When he doesn’t expand on the matter, Hua Cheng sighs, running his fingers through his own hair.

Which is now loose, combed—even though he doesn’t remember when he got around to that.

“...Mount Tonglu has opened,” he mutters, prompting Xie Lian stiffening with shock.

“...A new ghost king is about to be born?”

"Possibly," Hua Cheng agrees, though he's not sure if that's so easy to discern now, with how unsettled everything has been. "Now, what happened while I was...out of sorts?"

"Oh..." Xie Lian looks away, "Nothing of note, really..."

It's the reluctance that seems to catch the ghost king's attention.

"...Nothing?"

"No." Xie Lian agrees, bobbing his head.

"No, it wasn't nothing, or—?"

"It was nothing!" He repeats, a little too quickly this time, and Hua Cheng's heart sinks in response.

"...Did I do something to you, your highness?" His voice is uncharacteristically quiet, and Xie Lian—

"Just the opposite, actually..."

—Responds quickly, but in an even more baffling way.

"...The Opposite?"

"Well, you see..." The prince fiddles with his sleeve. "I...well...um..."

"...You what?"

And when Xie Lian blurts out the answer—

"I hit you!"

Hua Cheng is left sitting there, utterly shocked.

"...You what?"

"...In the face," Xie Lian adds, covering his mouth with his hand. "I-I'm really sorry, San Lang, I was startled, and we fought—"

"...We did?"

"Oh yes," the prince mutters, hanging his head. "I'm sure the forge is a mess by now, tools got scattered all over the place. And eventually I just...punched you in the face... hard. I...I'm so sorry, I didn't mean—"

Hua Cheng reaches up to touch his own cheeks, tilting his head.

“...It doesn’t feel like you struck me,” he comments, confused. Given how strong the prince can be when he actually exerts force, if he hit Hua Cheng hard enough to be so apologetic, he would think...

“Well—yes,” Xie Lian nods quickly, hands still covering his own face. “You were absorbing so much power—I’m sure that your body already healed from it, but I still thought I ought to apologize...”

Hua Cheng thinks that over, reaching down to twist the bead braided into his hair. “...Did something happen to my back?”

Xie Lian goes completely stiff.

“What do you mean?”

“Well,” Hua Cheng frowns, reaching over his head to touch his shoulder blade through the fabric of his robes. He isn’t uncomfortable —but he can sense broken skin.

Which is somewhat bizarre.

“It feels like something scratched me.”

If Xie Lian were a cat, every single hair on his body would be standing on end by now.

“And if my face could heal from a serious blow from his highness to the point where I couldn’t feel it, but I still feel that—?”

“You tripped!”

Hua Cheng leans over, eyeing Xie Lian a little more curiously as the prince turns away from him, his face still hidden.

“...I tripped?” He repeats.

“...Maybe I shoved you...” Xie Lian croaks, his voice cracking from the shame. “I was really so horrible to San Lang, I-I’m sorry!”

And maybe, just maybe, if Hua Cheng had been given the time to examine his god more thoroughly, he would have noticed something.

Xie Lian always does his hair immediately after waking each morning —so having it loose at this hour is strange for him.

(And if Hua Cheng had looked more closely, he might have seen certain things where the prince’s jawline meets his ear, or upon the nape of his neck.)

He also might have noticed that the black robes Xie Lian is wearing are freshly woven —

And with a much higher collar than usual.

Given time, he would have noticed all of those things—and maybe, just possibly—

How Unoffended the prince seems about such a predicament, only worrying for Hua Cheng's reaction.

In any case...

"Sir," the sound of Yin Yu's voice draws his attention. "You have visitors."

Hua Cheng glances over to the entrance to the table, finding his assistant waiting for him there—and he raises an eyebrow.

"Whoever it is, they can wait."

"Well, the thing is—"

"No," a familiar voice cuts the ghost officer off firmly. "It can't wait."

Xie Lian grows still.

"...General Ming Guang?" He questions, turning around.

Pei stands just behind Yin Yu.

Weary, but resigned.

"Your highness."

Xie Lian can't say he and the general have spent very much time together, but still—

He's never heard him like this.

Cold. Devoid of any good humor.

"I thought you wouldn't be coming to speak to San Lang until the matter with the Water Master had been—?"

"He's dead."

The news is delivered in clipped, unforgiving terms, and Pei feels no need to soften the blow.

It's not as though either of them care.

Still, Xie Lian winces

"...I'm so sorry for your loss," he mutters, shaking his head. "And Shi Qingxuan?"

"Had to be sedated by Xuan Zhen after He Xuan ascended while carrying her brother's corpse," the martial god explains calmly, eyes never leaving Hua Cheng.

And even he can't manage not to react upon THAT news. "He ascended?"

"Yes." Pei crosses his arms. Before, when Xie Lian came here with Shi Qingxuan and Lang Qianqiu—both seemed nervous about being in Hua Cheng's territory.

But it seems to be the furthest thing from Pei's mind.

"Then, he attempted to assassinate the emperor with the Godslayer, and promptly descended once more."

Hua Cheng doesn't react this time, but Xie Lian does—sitting up sharply, eyes widening with concern.

"Is his majesty alright?"

The worry in his voice turns Hua Cheng's stomach.

"He's sealed in the Imperial Residence, recovering." Pei Ming mutters. "But I didn't come here to update either of you on public information." His eyes settle on Hua Cheng once more. "I came because I was promised answers."

"..." Hua Cheng places a hand on Xie Lian's shoulder, stopping him from responding on the ghost king's behalf. Instead, he rises to his feet.

"My officer said I have guests. Did you bring anyone with you?"

"Ling Wen," Pei replies flatly. "But she had her own business here."

"Hmm," Hua Cheng acknowledges, offering a hand to help Xie Lian to his feet. “We should continue this conversation in Paradise Manor. Less listening ears.”

Pei falls into step behind them, and Xie Lian frowns.

Hua Cheng is worried about them being overheard? But…by who?

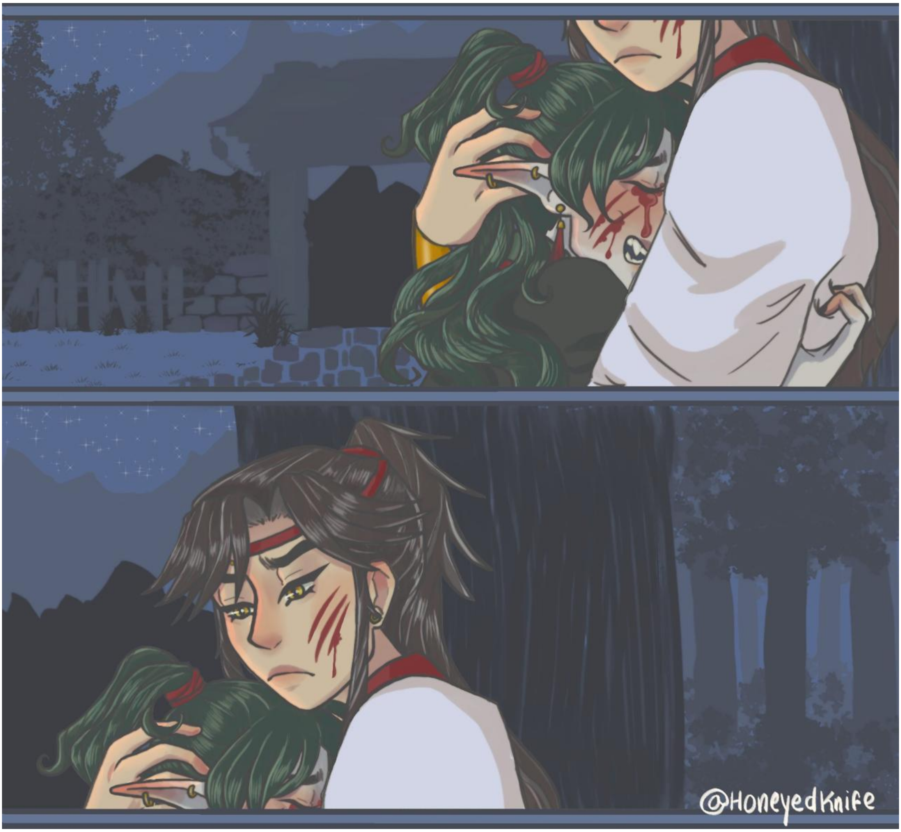
And does that mean…people may have overheard them last night?

Pei Ming disrupts him from that mortifying thought, stating:

“…And I want to know just how you and Blackwater are connected to Zhao Beitong.”

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from artists, do not reproduce or reuse for any reason.



@HoneyedKnife

CREDIT: HONEY

CREDIT: JUIH

Chapter End Notes

Thank you to Honey and Juih for their wonderful artwork, and allowing me to share it!!

xoxo, Evie

The Cultivation Master

Chapter Summary

In the heavens, there is a ghost.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

In the heavens, there is a ghost.

Shi Qingxuan lays on her side, hair spreading limply on the pillow around her.

Eyes always watching the window.

Waiting for another flash of golden light.

For the screams of greeting on the martial Avenue.

For the day before to be a dream.

A golden locket is clutched between her fingers, cold and still.

Waiting for her brother to come home.

Knock, knock!

“I’m not hungry.”

Everyone has been begging her to sleep. To eat.

The only ounce of rest she’s had came when Mu Qing used a spell to force her to sleep.

“It’s Lady Ling Wen, Lady Wind…” Pei Ming’s servant starts, then stops—awkward, remorseful. “Lady Shi Qingxuan.”

She doesn’t move, eyes hollow.

“I don’t want to see anyone.”

“She says it’s about your brother.”

The silence that follows is long—pained.

“...Alright.”

She hears the door open and shut behind her, unsurprised when Ling Wen doesn’t speak first.

Shi Qingxuan sits up, tiredly combing her fingers through her curls. Normally, she wouldn’t be seen in such a state, but...

That doesn’t matter.

None of it does. Not anymore.

“...What is it?”

When she hears no answer, she closes her eyes, irritated.

“If you don’t have anything to say, then why—?”

She turns around with a glare, then falls silent.

Eyes landing on a face she thought she would never see again.

He Xuan.

The silence is long—and both of them are hesitant to break it.

Neither of them want to dare.

But eventually, someone must.

“I was sure you would scream for the guards as soon as you saw me.”

She doesn’t seem afraid, that’s for certain—or on the verge of tears.

“I’m still deciding.”

Her tone is uncharacteristically cool—and her voice is hoarse.

From all of the crying.

Before the silence can settle in once more, she forces herself to be brave. Spine straight, eyes staring straight forward.

“...Why would you risk coming here?”

He Xuan closes his eyes, taking a deep breath.

“Because you deserve more from me.”

It’s not the answer she expected. One that leaves Shi Qingxuan recoiling, staring at him with distrust and confusion.

“...More?” She grips the locket in her hand so tightly, it leaves an imprint. “What would that even look like, at this point?”

He Xuan won’t look at her, and—

Shi Qingxuan doesn’t break down into hysterics. Not because she doesn’t want to. Or because she doesn’t have enough pain to scream and cry, no—

She’s just too tired.

Her eyes drift down to her closed fist, wishing the emptiness in her chest would just go away.

That at some point, it might get easier to live with, but...

When she looks up again, He Xuan isn’t standing on the other side of the room any longer.

He’s right in front of her. On his knees.

That was one thing she always noticed about her friend, one of the qualities that drew her into him so early on.

His pride.

It’s subtle, but ever present. And she...

She really couldn’t have imagined him on his knees before now.

“I didn’t kill him, Shi Qingxuan.”

The mortal stares down at him—eyes wide, confused—

Distrusting.

“...How can you expect me to believe that, after everything you did?” He doesn’t answer immediately, and she looks away, shaking her head.

“And it’s not—” She closes her eyes. “It’s not like I can say you would be wrong for doing that. Because you wouldn’t have been. I told my brother that we deserved to be punished, I—I believed that!”

She doesn't hear what he whispers under his breath: "I know."

"...But I didn't deserve to be lied to. I didn't..." Her jaw clenches as she clutches the hand holding the locket to her chest. "I didn't deserve to be used."

"I didn't—"

"You are the only person that I've ever been with." Shi Qingxuan finally looks at him once more. "Every single one of my firsts—they're all yours."

Every kiss. Every touch. Being with a man, a woman—in the most intimate of ways.

It's all been He Xuan.

"I don't have a right to say you couldn't have taken what was fair," Shi Qingxuan mutters.

"Whether or not you killed him—I can't say if that was right. I...If you had killed me , I wouldn't have blamed you. Do you understand that?"

He can hardly seem to bear to look at her. Because he never could have done that. He knows, even if she doesn't.

"...But instead of any of that, you have intertwined your life so closely with mine, I..." Shi Qingxuan places a hand against her forehead, her throat tight with emotions. "Is that my punishment? He had to die, and I have to live with...feeling like this?"

Not for that long.

In all likelihood, she has less than a year to live.

And still, it feels like agony.

"...I'm not trying to punish you," he mutters, lowering his head. "And I didn't kill him."

"Maybe if you hadn't spent so many years lying to me, I would believe you."

And he can't hold that against her.

When she says she would have understood if he had simply come to take her brother's life outright—He Xuan believes her.

It’s the lying that she holds against him.

She is a creature that has been in a gilded cage of lies all her life.

One that He Xuan resented Shi Wudu for, when he was younger. Found him to be a controlling, arrogant guardian—one who kept her from the world.

But then, He Xuan told lies of his own.

Strengthening the bars around her with every falsehood that fell from his lips.

“...And you were so determined to kill him before, what changed?” She asks him like she already knows—and still.

He owes her an answer.

“...The child.”

Shi Qingxuan tilts her head back—a faint, bitter smile on her face.

“You know something?” She sniffs, gripping the sheets. “The longer I spend in this form without changing back—the more contempt I have for the sex I was born to.” Her eyes lower down to look at him sharply. “Because you didn’t care about how any of this would impact me, until you knew I had your child inside of me.”

It’s harsh.

“...I cared.” He whispers. “I changed my plans so many times—”

“You didn’t care enough to stop fucking me, did you?”

She wants to cry. To scream and sob about how unfair it is.

But if she did—he would only pity her. She would be the weak, foolish person he believed her to be.

So Shi Qingxuan digs deep, finding a solid point inside of her heart—and she holds onto it, gripping on tightly.

“You didn’t care when you took my virginity. You didn’t care when I opened up to you SO many times. You didn’t care when I said I was in love with you.”

“...I did care.” He repeats, knowing what her reply would be—she doesn't even need to say it again.

He didn't care enough.

"And maybe you're a fantastic actor," she continues, her voice reeking with bitterness and pain. "Maybe every other word you said to me was a lie—but I guess I must still know you, somehow." She stares into his eyes, hating how much of him she can actually see.

How much there is inside of those eyes that she knows.

"Because I saw when you changed your mind."

Not when he saw her terror. Her pain. How heartbroken and betrayed she felt.

Not even when he asked her brother to switch her fate with a madman's.

Only when he realized that she couldn't change back to her male form—and what that meant.

"It shouldn't have taken knowing that a piece of you was growing inside of me to spare me even an ounce of decency. And my brother...he's dead either way. After you took him away for three days, to god knows where, and I—" Her hands tremble. "I know he suffered, I felt it."

He Xuan allows her to speak. Doesn't argue with her point. Because—

Because when you're so lost in your own pain, your own wants and needs—learning about the impacts of your choices can be just as jarring as the emotions that motivated them.

"...I will never tell you that what my brother did was justified. It wasn't. You saw what it did to me when I found out."

How horrified she was. How frightened and guilty she felt.

"But you know one thing I have to give him credit for?"

Her jaw locks.

"The moment I accused him of what he did—he owned up to it. He didn't make excuses. And he didn't ask for my forgiveness."

Those words actually manage to cut him, because—

Because He Xuan knows.

He saw that moment, in the Water Master's memories. "He—"

"Alright."

He finally speaks again—his voice low, tense, and Shi Qingxuan pauses, unsure as to what he means.

"…Alright?"

He Xuan looks her in the eye—and he steals himself. "I lied to you."

Shi Qingxuan swallows hard.

"I approached you in the beginning in order to get closer to your brother." He explains evenly, watching the hurt flaring in her eyes. "I became your friend, knowing that I was going to hurt you in the end."

Saying it almost feels better. Like finally getting a weight off his chest

"I lied to Hua Cheng, telling him that I knew what I was doing. I lied to myself, saying that I wasn't capable of growing attached. But every time I got the chance to kill your brother, I found a reason to wait. And I said that I was being pragmatic."

In truth, he was a coward.

"The first time you kissed me, I told myself that it wasn't my fault, because you started it. When I kissed you back, I said 'that's what Ming Yi would do.'" He doesn't look away from her, even if he wants to.

Even if he feels shame.

"I told myself that over and over again."

As they tumbled deeper and deeper into something beyond either of their control.

"I told myself that, and I believed those lies, because they were easier for me to live with." He Xuan breathes in deeply through his nose, out through his mouth.

Even if he doesn't need to.

"But I knew it was wrong. I know that it's wrong now. I told myself that you weren't an innocent in all of this, and that made lying okay, but..."

Shi Qingxuan swallows hard, having expected so many different things from her old friend, but—

Not sincerity.

"...I cared before the baby." He states conclusively. "But hearing that, that was when what I had done...when I knew…that there was someone in this situation now who never had any choice, and now they were going to pay...I had to stop."

And oh, she wishes she didn't understand.

"I should have stopped sooner. I had chances. You gave me chances. Hua Cheng gave me chances. Your—"

His voice actually wobbles.

"—your brother gave me chances. But I didn't—and I'm always going to be sorry for that."

He blows out another breath, and the only thing she couldn't have expected to see in his eyes...

Was sadness.

"But I can't say I don't want your forgiveness." His hand drifts up to the bed, landing on top of hers. "Maybe I don't have the same kind of resolve as he did."

His fingers squeeze hers.

"Even if that makes me selfish, or unfair, or...a monster."

And Shi Qingxuan doesn't know what to feel, or say, or do—and then the last words that leave his mouth are so out of the realm of expectation, her mind goes blank.

"Because the side of me that fell in love with you is the only good part of me that's left."

The only places where he finds warmth, kindness, or hope anymore...are the points in his soul where Shi Qingxuan resides.

All of the things he used to hate her for. Her kindness. Her silliness.

The way she could embrace life with such carefree joy.

All of the things he told himself he couldn’t be, his losses at her expense.

All of those things made him feel again, one smile at a time.

She doesn’t...

Shi Qingxuan looks away from him, too hurt, too confused to know what she thinks. What she feels. What she wants.

“When I said you deserved more from me—I meant that you deserve honesty.” He Xuan continues.

Noticing that she hasn’t pushed his hand away.

“I took your brother to Mount Tonglu,” he explains, watching her stiffen. “Because I knew I needed to forgive him.”

“Then...why—?”

“The Kiln...has its own magic. It allows those who battle inside it to share their memories. I saw...everything.”

Every single moment of their childhoods. Of what they were to one another. Learning so much about her brother, yes—

But he also learned about her.

“And...I did forgive him,” He Xuan swallows hard, struggling to purge the fresh image from his mind.

‘I don’t want to get better.’

How trapped and shattered the Water Master was, in those final moments.

“But he took his own life.”

Those words settle heavily on her shoulders, a sinking weight on her stomach.

“...No...” She whispers, her voice trembling.

“Shi Qingxuan...”

“He never would have done that.”

Her brother—

“He was the strongest person I’ve ever met, he wouldn’t have!”

His hand squeezes hers, even as she tries to pull away.

“Sometimes…it doesn’t matter how strong you are. Your brother…”

He Xuan agrees with her.

Shi Wudu was strong.

“…He was carrying a huge burden,” He Xuan explains carefully, swallowing hard. “One that no one else knew about, and eventually, it just…”

It broke him.

He couldn’t carry it any longer.

“…What are you talking about?”

He doesn’t reply, and her lips tremble—remembering.

‘He won’t let me go.’

A few months ago, when she was spiteful and immature—she would have asked if it was Pei.

Not now.

“…Who was hurting him? What happened to him?”

He lowers his eyes.

“He Xuan—!”

“I can’t.”

“…” She grits her teeth.

“I can’t tell you.”

“…you said you wanted to give me honesty.”

His mouth presses into a grim line.

"That's what I'm doing."

"This seems like a pretty important thing to keep to yourself!"

"I promised."

She stops, seeing—

'D…Don't tell anyone!'

Seeing the pain in He Xuan's eyes.

"I promised him that I wouldn't tell."

"…Can't you at least say who else was involved?"

He grimaces, and he feels her start to retreat.

"Shi Qingxuan, it's not because I don't trust you, or I don't think you deserve to know —"

"Then why?!"

"It would get you killed."

"That might only speed up the process," She mutters under her breath —

Startled to see the way He Xuan actually…flinches in response.

"Did you know what would happen to me, if I…?"

He's quiet, and his grip on her hand—it's more clinging now. Soothing himself, rather than her.

"…There aren't exactly many gods that are comfortable enough with switching genres the way you do for there to be a precedent," the calamity admits, hanging his head. "I assumed the spell was surface level, and internally…I just…I didn't realize you could …"

Then, breaking the utter seriousness of the situation, Shi Qingxuan says something that breaks through so many different layers of guilt, regret, and shame.

"Well—of course the changes were internal."

"…What do you mean?"

She stares at him owlishly.

“Well if I’m in my female form long enough I get the...” He stares at her so intently, while talking about this subject, she averts her eyes. “...Monthly flower...”

He Xuan’s jaw drops.

“You never thought to mention that?!”

“Don’t YOU start about things we should have mentioned!”

He Xuan lifts his hand off of hers, leaning back to run his fingers through his hair. “If you had SAID something, I wouldn’t have—!”

“It’s embarrassing, okay?!” She glares, wrapping her arms around herself. “When did you learn to be embarrassed of a reproductive cycle—?!”

“I was raised as a little girl,” Shi Qingxuan huffs, pointing a finger at her chest. “Up until I was in puberty myself, so I learned that sort of thing was EMBARRASSING!”

“I know your brother didn’t—!”

“He never talked about anything to do with having children!” She throws her hands up. “When I asked him how I was born, he told me that our parents had a long discussion about the responsibility of parenthood, they sent a prayer at the proper temple, and then I just...arrived.”

“How old were you?”

“...Seven,” She admits. “...And by the time I was an adult, I knew it didn’t work that way, but I just never thought about having children, so I never...”

Shi Qingxuan pauses, thinking, her thumb pressed against her lower lip.

“Though that does explain some of the things you said when we were...”

He Xuan wipes both hands down his face, feeling as though he’s aged more in the past month than he has in the last four centuries.

“That wasn’t a hint?!”

“You know how distracted I was!” She protests. “And you are the last person that I would have expected to want children, so if we were doing something that could have led to that, I thought you wouldn’t have—!”

“I wasn’t planning on it! But—!”

“But what?!”

“You’re a man half the time, I shouldn’t have to explain it!” He Xuan snaps. “I wasn’t actively trying to have children, but the idea of putting a child in someone is exciting. I don’t ACTUALLY want to be your shizun either, do I?!”

“Oh.” Shi Qingxuan pauses, scratching her head. “It was like the other times we played pretend in bed—?”

“YES!” He snaps, sounding so exasperated, if he weren’t already dead, he might have a stroke. “If I was being literal , why would I have mentioned putting a baby in you when you were in your male form?!”

“Okay, okay!” She throws her hands up. “I get it, the signs were there!”

He Xuan lets out the heaviest, most long suffering sigh, before struggling to get back to the topic at hand.

“The point is...I didn’t know you could end up with child, and I had no idea you would end up mortal, so it never occurred to me to...”

It never occurred to her either, so—

She supposes they’re equally to blame for that.

“...But I’m going to find a way to fix it.”

Shi Qingxuan sighs, the temporary bout of silliness fading. “Xuan Zhen already said...”

“He isn’t a ghost.” He Xuan mutters. “He doesn’t know everything about this.”

“And you do?”

He doesn’t answer, but she knows what he’s thinking—that he can learn. That he can figure it out. And she...

She sighs.

You can’t fix everything. She’s learned that the hard way. But before she can point that out…

“…And there’s another reason that I came now,” the calamity looks back up at her. “Otherwise, I would have given you more time, to…”

To mourn her brother. To be angry with him. To—

To work her mind around everything, but—

There are some things that cannot wait.

“…What?” She looks back at him, her eyes tired, confused. As lost as she was in the beginning. Maybe even more so, because just now…

Just now, it felt like the way things used to be.

Happier times. When things weren’t so complicated.

He Xuan steels himself once more.

“…You can’t stay here.” He delivers the words softly—but firmly, as though it isn’t a mere suggestion, and Shi Qingxuan…

Stares, shocked.

“…Excuse me? You think you can just—?”

“I’m not suggesting you come with me,” He Xuan shakes his head. “I’m not that much of a fool.”

Even if that’s the only thing in this world that he wants.

“If you want me to keep my distance for the rest of our lives, that’s what I’ll do. I won’t tell you were to go. I won’t tell you what to do, but…” He reaches for both of her hands this time, squeezing them.

“You can’t stay here.”

Shi Qingxuan stares down at him, baffled.

“…The emperor has offered me sanctuary. He’s offered the baby—”

“It isn’t safe here,” He Xuan shakes his head, “Not for either of you. And I—”

He lowers his chin, his throat tight.

“Even if it means you end up hating me more than you already do,” he mutters, his shoulders squaring with resolve. “I won’t let either of you stay here.”

The silence is long, and it weighs thicker with each passing moment. He waits for her anger. Her confusion. Her frustration.

And when one of her hands pulls away from his—that’s exactly what he expects. But she just…

Presses her palm against his cheek, guying him to look up at her.

“…I don’t hate you,” She whispers, watching the way his eyes widen in response. “I don’t forgive you. But I don’t…”

It’s hard to stop loving someone once you’ve already started.

“…I need time,” she admits, “but I…don’t want you to disappear from my life, too.” She’s lost so much, so quickly.

A brother. The life she once had. Her view of the world. Her lover, and…

Her best friend.

Even when she learned of the life growing inside of her, she was struck by the instantaneous loss of knowing that she most likely would never live to see her child grow.

“…Then what do you want from me?” He asks her quietly. Still on his knees, eyes free from deceit.

“…” Shi Qingxuan stares into his eyes, her own swimming with tears—tears she would have shed so easily before, but now she holds them back.

She’s grown.

“…I want you to promise me that no matter what happens—you’ll give them the best life as you possibly can.”

If there was any room for doubt as to what she means, she presses their joined hands against her stomach.

It’s so early on—there’s nothing to feel, and yet…

He Xuan stares, spellbound.

"It's a son," he whispers. She almost asks who he could know that, but...

He seems so certain, she decides not to question it.

"...Then...I want you to raise him. Regardless of what happens. If I..."

If she, against all odds, survives—

Then they'll do it together.

But otherwise...

She wants her son to be raised by his father.

She'll tell Xie Lian that, and he—

He'll see to it. She knows that he will.

Ironically enough, the only two people left in the world that she trusts are the Crown Prince of Xianle, and General Pei.

"...I promise," he agrees, his hand still resting on her stomach. "But..."

"...And," Shi Qingxuan continues, not finished with making requests, "After you leave here today—I'll get myself out of here. When I do—I want time. To think about... everything. I need to be by myself."

When he's here, she can't think... She can't detach herself so easily.

He starts to pull away, intent on giving her exactly what she's asked for, but... Shi Qingxuan holds onto his hands, biting her lip.

"...But before you go," she whispers, her voice trembling. "I have had the worst few days of my life. I'm..."

Her voice cracks, and with it—so does he.

"I'm so sad, and scared, and I..." Green eyes stare down at him, welling with tears. "I need someone to make me feel...like it's o-okay..."

His hand tightens in hers, knowing exactly what she's asking for.

Shi Qingxuan needs her friend.

She needs ‘Ming-Xiong.’

Not the person that He Xuan was pretending to be. Not the name. The title. The disguise.

She needs what was real.

And the moment he moves upwards, his arms opening around her—

Shi Qingxuan crumbles entirely.

Curled up in his arms, crying against his chest.

For herself. For her brother. For her child—Even for He Xuan, because...

With how carefully he cradles her in his arms, the way he smooths her hair, kissing her temple...

‘The side of me that loves you is the only good part of me that’s left’

She believes that he meant that.

As much as it hurts, to believe that someone who loves her could hurt her so much...

Her brother was the same.

And as horrifying as the prospect of facing the world without him is--in this one moment of self-respite--

She feels loved again.

Hua Cheng is careful, holding Xie Lian's hand as he guides the prince to sit on the throne in Paradise Manor.

"San Lang, I really don't need—"

"You were probably up all night looking after me." The Ghost King cuts him off gently. "Rest, gege."

Xie Lian sighs, knowing better than to protest.

Pei can hardly stand to look at either one of them, eyes following Hua Cheng as he walks to the cabinet in the corner, pouring himself a drink.

He doesn't offer the general one—and all the better.

"Dianxia has told me that the story you were given by the Emperor was that Zhao Beitong was the wife of Bai Wuxiang, and that she forged him into the first calamity, using him to slaughter the previous Heavenly Dynasty." He takes a drink.

"That's correct."

"It's a lie."

Hua Cheng feels the two martial gods stiffen, and he sighs, opting to give their honor an easy out, so they don't have to resolve themselves to listening to 'slander' against their emperor.

"That, or Jun Wu was given a false version of the story."

"...What do you mean?"

"He swapped the roles of Bai Wuxiang and Zhao Beitong." Hua Cheng explains calmly—concise. "She might have been a bladesmith, but everything she did was at his instruction—all to avenge her sons. He placed the blame for their demise upon the gods."

Xie Lian listens, though he finds it...difficult.

Not to hear that this woman was not responsible for the cruelties she was accused of —that doesn't surprise him.

Women make easy scapegoats in the eyes of history. His hand tightens into a fist against his leg. Cutsleeves, too.

No, what's difficult is listening to Bai Wuxiang being described in such human terms.

As a husband.

A father.

Remembering the things that man—that thing —did to him. To his family. To Hong'er—

It would be easier to imagine him as an inhuman thing. One with no…loved ones.

“He used her to slaughter the gods—and once he was finished with her, she was imprisoned permanently within the Kiln. Creating Ghost Kings.”

Listening to that finally gives Xie Lian pause from his own thoughts, looking up with curiosity.

“…She created you, then?”

Hua Cheng’s lips quirk as he takes another long sip from his drink.

His god has always been a clever one, after all.

“Blackwater too.”

“…Then she’s still in Mount Tonglu now, I take it?” Pei Ming questions, brow pinched with thought.

“No,” Hua Cheng shakes his head. “Only one ghost exits the Kiln. Up until me, she devoured every ghost king she forged, but I…”

“…Devoured her,” Xie Lian concludes faintly, not quite as horrified by the idea as he knows he should be.

“In part.” Hua Cheng agrees. “And He Xuan did after me.”

And now that the Kiln is open again—one or both of them will be called back. To create another Ghost King—or to devour one.

Only time will tell.

“…And why would he mention her when he attacked the emperor?” Pei questions watching the back of Hua Cheng’s head intently.

There’s something about him.

Something that feels…familiar, in a way that Pei cannot explain, only having met Crimson Rain on two occasions now.

Maybe in the posture. Or the hair.

Oddly enough, the way that he speaks feels like an echo of something, but he can’t place it.

“…I couldn’t tell you.” Hua Cheng admits. “I hold no fondness for the emperor, nor does he. But what Jun Wu did to offend him on this particular occasion—and what that has to do with her—is a mystery to me. As for what I know about the rest of it...” He sets his drink down. “That is a very, very long story.”

Pei leans against one of the pillars, his arms crossed.

“I have time.”

And Xie Lian is...somewhat surprised by how forthcoming Hua Cheng is being.

Normally, he would blow questions like this off without a care, coming from someone like Pei.

“...Shortly before I entered Mount Tonglu, I met two ghosts by the names of Xiang and Fai.” Hua Cheng hasn’t actually mentioned their names in centuries now.

He’s surprised by the small ache that it brings.

“Former gamblers who had attempted to cheat the owner of their hall.”

Xie Lian listens closely—as he always does, to everything Hua Cheng says—but this instance is particularly baffling. Because what could they have to do with the situation at hand?

“When they were caught—he had their throats cut, and their ashes scattered.”

Pei can’t help himself from pointing out the obvious. “If that were true, would their souls not have been dispersed?”

“They were,” Hua Cheng agrees. “But so was mine.”

There have been rumors of course—that crimson rain is the only ghost to have come back from such a thing.

Hearing that—even if Xie Lian knows it was long ago, and Hua Cheng is before him now, unharmed—

His chest still squeezes with fear.

“When I returned from dispersement, they came with me. And centuries later, when they faded...”

‘Faded’ being a generous term, that is.

“…I decided to seek out the descendants of the man who scattered their ashes.”

Hua Cheng offers no explanation for why he sought them out. A mixture between curiosity and guilt.

“That was how I found the Shi brothers…and learned of the creature that was hunting the younger.”

That catches Pei’s attention.

“You mean during their mortal lives?”

“At the ages of sixteen and ten.” Hua Cheng agrees. “And when I revealed the nature of the curse to them, posing as a mortal cultivator…Shi Wudu became desperate.”

Hua Cheng cannot fault him for that.

“It never occurred to you that leaving a parentless child with such knowledge might lead him to make poor choices?” Pei points out tersely, eyes narrowed.

“That has nothing to do with me,” Hua Cheng replies, calm. “I grew up without parents myself. I never even knew my father.” He shrugs, staring at Pei impassively. “That doesn’t make me responsible for the boy’s choices. I even encouraged him to do the opposite when he suggested tricking the Reverend into targeting someone else.”

He says all of it with such confidence, and yet.

Even back then, on some level, he had been reasonably certain that something horrible would befall the two.

Still, he left—all because it was none of his concern.

“A decade later…a young woman came to me in Ghost City, looking to make a deal. He Xuan’s fiancé, Qin Meirong.”

Who was willing to bet ten years of her life, no less—just to save He Xuan from his misfortunes.

Of course, no one else knows that Hua Cheng refused to take such an offer, accepting a home cooked meal instead.

“While I was fulfilling my end of the bargain, she was killed.”

Hua Cheng stares down at his empty glass, his eye dark.

“Having met the Shi brothers, then observing a man with such similar details around his name and birth suffer in such a similar way—I put together what had been done.”

But he took no joy in it.

“When He Xuan eventually died, entering the Kiln of Mount Tonglu—he saw my memories, and put that truth together for himself.”

“...You told him?”

“I had no control over what memories of ours were shared when he became a ghost king,” Hua Cheng corrects him coldly.

Xie Lian speaks up now, for the first time since Hua Cheng began his tale.

“Ming Guang—I understand what you’re feeling right now, but San Lang has given no indication that he desired this outcome.”

If he had, he would have actively helped Blackwater—which he never did.

“He Xuan and I made an agreement early on to stay out of one another’s business— and four centuries later, here we are.” Hua Cheng shrugs. “You asked what I know— and that’s all there is.”

And he’s been far more generous about sharing information than he needed to be, no less.

Pei doesn’t reply immediately, his brow creased as he puts all of it together, muttering —

“But there’s so much that doesn’t add...”

Just then, in the communication array—

Feng Xin of all people calls out.

‘Ming Guang, your highness—can either of you hear me?!’

Both of them freeze, sitting up.

'What's happened?'

'Yes—what is it?'

'It's...Shi Qingxuan.' They look at one another—while that might be pointless, given how Xie Lian can't make eye contact. 'No one knows what's gotten into her, but she… she's lost it!'

'What?!'

'Just get here fast, Mu Qing can't get a hold of her anyway—!'

Then, the other martial god's voice breaks in through the array.

'I'm sorry for not wanting to bodily tackle a PREGNANT WOMAN, ASSHOLE!'

'We—we're coming right now, don't worry!' Xie Lian leaps to his feet.

"San Lang—I'm so sorry, but there's an emergency!" He stumbles down the steps from the throne, only to have Hua Cheng catch him by the wrists, helping him the rest of the way down. "We have to go back to the Heavens, but we can talk—!"

"Later!" Pei concludes, grabbing his arm.

Hua Cheng stares pointedly at Pei's hand on the prince's arm, but he doesn't have the chance to say more before the two are out of the room, rushing towards the exit to Ghost City before ascending once more.

And the moment they land in the capital,Xie Lian hears—

Chaos.

"HAS SHE LOST HER MIND?!"

"IT SEEMS LIKE IT!"

And before Xie Lian can ask Pei what's going on, he hears the general scream out— "SHI QINGXUAN, GET AWAY FROM THERE OR SO HELP ME—!"

Then, the former Goddess's reply—hysterical.

"I'M NOT STAYING HERE!"

Mu Qing is the one standing closest to her, hands raised in a neutral gesture, all while Shi Qingxuan clings to the gates of Heaven—determined to push them open.

“My lady, you can’t descend on your own anymore—you aren’t a god!” He explains urgently.

“YOU’LL JUST FALL!”

“I CAN’T STAY HERE!” She repeats, clawing at the gates, tears streaming down her cheeks. “E-Everywhere I look, I see—I see gege!”

The other officials stop—their faces tinged with sympathy.

“A-And Ming-Xiong...I can’t sleep, I can’t e-eat, I...I CAN’T STAY HERE!” She screams.

“SO WHAT, YOU’D JUST GET YOURSELF AND THE CHILD KILLED?!” Pei rages, stomping over to grab her—and Xie Lian stops him, a hand on his elbow.

“Pei—calm down for a moment—”

“IS THIS A SITUATION THAT JUSTIFIES STAYING CALM?!”

“It might be for the best if we help her descend!”

Xie Lian walks over, grabbing Shi Qingxuan by the shoulder—and the minute she sees him, she clings to Xie Lian, sobbing.

“Your highness!” She weeps into his shoulder, clinging around his neck. “P-Please h- help me!”

Xie Lian hugs her back, patting her hair.

“She’s saying that being here upsets her,” the prince points out. “One of the most important things for the health of a woman carrying a child is to avoid stress, maintaining her general physical health. Isn’t that right, Mu Qing?”

“...Yes...” The Martial God agrees slowly. “How do you know that?”

Xie Lian blinks, and without an ounce of sheepishness, replies; “I’ve assisted midwives quite a few times during my banishment.” Feng Xin slaps his forehead with his palm, biting back a groan. “And since she can’t ascend or descend on her own...”

That only creates a situation where Shi Qingxuan is led to feeling claustrophobic and helpless, surrounded by traumatic memories.

“And we should just allow her to wander in the Mortal Realm?! What if Blackwater—”

“Pei.” Xie Lian cuts him off firmly. “We can’t ‘allow’ Shi Qingxuan to do anything—she’s a grown woman. She can make her own decisions.”

Her brother made a mistake before, sheltering her as much as he did—and given the challenge she faces now, Xie Lian wouldn’t be doing her any favors by allowing that to continue.

“And with everything that’s going on—between the emperor being injured, and Mount Tonglu opening, it’s unlikely you and I are going to have the time to give her the care that she needs.”

And the instruction, no less.

Pei balls his hands into fists, infuriated.

“So, what—you think we should just drop her off in the mortal realm and let her figure it out alone?!”

Xie Lian tightens his arms around Shi Qingxuan, who is still sobbing against his shoulder.

“No.” He shakes his head. “If Shi Qingxuan trusts me…”

“I do,” She answers quickly, her voice clear for one moment before breaking down into hysterical tears once more. “I-I do, your highness!”

Xie Lian nods, gesturing for Pei to join them—

(After all, he can’t be trusted to descend safely.)

“Then…I have a plan.”

Laughter peals through the air, light and happy, like the tinkling of bells.

“HEY!” One of the boys cries, bumping past the group of travelers at the city entrance. “WAIT FOR ME!”

The group of children rush through the gates, to the hills and plains outside.

“THEN KEEP UP, LIAO YONG!”

The sound of children playing brings a smile to Xie Lian’s lips—one that Hua Cheng, who joined them when they descended with Shi Qingxuan in tow—can’t help but watch with fondness.

There’s distant music in the air—people bustling about their business.

The further they walk down the street, more people seem to notice them, and it’s Shi Qingxuan and Pei Ming that are left frozen in shock, watching as the people of the city greet Xie Lian, the laughing stock of the three realms, with...

Adoring excitement.

“It’s the Weaver!”

“BABA, LOOK!”

“DIANXIA!”

Someone calls him ‘Mr. Hua,’ and Xie Lian is more sheepish than usual, hearing that while standing beside Hua Cheng of all people, but...

When children rush forward to greet him, he smiles, returning hugs, ruffling hair, nearly being bowled over.

The only thing that keeps him upright is Hua Cheng’s hand on his back. And Pei finds himself caught between two poles of disbelief:

One, that the Crown Prince of Xianle had a city of believers.

And second—

He’s never seen a god interact with mortals in such a way before. Allowing himself to be touched, returning their embraces—

He even seems to know some of them by name—asking them how their studies are going, their families, if they've been staying out of trouble.

(Naturally, as Xie Lian was living in this city until only a few months ago.)

What Shi Qingxuan notices, however—

Is the look of elation in Hua Cheng's eye. His expression is passive, controlled as ever —

And yet, she can feel happiness radiating from the ghost king—all over watching adulation aimed at someone else.

They…make an interesting pair.

"…I suppose the title, 'Liberator of Gusu' wasn't just a story…" Pei mutters, eyeing the new title plate being constructed over the city gates.

Removing the characters for 'Daqing', and replacing them with the city's true name: The Great Walled City of Gusu.

Well.

Sans walls, now—most of them are in ruins.

"…I had help," Xie Lian demurs, ruffling the hair of a little girl, clinging to his leg. "Speaking of…" he looks around, "Does anyone know where I can find—?"

"Xie Laoshi," a familiar voice calls out. "You honor us."

Pei and the others turn around to see the crowd parting for a young man in fine, dark robes—raven hair, pulled into a high ponytail, and eyes gleaming like fresh gold leaf.

"When you ascended, you made it seem as though you would be gone a long while."

"Well," Xie Lian scratches his head sheepishly. "That was what I thought too."

The two bow to one another, hands clasped in a gesture of respect between student and teacher—but the moment the teenager straightens, he rushes forward, pulling the prince into a tight embrace.

He's taller than Xie Lian, but pulls his feet up in a childish display of excitement—one the god indulges.

"...Are you going to introduce us, your highness?"

"Ah, yes," Xie Lian nods, setting him down. "This is Xiong Li, Prince of Gusu, and my student."

The teenager beams from Xie Lian's side, as though being called his student is the greatest praise of all.

"Xiong Li, ah..." Xie Lian sighs, and while everyone else seems to be waiting for him to come up with a proper cover story...

"That is General Ming Guang, Martial God of the North, Shi Qingxuan, formerly known as the Wind Master, and..." he pats Hua Cheng's arm. "Crimson Rain Sought Flower, the Ghost King Hua Cheng."

Everyone stares at him, slack jawed.

"...Well," Xiong Li tilts his head, wide eyed. "That's quite the party you're traveling with."

Pei Ming, however, takes the introduction with less approval. "You can't just go around telling mortals exactly who we are!"

"I'm not mortal," Xiong Li shakes his head, raising an eyebrow. "My cultivation partner and I ascended."

Pei stares, looking him over. "Then why haven't I ever heard of you?"

"Well, it was only a few months ago," Xiong Li shrugs. "And I wanted to help my people, which you can't do as a god—so I descended."

Pei wants to argue that isn't true, but... Xie Lian is living proof.

"...Aaand my Lan An can't live without me," he tosses his hair over his shoulder with a grin, pressing his hands against his cheeks. "So, he descended too!"

Shi Qingxuan mimics the gesture, doe eyed.

"That's so romantic!"

Pei massages his temples.

"Still, why are we discussing it out here in the open where anyone could overhear?"

Xiong Li smirks, crossing his arms. "Oh, so you didn't notice?"

Pei pauses, glancing around—and when he does, he sees the thin magical veil surrounding the group.

"Silencing spell."

He glances around them, "Everyone outside of the barrier thinks we're discussing Xie Laoshi's travels. Lan An came up with it for, ah...personal reasons, but it can be helpful in other ways, I suppose."

He snaps his fingers, and the barrier disappears.

"Come, there's much to show you, and we can discuss why you've brought your friends to visit."

He loops his arm through Xie Lian's, guiding him through the busy city streets—with the others following closely behind.

And it doesn't miss Hua Cheng's notice, the way the cultivator carefully explains to Xie Lian all of the sights they're passing, constantly considerate of his condition.

Telling him how they've rediscovered the old temples, and are now rebuilding them.

"And this," he stops in front of the rising skeleton of a new structure, "Is going to be your temple. It's really just a shrine right now, we didn't have time to do much else short notice, but—"

Xie Lian squeezes his elbow with a smile. "It's too much—but thank you."

He's spent the last eight hundred years in a world where his temples were burned, becoming ruins over the centuries. Until Qiandeng temple, he never thought he would have another temple like that unless he built one himself.

And now, he'll have two!

"And thank you for the blessing lantern—I was honored."

"We'll send you even more next year, this was just the beginning!" Xiong Li assures him. "Just a few months of freedom has brought so much wealth back to the city. Next year, you might not recognize it here."

Xie Lian hums, encouraging. "…Where is Lan An, by the way?"

"Oh…" Xiong Li blows his bangs out of his face with a huff. "In the Cloud Recesses with his students…but he's always back by sundown. Were you looking for him?"

"Both of you, actually."

"Oh?" Xiong Li stares curiously, but when Xie Lian doesn't explain, he continues leading him along. "We can wait for him in the palace, then. You won't believe all of the things we found since the Wens left…"

And in truth, it is rather stunning, even if he can't see it.

He supposes he shouldn't be surprised, given that Gusu was ruled by descendants of his own family, but…

It very much feels like the palace he grew up in—back in Xianle. When he mentions that to Shi Qingxuan, she pauses, surprised.

"…But your palace in the Heavens looks nothing like this." She mutters, examining the architecture a little more closely. The newly unearthed murals on the walls.

"Is it supposed to?"

"Well—normally the emperor models it after your original home, I'm told."

Hua Cheng is silent, watching the two converse. The way Xie Lian's lips turn down initially—the briefest frown—before he smiles.

"Oh—then that makes sense,." He pats her arm lightly, and when Shi Qingxuan starts to express confusion—

"I haven't had a home in quite some time."

They settle into one of the palace drawing rooms—most of which haven't been made up. Xiong Li doesn't see much of a point in putting the effort in—not when only two people live here.

Shi Qingxuan takes a seat on one of the chaise lounges, far more composed now than before.

"…So, you and Lan An are cultivation partners?"

"Yeah, dual cultivation," Xiong Li agrees, using a spark of magic to set the fireplace roaring to life. "Of course, he has his hands full teaching new disciples in the sect—but we night hunt as much as we can."

"Isn't dual cultivation a permanent commitment?" Shi Qingxuan tilts her head to the side, looking him up and down.

Xiong Li's expression darkens as he drops down into a chair, crossing his legs with a huff.

"It IS, and YET!" He sulks. "He says we're too young for marriage."

"Well," Xie Lian sits down near the fire, smiling gratefully when Hua Cheng helps him before easing down beside him. "You're both only eighteen, Xiong Li. That's barely even of age—"

"But you don't understand," the teenager whines. "He says I'm the one that's too young and that we should wait, but dianxia—we're the SAME age!! We were born on the exact same day!"

And yet somehow, after spending only a couple of hours with him and none with his partner, Pei can understand exactly what he means.

"Are you complaining about me again?"

The sound of his partner's voice from the door makes Xiong Li look up, leaping to his feet with a radiant smile as he crosses the room, wrapping his arm around his neck.

"No!" He lies, giving him a chaste kiss. "…Well, only a little!"

Lan An's lips twitch as he wraps an arm around his waist, surveying their company within the room. "…Dianxia," he acknowledges quietly, glancing over the strangers present. "What brings you and your friends back so soon?"

"Well," Xie Lian smiles, awkward. "You might want to sit down, it's… quite the story."

The cultivator goes ahead and takes a seat—sharing a chair with Xiong Li, despite there being plenty of other spots.

Something that Pei Ming wouldn't have minded before—and yet now, he can't bear to look.

Once introductions are made—Xie Lian launches into the tale.

Of everything that happened since the Mid-autumn festival. Of their trip to Fu Gu, then the Terrace of Cascading Wine. Being dragged to Blackwater Manor, and…

Everything that came afterwards.

And by the end of it—both teenagers are left staring at Shi Qingxuan in stunned, sympathetic silence.

“…We’re obviously sorry to hear that,” Xiong Li mutters, squeezing Lan An’s arm as he turns to Xie Lian. “But why bring her here?”

“Well—first, because this is the core of Ming Guang’s territory, and he…” Xie Lian struggles to phrase it delicately. “He was very close to her brother, and has an interest in her well being. And second…”

Now, he looks to Lan An.

“Because she needs a cultivation master.”

The sect leader stares back at him, arching an eyebrow. Most cannot stand making eye contact with the cursed shackles—unfocused and unseeing.

Not him.

“And you mean for that to be me?”

Even Shi Qingxuan seems unsure about the idea—but Xie Lian nods rather seriously.

“I think there’s potential in that spell you cast to clear my mind from the curse Wen Jiao placed over Gusu—the one where you used your Guqin. Even if it can’t completely purge the cursed energy from the child—it might prolong her chances.”

Xiong Li brightens, squeezing Lan An’s leg. “That sounds like a good plan!”

“You yourself said they’re barely of age,” Pei frowns, distrusting. “You also have connections in Yunmeng, don’t you? We could take her there. Or I have my own understanding with the Nie Clan—”

“I do have connections in Yunmeng,” Xie Lian agrees, “but Lan An and Xiong Li are both at a skill level where they were able to ascend. Lan An’s cultivation is stronger than that of many gods within the upper court. And if I can’t teach Shi Qingxuan myself…he’s the best option.”

“…Cultivation is not easy on the body,” Lan An points out quietly, the first time he’s spoken since Xie Lian made the suggestion. “Especially for someone carrying a child.”

Xiong Li crosses his arms, leaning against him. “She’s pregnant, not an invalid. Besides…” He looks Shi Qingxuan up and down. “She’s clearly not very far along. If we’re quick, she can adjust to the strain as the child grows.”

Shi Qingxuan places a hand on her stomach in response, her gaze slightly weary. “…How quick, exactly?”

Lan An crosses his arms.

“Sunrise.”

She makes a slightly horrified expression—but still.

It’s not the Heavens. It’s safe, and—

She knows it’s her best chance.

Once their plans are set, and Xiong Li has hosted for them to dinner, he has more to show the prince before he departs, leaving Shi Qingxuan in their care

Xie Lian holds his arm as the Prince of Gusu leads him along the side of the city defenses, recently under construction, lined with scaffolding.

“…I thought you’d be sick of walls by now,” he comments lightly.

“You can’t even imagine, Dianxia—but the world is dangerous.” Xiong Li sighs. “Our city is rich in natural resources that people haven’t had access to in over a century. If we don’t defend ourselves, we’ll lose our freedom all over again, but…” He smiles faintly. “We’re focusing more on keeping invaders out, than trapping people inside.”

That brings a smile to Xie Lian’s face.

Gusu hasn’t had its freedom for very long—but it clearly plans to make the most of it.

Hua Cheng stands at ground level, fifty meters below—watching with one gleaming eye as the winds blow through the grasses in the night.

It rolls like a churning dark sea until the moonlight, churning towards the edges of the forests, the plains disappearing into the slope that leads towards the mountains—and hidden within them, the Cloud Recesses.

There's something about this place that he can't overlook.

Listening to the story of how Xie Lian freed Gusu, of what Wen Jiao did—

He stole the city's name.

Effectively holding hundreds of thousands hostage right under the nose of all three realms for an entire century.

Until now, he only knows of one who used such a spell.

…Were Wen Jiao and Bai Wuxiang at one point or another connected?

And this spell Xie Lian spoke of—he doubts it would work as well on Hua Cheng's curse as it did on the curse over Gusu. His is older, and far more power—

Snap!

The sound of a twig cracking snatches his gaze.

And when he peers out into the darkness, between the tall, rippling waves of grass, he sees something that makes him go completely still.

A mask.

White.

Smooth.

A smile etched into the front.

For once, it takes his mind a moment to take in what he's seeing—

Wu Ming.

Or the mask of Wu Ming, anyway.

Slowly, the ghost king's lips pull back into a snarl.

There are very few people on earth, dead or ascended, who know what that mask means.

And only one who might dare to use that as a means of antagonizing him.

Hua Cheng flashes forward in an instant, grasping the figure by the front of the robes, half expecting it to disappear in a cloud of smoke, or turn into something grotesque as a means of frightening him—

(As Bai Wuxiang has always done to his victims.)

But it doesn't.

Hua Cheng pulls his fist back, claws already extended, but—

He notices something else.

A pounding heartbeat.

Terrified.

…Human.

"…" He glares, reaching for the edge of the mask—and as he does, Xie Lian reaches forward to grasp the railing, concerned.

"San Lang?"

Even from here, he can hear that the Ghost King went running off past the wall. Is something wrong? Did something—?

Of course, he makes one critical error—one even Xiong Li doesn't have time to correct—

See, this being a new wall, under construction…It doesn't have a railing.

As such, he's sent tumbling under the edge with a sharp, startled breath, Xiong Li scrambling to catch him, but their fingers slip past one another.

"XIE LAOSHI!"

Hua Cheng glances back, his jaw clenching as he shoves the figure back viciously, sending it tumbling into the dark.

Without another word, he takes a running leap—easily catching his god in his arms, landing back on the ground lightly, the bells on his boots chiming with a soft—

Clink, clink!

And it's almost endearing, the way Xie Lian had his eyes squeezed shut with annoyance.

Braced for impact, even if he couldn't see the ground coming.

And this time, unlike when they fell into the Sinner's Pit—he leans into him, rather than waiting for Hua Cheng to squeeze him closer.

"Oh, thank you San Lang, I'm sorry—what was it that you were running after?"

The Ghost King turns around, still holding the prince in his arms, glaring into the darkness as his mouth, however briefly, presses against the top of the prince's head.

"…Nothing," He mutters darkly, holding him tighter.

Whoever it was—whatever it was—

They're gone.

Which leaves him with a far more pressing question now, his eyes scanning for miles through the dark, over the plains, to the forests and mountains beyond—finding no sign of the stranger.

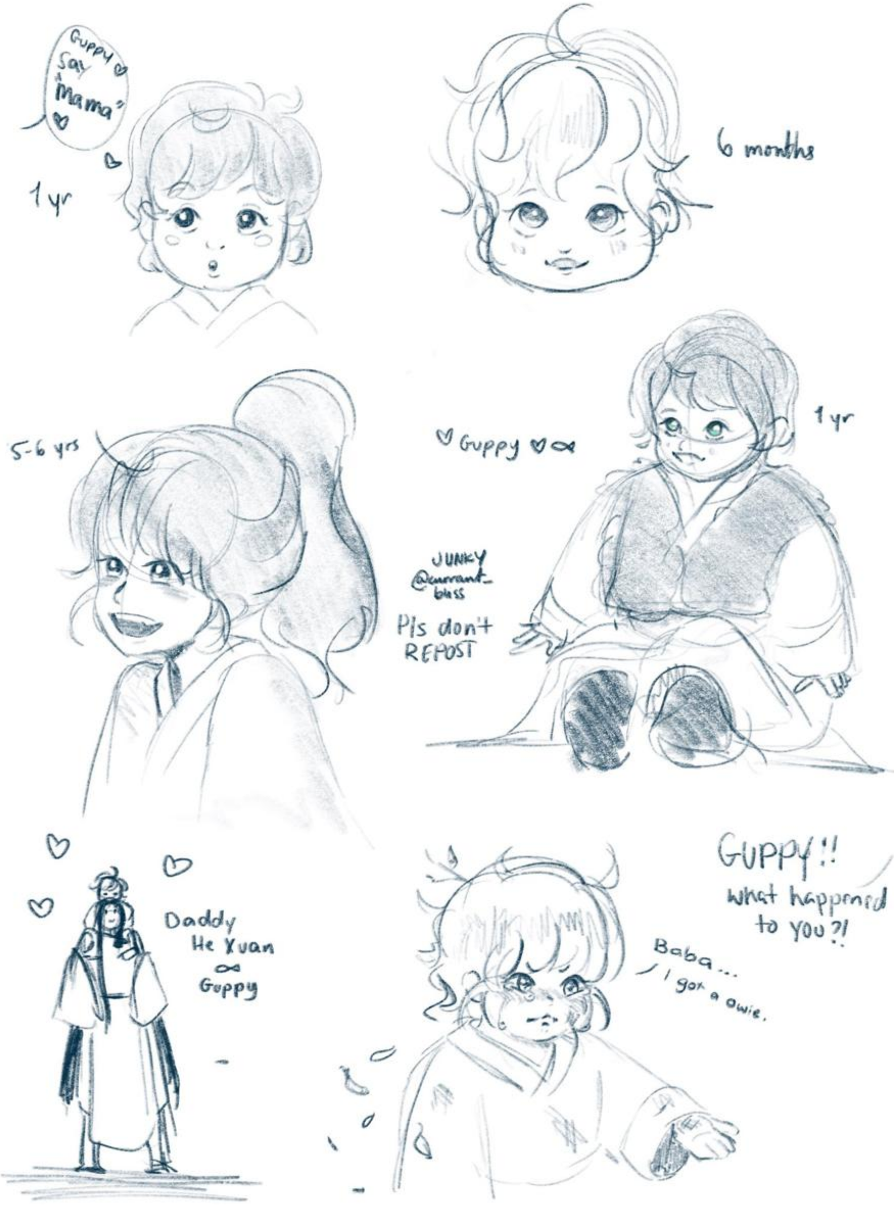
…What Mortal could escape his sight so quickly?

And how did they get that mask?

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS TORY

Included with permission from artist, do not reproduce or use for any reason.

Future Beefleaf Baby!



Guppy Say "Mama" ♡
1 yr
6 months
5-6 yrs
♡ Guppy ♡ ∞
1 yr
JUNKY @currant_bliss
Pls don't REPOST
Daddy He Xuan ∞ Guppy
GUPPY!! what happened to you?!
Baba... I got a owie.

CREDIT: JUNKY

Chapter End Notes

> thanks to Junky for your beautiful artwork, and allowing me to include it!

We Wear The Mask

Chapter Summary

> Swish…
>
> Eyelashes flutter, and fingers twitch.
>
> Swish…
>
> And everything—
>
> Everything hurts.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

TWO DAYS BEFORE

Swish…

Eyelashes flutter, and fingers twitch.

Swish…

And everything—

Everything hurts.

Swish…

His head, his back, his chest—as though he was just buried beneath a rock slide. But the ache in his throat is the sharpest—a burning line of pain.

But the moment sapphire eyes open, taking in the dusty beams on the ceiling overhead—

Not the dark.

Not a red door, or a black one.

He sucks in a rattling breath, one hand clapping over his chest as he sits up, wracked with a heavy cough.

W…Where is he?

“Ah. You’re awake.”

When he turns his head, he sees a man dressed in deep, almost navy blue robes, trimmed with gold. And when he sees the silvery white tresses flowing down his back, he scrambles away, that last memory of someone carrying him down the mountain flashing in his mind.

“W-Who are you?”

And when the man looks back over his shoulder—an unfamiliar face is revealed. That of a man in his mid twenties, with clear blue eyes, and…

A kind face.

“An ally.” He replies calmly. “Or, at the very least—I’m not here to harm you.”

“I’m—”

“I know who you are.”

Shi Wudu grimaces, pressing a hand against his throat.

The older cultivator looks him over appraisingly. “Given your condition, you’ve recovered remarkably well. You should consider yourself lucky. A weaker man would have died. Actually—most strong men, too.”

Bandages are wrapped tightly around his neck—and when he feels the flesh underneath, it’s still angry and red, with the remnants of stitching.

“…I did die.” He corrects him. The memories are faint, disorganized—but he knows.

He knows that he was gone.

“Briefly.”

The stranger shrugs, turning back to his business from before. “It happens. No need to make a big fuss about it.”

"…" Shi Wudu stares at the back of his head, bracing himself against the wall as he sits up. "How did you save me?" Then, after a pause—

"… Why did you save me?"

Those eyes, sharp and clear—look back at him one more time—

And he sighs, throwing up his hands.

"Ah, what the hell…it's not as though you can tell anyone of importance, anyhow. I knew the woman who forged that blade personally. The magic is powerful, but there are cracks."

"It felt pretty effective to me, Mr…?"

The ivory haired stranger tilts his head back, letting out a tired sigh.

Really, there's no point in worrying.

Who can the child tell?

"Mei Nianqing. You may call me Guoshi. And it did complete its assigned task, fulfilling the magical conditions placed upon the blade."

"…What?"

"You," Mei Nianqing points at the bandaged gash on his throat, "Killed the Water Master. Even if you managed to reascend—which, given the current state of your soul, is unlikely—your previous role has already been filled."

By He Xuan.

Shi Wudu can sense as much.

But that's not the only thing that catches his attention.

"…Reascend?"

Mei Nianqing arches an eyebrow. "You haven't felt it? Look at you."

He nods towards Shi Wudu's body—now that of a nineteen year old.

The same age he was when his mortal life ended.

"You died, yes. But the one I brought back wasn't the god—I brought back the mortal.” He explains carefully. “Which was no small task, mind you—I had to give you a portion of my own blood to manage it.”

The younger man wrinkles his nose, rubbing his forehead.

“…And why? You still haven’t told me that.”

“…” Mei Nianqing sighs, rubbing the back of his neck. “I’ve been watching you for quite some time, Shi Wudu. This was simply the first opportunity I had to get you away from him.”

The former god freezes, his eyes widening.

“…What?” He whispers, his fingers tightening slightly around his throat.

Someone…

Mei Nianqing watches him with distant, guilt stricken eyes.

…Someone was trying to help him, all this time?

“But how could you have known about—?”

“I know him better than anyone.”

Mei Nianqing looks over that face.

The same face Jun Wu would have seen when he chose to take the young cultivator under his wing, all those years ago.

Sharp, fine features. Long, well kept hair. The air of refinement most associate with royalty.

He resembled a missing toy the emperor once adored. Nothing more, nothing less.

But Xie Lian—

That boy is capable of withstanding anything. Enduring anything. All he needs is the smallest ounce of kindness in return.

Most humans aren’t like that.

It was only a matter of time before Jun Wu would have broken the child from Xuli. And by then, well—

Mei Nianqing has already seen him setting out a new mouse to bat back and forth as a cruel game.

“But why…for so long…?”

“Because the emperor is my failure.”

Mei Nianqing closes his eyes, remembering.

Not the pain, the betrayal, the cruelty, or the death.

But the child he met, all those years ago.

A bright eyed child, desperate to be enough.

Jun Wu wasn’t born cruel. No child is.

He’s the result of failure and cowardice.

“…And his atrocities are my shame.”

The Water Master has been the greatest among his recent crimes.

“In any case, you’re away from him now—though I cannot say it has come without a cost.”

Shi Wudu would have been exiled or mortal regardless—so he isn’t sure if that’s true.

Mei Nianqing sides to his feet, dousing the fire. “Night has fallen—we should get moving.”

“…Moving?” Shi Wudu questions, watching him pack up the few scattered items on the floor of what looks like…an abandoned warehouse. “Where are we going?”

“The emperor is incapacitated,” the Guoshi explains, pulling his pack onto his back. “I have until he recovers to hide you until all of this is over.”

“…Hide me?” The teenager repeats flatly. “…No, that isn’t going to work.”

Mei Nianqing lets out a long suffering sigh.

"I'm dying to know your wisdom on such things."

"Don't speak to me as though I'm a child," Shi Wudu growls, eyes narrowing. "I'm four centuries old!"

"To me, that is a child." The guoshi rolls his eyes.

"I need to find Shi Qingxuan—to find Pei Ming—!"

"No."

"Are you kidding?!" Shi Wudu glares, hands balling into fists on the ground by his side. "They're my family! They need to know that I'm —!"

"Go down that road, and you will only find pain." Mei Nianqing mutters. "And I don't have time to argue with you."

Before he can say another word, the guoshi snaps his fingers—and the mortal crumples, sleeping once more.

He promptly gathers the young man up in his arms, and continues their journey once more.

Even with travel arrays, the ruins of Wuyong are so remote—going east takes time.

And he will give the mortal credit for one thing—

He doesn't give up so easily.

Every waking moment, he seems to be trying to find a means of contacting his sister and lover. Attempting to sneak off to temples—or entering deep states of meditation.

It never works.

He always gets dragged back. And when he tries meditating, well...

"That determination is admirable," Mei Nianqing comments, sipping from his canteen as he watches Shi Wudu from the opposite side of their camp. "But you know you can't cultivate in this state."

The teenager opens one eye to glare at him.

"What makes you think I can't?"

"Because," Mei Nianqing points with his fan—not Shi Wudu's, but a cheap paper contraption that is meant purely for stirring a light breeze. "Your soul is in total disarray at the moment."

Shi Wudu squeezes his eyes shut again, his jaw locking stubbornly.

"It doesn't feel like it."

"...No," Mei Nianqing agrees, watching him with eyes filled with sympathy. "But it'll catch up with you before long."

Once he grasps the reality of his situation.

By the second day, however—he's become downright unruly.

“We're in the North now, that's—that's HIS territory!” The human snaps, straining as Mei Nianqing pulls him away from a shrine on their way down the road. “Why can't I just—?!”

“We're too close to the imperial capital.”

And if they stay that way by the time Jun Wu recovers—he'll find Shi Wudu in a near instant.

His eyes are strong, and far seeing.

No—for this to work, they need to go further.

But he can't bring himself to be offended by the young man's near constant protests.

He knows the motivation behind them.

That after saying goodbye to this world, thinking he would never see his loved ones again—all he wants to do is return to them.

But oh, the world is cruel.

Or, more specifically—

Human beings are what make it cruel.

Shi Wudu knew that. Better than anyone.

And yet—he never realized that there were worse things.

But on that second day, when he's being pulled insistently past a small trading village in the north, he hears the whispering.

That a Weaver has returned to the city of Gusu.

Which seems rather trivial, he can't understand why that triggers such a bustle of whispering, not until—

Someone mentions that this weaver is blind—and the liberator of Gusu.

Xie Lian.

The crown prince has always been a complicated figure in Shi Wudu's perception, but….

If he's there, the chances of Crimson Rain Sought Flower being there are high. He could find He Xuan—or even better, Shi Qingxuan might be with them. Xie Lian could call Pei, he—

"Don't."

Mei Nianqing doesn't sit up when he senses him sneaking away from camp that evening.

He's laying on the ground on his side—so relaxed, the former god had assumed that he had fallen asleep.

But—

He glances across the grassy plains, and Gusu—

It's less than half a mile from here.

Mei Nianqing has stopped him every other time—but he lets him run, now.

He knows the child cannot resist. He's been placed in a situation where he's compelled to try, desperate to return to that which he's lost.

Still.

He leans back on his palms, looking up towards the sky.

"This was cruel," He whispers, knowing Jun Wu can't hear. "Even for you."

He's tired.

Running through the grasses, the chill of the night—

It’s like being back in that hallway again.

Walking, walking, and walking.

But now, this weak, mortal body—it aches.

It tires.

It can’t—

It can’t do the things he’s used to.

And even this small task…

A task he could have done when he was nineteen without a problem—it exhausts this wounded, underfed, under rested version of himself.

To the point where he has to stop, bending over, bracing his hands against his knees as he catches his breath.

Was…Was life really this hard, before he ascended?

Was his body truly so fragile and weak? Or does it only seem that way now, compared to his near invincibility before? And…

His head feels oddly heavy.

Like there’s pressure, tightening in around his forehead, nose, and cheeks—locking his jaw into place.

What’s wrong with him? Even if he is tired, he could run himself into the ground with exhaustion before—until he was spitting blood. When did he become so weak willed? He—!

Then, his hands slide over his cheeks—and he stops, his breathing coming to a halt.

Because he doesn’t feel the familiar softness of his own skin beneath his palms—no.

He feels the hard, unforgiving surface of a mask.

Smooth—except where a smile has been carved into place.

“…!” He tries to swear in shock, to speak at all—but underneath the mask, his jaw has been locked shut.

And when he looks up—that's when he sees.

One dark, narrowed eye—glaring at him in the night, filled with resentment and confusion:

Crimson Rain Sought Flower.

He doesn't have time to think of why the Ghost King seems so offended, so unsettled by the sight of him—can't even cry out for help when he surges forward, snatching the mortal up by the front of his robes—his heart pounding.

W…What's happening to him?! Why—?

Why can't he speak?! Why is this mask on his face?! And why is Hua Cheng—?

"San Lang—?"

Shi Wudu whips his head to the side, seeing the prince of Xianle on top of the walls, his heart leaping with this horrible, pained kind of hope.

Because he was right—Xie Lian is here.

Along with Crimson Rain—and maybe, just maybe—his sister.

But that hope comes with it's own kind of agony—because they wouldn't be able to see that it was him.

And he—

He already died, didn't he?

If he had to come back—was returning to them such a cruel thing to ask?

But before he can think, before he can struggle any further to speak—there's screaming from the wall, and he's being thrown back to the ground, stitches in his throat screaming, aching all over.

He rolls onto his side, clutching his throat—and just then, arms catch him.

But still—not the arms he wants.

Not the person that he needs to see right now.

And when the pale glow of Mei Nianqing’s travel array wears off, Shi Wudu falls to his knees…finally able to wrench the mask free.

Gasping and coughing once he does, fingers clawing at his cheeks.

"W...What the fuck just happened?!" He glares, whipping his head around to look Mei Nianqing in the eyes, and the Guoshi...

He sighs, staring down at him with a look Shi Wudu has never been bestowed with before, one he cannot bear—

Pity.

"I thought we would have more time."

He goes about healing Shi Wudu's injuries—which, after such a shove from Hua Cheng—are severe, but he's in too much distress to notice it.

"What are you talking about?!" He gasps, his ribs aching as his vision blurs. "What...What are you..."

Then, everything fades to black.

When he awakens again, he's on the floor in another unfamiliar place—straw beneath his head, the snoring of horses nearby.

Oh, how far the mighty have fallen.

A god of wealth, sleeping in a stable.

He sits up, rubbing the side of his head with a groan.

"You know," Mei Nianqing sips his tea. "I was afraid that, after going to all of that trouble, that child had actually finished you off." He shakes his head, blowing over the cup's rim. "That would have been horrifically awkward."

"...You mean Hua Cheng?" Shi Wudu rasps.

"W...Why did he attack me?"

They weren't exactly friends, before—but they weren't enemies either.

"He thought you were someone else," The Guoshi replies calmly. "His reaction was that of fear."

Fear?

Shi Wudu can imagine Crimson Rain as many things—but not afraid.

"...In any case, this is as far as I can take you," The Guoshi mutters, rubbing the back of his neck with a tired sigh. "I have a long journey back to where I came."

"...You're going back there?"

To that god forsaken place?

"I have no choice."

Mei Nianqing stares at the teenager, regretful.

After all—leaving him alone is not an ideal situation. But there's no viable alternative to it.

And he still has his sight.

Mei Nianqing knows of fallen gods who have survived with far, far less.

Shi Wudu averts his own eyes--and when he does, he sees it there--sitting beside him among the straw.

A white, ceramic mask.

A curved smile etched into its face.

His first instinct is to snatch a rock off the floor, lunging forward and smashing it to bits.

"What...what is that thing?!" He glares, hair falling into his face as he looks up at Mei Nianqing again, eyes wide with panic. "Why did it just appear on my face?! I couldn't...I couldn't take it off!"

"...I was surprised myself to see that," the Guoshi admits.

"Though maybe I shouldn't be." His eyes drift downward, eyeing the broken pieces on the floor. "Your circumstances are very different."

Shi Wudu presses his hands against his temples, his head aching with confusion.

"Would you stop speaking in riddles and just spit it out?!"

"I can't." Mei Nianqing shakes his head. "Not by choice either. It would be far more simple if I could explain the situation. You'll have to figure this out on your own, but..."

It won't take long.

"What you make of your fate from now is up to you." He rises to his feet.

"I gave you another chance—but I can't tell you what to do with it. But I will leave you with a piece of advice," Mei Nianqing flicks his wrist, and his belongings fly into his rucksack as if lifted by an invisible hand, and a new travel array appears.

"Human beings are never truly alone. Not unless we choose to be."

Shi Wudu stares, sitting among the straw and the shattered glass as he watches the Guoshi disappear, his thoughts swirling.

Why...why would he tell him that?

Shi Wudu was the one who had wanted to return to his family, only for Mei Nianqing to stop him.

How is he choosing to be alone? He...

He grits his teeth, wiping a hand down his face.

He's tired. His body aches. He just wants...

There's a bone deep fatigue in him.

One that makes him just want to sink down and surrender to the pull of sleep.

But...he can't.

Not when he knows Pei and Shi Qingxuan need him.

They needed him before, but...

Dying didn't prove to be the solution that he thought it would be in the pits of his anguish.

And at the very least—his sister is mortal too.

Who knows if she'll forgive him—but he still has to try.

He pushes himself to his feet, tired and unsteady as he makes his way out of the stables, stumbling into the street.

It looks...like a city. A busy one, at that.

And from the salty taste to the air—they must be a port. In the north too, considering the noticeable chill.

"...Hey, you—" He points to a merchant, passing by—shocked when he receives a sneer in response.

"Who do you think you're speaking to?!" He scoffs, carrying on.

Shi Wudu freezes, his hand aloft in the air, eyes narrowed. How...

How dare he? Who does he think he—?

But when he looks down at his robes—black, worn from travel, simple garments—

He looks like nothing more than a commoner.

A woman takes pity on him, sitting on a nearby stoop as she hangs out her wet laundry to dry.

"Don't mind them, lad—the businessmen around here can be thickheaded. What is it?"

"..." Shi Wudu rubs his throat, turning to her. "What's the name of this place?"

She stares at him, surprised. "...Did you come in on one of the boats? They didn't tell you?"

When he shakes his head, she sighs.

"Well—welcome to the least friendly place in the hinterlands, Langling."

...Langling?

Shi Wudu looks around, taking it in.

He's never been to the city before--not even when he was mortal. There seemed to be no need, after his uncle's death.

It's a vast port down, bustling with commerce—not so different from Qinghe, where he grew up, if not slightly...

Harsher.

But that doesn't matter.

He needs help. He needs rest. Safety.

And he knows exactly where to get it.

"...Is there a temple for General Ming Guang nearby?"

She raises an eyebrow, looking him up and down.

"Are you a cultivator? We don't have many of those around here."

"...I suppose I am," he agrees.

"Well," she nods in the direction of one of the connecting streets, leading closer to the seashore. "There's a Ming Guang temple about five minutes that way, give or take. It's one of the only temples around here, actually. Good luck to you."

The teenager gives her a nod, holding his side as he makes his way down the street.

It's cold, and his body still aches, but—he doesn't focus on it. Not right now.

He doesn't have to push much further, he—

He's almost there.

The moment he sees the divine statue behind the temple gates, he feels his stomach lurch with relief, pushing the surge of emotion that comes with it back down his throat.

Incense is burning, and the coffers are full–but there don't seem to be any other worshippers here.

That's to be expected this time of day—and it works out all the better for him. Knowing Pei—he'll descend immediately and make a scene.

And for once, that's absolutely fine by him.

Shi Wudu drops to his knees on one of the cushions before the altar, clasping his hands in front of him, his body aching with exhaustion, holding out on the promise of relief.

It's been ages since he prayed, but ironically...

In his mortal life, he prayed in Pei's temples, too.

He might be a little out of practice, but...

'Pei?'

He squeezes his eyes shut, clasping his hands a little tighter.

'It's me, I—I need you.'

Admitting that feels like pulling teeth--but in this situation, he has no choice.

But...

He receives no reply.

Shi Wudu opens his eyes sharply, his brow pinched with annoyance.

Really?

He knows how many prayers Pei gets on the daily, but shouldn't his stand out? Then—

Then again, he isn't a god anymore. His voice is just one in millions—and most mortals never receive a response.

But unlike most mortals—Shi Wudu is a highly skilled, highly trained cultivator...even without his godhood.

He should be able to concentrate, to place enough power into his prayer that it would be quickly overheard.

And yet...

He feels nothing inside.

Only a cold, gaping void, where the power of his divinity once was.

Not even the warmth he used to feel from his golden core, back when he was mortal.

He takes a sharp, trembling breath. He—

He's just unsettled. Wounded. It's—

It's nothing. He'll recover.

He always does. To the point where he's taken his own emotional endurance for granted at times, but—

He'll be fine.

If he can't use his cultivation to get through—

Donations get attention, too.

Though, ironically enough—the god of wealth has nothing to his name now.

Just...

He reaches up, fumbling with his hair.

There's a golden pin there, holding it in place—

A gift from Pei. Worth more than a man's weight in coins.

The first gift the martial god ever gave him, and one that Shi Wudu rarely ever wears.

Not because he never thought it was beautiful, no—-but because he didn't want the Emperor to ask where he got it, or why he treasured it.

Instead, he only wore it on occasions when he wanted to feel steady. Reassured.

Strong.

Like when he was facing his third calamity.

He clutches the pin tightly in his hand, swallowing hard—staring at the golden dragon carved into its shape, a single ruby clutched in its talons.

Red was Pei's color, and it...

He was always so happy, when he saw Shi Wudu wearing it—like an overeager dog, tail thumping.

And to Shi Wudu's surprise, it's such a silly thing, but—

He doesn't want to let it go.

Even if he knows Pei will give it back, that it's necessary—

His heart still aches when he places the pin down upon the altar, fingers trembling as he pulls them back.

'Pei.'

He clasps his hands together again, pressing his lips together until they go numb to stop them from trembling.

'Pei, can you hear me?'

He waits, heart pounding in his throat, squeezing his eyes shut, when he hears—

Shi Wudu hears a reply.

'You speak of the General with such familiarity, mortal.' A voice responds coldly. 'Know your place.'

Oh.

Shi Wudu's eyes narrow into an annoyed glare.

Zeng Tao.

The deputy that's been filling in for Pei Xiu since his banishment to the mortal realm.

An old, judgmental man—one who always had a chip on his shoulder, being passed over by younger, more skilled generals as Pei's top deputy.

He and Shi Wudu never got along—but he tolerated the Water God due to his position.

(Shi Wudu didn't tolerate him at all.)

'...I'm perfectly aware of my place.' Shi Wudu fires back, glaring at the ceiling overhead. 'Now, will you tell the General I'm calling or not? He won't be pleased when he hears you kept me waiting.'

Zeng Tao's response is as haughty as ever.

'Oh, the mortal likes to make threats now, does he? If you were of any importance to the general, you would have another means of contacting him.'

Shi Wudu's eye twitches.

'You know damn well I'm of importance to him! I'm his—!'

The deputy god interrupts him testily.

'I have no idea who you are. You have made no effort to introduce yourself. That's a sizable donation, but to behave so impudently and make such demands!'

Shi Wudu frowns in annoyance.

'Don't you know my voice?!'

They've never been close, but they've been around one another for centuries. He should know what Shi Wudu sounds like—

'No, it's clearly under some sort of distortion. Is this—is this some wealthy young lord playing a prank?! You dare?! Or—'

Zeng Tao sounds exasperated.

'If the general has ended some sort of affair with you, pretending to reach out under a false identity is not a way of getting around that—'

Shi Wudu sputters, shaking his head vehemently.

'I'm no such thing! And who—who plays a prank on a GOD?! Have you lost your mind?!'

'You're the one who hasn't even stated your name or intentions!' The deputy god grouses. And Shi Wudu—

He wipes his hands down his face, seething, but—

He doesn't have any more time to argue. He needs—

He needs to see him.

'It's Sh—!'

Silence echoes through the prayer connection, and Zeng Tao waits, reeking of impatience.

'Yes, what?'

Shi Wudu falls forward, clutching his throat as it sears with pain, as though knives are clawing into him from the inside.

...What?

Still, he tries again.

'It's Sh—!'

This time, blood bubbles up from the back of his throat, making him choke and cough.

'The...The Wat...!'

The closer he gets to saying it, no matter how hard he tries—the worse the agony becomes.

Until he collapses on the altar with a scream, blood dripping down his chin.

'...This is a prank, isn't it?' The deputy god grumbles as Shi Wudu trembles on the temple floor, hands clutching his head. 'I've had enough of this.'

'No!' Shi Wudu sobs, scrambling and choking, still trying to force the words out. 'No, wait--PLEASE—!'

The link is cut.

Shi Wudu sits back, his chest heaving, clawing at his throat.

He would almost blame his recovering injury, but he—

That shouldn't have impacted his ability to pray.

With trembling fingers, he scrambles for a prayer sheet and pen—maybe if he can burn a note, he—!

But the minute he tries to write the characters of his own name down, his hand seizes up with pain, unable to move.

Not when he writes down Pei's name. Or his sister's name.

Just when he tries to write his own.

And when he tries to speak it aloud—

He spits out more blood.

Slowly, with building horror, the truth begins to dawn on him.

Mei Nianqing was otherwise forthcoming. But he was so insistent on not allowing the former god to approach his loved ones, saying...

It would only end in pain. And if he genuinely couldn't explain...

That reeks of magic.

Dark, cursed magic.

That mask—it appeared out of nowhere, and only—

Only before someone who knew Shi Wudu's face. Who would have recognized him.

He can't speak his name. Not even his formal titles. He can't—

He can't even write it down.

And even now, through the fear, pain, and rage—

He knows who would have done this.

He knows why.

Shi Wudu knows far too many secrets. And if he isn't dead, or trapped under the emperor's thumb—

He would certainly find a way to ensure that Shi Wudu could never tell them.

Shi Wudu hangs his head, shoulders trembling as thunder rolls overhead.

Langling is known for its storms—even in the winter months.

"...I won't tell anyone," he croaks, tears pouring down his cheeks. "Please, I won't...I won't tell anyone, just...just let me..."

'Just let me see him again.'

Normally, in any situation—his first thought has always been Shi Qingxuan.

Where she is. If she's safe. If she has what she needs.

But right now, there's this clawing ache in his chest, like the phantom pains of a ghost limb. And all he wants...

He curls up beneath the divine statue in the temple courtyard, leaning back against legs carved from stone.

Missing the living, warm arms that once held him so close.

He just—

He just wants Pei.

That's all he wants, shivering and alone, the rain soaking him to the bone.

Knees pulled against his chest, praying, over and over again, knowing that he won't be heard.

That no one will answer.

"...I love you," he whispers, fingertips digging into his knees.

Only able to admit it out loud now, when no one is listening.

Not anymore.

"I was too scared to tell you. And I...I knew you..."

He knew Pei had spent centuries running from that kind of relationship. That he didn't want it. And while Shi Wudu knew the martial god cared for him, he thought—

He thought that affection must have been a burden for him.

And he was so certain, if he told Pei how much he cared--the general would resent him for it. Or, at the worst...

Push him away.

Shi Wudu was too much of a coward to face that possibility. To make himself vulnerable.

"...It was always you," he chokes, hugging himself tightly.

Remembering what He Xuan said, seeing his memories of Pei inside the Kiln.

And he was right.

It's always been Pei.

Even before Shi Wudu knew him, just stealing glances at a statue through the window.

Just a teenager who knew nothing, and still...he felt pulled to him.

And every moment since he knew him—he wanted him. Not just in the obvious ways, but in all the little ones too.

Like he'd been cold all his life, and moments with Pei were his first brushes with warmth.

He might be a selfish person. He definitely is, but—

He wishes he had been more selfish, when it came to Pei.

Maybe if he had, he wouldn't...

When the storm passes, it'll be near sunset.

Worshippers will return to make their prayers before the end of the day, and Shi Wudu...

He lifts his head, eyes narrowed.

Before he leaves—knowing he'll be forced out anyway, having nothing to offer...he returns to the altar, snatching that golden hair pin back.

His hair is wet now, curling—Pei always loved it that way.

Shi Wudu pushes half of it up and away from his face, clasping it into place

"...This is a pretty sizable donation, right?" He wipes at his cheeks, glaring at the altar. "Good luck hunting down the thief."

He turns, hurrying back down the temple steps, the rain beating down on him, but...

He doesn't care.

It really doesn't matter anymore.

Alone in a city with no gold, too weak to perform even manual labor...he has no means of getting food, or even a place to stay.

Well. Only one.

The newly abandoned temple of Wind and Water, windows boarded and sealed.

He barely manages to pry one of the boards away, crawling inside.

It's cold—drafty and dark. The braziers and hearth have gone cold. The donation box empty.

Divine statues...shattered.

Shi Wudu is too tired, too broken to even look at them.

Shivering and soaked, he collapses on his side on the cold, stone floor—shivering as he curls in on himself.

Knowing that he deserves this.

He knew that before, but after the Kiln—

Shi Wudu knows that he deserves to feel this pain. This hopeless sorrow.

He knows, he does, and—

Still, he finds himself trembling and curled into the tightest ball possible, crying like a child.

Sobbing until it feels like his chest might rip apart, unable to contain the ache any longer.

Because he wants to see his sister.

Because he wants Pei.

Because he's scared, and it—

It hurts. So much, it—

It hurts.

(It really hurts.)

Even death isn't an escape anymore. Not when he remembers that door.

How he couldn't pass through.

Before, when Mei Nianqing told him his soul was in disarray...he didn't listen.

Because he had the same thing that always pushed him onward, in spite of all reason.

People he cared about. People who needed him.

People he wanted to see again.

But now, he knows;

He is never going to see Pei again. He is never going to see his sister again, either.

Because this curse—it won't be lifted until Jun Wu is gone, or Shi Wudu is stronger than him.

And he knows he won't live to see either of those things.

Now, he can feel it.

The emptiness inside. The cold void, where his golden core once was.

A soul in tatters.

He doesn't move.

Not when sleep takes him--or when he awakens again.

His body lies limp, facing away from the boarded temple doors.

One or two people notice that someone has taken to hiding in the abandoned temple--but no one cares. And why should they?

He doesn't try to find food, or water. Doesn't make a move to seek out work.

He makes no efforts to pray again, unable to bear the pain and disappointment any longer.

Slowly, the aches in his body become worse.

He goes from burning up to freezing cold, slipping in and out of consciousness.

He—

Oh.

It's been so long, he nearly forgot what it felt like, but—

He's sick.

He was prone to that, when he was mortal. Catching a fever if he didn't rest enough, or caught a chill.

And he always hid it rather well from Shi Qingxuan, despite causing himself to fall ill rather often, he...

He was never very good at taking care of himself.

But when he slides back into consciousness again—he notices something odd.

It's neither too hot, or too cold.

The ground isn't so hard and unforgiving beneath him. And...there's warmth—with faint, familiar crackling nearby.

When Shi Wudu opens his eyes, he's still in the temple—but there's a fire in the hearth.

There's...a blanket over him. Nothing expensive—but warm.

And from the feel of it--a bedroll underneath him.

But...who would bring that here? And why?

The fallen god struggles to sit up, still shivering as he rubs a hand against his forehead, and he notices something else.

A bowl of rice, sitting before him.

Nothing much, but...

When Shi Wudu reaches out, moving to push it away in disinterest—he hears a voice from behind him, whispering—

"...It's really you, isn't it?"

He stiffens, his heart leaping with hope as he whips around, finding—

...Just a normal, mortal teenage boy.

Shi Wudu's face visibly falls as he looks away, rolling over.

"...I wasn't sure at first," the mortal admits. "Everyone's been saying that you're dead, but...I was so sure I recognized you."

Shi Wudu doesn't answer, pulling the blanket tighter around himself.

"I mean..."

(It really does seem as though the kid can carry on without any feedback, doesn't it?)

"...Those eyes..." He scratches his neck sheepishly, looking away as he clears his throat. "And you kept saying the names of other gods in your sleep."

Finally, Shi Wudu pauses.

"...And when I tried to tell the other cultivators it was you, I couldn't say your name. It's gotta be some sort of punishment, right? The emperor exiled you, and made it so you can't...get any perks from your old identity?"

He sits up again, turning to look at the boy.

"...Who are you?"

The teenager blinks back at him owlishly.

"Oh...I guess you wouldn't remember me," he admits. "But you saved my life a couple of months ago—my sister's too. We were sailing here so I could join up with a cultivation sect nearby, and our ship..."

Shi Wudu squints at him blearily, swaying slightly from the effort it takes to sit up.

"...Was taken by pirates." He concludes, watching as the boy's eyes grow wide, brightening with excitement.

"You remember?!" He smiles breathlessly, practically vibrating.

...He does.

It was one of the worst nights of his life—and he used it to lash out at the pirates in response.

But still—saving those children was probably one of the few acts of interference he's performed as a god.

"You look younger now, but...like I said, your eyes are pretty..."

He trails off, then realizes how it sounds if he leaves it there, his cheeks growing splotchy and pink.

"Distinctive!" He clears his throat again, trying to deepen his voice to sound a little more grown up—and serious. "They're very distinctive!"

"..." Shi Wudu stares back at him, unimpressed as he rubs the side of his neck, trying to work out the aches and knots. "...I'm not banished," he mutters, looking away. "I'm mortal. You might as well get lost, you'll get nothing out of helping me."

The boy stares at him—and his response—

It takes Shi Wudu, who has lived a lifetime—ten lifetimes—of learning to expect the very worst from people—

"...Well...you didn't get anything from helping me, did you?"

...Shocked.

He smiles, his eyes a warm, golden shade of brown in the firelight. He couldn't be more than sixteen years old at most, but he's strong for his age. With a kind face, a warm disposition--and golden yellow robes to match.

"My name is Jin Feng, by the way, and..."

He sighs, crossing his arms. "If I can't call you the...y'know...or your name, I don't know what to..."

"...Pei."

The teenager looks up at him, shocked—and Shi Wudu clears his throat, turning around, rolling back onto his side.

"You can call me Pei Yuan."

His father's given name was Wenyuan, after all--it feels close to him, somehow.

And while Pei has become a not so uncommon surname in the North over the centuries, a flourishing clan with many branches...

If Shi Wudu can't have his own name—

Then he wants that one.

No matter how often he tells the boy to go, to leave him alone--refusing to eat, refusing to get up, or move—

To live. To fight for himself.

The child returns each and every time. His sister following behind him like a shadow every now and again.

Bringing food and water.

It takes a week before he's able to get within Shi Wudu's space without the former god panicking, beginning to hyperventilate, pushing him away.

A fear he always felt before—but now, he's too weak to hide the flight response.

But eventually...it fades.

To the point where he's willing to let Jin Feng close enough to check his injuries. To comb and wash the blood from his hair.

Slow, terrifying steps towards trust.

Still—getting the fallen god to eat, to so much as leave the temple—is a near impossible feat.

He doesn't want to get stronger. Doesn't want to see the world outside. It has nothing for him.

Not his family. Not his friends. And he couldn't offer them anything now.

He isn't even a god, he—

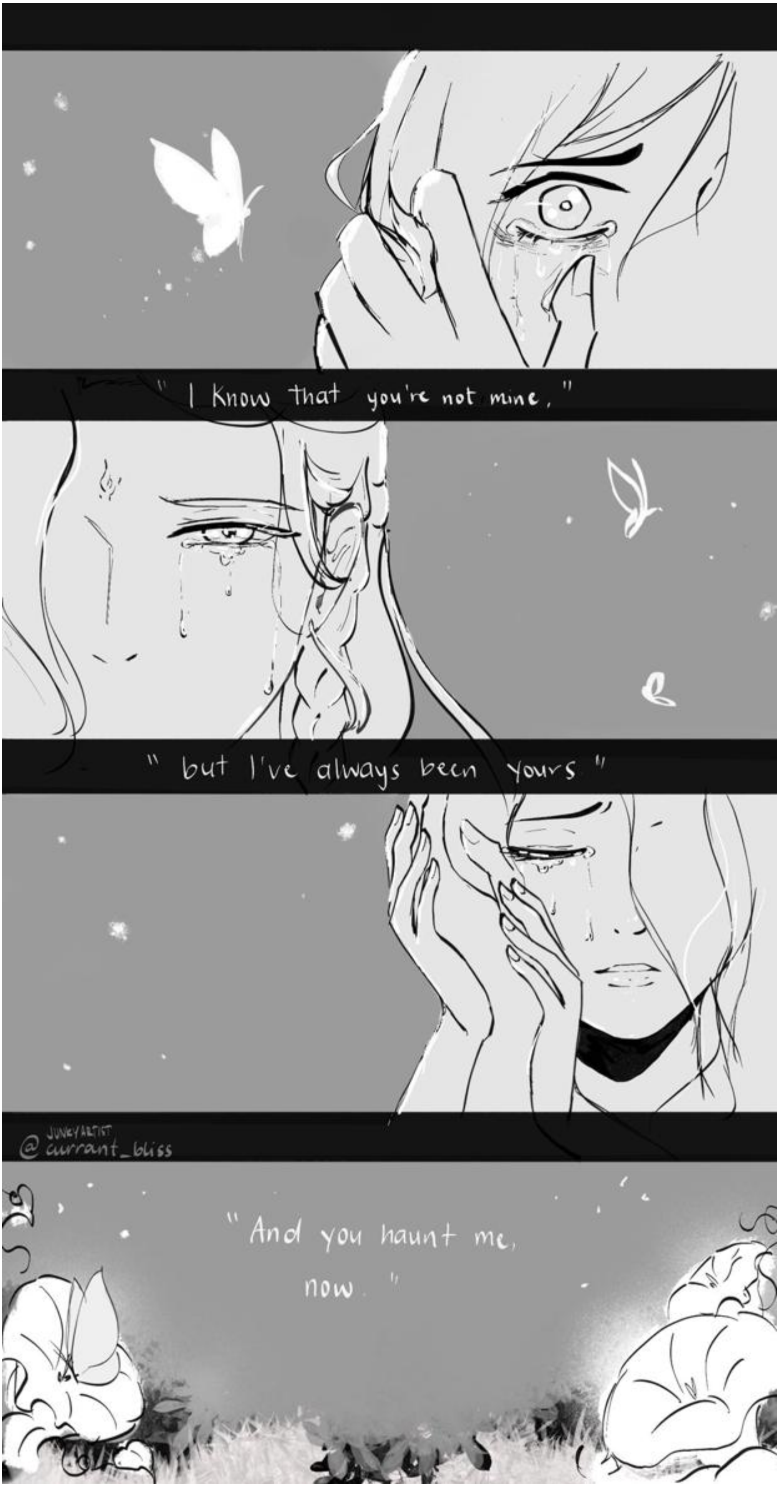
After so many years, he's exactly where he started:

Just a cultivator.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY:

Included with permission from the artist, do not repost or re-use for any reason.

Mei Nianqing and Zhao Beitong



" I Know that you're not mine, "
" but I've always been yours "
JUNKYARTIST
@ currant_bliss
" And you haunt me,
now. "

CREDIT: JUNKY

Chapter End Notes

thank you to Junky for your beautiful artwork, and allowing me to share it!

xoxo, Evie

Respite

Chapter Summary

> "You need to go back to Ghost City and rest," he places a hand on the calamity's arm, trying to sound firm.
>
> "Gege," the ghost king sounds almost endeared. "That's kind of you to worry, but I'm really—"
>
> Xie Lian shakes his head.
>
> "You weren't well the other night, and you haven't rested since. You've done so much for me lately—I want you to take a rest."
>
> "And what about you?" Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Not long after the arrangements are settled in Gusu, Xie Lian and Pei Ming receive a call sent out to all of the Martial Gods, ordering their return to the Heavens.

Not particularly surprising, given recent events—but still.

"You're sure you'll be alright?"

Pei Ming has both hands on Shi Qingxuan's shoulders, staring into her face searchingly, looking for any hint of unease about her situation. And she…

Seeing his concern now, how seriously he's taken looking after her since her brother's death—

She can't help but feel guilt.

"…I'm sure," she mutters, glancing back over her shoulder at the cultivators waiting behind them. "Xiong Li and Lan An have been very kind, I trust them."

The General frowns, still doubtful, and…

"…What's this?" He lifts up her wrist, examining the bangle there.

It's perfectly smooth, shining like black jade—with seams of gold throughout. Of incredibly fine make—but unlike any of the other jewelry he's seen the Wind Master wear.

When he goes to touch it, she yanks her wrist back sharply.

"Just a family heirloom!" She yanks her sleeve back down over the piece, surprisingly…protective.

"I've never seen you wear it before." Pei raises an eyebrow, and she shrugs, knowing her response is unfair, but…

"…I wanted to feel closer to gege," she replies, her tone tense

Knowing that he won't question that explanation—not even for a second. And there's some part of her that feels ashamed for using that, but…

It's better than risking him learning what it actually is.

A few feet away, Xie Lian is saying his own goodbyes.

Saying farewell to Xiong Li and Lan An was simple and quick, thanking them for their help, promising to come back soon—

With Hua Cheng, less so.

"You need to go back to Ghost City and rest," he places a hand on the calamity's arm, trying to sound firm.

"Gege," the ghost king sounds almost endeared. "That's kind of you to worry, but I'm really—"

Xie Lian shakes his head.

"You weren't well the other night, and you haven't rested since. You've done so much for me lately—I want you to take a rest."

"And what about you?" Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow. "You've exerted yourself more than I have, and you haven't rested either."

"Oh," Xie Lian waves that off, smiling at him. "Thank you for worrying, San Lang—but those weeks before the mid-autumn festival were the longest rest I've ever had."

That doesn't seem to bring Hua Cheng any comfort, but he carries on.

"Besides, I have responsibilities to attend to—and with Mount Tonglu reopening, you'll need all of your strength."

Hua Cheng is silent, and Xie Lian briefly worried this might be another instance where he refuses, so…

"…And I'll be upset with you if you don't."

He feels almost tentative, tacking something like that on. Is it really his place to fuss over a ghost king of all people?

Would Hua Cheng find that burdensome? Or—overstepping?

It feels like they've become closer recently, but is Xie Lian just caught up in things? He—

"…I'll rest," Hua Cheng responds slowly, his tone clipped. "In the best way I know how."

The way he says that feels pointed, and Xie Lian—he can't help but wonder if he did offend Hua Cheng. He never meant to treat him like a child, he was only…

"Okay," Xie Lian agrees weakly, confidence rapidly fading, until…

The ghost king reaches out, delicately pushing a lock of hair behind the prince's ear, fingertips brushing over his skin lightly when he does.

From behind them, Xiong Li gawks, silently shaking Lan An's sleeve and pointing.

(His partner politely looks away.)

"I'll see you soon, gege."

There's warmth in his tone—enough to set Xie Lian's mind at ease.

When he and Pei journey back to the Heavens—the general is unusually quiet.

Though Xie Lian supposes he shouldn't be surprised.

"General…Can I ask you something?"

"Yes, what is it?" He replies flatly, reaching out to take Xie Lian's arm, tugging him to the left.

It takes Xie Lian a moment to realize that there was a small hole in the path he would have tripped over.

“…Thank you,” he mumbles, clearing his throat. “Did you…?”

It’s been on his mind for days now, but there’s never been a good moment to ask.

“…Did you know what Shi Wudu has done to He Xuan before all of this?”

Pei falls silent, and Xie Lian half expects him to be offended, but…

“I wish I had. But no. We both had our secrets.”

He thinks on it, squinting slightly at the sunlight. "What made you wonder if I did?"

"...Your reaction was pretty calm," Xie Lian explains carefully. "And you never seemed...bothered by it."

"..." The general wipes a hand down his face with a sigh, his head aching with fatigue

He doesn't sleep well alone. Not since he got used to having someone...

Pei Ming opens his eyes again.

"I didn't know about Pei Xiu's behavior either, but I didn't stop caring about his welfare once he went into exile."

Clearly not. He's a loyal man.

But...he expressed disapproval and disappointment over Pei Xiu's actions, even if he still wished to defend him from the consequences.

He never seemed to have that struggle when it came to Shi Wudu, whether it was because he had been in danger at the time, or...

Seeming to guess Xie Lian's train of thought, Pei rests a hand on his hip, examining the road ahead of them. The Heavens aren't far from here, if he keeps walking, the conversation will end naturally once they're among the other gods, but...

"I knew exactly who he was."

The good, and the bad.

Even before they were lovers, the two were very close friends for centuries before that. But that closeness never blinded Pei Ming to his ruthlessness.

Actually, it was just the opposite.

He knew the man well enough to know the motivations behind seemingly callous behavior.

That Shi Wudu could be harsh, single minded, and never knew when to stop—but only when it came to one thing.

Shi Qingxuan.

But taken out of that context, when he didn't have to worry about that—when they were around Ling Wen, or it was just the two of them…

He was a completely different person.

Smug, arrogant, and coy, yes—

But also passionate, loyal, and brilliant.

He was never cruel, either. Not in any situation. Maybe not so generous or upright as people like Xie Lian and Pei Ming—

But he never went out of his way to cause harm, either.

"You can't really love someone unless you accept their flaws, your highness." Pei notices Xie Lian stiffening with surprise, and his smile is bittersweet. "I'm sure you must have guessed."

"…I assumed you wanted it to be private," the prince admits.

"Shui-Xiong did, but if it had been up to me…" Pei Ming takes a deep breath. "I saw the best of him, your highness—but I also knew what he was capable of. I wasn't surprised that he would do something like that, not if it was for Shi Qingxuan's sake."

And if it was Pei in that position—he isn't so sure he would have done anything differently.

If Shi Wudu had been open, Pei could have told him that.

Maybe then, he wouldn't have had to walk around with such a burden for so long. Secrets have a weight to them, after all.

"…And what was it you wish you had been honest with him about?"

Pei hesitates, and Xie Lian bites his lip, looking away.

"I'm sorry, I just…" He reaches up, grasping the chain around his neck. "I lost someone I was in love with before I could tell him—and I've always regretted that."

"…You were in love with someone?"

Pei sounds a little incredulous, and Xie Lian—

Well, given who he's speaking to, he can guess why.

"You can fall in love with someone without being physically intimate with them," he points out flatly.

"I know that," Pei protests, holding his hands up. "…In theory."

"I met him when I was still mortal," Xie Lian rolls his eyes. "He was from Xianle—and he was younger than me."

"Oh," Pei tilts his head to the side, thinking. "That's rather sweet, actually. Childhood sweethearts and all that."

"No, no…" Xie Lian smiles faintly.

He wishes they had been.

He almost took Hong'er into the palace after that incident with Qi Rong. And Xie Lian…

He couldn't even describe how many times he's considered how things could have been different if he had.

How much happier they both would have been.

Hong'er lived a difficult, cruel life. Xie Lian had the chance to make it less so, and…

He allowed Mei Nianqing to send him away.

"…We met when I was sixteen, and he was just a little boy—but I didn't see him again until years later, during my first banishment. He…"

Xie Lian's chest aches, but he still manages to smile.

"He took care of me."

"…And you lost him," Pei concludes, watching Xie Lian's expression carefully.

When he nods—the general sighs, recognizing the commonality between the two of them.

That they're both members of a class that no one ever wants to be in;

That of widows and widowers. Those who weren't lucky enough to go first.

And the weight of their own immortality weighs upon them heavily.

"…I never told him 'I love you' explicitly," Pei admits. "With my past…it's difficult for people to take that sort of thing seriously, coming from me."

Given just what Xie Lian saw on Mount Yu Jun, how he handled the situation with Xuan Ji…he believes that.

"But that's not necessarily what I regret the most." He mutters. "Even if I never said it—and he never would have believed it if I did—I know I made him feel it."

When they were together, Pei knows that Shi Wudu felt loved. That he felt safe. Even if he wouldn't admit what those feelings were.

"…My biggest regret was never telling him that I had a son."

Xie Lian doesn't reply at first, and Pei looks away.

They've stopped walking now—delaying their journey by a few minutes. And Pei takes a seat on a large boulder by the side of the path, his shoulders slumping.

"I'm not sure if you remembered—I assumed Xuan Zhen must have told you…"

"He did," Xie Lian agrees quietly. "I remember."

Many, many years ago, before his trial that cast him out of the Heavens—Pei asked for his permission to search for a mortal woman in Xianle.

A former lover by the name of Qing Yuan.

And when Xie Lian gave his permission, he asked Mu Qing about the matter—learning of the woman's death.

Along with the presumed loss of her son.

"…When I found out she was gone, I…" Pei closes his eyes. "I felt so much shame, and guilt—but then, they told me she had a son." He doesn't look up, his shoulders stiffened. "From the age he was, the math was easy to put together. And for one second—"

Xie Lian's chest pangs with sympathy when the general's voice trembles.

"…I was someone's father." He swallows thickly, pushing his fingers through his hair. "And I wasn't expecting the way that would make me feel. I'd never thought about having children before, but the moment I…"

He doesn't have to finish the sentence for Xie Lian to understand.

The moment Pei Ming knew that he had a son, he loved him. That instantaneous, unconditional love that comes from being a parent.

Xie Lian hasn't felt that before himself—and he never will—but he's seen it countless times in others.

"And it was only for a moment," Pei swallows down the pain, letting out a slow, trembling breath. "Because in the next second, I was told that he was dead."

Likely dead, to be more specific.

Ming Guang had refused to accept that at the time.

He looked. He searched for years .

His deputies swept the former lands of Xianle and Yong'an, finding orphan boys of the appropriate age—comparing their looks to Qing Yuan's, to his own—asking them their mother's names, where they came from.

None of them were him.

Between the plague and the war…

Eventually, he had to accept the truth.

"…And you wanted the Water Master to know about him," Xie Lian whispers.

Pei nods, his head still hanging low.

"He really thought the best of me. That I was this…righteous, upstanding person." He lets out a ragged sigh. "I wish I had told him about my failures."

"Oh…" Xie Lian sits down beside him, placing a hand on the general's shoulder. "You didn't fail, Pei."

His tone is so gentle, the martial god can hardly bear it.

"You didn't even know there was a child you needed to look after."

Pei Ming doesn't look at him, his hands clawing into the boulder they're sitting upon with such strength, he actually gauges small holes in the stone.

"…I had many, many siblings." He recalls slowly. "Plenty to carry on the family. I never planned on having my own children. And if I did—I said I wouldn't be like my own father."

Xie Lian smiles faintly, rubbing Pei's shoulder gently—a simple gesture of comfort and kindness that makes the older man sag, exhausted.

"I never knew you came from such a large family."

"I had twenty two sisters."

Xie Lian's smile freezes in place as he chokes with shock—and Pei snorts, even if he seems to find no mirth in it.

"My father kept a large household of concubines."

…Ah.

The founder of the Pei family just so happened to be a mildly successful general himself. As such, he was able to use his riches to live in luxury.

"And he was a violent man."

Cruel. Arrogant. Often the sort to feign affection when he was pleased, only to take it away.

“He wasn’t particularly fond of my mother—but I was his only son. He sent her away to a monastery when I was small, keeping me around in case he couldn’t produce another male heir.”

His sisters were kind. They raised him, doted on him.

But his father was the vicious type.

And oh, Pei despised him.

The way he treated the women in his life. How everything could be reduced to simple victories and war stories. What he was willing to do, in the name of winning.

How he constantly dangled Pei’s mother as a means of gaining his compliance.

Promising him that his mother would be returned to the manor if he studied well. If he trained hard enough.

But it was never good enough, and the blame was always placed at the child’s feet.

This endless, growing pressure—and resentment.

“I joined the army as soon as they would take me. And I thought—if I was better than him, I’d stop feeling angry.” Pei stares at the road ahead, the portal leading up to the heavens only a few meters away.

Objectively speaking—he succeeded.

No one even remembers his father’s name anymore. They haven’t for centuries.

And even now, after so long—he’s still far more famous than any other general who has ever lived.

Xie Lian seems to think the same.

“…You built yourself quite a legacy,” he points out gently.

“…” Pei shakes his head. “I have a legacy of being very good at killing people, your highness. And I’m not blind to the fact that I repeated his behaviors towards women—even if I told myself I was better, because I was straight forward. But I…”

He presses his hand against his forehead.

“…I was a worse father than he was—because at least he put a roof over my head, and food in my stomach. That child…my child… probably died frightened and alone.”

His jaw trembles.

“I can’t fix that. I’ll always have to live with it.”

Xie Lian squeezes his shoulder, but says nothing more. Knowing that no matter what he says—it won’t change the way Pei feels. And he probably doesn’t want anyone to change his mind.

He just wants someone to listen.

“…And Shi Wudu,” Pei swallows hard, still struggling to say his name without the grief rushing over him all over again. “They were brothers in name—but he was Shi Qingxuan’s parent, really. And…if he had known about my son, maybe…”

Xie Lian knew as much.

For better or for worse, no one watched them closer than ‘Ming Yi,’ and he said so during the mid-autumn festival.

That the Water Master was Shi Qingxuan’s father, mother, and brother—rolled all into one.

“He would have understood, Pei.”

The general hangs his head, not saying another word.

It’s quiet. Even with the winter months coming, there’s a warm breeze.

It’s peaceful, even if only for a moment.

“Could we just…” He swallows hard, unable to bring himself to look up. “Just for a few minutes…”

His eyes widen, stinging when he feels an arm wrap around his shoulders.

Pei Ming is a rather large man, and while Xie Lian isn’t exactly petite, it's still difficult to wrap his arm all the way around—in any case, he perseveres, staring ahead calmly.

"We can take as many minutes as you need."

He doesn't force any words of comfort on him—doesn't make a spectacle out of Pei's emotions—

He's simply there.

The General's shoulders tremble as he covers his face with his hands, gulping down ragged breaths.

It's hard to say how long they sit there—maybe for only a few minutes, or maybe an hour.

The general makes a rasping, exhausted comment about how people are probably waiting, only for the prince to squeeze his shoulder.

Assuring him that even so—they can wait a little longer.

Pei didn't get the chance to mourn with Shi Wudu's body, or in any of the time immediately after. He was looking after Shi Qingxuan. Getting answers from Hua Cheng. Settling her into Gusu.

And now…

For just a little while, he allows the grief to wash over him.

Xie Lian follows when he eventually rises to his feet—the general offering a quiet thank you, but the prince brushes him off, refusing to accept it.

It's no more than what anyone deserves, really

The Heavens are far quieter than they used to be.

There's no music or laughter in the air when they walk through the streets—and Xie Lian can't say that he minds, finding it far less overwhelming.

(Pei nearly seems to prefer it.)

And when they enter the Grand Martial Hall—

"Ah, Ming Guang. Xianle." Jun Wu's tone is clipped. "I didn't realize the two of you were traveling together."

Pei Ming glances over at Xie Lian, then back at the emperor—and his response is similar in tone.

“The prince is good company.”

Xie Lian smiles at that—then briskly walks toward the throne, bowing.

“Xianle was worried when he heard his majesty was hurt,” he lifts his head, biting his lip. “Have you recovered?”

Jun Wu glances him over for a moment, taking in the genuine concern in Xie Lian’s eyes, and—

His own soften.

“Not entirely—but enough to conduct business.”

Xie Lian nods, relieved, falling back into the group of gathered gods as the meeting begins.

(Clearly they were, in fact, waiting on just them.)

Jun Wu lifts his chin, clearing his throat.

“As you’re all aware—”

Bang!

Suddenly, the doors to the martial hall fly open.

Xie Lian turns his head with everyone else (even if it’s somewhat fruitlessly), but the aura standing in the doorway is unfamiliar.

Tranquil, soft oranges and pinks, like the skies after it…

“Lady Rain Master,” Jun Wu arches an eyebrow, surprised. “What a rare delight.”

Yushi Huang strides forward, hair flowing loosely down her shoulders, bangles jingling softly around her ankles as she moves, bare feet silent on the polished marble floors.

“You haven’t answered our general musters before.”

“Correct,” the princess agrees calmly.

The closer she comes, the more clearly everyone can see that she's dragging something in one of her hands.

A snake—no, a python—one large enough to kill a horse, or even something larger.

"One of the demons imprisoned in the Heavenly armory escaped into my lands."

Ling Wen is silent from her stance beside Jun Wu's throne, hands folded into her sleeves—not seeming to know how to respond when Yushi Huang smiles at her serenely, waving in greeting.

"I almost destroyed the beast and left it at that, but…"

She drops the creature at Jun Wu's feet with a heavy thud. It barely manages to squirm on the floor, steam rising from it's body.

"Given that I am the only Elemental Master remaining, I wondered if I should offer my assistance."

She clasps her hands in front of her in a polite gesture of respect, but she does not bow.

That would be inappropriate, after all.

Unlike other gods and goddesses who were princes, princesses, and generals—she was a head of state at the time of her ascension.

Meaning, in terms of social rank—Jun Wu is her peer.

"The Heavens seem to be struggling."

Jun Wu arches an eyebrow, taking in the woman before him, attempting to find some hint of insolence or disrespect in Yushi Huang's eyes—

But he finds none.

"That was kind of you."

He surveys the rest of the group beyond her. "We'll be facing a more dangerous task now than we have in many centuries. Given how much damage Hua Cheng and He Xuan have shown they can do to the order of the Heavens—we cannot allow another Ghost King to be born."

That earns murmurs of agreement, but Xie Lian frowns—unhappy to hear Hua Cheng included in that statement. When he opens his mouth to protest that, however—Pei Ming's hand lands on his shoulder.

Silently warning him.

And Xie Lian…he knows that he's right, but…It bothers him.

"Do you mean to send a group to intervene?" Nan Yang questions, crossing his arms—and Jun Wu shakes his head.

"Not yet. My injury…led to quite a few dangerous objects escaping the Heavens. They could pose serious damage to the mortal realm. Besides—we got lucky."

He holds his chest with a slight wince as he sits forward.

"Before, the most likely candidate to rise as a calamity would have been Autumn Twilight Shrouding Forests."

Xie Lian stiffens with shock, lifting his head.

"…You mean Ren Song?"

"I do."

Jun Wu rests his chin against his hand. "But from the reports I've received, the attack he survived in the Terrace of Cascading Wine weakened him significantly. That means it's a far more even playing field."

The attack…it really impacted him so severely?

"That means it should take the ghosts time to cull themselves down and for kiln candidates to emerge. Until then—you will all need to focus on recapturing the entities that escaped from the Heavens into the Human Realm."

The emperor surveys the room.

"I want all martial gods patrolling their assigned regions—Lady Rain Master, it's not your area of expertise, but with the waterways now left unsupervised—"

"I can handle that." Yushi Huang replies, bowing her head. "I'm told Ling Wen was familiar with the former Water Master's ledgers?"

"She is at your disposal," the emperor agrees with a bored wave of his hand. “Furthermore—if any of you encounter Blackwater in the mortal realm, do not engage with him.”

Pei Ming stiffens, his eyes narrowing. “…We’re just supposed to let him go?”

Naturally he isn’t facing punishment for killing Shi Wudu—that was seen as justice.

Attacking the emperor, however, was a serious crime.

“No.” Jun Wu’s eyes spark. “I intend to deal with him myself.”

Something about his tone sounds different to Xie Lian—sharper, more frigid.

Still—that doesn’t stop him from lingering once some of the other gods begin to disperse.

“…Sire?” He tilts his head to the side. “What’s my assignment?”

He’s a martial god with no territory to patrol

“…” Jun Wu scratches his chin, thinking it over. “…I suppose you could assist General Qi Ying.”

From his side, Ling Wen grows still.

“He’s been assigned to deal with the Brocade Immortal.”

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow, struggling to remember where he’s heard that before…

“Sire,” Ling Wen interrupts, her hands folded a little more rigidly inside her sleeves. “Why not have him patrol the East? Lang Qianqiu is—”

“There are no reports of major disruption in the East,” Jun Wu shakes his head.

“Then the north is a vast territory, Ming Guang—”

“Is currently even stronger than I am, given my condition.” Jun Wu rolls his eyes. “He needs no assistance.”

“Then the south—”

"Has two martial gods," Jun Wu glances at Mu Qing and Feng Xin. "Who have run their territory together without assistance for eight centuries."

Xie Lian tilts his head back and forth as the two spar their reasoning, his eyebrows raising higher and higher.

"Qi Ying is difficult to work with, and his highness will end up doing all of the effort. Given everything he's been assigned since his return…" Jun Wu stares as she lifts her chin. "Isn't it unfair to give him such a difficult task?"

Xie Lian, for his part—is touched.

"Oh, Ling Wen—it's kind of you to worry, but I'm not tired at all. And I enjoy being useful."

"Besides," Jun Wu smiles at Xie Lian, his expression glimmering with warmth and praise. "There is no one more uniquely qualified for this assignment than Xianle. You know that."

Xie Lian's eyes widen.

Compared to other martial gods—typically—he's pretty useless.

When he learned he was going to have his shackles indefinitely, he came to terms with the fact that would always be the case. Really, he's only gotten so much done since he arrived because he's had help, but…

He's uniquely qualified for something?

"That settles that," Jun Wu concludes. "You're all dismissed—and Xianle."

Xie Lian stops as he follows the others out the door, raising an eyebrow. "Your majesty?"

"Qi Ying is difficult," the emperor explains. "But a decent soul. He would…benefit from mentorship."

"…Mentorship," Xie Lian repeats slowly. "I…can do that." He looks up at Jun Wu with a slightly tired smile. "I learned from the best, after all."

Ling Wen watches the two with a mildly sickened expression, only distracted when someone tugs at her sleeve.

“Lady Ling Wen?” She stiffens, looking down to see that somehow, without her noticing, the Rain Master has appeared by her side. “The ledgers?”

Ling Wen hesitates, glancing around for Pei, seeking out support, but…

Naturally, given that Yushi Huang is present—he fled at the first opportunity.

“…Right,” she mutters, shoulders stiffening when the Rain Master doesn’t let go of her sleeve.

But, rather than comment—she simply stalks out of the martial hall with Yushi Huang in tow, the princess’s bangles jingling as they walk.

“This way.”

She’s brisk and silent, her expression taut.

“…Is something wrong?” Yushi Huang questions as Ling Wen leads them up the steps of her palace.

The civil goddess pauses in mid-step, staring straight ahead.

She’s never been particularly charming, and has never pretended to be.

“…” She turns her head to look down at the princess, stone faced.

“You’re a surprisingly small woman.”

Even for her, that’s particularly blunt—and not even what she meant to say.

Yushi Huang stares up at her, eyes round.

“…Am I?”

Her height is only slightly below average.

Petite framed, maybe—but with strong limbs, and…supple areas.

She’s never thought of herself as a small woman before.

“Given how Pei Ming flees from you like a raging Bull, yes.” Ling Wen grumbles.

“That has nothing to do with my physical strength.”

Says the woman who just dragged a python the size of an elephant through the grand martial hall as though it was nothing more than a sack of apples.

“Your reputation is just….”

Daunting, compared to her actual appearance. And…

She glares down at the golden flecks swimming in Yushi Huang’s irises, like sunlight sparkling on the surface of the sea.

Why should a goddess of agriculture be so distracting to look at? It’s impractical.

Yushi Huang tilts her head back.

“…You’re tall,” she replies softly.

Ling Wen’s eyes flash, then narrow.

“…Is that surprising?”

Yushi Huang shakes her head, never breaking eye contact.

(Ling Wen wishes she would.)

“Not in a bad way.”

“…”

The civil goddess looks away sharply, continuing up the steps.

Yushi Huang is quiet, following with a resilient grip on her sleeve, padding quietly across polished marble floor, eyes taking in the piles of scrolls all around, memos flitting around like sparrows in spring.

She lifts her hand, smiling faintly when one lands on her fingers.

Dozens of deputies and lower ranking civil gods bustle around them, occasionally glancing at their mistress with curiosity, only to quickly avert their gazes when they see the dark cloud of annoyance on Ling Wen's face.

"Do you ever wear shoes?"

Her voice is particularly cold, and the Rain Master lowers her hand, tilting her head as she watches the memo flutter to its proper destination.

Then, she shakes her head.

"I don't like them."

Ling Wen rolls her eyes, reversing the grip between them.

Instead of Yushi Huang holding onto her sleeve, Ling Wen is holding the Rain Master by the wrist, dragging her to the upper levels of her palace, where her private office awaits.

"It's going to take a minute," She mutters, letting Yushi Huang go as the door slams shut.

The Rain Master stands still for a moment as Ling Wen rummages about in her desk, taking it in.

It's...a disaster.

Organized chaos.

Every flat surface in the room is bursting with paperwork, pens and wells of ink scattered about.

And...

Yushi Huang stares at the bedroll.

"...You sleep here?"

Ling Wen glances up at her briefly, one of many drawers pulled open, rifling through papers.

"Occasionally."

It doesn't take a scholar to deduce what that means.

It's not that Ling Wen sleeps in her office occasionally.

She sleeps occasionally, and when she does, it's in her office.

(The dark circles beneath her eyes bear witness against her.)

Yushi Huang drifts closer from the doorway, eyeing the papers the head civil goddess is sifting through.

All of them from the late Water Master.

One of the few areas within the purview of the Heavens that Ling Wen didn’t have to manage before was commerce.

Now, an already full cup is overflowing.

Possibly cracking.

Ling Wen has never looked so tired, but it's more than that.

There's...sadness, too.

Ling Wen stiffens when she feels a hand against her shoulder blade—rubbing slow circles.

A kind gesture, maybe, but—

She whips her head around, her eyes frigid with annoyance, grasping the Rain Master's wrist between her fingers.

"What are you doing?"

Yushi Huang stares down at her, all round eyes and infuriating silence.

"Are you mocking me?"

Rarely are Ling Wen's interests noticed by female heavenly officials, who only express interest in her male form, and—

Never genuinely.

"..." Yushi Huang shakes her head.

Ling Wen stares, the muscles in her jaw working as she attempts to decipher the Rain Master's expression, finding it infuriatingly calm.

"I don't enjoy dancing around the subject." Her frustration spills over into an annoyed glare.

"So, if you have something you want to get across, use your words. I don't have time to decipher what you're trying to—"

"It's hard for me."

Ling Wen pauses, her lips parted, struggling to stop herself in mid-rant.

"...What?"

Yushi Huang lifts her free hand, not attempting to escape Ling Wen's grip on her wrist.

Pressing her palm against her throat.

The scar there.

"Speaking." Yushi Huang shrugs, holding Ling Wen's gaze, but—

Not as comfortably as she did before.

"It's hard for me."

Ling Wen is frozen, her grip on the Rain Master's wrist less forceful now, but—

Still, she makes no attempt to free herself.

"…But you do speak." She points out slowly, fighting the urge to look away.

"With effort, yes." Yushi Huang lowers her fingers.

Now, the scar seems so obvious—it was always there, she never attempted to hide it—but Ling Wen was never looking.

A raised, white line over otherwise flawless, deeply tanned skin.

She can't seem to pull her eyes away from it.

'…You should have said something sooner.'

When she speaks now, it's into the Rain Master's private communication array.

It isn't necessary for Ling Wen to ask for her password, of course—she knows that of every Heavenly Official as a part of her position.

Yushi Huang shrugs.

'I don't come to the Heavens often enough for it to be much of a problem.'

But that proposes a question of its own.

'…But if you live in the Mortal Realm full time, how do you communicate with the people around you?'

It's not as though normal mortals can use this option.

After a moment, the Rain Master lifts her hands, making gestures and signs that Ling Wen can't recognize, but—

There's a clear structure to them, almost like…

A language.

'The people of my lands have developed a way to communicate without words over generations.'

Ling Wen stares at her hands closely, attempting to decipher the commonalities between the movements like some sort of code.

It's actually…completely fascinating, to find a language she hasn't learned before.

'I didn't ask them to, but they've always been kind to me.'

Ling Wen glances up from her hands, finally—eyeing her expression once more.

Now that they're speaking in Yushi Huang's communication array—the difference is obvious, making it clear…

Speaking must be painful for her.

Like this, she sounds younger. Less…serene.

The emotions that Ling Wen found so difficult to discern before, now—she can actually hear them in Yushi Huang's tone.

Her discomfort, when she speaks of her worshippers doing something so considerate.

'…If you had asked, couldn't the Emperor have had your body completely restored after your ascension? ' Ling Wen asks slowly.

And there, she finds the answer—and something that shifts the Rain master—and everything the Civil Goddess ever knew about her—into a different light.

'If he did, I would have been indebted to him.'

Such a simple explanation—but so difficult to fathom.

'So…you'd rather carry on like that?'

The Rain Master has a delicate face. Warm eyes. An unassuming stature.

But there's steel behind her gaze.

'I hate saying thank you to anyone.'

Given her saintly demeanor—and reputation—it's a surprisingly… cynical thing to say.

'But I refuse to be dependent on the help of someone I do not trust.'

It explains many, many things in an entirely different context.

Her decision to remain in the mortal realm. To live such a simple, secluded life.

For her lands to be so well guarded from the outside world. Her obvious strength, but constant refusal to involve herself in heavenly affairs.

There's an exhilaration that comes with learning something new, something difficult. Ling Wen has always felt that.

But the fierce independence and stubbornness it takes to live like that —

It creates an unexpected spark of heat, deep within her gut.

'Why did you come today?'

Because involving herself in this—voluntarily picking up slack after Shi Wudu's death…

It's out of step with every other aspect of her behavior.

'And what are you trying to do?'

Yushi Huang stares down at her, standing behind Ling Wen's chair, with Ling Wen twisted around to look back at her.

The Rain Master's gaze is as unwavering as ever—but Ling Wen see's a flicker of something she never would have expected. Faint, but present.

Even more so when she replies.

'What's the most obvious reason, Ling Wen?'

…Shyness.

Ling Wen stares up at her, the ever turning gears in her head grinding faster and faster.

To what the immediate results of her actions are. What the gains and losses are. And…

Ling Wen's eyes widen with shock, and she's so thrown off—she forgets to speak into the communication array.

"No…" She mutters, her brow creasing as she struggles to decipher those eyes. "You…"

Yushi Huang stares back, silent—expectant.

"…You didn't do this for me…"

But—

It is the most obvious explanation.

The only one who benefits from Yushi Huang's offer to step in is her, lessening an impossible workload.

"We barely know one another. You have no reason to…"

She falls silent when Yushi Huang's hand rests upon her cheek.

'Jun Wu isn't the only one who can see far and wide.'

Ling Wen swallows hard, her skin hot under the princess's palm.

'It rains anywhere. Everywhere.'

Her meaning is clear:

Just because Yushi Huang stays away from the Heavens, doesn't mean that she doesn't observe.

That she didn't…

Inside her communication array, when she doesn't have to be so sparing with her words—

The Rain Master has far more to say.

'I know how it feels, to only be valued for your usefulness to others. '

To spend one's entire life working fighting for respect.

And receiving none.

"…It's out of pity, then?"

'I'm not the pitying type.'

No, she doesn't seem like it, but then…

Ling Wen isn't unaware of the fact that it is possible to admire someone from afar.

She's spent her entire life admiring women from a distance.

Sexually, there was never any shortage of options when she approached partners in her male form. Or when she paid for company in her female form, but…

When simply being herself, she's never been admired.

'I felt as though I could understand you.'

Ling Wen swallows again, this time with even more difficulty.

"Then this is…empathy?"

Better than pity, certainly.

And that is the primary motivation.

Because Lin Wen, particularly now—needs empathy.

Now, Yushi Huang is the one breaking eye contact.

There are many things she could say, but the brevity of words imposed on her by her condition—it leads to her voice holding a certain gravity.

Even within her communication array—she finds herself hesitant to sound foolish.

So, the only thing she manages to add, is…

'…And, you're very tall.'

It's so far out of the realm of what Ling Wen thought the goddess was about to say—for a moment, she can only stare, watching the way Yushi Huang's eyes seem to be burning a hole into the wall.

Tall.

She's…

After a few moments, Ling Wen's prolonged silence seems to be taken as an answer in itself—but when Yushi Huang goes to pull her hand away from the civil god's face…

Ling Wen grabs hold of her wrist—gripping it firmly.

'…You—?'

Thud!

Papers crinkle under Yushi Huang's back a she hits the desk, feet dangling off of the floor, and—

Ling Wen's hand lands next to her head, her eyes dark, nervous—but filled with a hunger that burns, drawing heat to the princess's face.

"Tell me to stop."

It's a peremptory move. Telling herself that she's just calling a bluff.

Expecting to be rebuffed. That, in contradiction to everything about the Rain Master's behavior so far, she'll scorn her. She'll tell Ling Wen that she misunderstood.

Yushi Huang stares at her—

Silent.

She's smaller than Ling Wen, yes—but from the way she handled that demon before, she could knock the civil goddess across the room if she desired.

But her hands are resting on either side of her head—making no move to defend herself.

Ling Wen leans closer.

Until their breaths are intermingling, and she can count the Rain Master's eyelashes, and—

It's almost infuriating, that silence—because it could mean so many things, but…

The longer it stretches, something in Ling Wen begins to snap.

White knuckled, tightly grasped control.

The moment she sees that Yushi Huang's lips are slightly parted, trembling in anticipation—it crumbles.

She surges forward at the last moment, sealing their mouths together, and—

And she shudders, feeling something inside her chest finally relax .

Her mouth is warm.

Giving—so soft, every slide of her lips against Ling Wen prompts another shiver.

And maybe it's simply because she's unaccustomed to someone being interested in her—or because the Rain Master simply didn't reject her, but—

Hands grasp Ling Wen's shoulders, hugging her close.

The reciprocation—the smallest show of it—makes the tone of the kiss change entirely.

To the point where Ling Wen isn't just kissing her with yearning, or a desire for acceptance, no—

But like she's starving, and this is her first chance in years to have a proper meal.

Yushi Huang gasps, arching slightly when she feels a hand cup and squeeze the underside of her breast, one leg pulling up slightly, only to feel Ling Wen's thigh slide between her own.

And those words are repeated.

Tell me to stop.

Against her mouth. The underside of her jaw.

It’s whispered against the side of her neck between sucks and bites.

But—

But when her lips brush over that scar, she freezes. It takes a moment for Yushi Huang to realize, and when she stiffens—the civil goddess chokes out an apology.

“No…no, it’s not…you’re…”

She’s beautiful.

The stupidly, infuriatingly obvious kind of beautiful.

The amount of beauty where people treat you differently. View you differently. She—

She must know that.

But, that scar…

When she feels it under her lips, all she sees—

All she sees is her friend.

Limp, eyes blank and unseeing, cradled in Pei Ming’s arms as the general wept.

How lifeless and cold his hand felt in hers.

She leans back sharply, clapping a hand over her mouth—and the moment Yushi Huang sees her face—the tears in her eyes—

She understands.

Ling Wen doesn’t have the capacity to apologize, to worry if she’s made the Rain Master feel—un—undesirable, or—

But she doesn’t need to.

Because Yushi Huang understands that it’s not about her. But, even more importantly…

She understands that Ling Wen only has two people in this world that she’s close with, and lost one of them only days ago—in the worst possible way.

And that no one has taken a single moment to offer her comfort.

That she hasn't had a moment of rest.

She sits up on the edge of the desk, reaching her arms out and pulling Ling Wen back in before she can retreat too far.

"I'm so—"

'It's alright.'

The civil goddess buries her face in Yushi Huang's shoulder, letting out a trembling breath.

'It's alright.'

'Whatever you need.'

Yushi Huang means that—even if she's somewhat hesitant when Ling Wen kisses her again. Not aggressively, like before—more desperate.

Is it really right to let her—?

But Ling Wen goes from ordering the Rain Master to make her stop—to begging her not to.

Because in this moment. In this ugly, weak moment, grieving, under an unbelievable amount of pressure after that meeting—

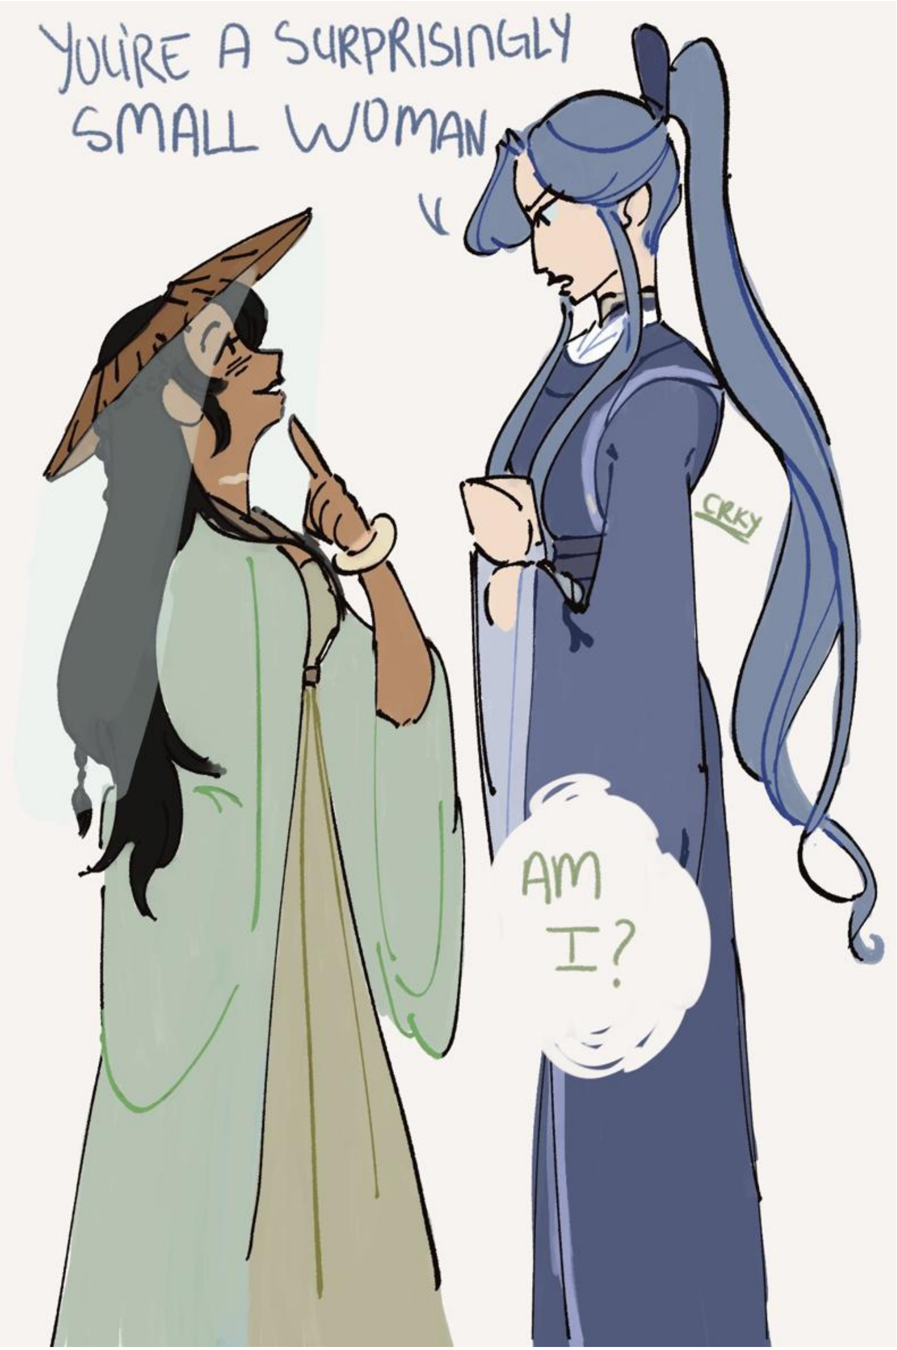
The most comfort in that moment could come from feeling wanted.

And as she's held close, hand in her hair, lips moving against hers—

Finally, she feels it.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from the artists, do not reproduce or use for any reason.



YOU'RE A SURPRISINGLY SMALL WOMAN
AM I?
CRKY

CREDIT: ABYSS

①
YOU'RE SHORT.
...
②
"You're tall"
③
Is that Surprising?
④
Not in a bad way.
...
Shakes head...
JUNKY 2022
@currant_bliss

CREDIT: JUNKY

Chapter End Notes

Thanks to Junky and Abyss for their artwork, and allowing me to include it in this story!

xoxo, Evie

Of Loyalty and Deceit

Chapter Summary

> Xie Lian freezes, hands in the air, and any brief amount of hope he may have had that the farmer was right, and he actually HAD improved is doused when the intruder drops to the ground with a—
>
> THUD!
>
> Sprawled across the kitchen floor, steam faintly drifting out of his mouth.
>
> Xie Lian rushes over to his side, opening his eyes, and when he does…he finds a faintly familiar aura. Blue, with veins of gold—swirling and crackling in a chaotic, unruly manner.
>
> "…General Qi Ying?!"

Chapter Notes

> For anyone who saw that two chapters were added: there was only ONE update today, but I added an informational chapter all the way at the beginning with frequently asked questions, a table of contents, and spotify information if anyone wants to check it out!
>
> I also took out most of the silly tags in the story so it's easier for people to see the relevant ones, and I decided to finally sit down and pick out a summary that seemed a little more serious than the one I had before. It's still the same ol' No Paths Are Bound, just a little more polished!
>
> Songs For this chapter: The Kids Aren't Alright, Ways to Go, Lotta True Crime

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Appearances are funny things.

The things people do to maintain them—intentionally, or not.

On appearances alone, many people make assumptions about the relationship between the Martial Gods of the South; Xuan Zhen and Nan Yang.

But now, Feng Xin finds himself fixated.

When he and Mu Qing are required to descend to the Mortal Realm together to deal with an issue within their territory—they've developed a routine.

They argue viciously the entire trip down, either something hurtful is said, or they end up against a tree—

(Sometimes both.)

Once the niceties are over with, they perform the assignment—and before they return to the Heavens, they usually stop for a meal and eat in stony silence.

It's what most people would call an unpleasant routine, but it's a routine.

But this time, Mu Qing hasn't actually instigated a fight—and Feng Xin—

He isn't starting one intentionally.

"…Is something going on between you and the emperor?"

It's a blunt question—but he always is.

And he isn't expecting the way Mu Qing stiffens in response.

"…What the fuck are you talking about?" He whips his head to the side, glaring at Feng Xin—who holds his hands up in a rare sign of surrender.

"You mean you didn't find that weird?"

"Find what weird?"

Feng Xin frowns, crossing his arms. "He implied that we're a good team."

Mu Qing rolls his eyes, then stops to actually think about it—

Because that was an odd statement to make. Objectively speaking, having a 50/50 chance of screaming each time they have a conversation isn't a basis for team work.

“Maybe his injury affected his logic.” Mu Qing allows. “But I have no idea what that has to do with me.”

“He was looking at you when he said it.” Not both of them—but Mu Qing specifically. “And ever since the mid-autumn festival…”

They still haven’t discussed the things that were said that night.

“I’m the more enjoyable one to look at, who can blame him?”

Feng Xin grits his teeth, his eyes flashing with annoyance. “Goddamn it, Mu Qing—I’m being serious.”

“And I don’t even know what you mean by asking me something like that.” Mu Qing glares right back at him. “Given how many officials have been wounded lately—I’ve spent more time around him, but that’s it. And why would it matter if there was?”

After all—they’re talking about the emperor himself.

If there was something “going on,” why would Feng Xin think that was a problem?

“I never said it was a problem,” Feng Xin grumbles, “I just asked if there was something going on, because—”

“Because it was weird?” Mu Qing gives him a sharp look. “The emperor giving me a glance while complimenting my work is weird?”

“ Our work,” Feng Xin growls. “And why do you take everything as a reason to get defensive?”

Mu Qing stops walking, leading to Feng Xin stumbling to a stop right in front of him, their faces close.

“Because I always know exactly who and what I’m dealing with. Probably better than you.”

Feng Xin glares back at him, struggling to vocalize his irritation, or even why he’s so bothered.

Because when Mu Qing points it out that way—he is right.

There’s nothing wrong with receiving a compliment from the emperor. Or even a little extra attention, he just—

It’s been bothering him ever since that night.

That on the mid-autumn festival, Jun Wu intervened when Feng Xin had been trying to speak to Mu Qing, locked away in his palace after their argument with Xie Lian.

He'd never done that before, not in eight hundred years.

Eight hundred years during which, mind you—they've had far worse arguments. And that night, Feng Xin hadn't been trying to argue with Mu Qing—

He'd been trying to help him.

And ever since then—Mu Qing's assignments have been increased, the emperor looks to him more and more…

Not that Feng Xin is paying that much attention, of course—it's just that noticeable.

Obviously.

Mu Qing stares at him long an hard, tilting his chin up—and Feng Xin struggles to keep his eyes on the martial God's face, and not that stupid fucking chok—

"…Are you jealous?"

Feng Xin freezes, his heart leaping into his throat, feeling like he just got kicked in the head.

"Because that would be ridiculous." Mu Qing points out flatly, glaring.

"I'm not—!"

"Because you've had plenty of—!"

"I didn't mean it like THAT!" Feng Xin throws his hands up, shaking his head. "Obviously the emperor isn't—I just meant—you've never exactly been in his inner circle—!"

"—career advancement!"

They both stop, staring at each other.

"…" Mu Qing stares, his eyes opening wider and wider, and Feng Xin locks his jaw, his ears turning red. "You thought I meant ROMANTICALLY?!"

"I—!"

"Oh my GOD!" The martial god snarls with annoyance, turning around, stomping ahead. "Why would I EVER think that?!"

"...?!" Feng Xin snaps out of it, stomping right after him. "Why are you saying that like it's so insane?!"

"Because you—!" Mu Qing covers his face with his hands, snarling with annoyance. "We're not—!"

"You're RIGHT, it would be INSANE for me to feel that way!" Feng Xin snaps. "It's not like we haven't been—been—!" He struggles to find the right word to describe it. "DOING THIS for eight centuries!"

"Doing WHAT?!"

"Swapping spit?! Examining each other's tonsils?!"

"UGH!" Mu Qing throws his hands up, letting out a small scream of disgust. "Why would you say it like THAT?! You're so gross—!"

"Because you flip your SHIT every time I even MENTION kissing you!"

"Because we barely ever—! It's only—! IT'S NOT A REGULAR THING, OKAY?! And it's NOT romantic!"

"Not—?!" Feng Xin sputters, nearly turning purple. "How is it not—?!"

"You're the one who should know better than me!" Mu Qing glowers, nails biting against his palms. "There's a difference between having feelings for someone, and wanting to get in BED with them!"

And for all these years, what else has Feng Xin done?

Pushing your tongue down someone's throat while you shove them against the wall once every couple of years isn't exactly a declaration of affection. And they—

They hate each other. They always have.

(Or, at least—Feng Xin always has.)

Mu Qing is more than aware of what physical attraction looks like. He can recognize it quickly.

And avoid it just as easily.

Feng Xin doesn’t respond, looking shocked, and—

Confused.

Forced to consider something that had never really occurred to him before.

“I don’t know if it slipped your notice in almost a millennia, but I can look after myself.” Mu Qing snaps, landing lightly on his feet in the mortal realm. “I always have. And any interest the emperor has in me—it’s NONE of your business!”

And that—

That might actually be true.

So often, having these conversations—or any conversation—with Mu Qing is like running headfirst into a brick wall.

Painful, and self destructive.

But now Feng Xin wonders if he’s been looking at it…wrong, all this time.

That brick wall—it isn’t Mu Qing’s personality, or incompatibility—

It’s that Mu Qing has always interpreted Feng Xin’s intentions in a certain way. And Feng Xin—

Somehow, in all of this time, hasn’t given his own intentions any thought.

Maybe because it was easier not to.

And—because that was how he was raised to be.

But…why does he always seem to come back to Mu Qing, when it always ends like this?

And…

When the emperor implied that they worked well together, before the suspicion set in—

Why did that make Feng Xin…

…Happy?

On a level, he always knew there was something between them. Ever since—

Ever since he was a teenager, and a palace servant dragged him to the kitchens, insulting him as he made him a bowl of congee—so he wouldn't go to bed on an empty stomach.

Feng Xin knew that, he's always known that—and he just pursued it, holding onto that notion without ever giving it deeper thought.

But for hold on for so long—to feel so pained at the prospect of letting go—

What does that mean?

It's a lesson in self awareness—one eight centuries in the making.

One that he'll learn after days upon days of deep thought, but…

There are some lessons that, no matter how well you learn them—come just a little too late.

Xie Lian stands with his arms crossed, scroll tucked into his sleeves, thinking.

It's quiet.

A gentle breeze passes over Puqi Shrine, wind rustling in the leaves.

Entirely too quiet.

And when he approaches, he can see exactly why.

"…Lang Ying?"

The boy is sweeping on the front porch, his head bowed, and…

He seems to be the only one there.

"Where are the others?"

His response is as quiet as he always is, saying little more than necessary.

“Qi Rong escaped.”

Xie Lian jumps, clutching his chest. “…What?!”

“A few days ago,” the boy explains, straightening. When he noticed Xie Lian beginning to grow upset, he adds—

“But Shuo and Lang Qianqiu have set after him already.”

…And Guzi is probably with Qi Rong, then.

Xie Lian sighs, pressing his hand to his forehead.

Well—if there’s anyone who can find Qi Rong, it’s Shuo. But still—leaving Lang Ying by himself in the shrine….Xie Lian knows that Shuo doesn’t care for the boy (even if he refuses to explain why), but Lang Ying is too young, too weak to be left unattended.

“…I’m sorry you’ve been by yourself,” the god sighs, reaching down to ruffle Lang Ying’s hair. Then—he smiles. “I have a little time before I start my next assignment, so we can have fun together, can’t we?” He tilts his head to the side. “Just the two of us!”

He couldn’t see Lang Ying’s face—even if it wasn’t almost entirely covered in bandages—

But the child nods, seeming to radiate contentment at the thought.

“Yes.”

Xie Lian pats his head one more time before straightening up.

There are plenty of chores to do around the shrine—and even while Xie Lian insists there’s no need, Lang Ying is quick to help, following him like a quiet little shadow.

Even when Xie Lian insists that he go on to play, he doesn’t stray far.

Sitting on the front steps, stacking sticks into surprisingly complicated little structures as Xie Lian pulls his hair up, tying his outer robe around his waist, chopping more wood.

Something that Hua Cheng usually does—and Xie Lian probably isn’t as good, but…

The prince shakes himself out of it.

What is he doing, thinking that? He's the one who sent San Lang away in the first place. He needs the rest, and Xie Lian, he's…

There's a nice sized woodpile by the time he finishes, the afternoon sun hanging low.

When the breeze comes through, the cooling sweat on his arms and the back of his neck makes him shiver—and finally, he turns to Lang Ying.

"I made you some warmer robes now that the winter months are coming," he turns to walk inside. "Let's take a bath—then you can try them on."

The tub in Puqi shrine would be a close fit for two adults, but for Xie Lian and Lang Ying? There's plenty of space.

But for some odd reason, the boy seems to be rooted to his seat on the porch.

"…Is something wrong?"

"I don't need a bath, dianxia…"

Xie Lian turns around, hands on his hips, his voice a little stern.

"That isn't true. You don't take one unless I make you, and I haven't had the chance since the mid-autumn festival. Not to mention the fact that you play outside every day."

Bafflingly, the air grows tense.

"…We don't…bathe together…"

Xie Lian's eyebrows raise. "I don't make you bathe as often as I should," he admits. "But it's been at least five times."

Beneath the bandages, Lang Ying's eye twitches violently.

"I'll go after you, dianxia."

The prince sighs, shaking his head. "The last time I did that, you only splashed around."

"I won't this time—"

"And, I don't have enough spiritual power to keep the water hot for both of us."

"Cold is fine—"

"Or…" Xie Lian rubs his chin. "I suppose you could go first."

It's too cold for Lang Ying to take a bath unless it's heated, but Xie Lian should be perfectly fine he just—

(Well, he really enjoys a hot bath—and he only ever gets to take one when he has a little extra spiritual power left over after borrowing some on a mission.)

That's one of the few holdovers from being raised as a prince that Xie Lian never quite managed to shake. He can tolerate being filthy—and often is—

But there's nothing more relaxing than soaking in hot water and scrubbing himself clean.

"…Okay…"

"Good," Xie Lian smiles.

At first, he thinks Lang Ying is agreeing to go first—but he waits for Xie Lian to go inside before following him.

Xie Lian drags the tub in from the back room, and Lang Ying helps him carry water from the well, filling it up before the god warms it with spiritual power.

Lang Ying turns away immediately when he sees the prince beginning to strip his robes, and Xie Lian tilts his head curiously.

Normally, he doesn't have the confidence—or the lack of care to be in a state of undress around others.

But Lang Ying is just a child.

It wasn't uncommon for Xie Lian to bathe with his parents when he was small. And, while the thought makes him want to gag now, he shared a bath with Qi Rong more than once when they were children.

Not to mention the fact that Lang Ying has no reason to be shy.

Xie Lian can't see anything, so there's nothing to be embarrassed about.

He climbs into the tub first, sighing contently, adjusting his hair until it's in a loose bun on top of his head—and taps the edge of the bath expectantly.

"Come on, the water's very nice!"

Lang Ying takes one unsteady step, walking backwards toward the tub, bracing his hand against it to get a feel for where it is as he strips down, taking one tentative glance over his shoulder.

Not looking at the prince, no—but the bandage coiled around his neck.

Something about the almost pleading look in his eyes makes Ruoye stir in response, wriggling against Xie Lian's skin before sliding away, coiling around Lang Ying's head, covering his eyes.

"…Ruoye?" Xie Lian frowns, turning his head. "That's rude, Lang Ying isn't—"

"It's okay," the boy mumbles quietly, stepping inside the bathtub and sitting down quickly, facing away from Xie Lian with his arms wrapped around his middle.

"…" The prince tilts his head to the side with a frown. "Has Mount Tonglu gotten you unsettled too?"

Lang Ying doesn't answer out loud, but Xie Lian feels him shaking his head as the god reaches over, grabbing the bar of soap sitting on the stool next to the tub, scrubbing himself off, humming under his breath.

Completely relaxed, water dripping down his bare skin.

When he offers to wash Lang Ying's back, like he usually does—the ghost shakes his head, sounding as though he might faint when he replies that he can do it himself, and—

Really, what's gotten into him?

"…Look," the prince sighs, shaking his head. "I know Shuo was probably tough on you while I was gone—but he doesn't mean it."

"I think he does." Lang Ying mutters under his breath, his tone entirely different—but when Xie Lian asks him to repeat himself, he stays quiet.

"…You're from Yong'an, so you'd be too young to remember—but Shuo was born in Xianle," the prince explains carefully, rinsing the suds of soap from his arms. "The name Lang Ying probably…brings back difficult memories."

(Oh, if only he knew.)

"But that isn't your fault."

Really, Xie Lian should try to have a conversation with Shuo about it the next time he sees him. If he's going to be staying in the shrine for now, Xie Lian doesn't mind—but he should at least be cordial to Lang Ying. Hua Cheng too, they both…

They both seem to dislike him.

Shuo, Xie Lian understands, even if he thinks it's unfair. But…why would Hua Cheng have an issue with the child?

It's not that he's been cruel to him—but he's actually rather charming with Guzi, but to Lang Ying…

He's silent and cold at best.

When Xie Lian finishes up, stepping out of the tub before the water can grow cold, Lang Ying is quick to scramble after him—even if the bandage over his eyes makes him clumsier than usual.

"…Ruoye," Xie Lian frowns, toweling himself off. "Really, that's enough."

The bandage slithers back to him, crawling up Xie Lian's bare leg before resettling on his forearm as the prince dresses himself.

Lang Ying doesn't say a word, which Xie Lian doesn't mind—

If anything, he's been more talkative than usual today.

The robes Xie Lian made for him fit well—not a surprise, he knew they would, but he's still pleased when he adjusts the sleeves over Lang Ying's shoulders, smoothing the front.

"There—I'm sure you look very nice."

He turns, going about cleaning up after the bath, and…

Lang Ying glares at the wall before stalking out the door, grumbling that phrase under his breath.

‘Very nice.’

The prince seems to call everyone that, apparently. It’s not particularly special, not like…

Xie Lian stares after him blindly, having pushed the now empty wash basin against the wall, wondering…

“Lang Ying, don’t do any more chores today, you should just…”

The boy begins stacking firewood, and the god sighs.

There’s nothing to be done, really.

He lets Lang Ying stay outside as the afternoon draws to an end, bustling about the kitchen as he attempts to put together a meal, remembering what Hua Cheng taught him last time…and Ruoye is rather helpful, as usual—but E’Ming was so good with the cutting…

Stop.

He has to stop and remind himself that, over and over, when he catches himself thinking about the Ghost King.

Why can’t he just put it out of his mind? He was the one who told Hua Cheng to stay away and rest, didn’t he? Shouldn’t he be happy that the calamity listened?

And yet, when the villagers stop by, asking him where ‘Xiao Hua’ has run off to…he can barely force a smile, explaining that he went home.

To his ‘parents,’ and the wife who has already left him spoken for.

The mere reminder of which makes him frown, contemplative.

This person—Hua Cheng has only ever given vague descriptions of them one way or the other.

That they’re kind. Clever. Hardworking.

And beautiful, apparently.

But if it’s someone Hua Cheng knew as a child…it has to be a ghost, doesn’t it? A god seems out of the question.

Hua Cheng loathes the heavens after all—Xie Lian is the only heavenly official he seems to like. The rest, he only holds contempt for.

But if it was a ghost—how could they not know who Hua Cheng was? He's the most famous ghost in all three realms. And…

…if it was a ghost, why hasn't he won them over yet?

"Daozhang, have you been cooking again? Smells…real interesting." One of the farmers comments, leaning against the door frame.

Xie Lian shrugs, trying not to look quite so glum.

"It's…Love for All Seasons Stew."

"You know, I don't think I've ever met a fella who names all of his dishes…"

Now, his mouth actually tips up at the corners.

"The only difference between any meal and that served in a royal palace is giving it a name."

The farmer chuckles, shaking his head.

"Well, the little guy seems to be enjoying it."

Xie Lian almost asks him what he means—until he notices the sound of chewing, and a spoon scraping the bottom of a bowl.

Is Lang Ying…actually eating that?! The only one who normally can is…

"Lang Ying, you don't have to—!"

The boy swallows another mouthful, sitting at the kitchen table—eyes burning into the farmer's skull.

And instead of answering—he just takes another pointed bite.

"…Well," Xie Lian scratches the side of his head, shocked. "He…must have been really hungry."

The farmer laughs, straightening up. "Or maybe you're just getting better in the kitchen, daozhang! It was nice seeing you again."

Xie Lian smiles—though he doubts he's actually improved, waving goodbye as the villagers head in for the night.

"…Lang Ying, you go on and get ready for bed, I'll clean up the rest of this."

The child seems hesitant—but after Xie Lian's persistent insistence, he eventually relents.

And it's so silly, but…

After only such a short time of having company…Xie Lian doesn't like the quiet.

He actually misses listening to Lang Qianqiu and Shuo bickering, something that had become almost playful background ambience, but…

More than anything, as embarrassing as it is—

He really enjoyed not having to sleep alone.

And now, he finds himself struggling to sleep at all.

Tossing and turning, unable to clear his mind, to stop thinking of…

Thud!

The sound of something in the kitchen in the dead of night makes him freeze, sitting up—his hair mussed and askew.

…What on earth?

Thud!

Creeeeak!

Is he…being robbed?

That would be just his luck, but…why bother? He doesn't have anything worth stealing.

Other than Hong'er, and the gifts Hua Cheng has given him in their time together—all of which remain on his person at all times.

Maybe they mistook this shrine for that of a wealthier god?

He’s quiet as he rises from bed, Ruoye curling menacingly around his wrist, silent, ready to strike as he creeps into the kitchen.

There is someone rifling through the donation box. Xie Lian can hear as much. But…

They’re filling it—with something heavy—rather than stealing.

…But who would do that?

And…why?

Before he can think of an explanation, the thief—well, intruder—slips away, only to pause by the pot in the kitchen, and…Xie Lian grimaces.

Oh no.

“Wait—!”

Before his warning is heard, the figure stuffs an entire mouthful down his throat.

Xie Lian freezes, hands in the air, and any brief amount of hope he may have had that the farmer was right, and he actually HAD improved is doused when the intruder drops to the ground with a—

THUD!

Sprawled across the kitchen floor, steam faintly drifting out of his mouth.

Xie Lian rushes over to his side, opening his eyes, and when he does… he finds a faintly familiar aura. Blue, with veins of gold—swirling and crackling in a chaotic, unruly manner.

“…General Qi Ying?!”

There’s a faint moan as the martial God’s legs twitch.

“T…the fuck…?”

Xie Lian didn’t even realize that Lang Ying had gotten out of bed until he hears a voice from the stairs.

“He tried to warn you not to eat it.”

“Lang Ying…don’t be rude,” Xie Lian warns him gently. “But really, General…you shouldn't just eat strange food you find…"

Quan Yizhen squirms, clutching his stomach.

"What kind of shrine poisons their own food?" He mumbles, sounding so pitiful…Xie Lian actually does feel a little sorry.

"It…wasn't on purpose," the prince explains with a wince. "My cooking just…"

He struggles, thinking.

"…It's really just for Hua Cheng," he lies—(though in practice, that's pretty much true), "He's the only one who likes it."

He can't see it—but from his seat on the steps, Lang Ying looks absolutely radiant, eyes sparkling.

"Oh…" Quan Yizhen groans. "Okay."

He doesn't question why a Heavenly Official's near lethal cooking skills are at the disposal of a calamity—which Xie Lian is grateful for.

"Here…can you stand?"

Quan Yizhen flexes his limbs, which are splayed across the floor. "…No," he admits. "I don't think so."

Xie Lian sighs, sliding his arms underneath the God's armpits, hauling him up onto a chair—finding him shockingly heavy.

It's not as though Xie Lian had a way of knowing his build before—but his voice sounded so young…

He isn't as big as Hua Cheng—but it's like moving a bear.

Not just from his weight or broad frame—but because of the wild tangle of curls that brush against Xie Lian's face as he moves him, making the prince sneeze.

"There, there…" he pats Quan Yizhen's shoulder, handing him some mantou. "I didn't make this, it's safe…"

The martial god is far more cautious now, nibbling as Xie Lian makes him take a cup of water as well. And when he goes to check the donation box…

“…You’re the one who has been bringing the gold?” Xie Lian asks, holding the gold bars incredulously.

Quan Yizhen chews slowly.

“Yes.”

…Not even an attempt at denying it, huh?

“…Why?”

Once again he stares—as if the answer is painfully obvious.

“Because I have a lot.”

Xie Lian stares back, unseeing, but he has his own suspicions about why the martial god is doing this.

During the mid-autumn festival—Xie Lian saw how bothered he was, and stopped his play when no one else would.

It’s a kind gesture of gratitude, but…

“General, I promise you don’t owe me anything. In any case, it’s good that you’re here.” He walks over to retrieve his scroll.

"The emperor has assigned us to work together. Did you hear about the opening of Mount Tonglu?"

Quan Yizhen whips his head back and forth in denial, earrings rattling heavily, and Xie Lian sighs, setting the scroll down.

"There are millions of ghosts flooding towards the Kiln."

He unrolls the scroll, feeling along the subtle raises of ink across the paper until he finds the map section, pointing to it so the General can see for himself.

"Most of the Martial Gods have been tasked with creating a blockade, stopping threats in their areas from passing."

He points to different points on the map, able to generally remember where everything is, even though he can't see it.

Quan Yizhen watches, eyes round. "...But I'm not in my territory right now," he points out, eyes wide. "It's the closest to Mount Tonglu."

"Yes," Xie Lian agrees, gently pointing out, "and it would be beneficial to everyone if you actually attended these meetings, because then you would know these things. In any case, your area has already been covered. Our assignment is different." He unrolls the scroll completely. "We've been tasked with tracking down the Brocade Immortal."

Quan Yizhen sits a little straighter, his gaze suddenly focused.

"Lots of prisoners escaped the Heavens, but this is unique, given that it couldn't have escaped on its own. It says here it's a silk robe, with a —"

"I know what the Brocade Immortal looks like," the younger god interrupts him. "I've seen it before."

...He has?

"When?" Xie Lian raises an eyebrow—and now, Quan Yizhen seems to have lost any interest in talking, nibbling at his mantou.

Clearly, asking him isn't going to get Xie Lian anywhere.

"..." The prince sighs, reaching out within a private communication array.

'Ling Wen?'

He almost isn't sure if she'll answer, given how chaotic everything has been, but--

'Yes, your highness?'

She's incredibly prompt.

Her voice sounds a little odd—slightly rough and groggy.

'...I'm so sorry, did I wake you?'

'No, no. How can I help you? '

Xie Lian frowns. Ling Wen really never gets a chance to rest, if he actually interrupted that--he would feel horrible.

'Quan Yizhen is here.'

'...Ah.' Ling Wen replies slowly. 'I see. He can be...'

'Childlike?'

'Yes, that's the word...' The Civil Goddess agrees. 'On the surface anyway. His real thoughts are difficult to get a read on.'

'I can see that. He mentioned having encountered the Brocade Immortal before.' Xie Lian frowns, turning away from the martial god as he continues to eat the bun, recovering his strength. 'But he won't say much more about the details.'

'...Well,' Ling Wen sighs. 'That isn't surprising. He had...a difficult experience.'

Xie Lian's eye brow raises.

'You wouldn't know your highness, it was during your second banishment—but Qi Ying wasn't always the sole Martial God in charge of the West. Until only a century and a half ago, he shared that responsibility with another martial god, a senior disciple from his own sect—Yin Yu. '

That name feels vaguely familiar, though Xie Lian can't place where he's heard it before.

'Qi Ying was infamously devoted to his Shixiong...'

'Infamously?' Xie Lian questions, surprised. 'I don't see how it could be a bad thing to be devoted to...'

'Infamously.' Ling Wen repeats her verbiage firmly. 'Yin Yu took the responsibility of being a god incredibly seriously, but lacked talent. Qi Ying had a once in a generation talent—and the only thing he took seriously was Yin Yu.'

Oh. Oh dear.

Early on in the story, and he can already...

'As Qi Ying's favor in the Heavenly Court rose, Yin Yu's fell. Managing their region together created a power imbalance, one that the senior could not stomach.'

Xie Lian can imagine that would be difficult, to have someone that once looked up to you looking down, but...

Quan Yizhen doesn't seem like the sort of person who would look down on someone he once admired. Or really—the sort of person to look down on anyone at all.

And it's surprising to hear that Yin Yu and Quan Yizhen's situation was so unsustainable, when...

Jun Wu just said it himself—Feng Xin and Mu Qing, who have as contentious of a relationship was anyone—have ruled the south relatively efficiently for the last eight centuries.

But...that doesn't work for everyone, clearly.

'And if Yin Yu couldn't surpass him fairly...'

Ling Wen trails off with a sigh. 'He attempted to assassinate his former shidi, giving him the Brocade Immortal in the form of a birthday gift.'

Xie Lian frowns, fighting the urge to look back at Quan Yizhen's aura, struggling to understand.

'Isn't it a powerful weapon?'

'Yes,' Ling Wen agrees. 'But not for the wearer. It feeds on the blood of whomever uses it, and forces them to follow every command of the person who gave them the Brocade Immortal in the first place.'

Rendering them a servant with no free will.

'The moment Qi Ying put the armor on, Yin Yu ordered him to go on a rampage, attacking other Heavenly Officials, and eventually, he ordered the general to take his own life...'

Xie Lian's jaw drops, shocked by the cruelty of it.

'How did he survive?'

'The Emperor stepped in.'

Xie Lian can imagine he would have—but it's a testament to the seriousness of the situation that he needed to, or that so many officials were injured before he did.

'Yin Yu was banished immediately, but...Qi Ying still won't hear a single bad word against him, even now. '

The prince rubs the side of his head, wishing he could say that he didn't understand standing by someone, even after they've hurt you, but...in this case, it seems particularly extreme...

'Alright, thank you Ling Wen—that gives me a better understanding of the situation.'

She's quick, unusually pleasant, given the gravity of the situation—and the pressure she must be under.

'It's no trouble your highness. If you have any other questions, do not hesitate to report in.'

'...Thank you,' Xie Lian agrees with a smile.

She really is so helpful...

"Alright," Xie Lian turns around. "So, you've seen the Brocade Immortal before. If we encountered it, do you think you would recognize it again?"

Quan Yizhen frowns, thinking.

"...Maybe."

Xie Lian's heart leaps—until he gives it more thought.

"But probably not."

"...You think so?" He sighs, slightly deflated.

Quan Yizhen, an immensely powerful being, nearly one hundred and seventy years old, starts sucking the mantou crumbs off of his fingers.

"It changes shape," He explains, gnawing at a hangnail on his thumb. "It's hard to tell."

"Ah..." Xie Lian rubs his hands over his face, thinking. If it changes shape, then how on earth are they supposed to—?

Knock, knock!

Both of them stop, heads turning toward the front door of Puqi Shrine.

"Is anyone home?" A woman's voice calls, "I'm looking to exchange!"

Xie Lian stiffens at the sound of that voice, reaching over to clap a hand over Quan Yizhen's mouth before he can impulsively reply.

"Old for new!" The voice calls again, hopeful. "Maybe your antiques will please me more than my new robes? Is anyone there?"

Just when it sounds like she's about to leave—the door to the shrine opens. And when the woman turns around, eager—

Her face falls.

Xie Lian leans against the doorframe, his arms crossed—eyes wide open, cursed shackles gleaming in the night.

"M...Mr. Hua..." She gulps.

Xie Lian's smile is perfectly kind, and from behind him, Quan Yizhen staggers toward the door, still holding his stomach.

"Y...You two know one another?"

Standing on the road is a slender young woman—well dressed, with a beautiful face—

The lower half, anyway.

Her eyes and nose are covered by a black silk head scarf, hiding the rest of her expression—but red stained lips turn down into a slightly nervous frown.

"Oh, yes," Xie Lian agrees. "We've done business several times before. Isn't that right, Peng Xiuying?"

"Y-Yes..."

She laughs nervously, rubbing the back of her head as Xie Lian's lips quirk with amusement.

"Everything alright? You seem a little nervous."

"N-no, no..." She waves that off, fumbling in her cart. "W...what would you like to exchange?"

"...Lang Ying? Bring the silver robe."

The child stands from his seat on the stairs, silently hurrying to do as he's asked, all while the young woman squirms with discomfort.

"How's business been?" Xie Lian questions, twisting his finger in the chain around his neck.

"Not...not bad," she mutters, squirming.

"Any good finds?"

As if she'd tell him, if there were...

When Lang Ying returns with the robe in his hands, Xie Lian ruffles his hair, sending him back inside as he steps out.

"Alright, show me what you've got to trade."

Her friendly smile fades into one of annoyance.

She shoves the cart over with little ceremony or salesmanship, and Xie Lian just smiles, reaching down to place his hands among the robes.

They've been through this many, many times before.

"How strange, how strange..." the prince muses, clicking his tongue as she glowers.

"Miss, it seems like there was some mistake...none of these are new," Xie Lian sighs, lifting one robe up, holding it to his chest. "This is from Yong'an...what...seventy years old?"

"Well, that's—!"

"And this pattern is from the Imperial City, that style is even older..."

Xie Lian lifts up another garment, running his fingers over the seam. "This stitch hasn't been used in two centuries. Old for new, you said?”

Peng Xiuying glowers. "How was I supposed to know you were the one who lived here?!"

"I don't know..." Xie Lian sighs.

Then, he leans his elbow on the cart, smiling in her direction.

Actually, it's more of a lopsided smirk, his eyes sparkling with enjoyment.

(From the doorway of the Shrine, Lang Ying stiffens, eyes glinting in the darkness.)

"Fate keeps on bringing us back together..."

The textile merchant glares at him, crossing her arms over her chest.

"You mean karma, don't you?"

Xie Lian's smile turns sugary sweet. "I didn't say that."

"You were thinking it."

Just then, Ruoye lashes out, flicking the scarf from around her head—revealing her true form

With the mouth and chin of a young woman, yes—but the face of someone far older–a shriveled, elderly hag.

See, for many, she's a thing of campfire stories.

A textile trader who comes in the night, offering fabulous deals to unsuspecting sellers...only to leave them swindled.

And in the worst case, if they offend her—she'll leave them with a cursed item, one that drains the very life out of them.

Better known as 'The Half-Maquillage Woman.'

But when Xie Lian met Peng Xiuying six centuries ago, she was an apprentice seamstress in Yong'an.

Talented, but struggling for a promotion—and willing to do just about anything to get by.

Including the occasional scam.

They've encountered one another many times since—and while she might call the crown prince the bane of her existence, Xie Lian considers them old friends.

And what do friends do, if not keep one another honest?

But this time, when he goes through her cart...one of the robes catches his attention. Not because it's lacking in quality—all of it is, no—

Because of the dark aura emanating from it.

"...Where did you get this?"

"Get what?" She glares—and when he holds the robe out for her inspection, she pales, taking a step back. "I...what does it matter? They're all fakes, you know they are!"

"Yes," Xie Lian agrees, his gaze suddenly sharp. "But why would you have a fake Brocade Immortal?"

“H-hah?!” Peng Xiuying sputters, looking away. “I—I don’t know what you mean…”

But the further Xie Lian looks in the cart—the more fakes he finds.

“…This is serious.” The smile fades from the prince’s face. “You understand I’m on an assignment from the emperor about this?”

“T…the emperor?!” She stammers, trembling. “Why would he care about something like my business?!”

“Where did you get them?”

“I just picked them up in ghost city!” She cries. “I thought they’d be good for any mouthy customers! I didn’t…!”

“Who in ghost city?”

“We don’t exactly exchange personal information when selling on the black market!” The merchant snaps. “They were working out of a warehouse just south of the city! That’s all I know!”

“If you’re lying to me…”

“I’m not!”

Xie Lian confiscates all of the fakes.

“Good.”

“You can’t just…! I paid for those!”

Xie Lian hands off the pile of robes to Lang Ying, who takes them inside. “And doing the right thing is it’s own reward. Thank you for your assistance, old friend!”

She hisses, eyes flashing with annoyance, but…

The boy carrying in the robes stops, one foot on the front steps—and when he looks back over his shoulder, his eyes flash at her with such menace that she’s sent stumbling back.

“…F-Fine! But you—you owe me one next time, okay?! And—you didn’t hear ANY OF THIS from me!”

Xie Lian smiles and waves as she scrambles off, the wheels on her cart rattling into the night.

“…How did you know they were fake brocade immortals if you’ve never seen one before?” Quan Yizhen questions from the doorway, and Xie Lian finds himself quietly relieved.

Quan Yizhen might be…eccentric, but he’s not so lacking in intellect as to fail to pick up on details such as that.

“My cursed shackle was damaged recently,” He explains, tapping under his eye for emphasis. “I can’t see most things—but I can see spiritual and cursed energy.”

And those robes—they reeked of evil.

“Someone wanted those robes to look similar to the legend of the brocade immortal—and they’ve got an evil aura around them…for it to be working like that…the actual source of the aura must be strong.”

The true story behind the brocade immortal—its origins as it were—is rather gruesome.

Long ago, very shortly after Xie Lian’s second banishment began, there was a famous warrior in the country of Xuli. As strong as he was foolish—used only for his martial gifts.

People mocked him in polite society, treated him like little more than a loyal dog.

Except for one young woman, who treated him with lukewarm respect.

For the young warrior, that was enough for him to fall deeply—irrationally—in love.

Affections that she constantly rebuked.

Until one day, out of the blue—she brought him a gift.

A silk brocade, in fact. The only problem was that it was poorly made. With no holes for the arms.

When he noticed such a thing and pointed it out, her reply was quick —

'It would fit just perfectly if you didn't have any.'

And, never one to deny her—he cut off his arms.

But similarly, he had the same problem with his legs—thus, he ordered her to help him cut those off, as well.

Then, when he had no limbs left, he asked her his final question:

'But what should I do? My head is sticking out.'

And…the story finishes itself from there.

"But…what would be the point in spreading around fake brocade immortals?" Quan Yizhen frowns, his mind working, and Xie Lian's expression turns grim.

He knows why.

And it's a rather clever reason, at that.

"Because we're looking for it." Xie Lian answers simply. "The more fake ones are floating around in the mortal realm, the more impossible the real one is to find."

Like he said—clever.

"But I suspect the evil aura on the fakes came from the real thing."

In which case—

There's a warehouse near ghost city they need to find. The sooner, the better.

"…I have a plan," he mutters, closing his eyes with concentration. "But you're going to have to do exactly as I say and not ask questions. Can you do that?"

Quan Yizhen thinks it over, his eyes round and earnest.

Typically speaking, following orders is not a point of strength for him.

But.

He's excellent at not asking questions.

"…I'll try."

"Good—now grab those gold bars you brought…we're going to need them."

Back in the Heavens, the Imperial Throne is finally occupied once again—but the vast majority of the Grand Martial Hall stands empty.

Only Ling Wen and Yushi Huang stand before the Emperor, one with her head bowed, the other staring absentmindedly out the window.

"Ling Wen," the emperor comments, eyeing the head civil god's posture. "I can't help but notice you seem far more relaxed than the circumstances would normally allow."

"I'll take credit for that," the Rain Master comments, her eyes still fixed on the window.

Jun Wu and Ling Wen both stare, one baffled, the other suddenly far less relaxed—until the princess drops down smoothly, demonstrating a perfect back bend, stretching her spine.

"I showed Ling Wen Zhen Jun meditation poses from my lands," she explains calmly.

Ling Wen's eyes flicker back and forth between Yushi Huang and the emperor, fighting not to linger on the way the pose thrusts the Rain Master's chest up and out.

"My people consider physical health to be important to emotional wellness."

She pulls her legs up into a brief handstand before flipping back onto her feet, pushing her dark, heavy layers of hair back out of her face and over her shoulders.

"I can show his majesty—"

"The emperor is a busy man." Ling Wen cuts her off flatly, arms tightly folded. "He doesn't need to learn any meditation poses."

Jun Wu raises an eyebrow, not bothered—but clearly curious.

"I don't know, Ling Wen—did you find them relaxing?"

"…Very." She stares, not seeming particularly enthused.

"Then I might take the Rain Master up on her offer." Jun Wu smiles faintly, rolling his shoulder, wincing when his wound—still healing—stretches. "It's been a long time since I had a hobby."

"You don't fish?" Yushi Huang comments, the comment making Ling When grow pale, while Jun Wu's eyes suddenly darken, snapping over to—

To find the Rain Master staring peacefully out the window, eyeing the pond on the imperial grounds.

And once both of the other gods see what she's looking at—they both sag. Ling Wen with relief, and Jun Wu's hackles lowering.

"…No," Jun Wu wipes a hand down his face. "I began keeping koi here a few centuries back—but they're for beauty, not for fishing."

Shi Wudu adored them. Sitting by that pond was one of the few times when they were…

Jun Wu frowns, pushing down an inconvenient rush of feeling.

"Oh." Yushi Huang doesn't look back.

And Ling Wen can't stop staring at the back of her head, wondering…

Why a woman who is normally so quiet, who admitted to Ling Wen that it pained her to speak, is now an active part of a conversation like this.

"…I always find aesthetics impractical," The civil goddess sighs.

Her own black robes and adornments make that much clear.

"It's not that," Yushi Huang corrects her gently. "His majesty has always loved keeping pets."

She glances over her shoulder at Jun Wu, smiling warmly.

Not an ounce of aggression in her eyes.

"Lord Ling Wen, you're too young to have seen—but the emperor used to have two hounds. Remember, your majesty?"

Jun Wu's gaze suddenly grows from defensive to nostalgic. It's always difficult to tell what the Rain Master is actually getting at, but—

That's a rather fond memory.

"I did—for years." The emperor agrees.

Such loyal beasts. And back then, when Yushi Huang refused to take her place in the Heavens, the emperor would occasionally visit her lands with the two animals in tow, giving them a chance to run in the vast fields of the Kingdom of Yushi.

The young goddess—and former queen—had been rather fond of them, even if she spurned Jun Wu's invitation to the Heavens each and every time.

"…What happened to them?" Ling Wen asks quietly, still watching the back of Yushi Huang's head.

It couldn't be as simple as old age—not when they were the companions of the Heavenly Emperor, but—

Yushi Huang isn't the one who answers.

"They became disobedient." Jun Wu explains evenly, his eyes like cold, hard steel. "Keeping them was impractical."

"I thought it was just the younger one who became disobedient," Yushi Huang recalls faintly—to which Jun Wu shrugs.

"Once one got out of hand, it was only a matter of time before the other followed. Surely, you remember how vicious they became?"

Just the one. And hardly.

"You forget many things over eight centuries." She replies faintly.

The emperor slayed his hounds the same day the Demon of Yi Nian bridge fell in battle.

"I'm sorry for going on—"

(From the woman who rarely speaks her mind on anything.)

"—Ling Wen has been very helpful in updating me on Shi Wudu's duties."

"Yes, she can be effective, even if certain things have been slipping through the cracks recently…"

Ling Wen stiffens, her jaw tightening, and the emperor sighs.

"We're lucky your deputies haven't started a revolt, by now—"

"They won't."

Ling Wen almost never interrupts him, but she does now, her spine straightening.

"I have the highest retention rate in the Heavens—along with Xuan Zhen. Do you know why that is?"

"I'm sure you're about to tell me."

"Because people who have been in service know how to treat those who serve them." Ling Wen explains curtly, holding her stack of scrolls tighter than ever. "And they have realistic expectations."

The underlying message isn't lost on Jun Wu, who simply leans his chin against his hand, looking her up and down.

"Yes, it's easy to forget that the mighty Ling Wen has such humble beginnings. Your father was a…what was it again?"

"Shoemaker." Ling Wen replies flatly.

"No need to sound so irritated," Jun Wu smiles, but not particularly kindly. "It's important to remember where we come from."

"Oh, I do." Ling Wen breathes in slowly through her nose. Trying to mind her anger. The boiling frustration in her gut.

"I remember everything."

It doesn't work.

She isn't looking anymore, but Yushi Huang has turned back from the window.

"You know the most important thing my father taught me…" Ling Wen's knuckles are white. "Was to never cross the person who makes your shoes."

She steps back from the throne.

“If you do, you’ll never know what’s under your feet.”

Other than someone waiting to trip you.

And in this case, with both parties far too clever to ignore the net that is slowly tightening around her—Ling Wen’s statement isn’t so much of a warning as it is a promise.

Jun Wu stares down at her, his gaze distant—as though he’s remembering something long; long past.

“I think it would shock you, if you knew how well I understood that.”

Oh, he doesn’t yet. Ling Wen doesn’t believe that.

But he will, if he tries her wrath.

(Oh, but she would be shocked.)

"I should go, your majesty." She bows deeply, to the point of near sarcasm before she turns her back on him, marching back down the hall. "Before anything else slips through the cracks."

Yushi Huang follows after her, footsteps light.

At least, until they exit the Martial Hall—then she abandons the need to seem poised, her feet working double time to keep stride with Ling Wen's longer legs.

'What are you doing?'

'He's...' Ling Wen stops on the street, her stance rigid. 'Don't come back here.'

'...What?'

'He's cleaning out shop.' The civil goddess glances back over her shoulder, glaring at the facade of the emperor's palace. 'For what, I don't know. It was Shui-Xiong first. He's been after Pei for a century. And now, it's me. Eventually it'll be you, too. Don't come back here.'

She continues on her way, only for a hand to grab at her sleeve.

'Come with me, then.'

Ling Wen looks down at her, hesitant. Into those warm, bottomless eyes that always pull her towards rest.

'You don't owe them anything.'

Ling Wen falls silent, her lips pursed.

Maybe she owes most of them nothing. In fact, the majority of the Heavens owe her an uncountable number of debts.

But leaving now would mean conceding defeat without payment for a betrayal. And even more than that—

Ling Wen has been an unwilling accomplice for so long.

Her guilt, her grief—it isn't the same as Pei's. Not only because Shi Wudu wasn't her lover, but—

Because she knew—or had every reason to suspect...

Ling Wen's eyes shut for a moment, and she takes a long, deep breath.

'I have business to finish before I leave.'

Yushi Huang's face falls—but before they part ways, Ling Wen catches her fingertips between hers, squeezing them gently.

'But remember what you said? I'm not replaceable. ' She lets her go before anyone else can see, turning her back. 'Look after yourself. I'll do the same.'

Her time is limited, but it's enough to make arrangements.

And, more importantly, to throw a spike under the wheel. Because after listening to Rain Master Yushi Huang reminisce...

Ling Wen thinks she's correct.

The emperor does love keeping pets.

FOR THOSE WHO WANT TO CONTINUE ON TWITTER:

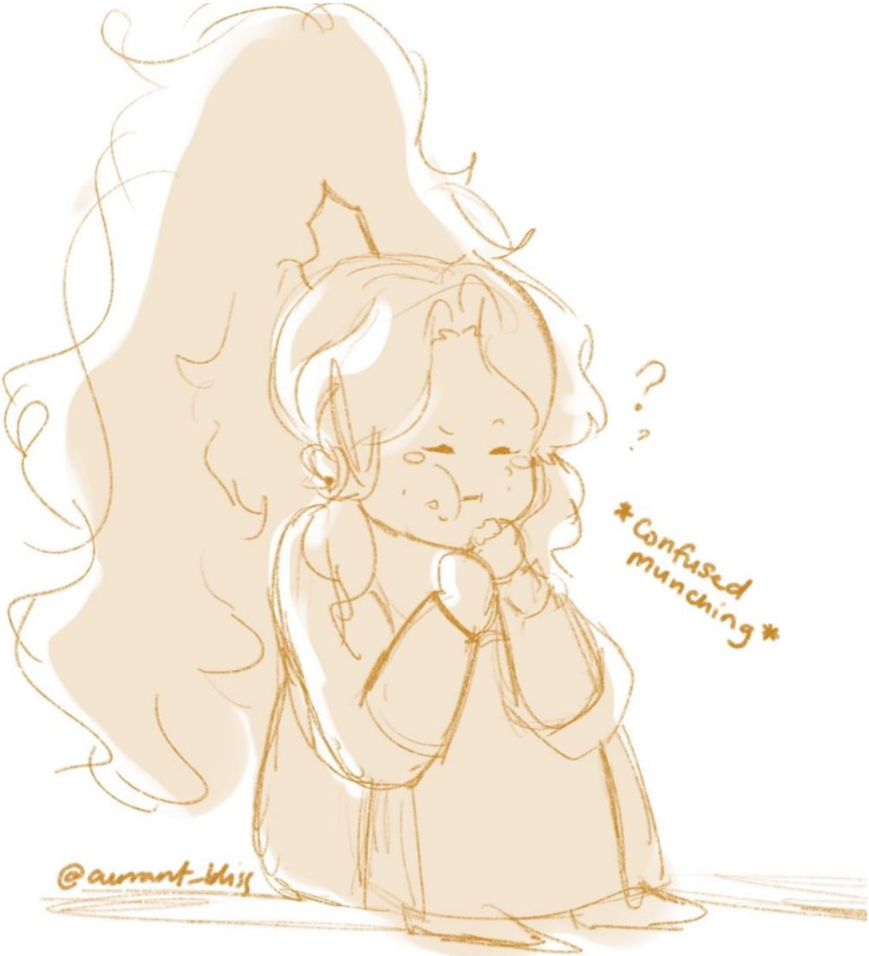
READ FROM HERE

While this fic does post on Ao3 with relative frequency, I update on twitter daily. Normally, I attempt to keep twitter about 50-100k words ahead of the AO3 version of this story, so I can update on Ao3 at a steady pace with few breaks. However, with chapter 100 coming up, I'm trying to pace the chapters a little closer to twitter for planning reasons, so there is currently only around 30k words of unposted content from twitter. This will probably lead to slower updates in the coming weeks, especially as I go through exams. Thank you for your patience!

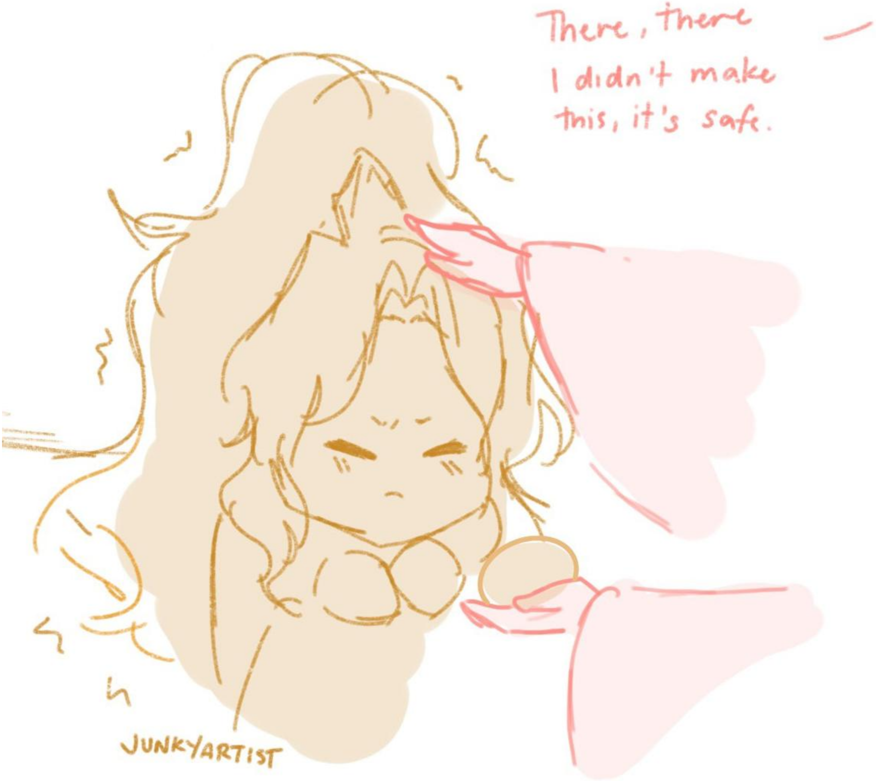
ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with Permission from the Artist, do not repost or re-use for any reason.

Quan Yizhen, suffering



?
?
Confused munching
@aurant_bliss



There, there
I didn't make this, it's safe.
JUNKYARTIST

CREDIT: JUNKY

The Kiln Arc

CREDIT: Leafsheep

Chapter End Notes

> Thank you to Junky and Leafsheep for their wonderful artwork, and allowing me to share it!
>
> xoxo, Evie

The Survivor

Chapter Summary

“Hahaha!”

Childlike giggling echoes through the leaves.

“New bride...new bride...”

The singing drifts through the air, unfamiliar to Mu Qing by sound—but the lyrics have been recited to him before.

“Do not smile under the veil...”

Chapter Notes

CONTENT WARNINGS FOR THIS CHAPTER: this chapter contains references to death, depictions of violence, abuse, the grooming process, and references to childhood abuse. Please proceed with caution.

Songs from this Chapter: Bastards, Dear John, and I Think I'm OKAY

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"Mu Qing!" Feng Xin's voice carries easily through the forest, always finding its mark. "Is your sector clear?"

The martial deity straightens, flicking his hair over his shoulder as he sheathes his saber.

There's been no end to them. Ghosts and demons—coming in hordes.

Oddly enough, despite the fact that Mount Tonglu is northwest of here, the majority of the flow of beasts has been curving south.

“...Just about. Yours?”

“I’ve still got a few snake spirits that won’t...stay...STILL—!”

Mu Qing rolls his eyes, following the sound of his voice.

Anything that he can’t hit with an arrow, and he turns into a grumbling child. Honestly. He knows how to use a sword just as well as—

“Hahahaha!”

Mu Qing pauses in mid-step, leaves crunching under his feet. “...Feng Xin?”

He was within earshot before, but now...

Nothing.

“...” Mu Qing crosses his arms, rocking back on his heels. Unless that wasn’t Feng Xin at all.

In which case, it could have been a weaker creature, getting Mu Qing to reveal that there were no other beasts in the area.

“Hahaha!”

Childlike giggling echoes through the leaves.

“New bride...new bride...”

The singing drifts through the air, unfamiliar to Mu Qing by sound—but the lyrics have been recited to him before.

“Do not smile under the veil...”

His eyebrows raise sharply, then his expression turns to stone.

A weaker creature, trying to lure him...

Mu Qing takes one sudden step back as the creature drops overhead, catching it by the scruff of the neck.

...Into an ambush.

He holds the fetal spirit at an arm’s length as it tries to twist around to claw and bite at him.

“You know,” he sighs, annoyed. “You get most of that personality from your mom. But serenading your prey and giggling like a little freak when you’re trying to sneak up on someone...”

He got the lack of subtlety from his father.

“...But what are you doing here?” He mutters.

It couldn't be rushing the blockade to reach Mount Tonglu. It doesn't have the strength or intelligence for that.

Not to mention the fact that Mu Qing isn't a bride, and he doesn't have a womb for the fetal spirit to sneak into.

"...Let him go!"

Mu Qing's expression sours slightly as he turns around, finding the heavily painted face he nearly didn't recognize in the beginning, glaring at him as she rushes through the trees.

"Did you break out with him yourself, or did someone help you?"

"Does it matter?!" She hisses.

"I thought you'd be glad to see us gone—now give him here!"

Mu Qing almost does exactly as she asks, but then—

He hesitates.

"...Where are you going to take him?"

Lan Chang glares, fists trembling by her sides.

"That is none of your business!"

Normally, yes. It wouldn't be.

"...He killed three unborn children." Mu Qing mutters, staring at the little creature with a complicated expression. "That we know of."

More than likely, over so many years—it could have been thousands.

Lan Chang falters, her lips trembling.

"O-Only when we were separated!"

"Did you know he was working for Qi Rong?" The martial god questions flatly, and her face falls.

"...What? What are you—?! You're lying, Cuocuo—he's a good boy! He gets confused, but he wouldn't—!"

Mu Qing struggles to look at the creature in his grip and see a 'boy' at all.

Between the sharpened teeth and blood red eyes, it's warped and twisted shape and form.

"...Did you hear that song he was singing before he tried to get the drop on me?"

"What about it?!"

"It was used to lure seventeen young women to their deaths on Mount Yu Jun."

Her eyes widen with horror, confirming that she's heard of the incident with the Ghost Groom before–and she swallows hard, shaking her head stubbornly.

"So?! Qi Rong and Xuan Ji took advantage of a child who doesn't know any better! They hurt those girls, not Cuocuo!"

Mu Qing doesn't argue with her–and her face screws up with frustration as she tries to stomp over, trying to push past him to get the child–and crying out when he doesn't hand him over.

"What is your problem?! What do you want?!"

"He's dangerous, and you can't control him."

"Yes, I can!" Lan Chang glares up at him. "He listens to me!"

"Right now," Mu Qing glares right back at her, using his free hand to hold her back. "But how many times has he gotten away from you?"

Her lips press together so tightly, the color drains from them. "I won't let him get away again!"

"You JUST DID!" Mu Qing snaps, lifting the snarling beast in his grip for emphasis. "If it had been ANYONE but a Heavenly Official, they would have been killed!"

"Don't pretend like you CARE!"

Mu Qing looks up at the sky, long suffering, his voice positively dripping with sarcasm.

"Yes, call me a crazy person, but civilian casualties tend to BOTHER ME!" He grits his teeth. "And you are CLEARLY ill equipped to prevent that from happening!"

"That's MY responsibility!" Lan Chang's eyes flare with deep seated resentment, still fighting to get through. "I'm his MOTHER!"

"YES!" He locks his elbow to keep the child at an arm's length. "And you have been FAILING."

"I'm–I'm doing my best! What else can I do?! Are you going to disperse him?!"

The thought of that seems to send her into a blind panic, clawing at Mu Qing's free arm. "He's just–he's innocent–NONE of this is his fault, YOU CAN'T–!"

"I agree." Mu Qing glares at her, his tone harsh. "NONE of this is the child's fault." Lan Chang stops struggling, her jaw dropping.

"...You're saying it's MINE?! You're saying what happened to us was my fault–?!" Her voice rises in pitch with rage, her shoulders shaking, only to be cut off.

"It's not your fault when horrible shit happens to you."

Mu Qing's expression is dark, eyes glaring down at her harshly. "But if you fuck up, and other people get hurt–that's still on you. And you have to live with that shit. You don't get to spend the rest of your life making excuses for yourself, or..." He turns his gaze to Cuocuo.

"And what should I have done?! It's not like I had any other options!”

"Yes, you FUCKING DID!" Mu Qing shoves her back now, at the end of his patience. "You knew the kid was dangerous, and you NEVER prayed to–!”

"We BOTH agreed he NEVER needed to know!" Lan Chang snarls. "Don't pretend you weren't on board with it, you had EVERY chance to reveal the truth in the Grand Martial Hall, and what did you do?! You just fucking STOOD THERE!"

"No, I actually had to defend myself when you accused ME of being the father!" Mu Qing shakes his head. "And don't pretend YOU don't know how fucked up that was!" Because if they had tested that sword on Mu Qing–

Lan Chang would have known exactly what to expect. That was why she accused him as a last resort.

And he's still livid about that.

"I'd rather hurt you," She shrugs, throwing her hands up. "I thought we understood that about one another. But--you KNOW I couldn't have prayed to Feng–!”

"I meant ME!" Mu Qing cuts her off, pointing at his chest. "You KNEW you could have prayed to me!"

Lan Cang's jaw drops.

"...Are you joking?" She sputters, almost laughing at the suggestion. "YOU? You think I'd actually–!”

"No! I never thought you would, but you KNEW I would have answered if you did, you KNEW I would have helped!"

Maybe not for her. Maybe not even for the father.

"Hell, if you hadn't fucking SPRUG IT ON ME, I probably would have been willing to play the father!" Mu Qing glares. "But you didn't. You kept it to yourself, when you KNEW you couldn't handle it, and now people are DEAD!"

Countless emotions flicker through Lan Chang's eyes.

Resentment. Anger. Hurt. Shame. Grief. All of those things, Mu Qing can understand, given their situation.

But there's one that baffles him, an emotion he's overly familiar with, recognizing it in the twist of her mouth, in the bitter insecurity of her tone–

"You..." her voice trembles as she tries to get past him again, "Are the LAST person I would EVER ask for help!"

Jealousy.

It rings in every single word. And Mu Qing–he can't understand it. Because–

What the hell did he ever do to her? Besides save her ungrateful ass?

"Then the consequences for not asking for help are on YOU!" He takes a step back when she lunges again. "Not me. Not the father. Not the kid. YOU!"

Because–

None of this had to happen.

"What could YOU have done, if he's so impossible to control?! Locked him in a cage?!" Lan Chang shakes her head vehemently. "If protecting him from that makes me a bad person, FINE! I'll accept the consequences! And I'll accept the consequences if I fail again too, but I won't let him live like that!"

"WOULD YOU JUST SHUT UP?!" Mu Qing shoves her back again. "I never said anything about dispersing him, or locking him up! Stop putting words in my fucking MOUTH!" He glares, and instead of holding Cuocuo at a distance, he pulls him in, pressing both palms on either side of the demon's skull.

"WHAT ARE YOU DOING?!"

Lan Chang panics, scrambling to her feet when the martial god's palms glow with spiritual power, frantically trying to get back to her child, when–

When something flickers, and she drops to her knees on the ground, frozen. "H...How did you...?"

Sitting in Mu Qing's arms–isn't the twisted, deformed shape of a resentful monster, no–it's just–

Lan Chang's eyes grow as wide as they possibly can, then fill with tears. Just a little boy–about the size of a toddler.

With wild, dark hair, and–

His father's eyes.

Lan Chang doesn't move, trembling on the ground, breaths that she no longer needs to take caught in her throat.

"..." Cuocuo turns his head, reaching up to tug at one of the longer pieces of Mu Qing's hair, giggling.

Mu Qing wrinkles his nose, but shakes himself out of it, summoning back the self righteous anger he was trying to emote before–which is slightly more difficult when holding a giggling child instead of a snarling beast.

"I had ZERO interest in medicine in my mortal life!" He glares down at her, bouncing the child so he doesn't start to fuss. "You think I picked that up for FUN?!"

"You..." Lan Chang doesn't move, her eyes flickering from Mu Qing, to her son–

Seeing his face for the first time, tears slipping down her cheeks.

"Do have any IDEA how hard it was learning how to do this much?! If you had brought him to me sooner, instead of running off the moment he turned fierce, I could have–!"

Lan Chang isn't listening to him, scrambling forward. "G-Give him to me!"

When Mu Qing hesitates again, she sobs, infuriated.

"I've never gotten to hold him like this–GIVE HIM TO ME!"

"It's more complicated than–!"

He doesn't fight her when she snatches the toddler back, not wanting him to get hurt in the struggle, but...

Lan Chang collapses back onto the ground with her son in her arms, sobbing as she kisses his hair, but the moment she leans back to look at him...

That warped, pained version of him is back–still staring at her lovingly, but–

But now that she's seen his real face, she...

An angry groan rips from her chest as she looks up at Mu Qing, clutching Cuo Cuo against her.

"WAS THAT SOME SORT OF TRICK?!"

"No!" Mu Qing snaps, "I was trying to EXPLAIN–!"

"Explain what?!"

"It requires a constant supply of spiritual power!" Mu Qing glares. "I haven't figured out how to make the spell work remotely!"

As a cursed spirit with a constant flow of cursed energy–Cuo Cuo would need an equal and opposite flow to bring his form back in balance.

Mu Qing kneels down in front of her, gingerly placing his hands on the spirit's skull again–and when he does–

Lan Chang sees her son in her arms, big eyes staring up at her, the same as before–but–

Tears slip down her cheeks as she strokes his hair back from his face.

"Mama?"

She chokes down a sob, pressing a kiss to his forehead, trembling. "I'm right here, honey...Mama's right here..."

Lan Chang clutches him so tight, that if he was a mortal child–he probably would have been hurt, but instead, the little ghost just hugs her back.

His little arms can't do much more than hug around her neck, but–

But it's more than Lan Chang ever thought she would get to have. And she...

She almost says thank you.

She knows the right thing to do would be to say thank you.

But...

Her eyes flicker up from where her face is pressed into Cuo Cuo’s hair, focusing on Mu Qing's face.

Palms glowing, eyes focused.

Those eyes that he–

The eyes that he always wanted to see, never hers.

And she's faced with the slow, dawning realization of a cruel irony.

That Lan Chang will only ever see her son's face when Mu Qing is holding him.

And that–

That creates a terrifying picture. One–one where she isn't–

Snap!

There's the sound of movement nearby, forcing Mu Qing to rise to his feet, drawing his blade.

"No, no, wait—!" Lan Chang chokes out a plea, sobbing when Cuocuo returns to his previous form, "Could you have kept it up a little longer?!"

"Something might be coming!" The martial god snaps, peering through the trees, "It's fucking dangerous right now, you shouldn't have been out here!"

"And what were we supposed to do, rot in a cell forever?!"

Mu Qing rolls his eyes, rounding back on her, not particularly moved by her tears, given the situation. "I wasn't going to let that–!"

"Mu Qing?"

Now, they both freeze–

Hearing Feng Xin's voice.

Mu Qing turns his head over his shoulder–just as the Fetus Spirit turns it's head back and forth–

Between his mother's crying face, and the martial god standing before them.

And for Feng Xin and the lower martial gods arriving with him–

An unfortunate picture unfolds.

Mu Qing, standing over Lan Chang, tears streaming down her face, streaking her makeup–

His sword drawn.

The martial god pauses, his eyes flickering from his blade, to Lan Chang, then back to Feng Xin and the others.

"Oh, this isn't–!"

Before he can finish that sentence, Cuocuo launches himself from his mother's arms while Mu Qing's back is turned, sinking his fangs into the Martial God's arm.

"SHIT!"

Feng Xin reacts before anyone else, rushing forward to pull the creature off–eventually succeeding when it lets go, leaping back into its mother's arms.

"Are you alright?!?"

"I'm fine!" Mu Qing grits his teeth, pressing his palm against the wound, beginning to heal himself.

"The little fucker is fast, that's all–"

"–HE HURT MAMA!"

Everyone in the forest freezes.

The spirit hasn't spoken coherently besides giggling, or singing that stupid song, but-- But NOW it decides to go and say that?!

Mu Qing looks around, his jaw hanging open.

"I..."

Feng Xin looks just as shocked and confused as he does, but–

But the other martial gods see a very different picture.

A woman who had her child cut out of her, Mu Qing, who was just standing over her with a sword, and the ghost of that child...

Who just accused him of murder.

Mu Qing whips his head around to look at Lan Chang, his heart pounding.

"Tell them he's lying!"

The ghost stares back at him, her eyes wide, flickering between him, and the others, clutching Cuocuo to her chest

"TELL THEM!"

Finally, her gaze settles on Feng Xin's hand–resting against Mu Qing's shoulder, helping him stand while he heals his arm.

Such a small thing, a normal thing to do for a wounded comrade on the battlefield, but–

Mu Qing leans into it, ever so slightly.

Lan Chang's eyes suddenly narrow into a glare, and Mu Qing–

He can only watch her hand rise, pointing at him in horrifying slow motion.

"He–He's A MURDERER!" She cries, scrambling away from him. "IT'S HIM!"

For a moment, Mu Qing is frozen, too shocked to react.

"...Xuan Zhen..." One of the other Martial Gods mutters slowly, reeling with everyone else. "He can be...an angry guy, but he wouldn't..."

"The hell?!"

Mu Qing freezes, his heart leaping into his throat when Feng Xin holds his shoulder in a death grip.

Is he–?

"You're actually CONSIDERING IT?!" Feng Xin rounds on the others, his face dark with anger. "What the hell do all of you look so shaken up for?! She's obviously trying to distract us so she can escape!"

Mu Qing feels shellshocked, like he's listening through water.

"I'll be the first to admit, he's an asshole–but we've known each other since we were kids , he wouldn't do that!"

And coming from someone like Nan Yang, who has always had a difficult relationship with Mu Qing–

They actually seem to be listening.

Mu Qing slowly looks up at him, and–

Feng Xin isn't looking at him, he's glaring at the others. So...

He doesn't see the way Mu Qing's lips tremble.

"...HE IS!" Lan Chang sniffs back her tears angrily, fighting to stop more from falling. "I can PROVE IT!"

Everyone looks back at her–but–

But not Mu Qing, who knows if he does–

He's going to make this situation ten times worse.

When they were kids, Xie Lian used to tell him to try counting to ten in his head before he spoke. To spell out soothing words while breathing deeply.

Because Mu Qing's temper is admittedly his worst quality, and makes him seem like a completely different person. It makes the worst first impressions, and–

He never has the will to defy what people think of him, especially when it's the worst.

"Your emperor, if he has a sword that can test if you're a virgin, then–he's got to have one that will show if you're lying, right?!"

The other martial gods glance at one another, squirming with discomfort, because…

Jun Wu does.

"He IS a murderer, I SWEAR!"

Mu Qing freezes, and Feng Xin looks down at him, suddenly hesitant.

"TEST ME!" She glares. "He–He EVEN HAS A SCAR ON HIS ARM FROM WHEN CUO CUO BIT HIM AFTER IT HAPPENED!"

Mu Qing's right hand squeezes into a fist, trembling, because…

Feng Xin's seen that scar before.

And Mu Qing...knows exactly what Feng Xin is thinking.

He–

He can't even blame him, really.

And now, all of the other martial gods can see the look on Feng Xin's face–not automatically believing the accusation, but...

He's confused. Because...

'I was a murderer.'

"It's on his right arm!" Lang Chang glares, leaning against a tree, trembling, her chest heaving. "You–you can match it to Cuocuo's teeth, I'm telling the TRUTH!"

The worst part is that she isn't lying.

She's just using selective wording to her advantage, and...

It puts Mu Qing in the position where he'd have to do two things, to clear his name. First, tell them how he actually got that scar.

And second–

He grits his teeth, breathing hard, his shoulders trembling.

"...I didn't hurt them," he voice is small, trembling.

And in some cruel, sick sense of deja vu, one of the martial gods standing nearby replies--

"Don't worry, general...we believe you..."

Mu Qing squeezes his eyes shut, remembering.

'Tell them, Mu Qing!'

'...Mu Qing?'

"Mu Qing?" Feng Xin's voice is low. "How does she know about that scar?"

Just hearing that he knows about it draws a flinch from Lan Chang, but–

No one's really micro-analyzing her reactions at the moment.

"...You don't believe me?" Mu Qing whispers, his vision swimming.

"I never said that!" Feng Xin frowns. "But if it's really gonna match, I don't know how to explain it to the–”

He doesn't. He–

Mu Qing's breaths are quick and shallow, his head spinning.

Feng Xin doesn't believe him. He's not saying it, but he doesn't believe him.

No one–

'And who would ever believe you?'

He's dragged back to that feeling. Being small and infuriatingly weak, being forced to ask for forgiveness, to take things he said back.

To call himself a liar, even when he wasn't.

To watching his mother plead for forgiveness, making excuses for him.

'He's been acting out since his father passed.'

'It's my fault, really, I...I haven't been giving him enough attention at home.'

'He has a problem with lying. We're working on it, he – he doesn't mean any harm!'

No one has ever believed him.

His eyes flicker around at the other martial gods, paranoid, his breaths coming faster.

"...Wh...When I m-m..." He squeezes his eyes shut again, shame boiling in his stomach, trembling with frustration and embarrassment.

Feng Xin doesn't say a word.

He's always known that Mu Qing has a stutter, one that he mostly got over when he was a teenager.

It's probably the only thing he's never made fun of him for, no matter how bad their arguments got.

Mostly, because Mu Qing only ever stutters when he's...

Ripped apart.

And he knows, the best thing to do is not prompt him to speak. To give him the space to sort his words out. Now, he just glares at the other martial gods, forcing them into silence.

"...When I...m-met them...t...they were already d...dead." Mu Qing spits out the words.

"I-I tried...to h-help t...them, b...but the k-kid went...fierce a-and b-bit...m...me..." He explains, his face growing dark with shame, he–

He's never stuttered like this in front of–

In front of the other gods. People he works with. Who–

Who looked up to him, before.

No one says anything, looking away with discomfort, no one…

Really knows what to do, seeing General Xuan Zhen like this.

Mu Qing turns away running his fingers through his hair, taking heaving breaths as he tries to calm down, and one of them finally asks...

"...Why would you be helping some random ghost and fetal spirit?"

"For it to scar him like that–he would have had to be a mortal, right?"

"...Isn't there a ritual with dead infants where you can...you know..."

(Trigger a false ascension.)

"I already TOLD YOU!"

Feng Xin steps between Mu Qing and the rest of them, glaring. "He's a lot of things, but he'd NEVER hurt a kid, alright?!"

"...But he never said he wasn't a murderer." One of the younger gods points out awkwardly, averting his eyes.

Feng Xin opens his mouth, then shuts it.

Because he can't say that Mu Qing isn't a murderer, either.

Because when they go back to the Heavens, Mu Qing might be able to prove that he didn't kill Lan Chang and her child, but–

He can't prove that his hands are clean.

Anger finally brings steadiness to his voice.

"Tell them the truth."

He whips his head to look at Lan Chang, who is in the middle of trying to slink past a tree, away from the situation, his eyes burning with rage.

"Tell them the FUCKING TRUTH, JI–!"

"I DID!" She shouts over him, before he can say her name . "You want the truth?! You're not like THESE fucking people!" She glares, gesturing at the martial gods around him. "You can wear their clothes, change the way you talk, act like you're BETTER, but you're NOT!"

Mu Qing knows what she's doing–that's the worst part.

Because the moment his temper snaps, he's done.

But even Lan Chang couldn't know how her last insult would hit, sending every hair on Mu Qing's neck standing straight up.

"The only difference between you and me is that I didn't MURDER anyone to get the things I wanted!"

Feng Xin whips his head around to look at her, suddenly confused, because–

Why does she sound SO familiar with Mu Qing, enough to pick on the fact that he used to be a serv–?

"...You put that kid down, right now." Mu Qing's voice is flat. "You've got three seconds."

"Mu Qing–" Feng Xin reaches over to stop him, a little TOO familiar with that tone, "Don't–if she puts that thing down, it might–”

"IT'S GONNA BE THE LEAST OF HER FUCKING PROBLEMS!" Mu Qing snarls, launching himself at her, only to get caught around the waist, arms clawing.

"LET ME GO, FENG XIN!"

"You need to calm down, you're gonna make this look–!"

Mu Qing laughs , shoving at Feng Xin's chest blindly as he attempts to get to her, his eyes gleaming with rage.

"IF I'M GOING DOWN, THEN I'M GONNA DISPERSE HER FIRST!"

If Feng Xin could, he'd be holding his face in his hands, because–

That sounds so incriminating.

"Would you SHUT UP?! If you're telling the truth, then you can prove it when we get–"

(He didn't mean to say 'if,' but that only makes Mu Qing even more hysterical.)

"Fine, FINE! YOU WANNA KNOW THE TRUTH?!" He isn't talking to Feng Xin, or the others–he's looking at Lan Chang.

And therein lies the fatal flaw of Mu Qing.

When he get's angry, he doesn't communicate, he–

"THAT BRAT OF YOURS LUCKED OUT!"

(He gets even.)

"AT LEAST HE DIDN'T HAVE TO GROW UP WITH A SELFISH FUCKING BITCH OF A MOTHER!"

Lan Chang's eyes grow impossibly wide with hurt and anger as Feng Xin fights, his heels dragging in the dirt, as Mu Qing blasts spiritual energy into his fists, fighting tooth and nail.

"YOUR PLAN WAS TO GET ME EXILED, RIGHT?!" He snarls.

So then, Mu Qing wouldn't have to separate from Cuocuo, and could be at her disposal without her having to confront–

Confront the truth .

That's it, right?

"WELL, I AM NEVER HELPING YOU EVER AGAIN!"

"Mu Qing, stop–!" Feng Xin grits his teeth, and–

All of them go still, when they hear a voice echo throughout the general communication array.

"Attention to all Martial Gods in the southern sector: there is an arrest order for General Xuan Zhen, along with his deputies."

Mu Qing freezes, going limp with shock in Feng Xin's grip as he looks up at the sky, his jaw hanging open.

"...What the FUCK, Ling Wen?!"

The other martial gods glance at one another, uncertain, but...After a moment, one of them pulls out a set of spirit shackles.

Feng Xin lets Mu Qing go, given that Lan Chang and the fetal spirit have already disappeared into the woods once more, his eyes widening with confusion.

"...We're jumping straight to an arrest? He's denied it, shouldn't we investigate–?"

"You want us to disobey an order?"

"...Come to think of it," one of the other gods comments, "He didn't seem surprised about the murderer thing either. He just said that Xuan Zhen wouldn't hurt a kid..."

"Because he wouldn't?" Feng Xin glares. "I may not get along with him, but I don't think he's a psychopath?!"

"No, it makes it sound like you knew something already..." One of the gods standing around frowns, his hand on the pommel of his sword, and–

Mu Qing doesn't miss the way Feng Xin's fingers twitch toward his bow.

"..."

He takes a deep breath, closing his eyes.

"...You think I tell him anything?" He sneers, rolling his eyes. "If he'd known what I did–he wouldn't have had anything to do with me."

Feng Xin doesn't move one way or the other, his eyes snapping towards Mu Qing. "Does anyone here doubt Nan Yang's loyalty to his oaths?"

The others glance at each other, none of them willing to say anything to the contrary. If there's one thing Feng Xin is, it's loyal.

Mu Qing smiles, shaking his head. But his fist, clenched at his side...it's trembling. "I murdered a member of the Royal Family of Xianle."

Feng Xin goes rigid, his eyes never leaving Mu Qing's face.

"So, if you think he'd have anything to do with helping cover up the murder of someone in a family he was sworn to protect...you're fucking idiots." Mu Qing mutters.

"...You what?"

Mu Qing takes a step back from him, his eyes on the other martial gods, and–

"Just let me go, Feng Xin."

'It's what he wants anyway, isn't it?'

His hand drifts down to the hilt of his saber, and the truth of the situation becomes starkly clear to Feng Xin.

That Mu Qing is either going to try to escape, or he's going to go down fighting. But–

Someone's done this to Feng Xin before.

And now, his own hands begin to tremble.

'Stop following me, Feng Xin.'

'You can't help me.'

And Feng Xin, he–

He listened, back then.

He listened, not knowing–

'IT HURTS!'

'XUAN ZHEN! NAN YANG!'

'HELP ME!'

Not knowing just how much pain his friend was in. Not knowing that when he said he couldn't be helped was when he needed it the most.

And then, he lost Xie Lian. For eight hundred years.

But now, with heart stopping clarity, he realizes; He can't lose Mu Qing.

Feng Xin couldn't explain why. Doesn't have the words or the coherency of thought. He just–

He can't.

Even if he–

Mu Qing gasps when his arm is twisted behind his back.

Even if it means doing this.

Mu Qing twists in his grip, looking over his shoulder as Feng Xin nods to one of the younger martial gods.

And his blood turns to ice.

"Bring me the cuffs."

Feng Xin can't look at him, not–

Not when Mu Qing whispers his name--too shocked to be angry.

"...Feng Xin?"

"I don't know what's going on," Feng Xin mutters, snapping the binds around Mu Qing's wrists, temporarily sealing his spiritual power. "But..."

'I know you're not a bad person.'

That was what Mu Qing wanted him to look him in the eye and say, after he told Feng Xin...

"If you fight it out here, or you run–that's it."

He'll be gone for good.

Feng Xin shakes his head. "You think I'm gonna let that happen?!"

"You don't know–!"

"Yeah, because people never tell me anything," Feng Xin steers him to the other Martial Gods.

"But I'm going to go find that ghost and her kid, I'm going to bring them back to the Heavens–and she's going to have to tell the truth. Alright?"

Then Mu Qing's name will be cleared of that crime. And as for what he confessed to... Feng Xin just has to trust...that Mu Qing had a good reason.

And if it's good enough–then the Emperor will have to understand.

All he has to do is tell the truth.

But that doesn't make it any easier to listen to Mu Qing struggling as he hands him over.

It doesn't make it less heartbreaking, to hear him cry–

"Feng Xin–just...please!"

Desperation and fear in his voice.

And by then, Feng Xin might be having second thoughts, but…

It's already been done.

With a flash of light, the group have already returned to the Heavens.

Mu Qing is trembling when he feels the light and warmth of the Heavenly Capital around him, and–

When he opens his eyes, he sees the deputies and other officials from his palace struggling with guards. Looking–

Looking to him, for guidance.

"..." Mu Qing's jaw clenches, as he looks to one of his lead deputies, shaking his head.

They would be willing to try to fight their way out, if he asked–and he won't.

They didn't do anything wrong. They'll likely be transferred to other palaces, once Mu Qing is dealt with.

There’s no need for anyone else to go down with him.

Still—even as his subordinates submit, allowing themselves to be taken into custody, one of them shouts—

“HEY! It doesn’t matter if he’s under arrest—our general hasn’t been banished!”

“Don’t drag him like a prisoner!”

Mu Qing swallows down the lump in his throat, holding his gaze straight ahead as he's led toward the Imperial Palace, where the Emperor is...

Glowering at Ling Wen, hands gripping the arms of his throne tightly.

"That was a rather rash decision, Ling Wen."

"Was it?" She raises both eyebrows, hands clasped behind her back. "I was following procedure, sire."

Jun Wu frowns, waiting for her explanation.

"The late Water Master was declared a criminal with no trail," Ling Wen shrugs. "I presumed the new policy was to act first, ask questions later." She unclasps her hands, eyeing the scroll in her hands, keeping up with the reports from the day before.

"...Unless there was something you had in mind for General Xuan Zhen that I was not aware of."

Jun Wu can’t fault her. Operating on the information that she has—it’s a very clever idea.

Maybe she even made the leap to understanding that Shi Wudu was being blackmailed. In which case…leaping to publicly arrest Mu Qing would have been a master stroke of genius.

Removing Jun Wu’s ability to blackmail Mu Qing or use him as a pawn by bringing that information to the entire Heavenly Court—rather than just a small, easily contained group of Martial Gods.

(Rumors only spread in court when he allows them to.)

But Ling Wen only believes she has one opponent—the Heavenly Emperor.

And thus, he’s the only adversary she can plan for. The only motivations she can predict or plan for are that of someone in his role.

But there are sides to Jun Wu that she doesn’t know—and cannot predict.

The doors to the martial hall open as Mu Qing is led inside, and Jun Wu spares Ling Wen one slur look.

With a flick of his wrist, the spirit shackles on Mu Qing’s wrists burn brightly, dragging him to the throne.

“I’ll interrogate Xuan Zhen personally.” He glares. “Leave us.”

But when he turns around, facing the throne—

His scowl fades away, replaced by an expression of calm. Maybe even relief.

Mu Qing is cautious and suspicious by nature.

This might actually speed things up.

“Sire, your injury—!”

“He’s in chains, he can’t harm me. Now—leave us.”

When the room empties, Mu Qing hangs his head, dark tresses of hair falling into his face.

He always had a fine face for a servant, though Jun Wu has never been one to believe good looks were limited to members of nobility.

In any case, that’s irrelevant for now.

“…That was quite a confession you made,” Jun Wu sighs, wiping a hand down his face. “Though it would have been less difficult to handle if you had just waited until you arrived here to say anything.”

Mu Qing stares straight ahead, his jaw stubbornly locked.

“I had no choice.”

If he hadn’t said what he did, Feng Xin might be sitting beside him right now, and that—

That would be impractical.

The prince is off god knows where with Qi Ying, and Crimson Rain is bound to show back up before long. The asshole can’t seem to say away, so—

One of them has to stay out of trouble.

Besides, Feng Xin—

He’s never actually broken a law in his life.

Well, excluding possibly property damage, but that was never intentional.

“I can guess why you did it,” the emperor sighs. “But Nan Yang’s reaction was rather admirable.”

Mu Qing’s throat tightens, knowing—

Knowing that he has no right to feel betrayed, but that doesn’t stop the painful twist of sadness in his gut, remembering how Feng Xin handed him over.

“After all that time, he still immediately honored his oath to the royal family…”

Jun Wu is still facing away from him, hands clasped behind his back. “I’d venture to say that, in the last eight centuries, his feelings about Xianle haven’t changed.”

And of course; there’s a cruel double entendre.

He could mean the country, his duty, or—

The prince.

Mu Qing remains silent, but when Jun Wu peeks over his shoulder…

The martial god is hanging his head, shoulders slumped.

“…Regardless of all of that,” Jun Wu’s voice turns soft—gentle.

“I’m not a cruel man, Mu Qing.”

Mu Qing shivers.

“I’ll listen to your side of things.”

“I…didn’t hurt Lan Chang, or the child,” Mu Qing shakes his head vehemently, his knees beginning to ache against the hard marble floor. “I was telling the truth about that, everything I said—!”

“But when you said you killed a member of Xianle’s family…” Jun Wu turns around.

“That was true, wasn’t it?”

Mu Qing stares up at him, exhausted, his lips trembling.

"…Yes," he admits

"Was it in self-defense?"

Mu Qing's face contorts as he shakes his head, hair whipping around him from the force of his movement.

"Is that a yes, or a no?"

"N…N-No…"

"…" Jun Wu sits on his throne, staring at him. "Who was it?"

Mu Qing trembles, his jaw locked, and the emperor's mouth curves with tired sympathy.

"I'll get the answer one way or the other, Mu Qing."

Mu Qing's nostrils flare, his face pale from the shame.

"T…the Q-Queen's…b-brother-in-law…" He hisses, fighting back the tears of anger and shame in his eyes.

"And when did this happen?"

Mu Qing shrinks, almost as though he wants to sink into the floor and disappear.

"W-When…I was…t-twelve…"

Jun Wu falls silent, taking that in, and…after a moment, he reaches forward, placing a hand on Mu Qing's shoulder.

"Poor thing…" He sighs, shaking his head. Slowly, his hand rises up to the side of Mu Qing's head, stroking his hair. "It must have been so difficult for you…"

Two tears slip down Mu Qing's cheeks, landing on the floor below.

"Being so young, working with that family day in and day out…"

The younger god chokes back a sob, wishing he could cover his face, but his hands are bound.

"I d-didn't w…want to h-hurt anyone, b-but I…"

The emperor shushes him, shaking his head. "It's alright, Mu Qing. I believe you."

He—

The tears pour even faster as he stares up at Jun Wu, cautious, but—

Desperately needing to hear what the emperor is telling him.

"I believe you."

Mu Qing shudders as the emperor stands.

"…But I'll have to have more proof than just your word, if I am to let you go."

Murdering the brother of a queen is a serious crime, after all—one that Mu Qing insists was not in self-defense.

"We'll either have to handle things my way, or…" Jun Wu's gaze slips to the side. "We could always bring the issue before Xianle."

Mu Qing stiffens, suddenly sitting up straight.

"Given Qi Rong's unreliable nature, it would be difficult to bring him into this…but if you would prefer to go through the head of that family to resolve the matter—"

"No!"

Mu Qing shakes his head, his gaze becoming stubbornly determined. "No, I d..don't want his h-highness to be i-involved…"

"Are you sure?" Jun Wu questions, looking him over hesitantly. "There is an alternative to prove it, but…it will be painful. Maybe you should just—"

"No!"

Mu Qing swallows hard, fighting the urge to imagine the look on Xie Lian's face, if they brought the issue to him.

Knowing that—

Xie Lian would forgive him. He would say whatever was necessary to get Mu Qing out of trouble…but that wouldn't mean that he wasn't judging him.

And it wouldn’t change the things Mu Qing has done, or the way that they’ve…

No.

No one else needs to be brought into this.

“You’re absolutely sure? Once I start, there won’t be a point in stopping.”

“…And it’ll prove that I’m telling the truth?” Mu Qing whispers.

“Yes,” Jun Wu agrees quietly. “You won’t be able to lie.”

“…” Mu Qing’s eyes close.

His entire life, people have called him a liar.

A thief.

A traitor.

When the only secrets he ever had were the ones that he had a right to keep.

And when he tried to tell—

'Do you know how dangerous it is, to go around lying about important people?'

'He's been acting out, since his father died...'

'I don't want the guilt of having to harm a child to keep this quiet.'

...No one believed him.

The ones who did–they forced him to keep secrets.

"I'm sure." Mu Qing mutters, bracing himself.

And maybe, if Jun Wu hadn't asked so carefully, he wouldn't have trusted it.

Maybe, if he hadn't been given a choice–or multiple chances to withhold consent–he would have realized that he never had an option to begin with.

"...Very well." Jun Wu reaches out, his palm glowing with magic as he activates an array–pulling a sword from it.

One that Mu Qing hasn't seen before. Curved and sharp–but it doesn't look like metal.

It looks like it's been carved straight from bone.

"I was going to use this on Xianle," he explains, the mention of which makes Mu Qing sag a little with relief, knowing—

If it was that bad, why would he use it on Xie Lian?

"Back when he was withholding the truth about that business with Lang Qianqiu, but..."

The emperor sides, seeming to go back and forth on the matter. "Crimson Rain interfered, proving his innocence on his own. It was...very fortunate."

He snaps his fingers, activating an array around the Grand Martial Hall. One that seals the doors shut, and...

Prevents any sound from escaping to the outside.

"But Xianle might have been better equipped to deal with this than you, I'm afraid."

Before Mu Qing can ask him what that's supposed to mean, Jun Wu turns around, facing him.

"I wish it didn't have to be this way," he admits. "But I can't afford to have you rotting in a cell, Mu Qing. You're too useful to the Heavens."

“Wh–?"

"Who was the man that you murdered?"

Mu Qing's eyebrows raise with confusion.

"...I already told y–!"

Thump!

For a moment, he's just still, his eyes wide, all of the wind knocked out of him. And slowly, when he looks down, he...

He sees that blade, white as bone, impossibly sharp, running straight through his ribs. And it–

It hurts .

A scream of pain builds in his throat, his body convulsing, but with his hands bound, he–he can't even hold himself, he–

But instead of screaming, he chokes out–

"L-Lord Q-Qi Shen!"

He can't recall choosing to speak, and yet the words rip right out of him anyway.

"Good," Jun Wu kneels down beside him, pressing one palm against Mu Qing's cheek, the younger man pale and trembling as his body convulses around the sword.

"I knew you were telling the truth, Mu Qing."

The sword is pulled from his abdomen, but before he can–

Thump!

A sob rips from Mu Qing's throat, blood dripping down his chin as Jun Wu sighs, grimacing, as though this genuinely pains him.

"It only works for one question each, I'm afraid."

"I d-don't–"

"How did you kill him?"

Mu Qing sways, his body tipping forward.

And–

Jun Wu catches him. Rubbing a hand over the martial god's shoulder as he chokes out the words–

"S-Slit h..his t-t-throat..."

And it's horribly confusing. With every cut, he's comforted. Told that he's doing well. That it's almost over.

By the person hurting him.

That what the person who was hurting him before used to say, too.

And it hurts.

It hurts. It–

It really, really hurts.

As every horrible detail is pulled out and examined with an unfeeling eye.

As old wounds are cracked open without regard for the time it takes to scar.

At some point, Mu Qing stops fighting it. Accepts the comfort when it comes, knowing that another blow is going to follow. His body trembling as he chokes out the answer to every question, vision blurring and swirling as the pain overwhelms him.

"Don't be scared..."

Jun Wu shushes him when it's over, when the sword is finally pulled from him, and it doesn't return.

It takes Mu Qing what feels like ages to believe that, flinching from every movement.

Help me.

Help me, help me, help me.

Help me, help me, help, help, help, help, help me!!!

"Don't be scared..."

Fingers smooth over his hair, tucking it behind his ear. Glowing with spiritual power as Mu Qing's body heals, his eyes glassy and dark as he stares at the sealing.

"You did well, Mu Qing."

He's left there, limp on the floor as Jun Wu rises up.

With a snap of the emperor's fingers, the blood disappears from the younger man's robes, even if he hasn't quite gained the strength to move.

But he should recover quickly enough.

It was only thirty three blows, after all.

There are far, far worse things a soul can endure.

Jun Wu takes a seat on his throne once more, waiting. He seems to take no joy in watching the martial god tremble on the floor, but–

There's really no sympathy, either.

This was a necessary step. One of countless, seemingly equally necessary cruelties.

He's never been wrong, before–or, more accurately, he's never faced the consequences of being wrong.

Some mistakes, however small, are fundamental.

Seeds so tiny, you don't foresee what they might grow into.

Some as powerless as a servant.

Or as voiceless as a ghost fire.

Mu Qing has always benefited from the fact that people are never looking at him.

As such, Jun Wu doesn't see the look in his eyes when he pushes himself up onto his hands an knees, staring at the emperor's posed on the throne.

How relaxed and poised he is, after all of that.

'These people are dangerous, A'Qing.'

That was what his mother told him, when they first went to work in that house. Holding the little boy close against her side as she whispered warnings in his ear.

'You don't beat men like that.'

Mu Qing lowers his eyes.

And he breathes.

'You survive them.'

He isn't a prince experiencing failure for the first time. Nor is he a child of wealth, born with resources some could only dream of.

No.

And therein lies the emperor's mistake.

"...I...is that a-all...I h-had to d-do?"

"Yes." Jun Wu nods.

Mu Qing's jaw finally unlocks as he wraps his arms around himself, trying to rub some feeling back into his arms.

"Are you still in pain? I should have given you enough energy to recover," The emperor inquires gently.

Mu Qing is looking away, his expression hidden.

"...No," he mutters, "My body is just in shock, but there's n-no damage."

Even if he can feel the ghost of the blade in his body still, that horrible, splitting feeling haunting him–

He's healed.

"Good," Jun Wu sighs with relief, resting his forehead against his hand. "...Given the circumstances of what happened...I would say it does qualify as self defense."

Or at the very least, defense of another.

Mu Qing still doesn't look at him, but when he does speak...

"...T-thank you," He whispers, "N...no one's e-ever..."

"I know."

Dark eyes glare at the opposite wall, narrowed and angry, but...

'Never cross the man who makes your shoes.'

That was what Ling Wen said.

Not only because you rely on his services, or because he could trip you.

Mu Qing turns his face back towards Jun Wu, lips trembling, eyes wide and grateful before he lowers them again.

"A...Am I g-going to b...be...?"

"Banished?" Jun Wu questions.

Mu Qing stares at the floor.

"No, no. Your actions don't rise to that. And in any case...you've made yourself incredibly useful, Mu Qing. I already said that I could see potential in you."

Not only is he among the strongest of their martial gods—but he's risen far above any other medicinal god as well.

"...T...thank you," He mumbles, eyes downcast.

"Now, if you're feeling better..." Jun Wu rubs at the side of his neck. "Could you come here?"

Mu Qing doesn't move, still frozen in place, half sitting up on the floor.

"...Sir?"

"I need you to examine something."

Mu Qing's eyes drift down to the bandages underneath his robes, slightly wary. "...I thought wounds from that blade couldn't be treated with..."

"It's not that," Jun Wu waves him off, his hand rising to his temple. "It's my head."

"Your—?"

"It feels like it's about to split."

‘Split’ is an interesting choice of words.

Mu Qing has heard ‘split open,’ but…

He nods, swaying slightly as he rises to his feet.

His body is healed, but his knees still tremble from the shock, along with his hands, even as he tries to shake the shock out of them.

"…Alright," He mutters, his voice far more even than he feels.

His expression trusting, calm.

Not upset.

(That's why you don't cross those who are accustomed to serving.)

He steps behind where the emperor is seated, placing both palms against his temples.

(They're accustomed to faking smiles, hiding anger—and you never know when they're against you.)

"…" Mu Qing's hands glow with spiritual power as he probes the emperor's spiritual form, his own energy swirling, attempting to find the source of discord, but…

Suddenly, the martial god yanks his hands back, taking two steps away from the throne, holding his hands against his chest as if they've been burned.

"Well?"

"Your…" Mu Qing swallows hard, working to keep his tone under control. "It's not something I can…"

Jun Wu stares at him, expectant. "What?"

Mu Qing winces, his palms crackling—even after only briefly interacting with the emperor's spiritual form, struggling to rebalance his own energy.

"Your soul," Mu Qing starts, then stops, hesitating. "It's…"

Jun Wu's expression darkens.

"…Unbalanced," Mu Qing concludes quickly, taking another step back. "That's not something that can be dealt with medically. "Rest, or meditation can—"

"Thank you, Mu Qing." Jun Wu cuts him off flatly—his expression is less frightening than before, but…

Boiling with underlying pain.

With a flick of his wrist, the array surrounding the Imperial Palace is lifted, and he calls out—

“Guards.”

The doors open with a heavy creak.

“I’ve interrogated General Xuan Zhen to the fullest extent, and acquitted him of all charges.”

Which was certainly Ling Wen’s intention, even if he can’t see her smirking in the background.

The other martial gods hesitate, given everything that they heard, but…

Everyone is aware of the fact that the emperor has a blade that can force the truth out of anyone.

And from the sight of the sword sitting beside the Emperor’s throne…

“Yes, your majesty.”

“He’s rather exhausted after his interrogation. Escort him to his palace at once so he can rest.” Mu Qing is quick to follow them, even if he’s unsteady, and—

“I don’t want him assigned any work for the next few days while he recovers. And Xuan Zhen? That means no descending to the mortal realm.”

“But sir…”

“If he’s not guilty…”

“…What about the southern blockade?!”

Mu Qing listens to the other officials argue, remaining silent.

“He seems like he can walk just fine—!”

“I’ll worry about the Southern Blockade.” Jun Wu replies calmly. “The rest of you have your orders to carry out.

“…Yes, sir.”

“Of course, your majesty.”

Mu Qing doesn't say a word as he's escorted out. He doesn't look back.

He returns to his palace under his own power, and…while Jun Wu pardoned him, saying he was no longer charged with anything…

The guards posted by the gates of his palace don't slip his notice, either.

The emperor's order to rest is one that he has every intention to enforce.

He barely manages a tired, passing greeting to his deputies as he walks through the halls. After how they stood up for him before, they —

They deserve more than that, and he knows it, but he just…

The door to his office slams behind him as he slides down to the floor.

Trembling. His arms wrapped tightly around himself.

But that isn't enough.

Not until he crawls underneath his desk, curled into the smallest ball possible. Just like he did when he was small, and the world felt so terrifying.

He isn't small now, but the world hasn't changed.

He might be older. Might be stronger. But no matter how much time and distance he puts between himself and the person he used to be, some things don't change.

And he finds himself in a situation that cruelly parallels his childhood.

Feng Xin couldn't have known what was going to happen to him when he let the other martial gods bring him back here. Mu Qing isn't—

His eyes fill with tears as he hugs himself tighter.

He isn't sure that Feng Xin wouldn't have done it anyway, but he couldn't have known.

And his mother couldn't have known either, back then.

He still had to pretend he was alright, after he—

After something like that happened.

Still had to smile and give the person who did it exactly what they wanted.

Because doing anything else would be suicide.

Before, when he tried to tell the truth, to ask for help—the response wasn't so different from what he would get now;

'It's dangerous, telling lies about such important people.'

And who could he even tell? What would he say, if he did?

Jun Wu told the truth about interrogating him, even if people don't know how gruesome the reality behind that was.

Everything else Mu Qing has is only a suspicion. And even if he shared those—

Who is there that could actually do something about it?

Mu Qing himself is among one of the most powerful gods in the Heavens, and—

Among other things, he's been blessed—and cursed—with a good memory.

'Be careful with the emperor's concern. His attention. People tend to forget what he is.'

Shi Wudu was more powerful than any of them. Only surpassed by the emperor himself.

'If he's being kind to you—or anyone—it's not out of the kindness of his heart. He wants something.'

He clearly knew something about Jun Wu. More than anyone else did, and—

Now, he's dead.

If Shi Wudu couldn't deal with him—realistically, who could?

His immediate thought is Ming Guang, but…

Now, the weakening of the General's base of power over the last century seems almost strategic.

And if there's one person who could, beyond a shadow of a doubt, deal with Jun Wu…

He's been bound in shackles for over eight hundred—

Mu Qing freezes, still trembling, his face wet with tears as his eyes grow as round as could possibly be.

…Was that on purpose, too?

All this time?

His heart pounds in his chest, his mind reeling with the gravity of that possibility.

That slow, sickening realization, one that comes far too late.

Knowing just how much could have been different, if he had asked one question;

'Was somebody hurting you, your highness?'

And if that's true—if all of that is true—

Mu Qing's body aches from exhaustion, even with the wounds forcibly healed, unable to forget the wreckage that was wrought across his flesh. He just wants to stay here.

To hide.

To pretend that none of that ever happened. To forget all of it, and tell himself that there's no point.

But he can't.

Because if all of that is true, then…

'You don't beat men like that.'

The martial god crawls out from under his desk after what feels like hours.

He scrubs the floors of his office, scrapes and organizes every surface until his mind stops spinning out of control.

Then, he brushes his hair, and washes the tears from his face.

Mu Qing can’t stay here, and wait until he ends up like that.

‘You survive them.’

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

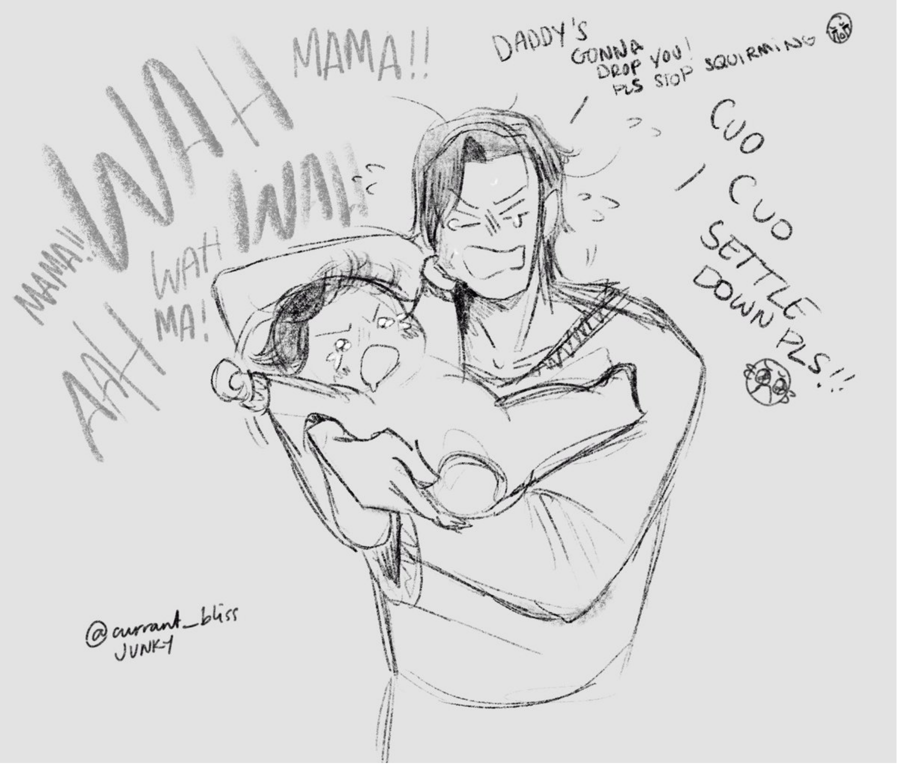
Included with Permission from the artist, do not repost or re-use for any reason

"You don't beat men like that."

[image]

CREDIT: ROWAN

FENG XIN AND CUO CUO



MAMA!!
WAH
AAH
WAH
MA!
WAH
MAMA!!
DADDY'S GONNA DROP YOU! PLS STOP SQUIRMING
CUO CUO SETTLE DOWN PLS!!
@currant_bliss
JUNKY

CREDIT: JUNKY

Chapter End Notes

> Mu Qing finally gets a bit of a spotlight now after like...700k+ words! So it's time for his character arc, enjoy!
>
> Thank you to Rowan and Junky for their beautiful artwork, and allowing me to share it!

The Brocade Immortal

Chapter Summary

He steps forward, knocking against the warehouse door firmly.

Bam, bam, bam!

Then, repeating himself when no one answers.

Bam, bam, bam—!

BAM!

Xie Lian nearly jumps with shock when Lang Ying leans over, slamming his fist into the door with a resounding boom.

The prince stares blankly in his direction as the boy leans back, shaking out his fist.

“…Ignoring people is rude.”

Chapter Notes

content warning: this chapter references past suicide attempts, victim blaming, and depression

Songs from this chapter: Lightning Crashes

See the end of the chapter for more notes

“Did you hear about General Xuan Zhen?”

Pei Ming doesn’t look up from his maps, his stubble far closer to a beard now than it was at the beginning of the week, his armor stained with blood.

“I heard that the emperor cleared him of the charges.”

Zeng Tao shrugs, pouring him another cup of tea.

“Yes, but you know how messy politics in the upper court are. With his medicinal skills, Xuan Zhen is a bit indispensable, don’t you think?”

Compared to the death of a one mortal woman and her child, anyhow.

Worth a coverup, some gods might say.

But Pei doesn’t think so.

The emperor, in spite of his gentle demeanor, isn’t so forgiving of any mistakes—big or small.

“…In any case,” the deputy clears his throat. “I know you’re busy with the Northern Blockade, but…”

“But what?”

Zeng Tao sighs.

“I didn’t want to worry you with it, General—but some of the lower deputies in the palace are truly incompetent. I’m sure straightening it out will have to wait until this mess is over, but—”

“Spit it out.”

“…There was a theft in one of your temples.”

Pei Ming raises an eyebrow, sipping his tea. The warmth is soothing against his throat, after nearly thirty hours of nonstop fighting.

“A theft? Since when have you felt the need to alert me to something like that?”

He has more temples than nearly any god, aside from Jun Wu.

And while he’s never been the god of wealth—his coffers have always been overflowing, to the point where he ordered his own deputies to not mind petty thefts in his temples.

Stolen food here, a little gold there—these aren’t things that he would miss.

“…Well, this was a significant offering, sir. It came from a mortal seeking a personal audience.” Zeng Tao admits reluctantly, still holding the tea pot, fingers drumming against the handle.

Pei frowns, pushing the map aside. “I haven’t given a personal audience in a year.”

“The request was denied,” his deputy explains quickly. “They were using a distortion over their voice, and they wouldn't even give a name. It also was so… soon after the passing of…"

He doesn't dare say Shi Wudu's name, lest the general smash something.

"…If the request was denied, then I don't see an issue with them taking the offering back." The general mutters, looking back down at the map before him.

Zeng Tao squirms, clearly disagreeing, but…

"It was a very unique offering, sir. A highly valuable artifact."

"…Why are you pushing this?" Pei's voice hardens, dripping with annoyance. "With everything that's going on, you think I care about —?"

Zeng Tao sets something down on the table with a thud, and when Pei looks down, his entire expression changes.

A golden hair pin.

A dragon carved into its face, with a ruby clutched in its talons.

When the Water Master's body was cremated, two things were removed from his body.

A golden locket, given to Shi Qingxuan—and this hair pin, which was returned to the original owner.

Pei Ming.

"I thought it seemed familiar, but I had to be sure. And when I went to check the treasury, it…" Zeng Tao frowns. "It was completely identical, sir."

Pei Ming lifts the hair pin up for his own inspection, his eyes hard, looking it over with an almost clinical gaze.

"…No," he mutters, his eyes narrowed. "They aren't completely identical."

"…They aren't?"

No.

Because this one—

Pei flips it over, looking for the engraving that should have been on the underside, finding it smooth.

…Isn't the original.

It's a good fake. The gold and jewels are real, the molding is so similar—

But clearly, whoever made it didn't have the time to examine it completely.

And Pei Ming can only think of one person that would try to lure him in with this.

Who would hide his identity while seeking an audience.

Who would have had the chance to swap the real thing out with a fake in the first place.

The last person to see Shi Wudu alive.

Pei Ming's eyes grow cold as ice.

"Which temple?"

"…Sir?"

"Which temple was the offering made from?"

"…Langling," the Zeng Tao explains slowly. "But I've posted one of the lower deputies there to keep an eye if anything—sir, where are you going?"

"Where do you think?"

"But…!" His deputy scrambles after him. "What about the northern blockade?!"

"Langling is in the North." Pei Ming shrugs, uncaring.

And if the emperor finds his performance to be lacking, well. He can fix the problem himself.

Pei Ming has more important things to deal with.

“But—!”

With a flash—he’s gone.

“Okay,” Xie Lian stops, placing a hand against Quan Yizhen’s chest to make the younger martial god stop in tow. “You remember what we agreed on?”

“Yes.”

“You don’t talk.”

“Yes.”

“And you go along with what I say.”

“Yes.”

Xie Lian sighs, relieved. “Good…”

He glances over at Lang Ying, who he asked to stay behind at Puqi Shrine, but…

The boy has been strangely defiant lately, following them all the way here in spite of Xie Lian’s protests.

“First—lend me some spiritual power,” he murmurs, holding out his hand.

Quan Yizhen bobs his head seriously, holding his hand out, grasping Xie LIan’s firmly.

Which prompts the god pulling away shortly after, feeling spiritual power flooding up his arm, generously, but far more forcefully than how Hua CHeng usually—

(Stop bringing him up.)

Xie Lian clears his throat, looking away.

“Thank you. Now—you’ll probably see me behaving rather strangely, but don’t worry, just stick to the plan.”

He steps forward, knocking against the warehouse door firmly.

Bam, bam, bam!

Then, repeating himself when no one answers.

Bam, bam, bam—!

BAM!

Xie Lian nearly jumps with shock when Lang Ying leans over, slamming his fist into the door with a resounding boom.

The prince stares blankly in his direction as the boy leans back, shaking out his fist.

“…Ignoring people is rude.”

Before Xie Lian can scold him, the door swings open—with a round, squat, bald headed ghost staring at the three of them, holding a toothpick between his teeth.

“…Can I help you gentlemen?” He questions dryly, sounding utterly disinterested.

Quan Yizhen opens his mouth, but—

“That remains to be seen,” Xie Lian speaks coldly, his arms crossed as he walks past the ghost and into the warehouse, making a show of reaching out to feel fabric as he looks around.

And, as he takes in the swirling dark aura in the air…

This is definitely the right place.

Lang Ying follows after him without hesitation, and after a moment the god snaps his fingers, gesturing for Quan Yizhen to follow after him.

“I hear you’ve been busy,” Xie Lian comments, running his fingertips over different piles of fabric.

The merchant coughs awkwardly, looking mildly ruffled when Quan Yizhen elbows past him, clearing his throat.

“What…makes you say that? Have we met before?”

"No." Xie Lian shakes his head, pinching one bolt of fabric with a look of distaste. "But I know someone hired you to spread around fake Brocade Immortals. And…" He keeps his head turned away, so the merchant can't see the cursed shackles in his eyes as he pretends to glance around the room. "It must be someone powerful, too."

The ghost stiffens.

After all, whomever it was, they were so sure that the merchant wouldn't double cross them that they were willing to leave the actual Brocade Immortal behind—so that it could be used for production of the fakes.

Meaning they're someone to be feared.

"…You're from the Heavens?"

"Me?" Xie Lian waves that off. "Ha!"

"Don't mess with me," the ghost glares, glancing around for the guards.

(All of whom have, for some mysterious reasons, disappeared.)

"I can smell it on you!"

Xie Lian places his hands on his hips. "Well, that's exactly why I'm here ."

He rolls his eyes, his tone suddenly becoming condescending.

(Not like him at all, just as he warned Quan Yizhen about before.)

"My assistant, he probably smells like a Heavenly Official too, doesn't he?"

The merchant pauses, glancing between them suspiciously.

"…Assistant?"

"That's right," Xie Lian lifts his chin. He changed into a different set of robes on the way here, one with a hood that sits low, covering his eyes. "Quan Yizhen—take them off."

The martial god pauses, looking towards Xie Lian, open mouthed.

"Take what off?"

"…" Xie Lian fights the urge to break character, instead forcing his expression to twitch with annoyance. "Your robes!"

His eyes grow round, and he nods quickly, reaching down to fiddle with the buttons and clasps.

It's only when Xie Lian hears the merchant cry out in shock, scandalized, that he realizes that Quan Yizhen is stripping completely , and his own ears burn.

"Just the outer robes!" He clears his throat, turning back to the ghost. "See the difference now?"

"…" The merchant frowns, looking back at the young man standing behind him, who certainly had a godly sheen about him before, and…

Now, from the pale complexion and pointed ears, he's clearly some sort of ghost.

"…How'd he do that?!"

"It's the robes," Xie Lian explains. "Lang Ying, give him the blue set."

The boy glances up, hurrying over with a bundle of robes clutched in his arms.

"Put them on."

Quan Yizhen has an easier time following this command, pulling the robes around him.

This time, his appearance changes to that of a mortal.

Deeply tanned, with 'imperfections," like a scar on his chin, or a birthmark on the side of his neck.

"…That's incredible!" The merchant breathes, walking around the god with fascination. "I've never seen a spell quite like it!"

(That's probably because the robes aren't enchanted at all, Xie Lian simply used borrowed power from Quan Yizhen to place an illusion over him before they even entered the warehouse.)

"Yes, well—not every ghost is powerful enough to disguise themselves as a human."

Xie Lian crosses his arms. "There's probably a big market for disguises like this. But, I'm just one person, and when I saw your little scheme here, I thought…"

He nods toward Quan Yizhen, who sets down the crate he's been carrying, revealing the gold bars within.

Now, smelling the chance at a deal, the merchant's eyes widen with greed. "Oh, I see, well—!"

"But," Xie Lian drawls, poking a pile of fakes with his finger, "I'm not so sure you can keep up with the level of quality I expect."

"But—!"

"Really. Just look at this hem work…" Xie Lian clicks his tongue. "I'll want to inspect the facility thoroughly before I make a deal. Make sure you can actually operate the way I need you to."

The merchant rubs his hands together eagerly, following behind him. "Oh, but sir—I assure you, we only carry the finest—!"

"I'll be the judge of that," the prince rolls his eyes. "Why don't you go outside and count the gold I brought you. If things are up to standard, we'll give you the other half of the first payment."

"O-Other half?" The merchant sputters, eyes wide.

"Well, of course, you can have a look around! But I should stay and give you a tour—!"

"So you can cover up any mistakes? I don't think so. I'm not fresh out of the coffin, you know."

(He can't help but laugh at his own joke—Lang Ying, however, seems thoroughly unamused.)

The merchant eventually relents, carrying his crate of gold off, eager to count the contents.

"…Now what?" Quan Yizhen questions, looking around.

"Place an array around the building so nothing can get in or out," Xie Lian replies. "Can you do that?"

"…It's done."

"Good!"

Xie Lian pauses, then reaches over to Pat him on the arm. “I’m sorry for speaking to you like that, but you did well!”

Quan Yizhen pauses, clearly unaccustomed to such feedback.

“…I did?”

The prince smiles up at him warmly, giving his arm one more Pat.

“Yes!”

Quan Yizhen looks away briefly, his lips curving into a small frown—but when he glances back, he sees Xie Lian still smiling at him...

His eyes grow big and bright.

"...Can I keep them?"

Xie Lian stares back blankly.

"...Huh?"

"The robes." The martial god explains. "I like them."

Xie Lian pauses, a little hesitant at first.

"Well...they probably don't fit you correctly..."

"I don't care," he responds earnestly, and Xie Lian sighs, rubbing the back of his neck.

"Sure—!"

"—No."

The prince pauses, looking in Lang Ying's direction.

"...Yes," he repeats, a little more firmly this time. "You can keep them—but let me make sure they fit you later, okay?"

The martial god nods earnestly, not seeming to grasp that Xie Lian can't see it—but he senses the movement.

"Good, now..." He turns back to their task. "Lang Ying, I really wish you hadn't come along, this could be dangerous, but..."

If he's here anyway, he might be helpful.

"I'll go ahead and separate out the weaker garments—Qi Ying, you hold onto them—and then Lang Ying, you can help me test the rest."

Putting the robes on Quan Yizhen is out of the question, given his personal history with the Brocade Immortal. Not to mention the fact that, as the strongest among the three, it's better to not risk him getting out of control. And they can't test it on a child, so...

Once the clearly harmless robes have been sorted out, Xie Lian stands before the pile of suspicious items, stealing himself. "Lang Ying, hand me one of those robes."

The child hesitates at first—but slowly, he complies, watching as the prince pulls it on.

"Now, give me an order?"

Lang Ying stares up at him for a long moment, looking him up and down.

"...Hit me."

"...?!" Xie Lian's expression turns to one of stress as he valiantly attempts to resist the order, and...He lets out a quiet breath of relief. “Okay, it’s not that one, but….really, Lang Ying, don’t ask me to do something dangerous like that. I could really hurt you, understand?”

“…Okay,” the child agrees quietly, handing him the next robe.

Xie Lian takes off the first garment, handing it off to Quan Yizhen.

Then, after he puts on the second one, Lang Ying orders—

“Turn around.”

Simple enough—and when Xie Lian is able to remain still, that proves the second try is no good, as well.

Then, when it’s time to try the third garment—

“Don’t hug me.”

Xie Lian pauses, tilting his head.

Noticing his confusion, the boy shrugs innocently.

“It’s boring ordering you to do stuff.”

When he’s more than likely not going to be wearing the Brocade Immortal, anyway. In that case, it’s more interesting to order him to not do something.

It’s surprisingly mischievous.

“…” Xie Lian smiles, shaking his head as he kneels down, wrapping his arms around the child. “So shameless.”

Lang Ying doesn’t respond verbally, leaning into the embrace, his eyes closed.

Soft.

Warm.

Smells—

Xie Lian leans back, taking off the garment.

“Next one?”

Lang Ying thinks it over.

"Don't hug me again."

The prince raises an eyebrow, a surprised laugh escaping him, "Lang Ying, what's gotten into—?"

He pauses, his laughter fading as he registers a sudden change in the air. Not from any of the garments, but...

Behind him, Quan Yizhen has gone completely still, his eyes the size of dinner plates.

Staring across the warehouse, where...

Framed perfectly under the moonlight, dark, silken tresses of hair blowing gently, despite the lack of a breeze.

Wearing black robes, trimmed with amethyst, and—

With a beauty mark under his left eye.

"...Shixiong?"

Quan Yizhen's trembling, hopeful whisper is what catches Xie Lian's attention first, sending his own eyes turning in that direction, but...

When Xie Lian looks for the sign of the aura of a heavenly official—or even the suppressed signature that might come from being shackled in exile...

Instead, he finds an intense, swirling point of resentment. So powerful, his eyes ache.

"Quan Yizhen, don't—!"

"SHIXIONG!"

The martial god launches himself forward, and Xie Lian is left with no choice but to leap to intercept, causing the two to collide forcefully in midair.

"GET OUT OF MY—!"

"IT'S NOT HIM! IT'S A—!"

They roll around on the floor, limbs flailing (rather undignified.)

Normally, Xie Lian could just take him down with a couple of quick blows and explain the situation later, but—

Quan Yizhen is surprisingly difficult to deal with.

Behind them, Lang Ying's posture is becoming more and more rigid, eyes glowing read in the dark, until—

Xie Lian rolls to the point where he's sitting up, legs locked around Quan Yizhen's middle from behind, gripping the top of his head with one hand, the muscles in his other arm flexing as he holds the martial god in a full on headlock.

"I'm so sorry!!"

From a few feet away, Lan Ying quietly claps.

(After all, it's brilliant execution of a wrestling move, absolutely magnificent form, as to be expected of a martial god of such caliber—)

"The Brocade Immortal is trying to trick you!" Xie Lian cries. "It's not Yin Yu!"

Quan Yizhen struggles violently, and Xie Lian holds on magnificently well for someone under three cursed shackles, but he can feel his strength slowly beginning to wane—forcing him to tighten his arm around the martial god's neck, cutting off his air supply.

"I'm sorry!" Xie Lian spits out between clenched teeth, his arms trembling slightly from the strain. "I know you want it to be him, I really understand!"

Quan Yizhen's vision blurs as he reaches for him blindly, heart pounding in his throat as the figure seems to turn away.

'Why?'

His fingers tremble as his head begins to spin.

'Why are you always running away from me?'

A pained whimper rips from his chest as his resistance begins to slow.

'What...what did I do wrong this time?'

"I'm so sorry..." Xie Lian repeats, softer this time.

As the younger god stops struggling, he gives a quiet command to Ruoye, sending the spiritual device flying out to attack the mass.

Just as it whips past, Lang Ying lifts one finger, allowing the spiritual tool to brush against him.

And when it does, it gleams with power.

Now that the Brocade Immortal has been identified, and Ruoye can attack it, Xie Lian's grip on Quan Yizhen isn't nearly so forceful, but—

The martial god doesn't get up.

His lips trembling, nostrils flaring as he struggles to swallow down the sadness, and Xie Lian...

He wishes he didn’t understand that feeling so completely .

Remembering the bone deep sorrow he felt, each time he was so sure he’d found Hong’er again—only to see that he’d been given false hope.

Again, and again, and again .

Quan Yizhen has become completely accustomed to people mocking him for his persistent attachment to Yin Yu.

He still beats them for it, but he isn’t surprised anymore.

He doesn't expect anyone to understand.

They don’t know what Yin Yu did for him.

But…

Xie Lian’s arms aren’t confining him so much any more, so much as…

Embracing him.

“I’m sorry,” the god repeats as Quan Yizhen goes limp in his hold, working so hard not to cry. “I—”

No one’s ever…

“I know you miss him, I’m sorry…”

Lang Ying’s expression isn’t hostile now.

It was before, when he was watching the two intertwined in a struggle, but…

Watching the pain in Quan Yizhen’s expression, his own becomes… complicated.

Ruoye drops down to the ground, a bloodied robe wrapped in its grip, twisting like a vicious python until it grows limp.

Xie Lian pats Quan Yizhen’s curls as the martial god struggles to regain his composure, opening a private communication array in his mind.

‘Ling Wen?’

Once again—her response is nearly immediate.

‘Yes, your highness?’

‘Qi Ying and I have located the Brocade Immortal.’

‘So soon?’ She inquires, sounding somewhat surprised.

‘Yes, well—it’s in a warehouse full of fakes. It looks like someone was planning to have them distributed to—’

'To make it impossible to find,' Ling Wen concludes for him with a tired sigh. 'That was very crafty.'

'…Indeed,' Xie Lian agrees. 'There's around 97 pieces here in total, including the Brocade Immortal.'

'Will you need me to send my people to help you return it?'

'No, I think we can handle it on our own, now that it's been subdued.'

Though honestly, subduing Quan Yizhen was more difficult.

'…I see. Best you bring the robes that the three of you are wearing, too. The Brocade Immortal is crafty—it'll try to disguise itself to trick you.'

'Really? ' Xie Lian raises an eyebrow. 'You think so?'

The robes he's currently wearing are the same black set he made in Ghost City—and given that he was by Hua Cheng's side when that happened—

(Even if the Ghost King was asleep after…well…)

—Xie Lian doubts they could have been tampered with. The same goes for the others…

But he makes no attempt to argue that point, his expression turning slightly grim.

'Alright—I need to take someone back to my shrine. As soon as we've finished that, we'll bring the items to the Heavens.'

'Be careful, your highness—and be sure to hurry. Things are…' She trails off, hesitant. 'Things are complicated. It's best if you finish this business as soon as possible.'

Complicated?

It almost sounds as though…there's something she's wary to discuss with him.

Xie Lian wants to inquire, but…

'We'll hurry, don't worry.'

He lets go of Quan Yizhen, helping the general back to his feet before brushing himself off.

“I need you to pack the rest of the garments up and carry them with you, Ruoye can handle the Brocade Immortal—and Lang Ying? Stay close to me, it isn’t safe.”

Lang Ying draws close as Quan Yizhen moves to do as he’s told, though slightly more sluggishly than before—still reeling from what he saw.

And when Xie Lian takes the child’s hand, he squeezes tightly, maybe to comfort him, but—

Really, to steady himself.

Thunder rumbles over the city of Langling ceaselessly. A city known for beautiful, mild summers—

But when the weather turns, it’s loud , sending the citizens running inside for cover, taking shelter under roof eaves and alleyways to escape the downpour.

A god stands in his temple, bloodstained armor gleaming with every flash of lightning.

“Y-Your eminence,” one of the mortal priests of the temple falls to his knees with shock, eyes wide. “You honor us!”

It’s rare—nearly unheard of—for a god to descend in their true form.

The general barely even spared them a look.

There’s no point in asking them if they’ve seen anything.

If that bastard wanted to stay hidden, he would have.

Instead, he walks past them—straight out the temple doors.

Not even seeming to notice when the rain beats down on him.

He walks down the city streets, boots landing heavily with every step, making no attempt at hiding his presence.

Mortals peek through shop windows, peering from behind their doors, taking in a rare, terrifying sight.

A god, openly walking among them.

But, despite Pei's reputation for being friendly among mortals—

No one approaches him.

Not with that look on his face.

His hand never leaves the pommel of his sword.

CRASH!

The lightning flashes so bright, it almost seems to bathe the entire city in a brief ocean of flame.

The ocean churns violently before him when he reaches the docks, white foam bubbling up each time it crashes against the rocks.

The fake hairpin quivers in his grip as he stands there, staring down at the black, endless waters.

"This is what you wanted, right?"

"You like it when people walk into your traps, don't you?"

His voice trembles, swallowed by the storm until he tilts his head back, roaring against the wind.

"WELL I'M HERE!"

If this is a trap, he willingly jumped inside.

"OR DO YOU ONLY LIKE IT WHEN YOU CAN AMBUSH SOMEONE?!"

The sea roils and smashes against the shore, but—

No Blackwater.

Even when Pei reaches out with defense arrays, feeling around for even the weakest ghost in the city—

He finds none.

"…" Pei hangs his head, his jaw locked so tightly—it aches.

"…I know he didn't make it easy for you." He mutters under his breath.

He wouldn't have.

Shi Wudu would have fought tooth and nail to get back to his brother.

And Pei doesn't have the strength to believe it—but part of him wishes Shi Wudu would have fought to get back to him.

"Did that make it less satisfying for you?" He mutters, looking up at the churning storm overhead. "So now you have this SICK need to torment the PEOPLE WHO CARED ABOUT HIM?!"

Pei has never been a vengeful person.

Some things just go hand in hand with life and death.

You have to let them go, or you'll get dragged down in it.

He knows.

He knows .

He's known that for such a long time, but—

If He Xuan was before him now, Pei Ming wouldn't use magic.

He wouldn't use a blade.

He would use his bare hands.

And it's not the pain he can't let go of. Or the anger. If he could, he would.

It's him .

It's the first time in nearly a millennia that Pei just wishes—so much—that he could follow someone to the grave.

Because carrying on without them is so hard .

And no matter what he says, no matter how hard he screams into the storm—no one answers him.

Like it's all some sort of cruel joke.

Like the only reason for bringing that hairpin to his altar was to drag him out here on some absurd hope.

Hope for what, Pei doesn't even know.

He's soaked to the bone from the rain, hair sticking to his forehead, the back of his neck—but his body doesn't let him feel the cold.

And yet somehow, it's always cold anyway.

FLASH!

A perfect streak of lightning strikes the sea in the distance, setting the water alight.

And for that brief moment before the thunder crashes, when silence settles over the bay, broken only by the wind, he hears—

Pei hears crying.

Quiet, but distinct weeping.

When he turns his head, there's no one else around. Except for…

On the other end of the docks, there's a hunched figure. Legs dangling over the side, hunched, hugging themselves tightly against the rain.

Looking like only one harsh blow of the wind could push them off and into the churning waters below.

A…mortal.

Why…?

But the closer Pei looks, he sees…

Long, jet black hair, curling…

Curling slightly, now that it's wet.

And it isn't rational.

There's no sense in it.

And yet…

His feet move on instinct, carrying him across the docks in an instant.

Heart pounding in his chest, filled with that horrible, irrational lurch of hope.

He’s too short, his frame isn’t broad enough, but—

It isn’t until Pei grabs the stranger by the shoulder, yanking him around, that the spark in his chest is blown out.

Staring back at him is a white mask, it’s face carved into a frown, and —

In the rain, it looks like tears are pouring down.

Pei flinches, stumbling back—just as quickly as the stranger turns away, convulsing with silent sobs.

What…?

What is some kid doing out here?

And why is he wearing that mask? He—?

He isn’t running from Pei either. Doesn’t seem terrified by the sight of an enraged god of war, no—

He just keeps crying .

“…Is this some sort of trick?” The general inquires coldly. “Or a sick joke?”

CRASH!

Lightning flashes again.

Illuminating his face, and the white mask staring back at him.

And Pei finds himself struck with the sudden urge to make it shatter .

“ANSWER ME!”

No answer comes. And—

Anger and confusion swirl inside of him in conflicting currents, forming a maelstrom of pain.

He reaches out, snatching the stranger by his shoulders, giving him a hard shake.

Enough that it should knock the mask loose, and yet…

It remains firmly in place.

If he’s just some mortal, why doesn’t he just say so?! If it’s Blackwater, then why hasn’t he attacked already?!

Pei shakes him again, this time even harder, the mortal’s head whipping back and forth. “WHY WON’T YOU JUST—?!”

Then, he freezes.

Feeling a hand pressing against his cheek, skin like ice, trembling from the cold.

And it feels—

Familiar .

Fingertips brushing against the beginnings of a beard, remembering—

'No.'

'What do you mean, no?!'

Whining, trying to burrow underneath where his lover had buried his face in the sheets, hoping to steal a kiss.

'It's itchy.'

'Shui-Xiong...don't be mean...'

'Then shave.'

He would protest, claim that his friend was cruel beyond all measure, a real tyrant, and—

And Shi Wudu's hand would come up from under the sheets, just like this—gently stroking his cheek before shoving him away, and telling him to stop complaining.

Violet eyes stare through the storm, wracked with pain.

CRASH!

"You..." He whispers, unsure—his heart twisting unfaithfully in his chest, caught between two poles of hope and despair.

Briefly, he covers that freezing, trembling hand with his own.

And his heart sinks.

It's not him.

This hand is too small. His—

His palms were always soft, and his fingers were slender, but—

This is the hand of a teenager, not—

Pei shoves the hand away, swallowing down a sob.

Not him .

"Who are you?!"

That mask stares back with no feeling, no expression—he can't even see the eyes that lay beneath.

(And if he could, he would have been spared so much sorrow.)

The stranger doesn't answer. Just reaches for his face again, only to be slapped away even more harshly.

"WHY WON'T YOU JUST—?!"

Pei goes to shake him again, only for the stranger to go...completely limp.

Head lolled back, only sitting up because of Pei's unrelenting grip on his shoulder.

"..."

He gives him another good shake, and gets no answer.

When he checks for a pulse, he finds one, but...

Even in the freezing cold of the rain, the skin beneath the teenager's jaw is scorching.

And his heartbeat is rapid, but weak.

Why...?

Why would a sick, freezing teenager be out here on the docks, alone...in a storm?

And if it was one of Blackwater's clones, or the monster himself—he would have attacked by now.

Or, at the very least—not allowed himself to be so defenseless.

CRASH!

The sky flashes, and Pei's stomach grows heavy with shame.

It's...just a kid.

Just some poor, sick teenager that he screamed at, possibly concussed, and slapped away until he passed out.

"..."

A great general of the north, indeed.

Pei sits back with the limp form of the teenager gathered up in one arm, hiding his face in his hand.

He can't keep doing this.

He can't, he—

He could have killed the mortal, if he'd had even a fraction less restraint.

Slowly, he rises to his feet, the teenager carefully cradled in his arms.

He feels so pitifully light, shivering, even when he's unconscious.

The priests in the temple of Ming Guang don't know how to respond when their god returns, soaked to the bone—

With the form of a teenager clutched in his arms, face hidden behind a white mask.

"...Your eminence—?"

The general ignores them, laying the youth down.

There's a low couch, and with a snap of his fingers, the teenager is completely dry.

"Someone call a doctor. Now."

He has no energy to put any inflection in his words—but his voice is low, harsh.

Enough so to frighten the priests into action, scrambling to obey.

The stranger still shivers, rolling onto his side, curling up with his arms wrapped around his chest. For a moment, Pei wonder's if he's awake, but...

From the sound of his breathing, he would guess not.

The general sighs, sitting on the edge of the couch beside him.

With another snap of his fingers, his own cloak is dry—enough so for him to drape it over the teenager. Not much of a blanket, but—

Better than nothing.

Pei hangs his head, his face in hands.

He...

His fingers knot in his hair, anguished.

He almost killed the kid.

There's stirring at the edge of the temple after a few moments—enough to draw his attention, hoping it's one of the priests returning with a doctor, but...

It's just some kid.

A gangly teenager in yellow robes, peeking through the doors, and when he sees the masked stranger...

"Oh, thank god!" He cries, rushing over. "I was looking for him every—!" He only seems to notice the god when he's a few feet away, his eyes bulging out of his head, all color fading from his expression.

"...where..."

Pei stares him down, arching one eyebrow.

Immediately, the boy drops to the ground, bowing on his hands and knees, his head turned down.

"G-General Ming Guang!"

Pei isn't exactly surprised by the reaction. Aside from the mandate to not reveal one's identity to mortals—it tends to startle them.

"You know him?"

Normally, he's rigid about hiding his own identity when he's among mortals. Even among lovers he's had in the past, but...

When he descended to Langling, he had done so with the intention of being found, even if...

The person he thought was calling him didn't appear.

"..." The teenager lifts his head, nodding cautiously.

"What's his name?"

The boy opens his mouth to reply immediately—then winces, shutting it. Pei waits expectantly, watching the young man open and shut his mouth multiple times, his face turning red.

"...Are you ill?"

"...Pei Yuan..." He finally answers, his expression...bafflingly sad.

Pei's eyebrows shoot up, nearly disappearing into his hairline.

"...Pei?" He questions, silently repeating the other half of that name in his head.

...Yuan?

"S-small world..." The kid laughs nervously.

Not that small—the Pei family is old, and for a time, it was vast. Not through the General's own doing, but there was a period in Xuli where you couldn't walk more than a few miles without running into a Pei.

Now, they're far more rare.

"...How do you two know each other?"

“Um…” The teenager glances down at his friend, limp on the couch, then back up at the god, struggling to find his words—just as one of the priests returns with a doctor, frowning at the sight of a civilian intruding upon the temple while Pei Ming is present.

"Jin Feng!" He barks, "Can't you see a martial god has graced our temple with his presence?! What makes you think you can barge right in—!"

"I was asking him questions." Pei cuts the priest off, holding up one hand. "He seems to know the kid."

"…You mean it's Pei Yuan?"

Langling isn't a prevalent city in the world of cultivation, with few temples, and even fewer cultivators, with the nearest sects being in Gusu and Qinghe. As such, while Pei does have a temple here—it only has two priests, and six disciples.

And one of them, a dark haired teenager with a perpetually cynical expression—bows deeply to Pei, but sends a slight frown towards the boy on the couch.

"I didn't recognize him with the mask…"

Pei raises an eyebrow, reaching down to pull it off, but—

It won't budge.

He frowns, curling his finger around the edge, trying to apply more force, but—

"Don't!" Jin Feng cries out, starting to reach forward—but then hesitating, remembering that he can't simply put his hands on a martial god. "You'll hurt him!"

That makes the general hesitate.

"…What?"

"He's a real lowlife, general," One of the cultivation disciples shrugs, crossing his arms over his chest. "He's on the edge of Qi Deviation. The only reason he hasn't is because his golden core is shattered."

"It's not!" Jin Feng glares. "You don't know what you're talking about, if you did, you'd be sorry—!"

"Then what is he talking about?" Pei interrupts, giving both teenagers a sharp look.

"…" Jin Feng grits his teeth, clearly struggling with his words. "Pei… Pei Yuan was…a…cultivator…"

He swallows hard, glaring at the others. “But…he was kicked out…of his…clan. He’s got some sort of…punishment, and the mask just…shows up sometimes. But…” He rounds on the disciple with a glare. “He saved my and my sister’s lives! He’s NO lowlife!”

“Then maybe you should do him a favor and let him off himself next time,” the disciple sneers back at him. “He’s already tried twice. He was probably going to throw himself off of those docks, so why not just—!”

“Enough!” One of the priests barks harshly. “Deng Su! You will not speak so disgracefully in front of our general, I won’t have it!”

“But—!”

“You might have great talent, but that is NO excuse to shame us. From my own future son-in-law…” he scowls, bowing deeply to Pei Ming. “Our deepest apologies, your eminence…”

“He isn’t a cultivator under our temple,” Deng Su glares. “If his clan saw fit to slap him with a punishment like that, he probably doesn’t deserve any sympathy.”

It’s an odd punishment, Pei won’t argue that, but…

“…He’s one of Ming Guang’s worshipers!” Jin Feng declares. When the general looks back at him, he straightens his stance nervously. “He prays to you every day!”

He’s…oddly comfortable with speaking to Pei, compared to the others. The priests are overly respectful—the disciples won’t speak to him directly, but…

Jin Feng looks him in the eye, even if he seems nervous.

Impressive, for such a young man.

(Unless he’s already become acquainted with one god, that is.)

Aside from that, Pei’s stomach sinks with even heavier guilt.

He…treated one of his own worshippers in such a way?

“…As long as he’s in Langling, you’ll provide him with whatever he needs.”

The priests stiffen with shock. “But—general—!”

“Do you think you have the right to question my orders?”

The priests look at one another, shaking their heads.

“…No, your eminence. Forgive us.”

“Good.” Now that the doctor has finished his work, Pei looks away from the rest of them, his focus settling on the teenager lying beside him, and Jin Feng.

“The rest of you can leave us.”

“Sir—?”

“Now.”

There’s hesitation—but eventually, they obey, slowly filing out.

“…” Once they’re gone, Pei looks at Jin Feng, his gaze evaluating. “This kid doesn’t seem that much older than you.”

Jin Feng’s smile is slightly strained.

“He’s older than he looks, General…”

“Just what could he have done to earn such a punishment?”

“…” Jin Feng looks away, scratching the back of his head. “To be honest? He won’t talk about it with me—so I don’t really know, but…”

He locks his jaw, straightening his back stubbornly.

“Whatever it was, I don’t think he was treated well, where he came from.” Pei raises an eyebrow, and he continues. “He was hurt when he first got here—and really sick, so sick, he could barely move. But when I tried to help him…he was afraid.”

Jin Feng bites his lip, like the memory pains him.

“It was days before he even let me close enough to clean his wounds—even though they were pretty bad. So…”

Pei Ming looks down, staring at the blank, seemingly unfeeling surface of his mask.

“…I think whatever it was that he did—it wasn’t bad enough to deserve this."

"…" Pei hasn't been able to look up, staring at that blank, covered face.

He said it only appears sometimes, didn't he?

Just what kind of face is under there, anyway?

Curiosity gnaws at him, but he doesn't dare try to pull it off again.

'Pei Ming.'

He's blocked nearly everyone from accessing his private communication array aside from Ling Wen, but…

There's one person who can reach anyone, anywhere.

'Your majesty.'

'Was there a disturbance in Langling?'

If Pei Ming was younger, he would have told him.

He would have asked Jun Wu about what kind of punishment from a cultivation clan could cause something like this.

There was a time when he leaned heavily on The emperor's guidance.

At some point, he stopped—and there's no one else left who remembers those days.

Except for Yushi Huang, maybe. But she—

Pei doubts she was paying attention back then, when he followed Jun Wu's guidance like a stray dog.

A soldier, who suddenly had no orders to follow. No wars to fight.

Jun Wu was structure, and Pei Ming craved that when he was young.

But Jun Wu was very, very different back then.

The emperor—everything about him—it's like a wheel.

When you're up, you're up. But when you come down, you're crushed beneath the spokes.

He has phases.

Ling Wen thinks he's two-faced, but Pei has never agreed with that.

He can be, and he'll always choose manipulation over direct confrontation—but…

When the emperor is in a good phase—he's a genuine person.

When Pei first ascended, it was like that.

He was patient, wise—the best teacher Pei had ever experienced.

Pei trusted him completely.

The first time he saw Jun Wu change was eight hundred years ago.

The day Pei Ming walked into the Grand Martial Hall, and found that the Emperor had slaughtered his own hounds.

It was the first time he witnessed Jun Wu showing any lack of control.

And he wept for the beasts.

Pei had been a young man then, standing in the hall, watching with confusion as Jun Wu wept for the very animals he once loved, and now had killed.

Pei Ming isn't prone to pity, and doesn't often interfere in the affairs of others.

But Xie Lian was always different.

Because Pei knew.

He knew that the punishment was cruel, even as the emperor delivered it with a gentle smile.

He knew that, if Xie Lian had committed the same actions at any other time, when the emperor hadn't been in that state—

His punishment would have been very different.

But not very long after—probably only thirteen years later—

Suddenly, the emperor was back to himself.

Kind. Attentive.

He—

He helped Pei grieve for Qing Yuan.

No one else knows, he never took any credit for it, but he did.

He even…

He even helped Pei set up a grave for them. There were no remains to be held there, but…

Pei still visits the site, a temple just outside of Qinghe. Where Qing Yuan always…

He wanted to bring Shi Wudu there—even if he never got the chance.

And for centuries, he was himself.

Four centuries, to be exact.

Then, he had another low period. Dark era. Whatever you want to call it—

He was cruel again.

Nan Yang bore the brunt of it at the time, though not so severely as Xie Lian had before.

And the more Pei Ming watched, it was like…

Jun Wu seemed almost infuriated that Nan Yang never put a foot wrong.

If he was given an order, he obeyed it to the letter. If he failed a mission, he would immediately accept any punishment without complaint.

Even when he was given an absolutely horrific assignment in Yong'an—he never asked for relief, or assistance.

Pei offered to descend to help him, back then—and the emperor refused to allow it.

That was when Pei realized—

Jun Wu wanted to watch him fail.

But even when he failed—

Nan Yang would just apologize, and try again until he succeeded.

The only torture that seemed effective was forcing him to spend more time with Xuan Zhen, assigning the two to deal with a plague that had swept the continent.

Nan Yang wasn't even the one who solved it in the end, it was Xuan Zhen, who ended up on the path to studying medicine after that, but…

A few years later, he was himself again.

Almost like the flip of a switch.

It didn't surprise Pei then, that the emperor took someone new under his wing. That there was a desire to mentor someone yet again.

And Shi Wudu was a new acquaintance back then—but not quite close enough where Pei watched them very closely.

Back then, it never occurred to him.

But it certainly did later.

Pei Ming has known Jun Wu for nine centuries. He's worked with him longer than anyone at this point.

And this is the longest, lowest period that the emperor has ever had.

Building tension. Escalating pressure on his subordinates, and...

While Jun Wu can't connect what happened with Blackwater to the emperor--

Shi Wudu was afraid of him, before the end. Pei Ming could tell, for one simple reason;

The Water Master became far more confrontational.

There are three responses to fear: Denial, attack, and retreat.

Pei was trained to develop a neutral response to fear. It rarely consumes him, or impacts his decisions. Xie Lian is similar.

People like Shi Qingxuan will nearly always retreat.

And people like Shi Wudu—fear makes them aggressive.

Not to mention the fact that he was keeping secrets. Disappearing for periods of time, and never explaining.

And all that time, the pressure on Pei from the emperor was only increasing .

The same with Ling Wen, and...

Now, the Crown Prince of Xianle as well.

Pei Ming doesn't expect most of the Heavenly Court to understand what's going on. He doesn't pretend to think he understands all of it, because he knows he doesn't.

But he's worked hand in hand with Jun Wu longer than anyone, and he understands more than people think.

He understands who Jun Wu targets, and why.

Jun Wu likes talent. He likes the sparkle and attention that comes from something new, and untainted. He likes being needed , and watching something grow.

Until he's no longer needed.

But if there's one thing Jun Wu hates...

It's someone who thinks for themselves.

A dog that stops and considers a command, rather than immediately following.

And while there are many reasons that he and the emperor have grown apart over the years, first and foremost—it's that Pei has never followed him blindly.

He's never disobeyed. Never betrayed Jun Wu's commands.

But he's always asked questions. Or expressed it when he didn't agree.

And while many, many others avert their gaze in submission to Jun Wu's will—Pei never viewed following his orders to mean adopting his views.

He's never once been afraid of him, either.

And while many would say that Jun Wu overworks Pei, treating him like nothing more than an effective sword—

Pushing him to exhaustion is very different from pushing the limits of what Pei is willing to do.

Jun Wu has shown awareness of what those limits are, and has intentionally avoided them in a way that he hasn't with others.

For decades, that's left them in a neutral, tense state.

With Pei as a dutiful soldier for the Heavens—and Jun Wu careful in the ways that he uses him.

But Pei doesn't trust him.

Not because of what Ling Wen sees, which is Jun Wu in a bad state—someone two-faced, manipulative, and calculating.

But because of what Pei has always seen.

Someone inherently unstable.

Who can't resist impulses. Someone controlled by fear.

'...I thought Blackwater was here,' Pei replies calmly. 'I came to kill him—but it turns out I was wrong.'

There's a brief pause, then Jun Wu's response is smooth, if not slightly pointed.

'I said I would be the one to handle He Xuan.'

'I heard you.'

There's a long period of silence, and when it's clear that Pei Ming isn't going to apologize for such a rare show of disobedience, the emperor chooses not to address it at all.

'The blockade has failed. The only thing we can do now is attempt to deal with the problem directly.'

'Fine.'

'I want you to—'

'Go to Mount Tonglu.' Pei concludes for him, 'Don't worry, I never expected you to go yourself.'

'I think you need to reconsider your tone, Ming Guang.' Jun Wu says this, just as his own voice turns harsh—cold.

'Yeah...' Pei sighs, his eyes still locked on that mask below him, the unsteady throb of Pei Yuan's pulse in the side of his neck.

Someone who was mistreated.

Punished unfairly.

Left alone here to die.

It doesn't feel so different now than it did eight centuries ago.

Walking into the emperor's chambers, and seeing two loyal, discarded beasts, bleeding on the floor.

And when the emperor wept, Pei Ming asked him why he had done it—when he clearly still cared for the animals.

His response had been chilling in its simplicity;

'They didn't love me the way they did before.'

Almost childlike.

'I guess my tone might not be fantastic after a century of being worked like a dog, or losing Shi Wudu. I'll go to Mount Tonglu for you, but I don't know what attitude you expect me to have.'

The one good thing about having a direct personality is that no one expects you to be subversive.

He plays up the exhaustion and the grief—and Jun Wu will take him at face value.

Which he clearly does.

'...I'm not ignorant to the fact that it's been difficult lately.'

Of course he isn't.

Pei fights the urge to roll his eyes.

Nearly all of it has been his fault.

'...After this situation is dealt with, I expect things will be quiet for quite some time. And I've been thinking of giving you a reward for your efforts.'

'...A reward?'

'Have you forgotten so quickly about Pei Xiu? ' Jun Wu muses, taking Pei's silence to mean that he's gotten the general's attention. 'He hasn't been doing well during his banishment. But, if you wrap up this situation...I think you could handle keeping him in line if he returns.'

It's incredibly corrupt, given the circumstances of Pei Xiu's banishment—but Pei is curious.

'You'd give me that for going to Mount Tonglu for you?'

It's rare that Jun Wu attempts to bargain with him like this—and while the prospect of going to Tonglu is difficult, he...

He can't imagine Jun Wu actually ending someone's banishment for that—even if it was a life threatening mission. Pei has had plenty of suicide missions before, and still—

'No. I have something specific I want from you while you're there.'

Pei Ming waits, listening.

'There's a strong possibility that Hua Cheng will approach Mount Tonglu.'

That isn't surprising, given that he's a Ghost King—he might want to re-enter the mountain himself, and come out more powerful than he was before.

'And he might bring Xianle with him.'

That's...less logical to Pei Ming.

He hasn't had the chance to spend much time with the two together, but one thing is clear—

Hua Cheng cares for the crown prince, and his intentions are clearly romantic in nature.

Pei Ming doubts he would bring Xie Lian somewhere like—

'If he tries that, I want you to kill him.'

Pei Ming pauses, his mind going blank.

'...Kill him?'

'Hua Cheng.' The Emperor repeats calmly. 'If he brings Xianle to the Kiln—it will be so he can consume him.'

'Consume him...?'

'Xianle's cultivation level was always high,' Jun Wu explains carefully. 'And while his shackle cuts off his ability to use his own spiritual power, he's still been cultivating for eight centuries continuously.'

Oh.

Pei's eyes grow round.

Oh.

Meaning that Xie Lian, the 'laughing stock of the three realms,' often viewed as among one of the weakest of the martial gods...most likely has the largest reserves of spiritual power of anyone alive.

He just can't access them.

But if Hua Cheng consumed him in the Kiln...

He can see what Jun Wu is trying to say.

'…And if it comes down to it…you're asking me to—?'

'Kill Hua Cheng. You're the only one other than myself who could possibly manage that. If you do—the Heavens will forever be in your debt.'

There's something odd about the request.

If Hua Cheng wanted to 'consume' the crown prince—Xie Lian's shackles leave him nearly defenseless.

Shackles that Jun Wu placed upon him.

If the emperor was so worried—why not remove them?

And with their power imbalance being what it is—

When Pei Ming went to Ghost City, where Hua Cheng was nearly all powerful—Xie Lian seemed perfectly at ease. More so than he does in the Heavens.

If the ghost king was going to consume Xie Lian—why hasn't he already done it?

There's no logical explanation for that. Pei Ming is just expected to accept the order at face value.

And yet, he gets the real bottom line out, and he doesn't know why, but—

Jun Wu does not, under any circumstances, want those two in the Kiln at the same time.

'…Understood.'

He's been quiet for so long, Jin Feng jumps when he moves again, taking one of Pei Yuan's hands, still limp, and pressing it against his cheek.

Just as he did before, on the docks.

Trying so hard to understand why he reacted that way, and then—

Then, Pei realizes what he's doing—letting the teenager's hand go with a sudden flush of self awareness.

"I didn't mean…"

(It seems even more out of line, remembering how Jin Feng said the kid was afraid of being touched.)

"It's okay," Jin Feng laughs awkwardly, looking away. "He wouldn't mind."

He sounds almost dejected saying that, and when Pei Ming puts two and two together, well…

The pieces aren't that hard to connect.

The kid seems desperate to protect Pei Yuan, who is apparently…a rather devoted worshiper of Pei Ming.

Of course—it's just silly teenage jealousy. Pei Ming doesn't care to mingle with mortals that way, not recently. And even if he did…

He's done with all of that, now.

"You're leaving?" Jin Feng questions as the god rises to his feet.

"Don't you want to wait until…?"

He falls silent, and Pei sends the teenager sleeping on the couch one last lingering look, shaking his head.

"I have duties to attend to. But…" He reaches into his sleeve, turning around, and holding something up in front of Jin Feng's face.

A golden hairpin.

"If you see something like this, pray to me, tell one of the priests—I don't care, I'll come looking for it."

Jin Feng seems to hesitate—then, he nods.

"…And what about the cloak? You left it—"

"He can keep it," Pei Ming mutters, disappearing through the temple doors. "He needs it more than me."

"…" Jin Feng sits back, letting out a shaky, terrified breath (one that he'd been holding since he first saw Pei Ming.) "Holy hell," he mutters, his eyes sliding over to Shi Wudu as he carefully—gingerly lifts off the mask.

Now that Pei Ming is out of sight—it slips right off. Revealing the fallen God's face. Pale. Bruised. Flushed with fever, though not as badly as the day before.

"…I get it now," Jin Feng mumbles, tossing the mask aside with a clatter, trying his best not to sulk.

Shi Wudu never explicitly said he was in love with the guy—

(Even if it was painfully obvious.)

—But that display?

Yeah. He gets it now, loud and clear.

"…Coulda mentioned he looks just like the divine statues though," he mutters, fiddling with his hair.

If he had…

Jin Feng scratches at his own cheek, smooth—unable to grow a beard yet, even if he tried.

…He can’t say he had his hopes up , but now they’re nonexistent.

It’s a few hours before Shi Wudu wakes back up again, grunting tiredly.

His head…

He rolls onto his stomach, throat and wrists stinging sharply, groaning as he presses his face into the couch cushions.

Did they really spend the night in one of his temples again? This is gonna be a pain to explain to Shi Qing—

The mortal’s eyes snap open wide.

“Pei?!”

He sits straight up, wincing and grasping his head, clutching the blanket around him, but…

It only takes a moment for him to remember where he is, and why he’s here, the light in his eyes quickly fading.

But when he breathes in—

“…He was here,” Shi Wudu breathes.

“…You can recognize him by smell?” Jin Feng mumbles, half depressed, otherwise impressed.

Shi Wudu pulls the cloak tighter around himself.

Then…on the docks…that wasn’t a dream?

The fallen god lowers his head, pressing his cheek against the cloak.

“He actually came…”

“You thought he wouldn’t?” Jin Feng stands up, starting to rummage around for some food. “He ordered the priests to take care of you, even though he had no idea who you were…” He sighs as he kneels down by a few supply crates, scratching his head. “I’ll admit it, he’s amazing.”

In spite of everything, for the first time since he found his sister at the Terrace of Cascading Wine—what feels like an entire lifetime ago—

Shi Wudu smiles, pressing his face into the fabric of the cloak, breathing it in.

It smells just like him.

"…He is," he agrees softly.

"…" Jin Feng glances back at him over his shoulder, not sure what to make of the situation, but…

It's the first time since the former Water Master has arrived in Langling that he hasn't looked…hollow.

So, he'll take it.

"Why didn't you show him the hairpin on the docks?"

"…He would have taken it," Shi Wudu admits.

And possibly mistaken Shi Wudu for an enemy. He nearly rattled him half to death out there anyway, and…

While Shi Wudu wasn't opposed to that idea at the time—he couldn't do that to Pei.

It would break him, if he knew.

And since the pin was the last thing he had left from him…

Shi Wudu couldn't have given it up. Not willingly.

The cloak sits heavy around his shoulders—warm.

(Well, it was the last thing he had left from him.)

"Well, he said he'd come back if I told someone I saw it, so…"

Jin Feng shrugs. He almost told him the truth back there, but…he had assumed that, if Shi Wudu didn't show him on the docks—it was for a reason.

And even though he's right…

He's confused.

"But if you weren't going to give it to him…why offer it, then steal it back?"

When Shi Wudu offered it, he hadn't known what his situation was going to be—and he hadn't been willing to give up the pin forever.

But really…

"…I guess I wanted to see him again," he admits—even if he hadn't been sure that Pei would come.

Pei Ming isn't perfect, and at times he can even be a little corrupt, but…

He has principles. Lines that he won't cross—and they're uncompromising.

Shi Wudu had always assumed that once Pei knew what he had done, he'd…

But…he came.

Shi Wudu swallows hard.

He still came.

"…Did he say anything else before he left?"

It's the most the former god has spoken in a single conversation since he arrived—and Jin Feng isn't quick to let the opportunity slide.

"I tried to get him to stay a little longer, in case you woke up, but…"

Jin Feng sighs. "He said he had orders from the emperor, and he muttered something under his breath about…A Kiln?"

Shi Wudu grows still, turning to look at him directly. "He said what?"

"I…" Jin Feng leans back, holding his hands up. "I don't know, that's really all I heard!"

"Did he say anything about Mount Tonglu?" Shi Wudu questions, suddenly focused. "Anything at all?"

"Mount—? You mean the volcano?" Jin Feng questions, eyes wide. "No—but apparently there was an eruption in the west a few weeks ago."

"…"

Shi Wudu looks away, locking his jaw.

He’s in danger.

He’s in danger, probably being sent to the most dangerous place on earth, alone, and Shi Wudu is just—

His hand balls up into a fist, nails biting into his palm.

“…What the fuck am I doing?” He mutters under his breath, exhausted, but…

There’s newfound determination in his tone, enough that it makes Jin Feng straighten up with surprise.

“Huh—?”

And now, for the first time since he got here—

Shi Wudu snatches the bowl of food in his hands willingly, shoving the first few mouthfuls down.

You don’t have to be a whole person to cultivate.

You don’t even have to be a good person.

The only thing you really need to be a cultivator, in the end—is strength.

Shi Wudu’s eyes narrow as he forces himself to swallow the food down.

He just has to find that again.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from artist, do not repost or re-use.

Baby Hong'er and Qing Yuan (his mother)

@currant_bliss
JUNKY
2022
Hong'Er ♡
a smol
I'm getting us a snack. Stay right here, mama will be right back!
smol red Koala ♡

CREDIT: JUNKY

Chapter End Notes

thank you to junky for their beautiful artwork, and allowing me to share it!

xoxo, Evie

Birdsong

Chapter Summary

> “Ling Wen Zhen Jun.”
>
> She stiffens with surprise.
>
> (Though maybe not as surprised as she should be.)
>
> Ever since the prince’s return to the Heavens, she’s worked closer with him than anyone—and he’s rarely ever used formal titles with her.
>
> Her quizzical smile slowly fades, even if she still hasn’t set down her pen.
>
> “Your highness, the crown prince.” She replies coolly.
>
> “I didn’t just forget one item,” Xie Lian explains softly. “Ten garments are missing.”
>
> Ninety, instead of one hundred.
>
> “…My mistake, apologies.”

Chapter Notes

> songs from this chapter: poker face

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Each time Xie Lian returns to the Heavens, they seem to grow more and more quiet, with fewer gods lining the streets each and every time.

Most of the martial gods having descended to the mortal realm to assist in the blockade, and the civil gods holed up working overtime.

Quan Yizhen is quiet beside him—has been, since they left the warehouse in Ghost City, only responding to questions when asked.

Xie Lian has grasped the fact that he’s a man of few words to begin with, only speaking about things that genuinely excite him, but…

“…So, you’ve really never seen Yin Yu since his banishment from the Heavens?" He questions, feeling sorry for making the general carry all of the crates of garments on his own—but he insisted.

Even if the circumstances of Quan Yizhen's relationship with his Shixiong were… very different, Xie Lian couldn't help but feel…guilt, hearing how pained the martial god was, seeing an illusion of him.

Remembering how Mu Qing and Feng Xin argued over looking for him .

It wasn't like Xie Lian intentionally hid himself all those years.

(Well, after the incident with the circus, and the whole…goat debacle, he did hide for a few years—but not many, and he wasn't hiding from the Heavens , just…the authorities of Yong'an and Xuli.)

But at the very least, he knows he should have told Feng Xin that he was alright . He—

'I didn't promise to protect you until it got hard.'

Xie Lian swallows thickly.

'I promised to protect you forever.'

But it was that burden, that obligation that Xie Lian was trying to protect Feng Xin from. And Mu Qing…

Well.

The last real conversation they had, where Xie Lian came even remotely close to being honest…

Ended with Mu Qing in tears.

Before, his friends had to sacrifice too much for him, and now…

Now, Xie Lian doesn't know if he's only bad memories, or a subject of guilt for them both, but…

He can certainly tell that what Quan Yizhen feels for Yin Yu is very different from that.

"…I did see him once."

Quan Yizhen pauses, slowly turning to look at Xie Lian with a slightly closer inspection.

“Actually, he was dressed like you.”

“…Oh?” Xie Lian blinks, a little surprise. “Well, plenty of cultivators wear—”

“No, I mean exactly like you.”

“…Exactly?”

“Even down to the hair.”

Quan Yizhen balances the crate on one arm, reaching over to push a loose piece of hair behind Xie Lian’s hair for emphasis.

The prince doesn’t mind—it’s clear that Quan Yizhen doesn’t mean any harm by it, but it’s a good thing Lang Ying wasn’t—

…

Xie Lian stops walking.

…Why would it have mattered if Lang Ying saw that?

Why is he even worrying about—?

“And Nan Yang hit him.”

Xie Lian whips his head around, shocked. “…He did?!”

That sounds nothing like—

“I saw it.” Quan Yizhen confirms, his expression smooth, but his eyes…

Have this strange, heated look, recalling that day.

Not quite angry. If Xie Lian could actually see the look on his face, he really wouldn’t know what to make of it.

“So…what’d you do about it?”

“Threw him through the side of a building.”

“Oh, well…”

“It was a hospital.”

Xie Lian deflates slightly, the sheer image that conjures up making him feel a little faint.

“…I see.”

He doesn’t know what makes him feel worse, imagining Feng Xin’s reaction to that, or…

“We’re here.”

Arriving on the steps of the Palace of Ling Wen.

The doors open immediately, which doesn’t particularly surprise him.

Nor does the fact that, while this hall is usually bustling with deputy civil gods—it’s notably quiet.

Ling Wen glances up from a desk in the center of the main hall, a mountain of scrolls behind her.

“…Your highness,” Her smile is tight, even if her tone is friendly. “I see that you made it here safely—I’m glad. But…” She glances over the crates in Quan Yizhen’s arms as he sets them down, beginning to unpack them. “It seems as though one of the garments has slipped away.”

Xie Lian forces himself to smile, even if his heart isn’t in it. “…Is that so?”

“Yes,” Ling Wen frowns, scanning over the piles of clothing. “Should I have my people go looking for it, or—?”

“No.” Xie Lian sighs, rubbing the back of his neck. “That won’t be necessary.”

“I don’t understand what you—?”

“Ling Wen Zhen Jun.”

She stiffens with surprise.

(Though maybe not as surprised as she should be.)

Ever since the prince’s return to the Heavens, she’s worked closer with him than anyone—and he’s rarely ever used formal titles with her.

Her quizzical smile slowly fades, even if she still hasn’t set down her pen.

"Your highness, the crown prince." She replies coolly.

"I didn't just forget one item," Xie Lian explains softly. "Ten garments are missing."

Ninety, instead of one hundred.

"…My mistake, apologies."

"It's unlike you to mistake a detail like that," Xie Lian crosses his arms.

"It's been a long day," Ling Wen shrugs, mimicking the gesture. "Mistakes slip through the cracks."

"But you were certain that one of them was missing," Xie Lian presses, raising an eyebrow.

"…I'm sorry for not quite grasping that it was such a large number of missing items." Ling Wen's tone turns icy. "But I'm not sure I like what you're implying, your highness. Now, is this little game over, or are you going to insult me further?"

"No," Xie Lian shakes his head, reaching into his own sleeves, pulling out the final 'missing' items. "I would never want to waste Ling Wen Zhen Jun's time. Here's the rest."

Ling Wen stares down at the pile on her desk, her expression slowly turning more and more grim.

"Is there a problem?" Xie Lian questions calmly, his hands still braced against Ling Wen's desk. And when she doesn't reply, he sighs.

"I don't enjoy this any more than you do, but it would be easier for both of us if we dropped the pretenses, Ling Wen."

"…Tch."

Ling Wen clicks her tongue, resting her chin on her hand, her expression sour.

"I really can't imagine you enjoying this less than me, but the sentiment, however superficial, is somewhat appreciated."

It's the opposite of superficial, but Xie Lian can't blame her for seeing it that way.

“You’ve been nothing but kind and helpful to me since I arrived here,” Xie Lian replies quietly. “I very much wanted to be wrong. Which is why I don’t understand how you could have done this.”

Ling Wen sits back in her seat, the back legs of her chair creaking slightly as she leans back, then forward again.

She isn’t blind to the way Quan Yizhen is watching her. Not openly aggressive, but with the persistent stare of a guard dog on high alert.

“…Let’s be clear, your highness.” She arches one manicured eyebrow. “You don’t want to know how. You want to know why . And without an actual explanation or evidence, I’m not inclined to tell you.”

Ling Wen has always been obstinate.

When she was mortal, people loathed that.

Her superiors. The men who desired her.

More than anyone else, her mother.

"So, if you have an accusation, I suggest you make it."

She raises her chin, refusing to hang her head, and Xie Lian...

He doesn't seem angry, or frustrated with her stubbornness.

He just...

He looks disappointed , which is surprisingly difficult to bear.

"Alright, that's fair." He pulls out a chair, taking a seat on the other side of Ling Wen's desk.

As if this is nothing more than a simple meeting.

"I can see how you hid it so well under normal circumstances."

Xie Lian's tone is gentle, and...

"But you've been under so much strain, you started making mistakes. Once I had a suspicion, I put the rest together from there."

...He's being kind , which she can't stand.

"Mistakes?"

"On average, you are the least likely to interject or contradict the emperor during a meeting," Xie Lian recalls. "But when I was given this assignment, you protested three times."

"Because I was worried that a friend was being overworked," Ling Wen offers, frowning.

Xie Lian smiles, shaking his head.

"I would believe that coming from Feng Xin or San Lang, but Ling Wen...you're too pragmatic for that."

The civil goddess grimaces.

"With Mount Tonglu open, it's common sense for the emperor to use everyone available."

Not to mention the fact that Pei Ming is far more overworked than Xie Lian, and his assignment was much more difficult.

If Ling Wen wouldn't speak out for her closest friend, why would she speak out for him?

Because it was self motivated.

"And while that only struck me as odd...You made another mistake."

The corners of Ling Wen's mouth tighten, as though she has a bad taste caught on her tongue.

"I don't blame you—the other officials you work with all have decent to good luck," Xie Lian reasons.

"Most of them take it for granted when there's a lucky coincidence, because things like that happen to them all the time. But my luck..."

Ling Wen rests her hand against her forehead, grasping where she went wrong.

"...Is terrible," she mutters, her brow pinched.

So, sending the Half-Maquillage woman to Puqi Shrine...

...Was a critical mistake.

Because a key piece of evidence, one that led him to the Brocade Immortal all too easily , was dropped right into his lap.

"So, when she appeared—it was by some form of intervention."

"That could have been anyone."

"Most of the other gods had already left by the time Jun Wu gave me my assignment," Xie Lian points out gently. "There's a limited number of people who even knew I had been given this case."

"Doesn't Crimson Rain always know what you're doing?" Ling Wen's eyes brighten with possibility. "And isn't he always trying to assist you? It's not out of the realm of possibility that he would have sent her."

"I considered that," Xie Lian admits. "If it was San Lang, he would have handled that situation very differently."

First, he never would have willingly placed Xie Lian in a situation where he had to touch wares like that.

Second, he can’t imagine the stress it would have caused the Ghost King if he had watched Xie Lian trying on such items to test and see if they were the Brocade Immortal.

"...I know it wasn't him," Xie Lian concludes. "But I do know a god who was unaccounted for in Ghost City recently. A rather powerful one."

When Pei Ming came to ask Hua Cheng for answers after Shi Wudu's death, he didn't come alone. But Ling Wen was nowhere to be seen.

She had 'business' in Ghost City. Something so important, she was willing to allow Pei to confront Hua Cheng on his own.

And even if Xie Lian knows that Hua Cheng wouldn't have harmed the general, Ling Wen doesn't have the same kind of faith in the Ghost King as he does.

Implying that whatever she was doing—for whatever reason she was doing it—

It was / important ./

"...That's quite a bit of circumstantial evidence," Ling Wen points out dryly. "I was getting a facial. Shi Qingxuan spoke highly of them from their last visit."

Xie Lian can't imagine that they did, and he can't imagine Ling Wen taking the time for self care during a crisis, but—

"It was purely circumstantial, until we arrived in the warehouse." Xie Lian shakes his head. "Then, it became very obvious."

He can feel Ling Wen's scowl from across the table, and he leans forward.

"I know you were probably protesting with the emperor because of my history working with fabric," Xie Lian continues, "And I can't blame you. That was part of it. But you know what gave you away?"

Xie Lian taps his finger across the desk, silently ordering Ruoye to unwind, lightly slithering around the perimeter of the desk.

Ling Wen stares at the device, her eyebrows raising. "...Your spiritual device was able to detect—?"

"No. It's nothing Ruoye did." Xie Lian shakes his head. "You couldn't have known, but Ruoye was forged under similar circumstances to the Brocade Immortal."

Ling Wen's eyes snap open wide, glancing from Xie Lian's face, back to the bandage wriggling around on her desk.

She had always assumed .

Every martial god owns and operates some sort of device from the emperor. She had been made aware of the fact that Xie Lian hadn't possessed Ruoye during his first ascension, so she always assumed that the device was gifted to him—as a tool to protect himself in exile.

And that , she presumed, was the reason that he was able to operate it without spiritual power. But...

"...Excuse me?"

"Ruoye was born from resentment," Xie Lian explains calmly. "Created through death and suffering."

It was soaked in his blood when Bai Wuxiang held him down.

His mother and father had the life squeezed out of them, white silk wrapped around their necks.

And when Xie Lian tried to follow them...

That's when Ruoye was born.

"Ruoye is not a spiritual tool." Xie Lian can't see, but eerily, he maintains eye contact with her just fine.

Ruoye is a demon. A conscious entity.

"Which is why I knew, the moment the Brocade Immortal took on the appearance of Yin Yu, that it was being controlled by you."

Ling Wen squints, fighting the urge to squirm or look away—even if Xie Lian would never know her reaction.

"By me?"

"It wouldn't have been able to operate independently." Xie Lian shakes his head. "Not to that extent. And it didn't try to fool me, knowing I was blind. Or Lang Ying, knowing he was weak. It attempted to distract Qi Ying , the only person present who posed a threat."

Meaning the person who was controlling the Brocade Immortal was someone who knew exactly who they were, what their strengths and weaknesses were, and not only did they know about Quan Yizhen's history and attachment to Yin Yu–they knew what the exiled god looked like.

"...I've seen Ruoye move on its own before," Ling Wen counters with a frown. "And I've seen it perform illusionary spells—"

"Ruoye was forged from three souls, not one." Xie Lian corrects her calmly. "Comparatively, the Brocade Immortal is actually rather weak."

Xie Lian can feel Ling Wen stiffen at that, and he leans his elbow on her desk, resting his chin against his hand.

"Does that bother you, Ling Wen Zhen Jun?"

She stares down at the white, snake-like creature, her lips curled. "Is it going to tourniquet your enemies to death?"

Xie Lian's smile is faint, and it holds no mirth.

"Something like that. It's bound to my soul, you see. It's impacted by the shackles, too."

(And it was still able to string up Qi Rong, Ke Mo, and bind Xuan Ji.)

"Without them, Ruoye's strength would be similar to..." Xie Lian hums, thinking it over. "E'Ming, I think. It's hard to estimate." Then, he smiles, laughing with sheepish humility. "But San Lang is far more adept in wielding E'Ming, to be sure..."

Even if he could be nicer to the scimitar.

(Ling Wen looks vaguely nauseous.)

He didn't actually wield Ruoye in his fight with Jun Wu before his second banishment—he was too new with the weapon, too wounded by its origins.

But when his soul was in Shi Qingxuan's body, he was able to estimate that, from consuming his blood alone....

Ruoye probably only operates at one tenth of its actual strength at the moment.

(The blood consumption is just another point of similarity that implies it's of the same type as the Brocade Immortal.)

"And, even more importantly, entities like that take qualities from the souls they were forged from." Xie Lian muses, reaching down to rub his fingertip over Ruoye affectionately, making the bandage squirm with delight. "And the soul that forged the Brocade Immortal was..."

Famously unintelligent .

"...Not the sort that would create a weapon that would manipulate and deceive on its own."

Ruoye is conscious and aware, just like the Brocade Immortal—but it's intelligence comes from Xie Lian.

It's gentle, caring side came from his mother.

And it's protective, stubborn nature— that came from Xie Lian's father.

Ruoye can be cruel, too. Violent.

(Because Xie Lian can be violent, and cruel.)

"And it made many other strategic choices last night." Xie Lian continues, even if Ling Wen is no longer arguing.

"It disguised itself based on information you would have had," Xie

Lian's shackles bear down on her, like an angry, burning mark of guilt —even if he himself isn't angry, the—

The shackle feels like a terrifying reminder of what might be coming.

"I can see spiritual aura and cursed energy on objects too," Xie Lian points out, and Ling Wen bites back the urge to swear. "You thought it only came from gods and ghosts. I never told you otherwise."

No, he didn't. It never came up, and—

God/ damnit ./

"The person operating the Brocade Immortal didn't know that either. So, it tried to change its shape and texture to trick me," Xie Lian raises an eyebrow.

"It would have done that for anyone, wouldn't it—?"

"But never its color." Xie Lian concludes calmly. "Because it had been operated by someone who knew I was blind."

"Anyone who was observing could have seen—"

"I wore a hood the entire time," Xie Lian shakes his head. "I hid being blind from an entire court for five years. It did that because you already knew I was blind."

"...And how would you even know if it changed color?!" Ling Wen snaps, finally reaching the end of her patience.

"Dye."

"I—what?"

"Dye changes the texture in thread." Xie Lian doesn't miss a beat, staring her down. "A mortal probably wouldn't be able to tell the difference."

But Xie Lian can.

It took him centuries to learn the different levels in roughness that came from a certain level of color saturation. For his fingertips to become sensitive enough to feel the difference between hues.

In the beginning, there was no need for him to learn.

When he got his first loom, there was a boy sitting beside him, holding the threads for him while he worked, helping him keep track of which was which, but—

But Xie Lian has been weaving alone for so, so long now.

And he knows the difference.

"But, if I'm wrong, there is one way you could prove it." Xie Lian leans back from the desk as Ling Wen crosses her arms, raising an eyebrow. "You were looking down on us when I called you, yes?"

"I usually do when someone calls me in the Communication Array." She admits.

"The robe that Ruoye had bound when I called you," Xie Lian murmurs, twisting a lock of hair around his finger. "What color was it?"

"..."

Ling Wen's silence makes his heart sink with one final confirmation.

She can't tell him, because she doesn't know.

Xie Lian can't actually see Ruoye, but he most commonly wears it around his neck.

Remembering exactly how it felt, hanging from it.

Ling Wen couldn't tell him what disguise the Brocade Immortal was wearing—she only sees its true form.

A torn, blood soaked robe.

She can't tell him what disguise it wore, because it can't disguise itself from her.

In the same way that, just like Xie Lian, she can control a demon without direct contact with it.

Because Ling Wen created the Brocade Immortal.

"..." Ling Wen presses her palm against her forehead, letting out a sigh so long and heavy, her entire body seems to sag. "I knew it would probably end like this, when the emperor assigned you the Brocade Immortal Case. But...I thought I'd have more time than this."

Slowly, she glances up at Xie Lian between her fingers.

"...But I believe that you never wanted it to come to this," She admits. "For what it's worth–I've never thought ill of you, your highness."

Xie Lian's smile is slightly strained.

"I could say the same about you."

He certainly never wanted it to come to this. And the moment he began to suspect Ling Wen...

He badly wanted to be wrong.

"...Once this gets back to the emperor, I'm finished." She concludes quietly. "Be it exile, or whatever else."

Xie Lian doesn't argue.

“…You made your accusation, and you showed your evidence.” Ling Wen murmurs, her voice even. “I’ll tell you what you want to know, but…Given everything, could I ask you for one thing?”

“What is it?”

“Bai Jing.” Ling Wen pauses. “…The Brocade Immortal, I mean.”

Xie Lian stares, surprised. “Is that his name?”

“Well, most people called him Xiao Bai, but…” The civil goddess shakes her head. “I would like to see it one last time. I only need one day—I’ll remain under your supervision. Then, I’ll turn myself in to the emperor.”

“…” Xie Lian thinks it over. “I don’t have the Brocade—I mean, Bai Jing—with me. If I take you there, I’ll have to bind you.”

Ling Wen places her wrists on the table, “Very well.”

The prince rubs his chin, unsure. “…And you give your word that you’ll do as we’ve agreed?”

Ling Wen holds her palms face up, her tone grave.

“I swear on my honor as a god, your highness. And once this is done, we can have no debts or ill will between us.”

Finally Xie Lian snaps his fingers, and Ruoye flicks to attention, binding her wrists.

“Then it’s a deal.”

Chirp!

Some headaches are worse than others.

Chirp!

On a base level, any headache is just pressure, building in your skull. But sometimes, it’s grinding—like needles digging in just beneath your eye sockets, ramming upwards.

Chirp!

Jun Wu has always loathed birds.

He curls up, knees tucked in, hands pressed against either side of his head, waiting for the ache to go away.

If he can just sleep a little longer, it’ll stop on its own.

That’s right.

Chirp!

If he can just sleep…a little longer…

Chirp, Chir—!

“QUIET!”

He sits up with a snarl, a ball of energy flaring in his hand, but—

An endless blanket of stars is what greets him through the window.

No sunrise. No birds.

Just the quiet of the night.

So why did he hear…?

The god groans, pressing the heel of his palm against his temple.

Until he hears soft, familiar laughter.

Like an echo.

“…You really still sleep on the floor, don’t you?”

The emperor doesn’t reply, hunched over on the ground.

“You gave me such a scare on our wedding night…”

He can hear the smile on her voice.

“…When I woke up in bed alone, I thought you’d gotten cold feet. I was ready to call the guards when I got up, and saw you sleeping on the floor…”

He doesn’t look behind him. Doesn’t want to see her face right now.

He doesn’t think he could stomach it.

“You aren’t real.”

His nails scratch divots onto the floor, eyes glaring into the darkness outside.

“You’re dead.”

(You left me.)

“…” His wife flops back on the bed, dark curls spreading out around her. “I’m not,” she agrees. “But does that really make a difference to something like you?”

Not someone.

Some thing .

“…Aren’t you tired?” She whispers, staring at the ceiling. “I’m so, so tired.”

Yes.

But he can’t sleep .

There's too many damn birds—

"Oh!" She sits up with an excited gasp. "Why don't we go visit my father, in the south?"

"Stop it."

"Remember the lake I used to go to when I was a girl? You took me there on our honeymoon—oh, do you think we could bring San Lang—?"

"STOP IT!"

He hunched forward, clutching his head.

It hurts.

(It really, really hurts.)

"Don't yell at her."

Hearing that voice—

It's already set his teeth on edge.

"This isn't her fault."

Jun Wu doesn't have to look up at the figure standing in front of him.

Over him.

Doesn't have to see white hair and deep, blazing blue eyes to feel their judgment.

"You aren't real, either."

"And I'm not dead," his Guoshi agrees, kneeling down in front of him. "But you know why we're here, don't you?"

Jun Wu won't look at him.

He won't.

His wife throws one arm over her face, letting out a pained sound.

"That boy was so young…what were you thinking?"

Jun Wu won't look at her, either.

"He was older than I was."

"That's not true," she frowns. "You were a grown man, with a wife and children—"

"I'm not talking about that." His fingers tug at his hair, almost painfully.

His Guoshi's eyes never leave him.

It's suffocating.

"It doesn't matter how old you were," he quietly reminds the emperor. "Or how unfair it was. Or how badly you think we treated you."

Jun Wu flinches.

An ancient deity. One who has towered over the earth for two thousand years.

And still, he flinches.

"You have to let that child go."

He's not a child anymore.

"Hasn't it been enough?"

"That wasn't me," Jun Wu mutters, almost distracted, as though this is all a mere nuisance to him.

(And it is .)

God, he wants to sleep.

"I didn't do any of that, that was all…"

"…Bai Wuxiang?" His wife sits up now, her tone suddenly cold.

"You're not a snake, you know."

He hears her footsteps as she slips out of bed, padding across the floor.

"No matter how many times you shed your skin…"

Fingers grasp the back of his head, yanking it to the side.

Forcing him to look at the fourth person in the room.

The one who is always there, watching him from the corner.

Half smiling, half crying.

“You can’t change who you really are.”

No. No—

“ENOUGH!”

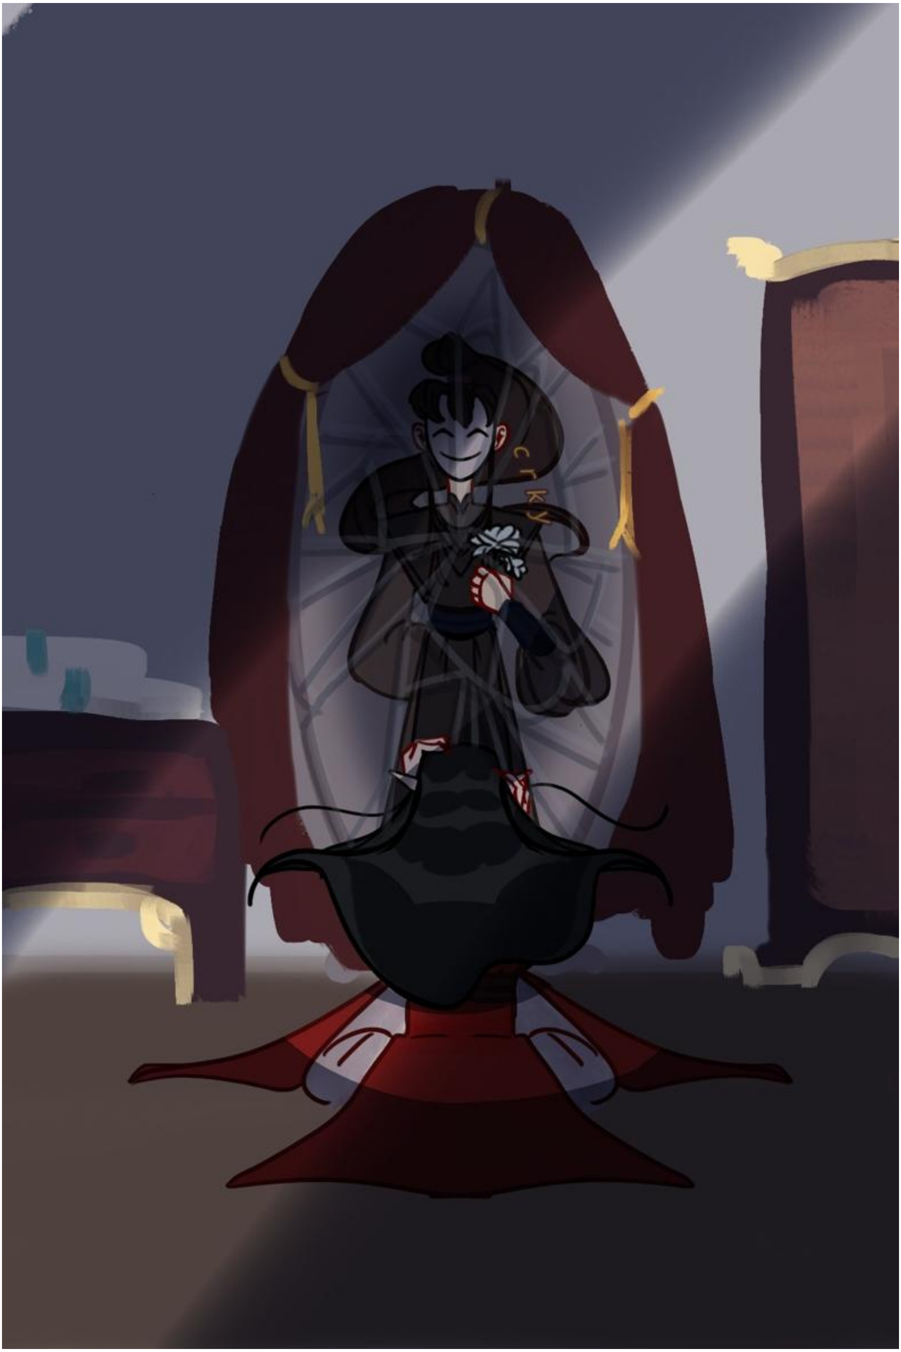
He shouts, but no one hears.

His head pounds.

And the birds still sing.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from artist, do not reproduce or use for any reason.



CREDIT: ABYSS

Chapter End Notes

thanks to abyss for their amazing artwork, and allowing me to share it!

It's Such a Simple Thing to be Happy

Chapter Summary

When they approach Puqi Shrine, Xie Lian can hear the soft rustling of a broom, sweeping off the front porch.

"…Lang Ying? You're doing chores again?"

His eyebrows raise.

What a dutiful child.

Ling Wen looks the shrine over, her expression blank.

"How…quaint."

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

When they approach Puqi Shrine, Xie Lian can hear the soft rustling of a broom, sweeping off the front porch.

"…Lang Ying? You're doing chores again?"

His eyebrows raise.

What a dutiful child.

Ling Wen looks the shrine over, her expression blank.

"How…quaint."

"...Thank you," Xie Lian smiles warmly. "San Lang and Ren Song have been a big help with fixing things up."

"I'm sure..." Ling Wen agrees, following Xie Lian inside, taking a seat at the table. "Where should we begin?"

Xie Lian holds up a finger. "First—I have to make dinner."

Quan Yizhen stiffens slightly from the memory of his last encounter with Xie Lian's cooking, and sensing his wariness, Xie Lian waves him off.

"I have offerings from the villagers the two of you can have if you would rather have that, but Lang Ying hasn't eaten since yesterday."

Xie Lian slips his bamboo hat from his shoulders, hanging it on the hook by the door as he rolls up his sleeves, calling over his shoulder.

"Lang Ying! You've done enough outside, why don't you come help me with the food?"

The child sets the broom down, returning to his side.

Behind them, Quan Yizhen drops down in the chair beside Ling Wen, his arms crossed over his chest, eyes never leaving her face.

If it bothers the civil goddess, she never says so.

"Here," Xie Lian slides a wood block and knife over to Lang Ying. "You can chop these." He hands the boy a couple of onions, while he sets himself to slicing up a head of lettuce.

Lang Ying dutifully obeys, his movements quick and precise, and as they move side by side, Xie Lian speaks up.

"We've had quite a few people visit lately." The ghost hums in agreement, not looking up. "Does Lang Ying mind?"

He gets a soft grunt in response.

"Too noisy. They bother dianxia."

"Ah..." Xie Lian tilts his head. "Which one do you think is the noisiest?"

"The green one," Lang Ying replies immediately.

"Mmm...and which one is the strongest?"

His answer is just as quick.

"The red one."

The prince bites back a smile. "And the most intelligent?"

"The red one," Lang Ying repeats, staring a hole into his cutting block.

"The richest?"

“The red one.”

“I can’t argue with you there...” Xie Lian sighs, lifting one hand to tap his chin. “...And which one is the best looking?”

His response is instant, but firm.

“You.”

Ba-bump.

The prince stares, then lets out a startled laugh. “Besides me!”

“...” Lang Ying looks back down at his block, his knife moving faster. “The red one.”

“Mmmm...” Xie Lian looks away, smiling. “I think so too. San Lang is very good look —”

“Handsome.”

The hard edge to Lang Ying’s voice throws him slightly off kilter.

“...Huh?”

“Handsome is a better word.” Lang Ying mutters, his knuckles knife where they grip the knife.

“You think so?”

“Yes.”

“I see—”

“Does dianxia think so?”

“Oh...” Xie Lian thinks about it. “There are so many words you could use—”

“That he’s handsome.”

Oh .

“I...Well...” Xie Lian clears his throat, “Yes.”

“Yes?”

“He’s definitely the best looking person I’ve met in a long time—”

Thud!

"...Lang Ying?!"

The boy lifts his head from where he slammed it against the countertop, picking bits of lettuce out of his hair.

"...I slipped."

...On what?!

Lang Ying goes back to cutting, not speaking on it anymore—and Xie Lian eventually clears his throat.

"...You like the red one a lot, don't you?"

"En."

"I like him too."

His knife quickens, cutting with more aggression. "Should we invite him over more often?"

"Yes!"

"...Okay," Xie Lian agrees. "But he's busy resting right now, so we shouldn't bother him."

Lang Ying screws up his mouth with annoyance, eyes flashing.

"Oh, and there's no need to call him the red one," Xie Lian shrugs, finishing with his cutting, pushing the lettuce into a pot.

"He's your Hua Cheng gege," he explains lightly, turning around before he can notice the way Lang Ying grips the handle of the knife so tightly, it's reduced to splinter.

He...said...He's never heard him say…

"...You've never called him that before," Lang Ying mumbles faintly.

"...Hua Cheng?" Xie Lian repeats, his eyes wide. "He prefers it when I call him San Lang."

And Xie Lian likes it better, too.

Not because he doesn't like Hua Cheng's name—he does, he thought it was poetic the first time he heard it.

Maybe it's a selfish way to think, but…

No one else calls him San Lang.

Is it horrible that Xie Lian likes that?

"...There's nothing left," Quan Yizhen speaks up, staring at Lang Ying's chopping block. The onions are just...pulverized into a liquid, now. Certainly unusable. "Your knife work is pretty bad..."

"That's okay," Xie Lian shakes his head, gesturing for Lang Ying to follow him. "We're done with most of the cooking anyway. Why don't you come and help me with this?"

Lang Ying trails after him, sending Quan Yizhen an annoyed look.

"Lang Ying, how's your handwriting?"

"..." The child goes still, and Xie Lian smiles, looking up at him expectantly. "...mediocre..."

Gears turn silently in his head, watching as the prince offers him a piece of paper, along with a brush.

"I just realized we don't have an establishment plaque." Xie Lian explains. "Do you think you could make one for me?"

"..." Lang Ying reaches out, picking up the brush, moving at a snail's pace as he reaches towards the page, clearly trying to work out something in his head, but—

His hand freezes, and Xie Lian knows what he's remembering.

The prince's hand, brushing over a certain tattoo ...

"...Gege..."

Xie Lian cracks the widest smile, finally hearing Hua Cheng's voice, rather than Lang Ying's.

The boy hangs his head, just as—

Xie Lian falls back, clutching his middle as he lets out a full-bellied laugh.

"Gege!"

"T...this is how San Lang rests?" Xie Lian sputters, rolling back and forth. "Y-you've really been taking it easy!"

"Gege tricked me!"

Xie Lian sits up, wiping his eyes as the ghost king retreats onto the porch, still giggling as he follows after him.

"Come now, San Lang—you really weren't trying that hard to be subtle towards the end—!"

"No!" Hua Cheng shakes his head, completely certain. "I was completely in character. Gege used his skills of deduction to force it out of me..."

"Force?!" Xie Lian's ribs ache from laughter. "Shameless!"

Just then, in his hurry to catch up with the calamity, his foot catches on the lip of one of the stairs, sending him lurching forward—

Only to land comfortably in Hua Cheng's arms, the ghost king sitting back on the ground.

And Xie Lian won't think about it until later, but—

He didn't even attempt to brace himself this time.

(Almost as if, if only subconsciously, he knew that someone was going to catch him.)

He sits up in Hua Cheng's arms as the ghost king lets him go, adjusting his hair.

"...Isn't gege angry with me?"

He's in his younger form right now, a teenager of maybe sixteen or seventeen years old, but he still feels strong as he helps the god sit up.

And...oddly familiar.

Comforting.

"Mmm..." Xie Lian swallows down the last of his snickering. "...Were you really resting?"

Hua Cheng nods sharply, his voice completely sincere; “Yes.”

Xie Lian thinks that over, then nods.

“Then I’m not angry.”

The ghost king lets out a low sigh of relief, and the prince continues, “San Lang is always welcome—wherever I am.”

The ghost king’s expression freezes as he stops to stare at him, his eyes round—just as Xie Lian turns his head away, still slightly entangled with Hua Cheng, sitting up between the calamity’s legs, facing away from him.

“Also, San Lang...”

“...Yes?”

“You don’t have to use tricks if you want to hug me,” the prince points out quietly, and though he can’t see it—

The tips of Hua Cheng’s ears turn bright red.

“You can just hug me.”

“...I know dianxia doesn’t like having people that close,” the calamity mutters, looking away.

Says the man who was just using the premise of the Brocade Immortal to steal an embrace from him.

Or the one who asked for a kiss in exchange for a gambling debt.

But paradoxically, he sounds earnest—and Xie Lian turns around, facing him. “It's alright if it’s San Lang.”

Xie Lian generally doesn’t like touching other people that much. He will—often as a form of comfort or affection. But small things. Like a pat on the arm, or a one armed squeeze of the shoulders.

But when it’s Hua Cheng—

The prince leans forward, pulling him into a gentle hug

When it’s Hua Cheng, it’s alright.

(And really, compared to what happened between them in the forge—

a hug is nothing.)

“...” The ghost king is quiet for a moment, eyes round, his lips trembling.

Xie Lian has his face pressed against his shoulder—and he can actually feel the way Hua Cheng’s fingers ball up against the ground, tearing at the grass.

“...San Lang?”

His breaths are suddenly noticeable and quick.

“...Are you al—? San Lang—did you just get smaller?!”

"No," Hua Cheng mutters, but he does sound a little higher in pitch, and instead of being around Xie Lian's height sitting down, he's slightly shorter now. Then, when Xie Lian pinches his cheek, he flails slightly, his face turning pink. "Gege...!"

"Sorry, sorry!"

Xie Lian leans back with a small laugh, reaching up to hide it behind his sleeve.

"..." Hua Cheng reaches up to rub his cheek, and while his tone is slightly sulking—he's smiling. "I really didn't think gege would be so happy that I ignored his request."

"Well, San Lang didn't ignore me, you already said you were resting," Xie Lian points out, realizing he's been smiling so widely for the last few minutes that his cheeks are actually sore from it.

Aching from the giddy pleasure of realizing someone actually never left .

"...Please forget the entire thing ever happened," Hua Cheng mumbles, sounding extra pitiful, only to cry out in dismay when Xie Lian solemnly replies;

"Absolutely not."

"Gege!"

His laughter drifts across the air as he flops back against the grass, hair pooled around him.

The sunlight falls across him just so , and Hua Cheng falls silent, a palpable ache in his expression.

But not a bad one.

He can't remember the last time he saw his god so...

"You're really..." He trails off, his voice slightly hoarse.

Xie Lian's smile softens as he throws one arm over his eyes, catching his breath, the wind teasing through his hair. It should feel cold given the time of year, but...

He's never been so warm.

"Really..."

The words fall out of him without Xie Lian meaning to say them;

"...Only after having met you, did I rediscover that it's such a simple thing to be happy..."

A long time ago, Xie Lian promised that he would be kinder to himself, and...he failed.

But when he's with Hua Cheng, it's so easy to make room for more than just sadness.

That last time he could laugh so much and so easily, that...

That was with Hong'er.

From when he was trying to make the prince laugh, and when he was just...

Xie Lian bites back a bittersweet smile, remembering how excited he was, shooting his first rabbit with a bow.

'Gege, look! Did you see me—?'

And of course, Xie Lian couldn't , but the way Hong'er faltered in realization...

That was the first time Xie Lian could actually laugh about his cursed shackles, finding joy in something that once brought him such despair.

And with everything that's happened—and everything that will happen—maybe it shouldn't be so easy for Xie Lian to feel happy right now.

But Hua Cheng makes it so...easy.

Hua Cheng stares down at him, silent, blinking slowly, as it dawns on Xie Lian that he said that out loud.

"..." Xie Lian clears his throat, sitting up on his elbows. "What did you do with the real Lang Ying, by the way? Where is he?"

"Back in Ghost City," Hua Cheng answers mildly, reaching over to pluck a blade of grass from Xie Lian's hair. "No harm done."

"Ah, good..."

"Your highness?" Ling Wen speaks up from inside the shrine, having been silent up until now--but the sudden reminder of her presence makes Xie Lian's cheeks grow hot.

"...Yes?"

"I'm afraid that whatever you were attempting to make has started to burn."

"...Oh!"

It's a slightly disorganized rush to rise to his feet, brushing the grass off of him as he goes back inside, the ghost king trailing behind him.

"Ah, Crimson Rain." Ling Wen muses, her chin resting on her hand as she watches the youth following Xie Lian like a little shadow.

"What a surprise."

Her tone is a little dry—but not openly hostile, the way most officials are when they see Hua Cheng.

As such, Xie Lian accepts that as better than average.

Hua Cheng spares the civil god a sharp look from the corner of his eye, but says nothing more.

Once he's ensured that the shrine isn't about to burn down from an ill fated attempt at stew, he leaves the remains to simmer (hopefully until it congeals into something edible), then returns to sit across from

Ling Wen.

"So," The prince tilts his head. "You got to see Bai Jing."

Even if the Brocade Immortal is sitting across the room, it's still within her line of sight.

"...Yes," She agrees, bowing her head. "Thank you for humoring me, even if you might not understand."

"It wasn't a hard request to grant," Xie Lian shrugs.

"But," Ling Wen sits back, crossing her ankles beneath the table. "Given what you told me about Ruoye, you must have found the story of the Brocade Immortal particularly disturbing."

Hua Cheng's eyes snap to Xie Lian's face, which remains largely impassive, smiling calmly.

"It was...disconcerting," he agrees, the bandage wiggling subtly around Ling Wen's wrists. "But it also provided no context."

And it becomes even more bizarre, listening to Ling Wen speak about Bai Jing. Not with loathing, or sadism, just...

Nostalgia.

Maybe even...warmth.

"...Yes," Ling Wen agrees faintly. "I suppose context is what makes or breaks any story, isn't it, your highness?"

Anything can seem like a kindness or a cruelty from the outside looking in—if you don't know the circumstances.

The intentions behind even an abhorrent act can change the shade of a person's guilt.

'Dianxia,' Hua Cheng speaks up in Xie Lian's private communication array, his chair tilted towards the prince. 'Be careful. Ling Wen is ruthless and cunning. She's not to be trusted.'

'San Lang...' Xie Lian frowns, thinking. 'I know that she's done horrible things, but so have I. She deserves the chance to explain herself. Then, the whole matter will be behind us.'

Hua Cheng frowns, but says nothing more.

Ling Wen takes a slow, deep breath.

"You know," She starts, folding her hands on top of the table. "Despite what my social behavior might indicate, I've always strongly disliked the male gender as a whole."

Quan Yizhen pauses in the middle of chewing his Mantou, realizing that applies to him as well.

Hua Cheng sends Xie Lian a pointed look, and even if Xie Lian can't see it, he can certainly feel it.

"…Well, that's…unique—"

"Not particularly." She speaks over him, her voice cold. "It's not unique to feel that way, if you're a woman. It's unique to have agency." She turns her head, staring out the window. "…Actually, I think the only man I didn't hate as a child, other than my father, was you."

Xie Lian stiffens with surprise, and Ling Wen watches the afternoon sun with a cold expression.

"You forget, I'm not much younger than you."

She was appointed as a deputy official shortly before the destruction of thirty three heavenly officials by Hua Cheng—and that was early into Xie Lian's second banishment.

"My father went to your temples when he was a boy. He spoke of those times fondly," Ling Wen recalls.

"But by the time I was born, you were…"

"Being cursed as a god of misfortune," Xie Lian smiles awkwardly. "I remember."

"Yes—but I've never really cared for fixating on luck one way or another. It didn't matter to me." Ling Wen shrugs. "The reason I didn't hate you, was because day in and day out, I would go door to door, helping people trying on shoes," she explains the memory in a business-like tone, with little fondness for that time. "And every day, men told me how nice I looked on my knees."

"…Looking down on you," Xie Lian murmurs, his eyes brightening with understanding.

Ling Wen's smile turns genuine, if not sharp. "Exactly."

And by that time—Xie Lian's statues were always shown to be kneeling.

He was the only man who was ever at eye level with her.

"And no matter how skilled I was, or how hard I worked, my greatest value in the eyes of the people around me was through my potential as a wife and mother." She glares, drumming her fingers heavily against the table's surface. "Can you even imagine what that's like?"

"…When you're born a prince, having a son is the most important task you'll ever have," Xie Lian points out quietly. "But that's not the same as what you experienced."

"But you had the ability to choose whether or not you wanted to marry, or have children."

Xie Lian shrugs, not arguing.

His situation was a little more nuanced. He was allowed to leave to train on Mount Taicang, yes, even if it devastated his parents.

But back then—Xie Lian couldn't have married whom he wanted, or had children with them.

Still, he sees her point.

Ling Wen's fingers bunch up slightly on top of the table, her mouth twisted into a tight frown.

"It didn't matter how much talent I had, or how much hard work I did. My life had no meaning—no value—on its own."

If she wanted to gain accolades, she did so by entering contests anonymously. Only to have her awards stripped when her identity was revealed, or in one case, to face imprisonment.

The first woman she ever loved married a man who came to Ling Wen asking for help writing letters.

Letters that she crafted with flourish, watching him reap the affections she had so carefully sewn. And watching still, the disappointment in her childhood friend's eyes when her new husband couldn't make her smile with his voice the way he did with his pen.

Like a certain calamity who came after her, she too took the state civil exams. Over, and over, and over again—

And she didn't pass until she paid a man to turn her test sheets in for her.

Her mother's only response was quiet exasperation.

And such disappointment.

In the fact that she hadn't had a son. Or at the very least, a daughter who smiled more.

A young lady who spoke at the right times, and wanted the right things.

"I was promoted to the middle court of the Heavens as a matter of mere pride and pity," She mutters.

A way of appeasing Jing Wen's wounded ego, if nothing else.

"And when I was in the middle court—even if I deserved to be there—I was treated like little more than a waitress, or a handmaiden." Her voice is sour from bitterness.

She might have been just as skilled with a pen as Xie Lian was with a sword. But she couldn't ascend at seventeen, much less become the second highest god in her chosen field.

"It took me twice as long to reach where I am now than it would have for any man."

And if Ling Wen still has to appear in the form of a god to gain any respect. She even likes her male form to some extent, enjoys the way it makes her feel, the power behind it, but—

She loathes the fact that it's the only face she can wear to gain respect.

Or the fact that she couldn't get where she was fairly. That she had no choice but to claw, cheat, and steal—just to get the recognition that was rightfully her own.

"…And then, I looked up and realized I was already as far as I could go, and you know something?"

Her smile is anything but amused.

“When you spend your life sitting behind a desk, you know what people do?”

Hua Cheng responds before Xie Lian can—

“Look down on you.”

Not so different from when she was selling shoes.

And still, with a man looking down on her.

One who uses her as little more than an effective, favorite tool.

“So, if you want to know WHY I wanted to steal it back…” The civil goddess shrugs, watching the golden tint of the sun, coming in over the trees. “It should be clear.”

Maybe so.

“That answers why you stole it back,” Xie Lian agrees. “But why create it to begin with? What did this Bai Jing do to offend you?”

Ling Wen’s expression becomes…complex.

“For the most part, it wasn’t really about him.”

That’s gruesome to consider.

“Have you ever seen an animal in a cage, your highness? Before your first banishment.”

Xie Lian thinks it over, fiddling with a longer piece of his hair, slowly winding it around his finger.

“We kept hounds in the palace of Xianle. Cats, too.”

“A wild animal, I mean.”

“…A king from a neighboring kingdom gave the crown a tiger for my tenth birthday,” Xie Lian recalls, squinting.

“You didn’t enjoy it, did you?” The civil goddess questions, just a hair too knowing.

“…I set it free after three days. It nearly ate a footman.”

Hua Cheng bites back a smile, eyeing the way Xie Lian’s hair looks, lightly curled around his finger—only to look away when he catches Ling Wen watching him.

“When I was in the middle court…I held so much resentment towards Xuli,” Ling Wen explains carefully.

“I felt like I had been robbed of my chances to make a name for myself in my mortal life—abused and taken advantage of by the system around me, and I wanted to take revenge by….weakening the country that had been unfair to me.”

“And you did that with the Brocade Immortal?”

"...Not initially," She shakes her head. "At first, it was small acts of sabotage. A lost communication between diplomats here, a seduced princess there. I wasn't alone, either...Even Pei helped me burn a few temples--here and there."

She's surprised by the way Xie Lian reacts.

His back straightens, eyebrows pulled together.

“Pei helped you.”

“Yes.”

“And this was shortly after my second banishment?”

“…Yes?”

Xie Lian’s fingers tighten against the table top. “Did you know that he was grieving, back then?”

Hua Cheng doesn’t outwardly respond, but he watches Xie Lian from the corner of his eye, curious.

“…He never spoke about it, but I was aware of the fact that he was going through emotional difficulties.”

“And you asked him to help you?”

“I explained what I was going to do, and he offered his help,” Ling Wen corrects him.

(Though, perhaps, maybe she only mentioned it to Pei Ming because he would have wanted to break something, back then.)

"Gods go through rebellious phases, Your highness. You know that." Ling Wen shrugs. "And men of action, like him…they become destructive when angry. I'm sure he would feel better if he could burn all of the Heavens down right now."

Hua Cheng's eyebrows rose sharply, and Xie Lian frowns.

"What do you mean?"

"That he benefits from closure."

Xie Lian can't say his own past attempts at 'closure' have been much better…

Far worse, actually.

"All I can say is that he held a grudge against the wealthy, ruling class of Xuli for centuries. He was happy to help me."

Which was why it was so surprising to her that, of all people, he fell in love with the heir to one of the wealthiest merchant families in the country.

But life is complicated in that sense.

"Still…it wasn't enough," she frowns. "That was when I noticed Bai Jing."

A famous general—though not for his intelligence.

Purely for his ability in battle. Nothing more, and nothing less.

"He was given rank and wealth by the leaders of Xuli, but…" Her mouth twists into a grimace. "He was mocked."

A joke.

A dog beloved for the sharpness of his bite, then thrown inside a cage and poked and prodded at when there were no rabbits left to hunt.

"At first, I thought I could make him turn against his country with a little kindness, and…it worked," Ling Wen explains slowly. "The stories always make it seem like it was some great act of seduction… but really, the smallest act of kindness, and he…"

He would have burned all of Xuli to the ground for her.

Finally, Hua Cheng speaks, twirling a set of chopsticks between his fingers.

“I feel sorry for the poor bastard,” it’s almost comical, hearing him speak like that with such a youthful voice—actually—

Did he get smaller again? He couldn’t sound older than fourteen, now…

“Though I’m sure a person like you wouldn’t understand.”

Ling Wen sends him a sharp look. "A person like me?"

Hua Cheng leans back in his chair, arms crossed over his chest. "A person who thinks the greatest form of suffering in life is having their intelligence go unappreciated."

The air grows tense, and Xie Lian's smile turns awkward. "San Lang—"

"I'm sure you've never had that problem," Ling Wen glares. "The moment you were born, people probably thought you were special. That everything came easily to you. You think I care if you look down on me?"

Hua Cheng's chopsticks go still, and his smile turns lopsided and sly--even if there's absolutely no amusement in his eyes.

"I think you care if anyone looks down on you, Nangong Jie."

The mere mention of her mortal name, drawled with such audacity, sets her teeth on edge.

She's very proud. Has a great sense of entitlement to being treated with a certain air of respect.

It makes sense to him that she and Shi Wudu were such good friends.

"Wasn't that the entire point of that speech you made?" Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow.

"Not your best work, by the way. Very rambling. I've read better essays from you."

The mention of the word essay makes her go slightly pale in the cheeks, and his smile is all too knowing.

"And let me be clear," his eye settles on her, and he might look young now, but...

Still, something about his gaze makes her blood run cold.

"Nothing has ever been easy for me."

He wouldn't be sitting before her now, most powerful among the ghost realm, if life had been kind.

"The difference is, I don't leave room for self pity."

The brief moments when he's allowed himself to feel it were his weakest. The moments when he failed.

"Tch." Ling Wen rolls her eyes, her expression openly resentful, finding no reason to pose niceties when the only person present she does want on her side, Xie Lian, can't see.

"No matter how hard things were for you, you don't know what it's like to have everything you do automatically discredited because—!"

"You had me on that point," Hua Cheng shakes his head, holding up a finger. "Do you know when you lost me?"

He tilts his head to the side, giving her a slow look of contempt. "When you turned your attention to getting 'revenge' on Xuli, who do you think actually suffered from that?"

Lin Wen falls silent, her mouth pressing into a thin line.

"There are worse things to be than the daughter of a shoemaker," Hua Cheng points out coldly. "When you cause a war, who dies first?"

Normally, even though Hua Cheng feels contempt for other Heavenly Officials, he doesn't pick fights with them around Xie Lian.

But now...something seems to have gotten directly under his skin.

"When you stop gold from flowing into a kingdom, who is going to starve first?"

The answer to both is the same;

The poor.

"You burn down a few temples, and a god won't notice. You know who will?"

The mortals who use them to take shelter. Who go there to make their troubles heard.

"You talk about how society as a whole mistreated you, but the only ones who suffered your 'revenge' were its most vulnerable."

"Oh, spare me the self righteous hypocrisy," Ling Wen sneers.

"The last person who should be lecturing about burning temples is you. How many did you set on fire that night? Hundreds? Thousands?"

"Ten."

His response is so cool and crisp, she almost doesn't know what he means—

"It was ten thousand."

Even Xie Lian chokes, because—

That was how many temples he had at the height of his power.

And Hua Cheng...reduced that many to ash in the span of one night?

"And I could do the same to you, right now."

He says the words casually, not in a threatening way.

Merely stating a fact. That Ling Wen, while she is a powerful god, doesn't even have half that number.

Hua Cheng would eradicate her existence with only moderate effort.

"Do you know, aside from the obvious reason, why I'm not going to?"

He spins the chopstick round and round between his fingers, staring her down, while Xie Lian tilts his head.

...What is the obvious reason?

"Because there is nothing you are capable of doing that could offend me in the way that they did."

His tone almost makes Ling Wen sound insignificant, comparatively. And Xie Lian can't help but wonder...

Just what could those thirty three officials have done to him that was so horrible?

"But since you want to speak of hypocrisy, that's by me."

Hua Cheng leans forward, smirking--but there's absolutely no mirth in his expression. "When I deal with my enemies, I don't find a martial god to burn their temples for me. A grieving one, apparently," He gestures to Xie Lian, who feels somewhat shell shocked by the conversation.

"I also don't use my difficult upbringing as justification for causing harm. I just take that criticism on the chin. That makes me many things, but not a hypocrite." He sets his chopsticks down with a sharp thud .

"And your attempts to make your life sound so miserable aren't particularly compelling when this is all leading up to a story of you cutting his limbs off and leaving him in a bloody sack."

Ling Wen recoils, her lips parted, and Xie Lian presses his fist against his mouth.

"...He's really got you there," the prince points out faintly.

"Fine." Ling Wen closes her eyes, locking her jaw, and her voice grows cold. "I am a hypocrite. And while what I did to Bai Jing was gruesome, and you won't ever understand it—he wanted me to. There was no trick."

"He agreed to cut off his limbs and eventually be decapitated, all so his spirit could eternally haunt what has to be the tackiest robe I have ever seen?" Hua Cheng tone is dry, and Ling Wen is equally flat when she replies;

"I never claimed to be a seamstress."

"Well thank heavens you drew the line at false advertisement," he replies, his tone absolutely dripping with sarcasm.

"You can say whatever you want about me, think whatever you want—but now that you've felt Bai Jing's spirit yourself, does he hold any resentment towards me?"

“…”

Xie Lian tilts his head in Hua Cheng's direction, shrugging helplessly.

"She's got you there, San Lang."

Everything Hua Cheng said was true—and yet.

Xie Lian can't feel one ounce of rage or resentment towards Ling Wen from the Brocade Immortal at all.

"…But," the god shakes his head. "Just because Bai Jing would have been willing to do anything for you, doesn't mean you should have taken it to such lengths."

After all, Xie Lian too has known someone that would have done absolutely anything for him, without limits.

And when he tries to picture what Hong'er would have done in that situation, or Wu Ming—

He swallows down nausea, shaking his head.

"…It was cruel," Ling Wen agrees. "And selfish. I won't say that it wasn't. I'm that kind of person. I always have been."

Which is why it's always confused her, the way she tends to draw in people who are just the opposite.

She's self motivated, spiteful, and angry.

So why would her best friends have been so fiercely loyal, and dedicated?

Why would the crown prince, so infamously selfless, have held such a high opinion of her up until now?

And why would…

Ling Wen squeezes her eyes shut, trying so hard to forget star studded eyes and quiet, knowing smiles.

(Why would she look at me like that?)

"If I had to do it again today, I don't think I could," she admits, looking down at the Brocade Immortal with a distant gaze. "After I was finished with Xuli, I made sure Bai Jing was found by the emperor and locked away. I haven't tried to use it again until now."

Yes, but that makes Xie Lian wonder—

Why did she choose now, of all times, to try to get her hands on the brocade immortal once more?

“You—”

“I wasn’t from Xuli.” It’s been so long since Quan Yizhen spoke, Xie LIan almost forgot he was there.

“…Where were you from?” The prince questions, curious, surprised when Quan Yizhen and Hua Cheng reply at the same time;

“Yong’an.”

All roads always seem to lead back to there, don’t they?

“I didn’t have parents, so I don’t know if they were rich—but I didn’t have any money.”

“…You were an orphan?” Xie Lian questions, surprised. The status of a person’s birth doesn’t impact their ability to ascend, but circumstances can make things…difficult.

He’s not sure if he’s met an orphan who became a martial god before.

“I don’t know if it counts.”

“You don’t know—?”

“My parents weren’t dead,” Quan Yizhen clarifies. “They just didn’t want me.”

He doesn’t sound particularly sad about it, only matter of fact.

“…I really couldn’t have helped that Yin Yu decided to steal—” she starts, then stops.

Upon seeing the sharp, hostile look in the general's eyes—she gives up on attempting to defend herself from that particular charge, shaking her head with a sigh.

"Then I apologize, Qi Ying, for the way my actions impacted you. It was never my intention."

There's a brief pause, then, the martial god nods—easily appeased.

"Okay."

He glances around, catching sight of the pot in the corner.

"...Your highness?"

Xie Lian lifts his head with a start. "Yes?"

"Why did the stew turn into meatballs?"

"..." The god pointedly clears his throat, looking at Ling Wen. "Well, with everything you've said, I can't deny the situation is complicated, but—"

Quan Yizhen, however, doesn't want to let the subject go.

"Why did the stew turn into meatballs?"

Xie Lian turns back to him, his lips parted into a bright, if not irritated smile. “When I saw that the stew had gotten a little bit too…solidified, I molded it into balls instead.”

Quan Yizhen stares at the pot.

“…You can do that?” He whispers, amazed.

“Well…”

"Of course you can."

Now, Xie Lian finally notices something...off, about Hua Cheng's voice. His form has clearly gotten younger again, but—

Something about it sounds vaguely...familiar.

Hua Cheng slides out of his seat, walking over to pluck a meatball from the pot.

After dropping it into his mouth for a moment, chewing as if he’s savoring some fine delicacy, he smiles.

“The flavor is very light, gege. Well done.”

In spite of everything, Xie Lian can’t help but smile a bit.

“…Really?” Quan Yizhen questions, watching very curiously.

“Well—“

“Really,” Hua Cheng intones calmly, reaching for seconds.

“…” Xie Lian hears the screeching of Quan Yizhen’s chair as he gets up to investigate. “…General Qi Ying, you really shouldn’t—!”

Thud!

Hua Cheng stares at the martial god’s limp form on the floor.

“…He didn’t even swallow it,” he comments, half amused, half condescending, poking at the martial god’s head with his toe.

Xie Lian groans, hurrying over to Quan Yizhen’s side, using a set of chopsticks to pluck the meatball out of the general’s mouth, setting it aside.

"Qi Ying? Qi Ying?!" He questions, fanning the god's face with his hand. "San Lang, get him a glass of water?"

The ghost king bites back a laugh, going to do as he's told.

From her seat, Ling Wen watches.

"That's an interesting form you've taken on, Crimson Rain."

She fiddles with the hem of her sleeve, making eye contact with Hua Cheng as he returns to Xie Lian's side, handing him a cup of water.

"Rather...youthful. Is there a particular reason for that?"

Hua Cheng's gaze turns snide, but Xie Lian feels himself prick with concern.

It IS pretty odd for Hua Cheng to take a form like this. He's pretended to be a teenager before, yes, but never...quite this young.

"If there was, do you think I'd tell you?" He drawls, annoyed.

"San Lang..."

"Apologies, gege." It's said as an aside, but...

Xie Lian winces, pressing a hand against the side of his head.

...Why does it sound so familiar? And why—?

“I don't know, there have been rumors spreading around the realms these past few days. I'm assuming his highness hasn't heard, but I'm sure you're aware."

"What..." Xie Lian shakes his head, rubbing at his ear. "What rumors?"

"That the opening of Mount Tonglu has forced him to take on a weaker form in order to avoid losing control of himself..."

(When she says 'losing control,' Xie Lian's cheeks grow flushed.)

"...And with the rumors of Ren Song's recent injury, and Blackwater's disappearance..."

(Not to mention the fact that the emperor has placed a kill order on him.)

"Apparently, the entire ghost realm is in disarray."

"...Only two of those things are relevant." Hua Cheng looks up at her with a narrowed gaze, his eyes narrowed sharply. "Are you going to bet on which one is wrong? You don't seem like much of a gambler to me."

"I'm not," Ling Wen muses, sitting back in his chair, knees spread.

Xie Lian perks up, surprised.

...When did Ling Wen switch into his male form?

"But I've always been good at making an educated guess," he smirks, finishing off a bite of the mantou Xie Lian gave him and Quan Yizhen earlier. "And someone has spread rumors of your...infirmity far and wide."

Ling Wen is a tall woman, but he's an even larger man—and staring at Hua Cheng, in his far more youthful form, his thoughts are very clear.

'Who is looking down on who, now?'

"You have quite a few enemies, if I recall."

Quan Yizhen groans, slowly coming to.

Xie Lian lifts his head, suddenly concerned for Hua Cheng's safety. "Ling Wen, you didn't—?"

He can't say more before Quan Yizhen rolls over and throws up, just barely managing to snatch a wash basin in time to place it in front of his face.

"If I'm in this form to keep myself from losing control, just what do you think would happen to you if I changed back?" Hua Cheng sneers.

He's never bared his fangs in front of Xie Lian before, even if the prince can't see.

Now, he's simply beyond caring.

"Something horrific," Ling Wen agrees sagely. "How lucky am I, that you wouldn't dare risk losing your control here?"

Hua Cheng's jaws snap together with an irritated click.

"...San Lang," Xie Lian says suddenly. "If she's telling the truth, you should hide somewhere."

Ling Wen smirks, staring him down, knowing full well...

Crimson Rain won't leave the Crown Prince's side. Not while Ling Wen is still here, and the Brocade Immortal hasn't been dealt with.

He's stuck, effectively.

"And as far as those three options..."

Ling Wen taps his chin. "Blackwater's situation is public knowledge. The only options that are false would be my statement about your situation, or that about Ren Song's. That's a fifty-fifty bet."

The Civil God smirks.

"I'll take those chances."

Xie Lian starts to stand up, suddenly finding this conversation far more distressing than it is informative.

"I think you've had enough time with Bai Jing," he mutters. "Time to go to the Grand Martial Hall, yes?"

Ling Wen doesn't answer—he doesn't have to.

Because now—

Xie Lian can hear people outside...

A lot of people. From the sound of their footsteps--probably at least fifty.

And with the commotion, he can hear one of the farmers in the village ask—

"What's with the hurry?"

"Yeah, you folks aren't from around here!"

Then, just as Xie Lian straightens up to deal with the matter, he hears —

"Are you people even aware that you have a ghost in your midst?!"

"...A ghost?" One of the women gasps, shocked. "Where?!"

Hua Cheng sends Ling Wen a loathsome look.

"Gege, this is no good."

He takes a step back. "I'll lead them off, so you can—"

"No."

Xie Lian's voice is so firm, it startles him.

"There's no other option, dianxia. You wait here while I—"

"San Lang, if you take a step out that door, don't you ever come back."

The prince has never quite heard him so distressed as he does now, crying out;

"Gege!"

Xie Lian brushes off his robes.

"You make sure Qi Ying drinks another glass of water, and feed him some Mantou—that helped last time."

"But—!"

"I'll handle this, San Lang."

He moves to go outside, and just as he does, Quan Yizhen slurs, "Why...don't you just put on the robes...you used last night? That way...they won't...recognize..."

Xie Lian doesn't have the heart to explain to him that the robes were never enchanted to begin with.

"That's a great idea, Qi Ying. Drink some more water, okay?"

He steps out the door, shutting it behind him—then smiles warmly, placing every ounce of charm he still possesses into his expression.

"Welcome sirs, how may I assist you?"

"Daozhang..."

One of the villagers frowns, looking back and forth between Xie Lian, and the group of cultivators who are standing before Puqi Shrine.

"Do you know these people?"

"Can't say that I do," Xie Lian shakes his head. "But I'm happy to make their acquaintance."

"They're..." The farmer clears his throat, lowering his voice. "They're saying there's a ghost here..."

"It can't be blamed!" One of the cultivators crows, his voice high and haughty. "Clearly he was taking advantage of a poor, blind priest! Befitting such a foul creature!"

"Hmmm..." Xie Lian reaches down, winding a lock of hair around his finger. With his chin tilted toward the ground, he glances up through his lashes, trying to get a grasp of how many cultivators there are without exposing his shackle, and...

It's quite a few.

It's not easy to tell, not with how many auras are blending and blurring together—but his estimate from before, fifty, seems to have been conservative.

"...Yes," he agrees with a smile. "There's always been a ghost here."

The farmers freeze, jaws dropping.

"...Pardon?"

"Me."

The lot of them stare, uncertain as they take in the sight of a blind, white robed cultivator, saying the words as confidently as anything.

Then, he leans against the doorframe in a far more languid, relaxed pose, crossing his arms over his chest.

A slow smirk spreads across his face, and when his voice comes out, it's in a confident drawl.

"You worthless pieces of trash wouldn't dare challenge me on any other day, but the second you hear I'm weakened, you come running? Pathetic."

"You..." One of the cultivators stares. "You're...Crimson Rain Sought Flower?"

"But he's not even in red!"

"Unlike you lowlifes, I like to change things up every once in a while."

Xie Lian throws his hands up, then slowly claps in a show of sarcasm so impressive, Ling Wen almost sheds a tear from the beauty of the performance.

"And now you're all here to fight me. Very brave, very brave...Which one of you wants to go first?"

Before, they seemed very confident, and now...

None of them seem so sure.

"It would be clever, disguising himself as a blind priest...None of us would ever consider that..."

"...But if he were, why would he just declare himself the moment we arrived?"

"Because I was expecting something a little tougher than you," Xie Lian snorts. "But this should be fun. Are you going to make a nice little line for me, or should I take you all at once? Doesn't really matter to me."

"...If that's true, then who's the kid in red?"

Now, there are a lot of other things Xie Lian could have said, but here, he runs into an age-old problem.

He’s not that good of a liar.

He can if it’s someone he despises, or if he’s had time to think up a plan, like he did the other night.

Or, he can imitate people he knows well.

That was a skill he picked up in that coffin, after a few decades went by. So starved for company, he would make up conversations with himself and Feng Xin, or Mu Qing. Sometimes Hong’er, or his parents.

But improvising a lie…

That’s where he struggles.

So, out of what would have probably been countless other plausible explanations, he replies—

“That’s my son.”

There’s more shocked murmuring, and Hua Cheng’s face couldn’t be any less amused.

(Whereas before, it was the opposite.)

“…Crimson Rain has a son?!”

“Since when?!”

“Well, can’t you tell?” Xie Lian questions with a shrug. “Not for very long. Isn’t he cute?”

He almost winces at the last line, knowing Hua Cheng wouldn’t say that, but—

San Lang is cute like this, really. Who wouldn’t agree?

“…And who is the mother?!” One of the cultivators glares. “If it was a mortal woman, the child wouldn’t look so normal!”

Xie Lian doesn’t foresee this going well, but he’s already in the hole, so—

“A Heavenly Official, obviously.”

…He may as well dig deeper.

"As if any Heavenly Official would have anything to do with you!" One of the cultivators screeches, horrified by the idea.

"Oh, you'd be surprised," Xie Lian lifts his hand, tilting his head down, pretending to examine his nails, and…

(Hiding the blush on his face.)

"Well," One of the others says, "Crimson Rain is known for spurning anyone who attempts to seduce him. Is it possible he's been married this entire time?"

…Is he really known for that?

"Hua Cheng, with a wife?!"

"Not necessarily a wife," Xie Lian mutters under his breath

Then, feeling the stares of everyone on him, he clears his throat with a sigh, feeling slightly miserable. "Of course—unlike the rest of you miserable lowlifes, I've been married for quite some time."

"To a heavenly official?!"

"That's right," Xie Lian agrees, solemnly.

"Which one?!"

"Well…" He sniffs, picking at his nails a little more aggressively. "Beautiful. A real princess. Not to mention intelligent, kind, and hardworking."

He rattles off every word he can recall Hua Cheng saying about his 'beloved,' treasured person, but…

His voice sounds slightly irritated , rather than affectionate.

He's startled when a hand wraps around his own, forcing him to stop picking at his fingers until they bleed.

"That's enough," Hua Cheng's voice is gentle, but—

Xie Lian sighs, his brow creased.

"I told you to stay inside, San Lang."

The calamity hangs his head, seeming fearful that Xie Lian will act on his threat from before—even more pitiful now, when his form is small enough to be that of an eleven year old.

"…Wait, I know who the wife is!"

One of the cultivators cries out, gasping with realization. "I heard the rumors in my temple the other day!"

"What?!"

"There's a god Crimson Rain has been traveling with very frequently recently—"

Oh.

"—A god?! But then how would they have a—?!"

"A god who was seen in a female form in Ghost City! I heard it from someone in the Yu clan myself!"

Oh no .

"What was someone like that doing in Ghost City?!"

"I don't know, but I'm telling you, it's the crown pri—!"

"ENOUGH!" A voice rings out, resounding.

Xie Lian pauses, confused, just as Hua Cheng grasps the hem of his robes, pressing his face into Xie Lian's side with an annoyed groan.

"Anyone but him…"

What? Is it a foe that even Hua Cheng is weary of? But—?

The moment he speaks, however, Xie Lian understands.

"I, the greatest among our temple, with my HEAVEN'S EYE, can settle this!" The Cultivator booms. A tall, slightly rounded man, with a shockingly majestic beard, points his finger at Xie Lian. "That man is NO GHOST KING! He barely has ANY essence of evil!"

His voice is exuberant to the point of being grating.

"Then who—?"

"BUT!" The cultivator strokes his beard, turning to face his comrades with a dramatic flair. “He does have MORE essence of evil than a mortal should! He’s clearly been…fraternizing…”

Xie Lian can’t feel all of the blood in his body rushing into his face, all at once.

“Fraternizing?!”

“Well, it’s all over his mouth!”

Beside him, Hua Cheng goes rather still.

“And his—!”

“DOES IT REALLY MATTER?!” Xie Lian speaks over both of them, feeling rather frantic.

Before they can say or do anything else, however, Xie Lian noticing something…decisively concerning.

Ruoye has returned, wrapping itself back around his throat.

But if Ruoye is here, then he isn’t…

Quan Yizhen sits up, finally coming to, and…

He stares, stunned.

“…Wow.”

Standing before him—not in a soaked, bloody robe, but rather gleaming, impressive armor—

Is Ling Wen.

Looking far more imposing in this moment than any martial god.

“…Ling Wen,” Xie Lian mutters, turning his head. “You aren’t planning on breaking your word, are you?”

“That’s right,” Ling Wen replies calmly. “I’m breaking my word.”

“You—!”

“I’m a liar.” The civil god shrugs. “Not to mention a thief. And a hypocrite. I’ve always been all of these things, and I’ve always been a terrible friend. And this…”

He stares at the disappointment in Xie Lian's expression, hardening his heart to it. "This isn't even close to the worst thing I've done to a friend."

The prince knows, listening to Ling Wen, that he should be hurt. He should be angry with him. And yet…

He feels…sorry for him

Because it's been a while since he heard someone sound so completely miserable.

"So," Ling Wen shrugs, turning to face the opposite wall. "I suppose this is where we part ways, your highness."

"Ling Wen…" Xie Lian takes a step forward. "What are you going to —?"

BOOM!

The blow is so forceful, so stunning, that Quan Yizhen's eyes sparkle, impressed. Even Xie Lian, who can't actually see it, feels a little awestruck, until…

He realizes he heard nothing like the wall shattering, or anything of the sort.

Ling Wen stumbles back, shocked, shaking out his fist, and Xie Lian…

"…Balsa Wood…" he mutters under his breath, eyes widening.

"What?!"

And Xie Lian can't help but let out a surprised, happy laugh.

"The walls aren't made from balsa wood anymore—they're OAK!"

"What's balsa—?!" Ling Wen starts, irritated, only to cut himself off with a growl.

Xie Lian is a little surprised that the walls were able to withstand that kind of blow, but, then again—

The wood was created by a forest demon, so it's bound to have abnormal qualities.

"You know what—fine," Ling Wen mutters, and Xie Lian can't see what he's doing, only hears the sudden rush of movement, and feels Hua Cheng's hand snatch his wrist as he suddenly yanks him away from the doorway.

"San—?"

CRASH!

Something large and heavy is thrown through the door, tumbling down the steps—and after a moment, Xie Lian realizes what it is.

"...QI YING?!"

Quan Yizhen groans, mildly concussed as he sits up, hair all over. "I'm okay!"

Honestly, it woke him up more than anything.

Xie Lian grimaces, a little more bothered than he should be about the door, only for Hua Cheng to notice, placing a hand on his shoulder.

"I'll make you another one, later."

(In turn, that comforts him more than it should.)

And of course, Ling Wen has taken the chance to bolt.

“…Qi Ying, can you move?” When the martial god nods in affirmative, Xie Lian points in the direction where Ling Wen just took off. “Go after Ling Wen—you can’t lose him, understand?!”

He nods, rumbling to his feet with the force of an angry bear.

Once he takes off after him, Xie Lian blows out an exasperated breath, turning back to the others.

“Well, as you can see, we’ve got a lot going on around here at the moment, so if you don’t mind—!”

“As a matter of fact, I do mind!”

The one who was screaming about Xie Lian having the “essence of evil” in…areas before, the one with ‘Heaven’s Eye,’ warbles on, beard trembling as he speaks.

“It is a grave thing to lie about a calamity young man, GRAVE!”

Xie Lian is older than nearly all of them combined, but—

“The rumors were TRUE!” The cultivator, whom Xie Lian has just chosen to dub as ‘Heaven’s Eye,’ in his mind, points at Hua Cheng, eyes wide, beard blowing magnificently in the breeze. “He’s taken the form of a child!”

“Well,” Xie Lian takes a step in front of him, “Let’s not be hasty—”

“I see the essence of evil ALL OVER HIM! He is EMANATING IT! That’s probably how it—!”

“San Lang,” Xie Lian mumbles out of the corner of his mouth, his voice low.

“…Yes, gege?”

“I think they’re hungry.”

He says this, but his voice sounds more pointed than hospitable. “Why don’t you feed them the leftovers?”

Xie Lian would do it himself—but with so many targets around, he doesn’t trust his ability to aim based on sound alone.

Hua Cheng stares up at him for a moment, then a slow smile spreads across his face as he turns on his heel, hurrying inside.

“Certainly, gege.”

“Where is he—?”

“He’ll be back in just a moment,” Xie Lian calms the crowd, holding up his hands.

“But before it comes to violence, I suggest you all take your leave. I would really rather avoid having to harm any of you.”

(Truly, with how many of them there are, Xie Lian would have to deal with them in a serious manner—in which case, he might accidentally hurt someone.)

But his words of caution don’t seem to land on Heaven’s Eye quite the way he had hoped.

“I—!” His beard trembles with rage. “A youngster like you DARES to threaten me?! Just what temple do you train under?! Who is your master?! What god do you pray to?! It’s UNACCEPTABLE!”

“Look, daozhang,” Xie Lian shakes his head, not wanting to be rude, but feeling his patience for the situation reaching its limits. “You—”

“A cultivator, defending a devil like HUA CHENGZHU?! It’s DISGRACEFUL! And for what?! You couldn’t even call him a PERSON!”

Xie Lian’s eyebrow twitches as the door to the shrine opens once again, Hua Cheng stepping out with the stew pot in tow. Scaldingly hot, but he easily carries it with his bare hands.

“WHAT KIND OF CULTIVATOR DO YOU THINK YOU ARE, DEFENDING THAT BEAST—?!”

Xie Lian has heard Hua Cheng listen to many insults, but he only ever seems to react…

…When criticism of him is used to smear Xie Lian.

And now, beside him, he senses the Ghost King shrink—however subtle the movement might be.

“IT’S AN ABSOLUTE—!”

BAM!

Before he can finish screaming his insults, 'Heaven's Eye' is sent flying back so quickly, his disciples can't even catch him, not until he slams into a tree a few yards away.

Xie Lian shakes out his fist, a dark pallor shifting over his expression.

"You ask who I am?"

The group of cultivators all whip around to look at him, a seemingly blind, helpless priest.

"LISTEN WELL! I AM HIS HIGHNESS THE CROWN PRINCE!"

But when he speaks now, his voice thunders over the entire valley, roaring like a tempest.

"YOU RIOTOUS RASCALS, BOW DOWN BEFORE ME!"

A few of the cultivators actually do drop down to their knees, not even realizing what they've done until their companions pull them up.

"What are you doing?!"

"I-I didn't even realize..."

"I AM OLDER THAN ALL OF YOU COMBINED. I HAVE CROSSED MORE BRIDGES THAN ALL OF THE ROADS YOU HAVE WALKED."

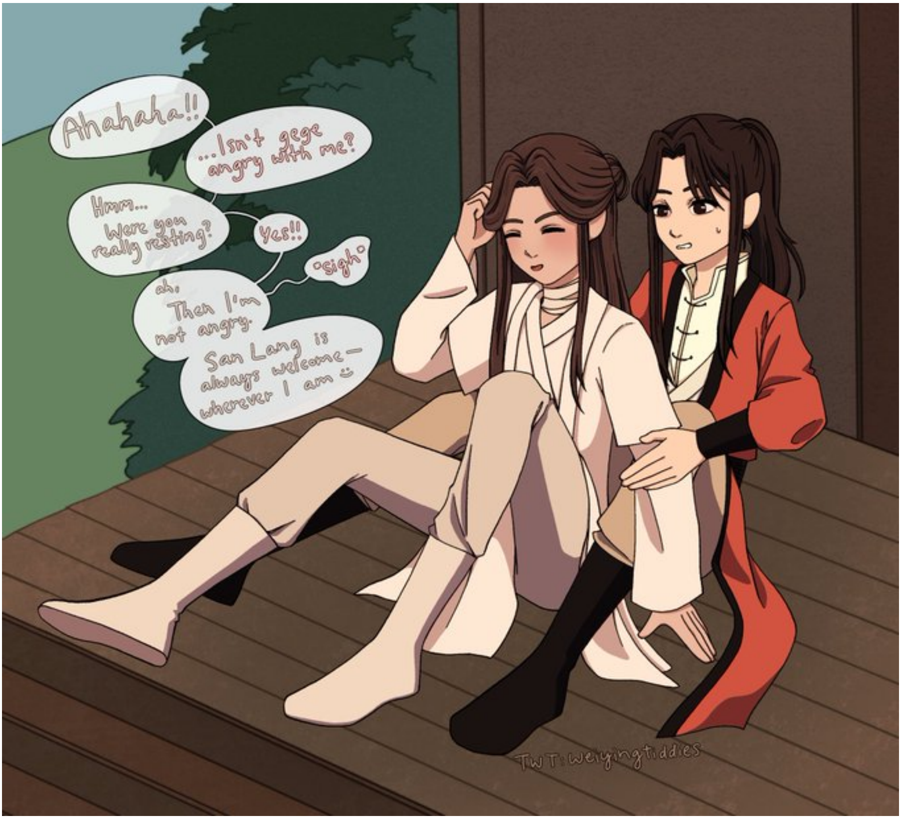
His voice has a ringing, echoing quality to it, as though he speaks with a hundred voices, rather than just the one.

"I DO NOT WORSHIP GODS!"

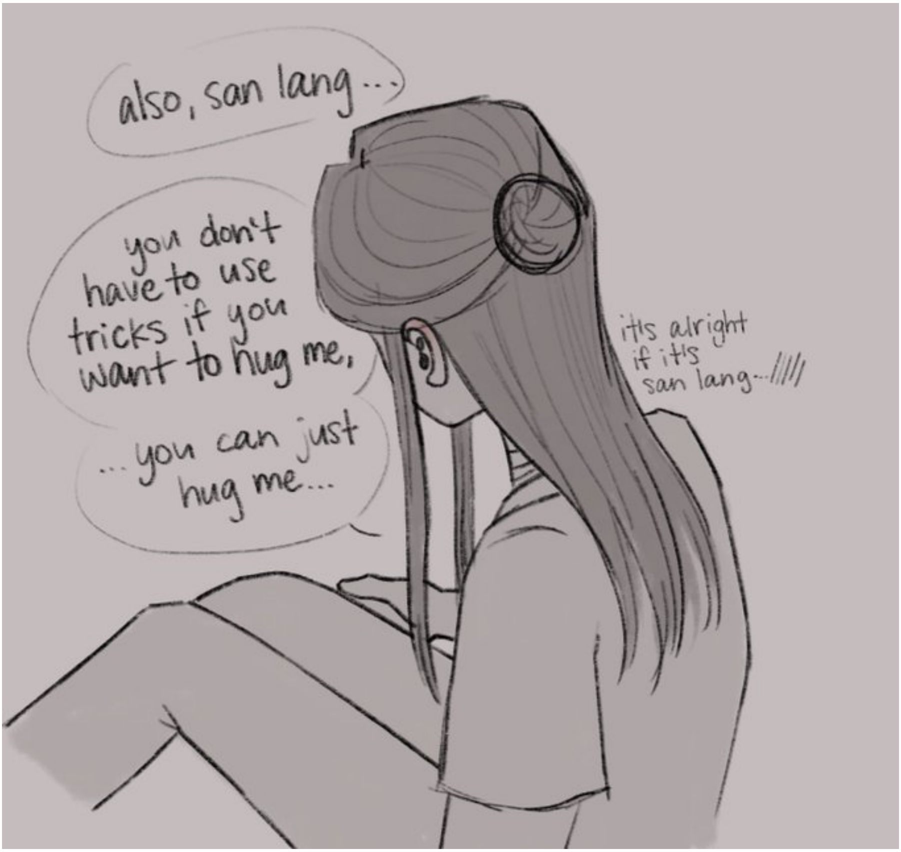
"I AM GOD!"

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or reuse without permission, included with permission from the artists.



Ahahaha!!
...Isn't gege angry with me?
Hmm... Were you really resting?
Yes!!
sigh
ah, Then I'm not angry.
San Lang is always welcome— wherever I am ☺
TWT: weiyingtiddies



also, san lang...
you don't have to use tricks if you want to hug me,
...you can just hug me...
it's alright if it's san lang...////

CREDIT: ASH

Do Not Repost
@olivieira__

CREDIT: OLIVIEIRA

Chapter End Notes

> Thank you to ash and olivieira for their beautiful artwork, and allowing me to share it!
>
> xoxo, Evie

Don't Ask Me

Chapter Summary

> "That was a pretty good impression of me by the way, gege."
>
> "..." Xie Lian stops, going red all the way from the back of his neck, to the tips of his ears. "San Lang, could you just...forget all of that?"
>
> "No," Hua Cheng rarely denies him, but now he does so eagerly, mimicking the sage tone Xie Lian used before, when he caught him pretending to be Lang Ying. "I'm gonna remember this forever."

The crowd falls completely silent listening to his speech, which would have sounded utterly ridiculous coming from anyone else, but somehow...

The delivery seems so...believable?

Their jaws drop in unison, gawking.

"...HUH???"

Of course, this was the moment he was waiting for.

"San Lang?"

It takes the ghost king a moment to reply, and when he does—his voice sounds even younger, slightly breathless.

"...Huh?"

Xie Lian pauses, blinking slowly. "...I think they're ready for their leftovers."

He can't see their expressions, but he'd be shocked if they weren't all gaping by now–that's why he said all of those ridiculous things.

Startling out of his daze, the ghost king leaps into action.

This form is limiting to some extent, but his hands still move so fast, they nearly blur as he uses his chopsticks to lift the leftover "meatballs" from the pot, hurling them with deadly accuracy into the waiting mouths of the crowd around them.

At first, they don't even realize what's hit them, but when they do—all of the cultivators around them drop like flies, landing on the ground with heavy thuds, clutching their mouths.

"WHAT IS THE MEANING OF THIS?!"

"WE'VE BEEN HAD!"

"They're the LEGENDARY INCORRUPTIBLE CHASTITY PELLETS!" Xie Lian declared. "Extremely poisonous! If you don't ingest eighty two cups of water in the next twenty four hours, they'll explode in your stomachs!"

"OI! IS IT REALLY THAT DANGEROUS?!"

"YOU'RE KIDDING!"

Luckily for Xie Lian, they look and taste just about as poisonous as what he's claiming.

"...By the way, will everyone please discount everything I just said? I'm actually just a local weaver!"

"You SNEAKY LITTLE—!"

"WE HAVE TO FIND SOME WATER!"

Xie Lian presses a hand to his chest, feeling nothing but relief, until one of them cries—

"Don't worry, REINFORCEMENTS WILL BE HERE BEFORE LONG!"

To which the prince's face promptly falls.

...There's even more of them?!

"...San Lang, we should go—hold onto me, okay?"

Hua Cheng hesitates, but doesn't have the chance to say much more until he's scooped up into the prince's arms—and Xie Lian is so surprised by his size, he has to pause.

Before, he was the size of a boy in his early teenage years, but now...

He's small enough to easily rest on Xie Lian's hip, arms locked firmly around the prince's neck—in a way that feels undeniably familiar, but...

Why on earth has he ended up like this?

Still, Xie Lian has no time to contemplate that, taking off.

Hua Cheng frowns up at him, glancing down at the road ahead—and in spite of everything that Xie Lian has endured over the last eight centuries, and his clear capability—

The Ghost King seems terribly vexed by the idea that he might trip over something.

"Gege, I can walk, let me help!"

"Don't worry," Xie Lian smiles, patting his back. "I won't drop you–and even if I trip over something, Ruoye can help."

That doesn't seem to ease any of the tension from the calamity's form, so Xie Lian adds—

"But if San Lang wants to be useful, he can keep an eye out for me and let me know if something is coming, okay?"

"..." The ghost king nods, grunting quietly in agreement.

With him mollified, Xie Lian runs as far and as fast as he can, using his free hand to touch his temple, activating the communication array.

'Ling Wen, something's happened—!'

Of course, it's a reflex, but the moment he realizes what he's done, he grows pale.

'...I know.'

'...'

Xie Lian doesn't know whether to laugh, or cry.

'...So sorry to bother you,' He mumbles quickly, cutting off the private array with her, before opening the general array within the heavens.

'EVERYONE, LISTEN! LING WEN HAS STOLEN THE BROCADE IMMORTAL AND FLED!'

But when Xie Lian tries to call out within the General Communication Array...even speaking as loudly as he can...

There's chaos all around.

'WE'RE BEING OVERRUN!'

'WHERE'S MING GUANG?!'

'THE EMPEROR SENT HIM WEST!'

'WEST?! SOMETHING JUST RIPPED THROUGH THE ENTIRE BLOCKADE!'

But more than any of that, one voice strikes him with an emotion he wasn't expecting to feel;

Fear.

'MU QING! WHY AREN'T YOU—?'

Feng Xin's voice.

'HAS ANYONE SEEN XUAN ZHEN?!'

Filled with panic.

'Feng Xin!'

'Your...your highness? Did you say something before?'

'It doesn't matter,' Xie Lian answers quickly. 'What's happened with Mu Qing? Is he alright?'

'He...ah...I've lost track of him,' Feng Xin replies slowly, having to raise his voice to be heard over the chaos. 'I'm working on it. Are you safe?'

'Um...yes.'

...dianxia...'

'I'm really alright!' Xie Lian assures him. 'I've got San Lang with me.'

Even if the ghost king wasn't reduced to his current state, that wouldn't bring the general any comfort.

'...Look,' he can practically hear the frown in Feng Xin's voice. 'Things are getting out of hand—everywhere. If you're finished with your assignment, you should return to the heavens immediately.'

Xie Lian shakes his head. 'I can't do that—I have business to attend to down here. And—what do you mean, you lost track of Mu Qing?'

'It's—it's all fine, your highness, I'll explain it to you later,' Feng Xin replies quickly. 'I'll find him. Where are you going, anyway?'

'Well...' Xie Lian trails off, unsure. He took off running away from the village without much of a plan other than getting Hua Cheng away.

When his pace becomes slightly more uncertain, reaching where he knows a fork in the road should be—Hua Cheng tugs at his sleeve, his voice ringing with certainty.

"Left, gege."

Xie Lian obeys first, and asks after. "Why left?"

"We need to keep moving towards the West."

...West?

"Are you sure?" Xie Lian questions, hugging one arm firmly around Hua Cheng's back as he heads in that direction. "Isn't that towards Mount Tonglu? Will that make things harder for you—?"

"I'll be fine, gege," the ghost king assures him. "Do you trust me?"

"Always."

He didn't mean to say it like that, the words came out without much thought--but it's hard to feel that sheepish when Hua Cheng is...well...

Like this.

Hua Cheng stares up at him for a moment, then replies;

"We have an advantage if we go West."

...An advantage?

'...Feng Xin, before I answer, I want you to promise me something.'

'...What is it? Is something wrong? Did he do something to you—?'

'San Lang wouldn't do anything like that,' Xie Lian cuts him off firmly.

'But he's in a weakened state right now. If I tell you where we're going—you swear you won't let the other martial gods know?'

'...'

The silence is deafening, and Xie Lian's jaw locks stubbornly.

'I'll get myself banished again if you do.'

'Dianxia—!'

'I'm being serious.'

Feng Xin sounds utterly torn, and Xie Lian can practically hear him grinding his teeth with frustration. 'Your highness, you're asking me to...'

'I'm sorry, but I can't compromise on this, Feng Xin.'

'...Fine.'

'You swear?'

'You have my word, your highness.'

It sounds like he has to spit the words out between his teeth—but that's enough for Xie Lian.

'We're going West.'

'W—?! HAVE YOU LOST YOUR MIND?! DID YOU NOT JUST HEAR WHAT EVERYONE WAS SAYING?!'

His voice is so loud in the array, Xie Lian actually winces.

It wouldn't bother him normally. But for some reason now, his head...

'There is a GAPING hole in the Western Blockade. Jun Wu assigned FOUR martial gods to the region while Qi Ying was with you, and something RIPPED RIGHT THROUGH IT!'

'I did hear that,' Xie Lian acknowledges.

'AND YOU'RE GOING ANYWAY?!'

'San Lang said we have an advantage in that direction,' Xie Lian pauses, thinking. 'Whatever tore through the blockade might not be on our side, but it may be on his.'

'So, a Ghost King tells you to charge straight into danger and you just GO?!'

'Yes,' Xie Lian replies immediately.

'...WHY?!'

'San Lang has never given me a reason not to trust him.' Xie Lian explains calmly. 'I would do the same thing if it were you telling me to go.'

He means that as a compliment, but it doesn't seem to bring Feng Xin much comfort.

'...I'll be fine,' Xie Lian assures him again. 'You focus on figuring out where Mu Qing is. We can all talk more after that, okay?'

'...Alright,' Feng Xin agrees—sounding horribly reluctant, but he doesn't exactly have a choice. 'But if you need help...'

'I'll ask for it.'

Feng Xin sighs—clearly not convinced, or even a little bit comforted by Xie Lian's reply, but...

He does need to find Mu Qing.

'Fine. I'll be checking in. If you don't answer—'

'I understand, Feng Xin—don't worry!'

(Xie Lian says it, knowing that's exactly what he'll do.)

They cut off communication shortly after that, and Xie Lian isn't sure how long they've been running by the time he stops—but it must have been miles.

He sets Hua Cheng down carefully, bending over to catch his breath.

"Dianxia..."

Xie Lian winces, shaking his head.

"Don't worry, San Lang—it's just been a little while since I ran that much, and..." He rubs at his ear, fighting the urge to wince again. "I don't know what's..."

"What's what?" The ghost king frowns, stepping closer as he looks up at him with concern.

"...I'm sure it's not San Lang's fault, it's probably something wrong with me, but..." Xie Lian rubs a hand against his temple. "Ever since your body got like this, for some reason, your voice sounds..."

Warped. Sharp in his ears. Xie Lian doesn't understand why, but...

"..." Hua Cheng's lips turn down into a sharp frown, and his expression darkens, but his eyes...

The pain in them is so sharp, if Xie Lian could see it—he probably wouldn't be able to see it.

"...Is this better, gege?"

Xie Lian stops, lifting his head.

"...Yes," he agrees, frowning just as much as Hua Cheng is, thoughts straining with confusion. "But you don't sound like you."

Before, even if listening to him brought an unnatural form of discomfort—if he listened through that, he still sounded like Hua Cheng. And...something...familiar.

Hua Cheng tugs at his sleeve, guiding him to sit on a log from a fallen tree. "Rest here for a minute," he murmurs. "They aren't anywhere near us."

He sounds oddly...forlorn, so the prince agrees without protest.

"I'll be right back."

Xie Lian looks around in the direction of the sound of his retreating footsteps, his worries piqued. "San Lang, you shouldn't wander when you're like this—"

"I'm not going far, gege—don't worry."

Xie Lian folds his arms, listening closely.

To Hua Cheng's credit, he doesn't go very far at all—just down the hill off the side of the road, rummaging around in the trees and the leaves for a moment, and Xie Lian can't understand what for until he returns, dropping something in his hand.

An...orange?

"There's a grove at the bottom of the hill," Hua Cheng explains quietly, sitting on the log beside him, picking at the peel of one in his hand.

He grabbed a small pile for Xie Lian, but knows the prince would make a fuss if he didn't take one for himself.

"...Thank you, San Lang," Xie Lian smiles gratefully, feeling around for the rind, only to find that Hua Cheng has already peeled it for him.

Even now, his smile softens.

"But...how did you know there was a grove?"

Hua Cheng stares at the road ahead, eyes distant.

"I've been here before."

It's been so long, he was almost certain the grove would be gone, but...

Some things have a way of outlasting the touch of time, in spite of all odds.

"You have?"

"Mmm," he hums, chewing on a bite. "With my mother."

Xie Lian stops in the middle of chewing, his eyes widening. "...You mean Zhao Beitong?"

A soft, tired snort escapes the ghost king's lips.

"No. I mean my birth mother."

The prince has never heard Hua Cheng speak of her—not even once.

"She brought you here?"

"When we left Xuli," he agrees, fiddling with another piece between his fingertips, the juice leaving his skin slightly sticky. "We walked the entire way, so we'd stop and rest in places like this."

That almost sounds nice, but...

"Walked the entire way to...where?"

"..."

Hua Cheng's feet curl inward, heels digging against the side of the log as his body hunches over, hair obscuring his face.

"...San Lang—?"

"Please don't ask me."

Xie Lian stops, his mouth parted with shock.

Hua Cheng...

His voice is trembling, and it's so small .

"I hate lying," he whispers hoarsely, his eyes stinging. "So please don't ask me."

He can say anything to anyone without thinking of it. But—

Not him.

It hurts more, lying to him, than tasting blood, feeling his soul rip in protest when he tries to tell the truth.

"...Why would you have to lie?" Xie Lian reaches out, touching his shoulder—and that's when he feels that...

Hua Cheng is shaking.

Like something is physically hurting him.

And Xie Lian can really only think of two prior occasions when he's acted like this.

"...Can you tell me why you left Xuli?"

Xie Lian knows he shouldn't ask anymore. Normally, the moment he saw that Hua Cheng was upset by the questions, he would have stopped, but—

There's been a knot in his stomach, since he was pulled from the Bridal Sedan on Mount Yu Jun.

And every time something like this happens, it grows tighter. Constricting until he can barely stand it anymore.

"...There was a man who wanted to hurt her," Hua Cheng explains quietly, his voice even now, but muted. "She was trying to get away from him, I think."

Then, after a moment—he hangs his head.

"...But...there was something I didn't notice until recently," he admits, sounding somewhat sheepish. Which is better than the pain and distress from before—but unusual, coming from him.

"What is it?"

"...That golden belt that Lan Chang had..."

Xie Lian perks up with surprise, not having expected to hear about her, of all people.

"What about it?"

"...My mother had one like that," Hua Cheng mutters, staring down at his feet. "Not exactly like that, but it was definitely..."

She refused to sell it, too. No matter how bad things got.

He always had food to eat, even if she went without. He never went without a roof over his head, even if there wasn't room for her.

But that belt, which was apparently so valuable...

She kept it until her death.

"...You don't..." Xie Lian pauses, thinking it over. "You don't think...?"

"We shouldn't wait around for too long," Hua Cheng mutters, slipping off of the log. "Those pieces of trash were pretty determined."

Xie Lian sighs, disappointed to change the subject, but...

He sounds less miserable than he did before, so Xie Lian will take—

"That was a pretty good impression of me by the way, gege."

"..." Xie Lian stops, going red all the way from the back of his neck, to the tips of his ears. "San Lang, could you just...forget all of that?"

"No," Hua Cheng rarely denies him, but now he does so eagerly, mimicking the sage tone Xie Lian used before, when he caught him pretending to be Lang Ying. "I'm gonna remember this forever."

"San Lang!"

"Dianxia was so intimidating!"

"...You're so insincere!"

Now it's Hua Cheng's turn to laugh, high and childlike as they continue in the direction Hua Cheng set out for them. Not quite as fast as before, but at a pace where they should still keep ahead.

There's just one problem.

And it is a problem, even if Hua Cheng protests.

His clothes don't quite fit him properly—and even though he insists he could just use magic to fix it, Xie Lian refuses.

In this state, he shouldn't be wasting any of his energy when he doesn't have to.

"I'm sorry San Lang, I'd normally make something for you myself, but..."

Given that they're on the run, it really can't be helped.

"It's no problem..." Hua Cheng mutters, sounding mildly...bothered. "You shouldn't have to do this for me in the first place."

Xie Lian pauses in the middle of going through different robes at a stall, looking up.

"...I like being able to do this sort of thing for you, San Lang."

"Well, I don't," the ghost king mumbles, his hands balled up into fists. "Everyone else already asks too much of dianxia. I don't want to be another thing he has to worry about—"

"Hey, hey..."

Xie Lian reaches down, ruffling his fingers through the ghost king's hair.

“San Lang helps me all the time. Do you ever resent doing that?”

“No,” he answers immediately. “But that's different—!”

“I'm not so sure,” Xie Lian shakes his head. “And either way, I'm glad

I got to see you like this." The ghost king squirms when Xie Lian reaches out to pinch his cheek, but doesn't push him away. "It's cute!"

"…" Hus Cheng grumbles under his breath, looking away. "I didn't know dianxia enjoyed children so much."

Xie Lian laughs at that, shaking his head.

"You know, when I was younger, I was actually pretty terrible with them."

Hua Cheng lets out a disbelieving snort, and the prince protests.

"It's true! I always wanted to have my own children someday…but that was a distant someday."

When he speaks about it, his tone is warm, aching with nostalgia. "I think the closest I ever got was pretending Feng Xin and I were parents to a puppy together."

Hua Cheng can't help but scowl at the mention of the former guard, but it doesn't reach his voice.

"I've seen dianxia with children before—he's always been kind and attentive."

"Yes, I'm like that now," Xie Lian agrees. "But…" he laughs faintly, shaking his head. "I used to be such a brat San Lang, really—I'm almost glad you didn't know me back then."

If only he could see the utterly baffled expression on Hua Cheng's face, it's almost priceless.

"…You? A brat?"

"I was an only child—and a prince at that. Nearly everyone I had ever been around—it was their job to look after me." Xie Lian explains. "The only friend I had that was younger than me was Mu Qing—and his job was looking after me, too. I had no idea how to deal with children. For the most part, Qi Rong was my only experience, and he…" Xie Lian makes a face. "Gave me a bad impression."

That wasn't to say that he was universally bad with children. Xie Lian could do well in small doses, or if it was oriented around a task.

Like attending a festival with Mu Qing's sister for her birthday. Admittedly, she wasn't a small child—but Xie Lian was also playing a role.

Taizi Dianxia was kind, patient, and generous—so of course he would be selfless and gentle with children.

(Even if Xie Lian himself had been somewhat immature, he could pretend not to be.)

“Back then, there was really only one child that I genuinely enjoyed being around.”

Xie Lian pulls a set of robes from the stand, holding them up to Hua Cheng’s shoulders to compare sizes, reaching down to feel for the hem and make sure that it isn’t too long.

“Though I didn’t get to spend much time with him until he was older.”

Hua Cheng stares at the pained nostalgia in Xie Lian’s eyes, his heart aching in response.

“Which child?”

“I’ve told you about him before,” the prince murmurs, reaching for a set of boots. “The one who took care of me, after I…” Then he stops, a soft laugh escaping him. “But that shows how selfish I was back then, doesn’t it? He was just a child, and he was the one always looking after me…”

His Hong’er never did anything less.

Hua Cheng watches him silently, his expression…complicated.

Xie Lian, unaware, adds something very offhandedly;

“Actually, it was spending so much time around him that made me wish I could have a family of my own one day. I gave up on that when I was a child, but he…” The prince shrugs. “He made me reconsider many things.”

And of course—Hua Cheng’s expression turns into a scowl, because he interprets the words in a very different way than how Xie Lian means them.

That Hong’er was such a kind, dutiful child; it made Xie Lian want one just like him.

(Which isn't what the god meant—not at all.)

"…Then why haven't you?"

Xie Lian looks up in the middle of comparing boots, feeling each set with his hands. "What do you mean?"

"In the last eight hundred years…" Hua Cheng trails off, fighting to keep any emotion out of his voice other than curiosity.

To his surprise, Xie Lian laughs.

"I haven't exactly had a stable environment to offer," the god reminds him, chuckling.

Really, when you can't go more than a year without whatever dwelling you're living in collapsing—that's no place for a child.

"And even if that wasn't the case, there was never anyone to have them…with," Xie Lian concludes.

Before, he always assumed his attraction to men had closed that door forever. Though now, after the things he's seen…

"Besides, there was really only ever one person I considered that sort of thing with," Xie Lian smiles anxiously, waving that off. "And never that seriously. Even if I had, it wouldn't be an option anymore."

He feels around in his pockets for change to pay for the robes, but…

Hua Cheng slaps a good foil down on the counter, with such a gravity and seriousness, all in the body of a small child, that it makes the prince cover his mouth to hide his laughter.

And while Hua Cheng changes into the new clothes in a booth behind the stall, he adds;

"Besides, I've gotten to help children like Banyue, that was more than I thought I'd ever get to have—and it's plenty for me."

When Hua Cheng steps back out, he frowns, bending over to fiddle with something, and Xie Lian senses a flash of magic.

"San Lang, you shouldn't use your powers when you're—"

Clink, clink!

There's a soft jingle as silver bells and chains appear, settling around his boots—and Xie Lian can't help a fond smile.

He's always insistent on that detail, isn't he?

"But what if things were different?"

Xie Lian pauses, confused.

"What do you mean?"

"If your situation was different, and the person you wanted them with was…still an option," Hua Cheng mutters, watching Xie Lian's face, still wrangling his own emotions.

"Would that make you happy, gege?"

The prince is surprised by the question, but…

Hua Cheng was so earnest about asking, so he takes the question seriously.

"…No," he admits honestly. "I don't think I would want that anymore."

He hangs his head for a moment, taking a steadying breath.

"I don't think I could handle outliving my children."

Just watching the pain in Pei's eyes, mourning for a son that he never even knew…

Xie Lian knows he could survive that. He's lived through so much pain, but—

That's one that he doesn't want to put himself in the position to feel.

He already has enough grief to live with.

"…I understand, dianxia." Something about Hua Cheng's tone startles him.

The profound sorrow in his voice.

…Has he—?

"When you did think about having them, did you ever imagine details?”

“…Details?”

“How many, boys or girls,” Hua Cheng explains, fiddling with his sleeve. “That sort of thing.”

“Oh.” Xie Lian blinks, thinking. “Well, you can’t control whether you have sons or daughters, I think I would be happy with either.”

But he always imagined himself with both, in all honesty.

“And…three.”

Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow.

“Gege sounds very firm about that detail.”

“Well,” Xie Lian’s face feels a little warm, even if he has no idea why. “I wished I had siblings growing up. And I’ve always thought…”

“Thought what?”

“Good things come in threes,” Xie Lian mumbles, feeling silly and superstitious.

And now, wanting to push the attention off of himself, he asks;

“What about you, San Lang?”

“Me?”

“You have someone that’s precious to you,” Xie Lian explains. “Have you ever thought about that sort of thing with them?”

“…No,” the ghost king answers honestly. “I’ve never thought much past…”

The daunting task of his affections being known; and the far more impossible chance that they would be returned.

“…But if they wanted them, then so would I. I just…”

He trails off, hesitant—and for once, Xie Lian feels keenly aware of what he’s thinking.

‘Have you ever loved something so much, there wasn’t room in your heart for anything else?'

"San Lang…" Xie Lian reaches over, finding Hua Cheng's hand and squeezing it tightly. "You'd be good at it."

When the ghost king doesn't respond; he gently adds—

"You already are."

Hua Cheng's brow furrows, and maybe he knows what Xie Lian is talking about, but he doesn't seem willing to acknowledge it—

"Dianxia?"

"Yes?"

The question he asks isn't one that surprises him—not at first.

"The person you imagined doing that sort of thing with…"

In fact, Xie Lian was bracing himself for it, his stomach lurching with anxiety, but—

"…Was it General Nan Yang?"

The prince chokes, nearly falling over.

"I—what?!" Xie Lian gasps, his mind reeling. "What would make you think—?"

Because of what Xie Lian said about the puppy?! But that was when he was eight years old! He—!

"You're sure you saw it over here?"

The sound of a vaguely familiar voice makes them both stop, tense.

"Of COURSE I did!" Another booms in response, and Hua Cheng scowls.

He can practically feel that beard's presence a mile away, like a bad omen.

"My Heaven's Eye can track an evil spirit for HUNDREDS of miles!"

Xie Lian bites back a swear.

They caught up already?!

"…" he straightens up quickly, reaching over to snatch up another item of clothing, "We'll be taking this, too!"

The shopkeeper doesn't protest—that gold foil was more than enough payment, but—

Hua Cheng barely has enough time to priest before he's snatched up.

The two disappear into the changing stall just as Heaven's Eye approaches, flanked by two other cultivators.

"I'm telling you, the trail of the essence of evil leads here!"

"Sirs," the shopkeeper warns them, holding up a hand as they approach the stall. "There's already someone—!"

Heaven's Eye pays him no mind; yanking the curtain back—and…

What greets him is the side of a pale, smooth shoulder, a dress slipping down just so as a young woman tries it on, only to yank it back up with a scandalized shriek when she hears the curtain open.

Heaven's Eye lets out a choked sound of apology, scrambling backwards.

"I—I'm so sorry miss, we didn't realize—!"

CRACK!

The slap that rings across his face is so forceful, his beard nearly whips all the way around his neck.

"PERVERTS! SOMEONE, HELP!"

Hearing the cry, several of the men from the village rush over, tangling the three cultivators in a mess, struggling to explain themselves.

"We weren't—!"

"We were only trying to—!"

"There's a—!"

Xie Lian takes the chance to take off again, H—

Hua Cheng clutched in his arms.

The stall owner throws his hands up in dismay, struggling to stop the displays from being knocked over in the tussle.

“WHAT IS WRONG WITH YOU PEOPLE?!”

Xie Lian glances back over his shoulder, apologetic.

“EVERYTHING IS WRONG, I’M SORRY!”

He holds Hua Cheng with one arm, lifting his skirts with the other as he charges ahead, leaving the others behind in a cloud of dust.

One of the cultivators is punched so hard, he sends the entire display of dresses crashing down, and the shopkeeper cries out in anger.

“WHY THE FUCK DO I EVEN BOTHER?!”

The sounds of his rage fade, as well as that of the brawl as Xie Lian charges away from the village—even farther and further than he did that last time, persistently heading west under Hua Cheng’s direction.

When he eventually does stop, he’s even more breathless than he was before, setting Hua Cheng down as he clutches his ribs, steadying himself.

The ghost king grasps his shoulders, vexed. “Your highness, breathe slower, you’ll hurt yourself.”

“…” Xie Lian bites back a laugh.

Even in this form, he still speaks so seriously.

“I’m alright, San Lang, I just forget this body has its limits at times,” he explains, shaking his head.

But even the prince knows that he needs rest, and at this rate he’ll worry San Lang sick

“…Why don’t we stop to rest? Is there a—?”

“There’s an inn just ahead,” Hua Cheng confirms.

“Let’s stop there, then,” Xie Lian mutters, his voice still a little weak and labored.

“…Alright,” Hua Cheng agrees. “We shouldn’t have to wait long.”

Rather than explain what he means, he tugs Xie Lian along.

When they step inside—it's oddly quiet, despite being the time of day that guests should be arriving.

"Excuse me?" Xie Lian calls out, holding Hua Cheng's hand. "We'd like to book a room for the night."

"Ah! A guest!" A few employees come out from the back eagerly.

"Welcome miss—!" They start, adjusting when they see the newcomer has a child with them.

Can't be an unmarried woman, then.

"Mada…!" They begin again in perfect unison, but when they see Xie Lian's face, which, while lovely, is clearly that of a man's, they…

"…Sir?"

The prince smiles pleasantly. "Hello, could we get a room for the night?"

"I…" the attendants stop, looking at each other. "Yes!"

"Of course!"

He sighs with relief, happy to be led to a table. "I really wasn't expecting to find a place to stay, so far out here…"

"And we rarely find guests out here!" The attendant agrees eagerly, handing them both menus. "A pleasant surprise for both of us!"

"Yes…" Xie Lian agrees cheerfully as they walk away, and when they do, Hua Cheng speaks up next to his ear.

"Gege…it would seem that we've stumbled upon a corrupt establishment run by ghosts."

Xie Lian hides his face behind his menu, feeling mildly ridiculous.

(After all, he can't even read it.)

"Yes, I've noticed…"

The average mortal wouldn't—but the stench of blood is powerful.

And even if not for that—the entire place is covered in a dark, pungent aura.

Death, it seems, is common here.

It's too bad, though—because Xie Lian actually was rather hungry.

"…Excuse me," he sets his menu down, speaking to one of the attendants.

"We're going to go on up to our room. Could you bring our food to us there?"

"Certainly, young master! Certainly!"

Their manners are a little overwater and clumsy, though Xie Lian supposes that is to be expected.

"And if anyone comes around asking for someone matching our descriptions…tell them you didn't see us?"

"Ah, but of course!"

"Completely discreet, sir!"

Xie Lian huffs out a sigh of relief, reaching for Hua Cheng's hand as they head upstairs.

This isn't his first time in an establishment like this, and while Xie Lian assumes they'll be following standard corrupt hotel practices—

(Poisoning, robbing them, and consuming their flesh.)

—The accommodations are surprisingly comfortable.

Xie Lian flops down tiredly, the mattress soft under his back.

"You can sleep for a little while, gege. I'll wake you if anything happens."

"Mmm…" Xie Lian hums, closing his eyes—smiling when he feels Hua Cheng place something in his hand.

Another orange.

"Thank you, San Lang." He raises a slice to his mouth, taking a bite.

He was such a picky eater when he was young—but he always loved oranges.

“…Were you and your mother close?”

Hua Cheng sits on the side of the bed.

“…I don’t know. She was my only relative.”

No grandparents, aunts, uncles, or cousins.

“…My mother was my favorite person in the world when I was little,” Xie Lian recalls with a soft smile. “And your father?”

Hua Cheng’s snort is surprisingly bitter.

“I was always curious—but he was long gone by the time I was born.”

He can still remember everything his mother said.

That his father was a soldier, and that they had loved each other.

And when Hua Cheng asked him where he was, she would always say that he still had a war to fight.

She hadn’t wanted Hong’er near any of it.

That’s hard, sometimes.

Knowing how she would have felt, if she had known that Hong’er became a soldier anyway.

“…But you think he was the one who gave her that golden belt, don’t you?”

Hua Cheng is silent, but…

Ever since that day, he’s felt more and more certain of it.

“Whatever happened to it, by the way?”

If he still has it, then maybe, when all of this is over, he could take a look at it and figure out…

“It stayed with her, when she died.” Hua Cheng explains quietly. “I didn’t take it.”

The belt was so important to her, it…

It felt wrong, even if Hong'er had known back then that it was worth some money. It was more likely someone would have just stolen it from him anyway if he had tried to sell it, he was such a scrawny kid.

Xie Lian wants to ask more.

He wants to ask where his mother is buried. What she looked like. Her name. He knows if he did, Hua Cheng would try to answer him.

Try being the operative word.

'Please don't ask me.'

Hua Cheng's shoulders are slightly hunched, hands gripping the edge of the bed tightly.

'I hate lying. So please don't ask me.'

Xie Lian frowns, turning his cheek against the pillow.

He doesn't have to ask him right now. It's not as though they don't have plenty of time. And Xie Lian…

He's exhausted.

But as he lays down, the pillow pressing against his cheek, eyelids growing heavy—one question is on his mind. Half formed, even as he drifts off.

"And why would you think…Feng Xin and I would…"

Hua Cheng watches the prince sleep, his expression smoothing out.

"…" The ghost king reaches out, carefully pushing a few locks of hair from his face.

'Because you wanted him, back then.'

He saw.

That day.

Sometimes, it's easier to forget—especially when they're together, and everything else seems so far away.

It's easy to forget now, during moments like this.

In this body, it almost feels like being in one of the Crown Prince's temples again. Taking shelter from the rain. Always looking up at that heart stoppingly beautiful face, carved from stone.

Never daring to want anything.

Now that face is closer than ever. Living. Breathing. Not a dream, but the real thing.

And he can only think of one time when those eyes looked at him the way that he always wanted.

One time when that selfish, aching hunger felt even a little bit sated.

On Mount Tonglu.

When 'Xie Lian' saw Hua Cheng's hallucination of him with Feng Xin, and said—

'That's you.'

'Not me.'

It wasn't real.

He knows that. It was only an illusion—however kindly Zhao Beitong might have intended it. A sweet dream to lull him to sleep so that he could be devoured.

'I always would have been yours.'

He can't even blame her for it. He did the same to her later, leaving her in a garden with Mei Nianqing, and her sons.

And it somehow seems more meaningful, that she had Xie Lian—an echo of him—tell Hua Cheng that back then.

'I know that you are not mine...'

Because that was what the man she loved said to her. The most honest expression of affection that she could think of.

'But I have always been yours.'

Hua Cheng's fingers linger on Xie Lian's cheek, even with his hair already pushed back.

He's far away in sleep. The ghost king knows.

For many nights, before the prince knew he was there, Hong'er would wait until he was deep in sleep before leaving food, or blankets—never daring to wake him.

"...I know you've never loved me," he admits quietly, infuriated by the smaller size of his hand. The youth in his voice.

"Not in the way that I love you."

Forcibly reminded of how weak he once was.

How inadequate.

He pulls his hand back, looking away.

"This lowly one is weak sometimes, forgive me."

Still.

'What about you?'

His hands are balled up tightly in his lap—and they tremble.

Remembering how Xie Lian had asked Hua Cheng if he had thought about it.

Having that kind of future with the person he was in love with.

Hua Cheng told him the truth.

He's never dared think about the future in that much detail. Not when everything else seemed so impossible.

It still does now, and yet...

Just because he never dared, that doesn't mean he's never had...involuntary responses.

Like how, when he found out about Shi Qingxuan's condition...

A good man probably would have felt sympathy for her situation. Or maybe even remorse, given his decision not to intervene.

But he's a selfish man. He always has been.

And all Hua Cheng felt was...jealousy.

He didn't understand it back then. He still doesn't now, not really.

But now, when he closes his eyes and tries to imagine it...

Three, huh?

Would they look like him?

He reaches back behind him—finding Xie Lian's hand, stretched out loosely in front of him, squeezing gently.

Not that it matters. Because, out of a million other reasons, Xie Lian already said that he didn't want them anymore, but...

It couldn't hurt imagining, could it?

A Past that Haunts You

Chapter Summary

> "What?" A voice questions dryly. "You aren't gonna scream? Tell me to get the fuck out?"
>
> Xie Lian grows still, lips parted with shock.
>
> ...Mu Qing?

Chapter Notes

> ! CONTENT WARNING !
>
> This chapter contains heavy implications of past childhood sexual abuse. It is not explicitly said or depicted, but heavily implied. Please read with caution.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

A few hours later, Xie Lian is woken by a gentle shake of his shoulder.

“Gege?”

“San Lang…”

He sits up groggily, his hair slightly askew as he reaches out for him, letting out a small sigh when he feels the boy’s shoulder.

“What is it?”

Hua Cheng doesn’t have to answer before it becomes abundantly clear.

“BATHROOM!”

Voices ring out from downstairs loudly.

“BRING US SOME WATER, TOO!”

“Right away, kind sirs, right away!” The servants reply excitedly. “Could we interest you in a meal, as well?”

Xie Lian winces, listening as the cultivators heartily agree.

“Those chastity pellets were no joke!” One of them groans pitifully.

“Yes, but the cure is effective,” one of the others replies solemnly. “This monk has only had thirty seven cups of water, and he feels better already.”

(Xie Lian doesn’t know whether to laugh or cry.)

“How did they find us already?” He whispers, vexed by the ability behind that Heaven’s Eye.

How is he going to deal with that without being forced to harm the priest?

“Don’t worry, gege,” Hua Cheng drawls, kicking his feet lazily as he eavesdrops on the conversation below.

“Everything will be fine soon, we just have to wait.”

…Wait on what?

Now that they’ve ordered their food, the real conversations begin.

“So—why are all of you after Hua Chengzhu, anyway?”

Xie Lian had wondered the same thing—and now, each of them explains.

For one, it was that a local pig had turned into a wrathful spirit, slaughtering the family of a local butcher.

And when Hua Cheng gave the beast shelter in ghost city, he said—

‘If you slaughter the family of a pig, don’t cry for mercy when he does the same to you.’

Another has a story with similar details, but it was a rooster, rather than a pig.

For the man who cried pitifully over the chastity pellets, it was that his shixiong had been tricked and drained dry by a ghost concubine that Hua Cheng gave sanctuary in Ghost city as well, welcoming another wayward soul within its walls.

Xie Lian almost feels pity for the man in the story, until another monk questions it, adding that the cultivator in question had been known for harassing women.

Another had been raised in a once prominent sect, but…

The official they worshiped was one of the thirty three.

No matter how many temples they built, Hua Cheng burnt them down. They fell from power over the centuries—all because of the ghost king and his grudge.

“And what about you, esteemed senior?” One of them asks Heaven’s Eye. “How did Crimson Rain wrong you?”

Heaven’s Eye leans back in his seat, beard quivering with emotion.

“It’s hard sometimes for me to even talk about it, but…”

Hua Cheng rolls his eyes.

“We’ve been rivals since I was a teenager.”

Gasps echo through the room, and Xie Lian sits up straighter, curious.

“Rivals?!”

“In love, of course.”

…Xie Lian chokes.

It’s hard, imagining a monk like him as a lovestruck teenager, but it happens to everyone, doesn’t it?

But how could he have been rivals with Hua Cheng of all people?

“You fought him over a woman?”

“Our Senior is amazing!”

Hua Cheng glances toward Xie Lian, unable to let that one stand.

"It's a misunderstanding," the Ghost King mutters under his breath.

"But he sounds so certain," Xie Lian muses, fiddling with the ends of his hair. "It must be quite an interesting story."

Oh, and it is .

"It was a DARK AND STORMY NIGHT!" Heaven's Eye's voice booms through the inn, flaring with dramatics. "Just like this one!"

Xie Lian bites back a snort when one of the disciples whispers to the other.

"But...it's not storming?"

"Why did he dim the candles?"

(For effect, obviously.)

"I was but a new devotee in my temple, sweeping the floor in the worship hall—when I heard a knock at the door. And when I opened it, I..." He trails off, clutching his chest, his voice trembling. "She was the most beautiful girl I had ever seen, then, and now!"

Several of his fellow disciples gasp, impressed by their senior's steadfast affections.

It's true love!

It must be!

"With hair black as a raven's wing, and eyes that burned me like a flame!" He presses the back of his hand over his eyes. "In an instant, I was bewitched!"

Hua Cheng rolls his eyes even harder this time, looking vaguely disgusted.

"I allowed her to take shelter within my temple for the night, and over the weeks that followed—she was the most charming, intelligent person I had ever met. And her sense of humor, ah!" Heaven's Eye clutches both hands to his chest, still love struck as he remembers it. "I haven't laughed like that since I parted with her company!"

"But how did Hua Cheng become mixed into the matter?!"

"Ah...it was a tragedy, truly, that of star crossed lovers..." The senior cultivator sniffs, his eyes wet from the memory. "You see, when I asked her to marry me—I was willing to abandon my cultivation, to leave everything for her—but she said that we could not be together, because she owed a great debt..."

"But senior..." One of the disciples frowns. "Why would you have been forced to abandon your sect for marrying a woman? Your sect doesn't mandate abstinence."

"No, you're quite right," Heaven's Eye agrees somberly. "But my sweet little plum blossom was not a normal girl—she was a ghost."

That draws even more surprise—and to Xie Lian's surprise, instead of being scandalized, the other cultivators are impressed.

"And our senior loved her anyway?!"

"Such powerful emotion!"

"What a righteous man!"

"Yes, yes, our love was true and pure, but..." Heaven's Eye grits his teeth, his gaze burning with anger from the memory. "She refused to marry me–because she owed the lord of ghost city a great debt, and was unwilling to place my life at risk..."

One of the disciples bursts into tears.

"What a brave, honorable girl!"

"She was! She still is, wherever he's keeping her!" Heaven's Eye cries. "She confessed to me that was why she had come to my temple—looking to steal one of our treasures, and use it to pay off her debt. But when she came to know me...she couldn't bring herself to do it."

Even Xie Lian turns to Hua Cheng, biting back a smile as he raises his eyebrows. "That does sound like a romantic story, San Lang."

The ghost king makes a small gagging noise, shaking his head. "He's absolutely delusional, none of it happened that way."

"...How do you know?"

"And I must confess to you my brothers, I committed a grave sin," Heaven's Eye bows his head, his beard nearly dipping into his glass of wine. "I broke into our sanctuary, and stole the item for her myself."

"What?!"

"You did?!"

"I have long since been punished—but yes." He sighs, grabbing a napkin to dab at his eye. "That was actually how I gained my supernatural abilities."

One of the youngest disciples leans forward, his mouth gaping in shock. "Truly?!"

"Yes," Heaven's Eye nods, his tone grave. "The jar had been sealed by the Heavenly Emperor himself, and could only be broken by someone of my bloodline, that of the priest it had originally been gifted to. When I opened it, a portion of his spiritual power entered my body, through here." He points to his forehead.

"But what could have been sealed inside that was so important?!"

Dangerous enough to be sealed by the emperor, and valuable enough to pay a debt to a ghost king.

"Ah, an ancient beast, one older than the emperor himself," Heaven's Eye strokes his beard, remembering.

"Swallowed by ash in the original eruption of Mount Tonglu, he roamed the forests of the West for centuries, slaughtering any men who dared to cut them down. He was becoming a danger, and so the emperor helped my ancestors seal him, and use his energies for their cultivation."

Xie Lian can't help but frown at that, feeling pity for the creature. He understands why Jun Wu would want to stop it from harming mortals, but...

Trapping it for all eternity, using it as nothing more than a power source for mortal cultivators?

That feels cruel.

Then, Heaven's Eye names the beast, and Xie Lian freezes.

"The Giant Panda Spirit, Sen Dian."

His jaw drops, trying to wonder if it's only a coincidence, but that seems impossible—

"She took the creature to Ghost City, but..." Heaven's Eye lets out a sorrowful moan. "She never returned to me!"

One of the disciples pats his arm as the older man dries his tears, choking out, "I went to Ghost City myself to demand Hua Cheng release her, but he refused me! Even though the panda was clearly living there! That was when I knew!" He sobs.

"He wanted my sweet little plum blossom ALL TO HIMSELF!" He shakes his head vehemently. "But I will FREE HER! I've thought of nothing else for the last hundred years!"

Xie Lian looks to Hua Cheng again, and the ghost king grumbles.

"He hasn't ascended, but he's cultivated to the point where his body doesn't age. Unfortunately."

Unfortunately? Xie Lian has to admit, the man is irritating—and rude—but he doesn't seem all that—!

"My poor Shuo—one day I'll find her, and bring her home again!"

Xie Lian claps a hand over his mouth, if only to hold back shocked laughter—and Hua Cheng sounds like he couldn't be any more annoyed.

"You see what I mean?" He grumbles.

They—They certainly aren't rivals in 'love,' no, Hua Cheng was right about that.

Just then, they're spared when the attendants start to bring them dinner, but...

Xie Lian can't help but bite his lip, stomach churning with worry.

The food is almost certainly poisoned. If he doesn't warn them, they'll—

"Is this supposed to be some sort of JOKE?!"

The prince lets out a soft sigh of relief, wondering if Heaven's Eye was skilled enough to notice the threat—

"Look how GREASY this is! Absolutely FILTHY!"

"O-Our apologies, sir!"

"And is this a HAIR?!"

"F-from the pig, daozhang!"

"WHAT PIG HAS HAIR THIS LONG?!"

"Take it back! What a DISGRACE, you expect anyone to PAY FOR THIS?!"

"We'll remake it my lord, right away!"

"Apologies, apologies!"

Xie Lian rubs his forehead, relieved the men aren't eating it, but...

"And by the way, have you seen a woman and child passing through?"

Xie Lian sighs, relieved that they already agreed not to—

"Yes," One of the attendants agrees, carrying the dishes back toward the kitchen. "There's actually a woman and child staying in one of the rooms upstairs!"

Xie Lian's face falls into his hands with dismay.

Maybe he was the foolish one, expecting a murderous ghostly inn attendant to keep their word.

Actually, saying that out loud in his head—he actually does feel utterly ridiculous for having any expectations.

At least when they have to flee again, he can warn them about the...

But, rather than storming into their room, they burst into the bedchamber next door, only to be met with angry shrieking in response.

"JUST WHAT DO YOU FUCKERS THINK YOU'RE DOING, STORMING IN ON A GIRL IN THE BATH?!"

Now, Xie Lian's eyebrows shoot up with surprise.

Lan Chang?

She's staying here as well? But—

"W-WE'RE SORRY MA'AM!"

"There's no need to shout, how were we supposed to know you were in the bath?!"

"I could've told you assholes IF YOU FUCKIN' KNOCKED! NOW GET OUT!"

"Have you seen—?!"

"I SAID GET THE FUCK OUT!" She shrieks.

They retreat just as quickly as they came, slamming the door shut behind them, and if Lan Chang is here...

Xie Lian grimaces, knowing what else must be with her.

But when he moves to get out of bed and go to her, hopefully to make sure her son is contained, he—

He hears Lan Chang gasp, water sloshing in the tub as she shrinks away from something in shock.

"What?" A voice questions dryly. "You aren't gonna scream? Tell me to get the fuck out?"

Xie Lian grows still, lips parted with shock.

...Mu Qing?

Well—-to be more accurate, that's the voice he uses when he poses as Fu Yao—but Lan Chang...seems familiar with him.

"How did you find me here?!"

"Who can say," the god drawls, his voice dripping with contempt. "It was probably the reports of three women dying in the area."

Lan Chang flinches, shrinking lower underneath the bathwater, to which he provides a contemptuous laugh, shaking his head.

"Oh, sweetheart—if I was ever going to be tempted to look at a woman, she'd have to have a lot more to offer than you."

Even Xie Lian winces.

Mu Qing has never been particularly kind with his words—but—

That was cruel, even for him.

Lan Chang slips out of the tub, fumbling for a robe as she dries herself off, glaring.

"Why did you come here then, huh? You on the run?" She looks him up and down.

"Is that what you think?"

"If you weren't, I can't imagine why you'd sneak in here in that disguise," Lan Chang mutters, pulling her hair up into a clip. "But I guess I owe you one after that, so if you wanna work something out, I can talk to—"

"...Work something out?" Mu Qing's voice is like ice. "Who are you going to talk to, exactly? Hua Cheng? The one you lied to and stole from? Or Qi Rong? And either way—the fact that you think I came here to work something out with you..."

His fists actually shake from anger, nails biting his palms.

"I figured no one else was talking to you at the moment," Lan Chang shrugs, crossing her arms. "You aren't exactly good at keeping people on your side—and you and the others were the one going on and on about that fancy lie detector sword. So did I put you in any real danger?"

Mu Qing stares at her, his jaw slightly slack.

"…You really have no clue what you fucking did, did you?" He whispers, discovering that, once he reaches a certain level of anger, he actually becomes nauseous.

That's something he didn't know about himself before.

"…Forced you to confess to murdering some wife beater no one cared about?" Lan Chang rolls her eyes, turning away from him as she actually dresses herself properly. "That was one of your better moments, it's not like I forced you to slander yourself—!"

"No."

Mu Qing covers his mouth, swallowing down the urge to vomit.

"…No, that wasn't what you did."

In the room next door, Xie Lian finds himself squirming with discomfort, knowing that he's overhearing something that he shouldn't—while Hua Cheng reclines lazily, listening.

"You accused me—knowing what EVERYONE would assume—and you know what? You're right. I'm not like Feng Xin, Ming Guang, Qi Ying—I'm not even like the crown prince. You know why?"

His jaw aches.

"People have ALWAYS wanted a reason to write me off—this shit is going to stick."

"But they said that sword—?"

"You think it fucking matters?" Mu Qing almost wants to laugh. "You know better than that."

People who are born to serve others—people born to rule don't like it when you overcome that.

Because it was nice, having someone below them.

"But even if…" Mu Qing presses a palm against his forehead.

Even if what Lan Chang believed was true, it—

It would still make what she did selfish and cruel.

But…

"…You think that was ever something that I wanted to talk about?" He glares, his voice trembling.

"We've all done things we're not proud of," Lan Chang glares. "Some of us aren't lucky enough to be able to sweep it under the rug for eight centuries before it comes out. Some of us have to be humiliated and looked down on EVERY FUCKING DAY!" She wraps her arms around herself tightly. "So, I'm sorry if you had to look bad for ONCE, and you had to tell everyone about your little deal with the—!"

She turns around, filled with vengeful anger, ready to shake her fist in his face, but—

Something about Mu Qing's expression makes her stop.

Makes her take a step back.

"You think it was a deal?" Mu Qing asks, his voice steady—but not calm.

No, it's miles away from calm.

"Are you actually that stupid, or are you so pig headed that you never gave it that much thought?"

Mu Qing always assumed she knew.

From the way she reacted to him, all of those years ago, hinting at the fact that she was aware of what he had done.

Her family was high up enough for her to be a possible concubine to the crown prince, and her father...

He was one of the very few members of palace security that had been involved in cleaning up what happened that night.

Little mess, no fuss. Men like that don't talk.

Except, perhaps, to their wives.

Or eldest daughters.

Unfortunately for Mu Qing, it's a small fucking world.

"Since you think you know enough of what's going going on to fuck around with other people's lives, let me de-mystify it for you." Mu Qing takes a step closer.

His hands are in his pockets—because he knows if he takes them out—he might hit her.

"Do you think, if the King of Xianle wanted to assassinate his brother-in-law, he'd hire a scrawny twelve year old who happened to work in the house? How stupid are you?"

Xie Lian grows pale and silent, his shoulders stiffening, and Hua Cheng's gaze suddenly cuts over to him.

"What other reason would you have to—?" Lan Chang stops, her eyes growing wide, and Mu Qing's tone grows quiet.

Xie Lian wishes it was quieter, so he couldn't hear.

Maybe because it feels like a violation—or maybe, because he feels so...

"I wanted to for a long time. Because I already tried every other fucking thing," Mu Qing's nails dig into his palms so sharply, he feels his skin break. "I asked for help. I told the people that were supposed to protect me—and there was nothing they could do."

Maybe there's pleasure to be found in the slow dawning horror in her eyes, but Mu Qing doesn't feel it.

"And...I guess I just figured out how to live with it," he shrugs, sounding vaguely disgusted with himself. "I told myself that was better than people calling me a liar."

He takes another step forward, his mouth so tight at the corners, his entire face contorts from it.

"But you know what I couldn't live with?"

Lan Chang reaches back to brace herself against the dresser, her fingers trembling.

"I didn't—"

"My little sister," He explains flatly. "Suyin. She was years younger than me. And she asked me if I had to do 'extra chores' for the lord of the house, too."

Lan Chang claps a hand over her mouth, her eyes growing impossibly wide.

"I don't care if that makes me a shitty person." Mu Qing swallows hard, and even if his eyes sting, and his nose feels oddly pinched—his voice stays even.

No matter how many years go by. No matter how strong he gets. How many things he's done.

He can't talk about this without tears in his eyes—even if they don't fall.

"I didn't think about it. I grabbed a knife from the kitchen. I went to his room that night. Then I cut his throat, and I watched him die."

He even covered his mouth, as he had done to Mu Qing so many times, to make sure he couldn't scream out for help with his dying breaths.

"I didn't have a plan. I figured I was going to get executed." Mu Qing shrugs, recalling those moments with a near clinical level of precision. "I didn't even try to hide the knife. I just sat in the kitchen and waited for someone to find me."

Eventually, one of the guards did.

But somehow, Mu Qing got lucky.

It was one of the guards who knew his mother well. One who was fond of him, who had only ever known him to be a quiet, hardworking child.

"When the palace guards interrogated me, I confessed. But I didn't want to tell them why."

Their faces are only a few inches apart now.

"I was happy to get hanged, rather than talk about it. What do you think would make a twelve year old feel that way?"

"I didn't..." Lan Chang swallows hard, every inch of bravado draining from her voice. "I really..."

"Then, someone remembered what I had said before," Mu Qing's voice has been even up until now, but...

It breaks.

"They didn't listen to me the first time—but after that, they had a doctor look at me. And you know what?" He shakes his head.

"The only thing they could do after that was kill me, or cover the whole thing up."

Obviously, they decided to do the latter.

"The king didn't put me in the palace because we made a deal," Mu Qing shakes his head, almost laughing at the thought, his voice broken and wet.

"He put me there because if anyone found out what happened to me, what happened to a lot of other people—it would've been the biggest scandal the royal family had ever experienced."

Xie Lian places a hand over his mouth, sitting perfectly still.

He hasn't taken a breath in at least two minutes—and Hua Cheng is sitting up now, no longer lazy or uncaring, watching Xie Lian with a hesitant, worried expression.

Watching the guilt sink in across the prince's face.

Thinking about the things he didn't ask .

'Is someone hurting you, Mu Qing?'

"So, if you think that's 'getting away with it' for eight centuries, or sweeping it under the rug, then..." He leans in, speaking the words while glaring directly into her wide, horrified gaze.

"Fuck. You."

Each word is acidic.

"And up until extremely recently, being examined by that doctor was probably the most humiliating moment of my life." Mu Qing doesn't pull back, doesn't get out of her space. He turns his mere presence into something with a heavy weight, crushing her with it.

"But when I got to the Heavens, and I was interrogated, do you really think they just heard me say, 'Oh, I did murder someone, just not THAT person,' and then they fucking dropped it?"

"I—!"

"They made me say who. They made me say why."

Lan Chang tries to break eye contact, and Mu Qing's hand snaps up, catching her in a harsh grip by the chin.

"Ah, ah," he shakes his head, eyes flashing at her. "You're gonna look me in the eye while I tell you exactly how you fucked up."

A tear slips down his cheek, but his snarl is so vicious, she flinches from him—even if she can't get away.

And Mu Qing doesn't stutter.

Not now. Even if that means he's talking slower than he normally would, spitting out each word with venom.

"They made me say what he did to me. How many times. Where. How I fucking felt." His eyes are dark, but they burn, his shoulders trembling as he recalls each question.

Not all thirty three. But enough for Lan Chang to shed tears of her own, squirming and shaking her head.

"And the worst part is, I can't even say I didn't deserve it," he almost laughs.

Really. It's almost fucking funny.

He betrayed someone's secrets once, too.

He hurt his friend, and then left him to suffer like that, too.

"But not from you ."

Because he never hurt her.

"I didn't know it was like that, I—"

"THEN YOU SHOULDN'T HAVE FUCKING SAID ANYTHING!" Mu Qing roars, shoving her back against the dresser once, hard, before stalking away from her, running his fingers through his hair, breathing hard. "SO WHY THE FUCK DID YOU?!"

"BECAUSE YOU—!" Lan Chang glares, tears streaming down her cheeks. "YOU ALWAYS HAD THE ONE THING I WANTED, AND WHEN I SAW YOU WITH CUO CUO, SAYING YOU COULD TAKE CARE OF HIM, AND I COULDN'T—IT MADE ME FEEL SO FUCKING UNNECESSARY!"

Mu Qing whips his head around to stare at her.

"...What the fuck are you talking about?"

Before she can answer, Cuo Cuo, as if summoned by the mention of his name, drops from the rafters with his fangs extended.

Prepared for that eventual outcome, Mu Qing catches him, sending spiritual power through his palms.

In an instant, he has a fussy, babbling child in his arms, tugging at his hair and whining.

"I—just—" Lan Chang looks at the two of them, pressing her hands against her temples. "The ONLY thing I've held on for all this time—was because he NEEDED me—and LOOK!"

She sobs, and the sound is so gut wrenching—Xie Lian's heart aches, even if Mu Qing's gaze remains cold and unsympathetic.

"H-He doesn't need me! He needs the person who—his—the person I—" Lan Chang hangs her head, shaking from head to toe.

"And I know I've been a horrible mother to him!" she weeps, hugging herself tightly. "I-I tried my best, but—I didn't ask you for help, b-because I knew—you would take him away from me! And in the forest, I..."

Now, she seems to fall apart, sobbing openly.

"I know it's better for him, I know y-you were trying to h-help him, but I..." She wipes at her eyes, the last of her makeup, half washed away by the bath, smearing off against her sleeve. "I was almost h-happy with him s-staying the way he was, because then, I..."

Because then, she was still needed.

And Mu Qing—

In some far away sense of knowing, he's aware of the fact that her death, what happened to her and Cuo Cuo, wrapped them both in such a deep trauma—it can meddle with reason.

Still, he can't find any pity. Not when he...

When he feels the ghost of pain in his ribs.

When he remembers the way Jun Wu pushed his hair behind his ear, almost tender, gentle as he asked him–

'How did it make you feel?'

Mu Qing could have gone a lifetime–could have gone a thousand lifetimes–without reliving that.

He turns away from her, letting Cuo Cuo play with the longer pieces of his hair as he bounces the child in his arms, and Lan Chang composes herself, kneeling on the floor, wiping at her eyes.

"I...Is this what you came here f-for?" She mutters, hanging her head.

Mu Qing rests his chin on top of Cuo Cuo's head, oddly silent after all of that.

It's interesting.

The spirit is eight centuries old, just like the rest of them, but—

It still has that smell that most newborn babies do. Sweet. Calming.

In spite of all cold hearted, uncaring appearances, Mu Qing has always enjoyed babies.

Maybe not when they're big enough to speak coherently and show off their shitty little personalities, but babies are nice.

And they have soft hair.

He closes his eyes, letting out a breath.

"No, I came here because I'm still deciding what I want to do with you," he mutters, sounding a bit more serene now.

"...I understand if you plan on taking me back—"

"No," Mu Qing shakes his head, breathing slowly through his nose, trying to get his chest to relax.

"No, we're way past that."

Cuo Cuo mumbles incoherently, whining until the martial god gives him his hand, and Mu Qing obliges.

"I'm deciding whether or not I'm going to disperse you." He says the words calmly, even as Lan Chang shrinks away with fear. "I'm on the fence."

Xie Lian squirms, conflicted.

He can't exactly stand by if that's really what Mu Qing plans to do—even if it sounds like Lan Chang might deserve it—

But he can't intervene without making it clear what he overheard, and...

He doesn't know if Mu Qing could bear it.

"See, that's not even the tip of the iceberg of what happened to me back there," Mu Qing explains, his tone suddenly light and cheerful as he bounces Cuo Cuo, making funny faces as the baby looks up at him.

"And I am definitely, absolutely not fucking okay right now."

If he wasn't focusing on how angry he is with her, he would probably still be trembling right now.

If he hadn't come here to scream in her face, he would probably still be hiding under his desk right now, crying like a little kid.

"Whatever I decide, it won't be good for you."

Mu Qing logically knows he shouldn't decide right now. That it's more complicated, because of who she is.

Because of who Cuo Cuo is.

But honestly, after everything she put him through—

She deserves to feel terrified, if only for a few minutes.

Xie Lian is still squirming with discomfort, with Hua Cheng watching him, struggling to figure out what he needs to hear.

"...Gege—"

Just as he starts to speak, they both fall silent—listening to another familiar voice, this time coming from downstairs.

From the kitchen, to be more specific.

"What the hell is taking so long?! They should already be dead by now! This ancestor is STARVING!"

"W-we're sorry sir, but they—they sent the food back!"

"HA?! They think they're TOO GOOD FOR THE FOOD HERE?!"

There's the rattling of pots and pans as Qi Rong bustles about the kitchen. "That's IT! I'LL MAKE THEM A PROPER MEAL MYSELF, THEN THEY WON'T DARE TO TURN IT DOWN!"

Xie Lian groans, his face falling into his hands—and the reaction leaves Hua Cheng curious.

"What is it, gege?"

"...Honestly, I don't understand it, but..." Xie Lian groans between his fingers, mildly disgusted with the fact that he has to admit it. "...Qi Rong is actually a really good cook."

Hua Cheng's eyebrows raise. "Really?"

"He always has been," Xie Lian wipes a hand down his face

"I think it's because the people who worked in the kitchens were the only ones who could stand him when we were kids, but...he has a talent."

So, if he does cook for the cultivators—they're definitely going to eat it.

Which leaves him pressured to intervene either way.

To stop the martial god from killing the ghost upstairs, or to stop the ghosts from killing the humans downstairs, it's—

It's a rotten situation, no matter how you look at it.

But before Xie Lian stands up, Hua Cheng grasps his hand, holding him steady.

"Don't worry, gege."

The ghost king reassures him gently. "You don't have to do anything, it'll be alright."

Xie Lian frowns, shaking his head. "San Lang, I appreciate it, but in this form—"

"I'm not going to do anything either, we just have to wait."

He waits for an explanation, curious, but...

Hua Cheng doesn't add anything more to it—even if he sounds certain.

So, Xie Lian...waits.

Anxiously, biting his thumbnail as he waits to see if Mu Qing makes a violent move against Lan Chang, and listens as Qi Rong bustles about in the kitchen...

By the time the re-made dishes are being served, Xie Lian is absolutely squirming, fighting back the urge to hurry downstairs and warn them not to eat it, but—

"Dinner is se—!"

BAM!

The doors to the Inn fly open, rattling against the walls from the force.

A new patron steps inside, shaking out his hair as he passes over the threshold.

"Say, say..." He drawls, casting his eyes around the room. "Anyone got a room for the night? My feet are killin' me."

The attendants stop, glancing at each other nervously.

"A-Ah..." They look at each other, nervous and uncertain. "We...we've actually already sold all of our rooms for the night."

"That so?" The newcomer drawls, leaning over to examine the plates set out across the table, jet black waves slipping over his shoulder.

"How about a meal then?" He lifts up an order of 'chicken feet,' examining it curiously as the cultivator seated beside him protests. "But is there a vegetarian option?"

He glances up at the attendants, fangs gleaming as he smiles.

"I don't eat humans."

That causes a stir about the table as the mortals start examining their dishes a little more closely, gasping with horror and disgust.

"THAT EXPLAINS THE HAIR FROM BEFORE!"

"I knew those feet were a little too long!"

"I almost put it in my mouth...!"

The attendants quiver, and the young man standing before them smiles even wider.

Sharply handsome, dressed in black robes, with dark hair pulled up into a high ponytail, earrings tinkling lightly in his ears when he turns his head.

"You can't spare a meal for me?"

As he says this, his eyes change—one flashing a vivid, emerald shade of green.

The other scorching and flickering, like a forest set aflame.

"My poor assistant is starving."

Just then, Xie Lian hears someone outside squawk with indignation.

"Who the FUCK are you calling—?!"

Lang Qianqiu.

The prince's heart leaps hopefully.

It's Ren Song!

"...Shouldn't we help him?" Xie Lian whispers, turning to Hua Cheng. "There are so many cultivators in that group, and some of them are—"

"Don't worry," Hua Cheng shakes his head. "He'll be fine."

"Ugh," Lang Qianqiu wrinkles his nose, stepping in behind him—clearly noticing the stench of blood that Xie Lian did when he arrived, but he's far less subtle about his reaction. "Why the fuck to ghosts do shit like this, anyway? It's so disgusting!"

"Ghosts?!"

Ren Song ignores the cries of the cultivators, sending Lang Qianqiu an annoyed look over his shoulder.

"Oi!" He barks, his lip pulling back over his teeth. "Most ghosts don't do that! Qi Rong is just fuckin' gross, and he's trying to copy He Xuan."

"Qi Rong?!"

"Blackwater?!"

"How is he copying Blackwater?" Lang Qianqiu frowns, leaning down next to Heaven's Eye, who seems too shocked to move, poking at a plate with faint curiosity and disgust.

"He Xuan-ge gained power in the beginning by eating other ghosts," Ren Song shrugs. "You can gain some resentment from eating the flesh of murder victims, or defenseless ghost fires, which is how Qi Rong has gotten by this far, but..."

Ren Song snatches out with his hand suddenly, catching one of the attendants by the throat as he lets out a surprised yelp.

The ghost twitches and squirms in his grasp as Shuo's fingernails puncture its skin, draining the resentment from its form until, eventually, there's only a ghost fire flickering in his palm.

"He can't do this," Ren Song concludes, tossing the ghost fire down his throat.

It certainly puts an entirely new perspective on all of the times Lang Qianqiu witnessed Shuo look at Hua Cheng with round, pleading eyes, saying—

'Gege, can I eat him?'

"T-THAT'S AUTUMN TWILIGHT SHROUDING FORESTS!" One of the cultivators finally recognizes him, leaping up.

"IF HE'S HERE, THEN CRIMSON RAIN MUST BE NEARBY! THE RUMORS SAY HE'S WEAK RIGHT NOW, SO THIS IS OUR CHANCE—!"

One of them hurls a talisman at him, the yellow paper landing against his sleeve.

Lang Qianqiu scratches the back of his head, annoyed.

"Does he seem weak to you?"

Ren Song glances down at the talisman, his eyes narrowing—

And the cultivators shrink back with terror as the paper crumbles to ash.

"I WAS weaker," He agrees. "Then I ate just about every ghost on the way here."

All of the man-killing ghosts, anyway—those are fair game.

Xie Lian stiffens from upstairs, realizing—

The thing that ripped through the Western blockade—

Was that Shuo?

"Alright boys," He sighs, rolling his shoulders and cracking his knuckles. "I'm not here for you, so why don't you stay out of the way?" He jerks a thumb back towards Lang Qianqiu. "It makes things a little less awkward for Golden Boy over here."

Lang Qianqiu sends him an annoyed glance. "Would you cut it out?"

Just then, Heaven's Eye seems to take notice of him, pointing in the prince's direction.

"WHAT'S A HEAVENLY OFFICIAL DOING WITH A GHOST?!"

Lang Qianqiu rubs his ear, annoyed with all of the screaming. "What, so you didn't notice all of the other gods and ghosts here, but you noticed me?!"

"Aw," Ren Song smiles over at him. "Someone finally noticed you!"

Lang Qianqiu's lips twitch at the corners, moving up just a hair before he replies, "Besides you?"

Heaven's Eye glances back and forth between the two, his jaw hanging open.

"Sire—are you FRATERNIZING?!"

"Frater—?" Lang Qianqiu frowns. "What does that mean?"

"You're just—COMFORTABLE TRAVELING IN THE COMPANY OF A GHOST?!"

"First of all, you should be asking me that," Ren Song grumbles, hands on his hips. "He's the one following me around, since he's shit at tracking ghosts. Second—we've developed a nice little system. Observe."

He clears his throat, "Hey, asshole! I'm about to commit a sin!"

To which the cultivators look at Lang Qianqiu, who probably would have screamed something about being scandalized a few months before, but now—

He rolls his eyes, then turns around, covering his ears.

Shuo reaches down, grabbing two cultivators and slamming their heads together, then dropping them to the ground, unconscious.

"Hear no evil, see no evil, right?" He wipes his hands off, looking around. "Now, if you don't mind, I'd like to have a word with the chef."

Before any of them can respond, Ren Song flicks his wrist, and the doors to the kitchen fly wide open.

Lang Qianqiu glances over his shoulder, making a sound of vague disgust as the cultivators cry out with horror.

"Calm down," the forest demon rolls his eyes. "So squeamish."

And who can blame them, when the kitchen looks more like a slaughterhouse, littered with blood and body parts—and standing in the middle of it is none other than Qi Rong, a kitchen knife in one hand, wearing a blood spattered apron.

“Y-Y-YOU FUCKER! HOW DID YOU CATCH UP?!”

He glances back and forth between the demon, and Lang Qianqiu, flailing with anger and confusion.

“This ancestor set things up PERFECTLY! YOU WERE SUPPOSED TO KILL EACH OTHER!”

“Oh,” Ren Song rolls his eyes, crossing his arms. “Shut the fuck up, you lazy piece of shit.”

The cultivators look around, seeming unsure of what to make of the situation—or of how to react.

"You didn't set anything up. You took advantage of an opportunity to escape, that was it."

And really, he had been banking on the fact that Lang Qianqiu would have killed Ren Song.

He was the one in a fragile, weakened state when it happened. Qi Rong had probably assumed that the martial god would have taken the opportunity to get rid of him.

Up until that night, Ren Song might have assumed Lang Qianqiu would have done the same thing.

"...Sir," one of the cultivators mumbles, glancing back at Heaven's Eye. "If Qi Rong and Ren Song are both here, don't you think we should try to...?"

Ren Song looks them over, turning to Lang Qianqiu.

"You take the ghosts, I take the humans?"

"...Seems fair."

As a martial god, he can't attack mortals, after all.

Ren Song has no such hang ups.

They pass one another as Lang Qianqiu heads to the kitchen, Qi Rong scrambling away, while Ren Song returns to the dining room, the other cultivators closing in.

From there, the brawl begins, with Ren Song calling over at some point for Lang Qianqiu to 'save him some snacks for later,' and while the martial god seems a little disgusted by the request, he acknowledges it, until—

"WHAT THE HELL IS GOING ON DOWN HERE?!"

Xie Lian sighs, slipping off of the bed as he hears 'Fu Yao' stomp down the stairs, Lan Chang gripped with one arm, holding a child on his hip with the other.

"...Fu Yao?" Lang Qianqiu blinks, holding two of the 'inn keepers' by the scruffs of their necks. "What are you doing here?!"

"I should be asking you the same thing!" The 'Deputy God' glares, looking around. He was too focused on Lang Chang before, but now seems to grasp the entirety of the situation. "And why are you running around with Hua Cheng's ki—?"

BOOM!/

The side of the inn bursts open as two cultivators are sent hurling through the wall, sprawling outside on the grass as Ren Song whips around to glare at him, raising an eyebrow.

"His what?"

"We're working together," Lang Qianqiu clarifies, subduing the ghosts in his grip. "Temporarily! Over the Qi Rong thing!" He adds quickly when Fu Yao raises an eyebrow.

Ren Song glances past both of them, his eyes settling on the woman in Fu Yao's grip.

"Lan Chang? You alright?"

The female ghost looks at him, then at Fu Yao, who seems to silently dare her with his gaze to make another accusation towards him—and she hangs her head.

"Everything's fine," she mutters, her tone pinched with shame. "Just some personal business."

With her, that could mean a good many things, so Ren Song shrugs it off, turning back to attacking the human cultivators.

"Hey—!" Fu Yao starts again, stepping towards him, when Xie Lian suddenly hurries down the steps.

"F-Fu Yao!" He cries out, making the martial god go still

"What are you doing here?" The prince questions, his tone that of surprise as he holds Hua Cheng's hand, allowing the Ghost King to keep him steered clear of the brawl. "Does Mu Qing know you've descended?"

"..." Fu Yao stares, eyes narrow. "...Not exactly. What about you?"

"Oh, I'm just helping San Lang," Xie Lian explains lightly, moving to stand in front of the ghost king, who doesn't seem to particularly enjoy that, but doesn't protest. "This group of cultivators was sent after him by..."

Then, as if on cue, Qi Rong begins to screech.

"WHAT GOOD ARE YOU USELESS CULTIVATORS ANYWAY?! STOP FOCUSING ON STUPID REN SONG, THE KID IN RED IS CRIMSON RAIN SOUGHT—ACK!"

He was dodging Lang Qianqiu's blows before, but in an instant he's suddenly frozen, a kitchen knife rammed down his mouth.

Lang Qianqiu barely managed to stagger back and out of the way when Xie Lian sprung forward, holding both hands up to ensure he doesn't accidentally hit his former master.

"G-Guoshi?!"

Xie Lian nods faintly in acknowledgement, focusing on his cousin.

"What was that?"

Qi Rong is frozen, wide eyed. The blade of the knife hasn't wounded him seriously, but if he tries to speak—he'll slice his tongue open against it, blood dripping from the corners of his mouth.

With that fire put out, Xie Lian opens a private communication array.

'Feng Xin?'

Given everything, he wouldn't have been surprised if the martial god took a moment to answer, but--

'Your highness?'

He lets out a low sigh of relief.

'...Why exactly were you so worried about finding Mu Qing? You said you would tell me later, but...'

Now, there's a much longer delay—and Xie Lian can practically feel Feng Xin wrestling with exactly what to say, but...

'When Mu Qing and I were patrolling the Southern Blockade, he...came across Lan Chang...who accused him of being her and her child's killer.'

Xie Lian gathered that much from the conversation he overheard, but he doesn't say anything about that, listening as Feng Xin flounders through the events as he knows them.

'I know what you're probably thinking, but I didn't believe it, and I told the others they were crazy for going along with it—'

'I know, Feng Xin.' Xie Lian replies gently, reassuring him. 'I know you wouldn't believe that about Mu Qing.'

He's known them both a long time.

Feng Xin's version of caring often comes off as anger. Xie Lian understands that—recognizes it for what it is. Mu Qing, however...

He takes it at face value.

But Xie Lian knows.

Feng Xin might resent him—Mu Qing might drive him crazy—

But Feng Xin cares about him.

'But she said there was a scar on Mu Qing's arm that matched the fetal spirit's teeth, and Mu Qing...I don't know, your highness—he went ballistic. Trying to strangle her, saying he had killed someone, but...that it had been a member of the royal family.'

Xie Lian's mouth presses into a grim line, and he's so distracted, he nearly slices Qi Rong's mouth open accidentally.

(Which really wouldn't be that much of a shame.)

'You mean my uncle.'

'Yeah...' Feng Xin mutters, too absorbed with worry to wonder how he guessed that.

'I figured there was probably an explanation for it, but if I let him run off...everyone would have assumed he was guilty.'

Xie Lian can't blame him for thinking that—but after what Mu Qing said...

He feels a little sick.

'And the situation has been cleared up now?'

'The emperor acquitted him of the accusations, ' Feng Xin agrees. 'He ordered him to rest in his palace, but he disappeared almost immediately after that.'

'...I see,' Xie Lian digs the knife in just a hair deeper.

'By the way—where are you, your highness?'

'Oh...' The prince trails off, 'Just staying in an inn for the night to rest, I should be fine, but—'

(Now, there's more commotion coming from outside.)

'...I should go.'

'Your highness? Wai—!'

He cuts off the line.

Just as he does, he yanks the knife out of Qi Rong's mouth, just in time for Lang Qianqiu to join in, binding the ghost with talismans as Xie Lian marches toward the front of the Inn, Hua Cheng following behind.

That's when he hears a faint roar.

Several cultivators crash down to the ground, pinned down by massive paws, cringing away from the snarling jaws of a...

...Giant...Panda?

Standing just to the side, having barely escaped the attack, Heaven's

Eye points with a rattling gasp.

"T-THAT'S! SEN DIAN!"

He whips around, glaring at Hua Cheng, who seems perfectly comfortable watching the unfolding disaster from Xie Lian's side, holding his hand.

"Are you HAPPY, YOU BASTARD?! FIRST YOU STEAL THE LOVE OF MY LIFE, THEN YOU ATTACK MY DISCIPLES WITH MY OWN ANCESTRAL BIRTHRIGHT?!"

"...Yin Rong?"

Heaven's Eye stops in the middle of his cries of outrage, turning around to stare at Ren Song, who has also paused in the middle of throwing one of the cultivators, holding him over his head, mouth agape.

"...How do you know my name, demon?!"

Ren Song looks over at Hua Cheng, then back to Heav—'Yin Rong,' his mouth still hanging open.

"You got...old," he mumbles, which probably should have been obvious to begin with, but— "Wait, you're still alive?!"

"Of course I'm still alive! Is this some sort of trick?!"

"..." Ren Song tosses the cultivator in his arms to the side, slamming him against a nearby tree, spinning around.

"YOU LITTLE—!"

But when Ren Song faces him again, the senior cultivator freezes, gaping at...

A young woman.

With hair black as a raven's wing, eyes burning like twin flames.

Lang Qianqiu makes his way out of the pile of rubble where the in once stood, just in time to stare at the forest demon's new look, his expression mildly shocked and flushed, when—

"...SHUO?!"

Before he really even has a chance to react, or ask what's going on—the large, majestically bearded cultivator marches across the grass, snatching Shuo's hand up in his, clutching it tightly.

"M-My plum blossom! Is it really you?!"

Lang Qianqiu gawks, dropping Qi Rong.

"Plum Blossom?!"

And of all of the reactions he could have expected—

Shuo looks away, covering her face with one hand, a little sheepish.

"...That's...quite a beard..."

Hua Cheng makes a gagging sound, rolling his eyes.

Xie Lian feels as though he could be knocked over with a feather.

"Wait," he mumbles quietly, bending over so he can speak next to Hua Cheng's ear. "It was mutual?!"

"No," Hua Cheng disagrees flatly, watching the two with faint disgust. "More like a momentary lapse in sanity."

"What's going on?!" Lan Qianqiu glares, seeming far more irritated than he normally does in Ren Song's presence, and Xie Lian scratches the back of his neck.

"Um...Shuo was...This man's...first love, it seems."

"Huh?!"

"You've been Ren Song all this time?!"

"Yeah..." Shuo glances at him from the corner of her eye, then looks away again, her hair hiding her face. "Sorry?"

She peeks at him again, startled to find him staring at her, wide eyed and earnest.

"I should have recognized you right away! Your intensity, your spirit!"

He leans closer to her, looking her in the face. "You're just as beautiful as the day we met, my darling!"

The other cultivators (along with Hua Cheng, Lang Qianqiu, Mu Qing, and Qi Rong), stare in shock in confusion, but—

Xie Lian actually thinks it's rather sweet.

Odd, but sweet.

Shuo actually lets out a strained, nervous giggle—then stops herself, clearing her throat.

"Well, you got old, but..." She slowly looks back at him, her eyes softening when she looks into his.

Those are the same.

"I really do like the beard."

"...What the fuck is happening..." Lang Qianqiu mumbles faintly, looking as though he's in the middle of a waking nightmare. Xie Lian almost explains it to him all over again, but—

The question seemed rhetorical, this time.

However, Hua Cheng actually answers.

"That's how Shuo reacts when anyone flirts with them," he mutters irritably. "They aren't exactly accustomed to it."

Xie Lian can see his point in part. It's obvious how self conscious Shuo is about being seen as a child, despite their spirit maturing past that point.

The prince can imagine Shuo probably doesn't get a lot of interest in a romantic sense—and for someone eight centuries old (who, unlike Xie Lian, has no vows of chastity to keep) that must be...a sore point.

But there does seem to be genuine warmth between the two.

"...Have you really been trying to kill Hua Chengzhu all this time?" Shuo questions, tucking a lock of hair behind her ear, looking up at H—Yin Rong through her eye lashes. "For me?"

"...Why the fuck do you sound flattered?" Hua Cheng mutters, offended.

"I wouldn't let him keep us apart forever!" Yin Rong shakes his head vehemently, beard whipping around. "I know he doesn't love you, dearest, not in the way that I—!"

Shuo cuts him off, raising a hand. "...Love me?"

Her old flame stares back at her, eyes wide.

"That's why he kept me away from you! Because he wanted you all to himself!"

"Hah?!" Shuo gawks, pulling back, vaguely disgusted. "No way! Hua Chengzhu rescued me when I was a little kid, I've lived with him in Ghost City ever since! That would be GROSS!"

Not to mention the fact that he's already spoken for—but, unlike Hua Cheng, Shuo has the sense not to bring that up in front of the crown prince.

"So," Lang Qianqiu speaks up again, distinctly irritated. "He's like your fath—!"

Shuo and Hua Cheng interrupt at the same time.

"He's like a guardian!"

"—More like a ward, really.”

"..."

"..."

"..."

Heaven's Eye looks from Shuo, to Hua Cheng, then back to Shuo, his gaze shocked and horrified.

"...I see I've committed a great wrong," he mutters, shaking his head.

"Well—"

"All this time, I've been insulting him, when HE WAS THE ONE I SHOULD HAVE ASKED FOR YOUR HAND IN MARRIAGE!" He turns to Hua Cheng, bowing deeply in apology. "I have INSULTED YOU GRAVELY, SIR!"

Hua Cheng makes a face, holding Xie Lian's sleeve, and Shuo chokes.

"Marriage?!"

"Of course! I couldn't have made my intentions more clear!"

"Yin Rong!" Shuo pulls her hand back, shaking her head. "We had fun, and I'm sorry for lying to you—but I was in it for the panda!"

Behind her, Dian Dian rumbles, nuzzling the back of her head.

"The...panda...?"

"I mean," she reaches up, patting his cheek gently—and now, Lang Qianqiu is the one gagging, "I liked you, but we only knew each other for three weeks!"

"...It was three weeks?" Xie Lian mumbles under his breath, and Hua Cheng nods, his tone dry.

"Momentary lapse in sanity."

"Besides, I asked Hua Chengzhu about having a relationship with you when I got back to Ghost City—and he said I wasn't allowed, so..." She shrugs, as though that means there's really nothing more to discuss.

"But...!"

Before he can say anything more, Ren Song reaches up, pressing her fingertips against the side of his head—what seems like a tender gesture until his eyes roll back into his head, and she sets him down gently on the ground.

When Shuo straightens, his normal form has returned.

"...So, he's not your father, but he has to give you permission to be romantically involved with someone?" Lang Qianqiu rolls his eyes, crossing his arms.

"Would you shut up?" Ren Song grumbles, tossing his hair over his shoulder. "I was going through a phase!"

"A phase?! You would've been over six hundred years old by then!"

"Yeah, and my brother had just been dispersed, and I wasn't thinking clearly!" The forest demon grumbles. "It was nice getting the attention, but I didn't want to marry the guy just to mess around with him."

Sure, he'd hoped to at least get his first kiss out of the entire thing—but nothing ventured, nothing gained.

"Hua Chengzhu was just looking out for me."

It could be worse.

"I can't believe your ex looks like someone's grandfather..."

"He's not my ex!" Shuo glares. "And he was actually VERY good looking when he was a teenager!"

"...Well," Fu Yao speaks up, "This has been fucking fascinating, but we should go."

He starts to walk away with Lan Chang in tow, when Hua Cheng speaks up.

"Whose child is that?"

"..." Fu Yao stops in mid step, glaring at him over his shoulder. "None of your fucking business."

"...Does this have something to do with what Lan Chang said about Mu Qing?"

Ren Song has returned to Hua Cheng's by now, sitting on the grass next to his feet.

Fu Yao doesn't answer Xie Lian's question, staring straight ahead, and the forest demon glances up at Hua Cheng, speaking into their private array curiously.

'Gege, who's the junior official?'

The ghost king glances down at him, distracted.

'It's Xuan Zhen in disguise.'

Shuo stiffens, glancing back and forth between the two curiously.

'Does the prince know?'

'Yes.'

'He's just pretending that he doesn't know?'

'Exactly.'

"I know you must be upset that she lied about your general," Xie Lian cautions. "But you shouldn't do anything rash."

Still, Fu Yao doesn't answer, and doesn't make any sign of turning around, so...

The prince sighs.

"Alright, if you're going to leave and take her with you, can I ask you for one thing before you go? I'm sorry to be a bother, but..."

Now, when Fu Yao hesitates, he seizes the chance. "Qi Rong abducted a young boy and was traveling with him—he probably needs to be examined. Could you take a look...?"

He can't see Fu Yao's expression, but Hua Cheng can—

And he seems genuinely torn.

"...Where is the kid?"

"He's right here," Lang Qianqiu replies, dropping Qi Rong into a crumpled pile on the ground as he turns around, lifting the boy in his arms. "He seems pretty dehydrated...and he's burning up."

Fu Yao looks over at the boy, the muscles in his jaw working.

"...I can't."

Xie Lian's eyebrows raise in surprise, and while he doesn't immediately react, Lang Qianqiu seems mildly outraged.

"What do you mean, you can't?! You're one of Xuan Zhen's deputies, aren't you? You can handle a fever!"

"I'll send another deputy to help the boy." Fu Yao mutters.

“But I don’t have enough hands to examine him right now.”

“What’s that supposed to—?”

“I mean literally!” Fu Yao snaps, and Hua Cheng watches him a little closer, eyeing the child in his arms.

“…You can’t put him down, can you?”

Fu Yao shoots a glare in his direction.

"Is that really any of your business, brat?!"

Hua Cheng crosses his arms. "You tell me, Deputy General."

"…"

Xie Lian frowns, taking a step forward. "Fu Yao, what's going o—?"

BOOM!

There's a flash of golden light, and Xie Lian groans quietly.

What now?

But when he sees that familiar aura—he doesn't know why, but—

Xie Lian gets the distinct feeling that the situation is about to become more complicated.

"…Feng Xin? What are you doing here?"

"You cut off communication in the middle of a dangerous area?"

The martial god steps forward as the light fades, glancing around those assembled, more than surprised by a few of them, but—

When he sees "Fu Yao," his expression cracks into one of relief.

"Mu-I mean, Fu Yao—the hell were you thinking, sneaking off like that?!"

'…Wait,' Shuo looks at Hua Cheng again. 'He knows it's Xuan Zhen too?'

'Yes. Mu Qing knows that he knows.'

'But he doesn't know that Xie Lian knows?'

'Precisely.'

'But basically everyone who matters knows that it's Mu Qing?'

'Yes.'

Shuo's eye twitches.

'Then why bother?!'

Hua Cheng stopped asking a long time ago when it comes to those three—but he generally assumes it has something to do with the fact that Xie Lian, in all of his wonders and wisdom, has idiotic friends.

“Sneaking off?!” Fu Yao scoffs. “I wasn’t a prisoner!”

“The emperor ordered you to remain in your palace!”

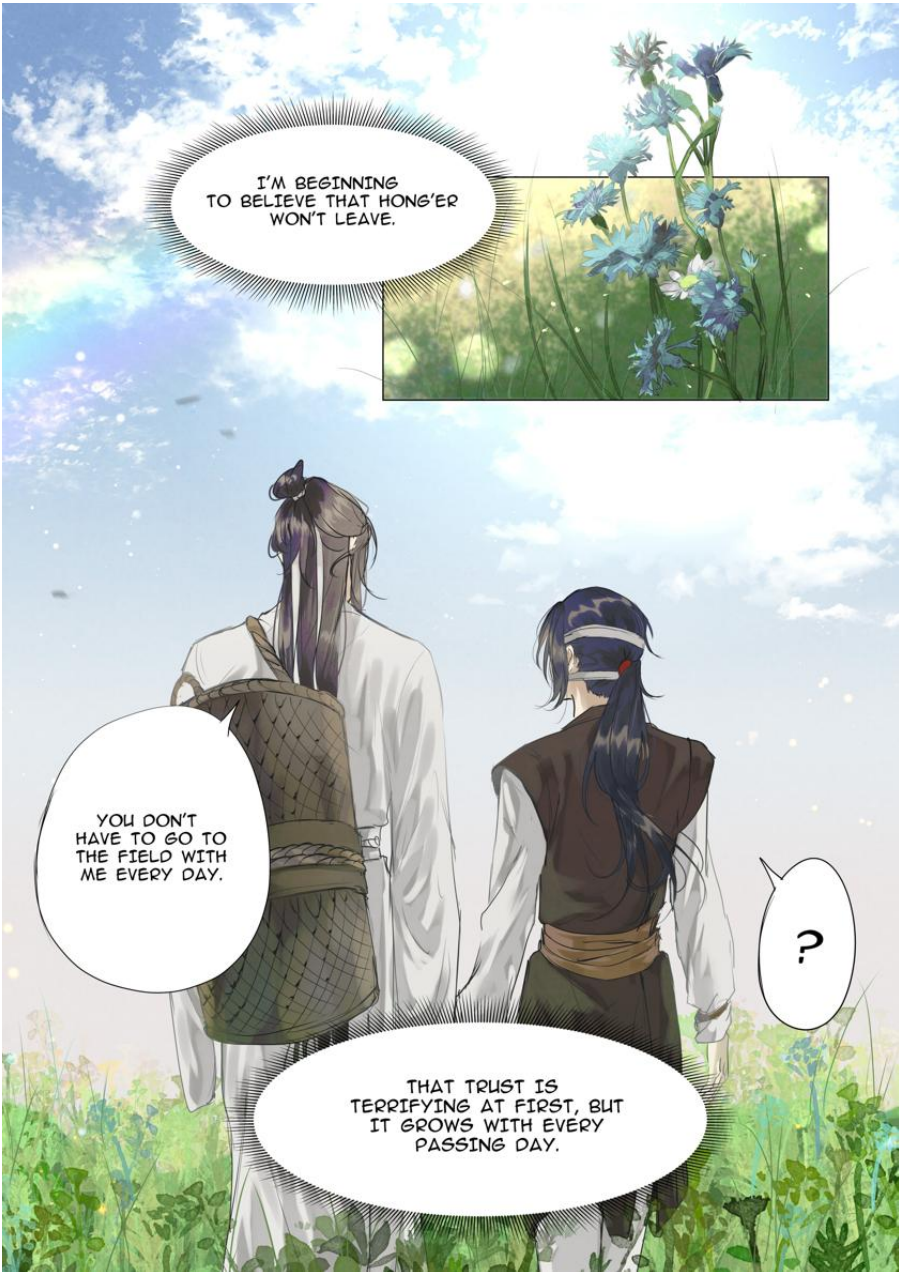
“My general, not me,” he glares, silently daring Feng Xin to contradict him.

Which he doesn’t—not because he wasn’t prepared to drag him off, no—

But because now he’s focused on something else entirely.

“…Who’s the kid?”

UPDATE ON THE NO PATHS ARE BOUND COMIC:



I'M BEGINNING TO BELIEVE THAT HONG'ER WON'T LEAVE.
YOU DON'T HAVE TO GO TO THE FIELD WITH ME EVERY DAY.
?
THAT TRUST IS TERRIFYING AT FIRST, BUT IT GROWS WITH EVERY PASSING DAY.

Imaginary Canvas has uploaded the second chapter of the comic adaptation of No Paths Are Bound! You can read it here ! Please support them for their amazing work, it's truly been an honor, and such an enjoyable experience to work with them! They're an incredible artist, and a wonderful person! This chapter covers events from the first half of chapter two. In order to keep up with future updates to the comic, look out for further information on their twitter!

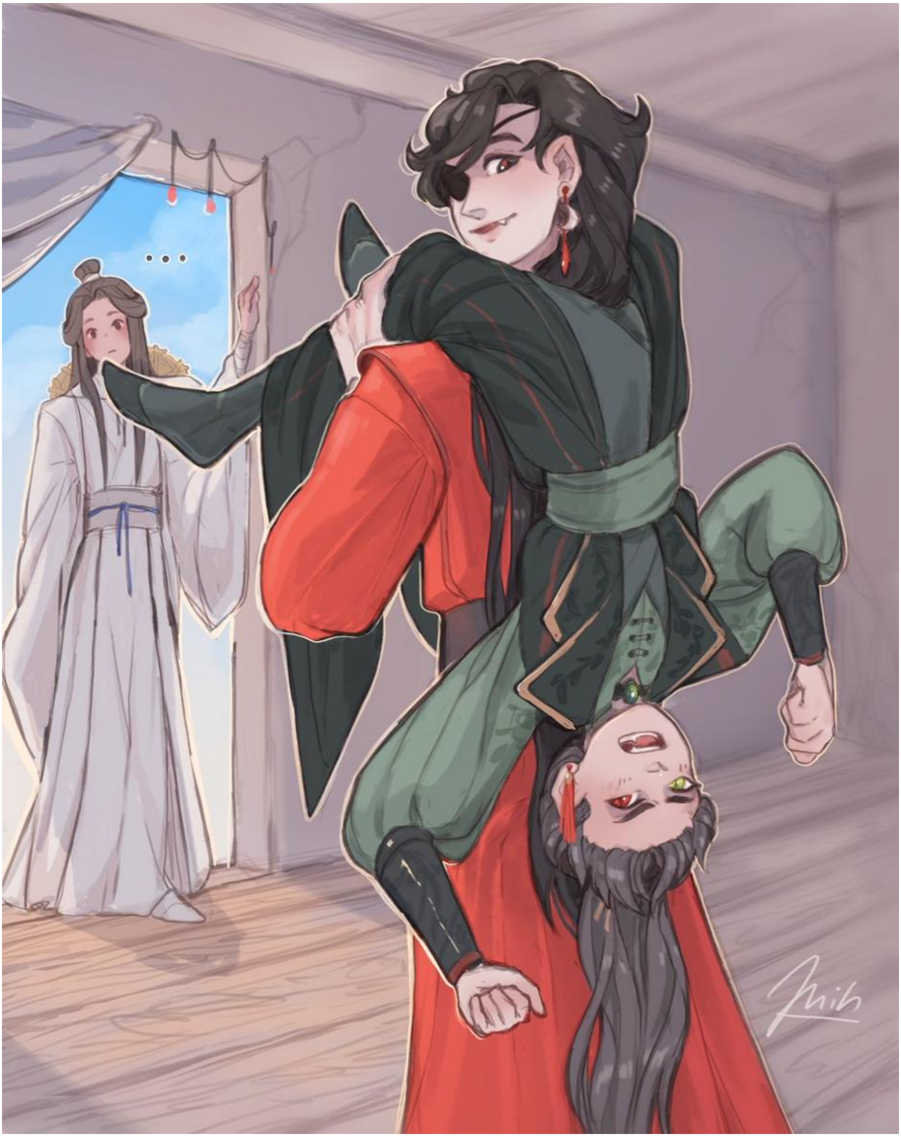
ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Crimson Rain and his Ward



CREDIT: JUIH

"Aw, Someone finally noticed you!"

"Besides you?"

CREDIT: LAURA

Chapter End Notes

> thank you so much to Juih and Laura for their beautiful artwork, and for allowing me to share it! And thank you so much to all of you for your continued support of this story!
>
> xoxo, Evie

Choosing the Paths You Walk

Chapter Summary

> "After EVERYTHING you know, you think Mu Qing ever wanted to be in the middle of that shit?!"
>
> Xie Lian falls silent, his stomach sinking.
>
> Oh.
>
> Mu Qing—
>
> "All he ever tried to do was his job, and everyone was always blaming him for everything, using him, lying to him, acting like they didn't WANT him around—and then they got mad at him for LEAVING!"
>
> Mu Qing is in pain.

Mu Qing falls silent, looking from the child in his arms, who is now slightly calmer than before, cheek smushed up against Mu Qing's arm, to Lan Chang, who seems caught between emotions, the greatest of them anxiety—

Back to Feng Xin.

“…My general's.”

Now, everyone stares.

"...He doesn't look like Xuan Zhen at all," Lang Qianqiu comments, shocked, to which the 'deputy official' glares, hitching the boy a little higher on his hip.

"Yeah, well, he takes after his mother!" He barks, fighting not to sound vaguely disgusted.

"...And why do you have Xuan Zhen's son and Lan Chang?" Hua Cheng questions, tilting his head to the side.

"Can't a guy multitask?!" Fu Yao growls with a glare.

"What the fuck are you going on about?" Nan Yang scowls. "You—your general—Mu Qing doesn't have a son!"

"You don't know that!" Fu Yao snaps, taking a step back. "Maybe just mind your own—!"

"Yeah, actually I DO know that," Feng Xin steps forward in response. "His cultivation method wouldn't allow it!"

And sure, there's the possibility that he COULD have broken the rules at some point—but if he had—

Well, it seems less likely that he would spook and bolt every single time they—

"Yeah, well—maybe he went and changed methods without saying anything! He's a private person!"

"You—!" Feng Xin grits his teeth, unable to say more without bringing Mu Qing's identity—or their private affairs—out into the open. "Just tell me what's going on!"

"I already—!"

"...Ain't that Jian Lan?!"

Qi Rong's voice comes out of nowhere, and Feng Xin freezes.

The ghost is sitting up now from where Lang Qianqiu tossed him on the ground before, rubbing the side of his head as he glances over Fu Yao's shoulder, smirking and snickering as he takes in her expression.

"WELL I'LL BE DAMNED, IT REALLY FUCKIN' IS!"

Fu Yao's expression twitches. "I don't know who you're—!"

But before he can laugh it off, the female ghost yanks out of his grip, marching over to grab Qi Rong by the collar, shaking him violently.

"WHAT THE FUCK ARE YOU TALKIN' ABOUT?! SHUT UP!"

"Jian Lan..." Xie Lian mutters under his breath, trying to understand why that name sounds...vaguely familiar...

"THAT'S NOT MY FUCKIN' NAME! WHO THE FUCK DO YOU THINK YOU'RE TALKING TO, YOU STUPID PIECE OF SHIT?!"

Qi Rong grins up at her, teeth gleaming in the moonlight.

"WELL LOOK AT YOU!" He cackles, looking from the boy in Mu Qing's arms, then at Feng Xin, and he—

He just throws his head back, laughing even harder.

"AHAHAHA! WHAT A MESS! WHAT A FUCKIN' MESS!"

He's briefly cut off when Lan Chang punches him, slapping him over and over.

"SHUT UP, SHUT UP, SHUT UP!!" She snarls, her face twisted with rage. "YOU STUPID, UGLY LITTLE TOAD! THAT'S NOT MY NAME! I HAVEN'T GONE BY THAT IN CENTURIES!"

The child in Mu Qing's arms whines, reaching for her in distress, and the martial god shushes him, trying to—

"Mama!"

Aaaand there it goes.

Mu Qing presses a hand against his forehead, swearing, all while Feng Xin stands there, looking like he's been kicked in the head, and Qi Rong—

Even as he's half throttled by Jian Lan, he keeps laughing.

"LOOK HERE, MY DEAR COUSIN HAS BEEN CUCKED!"

Now, Xie Lian chokes, turning his head in Qi Rong's direction. "What?!"

He—he's never—how could he have been—?

"DON'T LISTEN TO A WORD THIS PIECE OF TRASH SAYS!"

"Maybe they wouldn't have, if you hadn't reacted like a CRAZY BITCH!" Mu Qing snaps, trembling with frustration. "GOD I hate you SO FUCKING MUCH!"

"Yeah?!" Jian Lan whips around to glare at him. "WELL IT'S FUCKING MUTUAL, ASSHOLE!"

"YOU'RE SO LUCKY I CAN'T PUT THIS KID DOWN RIGHT NOW, OR I SWEAR TO FUCKING GOD—!"

"HAHAHAHAHA!"

There's so much shouting, Xie Lian can't make sense of it.

"JIAN LAN HERE WAS SUPPOSED TO BE A CONCUBINE IN THE ROYAL COURT OF XIANLE!" Qi Rong cackles. "But she was so plain, my cousin doesn't even remember her name! And she went and got knocked up by HIS BEST FRIEND, THEN GOT HERSELF MURDERED! HA! WHAT A STUPID SLUT! SUCH TRASH!"

Xie Lian presses a hand against the side of his head, seeming to grasp the gravity of the situation at the same time as Feng Xin.

"...You..." He stares at Jian Lan, open mouthed. "...You told me you were getting married. I thought...you were doing well..."

She screws up her mouth, looking up at him with wide, angry eyes.

Without all of the makeup she had painted on before—which now, it seems pretty clear was an attempt at a disguise—she's a surprisingly elegant woman with soft, delicate features.

Wrinkles here and there, but...

"...YOU MOTHERFUCKER!" She snaps, dropping Qi Rong as she launches herself forward, slamming her fists against his chest. "WHAT ELSE WAS I SUPPOSED TO SAY AFTER ALL THAT?!"

...After all of…what?

Mu Qing looks away sharply, still bouncing the arguing couple's child on his hip.

Feng Xin lets her hit him for a few moments, too shocked to respond, before he eventually catches her by the wrists, glancing between her and Fu Yao.

"You...your general...knew about this? The entire time?"

Fu Yao won't look at him, glaring in the opposite direction.

He looks back at Jian Lan, who is still stubbornly trying to get away from him. "And why didn't you say something sooner?! I would have —!"

"What?! Claimed him? Raised him?!" Jian Lan glares up at him. "You can only stand to look at him now, when he's like this!"

"I don't..." He stares, the wheels in his head turning faster and faster as he looks around, taking it all in—and—

He look firmly away from Cuo Cuo—refusing to address that now, because—

He isn't going to take that in while he's angry, not when...

"...That was why you pulled that stunt back there?"

He isn't speaking to anyone else now, just—

Just Jian Lan, who once again seems to want to break away, but Feng Xin has her in a firm grip.

"Because that is fucked up," he mutters, shaking his head.

"You KNOW why I—!"

"That was MY fault, not HIS! If you're gonna be pissed off and try to ruin someone's life, ruin MINE!"

"Oh? So you know?" Fu Yao whips his head around finally, glaring at them both. "The reason she hates m—my general so much?! If so, it'd be nice if you could CLUE EVERYONE IN!"

Feng Xin sends him an angry look—though really, it's not at him, or even about him, more so just silently bemoaning the entire situation, when—

"BECAUSE THE DUMBASS WAS IN LOVE WITH HIM WHILE WE WERE TOGETHER!" Jian Lan snarls, making both men go completely still.

Xie Lian feels as though he could fall over from shock—not necessarily by that fact, which he'd never completely considered before, but it's not that outlandish—more by the fact that Jian Lan just came out and said it.

(Shuo eagerly watches the entire thing like a stage play.)

He looks to Hua Cheng, eager to ask him more about what's going on in the communication array, but...

The look on the ghost king's face makes him fall silent—confused, and...

Worried.

The first person to speak, unsurprisingly, is Fu Yao—his voice dripping with disdain.

"...Are you fucking stupid?" He mutters flatly, eyes scorching with anger. "You put him through all of that shit, because you thought Feng Xin was in love with HIM?!"

Feng Xin is more than familiar with what it looks like when that temper snaps, and he holds up a hand.

"Mu—Fu Yao, don't start—"

"You're trying to tell me that you think, eight centuries ago, HE was in love with MY GENERAL?!" Mu Qing snaps, fighting the urge to set the child aside and throttle them both. Instead, he points to—

"THE CROWN PRINCE WAS RIGHT THERE!"

Xie Lian makes a small choking noise, color building up in his cheeks, holding both hands up frantically, remembering Hua Cheng's question from earlier.

'Was that person Feng Xin?'

Why does everyone keep assuming that?!

"Don't bring me into this—!"

Mu Qing responds with such ferocity, it startles him.

"You have ALWAYS been a part of this, STOP ACTING LIKE YOU'RE NOT!"

Xie Lian freezes, too shocked to respond—but Hua Cheng isn't—baring his teeth in Mu Qing's direction.

"Watch your fucking tone."

Mu Qing shakes his head vehemently, swallowing hard.

"You're all so...so fucking..." He doesn't say a word about what Xie Lian felt—even if he knows.

He doesn't have the right to speak on that ever again—no matter how upset he is.

If Xie Lian hurts him—Mu Qing deserves it.

Feng Xin, however…

That's a different story.

"You're probably right, Feng Xin probably WAS interested in someone else when he was sleeping with you, because he's ALWAYS been pining after Xie Lian! That's not fucking new!"

Feng Xin jumps, his ears turning red.

"THAT'S NOT—!"

"And YOU!" Mu Qing points to Jian Lan, his anger from upstairs all but reignited. "You did this, you put him through ALL OF THAT over a MAN?!"

"IT'S A LITTLE LESS PETTY WHEN HE'S THE FATHER OF MY CHILD!" Jian Lan glares. "And I–!"

"You're fucking PATHETIC!" Mu Qing screams.

His voice is hoarse, and now, when Feng Xin really looks at him—

He notices, even in his disguise as Fu Yao—

Mu Qing looks awful .

Pale, drawn, exhausted—jumping and reacting sharply to every little thing.

Like back during the civil war—but way, way worse.

"I'm SO sorry that a rich, spoiled little girl like you was so threatened by a servant. Your life got a little hard after the war? What, so that gives you the right to treat someone like that because you think your boyfriend had feelings for him?! FUCK OFF!"

"Fu Yao..." Xie Lian raises a hand, trying to use as gentle of a tone as he possibly can. "Maybe you shouldn't talk like that in front of a baby..."

But Mu Qing isn't listening to him.

"After EVERYTHING you know, you think Mu Qing ever wanted to be in the middle of that shit?!"

Xie Lian falls silent, his stomach sinking.

Oh.

Mu Qing—

"All he ever tried to do was his job , and everyone was always blaming him for everything, using him, lying to him, acting like they didn't WANT him around—and then they got mad at him for LEAVING!"

Mu Qing is in pain.

And Xie Lian wants to tell him that it isn't true.

That it hurt , hearing Feng Xin tell him that Mu Qing had left, but—

'I was GLAD when they told me you left!'

'It was a RELIEF!'

Xie Lian can't forget what he said before.

If he tried to tell Mu Qing he didn't mean any of that now—

He knows his friend wouldn't believe him.

Mu Qing has never been the trusting type, and now—

Xie Lian really, really finds himself beginning to understand why.

"And he did some fucked up shit back then, but he was a TEENAGER, so I don't know WHAT your excuse is now!" His voice breaks, and he cuts himself off, turning around sharply. "But you had NO FUCKING RIGHT!"

Cuo Cuo looks up at him with a frown, eyes wide.

Mu Qing's spiritual power has been lulling him into an induced state of calm, in spite of all of the chaos, but—

He reaches up, putting one small, pudgy palm against Mu Qing's chin.

"No!" He can't really say much more than that, but his expression is a little more clear.

'No crying.'

Mu Qing won't turn around to face the others, not when he has tears in his eyes.

He's already shed tears in front of Xie Lian and Feng Xin before, and he was like that before, upstairs, but—

He refuses to let anyone else see him like this.

"...I know we might have started in different places in life," Jian Lan glares, not bothering to use the fake accent now, with her real identity out in the open. "But for the last eight hundred years, I've been—"

"It really doesn't matter," Mu Qing cuts her off. "I don't care if you've spent all this time rolling around in the dirt with everyone else. Because the MINUTE you had a chance to use the privilege you used to have to hurt someone—you did , and you fucking enjoyed it." He shakes his head. "You haven't changed."

"I...I already said—I never would have done any of that if I had known everything," Jian Lan agrees, hanging her head with shame. "But I—!"

"What are you two talking about?" Feng Xin finally speaks up, tearing his gaze from the back of 'Fu Yao's' head. "What didn't she know?"

Mu Qing doesn't answer him—and Jian Lan bites her lip, unsure. "I—"

"It isn't her place to say."

Xie Lian's tone is completely different from before—which was mortified, and a bit nervous.

Now, he sounds...

Remarkably cold, but firm.

"She's done quite enough."

The female ghost falls silent, eyes downcast, her lips trembling. "Your highness, I—"

"You know, I think it should really speak volumes that my cousin hasn't had a word to say," Xie Lian speaks over her. "And given everything, I think he was aware of what Mu Qing did."

Jian Lian falls silent, looking at Qi Rong, who—

Is remarkably quiet on the subject of Mu Qing.

As a matter of fact, he won't even look at Fu Yao's back, his eyes cast away in discomfort. Implying—

That he did know.

It seems...like he knew all of it.

Xie Lian doesn't say any more—and he doesn't have to, because he's already leveled the greatest insult he's capable of.

That even Qi Rong , foul and loathsome as he is, hadn't crossed that particular line.

Jian Lan can't seem to even muster a response, pale with shame.

Because—

Qi Rong hasn't said a word about Mu Qing this entire time. He's insulted nearly everyone else, but—

Not Mu Qing.

And even now, after Xie Lian has invoked his name, which would normally excite him enough to start ranting—

He says nothing.

"...Well," Fu Yao sniffs, clearing his throat. "Now that we've sorted all of that out," he turns around, setting Cuo Cuo on his feet on the ground, letting him go and stepping away. "You can deal with your own fucking problems. Hopefully he doesn't kill anyone else. I'm done."

Feng Xin takes a step after him, torn. Because in spite of the complexity of the situation—

He isn't alright. Something—

Something is wrong .

He can sense that, and Xie Lian KNOWS that, after hearing—

'I am absolutely NOT okay right now.'

But it's not possible to go after him, not when the toddler that was once happily cooing in his arms shifts, turning into a small, scaled, angry creature, launching itself with sharp, gleaming fangs extended.

"CUO CUO, DON'T BITE!"

In midst of the newfound chaos, Mu Qing stops beside Lang Qianqiu, who seems too stunned by the entire encounter to respond, bending over to press his palm against Guzi's forehead briefly, his hand glowing with power.

"He should be fine. Make sure he drinks more water."

Lang Qianqiu nods, unsure of what to say, or how to respond—but before he can ask or say anything more, the 'deputy god' walks away, disappearing in a flash of light.

"...Ren Song," Xie Lian says, listening to Feng Xin and Jian Lan struggling, "Do you think you could—?"

Shuo glances over at him, rising to his feet.

"Yeah, yeah, no problem," he mutters, walking over, catching and holding Cuo Cuo by the scruff of the neck, letting him flail and shriek for a moment before passing him to Jian Lan, where he seems to become a little more docile.

And once that's taken care of—Xie Lian takes a deep breath, letting go of Hua Cheng's hand.

"Feng Xin?"

The martial god looks over at him, slightly dazed, clearly distressed by the entire situation.

"We need to talk."

Behind him, Hua Cheng looks away—his arms crossed.

Xie Lian and Feng Xin both walk away from the group, stopping at the edge of the forest, and when Feng Xin speaks, he has the sense to do it in Xie Lian's private communication array.

'...Did you know, your highness?'

'About the child?' Xie Lian replies, startled. 'I didn't.'

Feng Xin sighs shakily, almost relieved that at least one person in the situation wasn't hiding something from him. 'Do you have any idea what they were talking about?'

'...I overheard some things while I was in the Inn,' the Prince admits. 'But it's not my place to say.'

Back in front of the Inn, Ren Song kneels down to check on Guzi, and while he does, Lang Qianqiu comments, sounding mildly stunned—

"Fu Yao really is a loyal deputy, sticking up for Xuan Zhen so passionately like that...I had no idea he and the general were so close."

Ren Song opens his mouth, his brow furrowed—then closes it, reaching over to pat the martial god on the knee.

"You learn new things every day, big guy."

"...Why do I get the feeling that you're making fun of me?”

The ghost doesn't explain, ruffling Guzi's hair.

Back with Feng Xin and Xie Lian, the conversation is, well...

'...And look, your highness,' the former guard mutters, rubbing the back of his neck awkwardly. 'About what Fu Yao said, it's...'

Xie Lian turns his head away, and both of them are slightly red in the facel.

'It's okay,' the prince mutters, 'he was upset, and there's been a lot—'

'It was true.'

Xie Lian goes still, his heart actually skipping a beat from the shock. And if he was seventeen, he probably would have felt giddy right about now, but...

He isn't seventeen anymore.

'When we were kids, I mean. I obviously...I mean, I'll always care about you, but—'

Xie Lian lets out a relieved sigh he didn't know he was holding, pressing a hand against his chest.

'It's alright, Feng Xin.' He reaches out, feeling around so he can pat him on the shoulder. '...I felt the same way for a little while, before my ascension,' Xie Lian admits. 'And I'll always care about you too—but after that, when I fell in love for the first time...it was a completely different feeling.'

Feng Xin stares at him, his eyes growing round.

Of course, it's a little shocking to learn that your first childhood infatuation returned your affections—but that isn't the part of the admission that caught his attention the most. No, it—

'When I fell in love for the first time...it was a completely different feeling.'

It...

It is a completely different feeling, isn't it?

'...Was what Jian Lan said true?' Xie Lian questions gently, his hand still resting on Feng Xin's shoulder. 'I understand if you'd rather not–'

'Yeah,' the martial god admits, swallowing hard. 'I mean—she has every reason to think it is,' he modifies his statement, clearing his throat, his face as red as it could possibly be. 'I...God, this is such a fucking...'

'Mess?'

Feng Xin hangs his head helplessly, exhausted.

'Look...' The prince sighs, thinking. 'Mu Qing is going to want space—whether either of us like it or not. You should take Jian Lan and Cuo Cuo back to the Heavens for now.'

Even if both of them hate this, and they're both worried—if Mu Qing wants space, he's going to get it—no matter what they do to try and talk to him.

Feng Xin wishes he was wrong, but—

Obviously, he isn't. And with the new knowledge he has regarding Cuo Cuo's identity...

Not only do he and Jian Lan need to talk—but if he left him here in the mortal realm, and someone else got hurt...that would be on Feng Xin's hands.

He's...his father, after all.

(God, he hasn't even begun to process that.)

The two don't speak as they walk back to the others—and Jian Lan doesn't protest when Feng Xin places a hand on her shoulder, leading her away in stony silence.

Then he stops, looking back.

At the kid in red, standing next to Xie Lian now—and maybe, he wouldn't have guessed who the ghost king was before, but...

The look he gives Feng Xin now sends chills down the martial god's spine, just as he and Jian Lan ascend once more, disappearing in a flash.

"..." Xie Lian sits down with a groan, pressing his face in his hands, feeling Hua Cheng pat his back gently.

Before, the situation was so chaotic—but now, the only ones left are him, Shuo, Hua Cheng, and Lang Qianqiu...

"Where did Qi Rong go?" He mumbles, exasperated.

"Hmm?" Ren Song looks over. "Oh, he snuck off while you and Nan Yang were talking. But we know where he's going now, don't worry."

Xie Lian doesn't look up, not particularly comforted—until Hua Cheng explains,

"I placed a butterfly on him, your highness. We know where he is."

"...I just figured Ren Song would go after him if he ran off," Xie Lian mumbles.

"Oh, no," Shuo shakes his head. "Until gege here gets big again, I'm sticking with him. You two are the reason I showed up here—humiliating that asshole was just a bonus. But..." He glances over at Lang Qianqiu, raising an eyebrow. "Why didn't YOU go after him?"

The Crown Prince of Yong'an pauses, his shoulders hunching with surprise. "I...wanted to make sure Guzi was alright!" He mutters, pointing at the sleeping child irritably.

"Besides, my best way of keeping up with him is if I stick with you. Anything else is just a waste of time and effort."

Hua Cheng looks him up and down irritably, but Xie Lian seems to accept that explanation.

"God," Shuo groans, wiping his hands down his face. "That makes it sound like I'm gonna be stuck with you long term..."

He turns around, stalking back towards the rubble of the inn.

"What are you doing?"

"Dianxia and gege are sitting still for the moment, and I don't want A-Rong sleeping out in the cold," he shrugs.

"A- A-Rong?!" Lang Qianqiu sputters, following after him. "You mean that freak with the tattoo on his forehead?!"

"It's not a tattoo, it's a heavenly seal!"

"Whatever! It's weird that you call him that, his beard almost touches his chest!"

"You're just jealous!"

Lang Qianqiu reacts a little more violently than Ren Song was expecting, flailing his arms about before pointing at him sharply, his ears turning red. "Why the HELL would I be JEALOUS?!"

The demon stops, staring at him like he's lost his mind.

"Because you can't grow a beard?"

"..." The martial god slowly shrinks down, his hackles no longer raised as he looks away, clearing his throat. "Yes I can."

"I'm sure."

"I used to have a mustache, y'know."

Mentioning that doesn't have the intended effect, making Ren Song cackle , hunching over.

"You totally fucking WOULD!" He snickers, pressing one palm against the ground—and when he does, the broken shards of wood all around begin to reassemble, knitting back together, roots deepening as a new structure takes shape.

Lang Qianqiu glares, tapping his foot.

And with the loud groaning and crackling of the wood all around them—along with the fact that his guoshi and the ghost king seem enraptured with one another over thirty feet away, he mutters—

"Why is Hua Cheng in that form?"

"He's not weak, if that's what you're wondering."

"No, I already figured that much out," Lang Qianqiu agrees, shaking his head. "I just don't get why he'd choose to appear that way."

"...The more powerful you are, the more Mount Tonglu affects you," Ren Song shrugs. "I'm a little off, but Hua Chengzhu..." He shakes his head. "If he doesn't keep his powers sealed away for a little longer, then he won't be able to control his impulses. And that could get dangerous fast."

"...But you can control yourself?" Lang Qianqiu leans against the newly constructed wall, rubbing the side of his neck.

"..." Shuo gives him a sharp look out of the corner of his eye, raising an eyebrow. "Yeah. Why?" When Lang Qianqiu remains silent, he sighs. "Look, I know I freaked out that night, but that was just the immediate aftermath—"

"You tried to kiss me."

Obviously, the demon wasn't prepared to hear that—which leads to his knees briefly buckling, sending him tilting forward until he smacks his forehead against the newly built wall with a quiet yelp.

"I— what?!"

"After you stopped crying and everything. I didn't let you, but—"

"No, no—nonononono," Shuo turns around to face him, holding a finger up, a red spot forming on his forehead. "You--you're confused," he shakes his head. "I was probably just trying to EAT you, I wouldn't—!"

"No," Lang Qianqiu shakes his head. "That's what you tried to do at first, so I know what that looks like—and that definitely wasn't what you were doing."

"I..." Shuo stares at him, his mouth hanging open, his face growing more and more flushed by the second. "And why are you saying something now?!"

Lang Qianqiu tilts his head to the side with a shrug. "I don't know. Maybe I wanted to make sure you had yourself under control, I don't wanna awaken anymore of your underlying urges —OOF!"

He hunches over with a grunt when the demon socks him in the gut.

"The only 'underlying urges' I have towards you are VIOLENT!" He snarls, the flush on his face only getting worse when, in spite of the fact that he's still clutching his ribs with pain, Lang Qianqiu has the nerve to smirk up at him.

"Didn't seem that way to me, 'plum blossom.'"

"..." Shuo's eyes narrow sharply, and his tone gets low—dangerous. "Call me that again, and I'll tell Hua Chengzhu you tried to take advantage of me while I was in a vulnerable state."

That makes the martial god grow pale. "But I didn't—!"

"Yeah, well," Shuo shrugs, looming over him, hands on his hips. "I might have an underlying urge to tell a few lies every now and then. Who knows what's gonna happen if I lose control?"

The two glare at one another—and, well, they've been doing that since the very beginning, but...

(There might be something else behind those glares now.)

(Something with a little more...heated, underneath it all.)

Across the clearing, Xie Lian hasn't moved, still holding his head in his hands, all while Hua Cheng's hand rubs against his back, silent, but comforting.

In spite of it all, the prince can't help but smile.

It's just like what he did to soothe Hua Cheng in Qi Rong's lair.

It's a small thing—but the return of the gesture after this much time has passed—

It feels nice.

"...I'm sorry you had to see all of that, San Lang," Xie Lian mutters, pressing his face against his knees. "I'm sure it must have seemed pretty ridiculous."

"No," Hua Cheng corrects him gently. "His highness's companions are always ridiculous, but that isn't gege's fault."

"Oh..." Xie Lian sighs, his shoulders slumping. "I'm not so sure about that."

"I am," the ghost king shakes his head. "Their mistakes aren't your own."

"...Maybe," Xie Lian agrees. "But that doesn't mean I haven't made mistakes. I mean, you heard...everything Mu Qing said back there," he mumbles, his voice wracked with guilt. "I...San Lang, I never asked him about—about any of it—"

"You didn't know," he points out gently.

"...Shouldn't I have?" Xie Lian whispers, the true weight of it settling so heavily upon him.

"You were a child yourself, dianxia," it feels strange, having Hua Cheng reassure him like this when his form is that of a child himself, but... "What could you have done, if you knew?"

Xie Lian shrugs, knowing there really isn't a proper answer to that question.

“…And I gave Feng Xin a golden belt back then,” he mutters. “During my first banishment. I—I should have known, but I was so focused on my own pain back then, I…I should have…”

Hua Cheng falls silent for a moment, looking away—but after taking a slow, silent breath, he asks—

“Should have done what?”

“Asked him about his own problems?” Xie Lian laughs, but there’s no amusement in it. “I was supposed to be his friend, but everything was always…”

Everything was always about him. And Feng Xin—

He might be clumsy, when it comes to understanding emotions. Overly blunt—insensitive at times.

But he has always, without fail, been there for Xie Lian.

“Maybe if I hadn’t been so self centered, Feng Xin and Mu Qing would be…”

“…” Hua Cheng sits down beside him, looking up at the stars overhead, the moon sinking deeper in the sky. “They’ve had eight centuries to work it out on their own, gege. You can’t bear the blame for that.”

“…You think?” Xie Lian mumbles, tired.

Hua Cheng nods, reaching up to push a stray lock of hair behind the God’s ear. “If they felt that way about one another, and went all this time without saying so…then maybe that’s for the best.”

Xie Lian lets out a surprised snort, lifting his head. “Is it that easy?”

“It should be,” Hua Cheng murmurs, eyes never leaving his face.

“…I don’t know,” Xie Lian shrugs, turning his head away from him. “Sometimes—saying what you feel can be harder than you think. It’s not up to you to decide if the road is easy to walk.”

The ghost king falls silent for a moment, thinking that over.

“You’re right, but…” He watches the way Xie Lian’s hair slips over his shoulder. How the moonlight makes his skin almost seem to glow.

“Even if the path is difficult, I choose whether or not to walk it.”

There’s such certainty in his voice, even in this state, it nearly steals Xie Lian’s breath.

“…Even if someone tries to take that choice away from you?” He whispers.

“Even then,” Hua Cheng agrees. “Because whether or not I fight back—that’s still up to me.”

He reaches over, placing his fingertips on Xie Lian’s knee for the briefest moment before pulling them back.

“And if it were up to me…”

Xie Lian can’t meet Hua Cheng’s gaze, but he always seems to feel the weight of it anyway.

“I would tell that person exactly how I feel.”

That person.

That special, brave, kind, hard working, beloved someone.

Beautiful, and—

“I would tell them every chance I got,” Hua Cheng continues, leaving

Xie Lian silently hanging on every word. “I’d tell them until they got sick of hearing it.”

Xie Lian swallows hard, and when he speaks again, his voice is slightly unsteady.

“Why risk that?” He mumbles hoarsely.

“Because,” Hua Cheng explains, his voice even, “that way, every moment of every day—he’d know that he was loved.”

Xie Lian’s fingers drift down to his knee, where Hua Cheng’s fingertips lingered before, and—

“That he’s always been loved.”

He finds a flower there. Small, delicate.

And Xie Lian couldn’t tell you how he knows, but—

The petals are white.

Xie Lian’s fingers tighten around the stem of the flower for a moment, his eyes wide.

‘He’s always been loved.’

For a moment, his mind flashes back to that night in Puqi Shrine, after they returned from Banyue.

How Hua Cheng tucked a flower in his hair, back then.

For a moment, he doesn’t speak—and his lips tremble.

‘This servant was happy to be useful to him.’

The words echo in his mind suddenly and clearly, and he almost flinches.

Hua Cheng’s gaze has never left his face.

“Dianxia—?”

He doesn’t get the chance to complete that sentence before arms wrap around him, pulling him into the prince’s lap and hugging him tightly.

For a moment, Hua Cheng is frozen, too shocked to respond.

“That…that’s beautiful, San Lang,” Xie Lian mumbles, his voice wobbly.

“I…” the prince swallows thickly, pressing his face into the ghost king’s hair. “I really hope you get to tell that person, someday.”

“…” After a moment, Hua Cheng turns around in his arms, wrapping his own around Xie Lian’s neck, returning the embrace.

“I will, I promise.”

Xie Lian doesn’t say anything more, holding him tight, holding him close—like he can’t bear the thought of letting him go anytime soon.

Eventually, he mumbles—

“I’ll be sad when San Lang goes back to normal.”

The ghost king doesn’t pull back, but he raises an eyebrow.

“Hmm?”

Xie Lian presses his face a little closer against Hua Cheng’s hair, explaining—

“It won’t be so easy to hold you like this when you’re big again.”

“…”

Up until now, he’s been vaguely irritated and sheepish in response to Xie Lian being enamored by this form, but…

He smiles, his arms tightening around the god—and he parrots Xie Lian’s words from before.

“Dianxia doesn’t need excuses to hold me.”

The prince opens his eyes, startled as Hua Cheng holds him closer.

“He can just hold me.”

Xie Lian doesn’t know whether to laugh or cry.

Eventually, he does the latter—laughing wetly, his arms right around Hua Cheng’s waist. “As usual, San Lang is right…”

It’s almost comical when Hua Cheng nods solemnly in this shape, stroking the prince's hair—

But suddenly, he stiffens, his form going completely rigid.

Xie Lian doesn't know what to make of it at first, but he's immediately on alert, glancing around until he sees a familiar aura a few feet away.

Across the clearing, Shuo and Lang Qianqiu are suddenly yanked inside the newly built inn by an unseen force, the door slamming shut.

Xie Lian leaps to his feet without hesitation, yanking Hua Cheng behind him, but—

A calm voice interrupts him, immediately setting the prince at ease.

"Don't be afraid. Tea, Xianle?"

A Suicide Mission

Chapter Summary

> "...If the gathering of ghosts can't be stopped, is there another remedy to the situation?" Xie Lian questions slowly, tossing the question round and round in his head.
>
> "There is," Jun Wu agrees, "but—"
>
> "It's more like suicide—if you aren't already dead, that is."

Chapter Notes

> CONTENT WARNINGS FOR THIS CHAPTER: mentioned sexual assault

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Xie Lian freezes, acutely aware of how this looks.

After all, they're currently surrounded by over a hundred unconscious mortal cultivators, and Xie Lian was just sitting in the road, happy as a clam, holding a ghost king—

It…doesn't look good .

“I can explain—”

“No need,” Jun Wu shakes his head. “I was observing.”

Despite appearing out in the open in the middle of a desolate road, a table and chairs have been conjured—where the emperor is sitting comfortably, pouring a steaming cup of tea from a conveniently placed pot.

“My lord…” Xie Lian swallows hard, “You've…descended?”

“You left with Ling Wen, then sent that message about the brocade immortal and didn't return,” Jun Wu explains calmly. “I came to make sure that you were alright.”

…Right.

Xie Lian did do that.

His chest sinks as he rises to his feet.

"I'm sorry—the situation was urgent."

Jun Wu shakes his head, showing no ill will over the matter. "I understand—come, why don't you sit?"

Xie Lian begins to walk over, and Hua Cheng is left where he sits on the ground, staring a hole into the side of Jun Wu's head, until something steals his attention.

A communication array that has remained unusually silent sparks to life, and a voice, one he thought he wouldn't hear for far longer than this, speaks up;

'The emperor has descended?'

Hua Cheng remains still, his face betraying no sign of what's going on.

'Who told you that?'

'Shuo.'

…Of course he did.

Very few people have access to their private communication arrays, and when he saw the emperor, the demon would have wanted to alert backup.

And for Hua Cheng, there's only one being that could be useful assistance—

Another ghost king.

'He isn't here to fight me,' Hua Cheng replies flatly, watching as Xie Lian takes a seat beside the emperor, thanking him for the cup of tea that had been offered. 'He's probably just about to send dianxia on another fool's errand. What are you doing? Where the hell did you go?'

'I'm working on a problem,' Blackwater answers shortly. 'That doesn't matter right now. The upper court is in chaos. Ling Wen cut all of the major communication arrays when she defected, and no one knows where Ming Guang is—'

'I thought you were done reporting on the Heavens?'

Who could possibly be keeping him updated on all of this now, anyway?

'I am—just listen. Do you think I would bother with calling you now if it wasn't important?'

No. Hua Cheng doesn't have an argument there.

He Xuan doesn't communicate frivolously—especially not now.

'What?'

'I'm going to tell you something that is going to make you want to react,' He Xuan cautions him, 'but you can't.'

'That's not particularly comforting,' Hua Cheng mutters.

'And I can't tell you how I know.'

'Even better.'

'Don't leave the emperor and the crown prince alone.'

Hua Cheng's eyebrow twitches, his gaze focused on the two.

'I wasn't planning on it.'

'He's going to try to get the prince alone at some point. And I know you don't like interfering with his highness's wishes—but even if it upsets him, you absolutely can't let that happen.'

Even if it—?

Hua Cheng doesn't disagree with the notion, even if it's slightly more aggressive than what he would normally do, but—

'…Why?'

He can tell there's more to it, something sinister—

But nothing could have prepared him for He Xuan's reply.

'Because he's a rapist.'

Hua Cheng's pupils shrink, his gaze narrowing in on the horrifically minuscule distance between Xie Lian and the emperor.

'And he's fixated on the prince.'

And He Xuan was right.

It takes every ounce of Hua Cheng's control to hold back a reaction.

'…Was it you?' The question is calm, but only on the surface—and He Xuan's reply is quick.

'No.'

'But you're certain?'

He Xuan's voice leaves no room for doubt, ringing with certainty.

'Absolutely positive.'

And He Xuan can't tell him how he knows.

But the fact that he's only telling Hua Cheng now—that means that he didn't know before.

Given what happened to his sister and fiancé—Hua Cheng doesn't think he could have stomached working under Jun Wu for very long if he knew.

Which leaves a short list of possibilities.

And even if Hua Cheng was the one to tell him—when it comes to Jun Wu, Xie Lian wouldn't listen blindly.

He idolizes the man—practically views him as a second father.

'You're gonna lay low?'

'For now,' He Xuan agrees. 'But don't worry—I'll keep up my end of the bargain.'

Hua Cheng rises to his feet.

'I'll be working with our Guoshi until then.'

The line of communication is cut.

Creeeeeaaaak.

Jun Wu and Xie Lian fall silent, their conversation cut off when a chair is pulled back.

Hua Cheng drags a chair away from the table, pulling it around until he drops it down between the emperor and the prince, climbing up and taking a seat, making himself comfortable.

Jun Wu’s eyes never leave him, his expression…odd.

Locked in on Hua Cheng’s younger form.

“…Crimson Rain,” he mutters, staring him down. “That’s a new look.”

“…Isn’t it?” Xie Lian laughs awkwardly, thrown off by the sudden change in atmosphere. “Doesn’t he look just like my…”

“Son?” Jun Wu finishes Xie Lian’s sentence, his voice faint.

“…Exactly.”

…How did Jun Wu know what he was going to say?

After a moment the emperor seems to shake himself out of his stupor, smiling at Hua Cheng calmly.

“I’m afraid this is a conversation between myself and Xianle.”

Thud!

Thud!

Hua Cheng kicks both feet up on the table, tea cups rattling as he leans back in his chair, crossing his arms,

“Everyone knows your upper court is in disarray,” he drawls, eyes baring down on the emperor. “No need to save face.”

Jun Wu’s smile grows thin.

“…I suppose not.”

He looks over at Xie Lian, who has taken to sipping his tea in silence, eyes downcast.

“…I’m sure you’ve already realized, but it’s too late to stop ghosts from flooding the fields of Mount Tonglu before the gates shut—the blockade has failed.”

Xie Lian bows his head, his lips curving downward.

"I'm sorry that the plan was a failure, your majesty.”

"Don't be," Jun Wu shakes his head, sipping from his cup. "You were one of the few that actually succeeded in your assignment."

Xie Lian doesn't know if you could actually call revealing Ling Wen as a traitor, then allowing her to escape with the Brocade Immortal because he was more preoccupied with protecting Hua Cheng as 'Success,' but—

He doesn't regret prioritizing the calamity, so he doesn't argue.

"...If the gathering of ghosts can't be stopped, is there another remedy to the situation?" Xie Lian questions slowly, tossing the question round and round in his head.

"There is," Jun Wu agrees, "but—”

"It's more like suicide—if you aren't already dead, that is."

Hua Cheng interrupts him coldly, his gaze sharp.

Jun Wu stares at him for a moment, then sighs. "Yes. Unless it was absolutely necessary, I wouldn't have wanted to take this step."

Xie Lian's stomach sinks. "...You don't mean...?"

"I've already sent Ming Guang ahead of me," Jun Wu explains, grim. "But that's a temporary solution. A martial god is going to need to infiltrate the gathering of ghosts, and be sealed within the Kiln to eliminate anything else that gets inside."

Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow.

"You sent Ming Guang?" He questions, his tone slightly incredulous, prompting Xie Lian to look at him.

"Is that a bad thing, San Lang?"

"He has more enemies in the Ghost Realm than any other god—as you'd expect, from the one always doing the Heavens' dirty work."

Nan Yang is beloved by mortals for how often he descends—and Ming Guang is hated by Ghosts for the same reason.

“Sending him would not have been my first choice if there had been another option.” Jun Wu sighs, shaking his head—his tone filled with worry.

“Anyone with the nerve to come up with something that dangerous should go themselves,” Hua Cheng counters frostily, and Jun Wu… doesn’t argue.

“I have every intention.”

Xie Lian jolts with shock. “Your majesty, you don’t mean—?”

“Xianle—you’ll have to return to the heavens and take over my duties while I go to Mount Tonglu.”

And that—

That places Hua Cheng in a position where he has highly limited options.

After what he just heard…

The Heavenly Capital is the most dangerous place for Xie Lian to be.

Hua Cheng might have been able to steal Xie Lian away once—but no one was expecting him when he pulled that.

And within Jun Wu’s domain, the emperor is very nearly omnipotent.

So, Hua Cheng can’t allow Xie Lian to return—not alone.

“But your majesty…” The prince sputters. “No one would listen to me!”

“They’ll have to learn to,” Jun Wu shrugs. “I won’t be around forever. Even if this situation hadn’t come, something else would have—there’s a natural beginning and end to things.”

“But I…” Xie Lian swallows hard, shaking his head.

It’s selfish, but also telling, that his first thought was—

‘If I take the emperor’s role, how would I get to see San Lang?’

“…I’m not even the most qualified!” He cries, shaking his head. “Ming Guang should be next in line, not me!”

“Ming Guang is already in Mount Tonglu.” Jun Wu shakes his head. “And if you were a little more aware of Pei’s personal history, you would know that he would refuse the role even more stubbornly than you. He loathes power.”

He thrives on responsibility—but refuses to be in a position where he has no one to answer to.

He isn't like Xie Lian, who was born with thousands praising and blessing his name, with the innate knowledge that the sun and moon could rise and set by his word.

No.

Xianle has always been the most worthy successor, just…

Stubborn, and childish.

A slow learner, for sure.

"…Besides," Jun Wu starts to reach over, but when Hua Cheng doesn't lift his boots from the table between them, he's forced to settle for refilling Xie Lian's cup of tea, instead of patting his arm.

"You aren't a child anymore, Xianle. You're more capable than you realize."

The prince reaches for his cup somberly, and Jun Wu adds—

"Besides, once you outgrow those shackles, the rest of the Heavenly Court will see exactly what I have seen."

Xie Lian bites his lip, not saying a word—and when Hua Cheng speaks, his voice is like ice.

"…Outgrow?"

Jun Wu glances over to meet his gaze, and his eyes flash.

"Oh my," he murmurs, eyebrows raised. "I suppose Xianle hasn't explained—I apologize, you both seemed so close, I assumed—"

"It never came up," Xie Lian replies quietly, and something about his voice—

It makes Hua Cheng feel a little sick.

"We'll discuss it later."

Xie Lian's voice is steady, serene more often than not, but right now…

He sounds meek.

"…All of that aside," Jun Wu presses on. "There's no one else who can go."

Hua Cheng glares at the night sky coldly.

"No. It's not the best option." He looks back down, his eyes hardened with resolve. "You don't belong in Mount Tonglu," the calamity drawls, looking Jun Wu over. "She'll chew you up and spit you out."

The sudden use of pronouns for the landmark seems to catch him off guard.

"You think there's someone more qualified?"

"I think," Hua Cheng taps his heel against the table lazily, carelessly scratching the wood, "the last time you encountered a Ghost King in your own territory, he nearly took you out."

That reminder actually does seem to bother him.

"We could go to Ghost City right now and test how you'd fare," Hua Cheng's eyes slide over Jun Wu, distinctly unimpressed. "But that would just be boring."

"San Lang…"

"Then what would you suggest, Crimson Rain?" Jun Wu cuts him off, staring Hua Cheng down.

"I don't have a suggestion," Hua Cheng shakes his head. "As far as I'm concerned, this discussion has nothing to do with the Heavens."

"…I'm afraid I don't follow."

Even if Xie Lian can't see the way the two are staring each other down—the tension is palpable.

"What am I?"

Jun Wu's mouth doesn't move—but his eyes flash.

Still, his tone is calm when he replies—

"A Ghost."

Hua Cheng's gaze gleams right back at him, his lips quirking up into a lopsided grin, one fang gleaming.

“A Ghost what?”

Jun Wu stares—and his jaw twitches.

“…King.”

“Good…” The calamity smirks. “Dianxia can come along if the Heavens would like to keep an eye on things—but the next Ghost King—and whether or not there will be one at all—isn’t your problem.”

Xie Lian doesn’t speak, but—

…Things are about to get complicated, aren’t they?

"Gege!" A voice cries out in the street, "Look at me! Did you see?"

A teenage boy with cropped hair and broad shoulders looks down, smiling when the little girl sits up, hair askew, having just perfected the act of half-finishing a cartwheel.

"I did! Show me again!"

She grins even wider, nodding eagerly as she goes to flop back in her hands again, making a grandiose, sideways jump—one that her brother applauds, setting aside his tools so he can laugh and cheer her on.

"Looks like someone's an acrobat!"

From a nearby terrace, it's easy to watch them, and imagine happier times.

Running into her brother's office to show off a new trick, breathlessly beaming up at him, crying out—

'Ge! Did you see—?'

"It still takes getting used to," Xiong Li comments, leaning against the railing beside her.

Shi Qingxuan averts her eyes from the siblings below, fiddling with her sleeve restlessly.

"What does?"

"Seeing children playing in the streets of Gusu." He explains quietly.

"When I was little, we were beaten by the palace guards for running in the streets."

Shi Qingxuan winces at the notion, sending him a horrified look. "Why?"

Xiong Li sits against the railing, hair blowing in the breeze. "We had to save our energy and be well behaved livestock."

"...Are you gonna tell that cultivation partner of yours that I skipped out on meditating?" She mumbles, resting her elbows against the edge of the terrace with a sigh, watching the city below.

"Oh, he already knows," Xiong Li hums, a picture of tranquility.

"Huh—?"

The sound of a few notes rattling off of a guqin nearly makes her jump out of her skin, suddenly alerting her to the fact that her master is sitting a few feet away, lounging in the afternoon sun.

If you can call it lounging—he's sitting with perfect posture.

"...I really hate it when you sneak up on me like that," Shi Qingxuan mumbles with a groan, sagging against her elbows.

"Lan An doesn't sneak," Xiong Li smiles, "he just doesn't announce himself either."

And for a man who walks silently, it has the same effect as sneaking.

"..." Shi Qingxuan looks back over her shoulder, where her teacher is sitting on the ceramic tile floor of the terrace, robes pooled around him as he lazily plucks out a tune on his guqin. "...You're not going to yell at me for not finishing my meditation?"

"No."

It’s the fact that he genuinely seems to mean that, that bothers her. Like he didn’t expect her to have much focus to begin with—

“Meditation can help guide your focus and sharpen it,” Lan An murmurs, plucking out a soft melody. “But it cannot be its source.”

“…What does that mean?”

“Meditation requires a base level of self discipline,” Xiong Li shrugs, realizing that must sound like an insult, “No offense, but—”

“No,” Shi Qingxuan sighs, fighting the urge to fall into despair. “You’re both right. I don’t have any of that.”

Her eyes drift down to the pair of siblings below once more, half nostalgic, half sorrowful.

“…You should have seen my brother though,” she mutters. “He always made this sort of thing look easy.”

Even back when they were mortals—he was a picture of discipline and hard work.

“…It’s always a little easier to be tough when you don’t have a choice,” Xiong Li shrugs. “But you aren’t as hopeless as you make yourself out to be.”

Shi Qingxuan isn’t without talent. She knows that. But social skills and an aptitude for mathematics doesn’t help her now .

“…Maybe,” She mutters. “But being four centuries old and needing teenagers to teach me what I should have known in order to ascend in the first place—”

Shi Qingxuan stops, hanging her head.

“Maybe I deserved to be knocked down a few pegs, but it doesn’t feel great, you know?”

“…I don’t know about deserved,” Xiong Li shrugs, “but I think your perception of yourself is a bit skewed.”

Shi Qingxuan doesn’t look up, not in the mood to beg for reassurance—but he continues anyway, drumming his fingers against the railing.

“You lost everything, found out everyone you cared about was lying to you, and now you’re facing almost certain death.”

Well—never mind, that isn’t reassurance at all.

“Any normal person would have lost their mind—or just given up. But not you. You’re still trying.”

"…" Shi Qingxuan stares at her hand, fingers pale and small, wrapped tightly against the terrace railing. "If it wasn't for the baby, I might have."

She doesn't think doing the bare minimum as a mother makes her particularly strong or impressive:

She still hasn't started to show—but the signs are becoming more noticeable.

Fatigue, nausea, tenderness and swelling in the chest.

"…I don't think that you won't have," Xiong Li shakes his head.

"You've been surrounded by gods and calamities your entire life. That would make anyone feel a little average. But compared to normal people…" He reaches over, patting her arm. "You're actually pretty strong:"

Shi Qingxuan snorts, shaking her head.

"I'm silly, ignorant, irresponsible, I don't take anything seriously, I'm a coward, and I let everyone fight my battles for me," she mutters, sounding uncharacteristically bitter.

"You seem to be taking things pretty seriously now." When she doesn't respond, Xiong Li sighs.

He looks over to Lan An for help—and it's clear that his partner is listening, but he never offers what he actually thinks.

Which is typical.

It's not that he doesn't understand, or doesn't care—

He just believes in letting people work things out on their own.

But feelings of worthlessness and self loathing don't go away when left alone—they fester.

"…I'm silly," Xiong Li squeezes her shoulder. "I cry all the time. I get scared of things. Lan An has had to bail me out of trouble more times than I could count. Do you think I'm weak?"

"…No," Shi Qingxuan concedes.

She's been knocked on her ass too many times in the training ring by the blunt edge of a sword to think that.

“But you love this city. Everyone told me about what you did before you ascended. I could never—”

“Even if it didn’t work out—you didn’t hesitate to throw your immortality away to protect your brother,” Xiong Li interrupts her quietly. “Does that make you any less brave than me?”

“…” Shi Qingxuan looks away, and he straightens up.

“Come with me.”

He takes her by the wrist, pulling her away from the terrace over the central square.

“Where are we going?”

“You’ll see.”

He tugs her through the palace insistently, over her protests of being tired and wanting dinner, dragging her through the streets of Gusu.

Wherever they go, people seem to greet him—smiling eagerly, waving, asking after him and his partner.

The Prince of Gusu is beloved—and for the first time in centuries, Shi Qingxuan goes unnoticed, fading into the background.

Then, they reach a set of steps.

“You know, when I was a kid—the curse Wen Jiao put on the city made everyone think that every temple that wasn’t his was a cursed place,” Xiong Li explains, climbing up the temple stairs. “We never dared to go inside of them until a few months ago—but when we did…”

He reaches back, taking Shi Qingxuan’s hand as he pulls her inside.

“It was like learning there was a whole other world out there.”

Shi Qingxuan stops, her lips trembling when she sees the establishment plaque.

A temple of wind and water.

“…No, no,” she mutters, stepping back, “I shouldn’t…I shouldn’t be here…I…”

“It’s okay,” Xiong Li assures her, “You have every right.”

…Then why doesn’t it feel like it?

“I’m not the wind master anymore,” Shi Qingxuan whispers, shaking her head.

“And?”

Xiong Li gently leads her into the temple hall.

“Something tells me the new water master won’t mind.”

Shi Qingxuan falls silent, unsure of what to say.

Whether he cast himself out or not—it’s He Xuan’s rightful title now, but…

It feels strange—almost wrong—to be thinking that now, standing before a divine statue of her brother.

Looking up into a familiar face, heart aching, wishing lips hewn from stone could spring to life—

And tell her what she should do now.

Will they tear all his statues down?

Or will they depict him kneeling, like Xie Lian?

Shi Qingxuan doesn’t think she could bear that, remembering her brother’s pride.

Will the world forget him, and curse him?

Is her fate to fade away and leave behind a cruel reminder of their own past—a wealthy, motherless child?

Or will she survive, left to wander as one of his last believers until the end of her days, struggling to explain to her son what kind of man his uncle truly was?

In either scenario, she feels…hopeless.

Xiong Li looks around at the temple walls—and the murals painted there “Everywhere you look, there are stories of Lord Shi Qingxuan standing up for the weak. Advocating for truth—casting out the wicked.” Xiong Li murmurs, and for the first time, Shi Qingxuan dares to look at her own statue.

“Switched fates or not—the mortal realm adores you.”

“Adored.” Shi Qingxuan corrects quietly.

Huh.

She stares up at her own face.

This just so happens to be a temple where she’s worshiped as a man. That’s rare.

A temple for the Shi Brothers—proud, illustrious, and strong.

Shi Qingxuan never thought that a day would come when she would miss her male form so badly.

If she had to be trapped in one body—she supposes she’d rather be in this one.

When she was a child, she always resented the body she was growing into.

Felt sick at the sound of her deepening voice. Desperately wished she wouldn’t grow any taller. Refused to look in the mirror when she was undressed, not wanting to see what was between her legs.

At the time, Shi Qingxuan told herself that it was the fear talking.

Because the Shi family had one son, and a daughter.

If someone had found out who ‘Mingxia’ truly was, she would have been in danger—even if she hadn’t understood what that danger was back then.

She couldn’t really blame her brother’s dislike and confusion of her using a female form when she became a god—she didn’t understand it either.

Femininity had been a disguise she wore to escape a monster. Why did she use it still, once she was free?

She’s studied enough over the years to understand how mind, body, and soul are connected.

To know that souls are not simple things—that they exist in various shapes and parts, some heavenly and spiritual, others more material.

Those pieces determine everything about you. The person you’ll be, and the people that you’ll love.

For so long, Shi Qingxuan couldn’t help but feel like her soul was in the wrong body. That the shell encasing her spiritual being wasn’t the right shape.

And when she was Lady Wind Master Shi Qingxuan—she didn't feel wrong, or conflicted, or confused—

She only felt beautiful.

And Shi Qingxuan knew she couldn't take that form all the time—that no matter what she did, her original form was that of a man, but...

The longer she was a god, the longer she had that power—the more and more things felt...blurred, in her mind.

And when she had given up that godhood—she wasn't even afraid of dying.

She was afraid that her body would change back.

And that she'd be stuck in a form that felt wrong—but this time, permanently.

But now—

This is the longest she's ever been in her female form. And she's starting to realize...

While this is the form she prefers—it's hard, not being able to change.

And to her shock, she misses the way her other form looks. The way it feels.

Looking up at that stone effigy of herself, she aches for the freedom that comes with self determination.

Xiong Li watches her, watching the statue.

"...That's still you," he reminds her softly.

"You're still the person who did those things. You're still the person they built this temple for centuries ago."

"A fraud."

"A person." Xiong Li shakes his head. "Someone kind and generous. Someone who fought for the weak. That has nothing to do with your fate."

It sounds so simple, but hearing it—it makes her pause, finally breaking eye contact with the statue, really hearing what he's saying.

"...You really think that?" She mutters. "All my life—whether it was my brother, or He Xuan...I was always just..."

Shi Qingxuan stops in front of one of the murals, watching herself, descending from the heavens to rescue a group of mortals.

"...Part of a game I didn't even know I was playing."

"Maybe," Xiong Li agrees. "But what you do from here on out is up to you—no one else."

He stops beside her, looking up at the same mural. "You were how old when your brother switched your fate? Just a teenager, right?" He stares up at the fading, painted faces. "You don't know what you would have been capable of on your own. Not until you try."

“…” Shi Qingxuan offers a tired, unsure smile. “I don’t think I’ll ever catch up to Lan An, though.”

“Ah,” Xiong Li smiles, waving that off. “Don’t kick yourself over it—no one can.”

“And I don’t think I’ll ever be much of a swordswoman, either.” She admits.

Xiong Li doesn’t argue—because really, while she’s shown promise in other areas…Swords clearly aren’t for her.

His eyes drift to the altar where, above and behind each devine statue, rests a fan.

One marked with the character for Shui, the other Feng.

“Who says you have to?”

She’s a little scandalized when he walks over, plucking them off of the wall.

“You can fight with these, you know.” He pauses, holding a ceremonial fan in each hand. “Well, not exactly these—but they’re good for practice.”

“…Should you even be touching those?”

Xiong Li throws his head back with a laugh. “You tell me.”

Technically speaking—they’re still technically for her and her brother, so…

“…You can really use them like that?”

It’s a little awkward—she’s been using a fan for centuries, but never more than waving it around.

"Sure," Xiong Li agrees, "your martial arts aren't bad--and you've got a natural grace to you." He snaps one fan open, moving with them so artfully, Shi Qingxuan can't bring herself to look away. "See?"

"...Where did you learn how to do that?"

"Xie Laoshi, actually."

Xiong Li glances back at her with a smile. "Though he meant it as more of an artistic thing at the time. He's an incredible danger, you know."

"...I didn't," Shi Qingxuan murmurs, feeling almost jealous that she didn't get to see it.

Xie Lian always moves with a natural sense of grace and confidence—one that doesn't really match someone with such a self deprecating demeanor.

A faint echo of the person that he used to be.

"You would almost think that his feet didn't touch the ground, watching him."

Xiong Li tosses one fan over, leaving Shi Qingxuan scrambling to catch it.

"So, what's it going to be? Maybe we can find your 'focus' like this."

She looks down at the ceremonial tool, her fingertips gripping at the handle, staring at the word 'Feng' painted across the front.

Who she is. What she does.

It's all up to her , now.

Shi Qingxuan glances back over her shoulder, looking at her brother's face one more time.

'I love you, meimei.'

Her lips press together into a thin line, eyes determined.

She grips the fan tightly.

"...Show me."

Chapter End Notes

> Happy Chapter 100 everyone!! thank you so much for all of your support, and sticking with the story for this long! I really appreciate it!!
>
> xoxo, Evie

The Gates of Mount Tonglu

Chapter Summary

> The illusion of the mountain before them shimmers and disappears, revealing—
>
> A wide, open basin of fields and hills—framed in by broad, craggy mountain peaks.
>
> Heavy fighting at the edges, fewer and fewer further in.
>
> And there, almost impossible to see in the distance, not without the sharp, unnatural gaze of a child long since slaughtered, is a peak higher than all the others. Bearing down over the land like an ugly reminder.
>
> A burning, jagged scar.
>
> The forge of calamities.
>
> Mount Tonglu.

The road to Mount Tonglu is long—hard. With no access to the general communication array, or to travel arrays, everything has to be done on foot.

Xie Lian is accustomed to the walking—but he feels sorry for Hua Cheng, saddled with shorter legs at the moment.

There are some periods when he's willing to allow Xie Lian to carry him—but never for very long, and after one ill fated ride on Shuo shoulders, he opts to walk on his own, simply walking in double time compared to the others.

At some point Shuo stops, lifting his chin.

When he sniffs the air, his eyes narrow. "...We're getting close."

Lang Qianqiu sends him a curious look, raising an eyebrow. "How can you tell? I don't smell anything."

Xie Lian breathes in himself, curious. "...Resentment," he mutters.

The air reeks of it.

"But..." Lang Qianqiu peers into the distance, eyes narrowed. "I don't see anything."

"You won't," Hua Cheng agrees from Xie Lian's side, his eyes fixed on the horizon. "Just because you're close to the gates doesn't mean you're anywhere near Mount Tonglu itself."

"When people talk about it, they only ever speak of the Kiln," Xie Lian muses, holding Hua Cheng's hand as they continue to move forward down the road.

"Right," the ghost king agrees, squeezing his fingers amicably. "But the area within the gates is similar in size to Xianle."

"...An entire country?" Lang Qianqiu squints into the distance. "That seems like such a waste of space."

Shuo barks out a laugh, shaking his head. "You wouldn't want to live there, trust me."

The martial god frowns, curious, and Hua Cheng sighs.

"The land is cursed."

The acrid taste on Xie Lian's tongue is enough to warn him of that.

"Because of the resentment coming from the Kiln, or—?"

"No," Hua Cheng shakes his head. "The land surrounding the Kiln is what taints it—not the other way around. It's been that way for thousands of years."

And as to why—that reason is as good as anyone's guess.

Even in Zhao Beitong's memories, Hua Cheng never found the answer to that. Meaning the source is so old, it's likely been lost to time.

"And we have to just...kill every single ghost once the gates are shut—?"

"No," Hua Cheng shakes his head, and Shuo's silence feels almost pointed in comparison. "Think of a Calamity as something like a gemstone," he explains, tossing a ruby back and forth between his fingers as though it's little more than a worthless marble.

"Or a blade," he tosses the ruby in the air once more, and this time it lands in his hand as a gleaming dagger with serrated edges, gleaming dangerously under the sun. "Formed through heat and pressure."

Shuo remains silent, his palm pressed against his choker, deep in thought.

"It might take the weight of an entire mountain to form a diamond—but that doesn't mean every single rock is crushed in the process. The same goes for the Kiln. At the outer edges of the gates of Tonglu you'll find the weaker ghosts—cannon fodder."

"Like me." Lang Qianqiu turns his head sharply, finding Shuo offering a sarcastic smile."Eight hundred years ago, anyway. It's not so abnormal to find the ghosts of children just inside the gates."

Xie Lian frowns, feeling a sudden rush of concern.

"You were there when Hua Cheng...?"

"Well," Shuo's eyes drift over to the calamity. "Sort of."

It's not so easy, remembering that now.

Not because of the pain, or the fear he felt in that forest—he's already told Lang Qianqiu about that, even if it was more of an outburst of anger.

No.

Hua Cheng knows why, even he doesn't say so—knowing that it's likely better if the matter goes unacknowledged.

It hurts more, because the last time Shuo was here—he was with Bao and Yanlin.

"...The closer to the Kiln you get, the more powerful the ghosts are."

“Who were the most powerful ghosts last time?” Lang Qianqiu questions, curious.

“You mean with Blackwater?” Shuo shrugs. “No idea, I wasn’t there.”

Hua Cheng hasn’t been overly aggressive to Lang Qianqiu during the journey—but he has been remarkably cold.

Even now he sends him a sharp, uncaring glance before replying, “The gathering of ghosts in Blackwater’s case wasn’t particularly large compared to mine—so the only two particular ghosts that remained were him, as well as myself.”

“…You were there?” Xie Lian frowns.

“But isn’t the line, ‘Only one Supreme from the Kiln Shall emerge?’“

“Yes,” Hua Cheng agrees. “But there are exceptions.”

The prince waits for more of an explanation, but when one doesn’t come, he allows the subject to drop.

“…Are your feet still alright?”

The ghost king squeezes his hand in reassurance, "They're fine, but...does gege just want an excuse to carry me again?"

Xie Lian laughs sheepishly, scratching his neck. "Well, that's..."

Shuo stops once again when they come to a bend in the road, looking back—

"We're here!"

Lang Qianqiu stretches up behind him, scanning the hills. "...I don't see any gates or anything like—wait, is that the mountain?!"

He gawks, staring up at the sky in shock. A formation of that size—how are they only seeing it now?!

"No," Hua Cheng rolls his eyes. "That is the gate."

Lang Qianqiu frowns, looking back up at it in confusion.

There's a huge line of ghosts, each and every one of them staring with dismay, crowding forward and rushing together to reach what looks like a large, craggy rock face.

"Have they already closed?!"

"Just shut up and watch," Shuo grumbles, crossing his arms.

Xie Lian starts to follow them as they make their way towards the line of ghosts, but Hua Cheng stops him, tugging at his sleeve.

"What is it, San Lang?"

"Your scent."

Xie Lian almost feels self conscious for a moment—after all, he washed himself in the river the day before, but they've done quite a bit of walking since then. "Oh, should I—?"

"You smell like a Heavenly Official," Hua Cheng explains patiently. "The hordes will notice."

"Ah," Xie Lian sighs, relieved that it's something as harmless as that. "What should I—?"

He stops when Hua Cheng pulls him down firmly, gripping Xie Lian by the shoulders as he presses their foreheads together.

"There," he murmurs after a moment, letting him go. "All better."

"..." The prince smiles thankfully, but can't help but remember what Heaven's Eye said before, when they first approached Puqi Shrine.

About how he had the 'essence of evil' on his lips, and his...

"Thank you, San Lang."

From ahead, Lang Qianqiu looks at Shuo, expectant.

"..." Shuo slaps him on the back, heading on towards the line. "Good luck, hope you don't get eaten."

"Huh?! You're not gonna help me?!"

"No one ASKED you to come! Go away!"

"Don't be such a brat, just make me smell like you!"

"No! Ask Hua Chengzhu to help you!"

Lang Qianqiu dares one look in Hua Cheng's direction, then glances at Xie Lian, knowing if he asks his Guoshi for help, he could probably get Hua Cheng to...

The ghost king follows his gaze, surmising the martial god's plan, and his eyes flash.

"...I'll help you, General Tai Hua," he offers sweetly, leaving Xie Lian none the wiser.

What he can't see, however, is that the ghost king has his fangs fully extended, and both of his eyes are burning a bride shade of—

Lang Qianqiu turns away, solemn.

"EH?!" Shuo cries out, legs flailing when he's suddenly embraced from behind, lifted off the ground. "What the hell?! You—DON'T PUT YOUR FACE THERE!"

"How else am I supposed to get it?! Stop yelling, you'll make a scene!"

"YOU ALREADY GOT ENOUGH! THAT'S ENOUGH!"

"If you didn't want to be picked up, you would have stopped him," Hua Cheng grumbles under his breath as they carry on—and Xie Lian can't help but smile a little, whispering next to his ear.

"Maybe he wanted to save face."

Normally, Hua Cheng's answering growl of annoyance would be intimidating—but Xie Lian can't help but let out a soft laugh at how adorable it sounds, leading to whining in his private communication array.

'Gege...'

'I'm sorry San Lang, I'm really sorry—you're just so cute!'

This doesn't seem to soothe the ghost king at all, leaving him grumbling.

'Well, I won't be like this for much longer.'

Xie Lian makes a soft sound of disappointment in the back of his throat, and somehow, that manages to make Hua Cheng look even more depressed.

The prince understands why Hua Cheng would want to be back in his normal form as soon as possible. It must be a wound on the pride to be seen like this—and even if it wasn't, this is no place for a child, even if it's just an eight hundred year old ghost in a child's body.

It almost felt like a joke when they initially set off, having Hua Cheng's assistant come and fetch Guzi to take him back to ghost city, leaving Hua Cheng, who looked the same age, behind to go fight a horde of ghosts and demons.

'I understand, I understand…' Xie Lian sighs, trying not to sound too pitiful.

But then he notices something else, drawing his attention away.

“…Shuo, where did Lang Qianqiu go?”

The forest demon shrugs, and Xie Lian hears the telltale sign of something wooden rattling around in his pocket.

“Who can say?”

“…”

The prince presses a hand to his forehead, exasperated.

“I thought San Lang said you couldn’t use that spell anymore?”

“There are always exceptions,” Hua Cheng repeats his sentiment from before, not seeming bothered that Shuo took a lead out of his book at all.

“It’s for the best, gege—this part is going to require a bit of tact.”

(Something that General Tai Hua infamously lacks.)

And, in part, it may have also been motivated by the fact that now, Hua Cheng is the only one who can see the way Shuo’s cheeks have suddenly turned an angry shade of pink.

Still, it’s enough of an explanation to halt Xie Lian’s scolding.

Ahead, they can hear arguing.

"What do you mean, you can't walk around it?! The base can't possibly be that wide!"

"I'm telling you!" Another ghost grumbles, his arms crossed. "We walked around the foot of the mountain for three days before turning back!"

"Can't we climb it?!"

Just as one of them asks, a spirit in the shape of a large bird comes crashing down from the sky, wings twitching with exhaustion as it hits the ground with a dull /hud!

...It's too high to even climb?!

Xie Lian frowns. "...You're sure we aren't too late?"

Hua Cheng nods, standing near the crowds, but not close enough for them to be in the middle of it.

"Just wait a few moments gege, we'll be able to keep moving soon."

Just as he says that, one of the ghosts grumbles—

"Hey—is it just me, or do I smell a Heavenly Official?!"

Xie Lian can't help but stiffen up, even if no one is looking at him—not yet—wondering how they could have noticed so quickly.

Hua Cheng just protected Xie Lian with his own scent, and even after his antics with Shuo, Lang Qianqiu was turned into a Daruma Doll, so...

How?!

"Gege," Hua Cheng speaks to him quietly. "Someone is trying to stir up trouble—they haven't noticed anything yet, so best not to react for now."

Xie Lian nods, still firmly holding onto his hand as the ghosts argue among themselves.

"What should we do?"

"Is it an ambush?!"

"Look," One of the ghosts, a gangly, thin faced man, speaks up above the others. "It should be simple—we're all in a truce not to fight one another until we get through the gates anyway—so strip your masks and armor, and speak your titles. Then, we can sort out the fake!"

Several of the other ghosts cry out with agreement, "That seems like the easiest way to test it!"

Xie Lian can't really tell how that proves much of anything, but says nothing as the ghosts around them begin stripping off their cloaks and masks.

"Since it was my idea, I'll go first! I'm Demon of the Swift Executioner's Blade! My master was the royal executioner of Xuli! There ain't another blade that's snapped as many necks as me!"

Xie Lian supposes he shouldn't be surprised by how morbid that is.

And as they go down the line, every single one of them seems to--despite none of them being that impressive--have names that involve overt adjectives.

Like the 'terrifying' or the 'bloodthirsty,' 'destroyer of bloodlines,' stuff like that—until...

They reach their group.

"...And what about you?" The 'Demon of the Swift Executioner's Blade' takes a step forward, looking Ren Song over with an evaluating eye.

He's switched into a less intimidating shape—that of a young man with plain, brown hair and hazel eyes.

"Shuo," He replies flatly.

That causes a mild stir of confusion, because compared to the other names—

"That just sounds FAKE!" One of the ghosts grumbles, looking him over. "Are you even strong enough to be here?!"

His lower lip juts out. "What do you mean, it sounds fake?"

"It's...it's just a name!"

"...Yeah," Shuo agrees, glancing around the group. "Only important ghosts have titles, and I don't see any around here."

Xie Lian expected as much, but feels almost sorry for the group as he senses countless egos being punctured.

"Oh," his eyes grow round. "Are we just making stuff up based on what we do best?" He glances around the group, then takes a deep breath, pressing his thumb against his chest.

"Then I'm Shuo, the Castrator!"

...Xie Lian doesn't know whether to laugh or cry.

"...What?"

Shuo is one of the very few ghosts to actually possess a true title—why isn't he identifying himself?

(Little does Xie Lian know, Shuo and Hua Cheng shared a quick look before he spoke in the first place.)

"Yep," the teenager confirms with a grin. "See..."

He reaches to one of the straps on his thighs, and Xie Lian has always been aware of the fact that he carried daggers there, but he's never bothered to unsheathe them in the prince's presence before.

"I take this, and I—"

Several nearby ghosts cringe in discomfort.

"No need to explain! Really!"

"—cut off the important bits, then, I fuse their souls with it and put them in these," he lifts a small wooden doll out of his pocket, red and orange, with angry eyebrows—and the men stare with horror. "Cute, right?"

"Y...you mean that's a—?!"

Shuo bobs his head eagerly. "Yeah! And if I touch someone with it," his eyes drift down, staring directly at a very specific area on one of the ghosts across from him. "It absorbs your resentment, and makes you...smaller."

Suddenly, everyone seems eager to give him a wide berth.

"...W..what's the red panda for?" Someone stammers.

It would seem that Qi Qi has chosen this moment to make himself known, poking his head out from the back of Shuo's cloak before settling on his right shoulder.

The demon smiles, eyes glinting.

"He eats the leftovers."

The red panda opens its mouth, screeching softly, as if in agreement—and the others cringe away, quickly removing their attentions from him, instead turning to...

Xie Lian.

"And what about you?" One of them sniffs, eager to move on. "Your essence of evil is pretty weak."

"Oh," Xie Lian smiles, having had time during Shuo's...explanation to brainstorm a cover for himself. "I'm a puppet master."

Puppet Masters aren't exactly as common as they used to be, but still a well known type of ghost—typically having a weaker essence of evil.

"Huh?" The demon blade glances around, his eyes narrowed suspiciously. "I don't even see a puppet anywhere around here! How can you say that?!"

"Sure there is," Xie Lian smiles, reaching down to scoop Hua Cheng up and into his arms. "See?"

"...That's a puppet?" One of the men steps closer. "No way, it looks too real!"

"Are you kidding?" A female ghost shakes her head. "He's way too pretty to be real! What kind of child has eyelashes that long? He must be made out of human skin!"

Actually, it seems to catch the attention of many ghosts standing nearby. "Say, gege...do you make other puppets like this?"

"I want one JUST like it! Do you take commissions?”

"Can you make mine a little bigger—?"

"Sorry, sorry," Xie Lian smiles, shaking his head.

"All of my puppets are one of a kind!" He hugs Hua Cheng a little closer, stroking the boy's hair when one of the women tries to touch him. "And his temper's no good, so I wouldn't touch him if I were you."

Hua Cheng's eyebrows raise, and the ghosts 'oooh' and 'ahh' in response.

“He’s so lifelike!”

“…Wait a minute…” The Executioner’s blade glares, looking back and forth between Xie Lian and Hua Cheng. “There’s something off about that puppet master.”

“Huh? What do you mean?”

“His essence of evil—it’s off.”

"…Ain't that because he's a puppet master? They've got weak auras anyway!"

"Yeah, but his essence of evil is only on the surface!" The blade spirit glares, eyeing Xie Lian a little more closely. "Almost like he's been dyed with it."

"I don't know…can you really tell?"

"There's an easy way to test it out," he lifts a yellow talisman from his pocket, making the other ghosts around gasp and cringe away with shock.

"What the hell?! Why do you have one of those?!"

"IS HE THE OFFICIAL?!"

"Would you calm down?!" He glares.

"I was the first one who noticed—why would I bring it up if I was the one faking?!"

He has a point there, placating the other ghosts, and Xie Lian frowns, hugging Hua Cheng a little closer.

The blade spirit isn't a complete idiot like the others, is he?

"I killed a group of cultivators on my way here," he continues, holding the talisman up for everyone to see. "I stole this off of them to pick off low level spirits. Watch."

He presses the talisman against his forehead, and when he does—it bursts into flame.

But, rather than harming him—it simply crumbles to ash, leaving only a faint scorch mark behind.

Similar to how Shuo's body reacted when the cultivators tried to attack him back at the inn.

"It's too weak to actually harm you, but if you're a fake…we'll be able to tell."

Xie Lian senses the talisman being held out to him, his expression hidden by the rim of his bamboo hat, hanging low.

'…Gege,' Shuo speaks up, watching the Blade Spirit cautiously. 'Let me take them out.'

The ghost king remains calm, chin resting on Xie Lian's shoulder.

'Have you made a decision?'

Shuo grimaces, and when he doesn't respond—Hua Cheng makes the choice for him.

'No.'

'But—'

'No.'

Xie Lian reaches out when Hua Cheng says nothing to stop him, pressing the talisman against his forehead without hesitation.

It does exactly what it did before—bursting into flames and crumbling into ash upon contact.

But this time, no scorch mark is left behind—proving the demon blade was right.

The "puppet master's" essence of evil was only on the surface.

"…That proves—!"

"Nothing."

Everyone stops when Hua Cheng speaks—his voice far too deep, too haughty to be that of a mere child—or a puppet, for that matter.

"I can't believe you all bought that," the ghost king snickers, surveying the group.

"…What are you talking about?!"

Hua Cheng smirks, raising a hand up to stroke Xie Lian's cheek, thumb tracing over his jaw—and with a simple snap of his fingers, the prince moves woodenly, setting him down on the ground.

"This pretty little thing is my creation, not the other way around."

The ghosts don't know how to react to hearing a small child (visually, anyhow) call a perfectly normal sized grown man a 'pretty little thing,' but—

“…You’re the real puppet master?!”

Hua Cheng’s grin turns crooked and sly.

“Of course I am, you stupid pieces of trash.”

He twists his fingers—and at the same time, after speaking in their private array, Xie Lian obediently drops to his knees beside him, Hua Cheng reaching up to pet his hair.

“Why would I make a puppet so small?” He sneers, shaking his head. “He’s much more suitable.”

No one bothers to argue with him there, but…

Now the female ghosts are doing a very different kind of fawning than before.

“Oh, I REALLY want one just like him!”

“He’s a little skinny—couldn’t you have put a little meat on his bones, Mr. Puppet Master?!”

“Oh, I don’t know…” One of them smiles, reaching for Xie Lian’s shoulder. “You never know what kind of body might be beneath those robes…”

But before she can touch him, Hua Cheng’s fingers snatch her by the wrist.

And while he might look small, he squeezes until it cracks.

“He wasn’t lying before,” the boy explains thinly, letting the woman go as she shrinks away, clutching her arm to her chest.

“My temper is bad.”

“O-Over something like a puppet?!”

He spares them one cold, disinterested look.

“Why would I let anyone touch something I love?”

Shuo stiffens, looking sharply in their direction—but Hua Cheng doesn't seem particularly phased, and Xie Lian forces himself to bite back laughter.

He's really getting into the role, isn't he?

"Yes," Xie Lian agrees solemnly, shaking his head. "Master gets very angry when anyone else tries to touch me."

The use of 'master,' makes Shuo nearly slap his hand against his forehead, and after a brief pause, Hua Cheng nods, his fingers tightening in Xie Lian's hair possessively.

The prince's expression briefly falters.

"...I know a way we can check the puppet to make sure he's telling the truth," the demon blade stares Hua Cheng down. "If you stab them, they don't bleed. Why don't we take a—?"

In an instant, the very air changes around them, growing frigidly cold.

All sounds of life cease.

And while no one else around can quite understand what happened—Xie Lian sees it clearly.

All around them, the air is burning crimson—Hua Cheng's aura bearing down on the crowd of ghosts, so powerful on its own that it's nearly enough to suffocate them.

(Shuo rolls his eyes)

"Oh?" Hua Cheng smiles, and just as quickly as the terror began, it stops—with the air suddenly going back to normal. "You want to try it? See what happens."

It's a threat that doesn't even attempt to be subtle.

"Gege, get behind me."

Normally, Xie Lian wouldn't listen—but under the guise of master and puppet he obeys, moving to crouch behind the ghost king, murmuring—

"Yes, master."

The ghost king opens his mouth to respond, but—

"Say..." The executioner's blade looks behind the two. "That one didn't flinch."

When nearly everyone else on the field nearly keeled over with shock, one ghost standing in the background was completely unaffected.

"You—take off your cloak. What's your title?"

The figure obeys—lifting his hood to reveal a perfectly average face.

Very obviously a fake.

"Oi, did you hear what we said?! Show yourself, not that—!"

Everyone freezes in the middle of their accusations when they hear a sharp, pained cry, and—

A flash of Heavenly light.

Suddenly, the Executioner's blade drops to his knees, bleeding.

"W-What?!"

"Where did that come from?!"

In the blitz of the panic, everyone looking around and trying to see who did it, Shuo raises an eyebrow, eyeing the wound in the demon spirit's side.

"Looks like it was someone using a sword, so...ah. Basically any of you."

One of them fumbles around in the blade spirit's pack, pulling out another handful of talismans. "...Just how many cultivators did you kill?!"

"I don't know!" He groans. "Twenty? Maybe more?"

"Well—look, he's got a shit ton of these talismans. Let's test everyone!"

Some of the weaker ghosts have to be talked into it, worried that the talismans will be enough to rip them into shreds, but after countless reassurances, all of the ghosts pair off, pressing talismans to each other's foreheads.

Shuo watches the scene unfold, frowning.

'Gege...'

'No.'

'There are a LOT of ghosts here,' Shuo protests, watching as the ghosts begin to stare around at one another when nothing happens, tugging at the talismans on their foreheads.

"Why aren't they working?!"

"MINE WON'T COME OFF!"

'If you don't let me take him out now...'

'Have you made a decision?'

Shuo grits his teeth, hanging his head—and Hua Cheng shrugs, unbothered.

'I'm curious about something—let him go for now.'

'But—!

'It might be more difficult, but you can deal with him later if we need to.'

Then, he says something that gives Shuo no more room for argument.

'Or I will.'

Despite being a fearsome force within the realm of the dead—Hua Cheng rarely takes to the field himself.

And even when he does, it's rarely a fight at all.

But that tone...

'...Yes, sir.'

Xie Lian senses that something is going on as well—though maybe not as vividly as the other two, looking around suspiciously, and then...

There—

He stops, staring at a familiar aura not so far away from the rest of them.

...There really is another god here.

"You—?"

BOOM!

The rattle is sudden enough to make Xie Lian sway on his knees, only to be held in place because—

Hua Cheng is still gripping his hair.

That...

BOOM!

BOOM!

BOOM!

BOOM!

"Are you alright, gege?"

"...En."

All around them are withering piles of smoke.

"I really can't even say it was that good of a trap," Shuo grumbles, kicking at a pile of ashes. "They were just morons."

And the fools remaining—those who weren't quick enough to use their talismans—are now running for the hills, screaming at the top of their lungs.

"IT WAS A TRICK! WE WERE SUPPOSED TO HAVE A TRUCE!"

"HA!" The man who was standing there before, gangly and thin faced, suddenly looks a bit less gaunt than he did before.

Taller, broader—with a malicious sneer.

"WHO WOULD MAKE A TRUCE WITH YOU WEAKLINGS?!"

He barks out more laughter, cackling as he takes in the destruction around him—

And absorbing the power of hundreds of ghosts, all the while.

His gaze turns to the group remaining, eyes narrowed with hunger, but...

The boy with the red panda on his shoulder stares him down.

Not speaking, his posture relaxed, but...with his hand resting on the hilt of the dagger strapped to his leg, silently begging the question—

'Wanna try it? '

But he doesn't—no.

He's already taken out all of the weaklings at the edges of the gates.

Now, he moves inward.

Shuo watches him run ahead, all while the illusion of the mountain before them shimmers and disappears, revealing—

A wide, open basin of fields and hills—framed in by broad, craggy mountain peaks.

Heavy fighting at the edges, fewer and fewer further in.

And there, almost impossible to see in the distance, not without the sharp, unnatural gaze of a child long since slaughtered, is a peak higher than all the others. Bearing down over the land like an ugly reminder.

A burning, jagged scar.

The forge of calamities.

Mount Tonglu.

Xie Lian reaches up to press a hand against his temple, wincing.

Hua Cheng lets go of his hair, his hand moving to cup the back of his neck. "Gege? Are you alright?"

"...Yes," the prince mutters, rising to his feet. "The shackle in my eyes is just...it's fine."

Hua Cheng frowns, not wanting to leave it at that, but...

"...Ming Guang," Xie Lian turns his head, looking toward the man who was standing behind them before.

The one with the 'plain' face.

"The emperor mentioned that he sent you here—how were you able to hide so well?"

In an instant, the general shows his true face—dark, wild hair pulled back from his face—violet eyes gleaming under the stormy skies bearing down from above.

But there's no joy in them. No gleaming air of amusement that they had before.

His armor is streaked with blood.

Not his own.

The scar above his left eye seems more noticeable than ever—and rather than answer, he reaches for a canteen at his hip, handing it over to the prince.

Xie Lian opens it, taking a sniff—then pales.

Demon's blood.

"...You were drinking this?"

"Gets the evil essence on ya, inside and out," Pei Ming shrugs, taking it back. "I can purge it later. No harm done."

"..." Even Hua Cheng sends the general a look that is almost within the realm of concern, but Xie Lian—

He's visibly worried.

"It's risky."

Xie Lian's been pushing down the thoughts for weeks now, knowing that when you verbalize something like that, you might actually speak it into existence, but—

Emotional control is a key aspect of cultivation. Controlled through meditation and other means of discipline.

Xie Lian doesn't think Pei is necessarily out of control at the moment, but—

He also knows that, during his first banishment, before the events of Lang-er Bay...even if he hadn't recognized it at the time...

He had been in the early stages of what was likely qi deviation.

It was miraculous that he lasted as long as he did, through everything that he did—Xie Lian doesn't think he can claim any form of mental strength got him through it, no—

It was probably the cursed shackle.

Xie Lian still wonders, if he lost them now, if he would...

He also wonders if Wu Ming had known.

If that was why the ghost had been so careful with him. So gentle, and kind.

Knowing how fragile Xie Lian was, even if he had been too blind to his own brokenness to see it at the time.

But Pei Ming...is clearly unwell.

And Qi Deviation—despite what many who haven't trained in cultivation believe—isn't an instantaneous process.

It's a slow decline—only burning brightly at the very end, when it's nearly impossible to stop it.

But...

When Xie Lian eyes his aura—it seems stable.

For now.

"...Better question is why you two are here," Pei mutters, looking Xie Lian and Hua Cheng over, his eye lingering particularly long on the ghost king.

Eyeing his hair, the shape of his face—almost like something is tugging at his mind.

"Though I suppose I shouldn't be surprised that the emperor sent you," he continues, his gaze settling fully on Xie Lian. "I don't doubt your skill—but he had no business sending you here, your highness. You should turn around now, while the gates are still open."

"He didn't send dianxia," Hua Cheng speaks up, arms crossed over his chest. "I allowed his highness to come with me, but I came to deal with the Kiln myself."

Pei Ming's eyes drift to the teenager standing beside them, who seems to be giving the general the same look over.

Then, after a moment, he smiles, waving at him.

"I'm just looking after Hua Chengzhu while he's small."

"Why is he like that, exactly?" Pei questions, sending Hua Cheng a brief, confused glance.

Xie Lian rubs the back of his neck with a shrug. "He won't be for much longer..."

Hua Cheng can't help but hold back an annoyed stare when the prince sounds deeply disappointed by that fact, but—

"WELL, WELL, WELL!" A voice booms throughout the valley. Familiar, though...

Xie Lian thought he had already left.

"IF IT ISN'T THE FIERCE AND MIGHTY GENERAL!"

Pei Ming doesn't rise to the bait, tilting his head and raising an eyebrow.

"Shouldn't a desperate little demon like you be fleeing toward the Kiln for more beasts to swallow?" He questions flatly, drawing his blade. "Or would you rather end your journey here?"

"...Ming Guang," Xie Lian speaks up again, pressing a hand against the general's arm. "Maybe you shouldn't leap into this fight without thinking—that creature's aura is deceptively strong—"

"First of all, your highness—I don't think I've mentioned it to you before, but I prefer to be called by my mortal name by friends," Pei corrects him calmly, and before Xie Lian can feel pleased by being referred to as the general's friend, he adds;

"Second, you should be a little more worried about your little red friend right now."

Xie Lian turns to Hua Cheng, immediately stricken. "San Lang?!"

"I..." When the ghost king answers, his voice is noticeably strained. "I'm sorry for the timing, gege, but I..."

Xie Lian drops to his knees beside him, hands on Hua Cheng's shoulders.

"Shuo—what's wrong with him?!"

"The gates are closing," Shuo explains, stepping between the two of them, Pei Ming, and the blade spirit, his eyes on the horizon. "His true form is going to unseal itself."

But binding his body down into this form wasn't an easy process—and that seal coming undone is equally unpleasant.

Not only that—but it leaves the calamity in a vulnerable state.

"...Okay," the prince mutters, taking a deep breath. "Ruoye!"

The spiritual device unravels from around his neck, immediately forming a protective circle around Hua Cheng. Once that's done, Xie Lian reaches behind him, unsheathing fangxin.

But the moment he does, something else comes whooshing towards him.

"...E'Ming?"

Shuo looks back at them over his shoulder—and he can't help but giggle, clapping a hand over his mouth.

"Oh, that's so cute!"

The deadliest scimitar on earth, and it's smaller than one of his daggers!

"...Thank you for wanting to help," Xie Lian smiles, petting the blade. "But fangxin is better suited for this."

The eye in the hilt of the blade widens from the rejection as it slinks back to Hua Cheng's side, only to be batted away with annoyance.

"Didn't you hear him?! He doesn't want your help, useless trash!"

"Hey, hey..." Xie Lian catches the blade when it flees from its master, trembling with sadness. "I don't think that's true—you're very useful..."

The weapon doesn't seem all that comforted—particularly not when Xie Lian drives E'Ming into the ground before the circle, forming a 'lock.'

Behind them, the demon of the swift executioner's blade circles Pei, watching him with a sharp, hateful eye.

The general, however, doesn't seem particularly impressed.

"Do I know you?"

The demon smirks back at him.

"You haven't recognized me yet? That's typical," he sneers.

“So important now, such a success! Of course you wouldn’t remember!”

Pei Ming’s eye twitches with annoyance as the creature lunges forward to attack, arm transforming into a blade, and he raises his own to block.

CLANG!

The general’s parry was perfect—naturally.

And yet.

Half of the sword flies through the air, burying itself deep in the dirt, and—

Pei sighs, tossing the other half aside, as though part of him expected it.

The demon blade stares for a moment, throwing his head back and cackling.

“I CAN’T BELIEVE YOU’D USE SUCH A TRASH SWORD!”

“…Pei,” Xie Lian mutters, startled. “Was it really able to break your spiritual device that easily?”

“Huh?” The general looks back at him, shaking his head. “Oh—that wasn’t a spiritual device.”

“…It wasn’t?”

“Nope,” Pei yawns with a shrug. “That was just a half decent blade I picked up on the way here.”

“Bringing a mortal weapon to Mount Tonglu?” Shuo raises an eyebrow. “Ballsy.”

“…Well,” Xie Lian clears his throat, pushing past his own curiosity.

"It's probably time to use your actual blade."

"…That was my actual blade," Pei Ming explains. "I didn't bring another."

"…"

"…You didn't bring one of your spiritual devices?!"

Pei Ming's answer almost feels like insanity.

"I've never forged one."

Shuo gawks at him, and even Xie Lian's jaw drops.

"…You've…done all of this…" Xie Lian mutters, feeling a little winded, "Without ever having a spiritual device?"

The strongest among any god aside from the emperor—

And he fights without an actual weapon?

Even Xie Lian has Ruoye and Fangxin.

Taking into account just how many missions Jun Wu has sent him on in the last decade alone—

Xie Lian finds himself quietly astounded.

"I borrowed Shui-Xiong's sword sometimes, if things were a little too serious," Pei recalls quietly. "But otherwise, no."

"But why—?"

The demon blade attacks again—and this time, Pei Ming blocks him with his forearm, allowing the blow to be absorbed by his armor.

But he finds that each time he blocks, the demon seems to absorb it with ease, constantly launching into its next strike. Almost…

Almost like it already knows exactly what to expect.

"YOU DON'T KNOW WHO YOUR OWN SENIOR IS, DO YOU, KID?!"

Xie Lian pauses—unable to recall the last time in the last eight centuries that someone called him that.

And now, Pei's eyes flash with understanding.

This isn’t just a petty grievance, or some demon he’s offended in the past.

This—

“HAVEN’T YOU EVER HEARD OF THE GENERAL WHO SNAPPED HIS SWORD?!”

This is personal.

Pei Ming peers at the demon, eyebrows raised in recognition.

“…Ming’Guang?”

Xie Lian pauses, confused. "...But aren't you Ming Guang?"

Normally, this is where Hua Cheng would pipe up with an explanation—he's always so helpful in that way—but now he's silent, his face twisted with discomfort as he sits within the protection array, meditating.

He turns his head in Shuo's direction, and the teenager shrugs. "I know I look super smart and everything, but studying Heavenly Officials was never my thing."

But it IS Hua Cheng's 'thing,' apparently?

Pei Ming glances back at them both, irritated.

"Ming'guang was my sword."

Xie Lian frowns, thinking. "But you just said you never had—?"

"A sacred blade given to me by the King of Xuli when I was first appointed as a general," Pei Ming mutters, staring Ming'guang down. "That's why we saw that flash of Heavenly Light before."

"...It is?"

Xie Lian stares, blindly in his direction, surprised—and a little sheepish. "...I assumed you took advantage of that moment to attack him."

"Your highness—I know we've not spoken much until recently, but we've known of each other your entire life." Pei Ming raises an eyebrow. "Have you ever known me to be the type of man that uses sneak attacks?"

"...No..." Xie Lian mumbles, feeling a little silly.

"The moment I snapped Ming'guang in half, I ascended." Pei Ming continues his explanation, looking back at his former weapon.

"You couldn't erase the stain of Heavenly Light from it after that, even if it's been reduced to this state."

Ming'guang cackles, shaking his head. "REDUCED?! I'm more now than I EVER could have been at the side of a weak, SPINELESS coward like YOU!"

It's quite a flurry of insults being leveled at the general—but none of them seem to particularly bother Pei Ming.

"But that makes him an old demon—older than you, your highness. He won't be easy to deal with. Especially not with both of your spiritual devices occupied."

"Well," Shuo speaks up, his eyes never leaving Ming'guang, like a cat watching a bug skittering across a wall. "Something tells me he's going to try and take out the defense array before gege wakes up, at which point..."

Shuo would interfere—which is better than nothing.

"...Why would he go after him?"

"A demon of that level definitely figured out who he was after Hua Chengzhu pulled that little stunt when someone suggested stabbing you," Shuo mutters. "Remember how quickly he refocused his attention?"

...He did.

"That thing might hate General Pei—but it isn't here to settle a score." Shuo jerks his head back in the direction of Mount Tonglu. "The way to make it to the Kiln is to consume other high level ghosts. Devouring Hua Cheng when he's in this state would be the ultimate prize."

Xie Lian's eyes flash at the mention of that, taking one protective step back inside the defense array.

If it was this dangerous for Hua Cheng, then why did he come—?

The answer is obvious, but Xie Lian doesn't dare put more thought into it right now.

"Oh, don't worry," The demon blade smirks. "I don't plan on wasting anything. I'll make a meal out of the rest of you, too."

As he speaks, both of his hands transform into blades—and in a flash, he's attacking Pei Ming again.

Each blow landing with shattering force.

Pei Ming is handling it about how Xie Lian would expect from a martial god of his caliber, blocking each blow with his vambraces—but without a means of attack, that posture can't last for—

"IT'S YOU!" The group falls silent and still as a voice booms over the plains.

Unfamiliar to most, but Xie Lian groans, wiping a hand down his face.

Of course—HE would show up.

"BANYUE'S LITTLE UNDERLING!" The newcomer roars, charging down the hill, his club raised. "YOU CAME A LONG WAY JUST TO DIE, LITTLE UNDERLING!"

...General Ke Mo.

"...Your highness, who is that?”

"Trouble," Xie Lian mutters, trying to think of what to do.

It's already complicated enough, dealing with the demon blade. Ke Mo isn't much trouble on his own. But together...

"HEY! BIG GUY!" The blade spirit calls over. "YOU UNDERSTAND ME?"

He's been crying out in the language of the Crescent Moon Kingdom so far, which only Xie Lian is proficient in—but he understands the modern tongue, enough to nod in acknowledgement.

Ming'guang points his thumb towards the group before them, jerking his head in that direction.

"You wanna kill them? Cause that's what I'm trying to do. Why don't we just team up and get the job done faster?"

Ke Mo stares him down, thinking, and Xie Lian panics, lifting his head to shout—

"PEI SU! BANYUE!"

When he does, Ke Mo goes rigid.

"DON'T COME BACK HERE!"

"...Those two are here?!" The general whips his head around, scanning the area. "SHOW YOURSELVES, YOU GRIMY COWARDS!"

"HEY!" Ming'guang snaps, staring Xie Lian down. "I don't know what he said—but he's speaking your language on purpose! He's probably trying to trick you!"

That seems to snap Ke Mo out of it, much to Xie Lian's dismay.

"...you THINK YOU CAN TRICK ME THAT EASILY?!" The general glares, charging back towards them.

"I almost did," Xie Lian mutters under his breath—and Pei Ming glares at the two adversaries, thinking.

"...Kid," Shuo glances up, looking in his direction. "You think you can handle the big one?"

Shuo's eyes return to Ke Mo, sizing him up. "Yeah. But he's not the one going after—"

"I'll keep that old rusty sword of mine away from your gege if you take care of him. Deal?"

That seems to draw a scream of indignation from Ming'guang, his eyes burning as he charges toward the general, blades raised.

"WHO ARE YOU CALLING AN OLD, RUSTY SWORD YOU WEAK, PATHETIC OLD MAN?!"

The two glance toward one another—and Shuo gives him a brief nod.

Then, they both spring into action—with Shuo charging Ke Mo, and Pei Ming setting his sights on his old weapon.

Ke Mo doesn't seem to know what to think when he sees the small youth approaching—and then, his appearance starts to change, shifting back to his true form.

Taller—though still dwarfed by the general—with darker hair, and mismatched eyes, gleaming up at him with bloodlust.

"...YOU THINK I'M AFRAID OF YOU, DEMON?!"

Just before they clash, Ren Song drops down to the ground—skidding across the dirt between Ke Mo's legs, kicking up dust—rolling onto his feet behind him.

"No," Ren Song replies calmly, landing one palm strike against Ke Mo's back. "You don't look that smart."

The strike looks like something as simple as patting the general on the back—but it sends him flying with so much force that, when he lands on a nearby boulder formation, the entire thing shatters into a pile of rubble.

Pei Ming isn't particularly shocked—not when this is coming from the ward of the most powerful ghost in the realm of the dead, anyhow.

Besides, he has his own problems to deal with.

CLANG!

Sparks fly between his vambrace and the edge of ming'guang, their faces closer now.

"I'm surprised you had time to come all the way here," Ming'guang sneers. "I thought you'd be busy, now that your little band has broken up."

Finally, he manages to draw a flash of anger from the general, getting shoved back.

"You don't know what you're talking about."

The demon blade's eyes glint with vindictiveness. "Don't I, don't I? You think there's anything better for us to do, stuck in your shadow? All we get to do day in, and day out, is listen to tales of the three tumors and their GREATNESS! But it looks like you haven't changed, hm?"

He cackles when Pei Ming shoves him back, not deterred in the least. "The honorable General Ming Guang, always befriending traitors and watching them die. Ah, well—Ling Wen Zhen Jun still breathes, but for how long?"

"Pei!" Xie Lian calls after them. "He's just trying to provoke you, don't—!" He cuts himself off briefly, catching Hua Cheng when his body starts to convulse. "Don't LISTEN TO HIM!"

He can't say more than that, his attention returning to the ghost king —his forehead scorching to the touch.

"San Lang?!"

He looks around frantically, trying to find something off in his aura--but all he can see is an intense ball of light where Hua Cheng's chest must be, pulsing and crackling like a spark on the verge of explosion.

"Can you hear me? Is there something I can do? Hold on!"

Away from them, ming'guang smirks, going for Pei Ming's ankles with his next strike, crowing in sarcastic delight when the general black flips out of range. "Still light on your feet, huh? But really, tell me—how did it feel, when you saw your old friend Shi Wudu get cut down?"

Pei remains deathly silent, his eyes growing colder and colder with every word the demon speaks.

"So honorable, so SUPERIOR, you love it, don't you? ALWAYS BEING THE LAST MAN STANDING?! I—!"

He lets out a strangled cry, then falls silent—fingers gripping him by the throat.

He kicks and flails, but before he can turn his lips into blades to attack —Pei Ming rams his hand into the demon's rib cage, running him straight through with his bare fist.

"You might know all of my moves," the general explains calmly, watching as Ming'guang spits blood.

"But I know exactly where to break you."

He already did it once.

He yanks his hand back out—and when he does, Ming'guang's form collapses to the ground in two separate pieces, writhing and howling with indignation.

"YOU STUPID FUCKING BASTARD!" He howls. "WHAT ARE YOU EVEN DOING HERE ANYWAY?! SENT HERE BY JUN WU LIKE A DAMN DOG?!" He glances at Ren Song, who is currently crawling all over Ke Mo like a small, rabid animal, all while the general flails, trying to pull him off. "You don't even see how ironic it is, do you?!"

Pei Ming turns away, dragging his upper half by the hair, pressing his foot against Ming'guang's chest to hold him still.

"You just traded in one corrupt, lazy, sadistic old man for another!" Ming'guang sneers, blood spewing from his teeth when he speaks, but he carries on.

"And now, what's your plan?! To throw your lot in with Crimson Rain and Autumn Twilight?! You know why they're here, don't you?!"

Even as Ren Song takes a bite out of Ke Mo's shoulder, he grimaces.

"The last time Mount Tonglu opened—Hua Cheng SELECTED Blackwater!"

Xie Lian lifts his chin, listening a little more closely.

"He could have killed him and taken the power for himself—but he let Blackwater live, and the two have been allies EVER SINCE!"

Which, of course, takes on a completely separate meaning for Pei than it does for Xie Lian.

Because of what Blackwater would go on to do.

"HE'S BROUGHT REN SONG HERE TO DO THE SAME THING! YOU REALLY WANT THERE TO BE THREE GHOST KINGS IN LEAGUE WITH ONE ANOTHER?!"

Pei Ming stares down at his old blade, unfeeling—and Xie Lian looks to Shuo, conflicted.

...If that was their plan, he feels like one of them would have told him, but—

Shuo? A calamity?

That shouldn't be shocking to consider. After Blackwater and Hua Cheng, he's said to be the strongest. But...is that how the entire ghost realm sees him?

The next in line?

Pei looks from Shuo, to Hua Cheng—then to Xie Lian, remembering what Jun Wu told him.

That Hua Cheng would, at some point, try to drag the prince to the Kiln. And that he was so frightened of that, he wanted Pei Ming to eliminate the ghost king before that happened.

Could it be that his plan was to bring Xie Lian there as food for Ren Song? Or were the two planning to spare the possible energy to be gained?

IF that was true, IF Pei Ming believed it—

The best moment to eliminate Hua Cheng would be here, when he can't defend himself.

But that comes with a hefty cost.

He'd have to kill Ren Song first. Doable, but—

The demon has such a youthful look to him—and Pei Ming loathes harming children.

But after that would come the miserable work.

Xie Lian.

Pei Ming would have to hurt him—badly.

And that would be a far more difficult fight. Pei Ming would eventually get the upper hand, but...

There's no honor in doing that to someone wearing three cursed shackles. No humanity in forcing him to listen as Pei Ming slaughters a dear friend afterwards.

It would be cruel.

So cruel, it almost—

It almost feels like it's sadistic by design , in a way so familiar, Pei Ming can nearly wrap his mind around the answer—but it won't come to him.

"...Your highness." Xie Lian's arms tighten around Hua Cheng protectively.

"Yes?"

"I am going to ask you a question only once—and trust that you'll answer me with complete honesty," he mutters, digging the heel of his boot into Ming'guang's chest.

"...What is it?"

"Would Crimson Rain, under any possible circumstances, harm you?"

Xie Lian falls silent.

Confused as to why Pei Ming would ask him that now, when Hua Cheng really isn't capable of harming anyone, but...

"No," he shakes his head firmly. "If he ever did, it would only be to protect me from greater harm—but San Lang would never be my enemy."

The utter certainty in his voice is difficult to argue with. And...

That level of faith in another person is rare.

Pei knows that better than most.

"...Then you should trust him first, going forward," the martial god mutters. "These are complicated times that we're living in."

Because if Pei Ming had to choose which one of them to trust—

He would place Xie Lian's judgment of Crimson Rain's character over the emperor's, simple as that.

That isn't to say that he trusts Hua Cheng—actually—he thinks Ming'guang is probably correct.

Ren Song becoming the next calamity probably IS the best possible outcome for Hua Cheng from a strategic standpoint—even if it makes Pei Ming pity the demon.

Clearly fiercely loyal to Crimson Rain—but Pei doubts the bond goes both ways, given Hua Cheng's cold, detached demeanor.

Still—from the kid's behavior before—

He isn't bad.

So, even if it benefits Crimson Rain, it isn't a nightmare scenario.

It could certainly be worse.

"…HEY!" Ren Song barks, legs wrapped around Ke MO's head, squeezing until his skull cracks. "THE BOTTOM HALF CAN MOVE!"

Just as he says this, Xie Lian senses something coming flying towards them—aiming to displace Fangxin, which would unlock the entire array, leaving them defenseless.

Xie Lian launches himself forward, bracing the sword, and with no other choice—

"E'MING!"

CLANG!

Ming'Guang pauses, mouth gaping with shock.

"…Did…did that tiny little knife just BLOCK ME!"

Xie Lian lets out a trembling sigh of relief. "Well done, E'Ming!"

Pei Ming watches the blade—and then his eyes flash with recognition.

"…REN SONG!" He shouts.

"WHAT?!"

"SWITCH OPPONENTS WITH ME!"

"Huh?!" He looks up from where he's crawling over Ke Mo's back, claws extended. "Why?"

"You have blades, and he doesn't know your moves—I need someone to slow him down while I figure something out."

"Pah!" the demon grunts, shoving Ke Mo aside. "Just say it's TOO HARD!" He grumbles, slipping both daggers from their holsters—using one to pin the upper half of Ming'Guang to the ground by his throat, and the other to go after his lower half.

"TIME TO LIVE UP TO MY TITLE!"

'Shuo, the…'

The demon blade screams.

On the other side of the field, Pei Ming slams into Ke Mo head on, throwing him into a wrestling headlock.

“Your highness!” He calls out through gritted teeth, landing on the ground with the general roaring and struggling in his grip.

“Yes?!”

“When you complimented E’Ming just now, he got bigger!” Pei explains, rolling around with Ke Mo in the dirt, unable to decipher the string of obscenities coming out of his mouth. “TRY DOING IT AGAIN!”

“Huh?! Ah…” Xie Lian looks around. “…E’Ming?”

The blade immediately flies into his outstretched palm, and…it does feel a little bigger.

“…” the prince clears his throat. “You—you’re amazing! There’s no other scimitar as dangerous or deadly as you!”

The blade vibrates, its eye lolling around in its socket from joy.

And, just as Pei predicted…

E’Ming grows noticeably larger in his grip.

“And beautiful!” Xie Lian cries out, desperate. “And strong! I feel so safe when E’Ming is with me!”

The weapon is still growing larger, but not fast enough.

“…KISS IT!”

Xie Lian pales.

“HUH?!”

Shuo glances back at them, still locked in combat with Ming’Guang, gritting his teeth,

‘Have you made a decision?’

And for a brief moment—

He looks fearful.

But the forest demon swallows that down, boots digging into the dirt as he leaps back.

"HA!" Ming'Guang snickers, finally managing to dislodge the dagger from his throat. "I should've known Hua Cheng's brat was—!"

When he sees Shuo's eyes, he stops.

Particularly the right one, which burns so brightly, it casts shadows on the ground.

"W…what are you d—?"

Before he can finish his question, Ren Song slams his dagger down—but not into Ming'Guang.

Rather, into the earth below.

And when he does—the ground begins to rattle and rumble in protest. Dirt spewing, rock crumbling and shifting, as…

Roots spring forth.

Pei can't risk letting go of Ke Mo to see what's happening, and Xie Lian—

He just sees a sudden burst of resentment, like—

Something is no longer being held back.

Oaks bursting from the earth, forming a tight circle around the two demons, sealing them in.

An—

An array.

Once the branches weave together, there's no way in—and no way out.

And when Ming'Guang looks up, hateful eyes bear down on him like a forest set aflame.

"You think you're the next ghost king?"

His voice takes on a sharp, echoing quality.

"Make me bow, then."

Ming'Guang bares his teeth, scrambling to put both halves of himself together, to fight, but—

That's when he hears it.

The whispers echoing through the leaves as it gets darker, darker, and darker still—

"Murderer…"

"Traitor…"

"Oath breaker…"

"S…SHUT UP!" He screams.

Ren Song's claws extend as he seems to slice through the very air itself—rays of sunlight cutting horizontally through the leaves, providing the only source of light—a cold breeze rattling through.

Autumn twilight shrouding forests.

"Keeping secrets, are we?"

"NO—!"

CREAK!

The boughs and trunks of the trees around them rattle and shift—and before the demon blade can struggle to free himself—

The scene around him changes.

To a place long lost to time—

One that only exists within memory.

For a moment of comedic relief, here is a small animatic of the "Plum Blossom" being flattered that Heaven's Eye wanted to kill Hua Cheng for him. Thanks to Syl for the adorable artwork!

The General who Broke his Sword

Chapter Summary

> "A god? Me?" He snorts at the idea, shaking his head. "HELL no, who wants that?"
>
> Rong Guang nearly falls off of his horse, gripping the reins tighter as he stares at his friend in shock. "...You don't?!"
>
> "Nope!" Pei shakes his head emphatically. "Sounds miserable."
>
> They round the corner, and he explains, "If I ended up being a god, the only reason I wouldn't turn it down would be if I had nothing left for me down here."

Chapter Notes

> CONTENT WARNINGS FOR THIS CHAPTER:
>
> canon compliant violence / references to suicide, the death of a child

It's early autumn, leaves gently falling through the air.

Two teenagers move within a sparring ring, swords artfully clashing against one another—but with one clearly showing the upper hand.

Taller, broader—but also more nimble.

And when he sweeps the legs out from under his friend, he lets out a loud, carefree laugh.

"That makes it fourteen to nothing!"

He pulls off his helmet, revealing a mess of tangled dark curls and vividly violet eyes, but—

No scar.

"No fair Pei-Xiong!" The smaller teenager cries. "Your arms are longer than mine!"

"You expect me to go easy on you, Rong-Xiong?"

Two best friends—one, the son of an officer and a merchant's daughter. The other, the son of a general and a concubine.

One of them cunning and ambitious—while the other seemed straightforward to a fault.

But the latter—he was talented beyond all measure.

Rising through the ranks of the military at astonishing speed—always with his faithful lieutenant at his side, but…

The ever growing star of General Pei Ming only seemed to cast a shadow over his sworn brother, Rong Guang.

"…People think you're gonna ascend, you know."

It's another victory parade—this time, after a successful campaign to take back a string of iron mines in the south.

Flowers rain down as their horses parade through the streets, and the young captain grins, catching a rose thrown his way, winking at a girl in the crowd.

"A god? Me?" He snorts at the idea, shaking his head. "HELL no, who wants that?"

Rong Guang nearly falls off of his horse, gripping the reins tighter as he stares at his friend in shock. "...You don't?!"

"Nope!" Pei shakes his head emphatically. "Sounds miserable."

They round the corner, and he explains, "If I ended up being a god, the only reason I wouldn't turn it down would be if I had nothing left for me down here."

"...Why?" Rong Guang mutters, his brow pinched.

A god is the greatest thing a man could be—who wouldn't want that?

"Because," Pei squeezes his knees, urging his horse to go a little faster. "There are two things that make this life worth living—beautiful women, and battle. If I'm lucky, I'll die young and glorious, with women lining the streets to mourn me for miles and miles!"

"...At least you know what you want," Rong Guang sighs, giving him an exasperated look. "But why would you want to die young?"

"Mmm..." The soldier glances up at the sky.

It's sunny in the city--but with storm clouds on the horizon—not that he minds.

Xuli has always been known for its storms—and Pei Ming has always been reminded of home when he hears the thunder's call, watching a black eagle come soaring down from the sea shores, looking to take shelter in the forests of the mountains ahead.

As sudden as his smile and laughter came, they fade.

"...I've spent my entire life missing my mother," he admits—and the only one who can hear him over the roar of the crowds is his friend.

"I'm no good at mourning. If we all have to go someday—then I'd rather go first."

Pei Ming's life is full of firsts.

The first man from Xuli to become a General before the age of twenty years old.

The first general to ever win so many consecutive battles.

The first mortal man to knowingly bed a goddess—a married one at that.

But when it comes to dying...

...General Pei never does go first.

Burying childhood friends. Comrades. Two sisters, before he turns twenty one.

And so, so many men who marched into battle under his banner.

And when the great General is only twenty two—

He's the first to ever conquer the City of Gusu.

But when he stands on the great, ancient walls of this legendary city of the north—he feels no pride in what he's done.

No glory in this victory.

Not when he can see how far and how wide the blood of his soldiers stains the plains surrounding the city.

"...Are you insane?!"

Rong Guang paces behind him, his own armor stained with blood, just as pale and drawn as his general, but—

Somehow, even more distressed.

"The king offered you his own DAUGHTER in marriage, and you refused?!"

Pei Ming doesn't look away from the ground below.

"Of course."

He says it so simply, like he's explaining something as elementary as the sun setting in the west, and rising in the east. And yet—

Rong Guang cannot understand it.

Because the princess is beautiful, intelligent—well suited to the general in every way.

"...Why?!"

"Because I'm not interested in spending my days in a palace," Pei Ming shrugs, reaching for the flask in his pocket. "And I'm not interested in being anyone's husband. Gods—can you imagine if we had children?"

The general shakes his head, solemn.

"I couldn't do that to them."

"...Do what?" Rong Guang mutters.

They used to have such laughter in their eyes. Smiling and ribbing at one another as they went back and forth with toy swords. Talking about what the world would be like, once they grew into it. The things they would do.

"...Fail them."

But the older they get, the more stark their differences seem to grow.

Rong Guan always assumed his friend's principles were things that would evolve and bend as the naivety of youth changed into the cynicism of adulthood.

And it's true—General Pei did become quite cynical.

Still laughing and smiling, finding joy in watching as his nieces and nephews are born. As Rong Guang becomes more than just his sworn brother, marrying the general's younger sister, having a son of their own.

But war is like a blacksmith's hammer.

It changes you.

Hardens you.

Still. Pei Ming doesn't grow out of his honor, or sense of right and wrong.

He grows into it, and the childhood friends, now family through marriage, become men—each develops their own reputation.

If you want to win a battle with dignity and honor—leave it to General Pei.

But if you want to win quickly, and win at all costs—look to his deputy, Lieutenant Rong Guang.

The two always seemed ill suited as friends—and yet, loved and trusted one another like blood brothers.

To the point where, when General Pei was gifted with a sacred sword for his victory in Gusu—he named it Ming'Guang, a hyphenation of their names.

Knowing Rong Guang craved being remembered far more than he ever did—and attaching his name to a famous sword was a guarantee of it

But all things that rise must fall—and while some friendships can last across lifetimes, sometimes more than one—

Others, no matter how fierce the love and loyalty between them might be, will eventually fail.

It was in an act of love for his friend, that Rong Guang broke him.

"...Pei-Xiong?" The deputy stops at the edge of the war tent, his eyes fixed on the back of the general's head, then on the empty bottle beside him.

Pei Ming doesn't answer quickly, eyeing the rolling hills below.

The Kingdom of Yushi.

"She gave me their defense plans."

The scroll sits on his desk—the seal unbroken.

“…” Rong Guang reaches for it—then stops.

Knowing what his friend would say.

“You won’t use it?”

“If I do,” Pei closes his eyes, his jaw clenched. “I’ll be bound to her.”

“…I told you she was a bad idea,” Rong Guang mutters.

“I know.”

“Xuan Ji may be beautiful—but any woman who would eagerly allow her countrymen to be slaughtered for her lover is a coward—!”

“I know.”

“Then why did you get involved with her?!”

He falls silent when Pei looks back at him.

Pale and unshaven, eyes haggard.

“…Do you even know why we’re here?” Pei mutters, looking around. “Or how many days that it’s been since we left home?”

The campaign in Yushi has been longer than the others—and far more blood soaked.

The people are strong—prepared to endure suffering rather than surrender.

That was easier to justify, when they were retaking stolen land in the south. Or dampening the advances of Xianle to the west.

But the rationale for slaughtering farmers in Yushi is unclear—

Other than the desire for cheap crops, even if they’re stolen.

“…Because the king ordered us,” Rong Guang replies quietly, stomach sinking as he takes in the silent conflict in the general's eyes.

Trapped between duty, and decency.

"…What happened to women and glory?" He mutters, trying to pour Pei another glass to lift his spirits.

"…There's no glory in killing farm boys," his friend replies, turning his face back down to the hills below.

And his next words come from a place so hollow, just listening to them aches.

"If that's what wars are—then I don't think I want to fight them anymore."

"…Taking the capital without those plans would mean more bloodshed." Rong Guang points out. "We'll be fighting block to block. The civilian casualties alone…"

He lets out a heavy sigh.

"But there's another way."

Pei Ming looks back at him—hopeful.

"I have a plan."

A plan that seemed merciful, on paper.

Dishonest, maybe—a trick at its core.

But when the lives were weighed on a scale of dishonesty versus carnage—

Trickery won the day.

But it tore at Pei Ming—

To the point where he actually prayed.

Never a particularly spiritual man—but now, he kneels before a divine statue of the heavenly emperor, incense burning.

Listening, as a priest of the great martial temple allows the emperor's wisdom to speak through him.

“We all have our roles to play, General.”

Rong Guang watches from the sidelines, as his friend hangs his head low.

“There are kings, and there are soldiers. Which are you?”

“…A soldier,” he replies, his voice wooden.

But watching him now, for the first time—

Rong Guang sees something so much more.

“We all choose our own destinies in life,” the priest rests a hand upon the general’s head gently. “But it is for kings to give orders—and soldiers to carry them out.”

Pei Ming had been given one order:

To take Yushi. Whatever the cost. That failure would not be an option.

All of it culminating in that day.

That one, horrible day.

Standing on the palace walls, watching and waiting for the cowardly, treasonous King of Yushi to show his face.

While they may have felt sympathy for the people of the land—none was felt for the royal family.

But it was not the king who walked from the palace gates.

No.

The air lays heavy, thick with summer humidity—the distant rumblings of a storm.

And standing before the general and his army—

Is a young lady.

Alone.

Hair loose, with bare feet.

But upon her head lies a crown.

A memory stained with pain and remorse.

Watching as the young Queen stops before Pei Ming, silently falling to her knees, and bowing three times.

And with each lowering of her head, the horrible truth begins to dawn on them.

“WAIT—!”

But it’s far too late.

The blade is drawn across her throat in a flash of resolve—not a moment of hesitation.

Leaving the general holding the dying beauty in his arms, struggling to staunch the blood, cursing as it stains his hands, his armor, his cheeks—

Most soldiers break in the face of death. Growing frightened as it claws closer and closer, grasping at life as they're pulled below the surface, desperate to break free.

They weep. They beg. They call out for their loved ones.

But not the Princess Who Slit Her Throat.

Now, dying in the arms of the man who brought her to this point, her expression is calm. Even as her eyes flutter, and her breaths hitch—she reaches up, pressing her hand against the general's cheek—leaving one bloody palm print behind.

The words she says are lost to time.

General Pei is the only person who knows her last words—and he never shares them.

Not to a single soul.

As she takes her last breaths—it begins to rain, and when the drops land on her cheeks—

She smiles.

Relieved, to know that something will wash the blood away.

She won't be able to clean up the mess herself.

At first, people mistake it for a clap of thunder—but when she draws her final breath, the entire sky explodes with light, and a sudden—

CRASH!

The Rain Master is born.

General Pei doesn't move.

Doesn't leave his spot until the rain soaks him to the bone, washing the blood on him, around him, down to the streets below.

The General keeps his promise, leaving Yushi in peace for three years.

For three long, hard years—when he and his men are forbidden to return to Xuli.

Children are born in their absence. Parents buried. Memories and milestones that they can never take back—that never should have been robbed from them.

They, the greatest children of Xuli.

They, the providers of their kingdom's wealth and power.

They, who made the sacrifice.

Only allowed home when their bitter, bloody work is completed.

Welcomed with the same parades as before. Crowds screaming, flowers thrown from balconies above.

But with no laughter among the men, the way there was before. All of them quietly bonded by shared pain and remorse.

But none of them carry that weight more heavily than their general.

Who still laughs as boisterously as he used to. Drinks and dines as heartily as he did before. Beds women with an avaricious zeal.

But nothing ever seems to reach his eyes anymore.

And his friend...

"Don't bother, Rong Guang. I won't hear any more of it."

"...Have you forgotten everything they did to us?! Everything they put us through?" The deputy glares at him.

Both men have stepped aside from a wedding to argue in the back, turned away from the gathering.

"Do you think that girl would have had to do what she did, if we hadn't been placed in that position?!"

Pei Ming says nothing, facing away from him.

"There will ALWAYS be another war, don't you understand that?! Don't you see what the king is doing?! He wants to invade Xianle!"

"Then that's what he'll do."

Rong Guang recoils, staring at his old friend with shock and disbelief. "...You really have nothing to say about that?"

"Why should I?"

"Because we'll be fighting that war for the rest of our lives! I won't see my children grow up!"

Xianle isn't like their other adversaries. They're wealthy and powerful—with a strong history of Cultivation under the Heavenly Emperor.

Taking one city from them—Gusu—was one of their most costly campaigns. Bloodsoaked.

And the House of Xie is not known to be faint hearted.

An ancient bloodline, ruling the central plains long before Xuli was even a city state—known for producing strong rulers, warriors, and cultivators.

It's said to only be a matter of time before someone from the House of Xie ascends as a god.

And their Crown Prince...is said to be absolutely fearsome.

Already a decorated warrior, known for leading his troops into battle himself—with a secured royal line of two sons.

The family is beloved, powerful—and absurdly wealthy.

Xianle would only fall if it broke from within. An invasion from Xuli would be a fool's errand.

"Have you forgotten everything we went through in Yushi?! Do you have any idea how long a war like that could go on? Pei-Xiong—my SON could fight in this war, your nephew!"

"...A-Kang is only four years old—"

"Yes!" Rong Guang agrees. "And in ten years, he'll be old enough to die for this king, too." He points to his son, sleeping in his mother's lap beside one of the dining tables. "Look at him, and tell me you can live with that!"

"...Rong-xiong," Pei cuts him off, holding up a hand. "Calm down."

"How can you tell me to be—?!"

"The king is old," the general reminds him quietly. "He wants a legacy, and he's making reckless choices. But who can say if he'll even live much longer?"

"That's why we should—!"

"Wait," Pei shakes his head. "That's why we should wait, and give the prince a chance to decide what sort of king he's going to be."

"...Prince Xuli Meng is barely more than an INFANT!" Rong Guang cries, a vein throbbing in his temple.

"He'll be controlled by his mother if the king dies any time soon—and she is JUST as bad as he is!"

It's true—that among all of the King's consorts, Prince Xuli Meng's mother is said to be even more wolfish than her husband.

"He'll have advisors."

"Don't be naive, we're not boys anymore!" Rong Guang snaps, grabbing him by the arm. "Don't say that when you KNOW it won't work that way!"

"Then what should I say?" Pei Ming stares at him, his eyes sharp."That I'll become a traitor? Break my oath? That's what you want from me?"

"Is it treason if we aren't given a choice?!"

"There's always a choice," the general shakes his head, pulling his shoulder out of Rong Guang's grip. "If I suddenly turn tail now, then didn't I have a choice back in Yushi? Or in Gusu?"

His deputy falters, and Pei's hands ball into fists by his sides. "If this path was wrong, then every step I've taken was for nothing. Every life, every wound, every ounce of blood, sweat, and tears that were shed—are you saying they were given in the name of a tyrant?"

Rong Guang doesn't back down, lifting his chin in defiance.

"...Maybe," He admits, his chest aching with sadness when Pei's expression twists with pain, confusion, and...

"Then why do you need me to tell you what to do?! If you believe that, then don't follow him!"

"I'm not following him!" Rong Guang snaps, drawing attention from a few guests from the wedding, watching the men argue in the distance. "I've never followed him!"

"Then what the hell have you been doing all this time?!"

"Following YOU!"

Silence falls between them.

"...I'm going to tell you something now," Pei Ming mutters, closing his eyes. "And I'm only going to tell you once—so hear me clearly."

"Pei-Xiong—"

"I will never be a King."

The words seem to hit the deputy with a heavy weight, landing hard.

"I swear on my honor, I will never wear the crown of Xuli," Pei repeats for emphasis, staring him down—with eyes that have always been so unusual, and now, they burn with an almost unnatural force.

"Don't put me in a position where I have to choose between you, and my duty."

He leaves him then, stalking back towards the wedding, his expression stormy—only to have one of his sisters placate him, a hand on his shoulder.

Reminding him that Rong Guang is only upset, given how much time he's missed with the children.

That he's emotional.

That it's likely he didn't mean anything that he said—and he'll soon forget about it.

But that's not true. Rong Guang remembers one thing from that conversation—

And it's to not leave Pei Ming a choice.

The final thread breaks in Spring of the next year.

When Pei Ming is stationed in the royal palace, helping prepare battle plans for an upcoming campaign—and a horrible scream rips through the halls.

Sharp, blood curdling.

And as he and the other guards rush to its source–he hears a panicked cry of a child.

"G-General!"

When they round the corner—

They find Prince Xuli Meng.

A boy of little more than six years old—with a knife buried in his side.

He's curled up on the ground, trembling by the time Pei reaches him.

"SOMEONE GET A DOCTOR!"

"It's alright, it's alright..."

Pei holds the boy in his arms, placing pressure against the wound, but knowing, just from where it is—the moment the knife is removed, he'll bleed out.

A quick death. But—

"You're alright," Pei Ming repeats, holding the child close as the guards flurry about, panic spreading.

"Look at me, look, see?" The prince stares up at him, eyelashes fluttering. "I'm here," he assures the boy, watching with horror as the fear fades from his eyes.

Of course, he's safe.

General Pei is here.

"I-It hurts," he whimpers. "I-I..."

"I know, it's alright—"

"What did I do wrong?" The boy croaks, tears in his eyes, slipping down his cheeks—unable to understand.

It's unfathomable to a child so young—

And it's unfathomable to the general, who has seen so much war, and yet...

"Nothing," Pei whispers, his voice turning hoarse.

Xuli Meng was barely old enough to start learning how to read nursery rhymes. His favorite game was feeding the ducks in the royal gardens, and—

His greatest accomplishment had been recently becoming an older brother to the newborn princess.

He had hurt no one in this life.

"You didn't do anything," Pei promises the child, holding him closer as his breaths become more pained.

All around them is chaos—trying to find the prince's attacker, the flurry to find someone to help, but—

Even if they make it in time, there's nothing to be done.

"You," Pei Ming squeezes his eyes shut, breathing harshly through his nose to harm himself. "You are being so brave, y'know that? Your m...your mother is going to be so proud—"

"...T...then w-why did they hurt me?" He mumbles, lips pale and trembling, his skin turning blue.

"Who?" Pei questions, trying to be gentle, to keep his own emotions out of his voice. "Who hurt you?"

The name that falls from the child's lips breaks something inside of him.

Knocks him so far off balance, he feels something go tumbling over the edge.

"R...Rong...G-Guang..."

Pei's hands begin to tremble—but his voice doesn't.

"I...I don't know," he mutters, shaking his head. "But I'll get him, okay?" He pushes the prince's hair back from his face. "I promise, I'll get him."

The faith in the prince's eyes makes him sting with heartbreak and failure

Of course, Xuli Meng believes him.

Because he's General Pei.

"I...I'm scared," he mumbles, his hand so tragically small, clutching at the front of Pei's armor. "A-Am I g-gonna die?"

Pei stares down at the boy, lips trembling.

"...No," he whispers. "You're gonna be okay."

Xuli Meng lets out a whimper of relief, relaxing in his arms. "M-Mama's coming?"

"That's right," Pei agrees gently, cradling his head when he's too weak to hold it up on his own anymore. "She'll be here soon with the doctor, and they'll make it better. Do I look scared?"

"N...No..."

Pei Ming shushes him over and over, promises him that it'll be alright. Sings the song that his own mother used to sing to him when he was small, and—

When the prince's breaths fade, they aren't trembling with fear anymore.

Almost like he's fallen asleep.

Pei hands him off to the doctors when they come—and by the time he's made it to the great hall, he hears the horrible, grief stricken screams of the boy's mother.

And he—

He's seen so much. Done so much, but—

The Great General of Xuli can't stop weeping.

One of his sisters finds him by the palace gates, pressing her hands against his cheeks.

"Oh, gege..."

He holds her tightly, sobbing uncontrollably against her shoulder—the prince's blood still staining his hands.

Just like the Queen of Yushi's blood stained his hands.

Just like the blood of farm boys stained his hands.

Just like the blood of his friends will stain his hands.

How much rain will it take to make all of that wash away?

"I don't want to do this anymore, meimei," he whispers, his voice breaking in countless places.

"I know."

"I'm so tired."

"I know."

"I don't—!"

Pei doesn't want to fight anymore.

That's all he thinks, when he straps Ming'guang to his side—one last time.

When he saddles his horse, and rides for where Rong Guang and the others have gone.

Where it all began.

Gusu.

The Gates open for him like an old friend—and when he rides in—

The troops have the nerve to cheer, seeing the blood on their general's armor.

Assuming that he's riding back from victory over tyrants.

Pei Ming doesn't speak, riding to the front of the battalion.

When he dismounts, Rong Guang is there, rushing forward to his side. "Did you deal with the king? You—!"

He stops, when he sees the look on Pei Ming's face--and his own expression falls, filled with disappointment.

"How many of them knew?"

"What are you talking about?"

"How many of them followed you this far because they believed I signed off on this?" Pei Ming presses him, resigned.

"...They knew you would come once you knew what was happening," Rong Guang explains, "All of this—it's been done in your name. The king won't take you back—"

"So..." Pei Ming glances down the rows of soldiers, eyes unreadable. "All of them knew?"

"...Yes," Rong Guang agrees, continuously peering over towards Pei Ming's horse, to the point where the general finally asks—

"Are you looking for something?"

"...Where's Xuli Meng?"

Pei Ming stares at him, not reacting.

"Is that supposed to be a joke?"

"What are you—?"

"Xuli Meng is dead," the general glares, "This blood? It's all his."

Rong Guang takes a step back, visibly startled. "I..."

"He was asking me with his last breaths why YOU hurt him." Pei Ming pokes him in the chest—hard. "So don't talk to me like you didn't fucking KNOW!"

"I-I didn't!" The deputy shakes his head vehemently. "I lured him away from the nursery and left him with two of my men before going on ahead! I thought he'd make a good hostage!"

And slowly, as the two soldiers who were left with the prince come forward—the truth starts to become clear.

The soldiers left behind were young—nervous. And when they tried to pull the boy towards the palace gates, Prince Xuli Meng began to cry.

When they tried to gag him, the boy screamed—and being young, and their only order from Rong Guang being to 'take care of it'—

They panicked.

But everyone can see, as they explain their story—

Pei Ming doesn't believe it.

Who panics and murders a little boy?

"...Is there anything else you have to say for yourselves?"

"Pei-xiong," Rong Guang frowns. "I already told you, the child's death was unintentional—but it's already been done. We don't have a choice but to move forward—"

"I made my choice years ago, Rong Guang."

They stare at one another—and Pei Ming's words from before come back, ringing clearly in his mind.

'Don't put me in the position where I have to choose between you, and my duty.'

"...You can't be serious..." He mutters, taking a step away from him. "Don't be stubborn!"

When Pei Ming speaks again—his voice is loud enough to carry through the crowd of soldiers.

"As a sworn officer of the Kingdom of Xuli, it is my duty to enforce the code of conduct among my men. The punishment for treason is death."

A panicked stir echoes throughout the troops, looking at one another in quiet confusion.

W...what is their general saying?

Their general, who has led them through countless battles—laughed with them, broken bread with them, grown up with them?

"...Didn't you hear me?!" Rong Guang steps forward, grabbing him by the arm. "You're already in this, whether you like it or not! If you don't see it through, you'll end up executed!"

"I heard you." The general agrees, pushing his hand away. "I plan on turning myself in."

He looks out among the group—and no matter how angry he is with Rong Guang—

He knows his hands aren't clean of this.

That he should have said something when Rong Guang first started talking like this—months and months ago.

But he hadn't wanted to lose a friend.

"...I have failed in my duty to enforce proper conduct and discipline among my men, leading to mass insubordination," Pei explains woodenly. "The punishment for which is also death."

"...But general—!"

They'll make a public execution out of it, he's sure.

But he's the only one who needs to endure that.

The rest of them—

Ming'guang is unsheathed a final time, gleaming under the sun.

They won't endure that.

And in any other situation, these men wouldn't feel fear.

There are nearly two hundred of them—and only one of him.

But, with great sorrow, and no hesitation—

Pei Ming cuts every single one of them down.

Making the streets of Gusu run red with blood once more—until only two are left standing.

Himself, and Rong Guang.

There's no illusion between the two men over how it's going to end.

"...Be honest with me," Pei Ming mutters, his gaze distant, gripping his sword with blood stained hands. "Did you really think they were going to take that boy hostage? Or did you just think that was an explanation I could live with?"

"You..." Rong Guang laughs in disbelief. "...You just killed all of our friends—and you're...asking me about ONE boy?"

"...They made choices," Pei Ming mutters, shaking his head. "Xuli Meng never had that chance."

"What do you want me to say? That it was his son's future, or mine?" Rong Guang shakes his head.

"Because I'm not sorry for choosing mine."

"...Where do you think this would have gone?" Pei mutters, eyeing the bodies of his fallen comrades around him. "You really thought that, even if I went along, this would have been a bloodless coup d'etat?"

"You can't change ANYTHING without someone getting hurt!" Rong Guang glares, trembling. "You and I BOTH know that!"

"NO!" Pei shakes his head, "It doesn't matter how many people get hurt. NOTHING EVER CHANGES! LOOK WHERE YOU'RE STANDING!"

The citizens of Gusu watch from a distance—cautious, but curious—and frightened by the bloodshed.

"I lost more friends taking this city than I did today," Pei Ming mutters, looking around. "And I honestly don't think it made a single fucking difference."

He doesn't believe that the street vendors on the corner or the children playing in the parks know or care about whether or not they're ruled by a king in Xianle or Xuli.

Their lives are exactly as they were before.

Except for the scars left by war.

Pointless, endless war.

"Maybe, if you had waited—and that child had grown into the tiger you were afraid of, I would have agreed with you. But now he's dead, and the king is already a dying old man." Pei Ming explains hollowly, sword trembling in his grip. "He can't hurt anyone now. You knew that."

Rong Guang shakes his head vehemently. "You're ASSUMING! Old isn't dying—and you're really going to leave the kingdom in the hands of an infant girl?!"

"Should we assassinate the baby next, Rong-Xiong? Or is it too far when she's too young to speak?"

Pei growls, his expression darkening when he remembers those small, terrified eyes, staring up at him, asking—

'What did I do wrong?'

"What about when she takes her first steps, is she a viable political target then? At what point should we assume she's going to kill us all?"

"ONE life!" Rong Guang shakes his head, "Compare that to how many men—!"

"PROFESSIONAL SOLDIERS!" Pei Ming snarls, "Just like you! Who CHOSE this life! No one CHOOSES to be born to certain parents, and you were going to take that little boy hostage?! It's never ONE life!"

The moment Xuli Meng died—it rippled out to countless other lives.

His parents, his sister—children that will never be born, loves that will never be had.

"Maybe, if you had just done this on your own , I would have been able to let you go," Pei mutters, his voice breaking.

"But the minute you placed all of this on my shoulders—in my name—you knew that I would have to end it."

Rong Guang had just assumed that Pei Ming would give in, and fight for them. With them.

But how does that make him any different from the King?

Forcing Pei Ming into another war that he never wanted. This time, a civil war—because no matter how beloved, how skilled General Pei might be, there would always be those who would remain loyal to the throne.

Forcing Pei Ming into a role he desperately said he did not want.

Regardless of Rong Guang's paranoia--the King of Xuli won't live more than a few more years at most.

The moment their rebellion started, the best way to save lives was for Pei Ming to crush it. And even if it weren't—

Pei Ming can't—and won't—break an oath on a maybe .

Maybe, the King of Xuli would have invaded Xianle.

Maybe, Prince Xuli Meng would have been controlled by his mother.

Maybe, the King would have crossed that line—or many others—

But Rong Guang didn't wait for him to CROSS it before attempting to force Pei to turn his back.

"…There was another way," Rong Guang mutters, hand on his own sword. "You stop being such a damn coward, and face who you really are! Think of how much GOOD you could have done, if you just—!"

"I know who I am." Pei Ming steps forward. "I'm sorry you never bothered to see it!"

But when it comes down to it—neither man ever seemed to see things the same way.

Pei Ming, ever self aware, always knowing what and who he wanted—and who he wanted to be.

And Rong Guang, seeing what he could be, regardless of what Pei Ming wanted.

Leaving them here.

"I'm not sorry," Rong Guang repeats, lifting his chin, staring Pei Ming down with the eyes of a man on death row.

"I wish that boy hadn't needed to die—but I'm not sorry for trying to do more than maintain the status quo."

"Then you should have used your own name to do it."

Pei Ming’s face is like stone—even if his gaze is wracked with pain.

“You should have believed in yourself, instead of me.”

Because there’s no amount of force that can change a man into something that he isn’t.

Only time does that.

And Rong Guang has run out.

“For what it’s worth—I am sorry, old friend.”

They’ve been sparring since they were boys—and each and every time, Pei has always won.

Their last match is no different.

Rong Guang’s arms are still shorter than his—and Pei Ming is still faster.

His life is the last that Ming’Guang ever takes.

A quick death. Clean, and honorable.

His blood stains the hands of a friend, a brother, and a comrade.

But those hands are covered in the blood of many, many others.

And he gets more peace and dignity in death than most.

The knowledge that his wife and children will be looked after.

That his son won’t have to fight in a rich man’s wars of pride.

General Pei stands among his men, covered in their blood, closing his eyes.

At best, he’ll return to public trial and execution.

At worst, they might take this display of loyalty as reason to do exactly what Rong Guang wanted—placing the general in power.

But a man chooses his own destiny, and Pei Ming…

He stares down at Ming’Guang, struggling to see his own reflection through streaks of blood.

The General doesn’t want to fight anymore.

Doesn’t have the right to carry a blade, when it has been used to cut down every man who fought beside him.

One hand grips the hilt, the other, the scabbard—and with a twist of his hands—

SNAP!

The Sacred Blade Ming’Guang is no more.

The people of Gusu watch from their homes as the general stands among his fallen friends, broken sword in hand—streaked with blood, tears falling silently down his face.

Ready to face judgment—and then, rest.

But…

CRASH!

Some matters of fate are beyond a man’s choice.

And it’s then, on the day that Pei Ming chose to lay down his blade and stop fighting—that he ascended as the greatest god of war in living memory.

Trembling, bathed in golden light—still holding the broken shards of his sword.

A hand lands on his shoulder, gentle.

Welcomed by warm, paternal eyes, patiently guiding him to drop those broken pieces back to the mortal realm below, helping him to his feet.

“You fought well.”

Pei Ming’s heart is in his throat—and breaks, upon hearing his new title.

“Rest now, General Ming Guang.”

The Man in Black

Chapter Summary

Xie Lian doesn’t know whether or not to laugh or cry.

“Why do I need to KISS IT?!”

“Just trust me!”

Xie Lian doesn’t know whether or not to laugh or cry.

“Why do I need to KISS IT?!”

“Just trust me!” Pei Ming hisses, tendons in his neck straining as he keeps Ke Mo in a stranglehold, the general wailing about, ‘not dying for another Pei.’ “INSTINCTS!”

“…My battle instincts are pretty good, and I don’t—”

“It’s a DIFFERENT KIND OF INSTINCT, YOUR HIGHNESS!”

Xie Lian swallows hard, feeling around for the handle of E’Ming again, knowing they don’t have time to argue—and he’s kissed blades before to bless them for battle, but—

This doesn’t feel the same—not at all.

Still…

Xie Lian brings the blade up to his lips, giving it a gentle, sheepish touch with his lips—just above the eye on the hilt.

And he feels it work almost immediately, trembling and growing at a much faster rate.

“I-Is that good enough?!” He shouts back to Pei, unable to get a clear grasp on E’Ming’s length when one of his arms is holding Hua Cheng upright.

“Well—didn’t you sword swallow back in the day?”

“Wh—?”

Hua Cheng jerks violently in his arms, and Pei Ming cries.

“NOTHING!”

He glances between Ke Mo, struggling underneath him—and the newly formed trees, hiding Ren Song and Ming’Guang, glowing ominously.

He raises a hand to point, about to yell instructions to Xie Lian,

“E’MING IS—!”

But the moment he speaks…the scimitar flies into his hand.

“…”

“…”

For a moment, Pei is too shocked to react, making strange, prolonged eye contact with the eye in the blade’s hilt, baffled, but—

In the next, he’s leaping into action—slicing deep into Ke Mo’s side as he rolls to his feet, instantly gaining the upper hand.

“E’Ming went to you?” Xie Lian questions, shocked.

The blade has always been friendly and eager for attention from him—it not so much when it comes to anyone else.

“Yeah, I don’t know!” Pei calls back, flashing behind Ke Mo twice, taking out each knee. “It must be desperate!”

But he’ll be damned if the scimitar isn’t one of the smoothest weapons he’s ever used, moving like a perfect extension of his arm.

In a matter of moments, Ke Mo is left bleeding on the ground, in a similar state to when he was in the Sinner’s Pit—and Pei Ming turns to the array.

“What’s with the—?”

Before he can finish his question, the trees wither and crumble to ash.

CLANG!

Two separate pieces of an old, familiar blade come crashing down, landing on the ground at Pei Ming’s feet—and Ren Song comes walking out of the ashes.

Dragging someone.

Gripping them by the air—and when he drops the man to the ground next to the broken pieces of Pei Ming’s former weapon—

The truth of the situation becomes clear.

“…Rong Guang?” The general mutters, pale with shock.

His former deputy sits up on his knees, scowling.

"I haven't gone by that name in hundreds of years!" He growls, eyes flaring with rage—until Ren Song's boot presses between his shoulderblades, forcing his face into the dirt.

"I thought you might find him familiar," the demon drawls, digging his foot in until he squirms. "Looks like his soul fused with your blade the moment you ascended," he explains, looking from Rong Guang, to the broken pieces of Ming'guang. "I consumed most of his resentment just now and separated them—but that doesn't mean he's harmless."

"..." Pei Ming kneels before his fallen deputy, thinking. "Given how you died, I would have assumed that you would've been resting in peace a long, long time ago," he mutters.

Rong Guang won't look at him.

"You were adamant about being a man without any regrets."

"...Yeah, well what did I know?" Rong Guang snaps, glaring at the dirt, still unable to rise to his feet with Shuo's foot on his back. "I didn't realize I was gonna spend the next 800 years forced to watch you being such a goddamn hypocrite. And—and YOU!"

He twists his head around, glaring up at Ren Song. "What the FUCK did I do to you?!"

"...Besides trying to kill Hua Chengzhu?" The demon raises an eyebrow, digging his foot in even more viciously. "I was Xuli Meng's age when I died—in the exact same way. I know how he felt."

Rong Guang, who has been almost reminiscent of Qi Rong up until then—loudly cursing and swearing at anyone who will listen—falls silent, turning his head away in shame.

"Y...You..." Ke Mo sits up, bleeding all over, pointing at E'Ming with a trembling finger.

The scimitar blinks, trembling and sitting up on the ground—then tilting, as if to say, 'Who, me?'

"YOU'VE MADE A FOOL OF ME FOR THE LAST TIME, YOU CURSED BLADE—!"

But before he can get up and attack—something lands on him from above, rattling and hissing.

…A scorpion snake.

The ensuing screaming and flailing from the general is enough to break up any previous discussion, and from inside the array, Xie Lian hears a familiar voice cry—

"General!"

And for the first time in weeks—Pei Ming's face actually brightens.

"…Junior?"

He abandons Rong Guang in an instant, hurrying to his former deputy, who seems…sheepish about showing himself before Pei Ming.

"I know you probably don't want to see me right now, but I—"

He falls silent when the martial god pulls him into a tight embrace.

"Shut the hell up."

Pei Su swallows hard, biting back tears, his face pressed into the general's shoulder.

"I'm sorry about Lord Water Master."

Of course, he knew about it. Walked in on enough to—

"PEI SU!" Ke Mo snarls, writhing on the ground. "YOU INSULT ME AGAIN BY THROWING A—!"

"It wasn't Pei Su gege who threw the snake!"

Xie Lian turns in the direction of her voice, calling—

"Banyue?"

The ghost runs to his side, throwing her arms around his middle.

“General Hua!”

“YOU?!” Ke Mo seethes, throwing the snake to the side. “HOW DARE YOU DO THAT TO ME, WHEN YOU KNOW I HATE THE SCORPION SNAKES!”

Banyue tucks herself closer against Xie Lian’s side, explaining, “I’m sorry, but ah…I only know how to throw scorpion snakes…”

“General,” Pei Su says, “We brought these.”

He holds up a set of jars.

“That should be enough, right?”

“…It’s plenty.”

Ke Mo struggles at first, but not after he’s knocked out cold by Pei Ming—and Rong Guang snarls and flails—

“WHY THE HELL DOES IT SMELL LIKE PICKLES IN HERE?! YOU—!”

Clack!

The lid snaps shut, and everyone sighs.

"So..." Pei Ming mutters, sending a glance in Pei Su's direction. "She calls you Pei Su gege?"

The deputy coughs, his ears turning slightly pink. "It isn't like that, general."

"After everything you've done for her, I'd certainly hope it was like that—"

"What's wrong with calling someone gege?"

Of all people, Pei Ming wasn't expecting Xie Lian to speak up with THAT comment.

"Nothing!" He shakes his head quickly, holding his hands up. "It's nice! Just not my taste is all, guess I had too many sisters to be into it—"

"...Into what?" Xie Lian tilts his head to the side, confused.

Banyue frowns, offering a similar reaction, and Pei Su looks like he might have a small stroke, standing in front of Pei Ming and waving his arms.

"Don't mind my general! He just talks nonsense sometimes!"

Though, Pei Ming supposes it's all situational. If a certain someone had called him that, he probably...

Then, the mirth falls from his face, and he's not enjoying the conversation quite as much as he was before.

"What are you two doing here, anyway?"

Then, his day gets worse.

"We came following Lord Rain Master," Pei Su explains, holding one jar under each arm. "A group of ghosts abducted farmers from her lands on their way here--she came in pursuit, and we came with her."

"...The Rain Master?" Pei Ming mutters, slightly pale. "She's here?"

"We left her behind when we heard General Hua yelling," Banyue explains. "But yes."

Inside his jar, Rong Guang snickers nastily, and Pei Ming sighs, looking away.

"Did she capture you? Why were you with her?"

"Capture me?" Pei Su blinks, "She saved me."

"...Saved you?"

"I didn't really have anything to do while I was exiled," Pei Su explains. "The emperor has had us on such a strict schedule for so long...I didn't know how to stay still. But I overestimated my strength without my godhood, and after taking on a gang of criminals, I..."

"He was hurt really badly," Banyue speaks up, currently in the middle of allowing Xie Lian to come the brambles out of her hair with his fingers. "Lord Rain Master saved him!"

Hearing that makes the general wince, and Pei Su stares up at him with dismay.

"...Are you disappointed that she saved me?"

"What? No, no...just..." Pei presses a hand against his forehead with a sigh. "We're exposed out here. Your highness—if you can move Hua Cheng, we should probably keep moving."

Wherever the Rain Master is—his debt has grown.

And the Rain Master—

Well, she's in a rare mood.

"MY LORD!" Several of the farmers cry out in relief when they see her coming, the guardian ox's hooves running lightly over the scorched earth as she charges toward them, "You came!"

One of her hands is grasping the ox by the horn, keeping her balance—but with the other, she signs out—

'How many more?'

"...SIX! There are six more, but we can't find them!"

Yushi Huang bows her head, her fingers balling up into a fist—then, she sighs.

'The others are behind me—keep moving and you'll meet up with them. Take shelter until I come for you again.'

With the gates of Tonglu already sealed, her best bet is to group them all together, then protect them from any incoming ghosts until it's over.

And hopefully, that doesn't take as long as the last two times the Kiln opened, otherwise...

There's a high likelihood that she won't have an option other than watching them starve.

'Were there any other ghosts that took you?'

"No! But be careful, my lord! There'a a man in black—he's more powerful than any of the other ghosts we've seen so far!"

'...' The Guardian Ox comes to a halt as she looks back at the farmers, raising an eyebrow. ' Man in black?'

"We're going in the opposite direction of him, my lord—but you should stay back! He's already killed many, many ghosts!"

'...Go on ahead,' The Rain Master signs to them firmly. 'I'll find the others.'

"But—!"

"Go." She speaks aloud, her voice ringing with authority.

The men look at each other, then shrug, doing as their goddess says, continuing on down the path.

The ash that covers the ground here is soft beneath her feet when she swings down—her ox snorting with dismay.

'A-Huang, it isn't safe here.'

She smiles faintly, patting his leg.

'He won't hurt me.'

With that, she sits on the ground, her legs crossed, bamboo hat shielding her from the sun as she quietly awaits the approach of this 'Man in Black.'

And when he comes over the hill—his expression is one of dismay.

"...What are you doing here?!" He mutters, sheathing his blade—blood splattered across his cheeks, his brow perpetually pinched with stress.

'I could ask you the same thing,' Yushi Huang replies calmly—and Ling Wen averts his eyes with shame . 'Is that the Brocade Immortal?'

"...No offense, but you're the last person I wanted to see at the moment."

'...' Yushi Huang raises an eyebrow, tilting her head to the side as she looks him over. 'Offense taken.'

It's a departure from her normal, serene, overly kind nature. Enough to make him pause.

"What?"

He expected many things. Probably some sort of moral judgment about what he's done, his betrayal—or anything else, but—

'That was my first time ever doing something like that.'

And it takes Ling Wen a moment to understand what she means.

"I...you mean..." He stares, his mouth twisting with confusion. "...With a...woman? Because I don't want to be someone's—"

Before the word 'experiment' can even come out of his mouth, Yushi Huang replies—

'With anyone.'

To which Ling Wen, known for his flat nature and composure—chokes.

"...Your cultivation method doesn't require that," he mutters, rubbing the back of his neck.

Their size difference is already significant enough when they're both women—but in his male form, Ling Wen isn't much shorter than Hua Cheng.

And with her sitting down, and him standing over her...

It makes him feel like some barbaric brute, accused of violating a princess.

'No, it doesn't.'

"And you expect me to believe that in 900 years, you didn't—?"

'I'm picky.'

...Damn it all, Ling Wen loathes his ego.

"...Then why didn't you say anything when I touched you?"

Yushi Huang raises an eyebrow right back at him, leaning back on the heels of her palms.

'Because I liked it.'

Her overly simple way of phrasing things gets under his skin, always making everything sound so easy, when...

"...Well, if I had known, I would have been more sensitive about it," Ling Wen grumbles, "But that has nothing to do with why I don't want to see you here. Haven't you heard about what I've done?"

'The Emperor told me.' Ling Wen stiffens, and Yushi Huang holds up a hand to calm him. 'In my private communication array. I haven't returned to the Heavens since our last conversation. He seemed very intent to make sure I in particular was aware of your defection.'

"..." Ling Wen watches her with narrowed eyes. "Just how much do you know?"

'You were the one who warned me that the emperor was cleaning out heavenly leadership,' The Rain Master points out. 'I made my own estimates from there of what was going on.'

"And they made you think coming here was a good idea?!"

'My people were abducted.' Yushi Huang shakes her head, her cheeks faintly dusted with soot from the air. 'Only one group of mortals has ever escaped this place while the Kiln was open. If I didn't come for them, it would have been a death sentence.'

"I—" Ling Wen stops. "A group of mortals escaped?"

'Yes,' the princess nods, 'eight centuries ago, by the fire master.'

He frowns at her, shaking his head, reaching forward irritably to wipe the soot from her cheek.

For someone with such a delicate face, she's too comfortable with getting filthy.

"There is no fire master."

Yushi Huang doesn't reply immediately, leaning into Ling Wen's touch.

When she was appointed, eight centuries ago—there had been a lightning master, the most senior, as well as the water and earth masters.

The role of wind master remained empty until Shi Qingxuan's ascension.

But by the time of Xie Lian's second banishment—Yushi Huang was the only elemental master left remaining, and therefore the most senior.

The instant the new fire master was selected, a message was sent to her—as well as another sent shortly after, stating that he defected.

Normally, when a god defects—they eventually fade, and when they do, their role is filled once more.

Or, in cases like Shi Qingxuan and Shi Wudu, who gave up their immortality outright, they can be replaced when a new god ascends.

(Like He Xuan, who immediately succeeded him.)

But, in all of the years since the fire master's defection, he has not faded—and as such, another was never appointed.

Yushi Huang doesn't know why Hua Cheng has chosen to keep that aspect of his history private—but he has, and she won't be the one to expose him.

Instead, she repeats herself:

'If I hadn't come, they almost certainly would Have died.'

They might still die, if she can't find the others and properly shield and feed them until they can escape again.

Ling Wen groans, pulling at his hair slightly as he sits back.

"…You were lured here." He mutters, "Don't you understand that?"

'As the last elemental master aligned with the Heavenly Court, I suppose I do count as a loose end.'

"And you came anyway?!" He glares.

'The motivation doesn't make the reality for my people any different.'

Ling Wen turns away from her, pressing a hand against his forehead, fighting back the urge to offer a lecture about priorities—

Because their philosophies don't line up when it comes to such things, anyway.

In fact—their personal philosophies rarely align.

So, why?

Is that really all it takes to break Ling Wen's once ironclad rules of pragmatism and practicality?

A pretty face, and small gestures of kindness? One rushed (if not cathartic) night in his office, and he finds himself withering with concern over a woman he hardly knows?

'You didn't answer my question,' Yushi Huang counters, looking him over.

"What?" He mutters, not turning around—half distracted.

'Why are you here?'

"...That's a much longer conversation," he mutters, pinching the bridge of his nose. "And before you say we have time—no, we don't."

There's a rare, sheepish moment of silence—implying that was exactly what the Rain Master was going to say.

"...The more ghosts I kill, the stronger Bai Jing becomes," he explains flatly. "And I...miscalculated."

'How?'

"I assumed—since I created the Brocade Immortal, I would have complete control if I was the one wearing it." Ling Wen mutters, crossing his arms. "I would have taken more time to test that theory—but I wasn't expecting the Crown Prince to catch on so soon, so I..."

Gambled.

'...And you don't have complete control?' Yushi Huang questions, watching his back.

"...Not if Bai Jing decides to follow his own will," Ling Wen admits, his voice tight. "The karma of the situation isn't lost on me."

'And you can't take it off yourself?'

"No."

Yushi Huang rises to her feet, and Ling Wen stiffens.

"Don't try it."

'If I subdue Bai Jing and take it off of you, then there shouldn't be a problem, should there?'

"...Other than the fact that I would be in the middle of Tonglu, defenseless." Ling Wen replies dryly.

'I would protect you.'

Yushi Huang doesn't see much of an issue at stake. If she neutralizes Bai Jing, she can place Ling Wen with the other farmers—and when that happens, it's a waiting game.

After that, Ling Wen can be hidden within her lands until the situation clears.

Still, she doubts that Ling Wen, who constantly desires to be in the center of things, would be particularly happy with such a plan.

However, the Civil God doesn't seem to have a choice.

"...Bai Jing won't fight you," He mutters.

'What do you mean?'

"He wouldn't fight a woman," Ling Wen explains tiredly, shaking his head. "Regardless of circumstances."

Bai Jing was simple that way--but decent.

'...I see.' Yushi Huang crosses her arms, contemplative.

Well, there's only one way to deal with that, isn't there?

"Would he fight me like this?"

Ling Wen stiffens—not only because Yushi Huang spoke aloud—which in itself is a rarity—but because of the Rain Master's voice.

And when he looks back over his shoulder--his suspicions are confirmed.

A much taller (though still not as tall as him) young man, with deeply tanned skin, long, dark hair—

But the same eyes, shining up at him.

"...Don't," Ling Wen warns, taking a step back. "We don't know how that ends."

Yushi Huang shrugs.

"We'll have to find out."

He draws Yulong, the dark steel of the blade gleaming, pressing a hand against his Ox's leg once more, quietly alerting the beast to prepare for battle.

"I wouldn't be surprised if he wanted to fight me," Yushi Huang continues, lifting his chin. "Given that I'm your lover."

Ling Wen goes rigid, the veins in his temples throbbing as he fights against it, his hand flying to the blade sheathed at his hip.

"What are you doing?!"

"Provoking him."

"I told you—we don't know how this ends—don't be ridiculous!"

"But I didn't lie, Ling Wen Zhen Jun."

Maybe he didn’t, but that actually makes things worse right now…

“I can understand why that bothers him.”

Yushi Huang isn’t necessarily prone to embarrassment, but even he feels his ears growing warm, saying words that, normally, would never leave the Rain Master’s mouth;

He's not a particularly boastful person, which is part of it, nor is he rude, which is another aspect, but—

"If I didn't know what you tasted like, I'd be angry too."

Saying things like that is surprisingly embarrassing, even if he doesn't display that outwardly.

Even Ling Wen looks startled—and—

He can honestly say it's the first time a man has made him blush—even if that's slightly less impressive when the Rain Master is frowning, red behind the ears.

If he was shy, why did he even—?

CLANG!

...Oh. Right.

Bai Jing is no ordinary warrior, attacking with a strength that feels more akin to a wild beast than someone who was once a mortal man —

But Yulong is no ordinary blade, and the Rain Master stands his ground, parrying him solidly, feet sinking into the earth.

"You're not a martial god!" Ling Wen glares as they clash, the Rain Master catching up each and every time—but never quite catching the upper hand.

'And I'm not fighting alone.'

Just as he says that—Ling Wen feels something ram into his back, sending him flying.

Behind him, the Guardian Ox of Yushi snorts, nostrils flaring as its hooves gorge into the earth, charging Ling Wen down. He catches both horns before they can ram into him—but he's trapped that way, laying on the ground, with the Oxen pinning him.

Yushi Huang shifts back into her female form, kneeling down beside the civil god as she feels around for the straps to his armor, scrambling to unbuckle them.

Her eyebrows knit together with frustration.

'I didn't realize there were so many fastenings involved.'

Ling Wen grimaces, arms straining as he prevents himself from getting gored.

Why would she? It's not like farmer's have a lot of experience with armor.

Some sarcastic part of his mind comments—

'If only shui-xiong were here, he would have plenty of experience removing armor.'

It almost makes Ling Wen laugh, until a wave of sadness washes over him—the way it always does.

Why is he thinking about him now?

Something catches his attention just then, however.

The fact that, all around the surface of his skin—Bai Jing has begun to tremble.

With fear.

'He's coming.'

Bai Jing rarely ever has the frame of consciousness to speak—but he does so now, his voice echoing in Ling Wen's mind.

'He's coming.'

Ling Wen strains, looking around—but—

Every other ghost has completely deserted the area.

"Who's coming?!"

Yushi Huang pauses in the middle of tugging at one of the buckles underneath Ling Wen's shoulder plate, frowning.

'What are you talking about?'

Ling Wen has no idea. But—

For Bai Jing to feel fear like that. For the area to have cleared so quickly—

It's something wrong.

No.

Ling Wen's instincts are screaming at him.

Something evil .

"...Go," he croaks, fingers squeezing tighter around the ox's horns, Bai Jing becoming frantic. "You need to go, now!"

'Not without you.'

The civil god has always been so composed.

He can't control Bai Jing, who is becoming frantic—and for once, his tone becomes...emotional.

"Goddamn it!" He snaps, arms trembling, sweat forming at his temples, "I'M NOT WORTH BEING SO STUBBORN!"

Just as he says this, a rush of strength takes over him.

He shoves the Ox back, hard, and the moment his hands are free—

Thump!

Ling Wen is frozen for a moment, eyes wide with horror.

The karma of these things—it's never lost on him.

Yushi Huang doesn't cry out, but her face contorts from the pain, holding the wound in her side

Something she could have blocked, had she not been so preoccupied with the fastenings on his armor—but now, blood pools and stains the green silk of her robes.

"I didn't mean—!"

'I know.'

'HE'S COMING!'

The ground rumbles, and Ling Wen's jaw locks.

He's never been a good person.

Even when he wanted to be, because then, this sense of vengeful anger that's always been inside of him might have felt more vindicated.

But he knew.

When Hua Cheng confronted him with that in Puqi Shrine—he knew.

Ling Wen isn't kind. He isn't patient, or gentle.

He doesn't go out of his way for strangers. Or offer words of comfort to people who don't deserve it. He doesn't listen to the words of someone left grieving all alone, mourning a tyrant few would weep for.

Even when Ling Wen lashes out against the unfairness of a society—he isn't heroic.

Hua Cheng was right.

When it was Xuli, he targeted the weak points—weak people.

When it was Jun Wu, Ling Wen did the same.

And as someone who has read more books than most would in a thousand lifetimes—

Ling Wen is more than aware of the fact that everything he's ever done culminates in the role of a secondary villain at best.

Merely knowing that grates against his ego.

But more than anything, it baffles him.

Because a character like that—doesn't fall for the princess .

"...Take her!"

This time, Ling Wen doesn't speak to the Rain Master, no—

He addresses the Guardian Ox directly, trembling with the effort to hold Bai Jing back.

Yushi Huang sends him a stubborn look, but—

If there's one thing Ling Wen can beat anyone in (except, perhaps, the crown prince) it's being strong willed.

"NOW!"

The Princess of Yushi doesn't get the chance to argue before her deputy scoops her onto his back, taking off.

Towards where the farmers went running off before, likely to reconnect with them, and take shelter—even as his mistress protests—not wanting to leave Ling Wen behind.

It might seem like a sacrifice—but it's more of a gamble, really.

It's too late for both of them to escape.

The thing that's making Bai Jing panic—whatever it is—is close enough now that there's only one choice.

Each of them escaping in different directions--and forcing whatever's coming to pick one.

Guaranteeing at least one person escapes.

Ling Wen knows he's never been a good person.

That he's selfish, ruthless, and cruel.

But—in spite of Bai Jing's clear terror as he flees, and the sound of something approaching him from behind—

He's glad that it chose him.

(Even if that means that he doesn't get away.)

Even as such chaos unfolds, as, for the first time in centuries, the continent rattles to life, cracks in age old facades bursting open, revealing what lies beneath—

In the Heavens, the Emperor sags in his throne, relieved.

It’s an act of quiet irony—knowing that, with everything going on in the realms below, he should feel so much more.

Fear. Anger. Shame.

Emotions that have always been present within him, ebbing and flowing in their own natural cycles.

But not right now.

“Your majesty?” One of the deputies of the imperial palace speaks from the doors of the martial hall, cautious.

Eyeing the emperor from a distance, evaluating his state before he speaks.

“…What is it?” Jun Wu murmurs, his head tilted back.

“We…haven’t found Xuan Zhen.”

He says this, expecting a harsh response.

The emperor has been demanding they find the martial god of the south, inquiring after him nearly every other hour.

The deputy bows, bracing himself for a stern reaction, but—

“…That’s alright,” Jun Wu murmurs, looking out the window.

“But where’s—?” He starts, his eyebrows knitting together with confusion but—

Then, he remembers.

“…Sire?”

His expression is still hidden from view—never looking away from the window.

“It’s nothing,” The emperor eventually replies, shaking his head. “It doesn’t matter, now.”

The other feelings will come later—and he’ll remember.

He’ll remember all of it, no matter how hard he’ll try to forget.

But for now, it doesn’t matter where Xuan Zhen, Nan Yang, or any of the others are—

Because Jun Wu’s head doesn’t hurt anymore.

And finally—it’s quiet .

Not Xuli

Chapter Summary

> “…What’s that?” Pei Ming frowns, looking at the largest building in the settlement, looming over the central square.
>
> Hua Cheng looks at the establishment plaque hanging over the door, eyes narrowing with focus. “…It’s a temple for the Crown Prince of Wuyong.”
>
> “…Their god?” Xie Lian questions, brow quirked with interest. “Can we go inside?”

Xie Lian has to admit—he can’t really think of a stranger group of individuals to be traveling with.

He’s carrying Hua Cheng on his back, the Ghost King’s head slumped against his shoulder, with Shuo and Banyue walking on either side of him—General Pei and Pei Su walking ahead.

And, while they’re being silent right now, Banyue and Pei Su are each holding a jar containing a vengeful spirit respectively, so—

Like he said, it’s an odd gathering of gods and ghosts, all traveling in relative calm—until Pei Ming comes to a halt, kneeling down.

“General?”

Pei Ming inspects the earth for a moment, examining something. “…Something’s not right,” he mutters.

Xie Lian can sense as much—the hairs on the back of his neck standing up.

“Say—Ren Song. We should’ve run into more ghosts by now, correct?”

“…Yeah,” the demon agrees, looking around with a frown. “We’re not that far in—so there should be crowds closer to the gates, but…”

“There was a battle,” Pei concludes, his fingertips brushing over displaced earth. “Judging by these hoof marks—the Rain Master was part of it.”

Xie Lian pauses, confused, and upon noticing his expression, Banyue explains—

“Lord Rain Master has only one deputy—he ascended along with her, and she hasn’t appointed anyone else since.”

“And…it’s an Ox?”

Banyue bobs her head in agreement, walking double time to keep up.

“Back in the Kingdom of Yushi, it was tradition for worshippers in the Temple of Yulong to rub door knockers engraved with different animals upon entering—giving a bit of their essence in exchange for blessings.”

Ahead of them, Pei grimaces at the talk of the fallen kingdom.

"Most people would rub the tiger knocker, or the monkey—but every single day, Lord Yushi Huang would rub the Ox Knocker in greeting. By the time of her death, it was covered in her life essence—and so, it ascended with her."

"...And it was here," Pei concludes, hurrying to wrap that conversation up, and Xie Lian frowns.

"Lord Rain Master fought a battle? But there's no sign of her now..."

Just as he says this, Shuo pauses, noticing something else upon the ground.

The barest remnants of a spirit, little more than a fractured skull laying upon the ground.

"...Did you see what happened?" He murmurs, kneeling down beside it.

The spirit rattles and groans, barely able to do more than wriggle back and forth.

"Not...not safe here!"

It moans, eye sockets glowing faintly with energy—in a matter of moments, Shuo expects it'll be reduced to a ghost fire.

"Which way should we go then, friend?"

"Not...Not to the west," it rasps, responding well to the forest demon's gentle tone. "There's a man in black!"

“Man in black?” Shuo questions, his eyes scanning the horizon. “We haven’t seen anyone like that.”

“He killed A THOUSAND GHOSTS single handedly!” The spirit whimpers, and Shuo grimaces.

Better not to deal with it until Hua Cheng has recovered, then.

“East it is, I suppose—”

“NO!” The creature cries, trembling. “EAST IS WORSE!”

Xie Lian frowns, holding Hua Cheng a little tighter against his back.

…Worse?

“That’s where the one in white is!” The spirit sounds even more terrified than before, bones cracking as it speaks. “He killed twice as many!”

...Two thousand ghosts? All done in by one creature?

"Whatever you do, DON'T let him catch you, he's...he's...!"

Before he can say any more, the last of the spirit's will seems to burn out, the skull crumbling into dust.

Only a ghost fire remains, dark and flickering.

Shuo looks to the north, then the south—finding both directions crowded in by sharp, craggy peaks, and he sighs.

"...West it is, then."

Which is closer to the Kiln, anyway.

Like something is guiding them deeper in.

When he glances back over his shoulder—he sees Pei Ming standing at a much further back than he was before—and the demon rolls his eyes, straightening up.

"Scared of a ghost fire, general?"

"Laugh all you want," the god shrugs. "The last time I got close to a ghost in the middle of dispersing—I nearly got myself assassinated."

Xie Lian frowns as the group sets off, remembering that day.

"...The ghost who stabbed you with the God Slayer," he recalls quietly. "Wasn't that in Qinghe?"

"It was," Pei agrees, keeping an eye out as they descend through the hills. "That was my last major assignment before all of this mess, actually."

His injury saw to that, anyway.

"...I wonder how that ghost got his hands on something like that," Xie Lian mutters. "Or why he would attack you."

Pei Ming shrugs, not looking back at the prince, but...

While it obviously felt personal at the time—he doesn't think he was the target. And he doesn't think those cultivators in Qinghe were the real cause of the Ghost's Demise.

The spirit seemed ancient—far more than any other that Pei has ever encountered. And when he saw the general...

He seemed relieved.

As though in that moment, when Deng Shihong realized he could pass the blade on—he was able to let go.

"I don't know," Pei Ming admits.

"But that's not the question that's been bothering me."

In the end, Deng Shihong had made it clear that he wanted to send some sort of message to the emperor—one that was clearly received, and it could have been anything.

Jun Wu has been Emperor for well over a millennia—and has many enemies in the ghost realm.

"...What is it?" Xie Lian murmurs, curious.

And Pei Ming's question gives him pause, sending his mind into a brick wall—because Xie Lian doesn't have an answer.

"...I gave the dagger to Jun Wu when I returned to the Heavens," Pei reminds him, though it isn't necessary—the entire Heavenly Court witnessed it.

"So, how did it end up with Blackwater?"

The very weapon he used to nearly kill the Emperor after his ascension.

And—while Pei Ming struggles, thinking back on the sight of Shi Wudu's body—

It was clear that a blade had been used to kill him—

And Blackwater never wielded such a weapon.

Only that dagger, on that day.

Xie Lian grows quiet, thinking.

The immediate answer, the easy explanation, would be that Blackwater had stolen it while he was disguised as Ming Yi, planning to use it to assassinate Shi Wudu—and he used it to attack Jun Wu in order to cause panic and unrest.

But there are obvious problems.

Xie Lian doesn't doubt that, with how far 'Ming Yi's' ears could reach, that he could have learned of the God Slayer's existence and stolen it.

But in the case of the Brocade Immortal being stolen—Jun Wu noticed immediately.

The Brocade Immortal is dangerous, to be sure—but not in the same way. Only a few could use the device to it's full, most dangerous potential—

Whereas the God Slayer could, in the hands of even someone as weak as a child, be used to kill a God.

And Jun Wu didn't notice?

That seems like almost too much of a stretch of the imagination.

The further they go, Xie Lian pauses—feeling the ground change beneath his feet.

"...Is this a street?" He mutters, shocked.

What would a street be doing here?

"...More like a town," Banyue replies.

A town? In the middle of the fields of Tonglu?

"...Whatever it is, it's shelter," Pei Ming mutters, looking around. "Pei Su has a mortal body right now—he needs to stop and rest. I'm sure that wouldn't hurt Crimson Rain, either."

Xie Lian can't argue with him there.

They make their way into one of the buildings, and while Xie Lian lets Hua Cheng sleep in his lap, Pei Ming sets about finding Pei Su something to eat, having not bothered to bring any provisions for himself.

"...I wasn't expecting big game or anything like that," the general mutters, returning with a slaughtered chicken. "But how could anyone be expected to survive in this place?"

After all, 'chicken' would be a generous way of describing the carcass in his hands.

More like a pile of bones and feathers, with the occasional speck of meat in between.

"...I don't suppose anyone here knows how to cook one of these?" He mutters, surveying the group, eyes settling on Banyue. "What about you?"

Shuo sends him a look. "Why ask her?"

"Well, who else am I gonna ask?" Pei retorts, tossing the chicken down. "There's not exactly a wide variety of options. I already know Pei Su doesn't know how, his highness probably doesn't either—"

"I do," Xie Lian pipes up, lifting his head. "I can tell Banyue what to do."

"No, no—" Shuo holds up his hands, "I don't actually have anything against Pei Su, I'll—"

He notices that Xie Lian is on the verge of looking crestfallen, and instead of outright saying that his food is a risk to public health and safety, he amends;

"...I'll help too."

After scavenging around, he's able to find a pot while Pei Su starts a fire, and Xie Lian shifts Hua Cheng so the ghost king is sleeping against his side, leaving his arms free to remove the chicken's feathers.

Pei Ming can't help but snort.

"We make quite a pair. The chicken killing general and the feather plucking prince," he sighs heavily, sitting down, leaning against the wall across from them.

Xie Lian laughs a little bit with him—in the same self deprecating fashion.

"...I'm sorry Jun Wu sent you here alone," he adds, having handed off the chicken to Shuo, who took it outside to be washed. "It's not exactly a one man job."

Pei shrugs, running his fingers through his hair. "I wasn't particularly worried about it."

He doesn't say that like a man brimming in confidence with his own skills—no.

It's more detached, unfeeling.

"...I'm surprised you agreed to take it on in the first place," Xie lian admits.

Pei Ming snorts again, leaning his head to the side.

It's not as though the Emperor is someone you can actually say no to—but he doubts that Xie Lian has ever even tried it.

"He offered to shorten Pei Su's banishment," he explains quietly, noticing the flash of discomfort in Xie Lian's expression. "Don't blame yourself for that."

The prince looks away.

It's not like he thinks he did the wrong thing, back in Banyue—but if he hadn't, Pei Su never would have been caught, it's that simple.

But, ironically enough—everyone had been worried about General Pei holding it against him back then.

Now, here he is—being the one telling Xie Lian not to worry about it.

"But ever since all of this started," Pei glances around them, then, remembering once again that the prince can read his body language, he adds— "Since Mount Tonglu opened, I mean—I've been wondering..."

He looks Xie Lian over—from his closed eyelids, to the bandages wrapped around his neck, and his boots, knowing what lies beneath.

"...When you ascended this time, why didn't you ask Jun Wu to remove your shackles?"

Xie Lian's expression freezes.

"...I have a question for you, too." He murmurs—opening his eyes, and despite the harsh glow of the cursed shackle in his irises—

Pei Ming can't help but find it beautiful—in a strange, tragic way.

"Why haven't you forged a spiritual weapon in all these years?"

Now, it's the general's turn to go still, and the prince carries on, "I suspect our reasons are probably the same."

And just like that—Pei Ming understands.

"...Fair point, your highness."

Shuo returns shortly after with the chicken, washed and plucked, and with Xie Lian's help, starts instructing Banyue on how to stew it in the pot over the fire.

"There's not much meat—but at the very least, broth is better than nothing."

"Which reminds me—Shuo..." Xie Lian frowns. "Are you just going to keep Lang Qianqiu that way the entire time?"

Pei Ming looks around, startled. "Tai Hua is here?"

Shuo twists his hair around his finger, and Xie Lian sighs, his voice dry.

"...You forgot about him, didn't you?"

"..."

...Xie Lian can see why Hua Cheng told him he couldn't use that spell.

"I'm letting him out, I'm letting him out!" Shuo grumbles, rummaging around in his pockets. "Really, he's fine! Think of it like he got a free nap—!"

Poof!

"A NAP?!"

Oh boy.

"What is WRONG WITH YOU?! I could have helped back there!"

"We were fine, no one needs your help!"

"YOU'RE JUST PISSED BECAUSE I SAID YOU—!"

Shuo holds up his fingers threateningly, and Lang Qianqiu throws his hands up, defensive.

"Do NOT turn me into a DOLL AGAIN!"

Shuo pauses, fingers aloft—then seems to settle for reaching forward and grabbing him by the collar, dragging him outside so they can continue their argument there.

Pei Ming watches the entire exchange, baffled. "They seem...close."

Xie Lian sighs. "They do, don't they?"

The General would normally be eager to ask about that sort of thing—or maybe rib Pei Su a little about risking his life for a girl who can actually cook—

(Or do anything, other than throw scorpion snakes apparently.)

But for some reason, he can't make himself want to.

"...It's funny," he admits, glancing around at the building they've taken shelter in. "In all of the years I've listened to stories about Mount Tonglu, I've never heard about people having lived here."

"You wouldn't have."

Xie Lian didn't realize what a relief it could be, just hearing the sound of someone's voice.

"San Lang?" He turns to the side, feeling the ghost king sit up, stretching his arms over his head.

He sounds older now—feels older too, tho not quite his normal self.

Probably closer to fourteen—still, much older than he was before.

The ghost king lets out a soft yawn, his voice cracking a little as he rolls the kinks and aches out of his shoulders.

"Morning, gege. Hope I wasn't too much of a hindrance."

Xie Lian can't stop smiling—biting back the urge to ruffle his hair or call him cute again, knowing Hua Cheng wouldn't appreciate it—not in front of General Pei Ming, anyway.

"Not at all! How are you feeling?"

"Better, my strength is coming back," Hua Cheng assures him.

Then, he looks back to General Pei, continuing what he was saying before.

"The country that once stood here was destroyed so long ago—there's no one left who remembers it. Even compared to Jun Wu, it's ancient."

"...Really?" Pei raises an eyebrow. "How old is it?"

“More than two thousand years—the only people who would know of it are in the last heavenly dynasty.”

Ah—then he would have to be right.

Jun Wu is the eldest god in the Heavenly Court—and his ascension was around fifteen hundred years before.

A famous general during a warring era—one who deposed the former king, ruling for a few years before ascending himself.

“…If that’s so, why don’t the buildings look older?” Pei questions, glancing out the window.

The city doesn’t look like crumbling ruins—just abandoned.

“It’s sealed like a mausoleum for hundreds of years at a time,” Hua Cheng explains, watching the walls around them. “Only those who have survived the Kiln can come and go as they please.”

"…Trying to keep people out?"

More like keeping someone trapped inside.

A butterfly, pinned to a board.

"Does that mean you can come and go as you please?"

"…Blackwater too," Hua Cheng agrees, not missing the way Pei's eyes flash every time He Xuan is mentioned.

"And how do you know exactly how old this place is?"

Hua Cheng shrugs, nodding toward a shelf behind Pei Ming. "The same way I know anything—I read about it."

Pei frowns, turning to inspect the scrolls sitting there—and when he opens them—

"…What kind of language is this?"

"The mother tongue of the west and central plains." Hua Cheng rises to his feet, walking over to look at the scroll over Pei Ming's shoulder. "Spoken by the people of Wuyong."

"That was the name of this place?"

The calamity hums in agreement, and Xie Lian notices something.

Hua Cheng might be older now, but…

He still doesn't sound like himself. His voice is still altered—and Xie Lian can't help but wonder—

Why did it sound so distorted, before?

'Please don't ask me.'

'I hate lying—so please, don't ask.'

"…And how can you read all of this?" Pei mutters, brow furrowed.

"I spent ten years here, when I became a ghost king," Hua Cheng shrugs. "And I had a teacher."

Actually—it was the first language he knew how to read and write. He didn't learn to read the modern language of the time until he left, under Fai.

Xie Lian would have taught him about such things, back then—like he did many others—but Hong'er had been too ashamed to admit that he didn't know how.

Pei Ming waits for more of an explanation, but when one doesn't come, Xie Lian stands up.

"Well, while Pei Su is resting—why don't we explore the town? I'm curious about this place."

He reaches for Hua Cheng's hand, the ghost king squeezing his gently in agreement.

"Certainly, gege—I'm glad to tell you everything I can."

Pei Ming follows after them, arms crossed, as he can't help but notice —

That isn't the same as saying he'll tell Xie Lian everything that he knows .

"…What's that?" Pei Ming frowns, looking at the largest building in the settlement, looming over the central square.

Hua Cheng looks at the establishment plaque hanging over the door, eyes narrowing with focus. "…It's a temple for the Crown Prince of Wuyong."

"…Their god?" Xie Lian questions, brow quirked with interest. "Can we go inside?"

Pei Ming stares at the front doors, feeling…

Uneasy.

"You're sure this place is safe?" He mutters, walking up the steps behind them.

"As safe as it can be," Hua Cheng shrugs, helping Xie Lian step over the threshold. "Everything here is cursed."

That may be true, but…This place feels…

Evil.

Profoundly so.

“…Why is everything black?” Pei stares, cautious to take that final step. “I’ve never seen a temple like it.”

Hua Cheng glances back over his shoulder, his expression grim.

“All of the temples in Wuyong are like this.”

Xie Lian presses his palm against the wall, frowning.

“…It wasn’t originally black,” he leans closer, fingers smoothing over the scorch marks. “This is what happens when you burn marble.”

Xie Lian would know—most of his own temples ended up that way, before they crumbled into ruins.

“…All of the Temples in Wuyong were burned?”

Pei Ming stares up at the ceiling—and now, he can see it.

Blade marks, hacking away at the name that once stood there—rendering the characters unreadable.

To anyone who could understand the language in the first place, anyhow.

“…Actually…”

Xie Lian stops, stricken.

"...I've heard that name before," he mutters, pressing a hand against his temple, memory straining.

Hua Cheng pauses beside him, watching the prince's face. "Which one?"

Xie Lian's reply leaves the general and the calamity silent with shock.

"The Crown Prince of Wuyong."

"...Where?" Pei Ming frowns, recovering sooner than Hua Cheng. "Because I'm older than you are—and, no offense your highness, but you're a little clueless when it comes to matters outside of the mortal realm—"

"My Guoshi," Xie Lian explains, before Hua Cheng can take offense.

"When I was little...he used to tell me about the Crown Prince of Wuyong."

Usually as a means of getting the child to behave. Not that Xie Lian was ever foul tempered—he just had a tendency to wander off, his attention scattered.

(Always chasing butterflies.)

Xie Lian would be sat in his lap, staring longingly out at the palace gardens, all while his Guoshi was trying earnestly to get him to focus on his lessons.

"...And what did he say about him?" Hua Cheng mutters, his arms crossed.

"That...he was the smartest, strongest, most focused prince who ever lived," Xie Lian smiles faintly, "I think he was exaggerating to make me focus on my work, though."

He reaches out, pressing his palm against the wall once more.

That wasn't the only thing Mei Nianqing said.

He also said that he was the bravest man that he ever knew.

In an oddly specific, far off way that Xie Lian hadn't put much thought into at the time—children never do, but—

It seemed like he knew him.

"...And what did you say when he told you that?"

"...I said I didn't want to be like the Prince of Wuyong—I wanted to be a god," Xie Lian mumbles, rubbing the back of his neck, feeling sheepish.

"..." Pei Ming snorts. "Well, no one can say you don't follow through, your highness."

Xie Lian rolls his eyes, embarrassed, but...

He recalls saying--0

'If the Crown Prince of Wuyong was so amazing, why didn't he become a god, then?'

And Mei Nianqing never gave him an answer.

But clearly, standing here now...it seems like he did.

"Whatever happened to that Guoshi of yours?" Hua Cheng questions, and Xie Lian bites his lip, holding his arm.

"...He disappeared during the Fall of Xianle. Many people did."

But if the story was so ancient—

How did Mei Nianqing know it?

But that's when he notices something else—his palm still pressed flat against the wall.

"...There's something underneath this," he mutters, fingers digging into a thick layer of hardened soot. "San Lang, could you help me—?"

He doesn't even have to finish his request.

Hua Cheng holds up his hand, E'Ming flying into his palm—and when it does, he pauses, raising an eyebrow.

"...Did General Ming Guang touch E'Ming while I was meditating?"

"That's an artful way of saying you were out cold," Pei mutters.

"..." Hua Cheng stares at him sharply, but says nothing—and Xie Lian steps in.

"He did—but it wasn't on purpose," he places a hand on Hua Cheng's shoulder. "We were struggling to deal with Ming'guang and Ke Mo, and when Pei tried to say something to E'Ming, he just..."

Flew straight into the General's hand.

Hua Cheng would expect that sort of thing for Xie Lian, but for a practical stranger, and a Heavenly Official no less.

He sends the blade a warning stare, as if saying that he'll deal with him later, but...

It takes Pei Ming a moment to notice that the ghost king's eyes are burning into him with a cryptic expression—the emotion behind them unreadable.

"...What?"

Clang!

With a silver flash, E'Ming scrapes the hardened ash and soot off the walls, and Hua Cheng looks away.

"Nothing."

Unaware, once the air clears—Xie Lian presses his hand against the wall again, and for a moment—he remembers a very different day.

Standing in the halls of the Palace of Yong'an, wearing robes with trailing sleeves.

A mask on his face.

Tracing a mural portraying his own fall from grace, in a palace built by the people who dragged him down—paid for with gold stolen from his own people.

And instead of Hua Cheng standing beside him back then, it was Wu Ming.

But this isn't Yong'an.

Wu Ming isn't here.

Xie Lian isn't that person anymore.

And this mural...feels very different.

Xie Lian can tell as much by tracing it with his fingertips, Hua Cheng quietly describing it to him.

It's a mural with four levels—the highest being that of the Heavens, pure golden light, standing empty.

At the bottom are crowds and crowds of devoted subjects and believers, their hands lifted in adulation and prayer.

Above them is a group of five, each with distinct faces, glowing with a faint spiritual aura—and Pei can't help but notice the woman standing among them, curious.

"...She's beautiful," he mutters, staring at the unique color of her eyes. "Who are they supposed to be?"

"Perhaps the god's deputies?" Xie Lian offers, tracing the shape of their faces for himself.

"Or guoshi," Hua Cheng mutters under his breath.

And above all of them, stands who could only presumably be the Crown Prince of Wuyong.

Handsome—dressed in white, radiant.

His expression pulled back into a wide, laughing smile.

And if that was all there was to it—the mural wouldn't be that strange—even if it seems oddly new, compared to everything else—

It's what the Crown Prince of Wuyong is standing upon. Not clouds, or earth, but...a person

Dressed in rags—weeping.

The only thing in this glorious, idyllic imagery that feels out of place.

And yet.

When Xie Lian traces the features of his face—then reaches up to touch the Crown Prince of Wuyong's, they're...

Just then, there's a sharp cry outside, then moaning.

Pei Ming is the first one to whip his head around, rushing outside.

"Pei Junior?!"

They find the former deputy general rolled upon his side, clutching his stomach in pain, his pallor turned absolutely green, Banyue rubbing his shoulder, distressed, and Shuo—

He seems a little beside himself, throwing his hands over his head.

"Why THE FUCK would you put a scorpion snake in a PERFECTLY GOOD SOUP?!" He glares at Banyue, who shrinks.

"R...Ren Song gege, you said there wasn't enough meat on the chicken, so I..."

"...You're not even the only one she calls gege?" Pei Ming mutters, rubbing his temples--not even angry anymore, just disappointed.

"If you were worried about that, why not go out and find ANOTHER CHICKEN?! You don't just THROW A SCORPION SNAKE INTO SOMEONE'S DINNER!"

"But..." Banyue looks back and forth between Shuo and Pei Su somberly, her expression torn. "I only know how to throw scorpion snakes."

Shuo levels her with a glare. "I distinctly remember Hua Chengzhu teaching you other things besides THROWING REPTILES!"

"Are they, though?"

Lang Qianqiu frowns, examining the remnants of the scorpion snake in the pot.

Shuo pauses in the middle of screaming at her, looking over at him in confusion.

"What?"

"Well, it's half scorpion, and those are arachnids." Lang Qianqiu explains, poking at the tail with a stick.

"..." Shuo looks over at Xie Lian, dumbfounded. "You mean he's not entirely stupid?"

"...He's not academically hopeless," the prince offers, to which Lang Qianqiu preens as though he's been given some great compliment.

"I don't know if I ever wanted to see this side of him."

Shuo looks back at Pei Su, hands on his hips, "And for fuck's sake, if you watched her put the snake in the pot, why did you EAT IT?!"

Pei Su moans, half curled into a ball, "But...she...she made it..."

Behind Xie Lian, Hua Cheng nods with approval.

Perfectly logical.

Shuo feels like he might pull his hair out, and Xie Lian squints, staring in the direction of the pot, shackles gleaming.

"Did the snake...actually turn into a vengeful spirit?"

Banyue nods glumly, rubbing Pei Su's back.

"Apparently they take that sort of thing personally..."

Pei looks from Shuo, to Banyue, then to Hua Cheng, leaning over to speak next to Xie Lian's ear. "These are supposed to be the most dangerous creatures in the ghost realm?"

"..." The god twiddles his thumb, rocking on his heels. "San Lang and Shuo are, certainly." The general makes a quiet, disbelieving noise, and Xie Lian points out, "Think of how they would feel if they met General Qi Ying."

There's a difference between seeming dangerous and being dangerous.

Pei purses his lips, losing any capacity to argue with that. "Fair enough."

"We should keep moving," Hua Cheng murmurs, looking around. "I'm assuming he can't walk." His eyes drift from Pei Su, to Lang Qianqiu. "You—carry him."

"I—what?!" The martial god sputters, "I don't take orders from you, Crimson Rain—and he's Pei's descendant! Why should I—?"

"If something comes up, the general is more useful with his hands free than yours," Hua Cheng cuts him off coldly. "Or do you want to go back in Ren Song's pocket?"

"..." Lang Qianqiu scowls, his pride screaming as he lifts the exiled deputy off of the ground.

However, the moment he does—Pei Su starts crying out in even more agony—to the point where Hua Cheng shakes his head with a heavy sigh.

"Never mind—it looks like we can't move him. You four stay behind—the general and I will investigate the area with dianxia."

Shuo doesn't complain, understanding the thought process behind it—

Banyue and Pei Su are dead weight at the moment—more of a liability if they get ambushed. Leaving them behind--and Shuo and Lang Qianqiu to protect them—is the practical choice for now.

As the three head on, Xie Lian holding Hua Cheng's hand as they walk through the ancient streets, he adds—

"We should stop inside any more temples we find along the way and see if there are more murals like that," He murmurs, thinking.

Knowing—despite the fact that he doesn't particularly want to confront the question why —that they hold an important meaning.

"I couldn't agree more, your highness," Hua Cheng murmurs, but...

Pei can see a tension there, between his shoulders.

Curious.

But any strange reactions from the ghost king pale in comparison to the strangeness of this place itself.

A constantly overcast sky—though not from clouds, no—

From the smoke.

Swirling overhead, with no definitive source to it—and the ever present smell of ash.

Pei Ming has been here for days now—and he hasn't seen the sun rise or set.

Just this permanent, angry red glow.

There's a faint noise in his ears, crackling—like how his ears used to ring after a hard battle, but—

It's not that. It's…

He hears a faint, warbled voice. Distorted. Barely even noticeable over the sounds around him.

…His communication array.

And when he makes out one word—a name, really—it makes him stop in his tracks.

'…Pei-Xiong?'

The general raises a hand to his temple, his heart pounding, because—

There really aren't many people who have ever called him that.

'…Hello?'

There's more crackling—jumbled syllables, barely intelligible.

'Ling Wen?!'

That's the only person he can think of who would still call him that. The only one who's still a—

And just as suddenly as it started, the communication array cuts off, falling silent.

Pei Ming hangs his head, fists clenched at his sides.

"General! We found another one!"

"…Great," Pei Ming mutters, arms crossed as he steps into the temple behind them.

This time, it's faster with Xie Lian knowing what he's looking for—but the walls aren't quite the same, with this temple built directly into the mountainside. Half man-made, half cave.

Still burned and hacked at with swords—and with a strange, echoing quality to the sounds of their steps as Xie Lian feels around.

"…San Lang, right here!"

Clang!

E'Ming is quick to flash into action, and when Xie Lian reaches out again…

It's another mural.

Xie Lian struggles to distinguish by touch alone—and after a moment, Hua Cheng snaps his fingers, a small flame appearing in his palm.

Small—but bright enough to light the entire room. The magic looks simple, but displays a natural finesse.

"Good with fire, huh?"

The teenager glances back over his shoulder, dark eyes unnaturally bright in the firelight.

"…I dabble."

And when he turns back to explain the mural to Xie Lian—

Even he pauses to stare, confused.

“Is it…A cliff?” Xie Lian mutters, confused.

It's hard for him to distinguish the different elevations of rock beneath his fingers, where paint has left it slightly raised—but Hua Cheng leans in beside him, quick to explain.

"...It's Mount Tonglu," he mutters, peering closer at the rock face. "The eastern side."

There are two ways of entering the Kiln—one, much slower, is through the base of the mountain, climbing through countless different caverns and chambers until you reach the surface.

The second is near the summit—a nearly endless, winding path—the upper half covered in snow.

This spot is around halfway up—a craggy outcropping, overlooking the valleys below. And he's...

Pei Ming steps a little closer behind them, his eyes narrowed.

"Well, that's morbid."

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow, and Hua Cheng explains—

"Someone's being cast down."

More accurately, someone's being thrown off the side—their expression twisted with terror, and from the look of it...

There's a pile of bones waiting below him.

Previous victims.

"It...looks like it was some sort of execution ground," Hua Cheng frowns.

"..." Xie Lian turns his head toward him. "You didn't react this way to the first mural."

The ghost king nods, his palm pressed against the wall next to Xie Lian's.

"There was nothing about the last mural that confused me."

Pei Ming's eyebrows raise.

"...So you knew what all of that was about?"

Hua Cheng doesn't look back at him, his eyes focused on the wall.

"I saw the story of the Crown Prince of Wuyong in the Kiln, but...there are parts of it I don't remember," His frown deepens, staring at the man falling.

Screaming.

"But there was nothing like this."

"Care to share what you do know?" Pei Ming mutters, rubbing his arms in an effort to get the chill out of them. "It sure would help, since we're on a demented scavenger hunt in his temples."

Hua Cheng sends him an annoyed look, then sighs.

"I saw it through his wife's..." Hua Cheng stops, his lips parted, brow furrowing as something pricks at his memory.

"...his wife's what?"

"Memories," the ghost king mutters, slowly raising his eyes back to the wall.

Pei Ming scratches his chin, thinking.

"How would the Kiln have shown you that?"

"...When you fight someone inside the Kiln," Hua Cheng explains, saying each word cautiously—as though he doesn't know if he'll be able to get them out. "You exchange memories with them."

Just like that, it clicks.

Xie Lian's palm freezes against the wall, flingers slightly shaky—and his eyes widen with shock.

"...You mean Zhao Beitong," he whispers—and when Hua Cheng doesn't disagree, that pretty much confirms it.

Xie Lian hadn't even heard her name before his third ascension—and in the last months, he's been told two stories that seem utterly divorced from one another.

The emperor calling her a calamity—a murderer. The woman who forged her husband, Bai Wuxiang, into a Ghost King.

And Hua Cheng spoke of her...like a second mother. With fondness and respect. Saying that she had been a martial goddess, once—

And that she forged every Ghost King, but not Bai Wuxiang.

If there was a woman in the Kiln with Hua Cheng—it had to be her.

That's not what frightens him.

It's that...if the Prince of Wuyong was her husband, then...

"The Prince of Wuyong..." Xie Lian mutters, his fingers trembling slightly—until he has to cover them with his other hand to make them stop.

Hua Cheng's hand lands on his back, gentle.

"...Is Bai Wuxiang."

For a moment, there's only tense silence—then, Pei Ming lets out a low whistle, rocking back on his heels.

"Well I'll be damned. He's a geezer."

It's not that he's taking it lightly, more so that he's trying to take some tension from Xie Lian, but...

He watches the prince's back—how his shoulders slump in with anxiety and fear, just at the mention of the man's name.

And he wonders, now.

Why a ghost like that—who would have been well over a thousand years old by the Fall of Xianle...

...would target a teenage boy.

Pei Ming stares at Xie Lian's back—and for some reason, he—

He remembers the look on the prince's face, all those years ago—when the Emperor forbade him from descending to help the people of Xianle.

Upset, confused, and—

'What...did I do wrong? '

"...Her memories weren't that different from what the Emperor told you, but..." Hua Cheng's hand tightens on Xie Lian's shoulder—almost imperceptibly. "The Prince of Wuyong was always the one orchestrating events—not her."

It was his fault that their sons died, after all.

In San Lang's case, it was more obvious--but he was the reason Bolin was sent away, and...

While there was never any proof, Hua Cheng never forgot the look on his face, when Zhao Beitong found their first born son's body.

Saddened, but not surprised.

It was his fault.

"...He ascended as a god early in their marriage," Hua Cheng recalls quietly. "Then descended to try to help the kingdom when it fell into peril."

(It sounds painfully familiar.)

"And he failed," Xie Lian mutters.

That much is obvious, given where they're standing.

"He did." Hua Cheng agrees quietly. "And when he did—he used his wife's grief to manipulate her into taking revenge on the Heavens. The rest of the story is the same from there. He didn't re-appear again until..."

The fall of Xianle.

"What surprised you about this mural then?"

"...In Zhao Beitong's memories, no one was ever thrown off of the Kiln," Hua Cheng mutters, looking at the countless skeletons below.

Into it, yes—when they were desperate to stop the volcano from erupting once more.

"The people of Wuyong never climbed the mountain."

Actually, even before there was a risk of a volcanic eruption—people never went near it, or even spoke of it.

It wasn't something Hua Cheng noticed back then, but now, staring at this image...

It feels odd.

And there was one other thing that he didn't understand.

In that last Mural—he understood who the people were. Who the Guoshi and Zhao Beitong were. Who Bai Wuxiang was.

But what he couldn't understand—was why Bai Wuxiang was standing on top of a man with the same face .

His first instinct was a brother—due to the way harem politics work in most imperial families, most of them are littered with siblings, but...

Much like the prince he would come to torment countless centuries later, Bai Wuxiang was an only child.

His father had other consorts and concubines besides the Queen of Wuyong—but she was the only one who bore him a child.

A living one, anyway.

After the prince's birth, every single child brought into the world in the Palace of Wuyong was stillborn.

To the point where people began to whisper that the royal family was cursed.

The first child to be born alive after that was Bai Wuxiang's first son, Zhang Wei. And his other two children that followed.

So, no—it couldn't be a brother.

But the resemblance is so strong .

"...San Lang?" Xie Lian asks after a moment, reaching back to find his hand from where it's fallen from Xie Lian's shoulder, squeezing it.

"Yes?"

"About the things from the Kiln you said you couldn't remember..." Xie Lian mumbles, lowering his head.

"...Was it that you actually couldn't remember, or because you would have to lie, if you tried to tell us?"

Hua Cheng falls silent, staring at him, lips parted with shock.

"I would never choose to lie to you, gege."

"I know that," Xie Lian agrees quickly, biting his lip.

"But there are some things that you just...can't say, right? Even if you want to?"

There's nothing that Hua Cheng wouldn't tell him, if he had the choice. Hell, he'd be happy to die a third time, if it meant he could just tell him one thing--

"...Yes," he agrees quietly.

And Xie Lian—he's grasping his hand so tightly, but...

His fingers are trembling.

"Ge—?"

"Wait a minute," Xie Lian interrupts, shackles gleaming in the firelight as he looks around. "...Where's General Pei?"

The only aura left in the room is Hua Cheng's—muted, but visible.

Hua Cheng falls silent, his own eyes turning about the room.

"I was right there—and I didn't hear him move," Xie Lian mutters, suspicious.

And there's no way that the general would have disappeared during their discussion about Bai Wuxiang, so...?

But before long, Xie Lian's ears—long since over-sensitive from years without his sight, prick with awareness.

'...Ling Wen?! How the hell did you end up here?!'

The prince stiffens, pressing his ear against the wall, trying to detect where the voice is coming from.

‘Oh, I don’t know,’ Ling Wen drawls back at him, still in his male form. ‘I just felt like being tied up!’

‘So do I sometimes, but now’s not the time—!’

‘I was obviously captured and dragged in here,’ he grouses, feeling more than a little awkward.

‘Who was able to overpower you in the Brocade Immortal?’ Pei strains to twist around to look at him, surprised.

‘Not the creature that has us now—it just came across me when I was wounded and took advantage of the situation.’

‘Then…was it you calling me, before?’

‘…What?’

Ling Wen's voice is sharp, baffled—and he huffs with annoyance. 'I didn't even know you were here until you got dropped in with me!'

'Oh.'

'Are you going to help me figure a way out of this, or not?'

There's a pause, and when Pei Ming responds, his voice is clipped.

'I don't think I want to.'

'...What's that supposed to mean?'

'Well. Considering the fact that you decided to steal the Brocade Immortal and turn tail without saying a damn word to me—after everything that's happened? No. I don't feel like figuring it out.'

Ling Wen falls silent, stewing, and Pei just can't let it go.

'Seriously—what the fuck were you thinking, stealing that? You thought you were too smart to get caught?'

'The moment I knew Mount Tonglu was open, I didn't have a choice!' The civil god snaps. 'And if you want to be quiet—that's for the better. Bai Jing REALLY doesn't like you.'

'Doesn't like me?!' Pei Ming protests, appalled. 'But I haven't done anything!'

'He's gotten it in his head that we're lovers.'

'Lovers?! But we've never—!'

'THAT'S ENOUGH, BOTH OF YOU!'

A third voice cries out over the two, and Xie Lian stiffens with shock. It's—

He knows that voice.

And so does Pei, from the sound of it.

'...Jing Wen?' He mutters, audibly pausing to look something over. 'I thought you were dead! How the hell'd you end up in that thing?'

'DON'T CHANGE THE SUBJECT YOU DAMN PHILANDERER!' The fallen civil god sneers.

Xie Lian remembers him faintly. Jing Wen Zhen Jun wsa the head civil god before Ling Wen—the very same head civil god who ruled when Xie Lian ascended for the first time.

'Why have you chased us all the way here?' Ling Wen mutters, almost disinterested in the presence of his former superior. 'I'm surprised you're willing to show your face in front of me again.'

'I—?! ME, unwilling to show my face in front of YOU?!' Jing Wen half shrieks.

'I'm not the one who's done anything to be ASHAMED OF! All I ever did was LIFT YOU UP, and LOOK where it's gotten me!'

'HA!' Ling Wen barks out a sarcastic laugh. 'What was lifting me up, if not some means of satisfying your own ego?!'

'Ego?!' Jing Wen chokes. 'Is that what you think it was?!'

Hua Cheng must be hearing the same thing—and sensing Xie Lian's confusion, so he explains.

"Shortly after gege's second banishment–-there was a festival celebrating all of the Civil Gods of Xuli."

Xie Lian can faintly remember Xianle doing something similar, in times long since past.

"One of the events was an essay contest where anyone could submit anonymously—and they would be displayed in the Temple of Jing Wen, where the people would vote on a winner."

"At the time—Jing Wen thought it would be interesting to descend to the mortal realm and enter the contest himself. In doing so, he wrote a jaunty, sycophantic essay titled 'Ode to Xuli,' praising the people and history of the nation."

A crowd pleaser, Xie Lian is sure.

"But instead of winning—the price went to a critical political essay titled, 'Not Xuli,' dissecting the problems with society at that time."

"...Written by Ling Wen, I'm assuming?" Xie Lian raises an eyebrow, remembering what Hua Cheng had said to Ling Wen in Puqi Shrine.

'I've read better essays from you.'

"Was it quite good?"

Hua Cheng hesitates, thinking back on it.

"I would call it more daring than anything else. Nothing said was overtly insightful or revolutionary—but few people were willing to write against the government at that time."

Xie Lian can imagine why.

While he can't say he paid close attention to the politics of the human world during his banishment—he hadn't even realized there was a war between Yong'an and Banyue before he was drafted into it, for example—that wasn't always the case.

When he had been a crown prince in the mortal realm—understanding the politics of the kingdoms surrounding Xianle had been part of his upbringing...Including Xuli.

The kingdoms on the continent today seem to rise and fall with growing frequency and violence—but during Xie Lian's time, there had been three old powers: Xianle, Xuli, and Yushi.

The latter had been conquered and in decline by the time of his birth.

The kingdom of Xianle was the oldest of the three—and by far the most powerful, and Yushi had deep roots as well, but both crumbled rather quickly to internal and external pressures.

By contrast, the decline of Xuli was far more gradual.

Unlike Xianle and Yushi—Xuli isn't located on a flat, open plain. Its natural geography was such that it would never fall to invasion or external conflict.

Rather, it was centuries of internal strife and growing corruption that rotted the country from the inside out.

Becoming a country ruled by the wealthy merchant classes who ran the port city of Qinghe, before slowly fading from relevance.

But no one would ever dispute that Xuli reached the height of its prominence during the wars of the legendary general, Pei Ming.

Or that its decline began immediately after his ascension.

Born more than a century later, Ling Wen would have been living through the beginning of that decline—witnessing the corruption beginning to eat away at a once great power.

But few dared to speak of it yet—not wanting to speak the truth of Xuli's fate into existence.

So, while Ling Wen's words did not require any particular amount of brilliance—they did require audacity, and nerves of steel to put to paper.

"When the government officials of Xuli at that time discovered who had written the essay, they were going to throw Ling Wen in prison for sedition. But—upon hearing this, Jing Wen quickly descended and appointed her as his deputy, saving her from that fate."

And hearing Hua Cheng describe it like that—he does make it sound like a generous move on Jing Wen's part, but...

The argument between the god and his former deputy paints such events in a very different light.

‘You think it was ego?!’ Jing Wen snaps, infuriated. ‘What is it about having YOU as a deputy that would have soothed my ego?!’

‘Because I BEAT you,’ Ling Wen retorts, straining against his bonds. ‘Letting me rot in jail would have made you look like a SORE LOSER!’

‘You know something, you fucking bitch?!’ The civil god hisses. ‘You’ve always had an over inflated sense of self importance! I was a GOD! Do you think anyone would have remembered I lost a silly essay contest a century later?! I saw POTENTIAL in you!’

‘Potential?!’ Ling Wen glares, fighting the urge to laugh like it’s some sort of joke. ‘Is that what you do, when you think one of your deputies shows potential?! Do you have them serve tea, wait tables, deliver gifts?’

‘YES!’ There’s a rattling sound when he shouts in response. ‘That’s EXACTLY what I do! How else are you supposed to learn how to keep up with the others?!’

Ling Wen bites back a snort, his tone turning bitter—and Xie Lian is reminded of when he was in Puqi Shrine before.

Explaining how every man had looked down upon him.

‘You say that like I didn’t watch you favor every other deputy above me! Giving them opportunities to learn and sharpen their skills—while I was always trapped doing your menial work! You think I learned anything from that?!’

‘If you didn’t—then it was a WASTE!’

There’s more rattling as Jing Wen speaks, his voice shaking with frustration. ‘You think it’s enough if you JUST perform as well as the other male deputies?! NO! You have to work TWICE as hard, to be TWICE as good, you—!’

Xie Lian grimaces at that line of reasoning.

But Ling Wen—

‘Would you just shut the FUCK up?!’

Even Pei Ming is a little startled, hearing his friend curse like that.

‘You want to make yourself feel better, and tell yourself you’re enlightened on how DIFFICULT it is to succeed as a woman?!’ Ling Wen hisses. ‘You promote me, then push me twice as hard because you CARE so much, because you know society is unfair, but you’re just so GENEROUS?’

‘I gave you the opportunity, didn’t I?!’

‘It doesn’t MATTER if you understand a system is broken and prejudiced if all you do is ENFORCE IT!’

Ling Wen knows that better than anyone.

The one thing she learned from her old boss—it was how to be performative.

‘You don’t GET to act like giving me a position, then enforcing the SAME biased standards and expecting me to fail is doing me a FAVOR!’

‘And maybe I was right to treat you like that, huh?’ Jing Wen counters with a sneer on his tone. ‘Because you couldn’t succeed on your own—you had to fuck General Pei Ming just to get him to help you BRING ME DOWN SO YOU COULD TAKE MY POSITION—!’

‘HEY, HEY!’ Pei cries. ‘I have NEVER had ANY sort of relationship like that with Ling Wen! That would NEVER happen!’

‘Oh, really?!’ Jing Wen retorts. ‘You expect ME to believe that from YOU of all people?!’

‘…God, why is everything coming back to haunt me NOW of all times,’ the general mutters. ‘Look—we already settled this between us like men centuries ago, and believe it or not I HAVE changed! I don’t get around the way I used to!’

Xie Lian frowns, confused, and Hua Cheng explains it to him quietly, his lips just beside the prince’s ear.

“Pei Ming has always been famous for his romantic affairs—but before his ascension, he was even more well known for a relationship with a goddess. And she was the wife of…”

Jing Wen.

If not for the man’s words, Xie Lian would feel pity for him.

‘We had a duel, fair and square. I spared you when you lost, what more is there to discuss?’

‘You honestly don’t realize that all you did was humiliate me a second time?!’ Jing Wen sputters, infuriated.

(After all—Pei was mortal during said duel, and victorious over a god.)

‘And that doesn’t change the fact that you slept with my deputy, then helped her DEPOSE ME!’

‘I never slept with Ling Wen!’ Pei grumbles, ‘That’s not even a possibility!’

‘You mean to tell me you never tried?! You didn’t find her beautiful?! You fucking LIAR!’

‘Of course she is!’ Pei replies sharply. ‘But she’s a FRIEND! A respected, valuable friend, but nothing more! I find it highly ironic that, as you’ve pointed out, I of ALL people can make that distinction, but you CAN’T!’

‘Because you’re calling it an impossibility!’ Jing Wen laughs with disbelief. ‘As if it’s impossible for a dog like you to contain yourself with ANY woman—and you claim respect?! HA! As if anyone could ever believe that you would EVER change—'

‘You don’t know what you’re talking about,’ Ling Wen cuts him off flatly.

‘Don’t I?!’ Jing Wen scoffs. ‘Don’t we all, when it comes to men like him?! You make yourself seem like such a cunning player in this game, but all you had to do was open your legs—!’

‘Pei Ming is keeping quiet on MY behalf, but we have NEVER been lovers.’

‘On YOUR behalf?’ The former civil god laughs again, but finds no mirth in it. ‘If I were you, I’d be insulted by the general saying I’m the only woman in the world he wouldn’t have—a lowly, base, BRUTISH creature like him—!’

‘I have known Pei Ming longer than you—longer than anyone.’ Ling Wen reminds him of that coldly. ‘And I have seen him be a far more loyal, respectful—and compassionate partner than you could ever hope to be.’

Xie Lian finds himself taken aback, hearing Ling Wen—who has never been sentimental—speak of Pei Ming in such a way.

Even General Pei sounds shocked, his voice slightly thick when he replies, ‘Ling Wen, you…’

‘But he’s never been my partner,’ the civil god continues. ‘He never could be.’

‘You expect me to believe—?’

‘Because all my life, I have only been attracted to women.’

There’s a long, shocked silence.

‘You—?!’

‘He doesn’t owe you an explanation to begin with!’ Pei growls—but Ling Wen speaks for himself.

‘And I don’t care what you think about that. I don’t care if you think I slept with people to rise up—because I know the truth.’

Ling Wen’s voice might not be showing or cracking like Jing Wen’s—but he speaks far more firmly, and with conviction.

‘I know that Pei helped me deal with you because he agreed that you, along with Xuli, had become a disgrace.’

The general doesn’t contradict him.

‘I know that I’ve had more women—and pleased them—in my lifetime than you could ever dream of. And I know that even at the HEIGHT of your power, your palace of Jing Wen wouldn’t reach the KNEES of the palace of Ling Wen! So, you tell me—did I really need to work twice as hard?’

Xie Lian covers his mouth with shock, reeling from the force of that statement—but Ling Wen isn’t finished.

‘Or is it just that you have ALWAYS been woefully inadequate, and it KILLED you to know that a WOMAN was more capable than you?’

Jing Wen’s silence is proof enough of the fact that Ling Wen’s words hit home—but he doesn’t leave it there.

‘I bet you thought my seeing you would terrify me with the ‘guilt’ over what I’ve done, but you know what? I’m glad I got to see you like this,’ Ling Wen sneers. ‘Because any doubts I EVER had about my place and whether or not I deserved it disappeared when you reminded me who I replaced—a weak, PATHETIC old man!’

Xie Lian leans back, shaking his head.

“I think we’ve heard enough—San Lang, let’s step in before it goes too far.”

Hua Cheng makes a soft sound under his breath—not necessarily protesting, but not eager to rescue the likes of Ling Wen, either.

(Though Xie Lian isn't exactly sure if Ling Wen is the one they're rescuing.)

"I'll check over here, and you check on the West side."

Of course, Xie Lian can hear Ling Wen clearly through the rock on the back wall of the temple—but sound in mountains can be deceptive, refracting off of uneven surfaces. You might think someone is speaking right next to you, and they're dozens of meters away.

Hua Cheng makes his way to the other side of the temple, a deceptively vast, cavernous space, while Xie Lian feels around against the wall, looking for a weak point in the rock.

His fist pulls back, landing against the granite with a loud—

BOOM!

The rock crumbles beneath his fist—and rather than simply creating a small crater in the wall, it reveals a hollow space beneath, with a gently sloping drop into a separate chamber.

"...Your highness, is that you?!"

Squeezed beside the general, Ling Wen groans.

"He's here?!"

Normally, Xie Lian might feel a little offended by the sentiment—but given their last interaction, he understands.

He drops down into the chamber, expecting to land on a flat floor—but instead, lands on something large and solid, knocking it over with a rattle.

His hip and ribs are definitely bruised from the landing, but he doesn't make a sound, no—

"Would you watch where you're going, you CARELESS SON OF A BITCH?!" Jing Wen screeches, laying on his side on the ground.

Xie Lian sits up quickly, his hair askew.

"I'm sorry!"

He feels around, trying to figure out where the man has fallen in order to help him up.

"I couldn't see where I was going, are you alr—?

He stops, however, when his hand lands against an arm—but one made of stone.

"...Jing Wen Zhen Jun, how did you end up inside a statue?!"

The stone figure rattles underneath him with outrage.

"I didn't have a CHOICE! The bitch used sly tricks and the general's help to wear me down until I was so weak—by the time she came to kill me, there was NOTHING I COULD DO! I had to leap into this statue to hide!"

"..." Xie Lian frowns—not particularly fond of the man's language—but finds that to be one of the least objectionable aspects of the situation.

"Just forget him, your highness—come over here and untie us! Can you follow the sound of my voice?!"

Xie Lian fights the urge to roll his eyes. Pei Ming has seen him operate enough to know that, while Xie Lian is blind, he can still find his way around—but in a situation like his, he supposes it's understandable for the general to forget.

"Yes, I'm coming..."

He makes his way over, reaching out to feel Pei Ming's arm—only to find that he and Ling Wen have been tightly bound together in what feels like scrolls.

Magical, but not particularly strong—Jing Wen must have taken each of them by surprise.

He reaches over his shoulder, unsheathing fangxin, just as Ling Wen peers over him, noticing something.

And when he does, he barks out with laughter, throwing back his head and cackling.

"Oh my GOD, no WONDER YOU'RE SO BITTER!"

"SHUT THE FUCK UP!"

"What?!" Pei Ming strains his neck, trying to see over Xie Lian's shoulder, but he doesn't have the right angle. "What is it?!"

"He's—" Ling Wen wheezes, his face flushed from all of the laughter, "He's trapped in a EUNUCH'S STATUE!"

Xie Lian has barely even started cutting at their bindings, and he can already feel Jing Wen rolling around on the floor, possibly preparing himself to attack the two while they're vulnerable.

"You DARE laugh when this misery is ALL YOUR FAULT?!"

"Now, now..." Xie Lian holds up a hand while the other works at freeing them, using a placating tone. "There are worse things..."

"Like what?!" Jing Wen snaps, utterly infuriated.

"Well—not having one—" Xie Lian starts awkwardly, racking his mind. "It's not so bad!"

"How would you know?!"

"Ah...well, I have one," the prince reasons. "But I never use it, so I may as well not have one, you see?"

And Xie Lian can't say that it's been so bad. The number of occasions he's even felt remotely tempted have been exceedingly rare.

"...Oh really?" Jing Wen glares. "Cut it off, then."

He pauses, his face frozen in an awkward smile. "...What?"

"If it doesn't make a difference to you, then why don't you just CUT IT OFF, HUH?!"

Xie Lian doesn't know whether to laugh or cry.

"Well...um..."

"SEE!" Jing Wen rattles again, this time swaying upright. "You're just PLACATING ME! But my grudge isn't with you, your highness—you know what?! I think I'll cut off MING GUANG'S INSTEAD!"

"WHAT THE FUCK?!" Pei Ming snarls, flailing.

"General, stay still!"

"How can you expect me to stay still, after he said he was gonna—?!"

"I know!" Xie Lian saws at the scrolls a little faster, trying to avoid cutting either one of them. "But even if he did, it would probably grow back, right?"

He's had plenty of limbs regenerate, after all.

"I—?" Pei Ming whips his head around to stare at the prince as their bonds start to loosen, his eyes bugging out of his head. "That doesn't mean I want to experience that to BEGIN WITH—!"

The moment the scrolls grow loose, Ling Wen rolls to his feet, stalking over to Jing Wen.

The statue itself only contains a limited amount of spiritual energy—what he was able to save when he escaped Ling Wen all of those centuries ago—giving him the ability to crawl and rattle across the floor, but not real freedom of movement.

Either way, he doesn't get far.

Ling Wen's boot crushes down on him, pinning between his legs—the place where he's now lacking—glaring down at him with a vicious smirk.

"You really can't stand it, can you?" He tilts his head to the side, his gaze gleaming with contempt. "The idea that I was able to take you down without seduction or 'feminine wiles,' it makes you crazy, doesn't it?"

"..." Jing Wen glares at his former deputy, then at Pei Ming, who is slowly rising to his feet behind them both, rubbing his wrists.

"I suppose the person who deserves the most pity in this situation is Bai Jing, being tricked by a foul, corrupt creature like you! The poor fool probably didn't even realize that you were—!"

Ling Wen interrupts him with a harsh laugh, hands in his pockets.

"You've never seen what Bai Jing does to people who call him a fool, have you?"

"YOU—!"

CRASH!

Ling Wen's boot rises up, then crashes back down in one hard, vicious stomp--breaking the statue hosting Jing Wen's soul into countless pieces.

"...Thank you," Pei Ming mutters, rubbing his ear. "I was starting to get a headache from all of his yelling."

Ling Wen shrugs, staring down at one shard of the statue's face, now limp, his eyes filled with resentment—then kicks it aside.

"If he didn't want to end up like this, he should have worked harder," Ling Wen's tone is wry—even if there's no real amusement in it.

If he has bad karma for his actions—so be it, he's already paying for them.

It won't make a difference.

"...San Lang is somewhere nearby," Xie Lian brushes the dust off of his robes as best as he can, still slightly disheveled from landing on Jing Wen's statue. "We should keep moving if we don't want to—"

He falls silent when Pei Ming suddenly steps in front of him, an arm out.

"Ling Wen," His tone is cautious—warning. "What are you doing?"

The Civil God is silent, arms trembling, his brow knitted with concentration, sweat forming at his temples.

"I...I'm not TRYING to do anything," he spits out between clenched teeth. "I'm..."

His fingers shake, as though he's fighting each movement with all his strength—wrapping around the hilt of his blade.

"...Run..."

"What—?"

He unsheathes the weapon, lashing out with lethal speed—a beautiful strike, one Pei Ming barely dodges.

"I SAID RUN!" Ling Wen snarls.

That's all it takes to send Xie Lian and the General fleeing, the latter pulling Xie Lian by the wrist to make sure the prince doesn't trip over any loose rocks.

"DIDN'T THAT THING JUST HEAR YOU SAY YOU AREN'T ATTRACTED TO MEN?!" Pei shouts back over his shoulder.

"He did!" Ling Wen grimaces, dragging his feet as he stomps forward. "But I think he's in denial?!"

"Oh," Xie Lian turns his head, stumbling along with Pei. "That really doesn't help in the long run, it's better if you just accept—!"

"ARE YOU TRYING TO REASON WITH IT?!"

Well—!"

"I wouldn't try it, your highness!" Ling Wen laments, leaping over a large boulder as he grows closer and closer to them—chasing them through the main temple chamber, down the steps, and into the street below. "He thinks we get along too well! You're a threat, too!"

"...ME?!" Xie Lian cries, shocked. "PLEASE, LEAVE ME OUT OF THIS!"

"Oh, and leave me in it?!" Pei protests, dragging them around the bend in the road, into an abandoned market.

"Well, I'm—Ling Wen may be attracted to women, BUT I'M NOT!" He cries out to Bai Jing.

His attempts to placate the brocade immortal prove ineffective, but it seems to inspire a different question entirely from Pei Ming.

"Well—in that case, Ling Wen is in his male form right now. And you have a female form, your highness. In that scenario..." He ponders.

That makes all three of them stop—Ling Wen touching his chin, Xie Lian rubbing the back of his neck, his other wrist still in Pei Ming's grip, and Pei Ming tilting his head back to think, eyebrows raised.

"I don't know what he looks like," Xie Lian points out hopefully.

"You don't seem like the type to care about looks, your highness." Pei points out, half distracted.

"And my male form is objectively attractive," Ling Wen adds, unhelpful.

"You—you're right," Xie Lian admits, "it's more about emotional compatibility, but that's not—!"

"But in that scenario—Pei, you have a female form."

That admission from Ling Wen makes Xie Lian feel like he could fall over with shock, and Pei Ming shrugs, unbothered.

"Sure—but she isn't your type, is she?"

No—too tall, and retaining too much of his actual personality.

For obvious reasons, Shi Wudu enjoyed that form perfectly well—but it never appealed to Ling Wen. Who prefers shorter, quieter...

"...He's decided that Pei is the greater threat," Ling Wen admits, making the prince sigh with relief while the general cries out in protest.

"But he's still decided to kill both of you," Ling Wen concludes—making them both groan, taking off through the abandoned market stalls, down side streets.

"Couldn't you try a little harder to convince him you like women?! I've seen you with enough of them!"

"I'm TRYING!"

"Does he need details?! What about the time in Yunmeng—!"

"Do NOT bring up Yunmeng!" Ling Wen's ears burn, in spite of it all. "Just—Just GET AWAY and he'll calm down!"

"Don't you think WE'RE trying?!" Pei Ming cries, and Xie Lian interrupts.

"Maybe I should call—!"

Xie Lian takes a step back, and when he does, the heel of his boot catches against something on the ground, the small tug of resistance making his eyes widen.

A trip wire.

"WAIT—!"

"Wh—?!"

WHOOSH!

Before Xie Lian can complete his warning, they're both snatched up.

"HA!" A pair of ghosts poke their heads out from behind a nearby structure, rubbing their hands together eagerly. "We finally caught something!"

The net glows with spiritual power—strong, and tight, forcing Xie Lian and Pei Ming against each other in a close...intimate position

With Xie Lian’s cheek squished against Pei Ming’s chest, their legs intertwined, and the general struggling to keep his hands decisively away from him, struggling against the bonds of the net.

The two spirits who set up the trap snicker, clearly pleased with themselves, until…

They see a man in black staring them down, blade in hand—and their fates are immediately sealed.

“WAIT, WAIT, HAVE MERCY—!”

Ling Wen lunges forward, running one through with his blade, grasping the other by the throat, rapidly absorbing their energy until nothing remains.

Xie Lian is quiet, unsure if he did that to rescue them, or because the brocade immortal is still trying to absorb power from other ghosts, but General Pei is more optimistic.

“GOOD, you’ve gotten control over him—can you help us down?!”

Ling Wen stares up at them, thinking.

“…I could try, but I can’t guarantee that he won’t kill you once I do.”

Xie Lian struggles to lift his head, spitting his own hair out of his mouth, “I really think I should call—!”

“DO NOT!” Pei Ming shouts over him, “Whatever you do, do NOT call Crimson Rain right now!”

“General!” Xie Lian grimaces. “I know you don’t trust San Lang, but he’s really—“

“It’s not that!” Pei Ming shakes his head vehemently, immediately regretting it when the movement brings them closer together. “I know he’ll help you!”

“Then what’s the—?”

“He’ll KILL ME.”

Xie Lian pauses, taken aback. “Why would he do that?”

He can’t deny that Hua Cheng would attack a god, he’s done that before. But he has no ill will towards Pei—so why does the general sound so certain?

“If you don’t know, it’s not my place to tell you,” Pei groans.

Below them, Ling Wen ignites a ghost fire in his palm, gleaming a menacing shade of black.

“I could try shredding the net with this from a distance, so you can run when you get out—but I’ll hit you both in the process.”

Xie Lian and Pei Ming fall silent, thinking it over.

“…Do you know how much damage it’ll do?”

Ling Wen glances down at the fire in his palm with a careless shrug. “I hit Qi Ying with one about this size before—and it left him with a limp, but little more.”

Xie Lian and Pei Ming look at each other.

(Well, Xie Lian looks in Pei’s general direction–but an attempt is made.)

“I could handle that. You?”

“Yes,” the prince agrees immediately, which seems to settle things—until Pei Ming looks down again, seeing that the ghost fire in Ling Wen’s palm has grown exponentially inside, flickering menacingly.

“At this size, though…” Ling Wen shrugs. “I don’t know what it’ll do to you.”

Pei Ming bites back a curse.

“…I’d survive it,” Xie Lian offers, characteristically confident in his durability. “But I don’t think you…”

“…I’m comfortable with dying,” the general mutters, “I just never thought I’d have to choose between such shitty options…”

Hearing him say the words “I’m comfortable with dying”, Xie Lian and Ling Wen both frown, each concerned—

But, as per usual, life doesn’t give the general a choice at all in such matters.

The sky begins to rumble, clouds darkening, and Ling Wen stiffens, looking back.

“…Is that Mount Tonglu?! Is it erupting again?!”

Xie Lian shakes his head, thinking back on what Hua Cheng has told him. “It won’t erupt again until a new supreme emerges!”

“Then what—?”

Something wet lands on Ling Wen’s cheek, slowly dripping down.

His fingertips brush over the substance, curious—

And they come away red.

RIIIIP!

There's a tearing sound as something flashes past them tearing through the net—and while they both come crashing down—

Someone catches Xie Lian.

Strong, broad arms—now familiar.

And in spite of all of the work he's done in the last few weeks to push such feelings down—Xie Lian's heart soars. His fingertips reach up, finding a sharp jawline, and when the ghost king speaks, leaning his cheek into the god's palm—

"I'm back, gege."

It's his voice.

Hanging by a Thread

Chapter Summary

Xie Lian can't hold back his smile, grinning from ear to ear.

"...Welcome back, San Lang."

As he speaks, he notices something landing against his hair—though not wet this time, rather soft and light.

Flower petals.

Brilliant red, falling all around them.

Xie Lian can't hold back his smile, grinning from ear to ear.

"...Welcome back, San Lang."

As he speaks, he notices something landing against his hair—though not wet this time, rather soft and light.

Flower petals.

Brilliant red, falling all around them.

Hua Cheng reaches down, brushing them out of the prince's hair, and Xie Lian catches one in his palm, smiling.

"...I didn't realize you could make it rain flowers," he murmurs.

"I haven't before," Hua Cheng admits. "But I'd never let the rain fall on you, your highness."

Behind them, Ling Wen and Pei Ming are absolutely drenched, but Xie Lian hasn't been stained by a single drop.

It's the first time that this world has seen the sky rain with flowers—but not the last.

And the next time it does—the land they fall upon will never be the same.

Xie Lian finds himself leaning forward, not thinking or even realizing what he wants to do—and then Pei Ming speaks, breaking the small spell of silence between them.

"You couldn't have made it rain flowers on the rest of us, too?" He mutters, wiping the blood out of his eyes.

Hua Cheng barely spares him a second glance, his voice perfectly pleasant—but clearly fake.

"No."

Pei sends him an annoyed look, but soon turns his attention to Ling Wen, passed out on the ground. "Did you hurt him?"

"No," the ghost king shakes his head. “Just put him and the Brocade Immortal to sleep for a little while.”

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow as Hua Cheng helps him to his feet, impressed. “You were able to put them both to sleep—just like that?”

The calamity shrugs. “For some reason, Bai Jing didn’t want to fight me.”

Pei Ming can imagine why, but given his prior concern over being slaughtered by Hua Cheng, he keeps his mouth shut.

“Well,” he kneels down beside his friend, reaching for his armor. “While he’s passed out, we ought to try to get this thing off of him.”

He places his hand against one of the latches—then immediately yanks it back with a curse, deep gashes appearing in his palm, blood pouring down his wrist.

“What the hell—?! This thing bites!”

“It won’t let Ling Wen go,” Hua Cheng explains grimly. “Especially not for you.”

Maybe if a woman was trying, the results would be different—but Pei Ming is a perceived threat.

“…I suppose the best thing we can do is carry him back with us as he is,” Xie Lian mutters. “Do you think the Brocade Immortal will remain docile?”

“While I’m around? Probably.” Hua Cheng agrees, watching as Pei Ming lifts Ling Wen over his shoulders. “But we’ll have to see.”

In any case, he keeps Xie Lian close to his side as they walk back towards the town where they left the others—finding Pei Su mostly recovered.

Thanks to Shuo—who, it seems, was able to salvage a good portion of the chicken that remained, creating something passingly edible.

“General!” Pei Su straightens, seeing Pei Ming covered in blood. “Are you alright?!”

“Yeah…” Pei grunts. “Most of it isn’t mine.”

Not particularly comforting, but Pei Su is used to the like from him.

“If you’re feeling better, come and help me with Lord Ling Wen.”

Pei Su moves to do as he asks, and as everyone readies to leave, Xie Lian leans over to Banyue, murmuring—

“The other two are rather quiet.”

“Ren Song gege and General Tai Hua?” Banyue replies, looking over at the two. “They had some sort of argument while you were gone—but I don’t know what was said.”

Whatever it was—it’s left them pointedly ignoring one another.

“…” Xie Lian sighs.

There are moments when those two remind him of Feng Xin and Mu Qing, but—

Well, even they aren't quite that bad.

As they continue down the road again, they leave the remnants of the abandoned town, taking a left at the fork, instead of the right leading to the market.

This direction leads them back into the wilderness—if it can even be called as much. The hills are barren, with little more than ferns and the trunks of long dead, petrified trees covering the ground.

But, the further they go, they descend into a valley.

One that seems to narrow the further the walk, with the rocky edges climbing higher and higher, blocking out more and more what little rays the sun brings down.

"General," Banyue speaks up quietly—and for once, not to Xie Lian. "Is your hand alright?"

Pei Ming casts a look in her direction, fighting back the urge to snap with irritation. "...It's fine," he replies curtly. "I don't suppose you know any healing spells?"

Banyue hangs her head. "I only know how to—"

"Throw scorpion snakes," Pei Ming concludes flatly. "Right."

Or turn them into poisonous soups, apparently.

"...Don't take it to heart," Pei Su reassures her, tugging Ling Wen along with one arm pulled around his shoulder. "He doesn't have anything against you personally."

Banyue doesn't lift her head, struggling to believe him.

She may have been far removed from the world for centuries, trapped in the desert with the soldiers she cursed—but she isn't ignorant to the consequences Pei Su's actions to save her have had.

That General Pei Ming blames her for that.

Or, at best—he doesn't think she was worth all of that trouble.

And Banyue can't even argue that she disagrees.

Beside them, Ling Wen jerks awake, feet dragging against the ground, cheek pressed against Pei Su's shoulder.

"Why...?" He slurs, eyes half lidded. "Why are there so many people here? Isn't this Mount Tonglu?"

Pei Ming rolls his eyes with an irritated snort. "It sure is. And we're not the only ones here. Apparently the Rain Master is around somewhere—"

To his surprise, Ling Wen stiffens, suddenly lifting his head.

"Is she alright?" He asks sharply, looking Pei in the eye—his own gaze...uncharacteristically worried. "Have you seen her?"

"...No," Pei answers slowly, staring back at him in confusion. "...Have you? What makes you think that she isn't alright?"

Ling Wen looks away, ashamed.

"I hurt her."

Banyue and Pei Su both turn their heads to stare at him, concerned.

"Or—Bai Jing did," Ling Wen mutters, even if that doesn't feel like it makes a difference. "I wanted to make sure she got away from that thing."

"...What thing?"

Ling Wen grows pale, staring straight ahead as they move forward—only offering one somber explanation. Vague—and still.

"The man in white."

It sends a chill down Pei Ming's spine.

Walking ahead of the others, lightly grasping Hua Cheng's hand—Xie Lian looks up.

"San Lang?"

"Yes, gege?"

"So much happened while you were...indisposed," Xie Lian phrases it delicately, remembering how much the ghost king hated being in that form. "There was so much I wanted to ask..."

"Ask away, then." Hua Cheng squeezes his hand. "I'll try to answer."

"...Before, you mentioned that you were in Tonglu for ten years before you exited the Kiln," Xie Lian frowns. "Is that how long this is going to take?"

He hears a soft chuckle in response as Hua Cheng helps him over a dip in the ground.

"No, that was different."

"How?"

"Normally, the opening of Mount Tonglu is precluded by a profane loss of life," Hua Cheng explains softly. "In my case, it was the fall of Xianle, and the plague that came with it. Resentment swarmed the world—and by absorbing that, I became a Ghost King."

Xie Lian grimaces, and part of him can't help but wonder...

Is that why he's always felt a strong sense of connection to the calamity? Familiarity? Because he was born through the same sorrow that Xie Lian lived through?

"It was the same case with Blackwater. He was born following a plague that spread far further than Human Face Disease, and while there was no civil war, the human population was higher by the time of his birth."

Meaning that even just a plague was enough.

"...But there's been no major war since Yong'an and Banyue," Xie Lian frowns. "No plagues, either."

"No," Hua Cheng agrees. "There's less resentment for the Kiln to pass on—so it's unlikely it would take as long for this matter to be dealt with."

"...If there's less resentment, then why did Mount Tonglu open at all?"

To his surprise, Hua Cheng doesn't answer him verbally—instead, speaking into Xie Lian's private communication array.

'I have suspicions, your highness—but I cannot prove them. Not yet.'

'...And you don't want the others to hear?'

Hua Cheng's gaze flickers back toward Pei Ming and Ling Wen—two thirds of a shattered whole.

'I suspect it has something to do with the late Water Master.'

'Shi Wudu?' Xie Lian almost trips in surprise, forgetting to be careful.

'What would it have to do with him?'

'...Remember, back when we landed on the Island in Blackwater's territory, you told me you needed to speak to Shi Wudu. To warn him.'

'Yes...' Xie Lian agrees, grimacing at the memory.

Knowing what a horrible future awaited the water god for switching fates—and feeling so helpless to stop it.

'...He Xuan didn't know the consequences that came with switching fates—but he knew something that he only could have found in the Water Master's memories.'

Hua Cheng doesn't have to say anything further for Xie Lian to remember what he said before—

'...And He Xuan could have seen them if they fought inside the Kiln.' Xie Lian breathes, keeping pace with him instantly. 'But why would he bring him there?'

'I don't know,' Hua Cheng admits. 'But I think that's where the Water Master died.'

Inside the Kiln.

It's an interesting choice of words, too. Not saying that was where Shi Wudu was murdered , but simply that it was the place of his death.

'...And that on its own would have been enough to make Mount Tonglu open?' Xie Lian questions, stunned.

Hua Cheng is quiet for a moment, wrestling with his own theories, none of them quite fully formed, but...

'If someone planned it that way—then maybe.'

But who would plan for that? And why?

“Hey…” Pei calls over to them, looking at their surroundings with a frown. “Is it just me, or is this place getting narrower faster than it should be?”

Hua Cheng glances up, one eyebrow raising.

"...It looks like we've wound up caught between two mountain spirits," He murmurs, not sounding particularly bothered by the development.

"...You mean they're moving?!"

"If that's the case..." Ling Wen winces, turning a little green. "Climbing the sides is the best option."

"You would think," Hua Cheng shakes his head, "But no. You don't want to be climbing around or inside of those things if you can avoid it. Better to go through."

"...Won't we get crushed?" Xie Lian mutters. "I can hear them moving..."

"Don't worry, gege." As uncaring as he sounded, rejecting Ling Wen's plan, he seems perfectly kind now. "I won't let anything crush you."

"...He could have said us ," Ling Wen grumbles. "That would have been a little more comforting."

"He'll probably save the demon, too," Pei offers blithely.

"Besides," Hua Cheng helps Xie Lian continue forward. "There's another temple of Wuyong ahead."

"In the middle of a valley?" Pei Ming glances around, dreading having to go inside another one of those places. "How impractical."

"It probably wasn't a valley a few hours ago..."

Ling Wen's reminder of their possible impending demise doesn't bring him any comfort--and when they step inside the temple, he's met by the familiar feeling of cold dress, the hairs on his arms raising.

This time, the ghost king doesn't even lift a finger—just a simple inhale and exhale of breath, and every torch in the temple flickers to light, illuminating pitch black walls.

Xie Lian traces his fingertips over them, looking, and Banyue steps up behind him.

"General Hua...in the first temple we saw—after you left, the mural disappeared."

"I'm not surprised," Xie Lian replies quietly, tapping for thicker layers of soot, and Banyue's eyes widen.

"You're not?"

"These...were clearly made by magic—for us to find them."

Xie Lian says this like it's perfectly obvious—and Hua Cheng doesn't seem that surprised, but Pei Ming takes a step back from the wall, disturbed.

"And it's intended for someone who presses their hand to a wall when they move through an unfamiliar space."

Like a blind man.

If the person making these murals intended them to be viewed by just anyone—they'd be out in the open. Not covered in ash.

Ash that was only found inside the temple, not on the village outside.

"...And it doesn't freak you out at ALL that someone is running around, leaving creepy murals of Bai Wuxiang's past for YOU specifically to find?" Pei grumbles, rubbing the back of his neck—and then, his ears.

(They're buzzing again—like before, but louder.)

"No," Xie Lian shakes his head, rapping his knuckles against another spot on the wall, nodding to Hua Cheng.

CLANG!

"Haven't you ever wondered why so many killers and monsters in legends are portrayed as wearing masks?" He asks as the ash and soot crumbles away.

"I always assumed it was some sort of metaphor," Ling Wen offers, and Xie Lian shakes his head.

Maybe it turned into one over the centuries.

But for as long as humans have known their own reflections, they have feared men who hide their faces—a pure, raw instinct.

Sometimes a mask is a disguise. It makes you feel safe. Strong.

When Xie Lian wanted to feel control again, he wore a mask.

There's one mask he would embrace fondly now, desperately clinging to the memory of a lost, most devoted believer.

"There's nothing humans have feared longer than strangers."

Learning more about Bai Wuxiang wouldn't make Xie Lian fear him any more than he already does.

The most terrifying thing about the creature was always his anonymity. His complete and utter inhumanity.

And when Hua Cheng stares up at the wall, telling Xie Lian what lies beneath—

Cracks in that mask are slowly beginning to form.

"...It shows two children, your highness," Hua Cheng explains, the images flickering in the firelight. "With the same face."

"Like twins?" Xie Lian questions, his fingertips tracing the image.

Hua Cheng tilts his head to the side, his mouth twisting grimly.

"Maybe."

And as he describes the image further--the tale only becomes more somber.

One boy is always smiling and laughing.

Draped in jewels, shrouded in silks—surrounded by wealth, friends, adoring subjects. Doted upon by his mother and father, guided by his guoshis.

A prince with the world at his fingertips—beloved by all.

And the other...is always crying. Screaming with pain and fear.

Everywhere he goes, he's beaten. Forced to wear rags, and sleep on cold, barren floors. Half starved. Alone. Not a single ounce of kindness was shown to him.

Surveying the imagery, Hua Cheng feels a bitter taste growing on the back of his tongue.

But there's one image that bothers Xie Lian far more, when Hua Cheng describes it to him.

That of the prince shown misbehaving—running through the palace halls, crashing into a statue, toppling it over, and...

The boy in the rags is the one being beaten in the aftermath.

Clearly being punished for what the other one did.

"...Is that a thing with royalty?" Pei Ming comments, eyeing the figures curiously. "I know princes aren't beaten as a form of punishment. Did they have a stand in for you as a child, your highness?"

Xie Lian is almost startled by the suggestion, shaking his head. "...No," he mutters. "I wasn't beaten as a child—but even when I misbehaved, no one else was harmed in my stead, either. I've never heard of a tradition like that."

He can think of one instance—where Feng Xin broke his own arm as punishment for breaking Qi Rong's...but that was more complicated.

He punished himself in that instance to stop Xie Lian from getting into an argument with his father–but that wasn't because of Xie Lian either.

"...But you said Bai Wuxiang was the Prince of Wuyong," Xie Lian mutters, his eyes drifting back to the smiling boy. "Is this supposed to be some kind of metaphor, or...?"

Or, from infancy, someone else was always suffering from Bai Wuxiang's actions.

Maybe he had even been raised to believe that was the way of things.

"San Lang, did you see anything like that in Zhao Beitong's memories?"

"...No," the calamity replies, eyes fixed on the image of that little boy, curled into a ball on the floor.

"She met Bai Wuxiang when he was older...right when he came of age. All of this...it's from when he was younger."

All he knows about the man's childhood is what little he told his wife about it.

He actually said that it was lonely , being the only child in the palace.

That was why they hoped to have more than one child, even if Bai Wuxiang never took any other wives or concubines—because he didn't want their son to grow up without a playmate.

But there was no twin—or any mention of a boy being beaten in his stead.

But there was...

Hua Cheng grows silent, taking a step back from the wall, pressing a hand against his temple.

"San Lang?"

Having seen so many memories over the years, some his, some that of others—things bleed together at a certain point. But...there's one.

Faint, flashing across his mind.

Of sitting up in bed—a marriage bed.

The Crown Princess of Wuyong turning her head—and never finding anyone there, but...

His eyes can't seem to leave the painted face of that boy.

Sleeping on the floor.

'...Darling?' Her voice echoes in his mind—clear, confused—tinged with worry. 'What are you doing down there?'

He's never been able to remember Bai Wuxiang's face outside of the Kiln. Even his voice is distorted.

But his words are clear.

'I...I'm not supposed to be here.'

"San Lang?!" Xie Lian squeezes Hua Cheng's arm, snapping him back to attention. "Are you alright?"

"…I'm sorry, gege," Hua Cheng replies, shaking his head. "I don't know what came over me."

"I—"

Creeeeaaaaak!

Everyone falls silent as the walls around them begin to shudder.

The rumbling—distant, before, has now grown into a roar.

"…IT'S THE MOUNTAINS!" Shuo cries out, watching as the walls crack around them. "THEY'RE CLOSING IN!"

Just as he says this, the ceiling begins to collapse—massive boulders and shards of rock raining down.

But, surprisingly—none of them seem to land on Xie Lian.

After a moment of standing there, braced for an impact that never comes, he realizes–all of the rocks, some big, others the side of a carriage, are landing on something overhead before bouncing away harmlessly.

...Hua Cheng's umbrella.

"See, your highness?" The calamity reminds him pleasantly. "I won't let anything crush you."

"...It'd be nice if the rest of us had the SAME GUARANTEE!" Pei snaps, helping the others hurry forward as the temple collapses in behind them.

Xie Lian twists his head around in their direction, concerned—but Hua Cheng shrugs that off, casually leading him forward as the walls crush in, reducing the entire temple into a long, winding hallway.

"...WE WON'T MAKE IT TO THE OTHER END BEFORE WE GET CRUSHED!"

Pei Ming glares at the path ahead, currently in the middle of blocking the shards of rock falling from the ceiling so Ling Wen, Pei Su, and Banyue don't get crushed as they continue onward.

"...Can we climb out?"

"No," Ling Wen grunts, staring at the ceiling. "The rock would just crumble away—and I'm in no state to attempt it right now."

Pei Ming glances ahead, then behind. Normally, he would be able to do it with Ling Wen on his back. But he's already working with an injured hand. Lang Qianqiu could help with that, but...

With the walls closing in as fast as they are—even with help, they wouldn't have enough time to climb.

"...Damn it," he mutters, taking a deep breath as he summons his spiritual power, throwing both arms out—planting each against one wall.

Holding apart two mountain spirits with his bare hands.

Ling Wen claps his hands together in quiet encouragement. "Oi, what a man Pei!"

"I'll help too!" Pei Su shouts, his gaze determined as he sets Ling Wen down, rushing to his general's side.

He'd be little help as is, with his body reduced to that of a mortal at the moment—but Banyue goes with him, "Me too!

And when her palm presses against Pei Su's back, it glows with spiritual power, giving his body more force as he throws himself between the two walls.

"TAI HUA!" Pei snaps between clenched teeth, the muscles in his arms straining through his robes. "ARE YOU GOING TO HELP, OR NOT?!"

That seems to snap the martial god out of his stupor from before, following his 'fight' with Shuo.

"Coming!"

He moves in beside the others, throwing both arms out—and Pei Ming shouts ahead to Xie Lian.

“We’ll buy you time! You think of a way out of this!”

The prince nods quickly, rubbing his head as he paces beneath the umbrella, thinking.

Up is impossible—behind them is crushed, and they wouldn’t have time to get through ahead.

Which only leaves…

“DOWN!” Xie Lian looks up, clapping his hands together with realization. “THE ONLY THING TO DO IS DIG DOWN AND LET THE MOUNTAIN SPIRITS PASS OVER US!”

“…That does seem like the best course of action,” Ling Wen agrees, breathing hard as he leans against one of the walls. “If your highness can dig down, we’ll jump after you.”

Xie Lian nods, immediately going to work with Fangxin—but Hua Cheng stops him with a hand on his arm.

“Gege—there’s no need for any of that,” The ghost king assures him. “Just wait a moment, all will be well.”

“Maybe for you three!” Lang Qianqiu glares, not missing the way that Shuo has slunk over to stand by Hua Cheng’s side. “BUT THE REST OF US ARE PRETTY CONCERNED!”

Xie Lian frowns, but Hua Cheng simply pats him on the arm again, reassuring. “Don’t worry—they’re being overly dramatic. There’s nothing to be worried about.”

Lang Qianqiu doesn’t know what’s more maddening—the fact that Hua Cheng would say that, or Xie Lian instantly believing it.

“He’s a little late,” Hua Cheng admits, casually holding the umbrella over Xie Lian’s head, in spite of the prince offering to hold it for him. “But I suppose that’s to be expected.”

“…To be expected?!” Lang Qianqiu sputters, stunned. “What the hell does that—?”

CRUNCH!

Hua Cheng guides Xie Lian to take a step back as the floor opens up beneath them, forming an opening about two meters wide, a head popping up.

“Apologies for the delay, sir.”

Hearing the sound of that voice, Xie Lian perks up.

It’s Hua Cheng’s assistant from Paradise Manor!

The ghost officer, wasn’t it—?

But this time, with so many other officials around—

Ling Wen glances over, eyebrows raising with surprise as Hua Cheng helps Xie Lian down into the newly formed hole.

“Lord Yin Yu—thank you for the assistance.”

The dark haired man stiffens, shoulders straightening at the mention of his real name--then slumps.

"...You're welcome," he mutters, moving to help the others down as well.

Xie Lian is shocked, but has the sense to keep his mouth shut, whereas some of them...

"HA! Hua Chengzhu is arrogant enough to take a banished Heavenly Official into his service?! And Lord Yin Yu didn't have enough self respect to turn him down?!"

The pickle jar in Pei Su's arms rattles as Rong Guang cackles with laughter.

"I always heard he was pathetic, but—!"

Pei Su slaps a talisman onto the jar, quickly silencing him—and Yin Yu doesn't show much of a reaction one way or the other, his expression impassive as everyone drops down into the hole, which quickly reseals itself, protecting them from the cave in overhead.

"...How can any of you see like this?" Pei Ming mutters, feeling around on the edges of the tunnel, and Xie Lian can't help but make the wry comment;

"I didn't notice much of a difference."

After a moment of awkward silence, Hua Cheng snorts.

With a flick of his wrist, a few ghost fires appear within the tunnel, lighting the way as Yin Yu begins to lead the way, digging forward—and Ling Wen squints at the tool in his hand.

"...How did you come across the earth master's shovel?"

There's an immediate shift in the air--one that feels almost claustrophobic, with so many of them pressed into a small tunnel.

"...What?" Pei Ming's voice is quiet, like the calm before a possible storm. "He has He Xuan's shovel?"

Xie Lian's hand tightens on Hua Cheng's arm, remembering what he said before—

That He Xuan had spoken to him since Shi Wudu's death, but the way Hua Cheng phrased things, it made it sound like he didn't think...

"I found it lying on the ground," Hua Cheng replies.

Pei Ming stares him down, nails biting into his palm, and Xie Lian clears his throat.

"San Lang just told me he hasn't been able to get in touch with Blackwater, I don't think..."

"I was unconscious when he fled the Heavens," Hua Cheng explains, rescuing him from rambling.

"Dianxia was with me at the time, he can corroborate that."

Pei Ming looks to Xie Lian, who is already nodding in affirmation—even if he's suddenly flushed for some reason.

"The emperor can track heavenly arms wherever they are—I suppose that's why he disposed of the earth master's shovel in ghost city after he fled. I wasn't aware until Yin Yu told me that something had been discarded, and I found it there."

He glances ahead of them, where Yin Yu is still tunneling forward. "I'm glad I held onto it in this situation—it's become rather useful."

Pei Ming glances at Xie Lian, who has made himself an ironclad alibi for Hua Cheng—and he sighs harshly, forcing those emotions down.

It's only for now, anyway.

Because if he makes it out of Mount Tonglu—Blackwater will only be a temporary problem.

Walking at the front of the group, arm in arm with Hua Cheng, Yin Yu working ahead of them—Xie Lian's lips are pursed, deep in thought.

'...Gege?'

Xie Lian bobs his head in acknowledgement, but otherwise shows no signal that the two are speaking in his private array.

'Yes?'

'It seemed like there was something you wanted to ask me before. Gege is always welcome to contact me in my private array, you know—'

'It's fine,' Xie Lian speaks over him, fighting the urge to clear his throat with discomfort. 'With a password like that, you can't be surprised that I don't...'

Unbeknownst to him, that password was set on the far off hope that Xie Lian might use it one day.

Hua Cheng wouldn't complain about hearing him use that phrase in another context, but he isn't quite so hopeful.

'That's alright, I don't mind contacting gege directly. What is it?'

'...Before, when we were dealing with Ke Mo and Rong Guang...' Xie Lian frowns. 'He mentioned something about Shuo coming here because he might...be the next ghost king,' Xie Lian recalls, feeling silly even bringing it up--but he hasn't been able to get the thought. out of his mind. 'Is...that the plan?'

He's more surprised by the fact that Hua Cheng doesn't reply immediately—or deny it.

'...That's his decision, and he hasn't made it yet.'

Xie Lian fights the urge to look back at Shuo's aura behind them, warring with the conflicting feelings in his chest.

'Is that what you want?'

Hua Cheng watches Yin Yu's back, the earth dissolving in front of them like water.

'...I haven't decided either.' He admits. 'Still, it's not my choice.'

That seems to be a common thread with him—ever since they first met.

When they returned from the Crescent Moon Kingdom—and Hua Cheng told Banyue that he didn't teach her magic with any grand expectations in mind.

He simply wanted her to have the freedom and ability to make her own choices.

And mistakes.

Xie Lian's first instinct is to say that it reminds him of Jun Wu—who has always allowed the prince to make his own mistakes.

Sometimes very big, horribly painful mistakes.

But when he asks himself whether or not they're truly the same...

His gut says no.

And that sparks two points of confusion inside of him.

First—that when he tries to ask himself if Jun Wu has allowed him to make his own choices...logically, Xie Lian knows that he has.

But that feels incorrect.

And second—

Comparing the two feels deeply wrong.

But why does it—?

"Hua Chengzhu, your highness," Yin Yu pauses, looking back at the two of them. "I've dug about thirty miles ahead. What do you suggest?"

Hua Cheng doesn't reply—and Xie Lian is quick to clarify;

"You don't need to ask me," the prince reminds him gently.

Yin Yu doesn't answer him, looking to Hua Cheng for proper guidance—seeming overly cautious of the way he addresses the prince—and his employer shrugs.

"I would still defer to your suggestion in this instance. What do you think we should do, gege?"

"...It'll be easier to navigate above ground," Xie Lian reasons. "And we should be away from the two spirits by now. Let's dig to the surface and see where we've ended up."

Hua Cheng nods to Yin Yu in affirmative, and the official immediately leaps into action, tunneling upwards.

Xie Lian can't help but notice that—while his presence is pretty underwhelming compared to most martial gods, he actually has the perfect demeanor for an assistant.

Quick, efficient, speaking just the right amount—it's no wonder Hua Cheng relies on him so much.

But when their group begins climbing out of the tunnel—even Xie Lian can tell something is wrong.

The air—it's too still.

Hua Cheng is peering overhead when Pei Ming crawls out behind them, squinting against the darkness.

"...Did the sun finally go down?"

It would almost be a relief if it had. Ever since he's arrived, the land has been placed under a weird state of eternal twilight--but Hua Cheng shakes his head.

"There's a long night that settles over Tonglu when the Kiln is about to shut—but it's too soon for that."

Lang Qianqiu attempts to step forward—only to stop when he feels a tug against his back, looking over his shoulder to find Shuo gripping the back of his robes.

Not saying a word—they haven't spoken to each other in hours—but not letting him wander, either.

"...Then where the hell are we?" Pei mutters, squinting.

"It would seem we weren't out from underneath the mountain spirit after all," Hua Cheng steps forward, each movement echoing throughout the chamber, endlessly vast. "Now we're inside of it."

"...Should we split up and try to find an exit?" Pei suggests, trying to find some sort of path or landmark in the darkness—but there's nothing.

"No," Xie Lian shakes his head. "Splitting up is the worst idea in situations like this—all that does is divide our strength."

Pei doesn't dispute that, glancing in the direction from which Hua Cheng spoke before. "In that case, why don't you and Crimson Rain lead the way? Since he's been so helpful with lighting the path so far."

Xie Lian winces, expecting Hua Cheng to respond—as he hasn't been particularly keen on Pei Ming's remarks so far—but he doesn't.

Instead, he moves forward—grasping Xie Lian's hand tightly as he does. "Make sure you stay close to me while we're in this place, your highness."

There's an implied sense of danger behind his words—one that Xie Lian supposes he noticed before, insisting on sticking together, but...

For now, their focus should be on getting out of here.

After a few minutes of walking through the dark, ghost fires dimly lighting a shallow circle around them, they eventually find a tunnel leading out of the chamber—narrow and inconsistent, constantly rising and falling.

"...Gege?" Hua Cheng grips his hand tighter as his other grasps Xie Lian's shoulder, steadying him when he stumbles. "Are you alright?"

"...Yes," Xoe Lian agrees, blinking blearily. "I'm sorry—these tunnels are so winding, almost like intestines...I got a little dizzy."

"Do you want to take a break?" The thought of that seems almost like a joke in a situation this dire--but Hua Cheng sounds completely serious.

"I..." Xie Lian trails off, and when he looks back over his shoulder—his blood runs cold.

There's no one left behind them.

No spiritual auras for Xie Lian to spy from beneath his cursed shackles. No breathing from Pei Ming, Pei Su, or Lang Qianqiu. No resentment from Banyue or Ren Song.

No heartbeats.

Nothing.

"...Where did the others go? San Lang, is there something else in here with us?"

"No," Hua Cheng admits, glancing behind them, then ahead. "That makes it all the more worrisome."

Because if there was another spirit in here trapping them or following their movements—then Hua Cheng would be able to sense it.

Now?

All around them—it's pure nothingness.

"…But how could something have snuck up behind us and taken the others without us even noticing?" Xie Lian mutters, truly startled.

Particularly in the dark—where Xie Lian's senses should have been sharper than anyone's.

"I don't know," Hua Cheng admits.

"Should we retrace our steps?"

It's their only option, even if he phrases it like a suggestion—and it leaves Xie Lian even more disoriented than before. Winding back through the same endless dips, curves, and turns.

It slowly leaves him more and more disoriented than before—to the point of Hua Cheng offering to carry him at a certain point, but Xie Lian insists on walking on his own two feet—

Until they reach a dead end.

As winding as their path was—there was only a singular root.

With no fork or branches in the tunnel along the way, retracing their steps should have eventually brought them back to the large chamber they entered through before.

But now…they're left standing before a wall of stone. One Hua Cheng stops him from reaching out to touch.

"…Is it real?" Xie Lian questions cautiously, reluctant to go back the way they just came, but seeing little other options. "Or an illusion?"

"It's real," Hua Cheng mutters, taking a step back. "I think we were expected to walk straight into it."

Just hearing him say that pricks Xie Lian's instincts with alarm—because it makes it sound like a trap

Like something they can't even sense is hunting them.

Trap or not, Xie Lian is still contemplating whether or not he should just punch straight through to the other side.

(Typical martial god behavior.)

"…Gege, let me see your hand."

Xie Lian is a little baffled by the request—given that Hua Cheng never let go of him to begin with—but doesn't protest when the calamity lifts his fingers up, tying something around one of them.

And when the prince pulls his hand back, much to his surprise—

He can actually see it.

A gleaming thread, shining with spiritual power—crimson, just like the aura of its owner—

Connecting one affinity knot wrapped around his finger to another.

Xie Lian stares down at the red string silently, his eyes perfectly wide —

And his heart—

Xie Lian told himself so long ago that he would be kinder to himself. That he wouldn't be so cruel to his own heart.

But god, he hates himself for the way it leaps right now.

Because the string wrapped around his finger feels so familiar .

Begging the question his soul has been asking since Paradise Manor. Since they were standing outside Qi Rong's Lair. Since Mount Yu Jun.

Since he was weeping alone on a mountainside, shivering in the snow.

"…This way we won't lose track of each other," Hua Cheng explains gently, squeezing his fingers.

Xie Lian lowers his head, hair obscuring his expression.

"…Your highness?" The calamity murmurs, reaching out to grasp his chin—only to hesitate, touching his shoulder instead.

But if he had—he might have noticed that his god's lips are trembling.

"…Where did you get this?" Xie Lian whispers, keeping his voice low in a valiant effort to maintain composure.

Hua Cheng stares at the dark curtain of his hair, wishing he could see Xie Lian's expression.

"…I've always had it," Hua Cheng replies carefully. "Ever since the first time I came to Mount Tonglu."

Xie Lian doesn't know why—

But he was almost hoping that Hua Cheng wouldn't be able to answer that.

And for some reason—hearing any answer at all stings.

"…Oh," the god takes a shaky breath, his voice small. "I see."

Hua Cheng bows his head, trying to get at eye level with Xie Lian, who avoids his gaze.

"If dianxia would rather not wear it—"

"No," Xie Lian shakes his head sharply, pulling his hand back.

He keeps his head bowed low for another moment, composing himself before clearing his throat. "No, I'll wear it—is it some sort of spiritual device?"

Hua Cheng hums in agreement. "It won't break, not unless one of us is gone."

"...Gone?" Xie Lian questions, still unsettled.

"Dead or dispersed," Hua Cheng's thumb strokes over the ball of his shoulder, soothing. "Obviously the plan is to stick together—but this way, even if we get separated..."

"You'll come back to me?" Xie Lian's voice is thick with emotion, and...

Hua Cheng stares at him.

"...Always," he agrees quietly, beginning to sound slightly unsteady himself. "Your highness, are you—?"

They both fall silent, turning their heads to stare off into the darkness when they hear sharp, violent thuds in the distance.

"...That has to be a martial god."

The blows are just too forceful to be anything else.

"You think it's Pei or Lang Qianqiu?"

Xie Lian is too familiar with Lang Qianqiu's fighting style to think this could be him—the pattern is all wrong, but...

"It might be General Pei. We should hurry!"

There's little more discussion before they go running off down the path once more, Xie Lian breathing hard and fast through his nose to avoid feeling nauseous as they charge through the winding passageways and tunnels again. But after running for only a few minutes—they stop.

More accurately, Hua Cheng pulls Xie Lian to a stop, sending the martial god stumbling into his chest.

"San Lang—?"

"It's one of Banyue's scorpion snakes," the ghost king leans forward, inspecting the stones before them. "It's sticking out of the wall."

"...What?"

Xie Lian reaches out to touch it for himself—only for Hua Cheng to grasp his wrist, gently pulling him back.

"Your highness—please refrain from reaching for something venomous with your bare hands the moment I tell you it's there."

Xie Lian smiles, sheepish. "Right..."

It's not as though he wouldn't be fine if he ended up getting stung—but when he remembers how bothered San Lang was by it back when they traveled to the Crescent Moon Kingdom...

It seems better to avoid it.

"But what is one of her snakes doing like that...?"

"...I'm not positive," Hua Cheng admits. "But I think I found where the commotion was coming from."

He leads Xie Lian forward, guiding his hand to reach out and feel—only to find that there's a man sticking out of the wall!

His head and arms are dangling uselessly, while his lower half has been completely submerged beneath the rock.

...But how could that be? Xie Lian's hand slips up from his shoulder, brushing against a mane of long, curly hair, and his eyes widen.

"...It's General Qi Ring," he mutters, taking a step back.

How did the martial god end up here?!

"San Lang, I—" He turns around, about to ask the ghost king to help him dig Quan Yizhen out, but...

All of the sudden, he's standing alone.

"...San Lang?!"

At first, there’s no clear thinking.

Just his heart squeezing with panic, fingers fumbling for the chain beneath his robes, caught by a painful, familiar thought;

‘He wouldn’t leave me.’

“San Lang?” He repeats himself a little louder now, looking down and remembering—

The string.

He swallows thickly, clutching trembling fingers, staring at the winding, gleaming red path of light, leading forward.

Xie Lian sucks in a deep breath, his heart pounding.

When he was young, having faith was such an easy thing to do.

It's easy to have hope when you've never lost.

Back then, he viewed faith as a foundation of stone, something to be built upon, brick by brick.

That couldn't be further from the truth.

Sometimes faith is as small and fragile as a single thread.

Xie Lian's lips tremble, fingers wrapping around the string—pulling himself forward through the dark.

Reminding himself that it's still here.

And if that's true—

Then Hua Cheng is still here, too.

That he's unsettled, because the string reminded him of—of—

But it's okay.

He takes slow, steadying breaths, reminding himself of that over and over again.

It's okay.

It's okay.

He's okay—

Thud.

Xie Lian pauses, startled—his palm pressed flat against the wall, where…

The thread leads right up to it, disappearing inside.

And now—Xie Lian finds himself beginning to understand what’s going on here.

First the scorpion snake, then Qi Ying, and now…

That really only leaves one thing to do—and Xie Lian doesn’t hesitate.

Taking a couple of steps back—then charging the wall at full force.

But, rather than slamming into a solid surface—he finds himself sucked in, sinking in slowly at first, head and shoulders first, then the rest of him slowly disappearing beneath the rock.

And at first—it’s suffocating.

Crushing from all sides, dirt in his mouth and nose.

It feels—

It feels like being buried alive.

For a moment, he freezes–arms trapped beneath the earth, breaths quickening as he sputters and coughs.

He—

He can't move.

He can't see. He can't hear anything. He can't—

One eye squints open, stinging as dirt falls into it—but still, he still sees that thread.

San Lang.

His heart is still throbbing, and he can’t catch his breath, but—

Xie Lian scrambles forward, clawing and kicking deeper into the earth—following it.

Even when every instinct is telling him to run, to go back the way he came—he struggles forward. Until he can't tell which way is up or down, left or right, or even how far into the earth he's gone.

Just pulling at that string. Further and further and further, until—

At first, when the pocket of air opens up around his face—all Xie Lian can do is cough, struggling to get dust and dirt out of his mouth and nose, but—

"Dianxia!"

The Cost of Being Extraordinary

Chapter Summary

> ...San Lang, he isn't going to kill him, is he?"
>
> "Probably not," Hua Cheng reasons, his arms still firm around Xie Lian's waist. "But these things can be difficult to predict."
>
> "...He seemed like a gentle soul," the god remarks, surprised that such a side to him exists.
>
> "Gentle?" Hua Cheng questions, raising an eyebrow. "He's patient, I suppose—but just because a man doesn't have a short temper doesn't mean he has no temper at all."
>
> Yin Yu's biggest problem has always been that he is painfully self aware, knowing that he can't win a fight if he desires to start one. A trait that is often practical, but sometimes self sabotaging.
>
> Xie Lian supposes he shouldn't be surprised, given the story of Quan Yizhen and the Brocade Immortal, but...
>
> "Qi Ying seems so attached to him," the prince mutters, baffled. "It's hard to understand how things could have ended up like this..."
>
> "Would gege like to see?"

Chapter Notes

> sorry for an extremely long chapter this time around, this part of the canon tends to move kind of slowly, so I'm trying to move past it quickly so we can get to more original content!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

A choked sound of relief escapes him as he throws his arms around Hua Cheng, holding him tightly.

"San Lang—I found you!" He cries, pressing his face into the ghost king's chest. If he were a mortal man, his ribs would certainly have been crushed by now—but instead, he simply holds Xie Lian just as tightly, his face pressed against the prince's hair.

"And I found you!"

Xie Lian can't speak for a moment—not wanting to reveal how distressed he truly is.

(Even if that might be useless, Hua Cheng can almost certainly tell.)

"...Is the mountain swallowing people?" He rasps, his throat somewhat. raw. "How do we get out of this?"

There's a small pocket of air around their heads and upper bodies, created by Hua Cheng exerting spiritual power—but their legs are still submerged, pinned in the earth.

"...Looks like we resurfaced in a bad place," Hua Cheng explains quietly, rubbing Xie Lian's back as he coughs up more dirt. "We ended up digging into the stomach of the mountain spirit—and it's a bit angry at the moment."

Xie Lian, exhausted from the events of the day, has little other option than to lean his head against the ghost king's chest.

"Are the others alright?"

"They are," Hua Cheng reassures him. "The Mountain Spirit is more likely to spit us out before there's any harm done."

Hearing that is enough of a relief, even if it's slightly cramped at the moment—almost like being buried together, which is absolutely an improvement over prior experience, but...

"...Qi Ying is here," Xie Lian recalls. "He was half swallowed, but I..."

Xie Lian pauses, sheepish when he almost admits that he panicked the moment he noticed Hua Cheng had disappeared, leaving him.

"You mean the curly haired one?" Hua Cheng recalls. "He's alright. I can see him."

"...You can?" Xie Lian looks up, shocked.

"Through my right eye," Hua Cheng nods, and Xie Lian is momentarily baffled, not wanting to be rude, but—

Hua Cheng doesn't exactly have a right eye.

His questions are soon answered, however, when the ghost king leans down, pressing their foreheads together.

Xie Lian stiffens, startled that, after all this time, he's having images sent directly into his mind—circumventing the cursed shackle.

"...Is that really what Qi Ying looks like?" He mutters, startled.

"I suppose so," Hua Cheng agrees airily.

"My right eye can see anything the wraith butterflies or E'Ming see—and I've had one tailing him since he left Puqi Shrine."

Xie Lian supposes he shouldn't have assumed what Qi Ying looked like, he never touched his face—but he imagined someone...

He’s well aware of the fact that Quan Yizhen is nearly two centuries old—but Xie Lian thought he would look younger.

If only because of the almost childishly direct manner with which the martial god conducted himself.

But he’s nothing like that.

He's tall and broad, Xie Lian felt that much before—and from Shi Qingxuan's reaction when they accidentally stumbled into his bedroom escaping the heavens, he could have guessed, but—

It's his face that makes Xie Lian pause and take notice.

Maybe because it's been centuries since he saw a new face. The last time he could see, it was through Shi Qingxuan's eyes, and he saw...

A monster.

Instead, Quan Yizhen's face is sharp. Square jawed. The only thing to soften his features is a spray of freckles across his nose.

"...Isn't he in more danger if he's unconscious?" Xie Lian whispers, concerned. "He won't be able to fight back against the mountain spirit at all..."

"That might not be an issue," Hua Cheng murmurs.

The key word being might.

"Someone is coming."

Xie Lian perks up. "Who—?"

He falls silent when he sees someone moving down the hall, popping out of a hole in the floor, crawling out as silent as can be, then creeping over to where the martial god is dangling.

A tall, slender figure—wearing robes of black and purple, a white, horned mask on his face.

It's only when he creeps closer that Xie Lian notices the shovel in his hand—black as jade, tipped with gold. New to his eyes, but the power emanating from it is blatant enough.

"...Is that Yin Yu?" he whispers.

"The very same."

Just then, Quan Yizhen begins to stir.

And it's when his lids open, revealing round, earnest hazel eyes, that his visage begins to match his personality.

"...You," he speaks to Yin Yu directly, clearly not knowing who he is beneath the mask, "Can you let me down, now?"

He asks so...casually.

As though he's experiencing only a minor setback, and Yin Yu would be doing him a small favor by being so kind.

"I'd like to get down."

It's hard to know exactly what the look on Yin Yu's face is with the mask on, but...

Xie Lian bites his lip.

There's anger there.

Simmering just beneath the surface—and the one provoking it is painfully oblivious.

"...San Lang, he isn't going to kill him, is he?"

"Probably not," Hua Cheng reasons, his arms still firm around Xie Lian's waist. "But these things can be difficult to predict."

"...He seemed like a gentle soul," the god remarks, surprised that such a side to him exists.

"Gentle?" Hua Cheng questions, raising an eyebrow. "He's patient, I suppose—but just because a man doesn't have a short temper doesn't mean he has no temper at all."

Yin Yu's biggest problem has always been that he is painfully self aware, knowing that he can't win a fight if he desires to start one. A trait that is often practical, but sometimes self sabotaging.

Xie Lian supposes he shouldn't be surprised, given the story of Quan Yizhen and the Brocade Immortal, but...

"Qi Ying seems so attached to him," the prince mutters, baffled. "It's hard to understand how things could have ended up like this..."

"Would gege like to see?"

When Xie Lian nods, the image changes—to that of a bustling city street. For most, recognizing a time and place isn't so easy.

But for Xie Lian, who has known what clothes were worn where, and when for the last eight centuries—it's easy.

Yong'an, nearly two centuries ago.

"…Were you here for this?" Xie Lian questions, eyes struggling to take in all of the stimuli in the city street.

It's not exactly like seeing, more like dreaming. And yet, it's more than he's had in so long.

"No, no," Hua Cheng shakes his head.

"I'm careful about doing background checks on anyone I hire. This is fairly standard."

Xie Lian can't say if examining someone's memories in detail is standard, but—

"SHIXIONG!"

Cries of panic permeate the air, along with a loud commotion, almost like a stampede.

"HELP!"

A dark haired youth rushes town the steps of a nearby temple, hair slipping out of its braid in his hurry.

“What’s going on—?!” He questions, craning his neck until he catches sight of a chaotic scuffle down the street.

“It’s that FREAK!”

“He BIT ME!”

“…” The moment he hears that, understanding settles over the cultivator’s features, and he sighs in quiet exasperation. “Stand aside, stand aside, let me through…”

He has to push and elbow his way through the crowd to reach the brawl, pulling younger disciples out of it.

When the last is tugged away by the scruff of the neck, he sees the little boy at the center of the chaos.

Barely more than twelve years old. A mess of dark hair and angry, wild eyes. Covered in dirt and sporting a bloody nose—but otherwise no worse for wear.

“Someone should put a MUZZLE on him!” One of the younger disciples from the local sect cries, clutching a bleeding bite mark on his arm, but Yin Yu pays him no mind—not yet.

“Who started it?”

When he asks that question—nobody seems to want to answer.

"...He threw the first punch!" One of the disciples suddenly blurts out, pointing at the child on the street. "He's crazy!"

"...Quan Yizhen?" Yi Yu prompts the boy gently.

Everyone in town is...aware of him. Not even a teenager, and viewed as a public nuisance.

He was left in the local orphanage by a wealthy couple passing through when he was five years old--stayed there for another five years, only to be put out on the streets when he became too difficult to handle.

He's been there—mixed up in trouble—ever since.

"...They were laughing at me," the boy mumbles, irritably wiping the blood from his nose with the hem of his sleeve.

Yin Yu kneels down to look him in the eye, looking between him, and the boys from the temple."What for?"

Quan Yizhen doesn't answer, and the others are forced to

"...He was eating out of the trash, Shixiong..."

Xie Lian watches the child more closely now—how the rags he wears hang off of his body, and his heart aches with sympathy.

"...And instead of offering him help, you laughed?" Yin Yu asks them quietly, emanating disappointment.

The senior disciple shakes his head. "That is not how our master has taught us to treat those in need."

"In need?" One of the boys sneers. "He nearly took a bite out of me!"

Behind him, Quan Yizhen's expression contorts—like he might spring up and fight again, but...

"If saints were the only ones who were worthy of charity, we would help very few of those who are actually in need," Yin Yu scolds them —his tone gentle, but his words firm.

Xie Lian finds himself nodding fervently with approval.

Yin Yu is not, by any measure, a particularly remarkable looking young man. Appealing in a very general way, but not memorable.

Long, dark hair—pulled into a high, neat ponytail, each strand perfectly straight. Unblemished skin other than one beauty mark on his cheekbone.

But he has kind eyes—warm and bright, despite being a simple shade of clear gray.

And when Quan Yizhen looks at him, he seems to find the senior disciple anything but unremarkable.

The boys are quickly ushered away, heads hanging in shame—but Yin Yu lingers behind.

Quan Yizhen is sitting cross legged, his head hanging low—clearly expecting to be scolded just like all the others—

But that moment never comes.

"Are you still hungry?"

The boy stiffens—sneaking a nervous glance through his bangs—

And Yin Yu doesn't seem angry at all.

Finally Quan Yizhen looks up at him, nodding earnestly—and Yin Yu smiles, offering him a hand.

"Come with me."

Xie Lian watches as he leads the boy back to his temple—past all of the judgmental stares and sneers, sitting him down on the back steps with a bowl of noodles.

He eats quickly, not even stopping to take a breath as he practically inhales the meal down his throat—and ignores the chopsticks offered, using his hands instead.

Yin Yu leans his chin on his hand, mildly vexed as he watches the child devour his first proper meal in days.

"...Quan Yizhen?"

The boy looks up at him immediately, chewing silently.

"Next time you can't find a meal—don't go digging through the trash," Yin Yu murmurs, reaching out to wipe a smear of sauce from the boy's chin with a cloth. "Come and wait here, I'll always feed you."

And in that moment—Xie Lian watches the boy come to watch Yin Yu with more than just gratitude.

It's the same look that his own worshippers used to give him, centuries ago. Back when he was considered to be powerful, beautiful—nearly the highest among all of the gods.

Sheer adoration.

And, in the most painful sense—Yin Yu never seems to notice it.

The boy returns. Not when he can no longer stand the hunger—but almost immediately the next morning, and every day after. Sometimes more than once a day.

Yin Yu never complains—always brings him a hot meal, sitting on the temple steps with the boy as he eats.

And the fighting lessens, even if it doesn't stop entirely.

After all, there are still some days where the other disciples find him waiting there first.

And every time, Yin Yu doesn't find himself protecting the child, no—it's usually the disciples, most of them larger and several years older.

"You nearly broke Ye Min's arm..." The teenager muses at one point, holding a cold cloth to Quan Yizhen's eye to stop the swelling.

The boy doesn't apologize—he almost never does, not unless Yin Yu asks him to explicitly. Simply shrugs, leaning into the touch. Not out of relief—more like a dog, eager to be patted on the head.

"I held back."

Yin Yu should scold him.

Any responsible elder in this situation would insist that violence is wrong, and Quan Yizhen should avoid fighting.

...So, why is he biting back a smile?

"Quan Yizhen?"

"...Yeah?"

Yin Yu leans his chin on his hand, turning to look at him.

"Why do you fight so much?"

He has many of his own guesses as to why.

Because the other children are cruel. Because he's lonely. Because being abandoned would leave any child angry. Because—

"I like it."

Yin Yu pauses, sending him a wide eyed stare. "...What?"

"I like fighting," the boy replies simply.

Finally, the cracks in Yin Yu's composure start to slip through—and a small laugh escapes him.

"You do?"

Normally the boy treats laughter as an attack—but now, he just stares up at Yin Yu with wide eyes, nodding earnestly.

"I can't imagine that!"

"Why would I do it all the time if I didn't like it?" Quan Yizhen tilts his head to the side, and Yin Yu pauses, thinking.

"I guess I always assumed you had a temper."

The boy shakes his head firmly, licking the remaining sauce off of his empty bowl.

"I'm not an angry person."

It sounds almost ridiculous, coming from the mouth of someone who will grow into a martial god infamous for beating his own worshippers—

But Xie Lian can see it.

Quan Yizhen isn't a spiteful, angry, or bitter person—he's just painfully direct, and addresses conflict as such.

But his emotions don't weigh him down, either.

And from the look on Yin Yu's face—he seems almost jealous of that.

Painfully self aware, a natural born worrier, all too grounded compared to a child born to be larger than life.

"…I hate fighting," he admits quietly.

Quan Yizhen sits up a little straighter, just as surprised by that admission as Yin Yu was by his own.

"…But aren't you the best in your temple?"

The teenager's smile doesn't quite reach his eyes.

"There's more to cultivation than fighting, you know."

Quan Yizhen seems genuinely shocked by this information, pausing to think it over–and Yin Yu can't help but smile.

He's not accustomed to having someone listen to every word he says so intently.

"...Would you like to learn?"

The boy looks up quickly, curls bouncing.

"About how to fight?" He asks breathlessly, his eyes round with excitement.

"..." Yin Yu's lips quirk at the corners as he reaches out, flattening Quan Yizhen's curls with his palm. "About cultivation as a whole...which includes fighting."

"Will you teach me?"

"Huh?" The teenager stiffens, shaking his head. "Oh, no—I'm too young to teach anyone." Seeing the disappointment on the child's face, though, he tacks on—

"But...I'll be your shixiong, and I'll always be there to help you along the way."

Watching the two together—Xie Lian frowns with dismay.

"...San Lang, Yin Yu seems like such a genuine, kind person—and he clearly cares for Quan Yizhen."

"Yes," Hua Cheng agrees. "Both of those things were true."

"But then..." Xie Lian swallows hard.

"How did things turn out so badly?"

"That..." Hua Cheng sighs, "It's easier if I show you, your highness."

From then on, Xie Lian sees flashes—of training, childhood, and strife.

He sees Quan Yizhen in the sparring ring day in and day out, working until his hands bleed.

He sees Yin Yu traveling from a wealthy home to the temple each and every day—but not a happy one.

An absent father and a bitter mother. The youngest of a long line of sons. Each successful in their own right. A merchant here, a doctor there.

An army officer. A famed poet.

And then, the fifth and last of them, was Yin Yu.

Being the senior disciple in a temple was an honor for most families. Something most parents would fawn and brag over.

But in his, by comparison to his brothers...he was completely unremarkable.

When he succeeded, it was expected. Actually—it was the least he could do, avoiding being a disappointment to such a prestigious family.

By contrast—when Quan Yizhen thrived in any way, big or small, it was regarded as nothing less than a miracle.

That he, an orphan living on the streets, could join a prestigious temple—that was nothing short of impressive.

(Yin Yu offering him a place was merely noticing talent.)

And when the boy showed natural potential—he was called a genius in the realm of martial arts.

But when Yin Yu succeeded—on any level—it wasn't that he didn't receive praise, but...

People would always use him as an example of what you could accomplish with hard work and humility. Always an addendum.

But his achievements were never treated as exceptional.

But Xie Lian doesn't see bitterness in Yin Yu's eyes. Perhaps frustration and insecurity—but never aimed in his shidi's direction.

The same could not be said, however, for the other disciples who called their temple home.

"Shixiong! You have to DO something about him!"

Yin Yu, now looking several years older—more of a young man than a teenager—sets his book down with a sigh.

"What has he done to offend you now?"

He says this as if it's one complaint—but from the group of disciples surrounding him, it's clearly more than that.

"He eats like an ANIMAL! He knocks rice everywhere, and he eats three times as much as anyone else! How are we supposed to feed anyone else?!"

Before Yin Yu can even respond to that, another disciple cries out in dismay.

"And does he have to be so damn scary all the time?!"

A few of the other young men echo him in agreement.

"He always glares at me like he's about to break my ribs!"

"And he's the WORST to have on missions—master favors him too much! He's not even close to a senior member of the sect, why should he be given so many opportunities?"

"I'd rather go on patrol with ANYONE but him shixiong, really! I can't take him anymore!"

Yin Yu listens to all of their complaints, massaging his temples in a vain attempt to alleviate the stress from so many people talking at once.

"Alright, alright, I've heard you."

He glances around, taking in the angry looks on their faces. "I'll investigate each complaint, and if there's anything that breaks the sect rules, I'll take it to the master."

"...Shixiong..." One of the disciples standing towards the back speaks up, his arms crossed.

Yin Yu looks over at him, paying more attention to his words than he would the others. "Yes, Jian Yu?"

This disciple is near him in age—good looking, tall and broad, but all of it wasted by the near permanent scowl on his face.

"The sect leader won't listen to anyone but you."

No one else says it, but it's clear that there's silent agreement among them. "If you don't say you think the kid is a problem—he won't do anything about it. How long are we supposed to deal with that?"

"..." Yin Yu hangs his head with a sigh, snapping his book shut.

"I don't agree with any of you."

That comment doesn't go over particularly well, stunned silence left in its wake, and the senior disciple sets his book aside.

"I'm going to say something that none of you are going to like," he mutters, bracing himself.

"If you aren't getting the opportunities you want, or if you feel sidelined—that isn't because Quan Yizhen has taken them from you. It's because you weren't good enough. It's that simple."

His words are delivered in a gentle tone, however harsh they might sound.

"...You're being passed over as well," one of the disciples mutters angrily. "Does that mean you're not good enough?!"

"Yes." Yin Yu replies instantly, looking him in the eye. "But I'd rather keep my dignity and work hard to earn my place, not push someone out of my way."

Few of them seem to know what to say to that, and Yin Yu rises to his feet. "Now—if the rest of you are finished, it's late. I'm going to do my meditations, then go to sleep. I suggest the rest of you do the same."

There's a collective groan of protest—but most of them listen.

Even Jian Yu, who lingers to make one statement;

“…Shixiong—I’ve only ever tried to be a friend to you, but…” He shakes his head, staring at Yin Yu wearily. “If you’re not careful, then that boy will only bring you misery.”

Even then, when they had no clue what was to come next—his words carry an oddly prophetic ring.

Yin Yu sags when the door closes behind them, head in his hands.

“…San Lang, your assistant really does have an impressive personality,” Xie Lian murmurs.

Hua Cheng doesn't reply immediately, simply watches the scene as it unfolds.

The chambers for the sect's senior disciple are on a split level—the lower half for studying and meditation, and the upper side for living and sleeping.

When Yin Yu ascends the steps to close the window and prepare for bed—he nearly stumbles backwards, clutching his chest with shock.

"Quan Yizhen, I—!" He hunches over, his heart pounding. "How long have you been sitting there?"

The boy doesn't respond, staring at the horizon.

Yin Yu straightens up with a sigh, reaching out to pull on his arm—but the younger man doesn't move or respond.

"...If you're going to stay here, could you let me shut the window? I'm getting ready for bed."

After a moment, Yin Yu responds—but not to what he asked.

"...Shixiong, am I annoying?"

Yin Yu pauses, his hand halfway extended towards him, unsure of how to respond.

"You're...um..." His eyes slip to the side, and Xie Lian can see him struggling, teetering between being honest, and being kind.

"You're...not so bad."

It's not exactly glowing praise—clearly, he just wanted to give an answer that wasn't hurtful.

And yet, Quan Yizhen takes him at face value.

"...But everyone else thinks I'm annoying."

"..." Yin Yu reaches behind him, stroking Quan Yizhen's curls. "Does that matter?"

"...I only care if Shixiong likes me," he mutters, reaching back to catch Yin Yu's hand at the wrist.

It's funny—he still looks so young in comparison, blessed with a handsome face, with no lines of worry—

But his grip on the senior's disciple wrist may as well be iron.

Ironically enough, in this case—Xie Lian sees what the young man means almost instantly.

That the word 'like' was used with utmost seriousness. To be taken a certain way.

And he watches with faint embarrassment and discomfort as the meaning is not understood.

"...Of course I like you," Yin Yu assures him, patting the back of his head. "I've always liked you."

He wouldn't have given him a place here if he hadn't.

Even if liking Quan Yizhen is hard sometimes.

The younger disciple looks back at him suddenly, eyes impossibly wide.

"I like Shixiong too," Quan Yizhen tells him breathlessly, still holding onto Yin Yu's wrist. "I like Shixiong better than anyone."

(Xie Lian groans, pressing his face into Hua Cheng's chest, unable to watch.)

Yin Yu laughs softly, ruffling his hair one more time.

"You don't like anyone else at all, Quan Yizhen. There isn't much competition." He tugs at his wrist gently. "Could you let go now? You're squeezing too hard—it hurts."

Xie Lian has never witnessed the man react so instantly and without question, dropping Yin Yu's wrist.

His shixiong reaches behind him, pulling the window shut. "Are you going to sleep here again? I hear your bunkmates are a bit upset with you."

Quan Yizhen doesn't even deny it, nodding shamelessly—and Yin Yu sighs, walking towards his bedroom.

"Let me change and wash up first—don't walk in like last time, okay? You nearly gave me a heart attack."

Quan Yizhen frowns, dropping down with a heavy thud to sit at the bottom of the stairs, waiting. "It's not like I haven't used the baths with Shixiong before..."

"The public baths," Yin Yu corrects him, pulling the curtain shut, the tub he filled earlier finally warm enough to use.

"And the private one."

"That was when you were a kid," the dark haired man huffs a laugh, pulling his hair up.

"Why is it different now?"

"Because," there's splashing sounds as he climbs into the tub, presumably naked, "two adults shouldn't be in a private bath together. Not unless they're married."

"..." Quan Yizhen scowls, pulling his knees against his chest, wrapping his arms around them as he waits.

There's a chance that, if Yin Yu had heard what he said then, he might have interpreted everything that came afterward differently.

"Later, then." Quan Yizhen mutters under his breath, his eyes staring determinedly at the curtain.

But...he didn't.

"...I'm guessing this means the problems between them started after their ascensions?" Xie Lina mutters, half mortified—and Hua Cheng nods, pushing the scene forward with a flick of his wrist.

And the moment the light shines down around them, Xie Lian knows where they are.

The Heavens.

Perhaps not in the grandest palace that he's ever seen in the heavenly capitol, but well made. With large windows facing a forest to the back, and smooth marble walls in the front.

"Ah," Xie Lian whips around at the sound of a familiar voice;

“So, this is the new palace of Yin Yu? I like it! Not…too overstated!”

A bright faced young man beams, one with long, chestnut waves of hair, gleaming like silk under the light—and warm, vividly green eyes.

“You think so, Lord Windmaster?” Yin Yu asks, hopeful.

Xie Lian couldn’t tell you why, but…

It makes him happy to know that the Shi Qingxuan has always had a kind face—and the prince suspects that carries over to whatever form the Wind Master takes.

It suits him, the way warmth can just be a second skin.

“I do!” Shi Qingxuan beams. “Very tasteful, really—some of the martial palaces are so gaudy, but this is just right!”

“I hear your own palace is rather extravagant,” a nearby civil god comments dryly, dressed in black.

“Well,” The Windmaster frowns, tapping his fan.

"It would be strange if the palace of Ling Wen didn't have any books, wouldn't it? So, of course my brother's palace is opulent, he's the god of wealth! Besides," he looks back to Yin Yu, smiling kindly. "New money is gaudy, old money is elegant. Elegance has its own charm!"

Yin Yu smiles at the Wind Master gratefully, and the civil god rolls his eyes, irritated.

"...Why does he seem familiar?" Xie Lian mutters, tilting his head.

"Oh," Hua Cheng is remarkably blasé about the matter, "that's because he's Blackwater."

"...He is?!" Xie Lian gasps. "But I don't understand..."

His first instinct is to blame the fact that he's so unaccustomed to taking in visual information, but—

"...He posed as more than just the earth master?"

"His true form was always disguised as Ming Yi," Hua Cheng explains.

"But he had around fifty clones embedded into the Heavenly Court by the time his cover was revealed."

...Fifty?!

"He can control that many clones at once?" Xie Lian marvels, silently awed by the level of compartmentalization, skill, and focus that must take.

"Ghost Kings really are amazing..."

Even at the peak of his power, Xie Lian never attempted controlling more than three clones at once.

"I've always been the best at changing my shape," Hua Cheng shrugs, only willing to give He Xuan a compliment if he gives himself one first.

"But Blackwater is the expert when it comes to clone manipulation."

Among other things, it seems.

"...Does he still have clones in the Heavens, you think?"

"Oh, I'm sure," Hua Cheng murmurs. "And I'm also sure that Jun Wu is going gray trying to weed them out."

He sounds a little too gleeful about that prospect—but Xie Lian is too distracted to ask him anything more about it, watching as Shi Qingxuan whispers with a minor forest god, hiding their faces behind his fan.

"Where are the others?"

"How should I know?" The older god whispers back. "Where's your brother?"

"Busy with the emperor," Shi Qingxuan's eyes flicker back towards Yin Yu, trying to act casual. "Ming Guang couldn't have made an appearance?"

"He's in the mortal realm on a mission!"

"He couldn't have made time?" Shi Qingxuan grumbles, annoyed.

Xie Lian is fairly sure that Pei Ming could be lying in the street, bleeding from the head, and Shi Qingxuan would say the same thing. The forest god seems to think the same, but has the sense not to say so.

"What about Xuan Zhen and Nan Yang?"

"It's better that they're not here," the Wind Master shakes his head. "They always make a scene."

(Xie Lian can't disagree with him there.)

"Still...I invited plenty of deputy gods to make an appearance with me..."

Shi Qingxuan cranes his neck, looking around. "You don't think they stood me up, do you? That's never happened to me before..."

Xie Lian thinks it was kind of the Wind Master to attempt to stir up interest in the opening of a new martial palace to begin with, but...

Given the reason that Hua Cheng is showing Xie Lian these memories, he has a fairly good guess as to why no one else is here.

"...Oi, is this the new martial palace?!" Voices cry from outside.

"What's the new guy's name? Yin...Su? No. Zu. No—Yin Wu?!"

"He's only been a god for a month--how did you forget his name already?!"

"I don't know! It's just kind of generic!"

Jian Yu, a newly appointed deputy, steps toward the door, veins popping in his forehead as he shakes his fist. "It's LORD YIN YU TO YOU, YOU IDIOTS!"

The group of middle court officials storm in now, knowing who they're looking for (by name, anyway.)

"...Oh!" Shi Qingxuan brightens, beginning to wave his fan. "You ca—..." He pauses, taking in the angry looks on their faces. "...came..."

"We were about to come, Lord Wind Master—and then we got attacked by someone from this very palace!" One of them declares angrily. "Is that how Lord Yin Yu intends to start his tenure in the heavens?! By having his deputies fight people in the streets?!"

Jian Yu steps forward, clearly incensed. "Now, you listen here—!"

Yin Yu puts one hand on his chest, stopping him, while his face drops into the other with a sigh.

"...If any harm was done to your property or persons, I'll be happy to reimburse you all," he mumbles, tired.

He doesn't even ask what happened, or who did it—it's a very familiar song and dance at this point—and he's used to playing along.

"...You're not going to punish him?!" Jian Yu rages at him later, once the others have left. "Shixiong—he ruined the palace opening!"

"...If I was going to punish him, it would be to make myself feel better, or to teach him something," Yin Yu mumbles, rubbing his hands against his temples. "Neither of those things are going to happen, so why bother?"

"You're just as bad as our master was!" Jian Yu snaps.

"Both of you always act like he can't be blamed for anything because he's ignorant to how the real world works! But can't he learn?! Isn't it our fault if we don't make him?!"

Yin Yu stares up at him with a helpless shrug.

"I've tried, Jian Yu. Some people are just..."

"What?!" Jian Yu throws his arms up. "Too stupid to learn?!"

Yin Yu's eyes flash with a rare hint of anger. "He's not stupid—don't say that just because you're angry with him."

"How are you DEFENDING him now?!"

"I'm not defending him—but why resort to insults?"

No matter how much they go back and forth, the reality is still the same. That Jian Yu desperately wants Quan Yizhen to face some sort of punishment—and Yin Yu outright refuses to engage in it.

It ends with Jian Yu storming off, leaving Yin Yu alone in his new palace, until…

"Gods!" Yin Yu stumbles to the side, clutching his chest once again when he steps into his bedroom, startled by the sight of Quan Yizhen sitting on top of his desk. "You really need to start announcing yourself..."

"It wasn't my fault."

Yin Yu stiffens, but doesn't reply.

Instead he turns around, working to straighten a set of knick knacks on top of a nearby dresser that clearly doesn't need any adjustment, just looking for something to distract himself with.

"I never said that it was."

"They were the ones who picked a fight with me."

"...What did they say?"

"They kept on asking me to bow to them, like I owed them something." Quan Yizhen wrinkles his nose. "But they were all just middle court officials. They don't matter."

No, but older deputy gods enjoy asserting seniority over new appointments.

"Was that all they asked?"

"No—they wanted me to call them certain titles, and apologize for getting in their way. I was just walking down the street like anyone else." Quan Yizhen shakes his head. "I wasn't going to do that."

"...But did you have to fight them over it?"

Yin Yu can't help but remember Jian Yu's words—how exasperated he seemed. "Could you not have simply told them no and walked away?"

"I tried," Quan Yizhen frowns, picking at his sleeve. "But they wouldn't let me leave. That was when I fought them."

When he says it like that--Yin Yu knows it was their fault, not Quan Yizhen's.

He knows that, but the flicker of frustration in his stomach remains.

Because would it have really been so horrible to do as they asked? To just suck up his pride and bow, saying a few nice words?

Yin Yu doesn't see how it could be so difficult—but his refusal to do so had real consequences for others.

Isn't that...selfish?

"...I wouldn't ruin today on purpose," Quan Yizhen mumbles, fingers tightening in his sleeve.

Almost self awareness, but—

"It was their fault."

Yin Yu sighs, fighting the urge to place his face in his hands with frustration.

"…I know," he agrees. "I know you would never do it on purpose."

(That's not the same, however, as saying he doesn't blame him.)

Quan Yizhen misses that distinction.

"…I have something for you," he mumbles, patting around in his pockets.

Yin Yu blinks, watching him I. Confusion. "…For me?"

"You're supposed to give people things when you want to congratulate them," Quan Yizhen speaks plainly, and Yin Yu's heart sinks.

It's a gift for his ascension, clearly.

"You didn't have to…"

Even if his resentment might be understandable, it doesn't feel right to accept it.

"Yes, I do."

And for all his insistence, it leaves Yin Yu with no idea what to expect, but…

He wasn't expecting his shidi to pull out a single Pearl, dropping it into his palm.

"…Oh," Yin Yu mumbles, staring down at it in surprise. "A Pearl?"

Quan Yizhen nods with utmost seriousness. He could have gotten a spiritual device, or a new sword—but this is better anyway.

"…Thank you, it's very pretty—"

"It made me think of you."

Yin Yi's face falters, because—

Pearls are beautiful, but…

Xie Lian’s face falls into his hands.

“He doesn’t see it, does he?”

“…He does not,” Hua Cheng agrees, faintly amused.

“This is just so….”

"Keep watching, gege."

(Because it gets worse.)

"...I don't really own any other jewelry pieces, so..." Yin Yu trails off, unsure of what to say, but Quan Yizhen pays him no mind.

"You can wear it by itself."

"...Right," Yin Yu mutters, fumbling around for a chain.

Once he slips the pearl onto the links, tying it around his neck—Quan Yizhen seems satisfied enough to change the subject.

"...I don't like it here, Shixiong."

Yin Yu looks up from his new accessory to find his shidi forlorn, hugging himself.

"Can we go home now?"

Yin Yu rubs the back of his neck, hesitant.

“…Quan Yizhen, it’s not that simple…”

“You don’t like it here either,” the deputy points out, looking up at him with wide eyes. “I can tell.”

Oh, so he can see that much, but he can’t see—

Yin Yu sighs, crossing his arms.

“Why don’t you want to stay?”

“Everyone lies here,” Quan Yizhen mumbles. “And it smells bad.”

That actually startles Yin Yu. “…What?”

The Heavens doesn’t have any distinct smell—it changes from palace to palace. His, for example, smells like cedar wood.

“It smells like ash,” Quan Yizhen mumbles, crinkling his nose. “…And bone.”

“…Bones have a smell?”

“Burnt ones do,” his shidi glances out the window, irritated. “It’s like sweet incense is trying to cover it up everywhere you go—but it’s still there.”

“…Why would the heavens smell like that? A-Yizhen—you’re sensing what you want to sense because you don’t want to be here. Everyone in the heavens is immortal—there’s no reason there would be ashes here.”

“I am not,” Quan Yizhen frowns. “Who wants to smell something like that?”

Yin Yu doesn't have an answer to that—and Quan Yizhen reaches out, grabbing his hands.

"Shixiong, we should leave. You don't have to live in the Heavens to be a god. Like Lord Rain Master."

Yin Yu stares down at their joined hands, hanging his head.

"I don't want to leave."

Quan Yizhen frowns, frustrated. "...Why not? What does this place have that everywhere else doesn't?"

"It..." Yin Yu hesitates. "It was so much hard work to ascend in the first place, Quan Yizhen. I earned my place here. Why shouldn't I want to stay?"

"...What's so important about ascending anyways?" Quan Yizhen shrugs, tugging at his hands insistently. "There are plenty of gods. Who wants to be just like them?"

Xie Lian cringes in silent discomfort.

Because of course, it's the wrong thing to say to Yin Yu of all people.

Someone who has never been considered remarkable, no matter how hard he worked. And now, having achieved one of the greatest distinctions, ascension—

Quan Yizhen is telling him that it isn't even that special to begin with.

"...If it's so easy, then why don't you try it?"

Xie Lian still hasn't lifted his head from his hands—and he groans before the memory even moves forward, knowing that Yin Yu will come to regret those words.

And he does—in a remarkably short span of time.

Six months.

That's how long it takes for General Qi Ying to ascend.

Six months of focused training—compared to years of Yin Yu giving it absolutely everything he had.

And Yin Yu doesn't seem to resent the fact that Quan Yizhen ascended. It was almost like he expected it, and Xie Lian can see why.

It's like the boy was born to be a martial god.

That in itself isn't the problem, no.

It's that Jun Wu—likely well intentioned, assigned them both to the West.

Two Martial Gods in any one region could be difficult. Ming Guang has always been the sole appointee in the North for a reason;

He would overshadow anyone else.

For martial gods--that can mean eventual destruction, even if the two don't mean each other any harm.

Even in Xie Lian's exile and eventual erasure from cultural memory, he's never been replaced as the martial god of the central plains either.

Because, on the off chance that he ever did ascend once more as a full blown martial god, shackles removed—he would likely quickly and immediately subsume any possible successor.

The only exceptions he can think of to that rule would be Mu Qing and Feng Xin.

And the reason for them being an exception isn't particularly hard to guess.

In terms of martial skills, the two are evenly matched. Feng Xin might have more brute strength and aggression, but Mu Qing is faster, graceful, and tactical.

Even in the skills where they surpass one another, neither is far behind. Eternal rivalry is good for some things, Xie Lian supposes.

And, unlike other martial gods, each of them has had the sense to diversify what they're worshiped for.

In Feng Xin's case, it actually isn't a matter of sense—it was purely a case of unfortunate error and bad luck.

But, being a god of virility isn't the worst thing—it's something men and women alike will always pray for.

The same goes for medicine.

Even if one of them became favored over the other as martial god of the south—they wouldn't fade from relevance.

But even so...

"...I wonder how Feng Xin and Mu Qing manage it..." Xie Lian murmurs out loud, watching the memories float by.

The balance exists for all of the reasons he's already stated, and by the fact that neither of them seems to wish genuine harm on the other, but—

"You know, they have more than a few joint temples," Hua Cheng comments idly, and Xie Lian is left dumbfounded with shock.

"...I can't imagine either one of them is happy about that," he mutters dubiously, and Hua Cheng snickers with agreement.

"From what I gather, each of them is too mortified to bring it up."

Finally, the memories come to a halt once more—and Xie Lian recognizes the music.

Songs that are only played during the mid-autumn festival.

Despite the fact that Yin Yu has never been in the top ten during the battle of the lanterns—or even close—he’s always enjoyed the celebration. Watching the fireworks, eating sweets with Jian Yu.

He makes the most of it

Watching the others—the special ones—taking center stage in the festivities.

Shi Qingxuan has clearly had too much to drink, half strewn over the earth master’s lap as she sings along with the folk songs.

“Ming-Xiong, stop eating and sing along!”

“Mmmphf.”

"I know," Shi Qingxuan slurs, patting his cheek. "I know it's not your comfort zone, but you need to GROW Ming-xiong! Expand your horizons!"

"Mmmm."

"Hey—that's just uncalled for!"

Then there's Mu Qing, and the sight of his silver hair gives Xie Lian a start.

Someone mentioned to him that he has to wear it that way during the mid-autumn festival—because his Worshippers depict him that way. Similar to how Shi Qingxuan has to take her female form.

He isn't shocked by the color itself—rather by how ethereal it makes his friend look.

Laughing and smiling—a rare sight—among the deputies from his palace. And across the room, Feng Xin scowls in his direction, taking a few extra swallows from his glass of wine.

It's a rather endearing scene—old friends and new, and Xie Lian supposes, around this time...

He would have probably been fighting in the army of Yong'an in the Crescent Moon Kingdom, looking after Banyue.

Xie Lian can't say he regrets those years with her, and yet—

For some reason, seeing moments like this...leaves an ache.

"Oh! You must be the Martial God of the West!"

Yin Yu whips around to see a minor deity offering a friendly smile.

"Oh—yes, that's me!"

"Has it been difficult lately?" It's rare that anyone stops to make small talk with him of all people these days—and the martial god is glad for the company.

"I heard that you've been assigned to the same territory as another martial god."

"Oh, it's not so bad," Yin Yu smiles pleasantly, shaking his head. "We were in the same sect together before we ascended, so we've always got along well."

"The same sect? How impressive!"

The other official places both hands on his hips, looking Yin Yu over. "Speaks to the training you both received, I'm sure! He's lucky you two are on good terms, I doubt he'd last very long against you, sir!"

"Oh..." Yin Yu pauses, confused. "I'm not sure that's the case..."

"Of course it is!" The official beams, taking a generous sip from his glass of wine. "After all, you're the most promising martial god to ascend in the last few centuries! Everyone's been talking about that wolf spirit you vanquished a few weeks ago!"

Yin Yu freezes.

"Oh, um...I think you've got that mixed up," He smiles awkwardly. "I'm afraid Quan Yizhen was the one who vanquished the wolf spirit, not me."

The official stares at him, his eyes widening, lips rounding into an 'o,' "You mean you're not...?"

Yin Yu's smile quickly fades.

"I..." The official seems to realize with dawning horror what he's done, and doesn't know what to do other than let out a shrill, awkward laugh, downing the rest of his wine. "I-I'm so sorry, I thought you were —!"

"It's fine!" Yin Yu blurts out quickly, waving his hands. "Actually, I've had too much to drink, and I'm pretty tired. I think—I think I'll just go ahead and retire for the night!"

(He winces at the word 'retire.' Why would he say it like that, after everything that was said just now?)

He turns around quickly, hurrying off.

By the time he's back on the street, he's walking briskly—not wanting to cause a scene by running, but desperate to get away from the party, a growing lump in his throat.

But...

"Do you see what I mean?!" Jian Yu mutters, appearing at his heels. "I was right all along!"

"...You saw that?" Yin Yu croaks, his arms crossed tightly, and Xie Lian's heart aches with sympathy.

"Of course I did! How could he dare to disrespect you like that?! You're the SENIOR martial god of the west!"

Yin Yu bites back a bitter laugh.

"I don't think that matters."

He's what—six months ahead of him in terms of ascension? As far as gods are concerned, they might as well be celestial twins.

And in age—they're what, five years apart in age? To immortals, that's absolutely nothing.

Why should that scrap of seniority matter—all when one is clearly so superior to the other in talent?

"None of this would be happening if we had just kicked him out to begin with! He has NEVER known his place! Always stealing opportunities from everyone else—!"

"Like what?!"

They step back inside the palace of Yin Yu, with the deputy general practically bursting at the seams with built up frustration.

"There were so many points—you take your pick! He was lucky enough to be appointed to the middle court by you, and look how he shows his gratitude!"

"Being appointed to the middle court has nothing to do with whether or not you actually ascend," Yin Yu sighs, walking across the room to pour himself a drink. "He did that on his own."

And Yin Yu doubts he's grateful for any of it—Quan Yizhen still asks him to go home.

Maybe it's a yearning for childhood. For things to be simple again. To go back to a time when he could monopolize his shixiong as much as he wanted, but...

Yin Yu still catches him wrinkling his nose when he sniffs the air here.

Almost like he still smells ash and bone.

"So?! He wouldn't have learned cultivation at all if it wasn't for you! And he doesn't CARE about any of this, but he STILL takes opportunities from you! Like killing the wolf demon and getting all of the credit for it!" Jian Yu sputters, pacing the room. "He's shameless!"

"...Look, the people in the area prayed to him, not me. And even if they had asked me..." Yin Yu sighs, staring down at his glass. "I probably wouldn't have been able to handle it. He was the better choice."

"...Lord Yin Yu," Jian Yu implores him, exasperated. "You can't keep going on like this."

"I don't—" Yin Yu slumps, pressing a hand against his forehead. "I don't know what you expect me to do."

"Something! Be selfish! Be greedy! Fight for yourself!" Jian Yu glares, smacking his hand on the table between them.

"Because if you don't—if you don't learn how to start playing the game the way the rest of these people do, you aren't going to be a god for very long."

"I—playing the game?" Yin Yu mutters, shaking his head. "What are you talking about?"

"Look—I like Shi Qingxuan as much as anybody, but do you honestly think he's the Wind Master because he's an amazing cultivator?"

Watching the dream, Xie Lian stiffens, startled. "...He figured it out that soon?" He whispers.

"Not exactly," Hua Cheng shakes his head. “But Jian Yu wasn’t a fool. To the contrary, he was the most intelligent of the three—just the least skilled in cultivation, and not destined to ascend himself.”

Within the memory, the deputy god shakes his head. “He’s the Wind Master because the Water Master made it so!”

"Okay?!" Yin Yu throws one hand up, the other still clutching his forehead, frustrated. "What am I supposed to do about that? I don't have any connections to the higher level gods, in case you hadn't noticed!"

"You have your family in the mortal realm!" Jian Yu glares.

"With all of the connections your brothers have—couldn't they build you temples? Or make larger donations at the very least!"

Yin Yu's face contorts with a flash of something that has built slowly—over a lifetime of disappointments;

Wounded pride.

"No!" He snaps. "I can't ask them!"

He'd rather deal with the worst case scenario than ask his family for help. Than admit that the one thing that finally made him remarkable wasn't—

That he wasn't good enough.

"...Then tell Quan Yizhen to back off!" Jian Yu gestures animatedly. "If he actually gives a damn, maybe he'll listen!"

That—

Yin Yu can't do that either.

"Why should he have to change, just because I can't—?"

Creak!

Both men fall silent, looking towards the door.

Speak of the devil, and he shall appear.

"...Quan Yizhen!"

Yin Yu's smile is all forced politeness and false warmth, desperately trying to hide the conversation they were having before. "Shouldn't you be at the festival?"

Behind him, Jian Yu picks up his half finished drink, downing it as he rolls his eyes.

"Shouldn't he have learned to knock?"

Yin Yu sends him a look, but Quan Yizhen doesn't respond to that. Actually, he doesn't even seem to acknowledge Jian Yu's presence, instead focusing on Yin Yu.

Which is entirely normal, after all—he is always focused on his Shixiong, regardless of the circumstances.

"I heard that you left the banquet in a rush," Quan Yizhen steps forward, examining Yin Yu's face.

Before he was pale, stricken—and now, in his Shidi's presence, his forced smile remains in place, fighting not to betray that anything is wrong.

"I was tired. It's been busy lately..."

Behind him, Jian Yu takes another swig of his lord's wine, scowling. "So busy," he repeats.

(They haven't received a request to go on a mission in the mortal realm in over a month. Jian Yu has been reading the compiled volumes of Jing Wen's essays for the third time. Yin Yu has taken up studying different celestial maps in order to pass the time.)

Quan Yizhen finally does look at Jian Yu now, a rare flicker of irritation flashing in his gaze. Jian Yu never liked the younger disciple—but that feeling was never mutual.

Honestly , Quan Yizhen never paid much attention to him one way or the other, but...

"Oh," Xie Lian breathes, eyes widening. "Does he think...?"

Hua Cheng shrugs. "I suppose even the most oblivious souls aren't immune to jealousy, are they?"

(Oh, if only he knew.)

Quan Yizhen shrugs off Yin Yu's explanation without question, glancing around. It's only been ten years since his own ascension—but he misses it here. That much is clear from the look on his face.

His own palace is boring, too big—and filled with far too many things that he couldn't be bothered to care about.

"I heard that someone mistook you for me."

Yin Yu grows pale, his jaw clenching.

"...I suppose that did happen," he mutters, turning his gaze toward the floor in order to hide his expression. "It was an. honest mistake on their part."

Honestly, Xie Lian has learned to know better than to expect any reaction from Quan Yizhen, but—

He wasn't expecting Quan Yizhen to laugh .

Not unkindly, but loud—hunching over and clutching his ribs, shaking his head as though it's the funniest thing he's ever heard.

"Ha! I would have liked to see that!"

Behind Yin Yu, Jian Yu's fingers tighten around his glass—practically trembling with rage.

That Quan Yizhen would even dare laugh at something that caused their Shixiong such humiliation.

(On the contrary, Xie Lian doesn't think it ever occurred to Quan Yizhen that such an experience might be humiliating for Yin Yu. Honestly, he probably found it funny because the two look nothing alike, but...

Jian Yu has never been generous when interpreting him.)

It takes Yin Yu a few moments to speak. Always patient, always understanding, but—

There's only so much a man can take. And having such a profoundly mortifying experience, hearing Quan Yizhen laugh at it...

It gets to him. It's visible from the hunch in his shoulders.

But when he speaks, there isn't a trace of that in his tone.

"...Then I'm sorry that you didn't get the chance to see it," he mutters, clearing his throat. "But as you can see, I'm perfectly well. Did you just come here to check on me?"

"That was part of it," Quan Yizhen acknowledges, "But I was going to come over later anyway."

Yin Yu waits for an explanation as the martial god stares at him, expectant.

"...Well, I'm glad to hear it," Yin Yu forces another smile. "I'm always happy when you decide to visit."

Such a statement probably would have been sincere, a few years back. Now, listening to him say it makes Xie Lian grimace.

Quan Yizhen stares at him, as though he finds something about this odd—and the reason for it soon becomes clear.

"I always visit you on my birthday."

Yin Yu bites back the urge to swear when he realizes.

Right.

Quan Yizhen's birthday IS during the Mid-Autumn Festival this year. How could Yin Yu have forgotten?

"...Right!" The martial god agrees quickly. "I'm sorry I didn't speak to you earlier, it's just been so busy!"

"So busy," Jian Yu parrots from behind the two, rolling his empty glass against his palm as Yin Yu steps forward, patting the top of Quan Yizhen's head.

Even now, as a grown man and formidable martial god, the gesture makes Quan Yizhen brighten.

"Happy Birthday!"

Yin Yu enthuses cheerfully, smiling at his shidi with a little less force, and a little more genuine warmth.

It's nice that now, even when things are so different than the way things used to be, some things will stay the—

"Where's my present?"

"I..." Yin Yu falls silent, his mouth hanging open as he struggles for an answer. "I, ah..."

He almost tells him the truth, he really does.

But he's standing there, staring all expectantly, and he just—

"...Have it back here somewhere! Jian Yu, come and help me find it!"

He stumbles backwards, grabbing his deputy by the sleeve as he drags him out of the room, disappearing into the private chambers of his palace, leading Jian Yu down the hall.

"What should I do?!" He whispers frantically. "I completely forgot!"

And how could he have done that?

He's gotten Quan Yizhen a birthday present every single year, even back before he began training in their temple. He hasn't missed a year in decades, and it's something that he expects—

"You could always tell him that he's a grown man, and it's ridiculous for him to show up here like this, laugh at you, then demand a birthday present?" Jian Yu counters dryly.

"I can't do that!"

"Why not?!"

"He won't understand—it'll just hurt his feelings," Yin Yu mutters, his hair slipping free from its braid in his distress, several pieces falling into his face.

"And?! He just hurt YOUR feelings!"

"That's different."

"How?!"

"He didn't MEAN to!" Yin Yu groans. "That doesn't mean I should be cruel to him!"

"It's not cruel! Because you're both ADULTS and you have bigger things to worry about than getting him a birthday gift! He's immortal! He can't expect his birthday to be celebrated indefinitely!"

Oh, but he can.

Yin Yu doesn't really expect Jian Yu to understand.

For Quan Yizhen—it isn't really about getting a birthday gift. Not necessarily. It's about the gift being from Yin Yu , because...

Yin Yu is the only one who's ever bothered to give him anything.

Quan Yizhen has never had many connections, or sources of stability in his life. Those he does have, he holds onto tightly.

Among them—

Yin Yu gets him a birthday gift every year. Always has, always will.

That's important to him.

"Look..." Yin Yu sighs, pressing his face into his hands for a moment, taking a deep breath. "Just go find that armlet I was given a few months ago, alright? That should be nice enough, I don't have anything else here I could give him with no notice."

"But—"

"Please, Jian Yu."

"...Fine, fine!" He grumbles, walking off. "I don't even know why I bother!"

He can complain all he wants—Yin Yu is just relieved that he's actually doing as he says.

He walks back out to the front, where Quan Yizhen is still waiting, leaning against one of the pillars.

“…Jian Yu remembered where it was while we were looking,” Yin Yu explains, a little nervous. “He’ll be back with it in just a moment.”

“…He didn’t help you pick it out, did he?”

Yin Yu pauses, a little surprised by the question. “Um…no. Why?”

Quan Yizhen shrugs.

“No reason.”

Yin Yu tilts his head curiously—and that’s when Jian Yu returns, a gift box in hand.

(Having even taken the time to properly package it before bringing it out, bless him.)

“Here you are, General,” he mutters, handing it over. “Happy birthday.”

From that moment, Yin Yu should have known.

Jian Yu NEVER referred to Quan Yizhen by his proper title before that moment—or even deigned to wish him a happy birthday.

Yin Yu should have known—but he didn’t.

And the things he should have known would cost him everything.

“Thank you,” Quan Yizhen bows his head, going to open the gift, but —

“Maybe you should wait to open it until you get home,” Yin Yu mutters, exhausted. “You’ve had such a long day.”

“…Alright,” Quan Yizhen agrees with a shrug.

"I'm going on patrol in a few weeks—if Shixiong has time, he should come with me."

"Yes," Yin Yu replies distractedly. "Yes, we'll see..."

The minute Quan Yizhen is out the door, Jian Yu is fuming.

"Did you hear him?! Bragging about going on patrol—who does he think he is?!"

Yin Yu sends him one tired look, then shakes his head, walking back to his bedroom.

It doesn't matter anymore, really.

"..." Xie Lian watches events unfold, his stomach sinking. "...San Lang, that gift he gave him wasn't the armlet, was it?"

"No," the calamity agrees.

"It was the Brocade Immortal."

"...But why did they even have it?" Xie Lian frowns, trying to understand.

"Before this incident, it was normal for martial gods to house cursed objects in order to guard them, rather than leave that task solely to the emperor."

That makes sense—Xie Lian faintly remembers housing a few cursed blades in his own palace after his first ascension.

"But...they left something as dangerous as the Brocade Immortal with Yin Yu?" He questions, startled.

He means no offense—but it's beyond his capabilities.

A god like Pei Ming or Feng Xin would have been more suited. Xie Lian would say Mu Qing as well—but given his spiteful temper, perhaps...

"Prior to this, no one realized just how dangerous the brocade immortal was," Hua Cheng shakes his head. "So, they saw no risk."

Xie Lian supposes he can understand that circumstance. If the brocade immortal had never been turned against a god before, there was no reason to think the cursed robe would work in that sense. Not yet.

And giving it to someone as kind tempered as Yin Yu would seem practical.

“…But Yin Yu didn’t even know what Jian Yu had done,” Xie Lian frowns. “Why would his punishment for what happened be so harsh?”

“It only takes three days to see why,” Hua Cheng replies—and with a flick of his wrist, time rapidly moves forward.

The sun rising and setting quickly across the sky, shadows shifting across the floor—until the day arrives.

Yin Yu’s last day in the Heavens.

“…Jian Yu?” He steps out into the main hall, something clutched in his hand. “Where are you?”

“Here, my lord. What is it?”

“…Why did I find the golden exorcism armlet here?” Yin Yu frowns, holding it up in front of him, the golden bangle gleaming in the light. “You didn’t box something inappropriate to give to Quan Yizhen instead, did you?”

Jian Yu shrugs, crossing his arms smugly.

“Oh, I gave him something that suits him much better.”

Yin Yu sends him a confused look, sighing with annoyance.

“Why do you always have to insult people?” He mutters, turning away, but—

Yin Yu’s palace isn’t exactly overflowing with treasure. What could he have possibly—?

The moment Yin Yu realizes, his face grows pale.

“Jian Yu…you…” his hair whips around him as he turns to look at his deputy, panicked. “You didn’t give him that robe, did you?!”

“And so what if I did?” His friend glares. “Maybe he’ll finally learn a lesson!”

“Jian Yu!”

“What?!”

“That thing is dangerous!” Yin Yu groans. “It feeds off the blood of anyone who wears it—he could get hurt!”

“That brute? He could probably wear it for the next decade without noticing anything was wrong. Besides—all it means is he has to do what you tell him to!”

It’s the same assumption that landed Yin Yu with looking after the Brocade Immortal to begin with.

That of course he could be trusted with that sort of thing—because he had such a good temperament.

He would never misuse it.

In Xie Lian’s experience, assumptions like that…

They never end well.

Everyone has their limits.

“Where are you going?”

“Where do you think?” Yin Yu mutters, pulling on his boots as he heads toward the door. “I have to get that thing off of him!”

Without letting anyone else realize what‘s happened either—no small task.

Xie Lian almost wishes he could shout for him to stop—already knowing that, somehow, the martial god is doomed to fail, but…

It’s too late to change the course of the past now, and they can only watch.

“…Lord Yin Yu,” Jun Wu raises an eyebrow when the doors slam open.

“It’s rare to see you here these days. To what do we owe the honor?”

“I, ah…” Yin Yu clears his throat, his eyes flickering to the side, taking in the sight of Quan Yizhen. “I just wanted to…”

General Pei kicks back in his chair, smiling crookedly. “Like Qi Ying’s new armor?”

"Um..." Yin Yu can't stop staring at it, the shoulder plates gleaming impressively under the light, almost demanding to be seen. "Yes, they look very nice on you."

Quan Yizhen smiles faintly, clearly pleased. "They were a birthday gift from Shixiong."

It's almost shocking how quickly Yin Yu goes from smiling politely to looking slightly shell shocked.

"I—ah, yes, so it is."

"Your shixiong is very kind," Pei Ming muses, leaning back in his chair, slightly forlorn.

"My birthday is soon to be upon us, and I doubt I'll receive such a generous gift..."

From the seat to his right, the Water Master rolls his eyes, most of his face obscured by his fan as he waves it in front of his face lazily.

"I suppose you'll just have to wait and see."

"I, um..." Yin Yu swallows hard, glancing among the gathered heavenly officials, some of the most important in the heavens, realizing...

He feels so out of place here. Like a child sneaking into a meeting where he doesn't belong.

Quan Yizhen, however, looks utterly at ease.

The stark difference between the two of them has never felt quite so bitter until now.

"Quan Yizhen, when you have a moment, I need to speak with you. I'll just...wait outside until then."

"No need," Jun Wu shakes his head, rising to his feet. "We've just about finished all of our work here already. This meeting is adjourned."

The other officials nod, murmuring in acknowledgment as they go about their business, filing out of the room.

Ling Wen nearly trips over her own feet, twisting her head around to look at the two of them, her face oddly pale—only for Shi Wudu to catch her by the wrist, tugging her along.

"What's gotten into you, Ling Wen?"

"Sorry, I..."

Her eyes linger on the general for a moment longer, lips drawn into a thin, firm line. "I got distracted."

When Quan Yizhen goes to follow, Jun Wu calls over to him—

"Oh, and General Qi Ying—I'll think about your request."

Quan Yizhen looks back, giving him a short nod before walking out beside Yin Yu, who can't help but glance back over his shoulder as they go down the steps, baffled.

"...Request?" He mutters, his brow creasing.

"I don't think I've ever heard of you requesting anything from the emperor."

"Huh?" Quan Yizhen looks over at him, then shrugs, rubbing the side of his neck. Not in a sheepish gesture, no—there's just been a sting there lately. Like some sort of bug bite...

"Oh—I told the emperor that I wanted you to go on patrol with me next month, and he said he would think about it."

Yin Yu freezes on the final step, almost like he's been grabbed by an invisible force.

Xie Lian can only peek through his fingers at this point.

Patrols are a major component of a martial god's prominence. Each god is responsible for their own territory, but each month certain deities are selected to descend to the mortal realm full time, fighting monsters and earning merits as they do so.

It's a privilege, one only given to the higher ranking martial gods as a sign of their status. Yin Yu was invited on a few patrols in the very early days following his ascension, but...not recently.

The idea that Quan Yizhen would go to the emperor and ask him to invite his shixiong along...there's something so profoundly mortifying about it, Yin Yu has nearly lost the ability to speak.

"I...I didn't ask you to do that!" He croaks, his face flushing an angry shade of red. "Why...why would you do that?!"

He didn't ask Quan Yizhen to do that—but Quan Yizhen did bring up the idea of going on patrol together on his birthday.

But Xie Lian doubts that Yin Yu remembers such things—or that it would have made a difference.

"Shixiong..." Quan Yizhen's voice is a sharp contrast to Yin Yu's mortification. Shocked, staring back at his shixiong with confusion. "Are you angry? Did I do something wrong?"

"You...!" Yin Yu turns away, clutching the sides of his head, nostrils flaring.

Trying so, so hard not to lose his temper.

But when Quan Yizhen's hand lands on his shoulder, he just...

"YOU GO BACK TO THE EMPEROR RIGHT NOW AND TAKE IT BACK!" Yin Yu cries.

That patience, ever present, ever relied upon, finally snaps.

Yin Yu catches his breath, trembling with anger as he fights to get his emotions back under control, turning around, planning on repeating himself far more calmly, but—

When he does, he sees Quan Yizhen staring back at him, stricken—white as a ghost.

"I..."

Yin Yu swallows hard, suddenly ashamed. He's never raised his voice to Quan Yizhen before, of course—

Of course, it must have been a shock to him. But—

Before Yin Yu can say a word, Quan Yizhen's body jerks back around, running back up the steps to do as he's told, but...

Not the way he would if he was simply doing as Yin Yu asked him to. No. His body...is moving strangely.

Almost like his limbs are that of a marionette, strings being plucked with every step. Jerking, unnatural, and quick.

"...Quan Yizhen?" Yin Yu starts after him, gasping with horror when his shidi violently shoves a deputy ogd out of his way. With so much force that it sends him flying into a nearby pillar, breaking his arm. "...QUAN YIZHEN!"

Around them, there are voices of panic rising through the crowd as the martial god begins violently throwing people out of his way, leaving no one in his path unscathed.

And with slow building horror, Yin Yu visibly begins to realize what he's done.

That it isn't Quan Yizhen doing this, it—

It's the Brocade Immortal.

Xie Lian watches two diverging, equally distressing emotions cross over Yin Yu's face.

First, guilt. For the situation that Quan Yizhen is in, and the fact that he's now made it so much worse.

And second, maybe even more importantly: fear.

Yin Yu looks absolutely petrified . Not over the fact that Quan Yizhen might harm him, no. Brocade Immortal or not, that's an impossibility.

No.

Everyone is seeing this. Everyone is going to know .

Yin Yu's chances of getting Quan Yizhen alone and getting the robe off of him without anyone knowing about it are gone now.

He'll be blamed. He'll—

He'll be punished for it, too.

Even though he never meant for this to happen.

Even if he wasn't the one who gave Quan Yizhen the stupid thing to begin with—

No one else is going to care about that. No one else is going to see that. They'll just—

They'll just see him for what he really is.

Someone entirely unremarkable, bitterly trapped in the shadow of someone who always shines.

The shame and fear that brings strikes him to the core, and he just—

"SOMEONE CALL THE MARTIAL GODS, HE'S LOST HIS MIND!"

"IS HE TRYING TO BREAK INTO THE IMPERIAL PALACE?!"

"SOMEONE HELP, HE'S BROKEN MY LEG!"

"...JUST GO!" Yin Yu shrieks, hunched over, pulling at his hair. "JUST GET OUT OF HERE!"

He can't be reasonable anymore.

And Xie Lian's speculation earlier—that the brocade immortal had never been used on a god, and they wouldn't know what to expect—all of that was true.

Before now, the Brocade Immortal had never been inflicted on anyone but mortals.

And centuries later, in the hands of a civil god, it would be quite formidable.

But in the hands of a martial god—that's when the cursed object is at its least stable point.

When even the one who gifted the wearer the cursed object can't completely control them.

Quan Yizhen turns around, staggering slightly, dark energy emanating from his body as he walks past the injured officials remaining in the martial hall, descending to the outside with slow, heavy footsteps.

And the moment he's past Yin Yu...

Any god that gets in his way, he attacks.

And one of them...

"MURDER!" One of the deputy officials shrieks with terror, watching as blood pools in the streets. "MURDER IN THE HEAVENS!"

...isn't as lucky as the others.

"Oh god..." Yin Yu whispers, horrified, taking a trembling step backwards.

...How did it come to this? He never...he never meant...!

"SOMETHING IS CONTROLLING GENERAL QI YING, DIDN'T YOU NOTICE?! HE DIDN'T START ATTACKING UNTIL YIN YU SHOUTED AT HIM!"

"I SAW THE SAME THING!"

"Don't run," Xie Lian whispers desperately, watching the rising panic in Yin Yu's expression. "That'll make everything look so much worse, don't—"

But his words cannot carry through time—and in his terror, Yin Yu simply turns on his heel and flees, making like he's going to descend into the mortal realm, until—

SLAM!

"Oof!"

He hits the ground—hard—one arm twisted behind his back until he feels the bone snap.

"What the hell is this?!" A voice snarls in his ear, just as other gods around them begin to cry out in relief.

"The martial gods—they're here!"

And one of them—General Xuan Zhen—already has Yin Yu in custody.

Capturing Quan Yizhen, however...isn't so simple.

Not without killing him.

"Hell!" Feng Xin snaps, holding his bow in a locked position, the notch of the arrow moving around frantically. "That armor only has gaps at the LETHAL points! Who the hell designs it like that?! Where's Pei?!"

"The emperor had him descend to deal with a matter in the mortal realm as soon as the meeting was over!"

"Could he not—!" Feng Xin grits his teeth, trying to aim for the back of Quan Yizhen's knee, only to find the armor covers that too. "Could he not have WAITED A MINUTE?!"

"We're calling him, we're—!"

Just then, Quan Yizhen makes eye contact with Mu Qing, holding Yin Yu down—and his pupils dilate with rage, surging forward—

And Xie Lian sees a flash of an unusual emotion on Feng Xin's face.

Genuine fear.

"HEY—!"

BOOM!

Perhaps the armor isn't giving any options for an arrow or a blade to strike Quan Yizhen in a place that isn't fatal, forcing the other martial gods to choose between saving the others, and killing their comrades.

Water, however, is a far more flexible medium than a blade.

And even with just the spiritual pools around the Heavens, there's enough to pin Quan Yizhen down, enveloping him with a pulsing current, one that even the Brocade Immortal cannot escape.

Feng Xin sags, letting out a breath he didn't know he was holding.

"...Thank you, Lord Water Master."

Xie Lian turns his head around. Shi Wudu's face was hidden by his fan during the meeting, and he hardly spoke.

Now, his eyes burn with a vibrant, intensely blue light, hair whipping around him as he guides spiritual power through his fan.

Shi Wudu barely nods to acknowledge Feng Xin's gratitude, his eyes narrowed with concentration as he controls the currents around Quan Yizhen's body, using them to slowly—painfully—pry the armor off of him, piece by piece.

"How the hell did Qi Ying end up like this?!"

Quan Yizhen struggles violently just then, forcing Shi Wudu to grit his teeth and grip onto the water tighter, allowing only his face to escape so he doesn't drown—and two things occur to Xie Lian.

First, he finds it odd that no one ever spoke often of the Water Master's looks.

Even in a situation like this—and Xie Lian was never one to pay much attention to such things—

Shi Qingxuan's elder brother is uncommonly beautiful.

But there's something far more pressing, something strange—

Something that never occurred to him until now.

Standing here, with Hua Cheng beside him, his friends before him, watching Quan Yizhen and Yin Yu struggle, seeing Shi Wudu standing there, a living, breathing person who would fade into a painful mystery—

It feels like broken pieces surrounding him, rather than actual people.

Like he's supposed to be matching the shattered edges together, as though everything before his eyes is a puzzle of someone else's design.

And Shi Wudu is the piece that doesn't fit.

Because seeing the scope of his skills with his own eyes—Xie Lian doesn't understand.

"..." He steps toward the water master, invisible inside this scene, watching his face with ever growing confusion.

"...Why did he let you die?" Xie Lian whispers, hand hovering in mid-air.

"Who?" Hua Cheng asks him softly, watching from a few steps behind.

"The emperor," Xie Lian starts, his voice faint. "Everyone spoke about how close he and Shi Wudu were, I..."

Xie Lian can think of so many things that have happened since the opening of Mount Tonglu that the Water Master could have stopped, if he had lived.

As a matter of fact—things really only started to fall apart after he died. An almost predictable result of Jun Wu losing his most powerful ally.

Hell—when Jun Wu asked Xie Lian to step in and take over his duties while he went to Mount Tonglu, he...

All Xie Lian could think of was the fact that the only people qualified to do that would have been Ming Guang, or the Water Master.

One dead—and the other devastated by his loss.

"...You think Jun Wu allowed him to die, your highness?"

Hua Cheng's voice is carefully neutral.

Xie Lian's stomach drops, his face pales, and he shakes his head—suddenly wracked by this overwhelming sense of guilt.

That he would even think that. That he would say it.

The—

The Water Master was dear to the Emperor. He was just as hurt by his loss as anyone.

"N-No," he mutters, clearing his throat. "I—that was horrible of me to say, San Lang—I don't know what I was thinking."

Ju Wu has given him so many chances. Given Xie Lian the benefit of the doubt—even when he didn't deserve it.

Thinking something so awful—he's ashamed.

Finally, the scene clicks back into motion—the Water Master struggling to contain Yin Yu, and—

"JUST STOP!" Yin Yu cries, wincing with pain from his broken arm, staring up at Quan Yizhen imploringly. "Quan Yizhen—STOP!"

The moment those words leave his lips...

Quan Yizhen goes limp, and Shi Wudu releases the water around him, allowing the general to sink to the ground.

"What did you do to him?!" Mu Qing snaps at Yin Yu squeezing his arm until the martial god cries out, sending Quan Yizhen flailing—but Shi Wudu slams him back down.

"Whatever it is, release it now!"

"I..." Yin Yu presses his forehead against the ground beneath him, trembling with frustration, sadness—and utter humiliation.

How did things come to this? He—

He tried so hard to be a good person. Where did it all go wrong?

How did he end up here?

"ANSWER HIM!"

"Can you believe that he would do this to his own shidi?!"

"It's a disgrace!"

"Should we arrest him? Do we even have enough evidence to do that?"

The voices are overwhelming, rattling around in his ears, tension building in his chest.

Until he can't—

"...Shixiong?"

"...SHUT UP!" Yin Yu shrieks, slamming his forehead against the ground again, and again, and again. "JUST—JUST GO FUCKING DIE!"

Who he meant those words for isn't clear to Xie Lian, but...

Screams echo across the streets as Quan Yizhen immediately turns his sword upon himself.

It shatters in a flash of golden light before it can penetrate too deeply between his ribs—but he still sinks back down to the ground, clearly wounded.

"QUAN YIZHEN!" Yin Yu cries out.

A few people nearby shake their heads with disgust at the idea that he would dare express worry after what he's done.

Heavy footfalls echo on the streets, the Heavenly Officials around them parting like the tides—making way for the emperor, who kneels beside Quan Yizhen.

"..." He snaps his fingers—and in another flash of light—similar to what destroyed the general's sword before he could take his own life—the armor falls from Quan Yizhen's body, landing on the ground with a clatter.

"It would seem Qi Ying was wearing the Brocade Immortal."

The armor that Quan Yizhen indicated had been a gift from Yin Yu turned out to be the deadly, cursed item that Yin Yu had been tasked to guard .

The moment Jun Wu says those words—Yin Yu's guilt in the matter is all but sealed.

And even if it wasn't...

When Yin Yu said those words—

'Just go die.'

It was like trying to commit murder in front of the entire Heavens, and...there's no way to get away with that.

Xie Lian watches in silence as the memory fades, Mu Qing moving to treat the wounded as Yin Yu is arrested.

"...There was a trial shortly after that," Hua Cheng explains calmly. "Jian Yu claimed responsibility for the entire thing, but that didn't make much of a difference for Yin Yu in the end."

They were both exiled. Jian Yu dying of old age, and Yin Yu...

Found stable employment.

Now, they fade back into the present, with Yin Yu still holding the shovel in the air, indecisive—face unreadable beneath the mask.

"…You want to come out?" He repeats slowly.

"Yes," Quan Yizhen agrees, having made himself perfectly clear already.

"…"

WHACK!

The shovel slams into his forehead—hard, until Quan Yizhen slumps forward, limp.

"Is he—?" Xie Lian gasps, concerned, but Hua Cheng shakes his head.

"Just knocked out. It seems unlikely that Yin Yu would let him die—but he doesn't want to be recognized either."

The image of the two fades as Yin Yu uses the earth master's shovel to pull Quan Yizhen out of the wall—leaving Hua Cheng and Xie Lian alone, crushed inside the darkness.

Well—partially crushed.

Xie Lian's arms and head are still free, comfortably leaned against Hua Cheng.

Almost like being buried together.

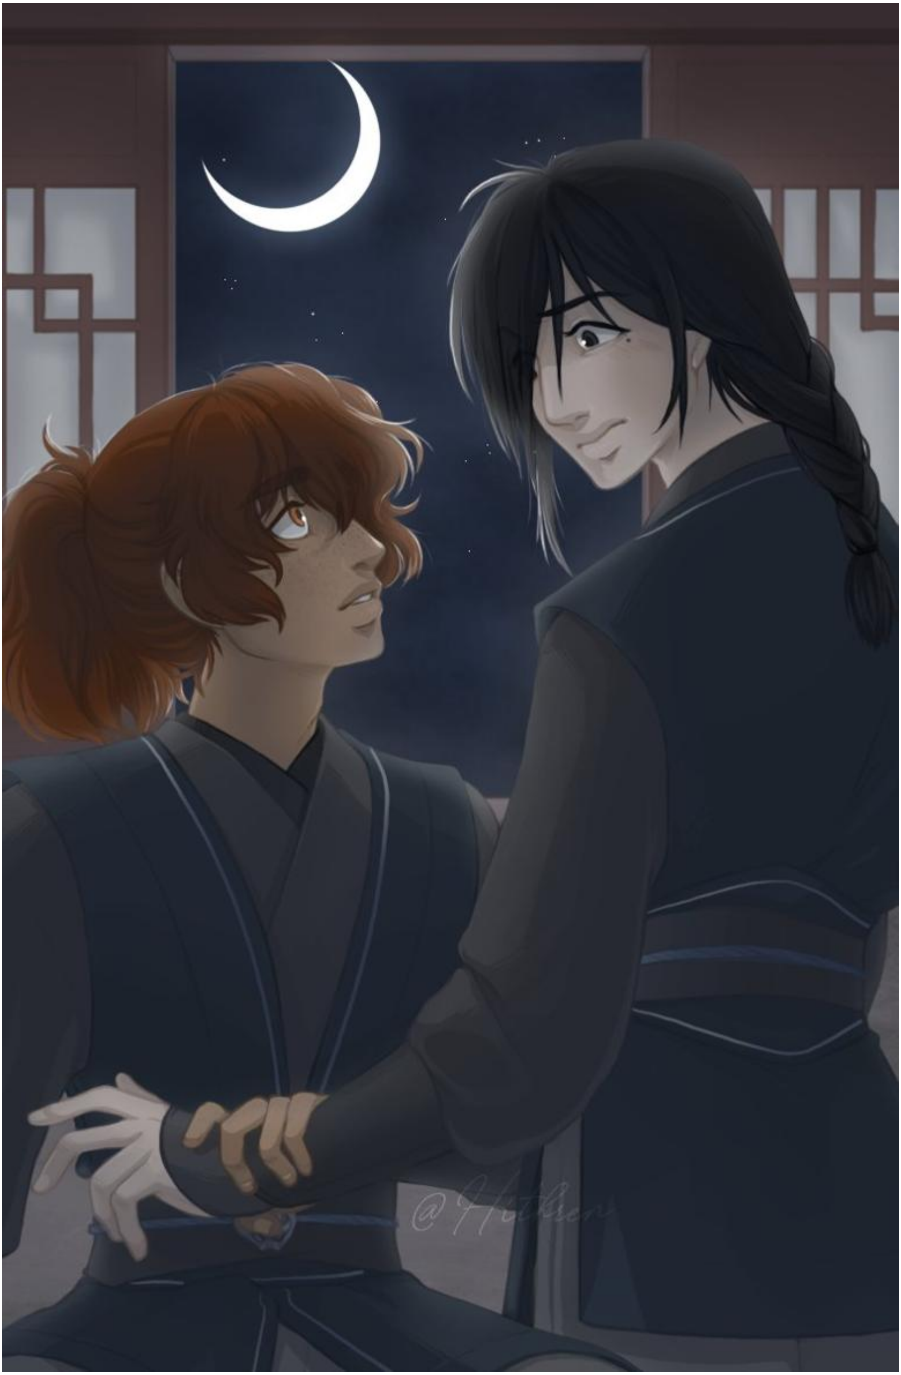
Xie Lian honestly didn't think he could bear another moment underground, not after…

He presses his cheek a little closer against Hua Cheng's robes, taking a deep breath.

But this…isn't so bad.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Included with permission from the artist, do not repost or re-use for any reason.



CREDIT: HITHREN

Chapter End Notes

> Thank you to Hithren for their beautiful artwork, and allowing me to share it!

Stunted

Chapter Summary

> "…The prince is here now too," the man sighs, speaking to someone that Xie Lian can't sense. "But he's far beyond saving."
>
> Hearing that makes the god grow still.
>
> …He's beyond saving?
>
> Something about those words hits Xie Lian in a deep, nearly forgotten place.
>
> One that aches.

Chapter Notes

> sorry for another long chapter, but the plot should be moving a bit faster from here on!

"…Do you think the mountain spirit is going to spit us out any time soon?" He inquires, trying not to think too much more about that thought, knowing—

Knowing it doesn't matter, in the end.

"…Perhaps," Hua Cheng agrees. "But if gege is uncomfortable, I can blast us out now."

Xie Lian considers it—not because he's panicking like before, but because they really should try to find the others, but—

"…Did you hear that?"

Hua Cheng falls silent, listening.

"…I do."

On the other side of the wall—Xie Lian can hear a voice. Faint, but clear.

And when Xie Lian presses his ear against the stone—he can make out the words.

"…The prince is here now too," the man sighs, speaking to someone that Xie Lian can't sense. "But he's far beyond saving."

Hearing that makes the god grow still.

…He's beyond saving?

Something about those words hits Xie Lian in a deep, nearly forgotten place.

One that aches.

Hua Cheng's hand tightens against the small of his back, and that voice speaks again.

"I've…Oh, my friend," the man sighs, so…mournful.

Remorseful.

"I don't know what to do."

Hua Cheng can't show him who it is—he doesn't have any butterflies in the area—but…

…Xie Lian knows that voice.

Remembers it from times far behind him, faint, but impossible to forget.

"…Guoshi?" He whispers, jaw slack with shock, feeling Hua Cheng stiffen against him.

"That's—?"

"It's Mei Nianqing," Xie Lian confirms, biting his lip.

The State Preceptor of Xianle, and a dear, beloved teacher to the crown prince.

But…he's alive? What…what is he doing here?

"…There were so many lies," Mei Nianqing's voice trembles. "I don't know what the truth is anymore."

There's a faint pause where he seems to be listening to someone else, and—

"She couldn't kill him, and he was weaker then."

She—?

“I don’t know if he genuinely cares for the child, or—no,” Mei Nianqing cuts himself off firmly, like he’s trying to remind himself of something that he’s forgotten countless times. “Even if that’s what he thinks this is—it's an obsession. Or…”

His Guoshi falters. Almost…afraid.

“…Or, he knows that the boy is a threat, and in that case…I don’t know if I can save him. The spell binding him is nearly unbreakable, and his highness…he’s never going to let him go. It’s been so long already.”

…He couldn’t be talking about Xie Lian, it just isn’t possible.

But if that's the case—then what prince is Mei Nianqing talking about? And—

What child is in danger?

“Well—you’re right, the spell could be broken. But it’s beyond my skills—and the sacrifice required would be immense…of course I’m trying to warn him. Haven’t you seen?”

Mei Nianqing’s voice turns slightly frantic, and the next words out of his mouth make Xie Lian’s thoughts grind to a halt.

“I know there are other things that are more important to show him—but that curse—it’s incredibly difficult to work around it!”

…A curse?

“Yes, yes, I can’t show him what he became—that’s why I’m trying to show him who he was before!” Mei Nianqing continues explaining, irritated by some response that isn’t for their ears. “I think…you might think I’ve gone mad, but I think…”

Hua Cheng rolls his eyes, muttering under his breath, "Wouldn't talking to the mountain spirit like you're old pals be the crazier part of this situation?"

Xie Lian pauses, looking up.

He's...talking to the mountain spirit?

Still, Mei Nianqing's voice echoes through the walls.

"...What if we were wrong about everything, all this time?"

His tone takes on a haunting quality—as though he's caught between fear and regret.

"What if we were tricked, and...Guoshi was right all along?"

It takes Xie Lian a moment to understand, taken aback at first.

Of course—Mei Nianqing must have had his own teacher at some point or another. Or a guoshi that preceded him in his work, but—

What was he right about, and how were they tricked?

"...There's not enough time," Mei Nianqing mutters.

"At this rate...he'll reach the Kiln in two days. If he traps the boy in there...it might be the end of us all. I should hurry now. Pass that message to the others for me, will you?"

And just like that—all trace of him is gone.

No voice, no breaths, no heartbeat.

That's when Hua Cheng seems to take his cue to break the wall open, holding one arm around Xie Lian's back as his palm reaches out, a powerful bolt of energy blasting through the rock, setting them free.

He almost staggers when they land on the ground—but Hua Cheng steadies him.

Xie Lian whips his head around, hoping to catch a glimpse of his former teacher, but instead...

Hua Cheng's blast seems to have dislodged another part of the wall, and two bodies drop out—one after the other.

"..." Shuo sits up sharply, hair askew. "Hua Chengzhu!"

Lang Qianqiu groans sharply when the demon's knees dig into his ribs as he gets up, relieved to be free.

"That was suffocating..."

"At least you didn't have to be crammed up against someone with the sharpest elbows in existence—OW!"

A few dozen meters down the tunnel, Yin Yu looks up, startled by the voices. "...Did the others get free?"

As he does this, his grip on Quan Yizhen loosens—and it's that moment when the martial god stops pretending to be unconscious, reaching up and snatching his mask.

For a moment, the two are comically frozen in place, staring at one another with round eyes and gaping mouths.

Two very different forms of shock.

"..." Quan Yizhen lunges forward, just as Yin Yu turns tail and flees down the tunnel.

"SHIXIONG!" He cries, only for Yin Yu to cover his ears, shaking his head frantically.

"YOU'VE GOT THE WRONG PERSON!"

"DON'T RUN! IT'S ME!"

"THAT'S EXACTLY WHY I'M RUNNING!"

They come around the bend in the corner, catching up with the others—and Hua Cheng shows mercy.

There's a crack of his fingers--and Quan Yizhen disappears in a gold puff of smoke, a small, wobbling daruma doll left in his place.

"..." Yin Yu hunches over with a relieved sigh, clutching his chest as he recovers from the panic. "Th...thank you, Hua Chengzhu..."

Shuo scratches the side of his head, kneeling down to pick up the doll. "...It didn't seem like he wanted to hurt you, Yin Yu. What were you running like that for?"

"...Not everyone wants a big, emotional reunion, alright?" Yin Yu grumbles, snatching the doll from his hands.

"And sometimes there are just conversations that people aren't ready to have."

"Hey..." A voice echoes down the hall, "Crimson Rain, your highness—did you two manage to get out?"

"General Hua!"

Xie Lian sags with relief at the sound of General Pei and Banyue's voices.

She runs to his side, pulled into a tight hug as Pei Ming and Pei Su join them, the latter visibly gaunt and exhausted, while his former general rubs pebbles from his hair.

"...I suppose the spirit spat the rest of them out when I knocked us loose," Hua Cheng muses.

"...What about Ling Wen?" Xie Lian mumbles, listening around. "Do you know where he is?"

"I didn't have a butterfly tracking him," Hua Cheng admits, "so no."

"...Very comforting," Pei mutters, working to shrug that one off.

"...But I doubt Bai Jing would let anything get to him—not when he nearly bit my finger off when I tried to get the robe off of him."

That's...a fair point.

Xie Lian opens his mouth to ask something else, but—

THUD!

THUD!

A massive rumbling sound overtakes the tunnel as it sways back and forth, the floor seeming to rise up and down underneath their feet.

"What—?" Xie Lian gasps, grabbing onto Hua Cheng's arm to gain purchase. "Is the spirit trying to swallow us again?!"

"No," Hua Cheng shakes his head, bracing one arm back against the cavern wall, using the other to hold Xie Lian close to him. "It's running."

"What is?" Shuo frowns, rubbing his forehead after falling head first into the wall, sporting a growing bruise.

"That Mountain Spirit!"

"...Two days..." Xie Lian mutters under his breath, holding Hua Cheng's arm even tighter as he remembers what Mei Nianqing said before.

That they were running out of time.

"It's running towards the Kiln!"

In which case—their best option is to ride there along with it.

Eventually the swaying back and forth isn't as violent as it was before—giving them all the opportunity to slump down against the cavern walls, resting while they have the chance.

Well—some of them are resting.

Pei Su is deeply asleep, his head resting against Banyue's leg.

Lang Qianqiu has taken to doing pushups in order to work off the excess energy and nerves, pointedly ignoring Shuo's barbed comments as he does so.

And Pei Ming, well...

He sits back against the wall, staring at something in his palm.

A gold hair pin.

Hua Cheng watches from the other side of the tunnel, not saying a word—and when Pei Ming glances up at him, he’s already looking away.

“…I need to ask you one thing about Blackwater,” the general mutters, looking back down at the pin. “Just one.”

Hua Cheng doesn’t reply at first, slightly wary. But eventually, he looks back at the general, his expression impassive.

“What about him?”

Pei Ming’s fingers close around the pin, and he locks his jaw.

“…Would he scatter someone’s ashes?”

The calamity stares at him, silent.

“You mean Shi Wudu’s.”

Pei Ming doesn’t confirm or deny it—but there’s no other option that he could remotely care about.

“I don’t see why you’re concerned, given that you have his remains,” Hua Cheng sighs. “But no—He Xuan wouldn’t stoop to that. He has limits.”

Limits.

Pei Ming's eyes drop back down to the pin clutched between his fingers, wrestling with that.

With the idea that the death that he's mourning is one that so many believe to be justified .

If that's the truth—then it feels cruel.

Limits are fluid things, changing from one situation to the next. A man can be capable of anything, depending on the circumstances.

And yet...Hua Cheng sounds absolutely certain that Blackwater wouldn't stoop to scattering someone's remains.

"...Very well, then."

That's when Hua Cheng does something somewhat out of character.

Always the one to avoid making conversation. Never asking more, or expressing interest in other people.

(Unless that person is Xie Lian, anyway.)

But now...

"...Why do you ask?"

Pei Ming falls silent, and the ghost king doesn't expect a genuine answer, more than aware of the fact that he doesn't exactly inspire emotional vulnerability in others, but—

"Did you ever lose someone when you were alive? Someone dear to you?"

Hua Cheng grows silent.

Pei Ming is staring ahead—his expression pale, a shadow of his normal, lighthearted self.

Ghosts don't haunt mortals, in Hua Cheng's experience.

Grief does.

"...My mother," he finally replies, his tone somewhat curt. "When I was young."

Pei nods, his hand lowering to rest against his leg, clutching the hairpin until it digs into his skin.

"...My mother was taken away from me when I was young, too," he admits, rubbing his thumb over the dragon carved into its face.

"She didn't pass until I was in my teens...but I never saw her again," Pei recalls softly. "Still...even before my father told me—I knew she was gone. I just...felt it."

That isn't entirely unheard of—even if it does leave Hua Cheng slightly surprised.

There have always been mortals who are slightly more sensitive to the barrier between life and death than others, even without training in cultivation.

Hua Cheng was one of them.

And he...never would have expected that from a god like General Pei Ming.

He isn't exactly known for being particularly perceptive outside of the battlefield—and most martial gods aren't. Xie Lian is an exception, not the rule.

"In all of my years...I've experienced almost every kind of grief there is," Pei Ming continues. "But...this is different."

His fingers tremble slightly—forcing him to press them down against his thigh until they stop.

"I...didn't feel it when he passed," he admits, his stomach churning with confusion and shame.

Because he should have felt it.

"And at first that gave me hope, but now..." Pei Ming stares ahead vacantly, his eyes glassy. "...I can't feel him anywhere."

It isn't an overemotional, weeping sort of confession. More like a quiet, yet profound statement of loss.

"Jun Wu says its denial. But...I've never struggled with that before."

Being a god of war, in many ways, is being a god of death. Pei Ming grew up surrounded by it. Has dealt with it. Felt its sting.

Even with Qing Yuan, as painful as that grief was—he never denied the fact that she was gone.

And the hairpin was just...

Something wasn't right.

Hua Cheng glances around them—finding that nearly everyone is asleep other than Shuo and Lang Qianqiu, who seem too utterly absorbed in irritating or ignoring one another to pay attention.

He has never had any difficulty when it comes to keeping out of the problems of others.

In general, it's not hard to remain uninvolved when you don't care.

But he remembers what He Xuan told him about Jun Wu. What he is . Who was most likely to have suffered from it. And he...

There are some things even he can't force himself to stomach.

"...Don't speak to the emperor about it anymore."

Pei Ming stiffens, his eyes snapping back to Hua Cheng, brows raising.

"Speak about what?"

Hua Cheng closes his eyes, leaning his head back against the wall.

"Anything that makes you vulnerable."

As he says that, his head slumps to the side, resting his cheek on top of Xie Lian’s head, where the prince is sleeping peacefully against his shoulder.

Pei watches the two—the small acts of genuine intimacy that seem to come so easily.

Such unusually profound trust.

“…You two didn’t meet on Mount Yu Jun, did you?”

Of course—Hua Cheng doesn't answer him. He doesn't even open his eyes or acknowledge the fact that Pei Ming asked.

But…

…He doesn't deny it, either.

When Xie Lian wakes up, it smells familiar.

Slightly wild—like a forest, just after the rain falls.

The kind of scent that calls memories forth, ringing in his ears.

'Dianxia! Did you see me—?'

Slowly, his eyes open—cursed shackles flickering dimly in the dark tunnel.

"…" his cheek is resting against something soft—warm.

If Xie Lian didn't know better, he would say he was dreaming, but… life had never been so kind.

He doesn't remember his dreams.

His fingers reach up, grasping the chain around his neck.

"…Good Morning," he whispers.

He's said that 255,833 times, always to the same person—even if Hong'er could never hear.

But for the first time, someone answers.

"Good morning, gege."

(Even if it's not him—and it never will be.)

"…How long was I asleep?" Xie Lian rasps, his voice slightly rough.

"Close to sixteen hours, give or take." The number startles Xie Lian, but…given the stress he's put on his body since coming here, maybe he shouldn't be surprised.

"Don't worry," Hua Cheng's voice is somewhat dry, staring at the group around them in annoyance.

"Gege really didn't miss anything."

Xie Lian was able to sleep soundly—if only because Hua Cheng created a magical barrier around his ears, keeping the annoying, loud nonsense from the others away from him.

“…Do we know how far we’ve traveled?”

“Close to 800 miles,” Yin Yu answers him quietly.

“…We’re actually nearing the foothills of Mount Tonglu,” Hua Cheng explains. “The imperial city of Wuyong is beneath us right now.”

After everything they’ve seen, Xie Lian almost doesn’t want to ask, but…

“…Do you think there’s another temple of the Crown Prince down there?”

“There is,” Hua Cheng confirms. “His grandest temple sat adjacent to the imperial residence.” Hua Cheng turns to look at him. “Would you like to stop and see, your highness?”

Xie Lian swallows hard, bracing himself—then nods.

Hua Cheng gives the silent order to Yin Yu, who immediately starts tunneling back down though the bottom of the passageway.

"There's going to be a drop."

That's the only real warning he gives the others, wrapping an arm around Xie Lian's waist as the tunnel opens up to the ground below—and Ren Song rolls his eyes, watching as he drops down with the prince in his arms.

"...I guess getting the rest of them down is my job, huh?"

Lang Qianqiu looks over at him, rubbing the fatigue out of his eyes after spending so many hours trapped in the dark mountain tunnels.

"How are you going to get us—AHHHHHHH!"

His question is cut off with a scream as the ground crumbles beneath them, sending them plummeting.

When Hua Cheng said there was a 'drop,' what he really meant was that they were already several hundred meters off of the ground—no longer digging out of the bottom of the mountain, but rather launching themselves off of an outcropping on the side.

Xie Lian had pressed his face into Hua Cheng's chest as they dropped to shield himself from the wind—but now he looks up, concerned.

"San Lang, don't you think we should—?"

"They'll be fine."

Lang Qianqiu and Yin Yu have spiritual devices they can fly on, but the others...

But, before any of them can plummet that far down—they find themselves caught by something rather solid.

Pei Ming glances down, almost comically unbothered by suddenly falling out of the sky—and tree boughs are wrapped around his middle, arresting his fall.

Similar branches have also stretched out to catch Pei Su and Banyue, easing them back towards the ground.

Lang Qianqiu hops off of his own sword, glancing over towards Shuo, watching him help the others down with a complicated expression, until he notices...

The ground is soft.

Sinking under the heavy material of his boots--and when he looks down to examine it...

He sees ash.

Several inches—maybe more than a foot deep, stretching for as far as the eye can see.

Covering an entire city, staining everything black.

Most of the roofs are caved in, making this place look far less pristine than any of the other villages or cities in Wuyong they've passed so far—which makes sense, given that it's so much closer to Mount Tonglu itself.

Only two buildings remain intact.

The palace—and the temple, standing side by side like long forgotten sentinels, looming over the barren landscape.

Shuo stares down at something on the ground beside his foot, then looks away.

A child's toy—petrified wood crumbling away beneath the ash.

"…General…"

Banyue looks up from where she's tending to Pei Su, visibly concerned.

"Pei Su gege isn't waking up."

That immediately catches the attention of Pei Ming, who kneels beside the two with concern.

"What do you mean, he isn't waking up?!"

"It isn't her fault," Xie Lian murmurs.

"Pei Su's body is the same as a mortal's right now. He's dehydrated and malnourished most likely—but he'll survive."

"…Wouldn't that be the case for you, too?" Lang Qianqiu is willing to say it out loud, while Hua Cheng turns his head away, his face dark.

"That's…different."

The underlying understanding being that Xie Lian is more than used to it by now—

And Hua Cheng strains under that ugly little reminder.

"…It might be for the best for Pei and Banyue to wait here," Xie Lian mutters, listening around. "It'll only be more dangerous ahead."

Pei Junior, that is—

Xie Lian doesn't like the idea of leaving Pei Ming on his own in a place like this. Not with his mental state being what it is—or the impact reuniting with Rong Guang seemed to have on him.

"…Are you sure, General Hua?" Banyue frowns, almost guilty.

But it's more than that.

"…" Xie Lian smiles, kneeling down beside her as he places a hand on top of her head.

“You’ll see me again soon,” he promises her gently. “It won’t be as long as it was last time.”

Her relief is unspoken, a shaky sigh and trembling lips.

"...Alright," she agrees, holding Pei Su against her side. "I'll find us shelter, and we'll wait there."

"Don't feed him any more scorpion snakes," Shuo warns her sternly. "Just use the rest of what I already made, understand?"

"...I understand, Ren Song gege," She mumbles, bowing her head in agreement.

"We'll send someone to come get you two when this is over," Xie Lian assures them both as they set off deeper into the city. "It won't be long."

General Pei raises an eyebrow, staring at the back of Xie Lian's head—but he waits until they're out of earshot ask;

"...You sound rather sure of that, your highness. Just how soon do you think this matter will be dealt with?"

Xie Lian stares ahead blindly, grim.

"Two days."

After hearing Mei Nianqing's words before, speaking to the mountain spirit, he's nearly certain of it.

Something is arriving to the Kiln by then. A prince—and a child is going to be in danger.

Whatever they're facing—Xie Lian senses it will come then.

But, considering how long he slept...

"Actually—more like one."

And Xie Lian couldn't have known it then.

That the world will be different for him tomorrow. And every single day that comes afterwards.

That today, in so many ways, is the last day.

"...Then we should move quickly," Hua Cheng mutters, holding Xie Lian's hand firmly as he pulls him toward the Grand Temple of Wuyong, its ruins jutting sharply into the sky.

Pei Ming, Lang Qianqiu, and Ren Song follow behind, the latter noticing;

"...Has anyone seen Yin Yu?"

Hua Cheng looks around, then presses his fingertips to his temple, silently checking in his communication ray.

"...He's probably fine," the ghost king finally concludes with a shrug, continuing on.

"Probably?"

"He hasn't sent out a distress call—it can't be that serious."

Xie Lian doesn't know if he would agree with that, given that he also just so happens to have Quan Yizhen's daruma doll in his possession, but...

When they step inside the final temple, he finds himself stopping, feeling his foot bumping into something...

Solid—like an oddly shaped rock sitting in the middle of the entrance to the temple. Which seems counterintuitive—even as Hua Cheng simply guides him around it, Pei Ming stops to examine the formation, his face growing pale as he notices others like it.

"Are these...bodies?"

Just from the poses, Pei Ming would have mistaken them for statues, but...

No sculptor would leave them so rough and uneven, and the closer he looks, the more agonized and petrified their positions seem to be.

"...There were over half a million people living here before."

The City of Gu was once one of the most prosperous cities in the ancient world—and the largest of the seven great cities of Wuyong.

Most of its citizens had not fled, prior to the greatest of Tonglu's eruptions—believing that they would be saved.

Men, women, and children alike died in their homes. In the streets.

Fleeing and hiding within the temple of the god who promised to protect them.

"...This is what happens when volcanic ash hits a mortal body," Hua Cheng explains quietly, stopping Xie Lian from touching it.

"Careful, gege—every body within the realm of Mount Tonglu rapidly develops corpse poison."

Even if the remains trapped within are long gone—the curse remains.

"...Oh," Xie Lian pulls his hands back with a nod.

"I'm already immune to most poisons at this point—I've accidentally poisoned myself enough times."

Xie Lian often tries to reassure Hua Cheng by saying things like that—and every single time, he only seems to send a dark cloud of dismay over him.

The prince used to be utterly oblivious to that—but now, he's gained a certain amount of awareness. Enough to force a bright—if not slightly inappropriate, given their surroundings—smile at Hua Cheng before straightening up, feeling along the walls for another mural.

Hua Cheng and Pei Ming share a brief moment of mutually irritated eye contact as the prince continues to look around, and behind them...Shuo notices something else.

Most of what was once furnishing the temple, like its worshippers, has been reduced to ash and rubble.

But there's one thing that isn't stained with soot, or crumbling with decay—still bearing the enchantment from centuries, no, millennia before.

A protection charm.

Clutched in the charred form of a long dead believer.

"...Chengzhu..." He mumbles, kneeling down. "...Can you read what this says?" He barely manages to pry the charm free without ripping it, handing it over to Hua Cheng's waiting palm.

The calamity stares down at the bright yellow paper, characters painted in gold—and he frowns.

"...The Saint Born Under a Cursed Star."

As he reads the words aloud, Xie Lian's fingers go still against the wall, pressing inward. "...San Lang! It's over here!"

E'Ming immediately rushes forward, slashing against the wall with a—

CLANG!

Before, whenever the scimitar slashed at the layer of ash, it would come down from the wall in a solid slab—almost like peeling the lid back from a coffin.

But not this time.

At first, nothing happens. The edge of the blade digs into the wall, vibrating—but nothing moves.

Shuo waits for the usual—Hua Cheng smacking the blade around, scorning it for being so useless—but the ghost king says nothing, his arms crossed.

Like he's waiting for something.

Slowly, all four walls of the temple begin to rumble, dust falling from the ceiling in sheets.

Finally, it all comes crumbling down in piles of ash and volcanic glass—leaving the group crowding towards the center of the temple to avoid it.

Everyone except for Xie Lian that is, easily sheltered beneath Hua Cheng's umbrella.

"..." Lang Qianqiu whips his head around, having not seen the temples before this one—so startled that he takes a step back, instinctively reaching for Shuo's elbow.

The forest demon stares at the place where his hand is gripping him, but...

He doesn't complain, either.

"...San Lang?" Xie Lian murmurs, swallowing down his nerves. "What do they say?"

"..." Hua Cheng turns to the first wall, clearing his throat. "...It's the cliff from the first mural, your highness."

A cliff on the path leading toward the Kiln.

The same cliff that countless numbers of people were being thrown from, screaming as they crashed toward the bottom of the valley below.

"...The child from the other murals we saw—the one who was being mistreated..." Hua Cheng takes a slow breath. "He's being thrown from it."

"...What?" Xie Lian questions, surprised by how...startled he is to hear that. "By who?"

"...Bai Wuxiang, I would presume," Hua Cheng mutters, stepping closer to the wall. "Or someone wearing the same mask."

Xie Lian presses his palm flat against the wall—and he feels it.

The face of a screaming teenager, painted over stone—plunging towards his death.

But...none of it makes any sense.

If the prince in the murals is Bai Wuxiang...why was the other boy with the same face treated so terribly?

And why was he killed?

In a strange way—it feels almost as though the conversation he heard from Mei Nianqing in the belly of the Mountain Spirit wasn't about what would happen—but events that had already occurred.

Because here's Bai Wuxiang—a prince—sending a child to his death from the Kiln.

Regardless—the child Mei Nianqing spoke of couldn't have been Bai Wuxiang, he—

The muscles in Xie Lian's jaw work as he reaches down to squeeze his right hand, stopping it from trembling.

Bai Wuxiang is dead.

He can't be a danger to anyone. Not anymore.

Hua Cheng turns his head to look at the other murals, quietly explaining them to Xie Lian—as he has every other time.

They show memories he's seen before, through the eyes of the last Queen of Wuyong.

Bai Wuxiang's ascension. The prophecy of the fall of Wuyong.

All of his attempts to stop it—and finally…

The bridge.

It's hard for Hua Cheng to look at that sparkling golden image now, this idyllic plan that, in the end, was a horrific display of ego.

He can't see it now, without remembering Zhao Beitong's son plunging into darkness.

"…How could he have even attempted that?" Xie Lian mutters, shaking his head. "The only way he could have taken the people of Wuyong to the heavens would have been by appointing all of them as deputies…"

Saving everyone would have been impossible.

Not with even just the imperial city, much less the entire country.

Even a god of Jun Wu's strength couldn't appoint more than a few thousand deputies.

The very same god who was able to slaughter Bai Wuxiang on the streets lining Lang'er Bay, thousands of years later.

The bridge Hua Cheng goes on to describe in the next mural seems even more ludicrous.

The idea that one god could sustain such a single structure single-handedly feels like a fool's errand.

Even if…

In his youth, Xie Lian would have tried the same thing.

He stops next to the mural in question, feeling the edges of the bridge with his fingertips.

Remembering being a teenager, holding the pavilion on Mount

Taicang up by himself.

Only his mother standing beside him, holding an umbrella over his head.

Even on that smaller scale of difficulty, it felt like carrying the weight of the entire world.

All alone.

And maybe, if he hadn't known what Bai Wuxiang would become, he would feel something more than sickness now.

Not disgust.

That word is too shallow to describe it.

Xie Lian isn't disconnected enough from Bai Wuxiang's actions to regard them with disdain or distant moral outrage.

No.

He feels every scar. Every loss. Every invasive, lingering memory of the demon's impact upon his life.

Most of it, Xie Lian could accept and move on from.

He broke the rules of Heaven by descending to Xianle. The war—the plague—

Those are his responsibility to bear. Jun Wu warned him of the dangers enough times. Tried to protect him. To guide him.

But Xie Lian had been arrogant.

An arrogant, over confident, ungrateful child.

Maybe he could even forgive Bai Wuxiang for that night in the temple, or—

Forgive is the wrong word.

Maybe Xie Lian could let go of that night. Could speak like it happened to someone else, and actually mean it.

But there is one thing that he'll never forget.

That day.

Over 255,833 days ago.

Kneeling on the forest floor as the snow began to fall.

Feeling his heart die, leaving a disloyal, immortal body behind.

All from feeling a pair of boots beneath his hand.

Familiar.

Because he knew them.

He made them.

Xie Lian reaches up, grasping the ring hanging around his neck tightly, until his knuckles grow white.

Hong'er.

For as long as Xie Lian remains in this world—and long after he leaves it—

He won't forget what they did to Hong'er.

What they took from him.

Behind him Hua Cheng reaches up with a small wince, rubbing the back of his neck.

"…Gege, are you alright?"

Xie Lian pulls his hand back from the mural, curling his fingers into a fist.

"…Yes," he mutters, turning away. "I'm sorry."

Pei Ming watches them both, thinking.

"…If the Prince of Wuyong was Bai Wuxiang…" He murmurs, glancing from the falling child, to the cataclysmic events that followed—he wonders. "…Do you think he killed the other child in order to gain the power to save his kingdom?"

Xie Lian swallows hard.

"…Maybe."

"I didn't see anything like that in his wife's memories," Hua Cheng shakes his head, watching the painted faces with a distant glare. "Maybe they weren't connected events."

"Or," General Pei sends him a curious look, "Zhao Beitong didn't know everything her husband got up to."

Hua Cheng doesn't reply—but he still doubts it.

Of Bai Wuxiang's many methods of controlling those around him—he doesn't necessarily go out of his way to completely erase events.

He'll reframe them. Switch details.

Or, force others to keep his secrets for him.

Through guilt, through shame—

Or something as maddeningly simple as stealing a name.

If the truth can be found, Hua Cheng suspects it's hiding in plain sight.

Shuo walks along the edges of the temple hall silently, looking at huddled forms of stone.

Some of them so small.

It's hard.

To be in a place like this. A land drenched in the blood of children, knowing that you're the last one standing.

Even among the dead.

He turns his head to stare down a dark corridor, knowing that even more bodies probably wait in the levels below.

Women and children most likely, fleeing the molten ash falling from the sky, only to suffocate from the smoke underground.

Turning the Aqueducts and catacombs beneath Wuyong into the largest graveyard in history.

Every breath here feels heavy, almost weighed down with death.

When he stares down that corridor, leading into the dark—he almost feels it.

Like a heavy, oppressive presence.

In one blink, it’s like staring into an endless, dark abyss.

And in the next, something is staring back at him.

Beady red eyes, gleaming in the shadows.

Xie Lian and Hua Cheng turn around when they hear a terrified shriek, the latter far more concerned, because—

Shuo doesn’t scare easily.

And when the ghost king looks—it’s just in time to see a rat lunge from the darkness.

One the size of a man , fangs glinting viciously.

Shuo scrambles backwards, having fallen down in a rare state of panic, pushing back with his feet—and he gives the creature one hard kick in the jaw with the heel of his boot, making it stagger briefly.

By the time it recovers, a blade pierces it through the neck.

Shuo shudders as the blood splatters across his cheeks, Lang Qianqiu standing over him as he yanks the blade out, kicking the dying creature back down the dark hall from where it came.

"What the hell was that?!"

Hua Cheng appears behind them, pulling Shuo up by the arm as they back away from the corridor.

"...The rats here spend years feeding upon the dead," he explains, summoning E'Ming back to its scabbard. "It left them slightly...mutated."

"Mutated?!" Lang Qianqiu glares. "They've turned into monsters!"

"...They weren't that big last time," Shuo whispers hoarsely, wiping the blood off of his face with the end of his sleeve.

He's never liked rats.

Back in Xianle, when the bodies fell too quickly to bury, they became rampant.

It wasn't uncommon for Shuo to wake up to Bao chasing them away from his bed, making sure they didn't take a bite out of him while he slept.

But the rats in Mount Tonglu...

In those years he spent hanging from that tree—he listened as they devoured countless souls.

Back then, they were the size of dogs at most—and they were still terrifying. But now...

The forest demon continues scrambling backwards on the floor, watching the dark corridor in terror as more sets of eyes begin to appear.

"...They travel in packs," he croaks.

E'Ming flashes forward, from Hua Cheng's hip, disappearing down the corridor as it slashes through unseen enemies, the rest of the group retreating back towards the temple exit.

"...There are hundreds of them!" Xie Lian shouts, listening to the sounds of their feet, scurrying.

Pei Ming shoves Lang Qianqiu and Ren Song out the door ahead of him, sending a bolt of energy down the hall after the rats—likely incinerating a few of them, but not all.

"Are Pei Su and Banyue safe where they are?!"

"Probably," Hua Cheng mutters. "But I can't guarantee it."

"...You go back and check on them," Xie Lian places a hand on the general's arm as they run down the steps. "Have Banyue keep her scorpion snakes nearby—that should keep them away."

"And tell them to move to one of the roofs," Shuo calls after them. "They hate sunlight!"

Pei Ming peels off from the rest of them, returning from where they came, and Xie Lian pauses, his head whipping to the right—shackles gleaming as he stares into the distance.

"...Everyone—jump onto the temple roof!"

Hua Cheng is the first to obey without question, wrapping an arm around the prince's waist as he leaps up, bringing Xie Lian with him—and Shuo and Lang Qianqiu are quick to follow.

"San Lang," Xie Lian whispers, motioning for the rest of them to get down and lay low.

"Can you make a communication array for the four of us? I would, but I don't have enough..."

"Does gege need to borrow more?" Hua Cheng offers, always courteous—and Xie Lian almost agrees, until he remembers the other two on the roof with them.

"No—it's better if you do it."

Hua Cheng smiles faintly, doing as asked, speaking into the newly formed array—

'It's done, your highness.'

Xie Lian nods, speaking to the others.

'Lay low and be quiet—someone is coming, and I'd rather observe than get into a fight.'

'...Do you know who it is? ' Shuo asks.

'I recognize the aura,' Xie Lian nods.

An angry, pulsing shade of resentment—burning red. One that Xie Lian hasn't seen in some time.

(And he can't help but feel silently relieved that he sent Pei away.)

In the streets below, a figure rounds the corner.

Thump...

There's a thudding sound as she walks. Slamming one boot forward into the ground—dragging one useless, limp leg behind her as she walks.

Thump...

Ding...Ding…

A small, ornamental bell rings against her belt—

Part of her wedding gown.

Xie Lian recognized Xuan Ji from the minute he heard her familiar gait, turning his head to catch sight of her aura—the same sight as when he was on Mount Yu Jun.

His curiosity is dampened, however, when he hears a familiar voice coming from down below.

"Jiejie..." Guzi whines, holding onto her sleeve as he stumbles along beside her. "I don't feel so good..."

The sight of the child makes both Shuo and Lang Qianqiu stiffen, concerned for the child. After all—they both had plenty of time to bond with him in Puqi shrine.

Xie Lian holds a hand up, keeping them both silent.

'We can move in if she makes a move to harm him—but if she knows we're here, she might take him hostage.' Or, knowing her vindictive nature—she might kill the boy just to get a rise out of them.

But...

'San Lang, I thought you said Guzi was in Ghost City?'

'...He was supposed to be,' Hua Cheng agrees, audibly displeased. 'He must have been initially—or else Yin Yu would have reported otherwise.'

'Do you think Xuan Ji abducted him?' Lang Qianqiu frowns. 'But why would she?'

'That's not possible,' Shuo peeks his head over to get a better look at them, his stomach churning when he watches how Guzi clutches onto the deceased general's hand. 'No one can be abducted from Paradise Manor.'

'What do you mean?'

'There's a spell on every door that protects against thievery,' Shuo explains. 'But guests are under Hua Chengzhu's protection. They don't leave unless it's of their own free will. And Xuan Ji wouldn't have been able to enter, anyway.'

Lang Qianqiu frowns, trying to understand.

'...Why not?'

'Anyone can enter the throne room of Paradise Manor,' Hua Cheng finally replies, his eye scanning their environment for possible threats. 'But no one can enter beyond that unless I allow it.'

Which leaves one blinding mystery.

How did Guzi manage to leave Paradise Manor? And why is either one of them here?

'...Do you think Xuan Ji is making her way to the Kiln?' Xie Lian asks quietly—and Shuo shakes his head.

'She's way too weak for that. She's only dangerous because she works for Qi Rong.'

And considering how lowly Hua Cheng and Ren Song regard the Night Touring Green Lantern—Xie Lian supposes that does leave her pretty far down the ladder.

'...There's something about that I don't understand,' Xie Lian murmurs, watching her aura as she walks down the street. 'If Xuan Ji works for Qi Rong—why is her aura so much stronger than his?'

Not only that—but Xie Lian genuinely struggled to deal with her on Mount Yu Jun.

Granted—back then, he had still been recovering from the Battle of Gusu, sick and wounded, but...

She isn't harmless.

'...That is a mystery to me as well,' Hua Cheng admits. 'Qi Rong has never been able to command high level ghosts up until now, either.'

And Xuan Ji isn't the only one.

After their encounter at the Inn...It became clear that Cuocuo—the fetal spirit—was the one singing.

It's even more surreal to him now, knowing that the spirit is Feng Xin's son, and the very same voice he heard that night on Mount Yu Jun.

'New bride, new bride...'

How could Qi Rong, whom Xie Lian can suppress easily, command both of them?

Guzi clutches Xuan Ji's sleeve a little tighter as he trudges along, pale and thin.

"…I think there was something wrong with that water, jiejie…"

Xuan Ji sends him an annoyed look, flicking her hair over her shoulder. "What? You're fine! Keep walking…'

She drags him along, not stopping until they reach the only other intact building around;

The Palace of Wuyong.

The four of them creep along the roof, carefully leaping from one building to the next—

And Xie Lian's heart immediately sinks.

'…There are other mortals here.'

Lang Qianqiu stiffens. 'There are? How many?'

Xie Lian tilts his head forward, silently tracking the number of heartbeats he can hear.

'…Around eight or so.'

But from the stench of blood coming from within the palace…

Xie Lian suspects it used to be more than that.

And when he sees that all too familiar, acidic green aura in the darkness below—he can already guess what happened.

"…Papa!" Guzi cries out in dismay upon entering the ruins of the ancient throne room. "You shouldn't eat weird things like that anymore! It's bad for you!"

And of course—that shrill, cursing voice, one that Xie Lian is all too familiar with, replies with—

"Damn it, Xuan Ji! You couldn't have kept him away a little longer?! I was almost done!"

"He wouldn't stop complaining!" The female ghost snaps. "What was I supposed to do?!"

“Don’t you have any motherly instincts?!” Qi Rong wipes the blood from his mouth, irritated. “Just entertain him while I’m busy!”

“…Why are you traveling around with this child, Anyway?” Xuan Ji grumbles, letting go of Guzi’s hand with a distasteful look.

“Ain’t that obvious?!” Qi Rong drops the bone he was previously gnawing on, gesturing towards Guzi. “Children have the most tender flesh there is!”

“…Then why haven’t you eaten him yet?”

Xie Lian has been wondering the same thing himself—But Qi Rong simply cackles in reply.

“Because! The little fucker likes calling me dad, and I find it amusing!” He tossed the bone down next to a growing pile of human remains. “You don’t have to give a calm about someone to let them live a little longer. Just look at me and Ren Song.”

He picks at the dried blood beneath his nails, rolling his eyes.

“He’s had plenty of chances to get rid of this ancestor. Not because the brat is any good, that asshole Hua Cheng’s always giving him an unfair leg up!”

Shuo rolls his eyes from beside Xie Lian on the roof.

Qi Rong has been reduced back to a ghost fire by Hua Cheng so many times—his strength is hardly notable.

But there’s nothing he loves more than talking about himself—how strong he is, how unfair and jealous everyone else is.

“But that little shit won’t ever get rid of me—‘cause if he does, he might disperse.”

Qi Rong makes a snapping motion with his fingers—and Shuo looks slightly less self assured than he did before.

“…Really?” Xuan Ji pauses, startled. “How are the two connected?”

“I killed his big brother, remember?” Qi Rong yawns, picking at his teeth. “Once I’m dead, the resentment that’s been tethering him to this world might disappear.”

A ghost doesn’t necessarily need resentment to remain in this world—

but they do need drive.

A purpose.

Between Yanlin and Bao, Shuo was always the strongest of the three ghost children—and he had a reason to remain.

Looking out for them.

With both of them gone—his tether holding him to this world became far weaker than it was before.

But his resentment skyrocketed.

“He didn’t become Autumn Twilight Shrouding Forests until AFTER this ancestor did a number on him,” Qi Rong crows, always eager to take credit for the achievements of others.

“…If you think about it, I had a hand in both him AND Crimson Rain getting where they are. HA!”

Both Xie Lian and Hua Cheng stiffen at that.

One from confusion, the other from anger.

“…You helped make Hua Cheng gege a ghost king?” Guzi gasps, his eyes round. “How did you do that?”

Qi Rong snickers, his expression smug.

“That’s a secret!”

Of course, he’d say it like that. Making it sound like he’s choosing to keep his cards close to his chest, rather than admit that he can’t say.

“…” Xuan Ji half kneels, hampered by her wounded leg. “My lord Qi Rong truly is impressive.”

The green ghost looks at her, pleased.

“…You’ve served me well these last few decades, General. When all of this is over and I have Pei Ming in chains, I’ll cut off his cock and give it to you to play with.”

Xie Lian grimaces at the crassness, and Xuan Ji grins widely to show her delight, shaking her head.

“If my Lord could just give him to me intact…that would be more than enough payment for my service,” Xuan Ji promises, looking over to count their human prisoners once again.

“…Say, did you pick up another one while I was gone? Why is he covered in resentment?”

Shuo and Hua Cheng exchange silent looks, the former dropping down the side of the roof, claws digging into the wall as he peeks through the window, glancing into the rooms below.

What he finds is an abandoned great hall, broken tiles forming an ancient mosaic on the floor.

Forming the shape of a sun, its rays now streaked with long dried blood and ash.

Sitting at the top of the dais, upon what once must have been an elaborate throne, is Qi Rong. Slumped to the side, his legs kicked over the arm.

And lined against the wall, are…humans.

Farmers from the look of it. Clothes well made, but worn.

The one who Xuan Ji indicated lifts his head, his voice calm.

“Lord Rain Master has me give rice to hungry ghosts when they pass through her territory. I suppose I picked up the essence of evil from them.”

‘…I suppose that’s where Yin Yu went,’ Xie Lian mutters into the communication array. ‘Qi Rong must have captured him when we fell from the mountain spirit.’

Shuo hadn’t guided him down with the others, assuming he would use the earth master’s shovel to fly to safety.

The other farmers from the kingdom of the Rain Master seem to be more than aware that he isn’t one of them, signing to one another silently—but no one says a word to contradict him.

“…Well I’M a hungry ghost too, ain’t I?” Qi Rong grumbles, crossing his arms.

"But look at the kind of treatment I get! Chased halfway across the damn continent, and all I took was a few measly farmers!"

"She doesn't actually care about them," Xuan Ji scowls, her voice turning even more vicious. "She just likes looking like a little hero."

Xie Lian turns his head to Hua Cheng, surprised by the female ghost's tone. '...Wasn't Xuan Ji a general of Yushi? Why would she speak of someone from her own Kingdom so harshly?'

'She also sold out her kingdom in an attempt to keep Pei Ming's affections,' Hua Cheng reminds him.

'Not to mention that Yushi Huang has a history with Pei Ming herself,' Shuo points out from where he's hanging on the side of the roof, and when Xie Lian and Hua Cheng both look at him, he shrugs. 'I saw memories from Rong Guang and that sword when they were in my array.'

'...If that's Hua Cheng's assistant down there, shouldn't we be more concerned with trying to get him out? ' Lang Qianqiu grumbles, the first to display any real concern for Yin Yu.

' You forget—he has Qi Ying's daruma doll with him,' Hua Cheng shrugs. 'If he wasn't too proud to deal with him, he'd have escaped already.'

Pride is an interesting word to use. After everything Xie Lian saw in the former god's memories, he had assumed that his reaction was from shame, but...

Pride and Shame are siblings, not strangers.

You can't have one without the other.

"...Dad," Guzi's voice drifts up to them from the throne room. "How come all of these people aren't running away? They aren't tied up."

"Huh?" Qi Rong glances over at the farmers with a sly, self satisfied grin. "Ah! They're all too scared to move, because of a spell your dad put on them."

Guzi gawks up at him, his mouth hanging open with awe.

"...YOU'RE THAT AMAZING?!"

Xie Lian bites back a groan, his face falling into his hands.

Qi Rong needs many things. A reality check. Maybe even an executioner.

But not validation.

"Sure!" Qi Rong agrees delightedly, sitting up slightly in his throne. "Your dad has ALWAYS been better than any of those other idiotic fuckers calling themselves GHOST KINGS!"

Hua Cheng rolls his eye, but exhibits no other reaction as Shuo crawls back onto the roof.

“And once this ancestor passes this trial—they’ll BOTH be bowing to ME!” He smacks a hand against his chest for emphasis, his eyes gleaming with vicious pride. “THEY’LL ALL SEE!”

‘…If we’re going to get the other humans away from them, it’ll be easier to do if we get Xuan Ji away from here,’ Xie Lian mutters.

He doesn’t doubt that they could deal with her, but there’s no guarantee that the farmers would escape unharmed.

Xie Lian doesn’t need to explicitly explain to Hua Cheng what the best way to lure her away would be.

He already almost successfully used a similar trick on Ke Mo, back when they were fighting against him and Rong Guang.

Xuan Ji, however, requires something more compelling.

Hua Cheng flicks two of his fingers, the edge of one of his vambraces glowing as a silver butterfly leaps forth, almost like it’s bursting through the surface of a still lake, drifting down to the rafters of the throne room below.

It’s a simple matter to connect this butterfly to one that was left with Pei when he left to check on the others, and just like that—

“…Both of you should be safe here.”

Pei’s voice is echoing throughout the room, and Xuan Ji goes completely still—stiff as a board.

“…Did you hear that?” She whispers, whipping her head back and forth, the chiffon of her bridal veil twisted about her neck.

“Hah?” Qi Rong frowns, cupping his hand next to his ear. “What are you talkin’ about?!”

“IT’S PEI!” she shrieks, face contorted. “HE’S HERE!”

“…What?” Qi Rong frowns, looking around. “What are you on about now?! Someone's just tryin' to mess with ya!"

For once—he's completely correct, but…

"Thank you, General…" Banyue's voice soon follows, drifting through the air, and the sound of a young woman with Pei Ming…

…It completely sets her off.

"HE'S HERE!" Xuan Ji scrambles out of the great hall, half running, dragging her injured leg behind her as the butterfly flutters off into the street, luring her away. "I CAN SENSE HIM! I'LL TEAR HIM APART!"

Xie Lian winces.

'…You don't think Pei will be in any danger, do you?'

'The butterfly is going in the opposite direction of where he and the others are,' Hua Cheng assures him. 'They should be fine.'

Xie Lian nods, relieved, just as Qi Rong begins to grumble.

"That stupid bitch is OBSESSED!"

He tears at his hair with frustration. "She just hears the name PEI and she flies off the handle! She's LUCKY I can handle this group of weaklings on my own, that FUCKER!"

"…Dad?" Guzi looks up from where he's been hand chopping Qi Rong's legs (at his request), curious.

"Yeah?" Qi Rong grumbles, nearly kicking him in the face in his irritation. "What do you want?!"

"All of these people," Guzi stares around at the farmers with wide eyes. "How does the spell you put on them work?"

"…Oh," Qi Rong sits up on his elbows, eager to boast. "See those green lights on their heads?" Qi Rong sends a careless wave in their direction, watching the way the farmers shrink, turning away from him in fear—a smirk spreading across his face.

"Yeah?"

"Well, when your old man gives the signal—BOOM!" He claps his hands. "They all go up in flames! Even if that fucker Hua Cheng was here—there'd be NOTHING HE COULD DO ABOUT IT!" Qi Rong cackles. "The spell can only be lifted if you know the password! It's PERFECT! SO PERFECT!"

His laughter echoes across the walls, and Guzi tilts his head.

"…What kind of password?"

The green ghost snickers, leaning forward to whisper it in the child's ear.

Guzi's eyes grow round, and he repeats him innocently—

"…Dog fucker Xie Lian?"

"…" Xie Lian wipes a hand down his face, exasperated, and Hua Cheng's expression grows dark.

"HA! GOOD BOY! THAT'S EXACTLY—!"

CRASH!

Qi Rong falls silent when a large, glass window—one of the only left intact—shatters, four figures dropping through it, landing in front of him.

"…" Guzi's face lights up, just as Qi Rong grows pale. "Shuo gege!"

The forest demon sends Qi Rong a sharp look, extending his arms to Guzi, who runs straight to him.

Hua Cheng takes an angry step in the green ghost's direction, but is stopped by a palm placed against his chest.

"Qi Rong," Xie Lian crosses his arms. "How is this going to go?"

His cousin glares back at him, visibly irritated.

"The hell is that supposed to mean?! YOU'RE THE ONES WHO BUSTED IN WHEN THIS ANCESTOR WAS—"

"Are you going to let them go," Xie Lian continues, not in the mood to waste any more time than he already has. "Or, are we fighting?"

"…" Qi Rong's eyes flicker to Hua Cheng, holding back for the moment—if only on Xie Lian's silent request. Then, to Ren Song and Lang Qianqiu, each of them glaring at him venomously.

Ironically, he has all of those with the greatest grudges against him gathered in one room.

“If you even try it, I’ll just set off the spell!” He sneers, holding his fingers up in a warning motion.

Xie Lian sighs, wishing he could send the farmers a sympathetic look; any form of comfort—but he can’t.

“…It’s either that, or being eaten by you,” he points out. “Which do you think they would prefer?”

The farmers look at one another—then shrug, seeming to come to an agreement, gesturing to each other with their hands.

“…We’d prefer going quickly if he’s going to eat us anyway, actually.”

“Understandably,” Xie Lian agrees.

Then, he addresses Qi Rong directly once more.

“There’s not an outcome where you’re going to be able to eat them. Xuan Ji isn’t here to protect you. So, what’s it going to be?”

Qi Rong glares at him, his lips twisting into a frustrated frown.

“…Fine, you heard the password! YOU LET THEM GO YOURSELF!”

Hua Cheng grinds his teeth, taking another step forward.

“Dog fucker Xie Lian,” the prince states calmly, taking another step towards Qi Rong. “Dog fucker Xie Lian.”

Another step.

“Dog fucker Xie Lian.”

Another.

“Dog fucker Xie Lian.”

The prince stops, standing before the rotting throne of a would-be usurper.

He can’t see Qi Rong’s eyes—and still, the green ghost shrinks when those shackles gleam down at him.

"Aren't you going to laugh?" Xie Lian prompts him calmly. "That was the joke, wasn't it? It only works if you're the one who says it."

He leans over him, not a particularly large man himself—but still, he towers over Qi Rong.

"…You…" The green ghost shrinks back into the throne, limbs scrambling. "YOU WOULDN'T HARM THIS BODY!"

He searches Xie Lian's face, trying to see if his cousin is bluffing, but—

Qi Rong genuinely can't tell.

All he finds in those eyes is quiet contempt.

"IF YOU DO, THAT BRAT WILL—!"

He falls abruptly silent, noticing small sparks of light from behind Xie Lian.

Shuo is holding Guzi against his side with one arm, and with the other, his fingers dance before the child's eyes, sending small sparks of illusion into his senses.

A simple spell, but he can't see what's going on.

He can't hear , either.

"Did you think I hadn't noticed?"

Qi Rong is so quick to scramble away, he falls from his throne. Halfway strewn down the steps, pushing away with his feet, glaring up at him.

"You don't have a heartbeat anymore, Qi Rong."

He's already drained the body of Guzi's father dry, using it as nothing more than a husk.

"There's no human in there for me to hurt, Qi Rong," Xie Lian explains calmly. "It's just you."

"…You think I'm scared of you?" Qi Rong sneers, pushing himself back up the steps toward the throne with his hands, hair falling in his face. "You're PATHETIC! A DISGRACE!"

"You think so?" Xie Lian replies, unbothered—even as Hua Cheng's hands ball into fists behind him, his jaw locked.

“IF I’M SO MUCH LOWER THAN YOU, THEN WHY ARE YOU THE ONE IN CHAINS?!”

Lang Qianqiu shakes his head vehemently, rolling up his sleeves. “You SHUT YOUR—!”

Xie Lian kneels before Qi Rong, and in a rare instance, their faces are level with one another.

The prince lifts his hand to his throat, pulling Ruoye aside until the cursed shackle around his neck is visible.

The shackles in his eyes have always been considered beautiful.

But no one could say that about the shackle around his neck.

Angry, twisting marks—the color of soot, carved deep into his skin.

Ever present, always constricting.

The shackle that binds his spiritual power.

“I wear these chains because I need them,” Xie Lian answers simply.

“I could cause harm without them.”

Because Xie Lian—

He breaks things.

Even when he doesn’t mean to.

He can’t stop breaking things.

“But you…” Xie Lian shakes his head. “In all of this time, you’re still just words.”

“I’VE CAUSED COUNTLESS DEATHS, I—!”

“No,” Xie Lian isn’t interested in indulging any more self delusion. “It’s not you, Qi Rong.”

His cousin tries to stand up, but a palm presses on his chest, shoving him down.

“You’re only dangerous when someone powerful is using you as a pawn.”

Back then, it was Bai Wuxiang.

Xie Lian has never regarded Qi Rong as anything other than an offensive murder weapon.

Not Hong’er’s actual killer.

“…YOU HAVEN’T CHANGED AT ALL!” Qi Rong squirms, incensed. “ALWAYS LOOKING DOWN ON ME! PERFECT XIE LIAN, SO NOBLE! SO KIND!”

He twists his head around, veins bulging in his temples as he attempts to wriggle out from underneath Xie Lian’s hand.

“It makes me SO FUCKING SICK!”

“You haven’t changed either,” Xie Lian agrees, not particularly riled by his words.

“That never surprised me before. Up until recently, I didn’t think you were capable of guilt. Or empathy.”

His hand presses down just a little harder, drawing a wheeze from his cousin.

“Then, I saw the way you reacted to Mu Qing in that Inn.”

Even now, when Xie Lian mentions his friend’s name—Qi Rong doesn’t say a word.

The man who always has an insult.

Who normally wouldn’t even hesitate to make a grotesque remark at the expense of a victim to get a rise out of him.

The man who gloated/about torturing Hong’er.

He can’t even lift his head when Xie Lian says Mu Qing’s name.

“…You can feel remorse,” the prince concludes. “Which means you could have changed.”

“…Changed?!” Qi Rong sneers. “Who says I ever wanted—?!”

“You.”

Xie Lian's reply reduces him to stunned silence.

"Always wanting everyone's admiration and approval. To be accepted. You want these things, and you've had countless chances to change over the centuries, but…" Xie Lian shakes his head, rising to his feet.

"Part of you has always known it would start eating you alive if you tried to look it all in the eye, hasn't it?"

Hua Cheng is barely holding back his own anger, but—

For the first time, Shuo sees something beneath all of those layers of bravado.

Pain.

Genuine suffering.

And he didn't—

Seeing that in Qi Rong's eyes doesn't make Shuo want to forgive him for what happened to Bao.

It doesn't even make Shuo pity him at all.

But even acknowledging that there is anything human about Qi Rong at all makes him sick .

"…What's the point of this?!"

Qi Rong hisses, staring up at him. "You think convincing me I have a conscience is going to make me let those humans go?! YOU THINK I CARE?!"

"No," Xie Lian shakes his head. "I'm explaining."

"Explaining WHAT?!"

"Why I won't feel guilty for what I do to you."

It's not exactly a threat—not when he has every intention of actually doing it.

And yet, Qi Rong still seems to be in disbelief.

"…And just what do you think YOU'RE going to do?! You can't—!"

He quiets again when Xie Lian reaches over his shoulder, drawing Fangxin.

A sword Qi Rong knows all too well. The same one that…

The memory already would have been fresh in his mind, even without Xie Lian saying—

“Do you think I need my sight to hurt you, Qi Rong?”

The same words Xie Lian said to him that night.

Back when he—

Qi Rong starts to scramble backward again, nearly tripping over his own feet in his efforts to get away, but—

He doesn’t get far.

Ruoye slithers away from Xie Lian’s neck, wriggling across the floor until it shoots upward—Wrapping around Qi Rong.

Squeezing until he collapses.

Qi Rong twists around until he's on his back, feet kicking uselessly, staring up at his cousin as he approaches, fangxin dragging across the ground as he walks.

Xie Lian's expression is calm—not holding a single emotion.

Not the hatred or the rage it had...that night.

But Qi Rong can still remember.

Hanging from the ceiling. Begging for his life. All as his cousin, the one he used to adore, who he used to look up to the way he had to no one else, said—

'You were murdered by a cutsleeve—avenging another cutsleeve.'

Up until now, he'd looked back on the moment as a grudge, something to hold onto, to be spiteful over—

Never realized until this moment, when his hands begin to tremble in Ruoye's grip, that it might be a source of...

Fear.

That he might...

Be afraid of Xie Lian.

"You..." His lips tremble, skin someone growing even paler now, losing any semblance of color as his cousin approaches him, fangxin gleaming wickedly in the dim light filtering in through the windows. "You...YOU THINK I'M SCARED OF YOU, YOU PIECE OF SHIT?!"

Qi Rong's reactions are almost predictable, beyond a certain point.

His breath quickening as he watches Xie Lian pull fangxin back, preparing to strike.

"FUCKING FREAK! DEVIANT! SICK MOTHER FUCKER—FUCKER—YOU—!"

Xie Lian lunges, and he cringes.

"...DOG FUCKER XIE LIAN!"

The blade never lands.

Qi Rong trembles, his eyes squeezed shut—and after a moment of hesitation—he slowly opens them.

Only to find his cousin turned away from him, sliding fangxin back into its sheath.

"I'm sorry about that," he addresses the others in the room quietly.

"Does anyone need medical attention?"

That's when Qi Rong glances around at the farmers, now rising to their feet and stretching their limbs, stiff from staying still for so long...

...And realizes what he's done, unleashing a storm of curses.

"YOU ASSHOLE, YOU TRICKED ME!!"

Xie Lian ignores him, walking back to Hua Cheng's side.

"Gege was just pretending," the ghost king sighs, sounding...somewhat relieved. "I was beginning to worry."

Xie Lian bites back a smile, raising an eyebrow. "For Qi Rong?"

Hua Cheng quickly laughs in reply, shaking his head. "Hardly."

"...Thank you, your highness," one of the farmers steps forward, bowing deeply. "We're all in your debt!"

Xie Lian shakes his head, waving it off. "Oh, no! He and I used to be family—his mess is my responsibility."

They make their way out of the palace—leaving Qi Rong behind after Shuo hands Guzi off to Yin Yu, giving the ghost a solid kick in the head, knocking him out.

"Take the boy and return to Paradise Manor," Hua Cheng glances over his shoulder, where Mount Tonglu looms behind them.

Yin Yu nods at first, then looks down, staring at the Daruma doll of General Qi Ying in his hand. "...And what should I do with Quan Yizhen?"

"Whatever you choose," Hua Cheng shrugs, uncaring. "It's not for me to tell you."

The former official nods, his expression...conflicted.

Shuo stops him before he goes, pushing Guzi's hair back from his face, many emotions roiling behind his eyes.

"...Make sure you feed him as soon as you can," he finally mutters, pulling his hand back. "Who knows the last time that freak actually gave him a meal."

Yin Yu nods, stopping Shuo with a hand on his arm before he walks away.

"He'll be fine, you know."

"..." The demon nods, clearing his throat before he returns to the others.

Lang Qianqiu has his arms crossed, looking him over.

"...You're that worried about him?"

"No," Shuo shakes his head, rubbing the back of his neck—stiff after being on the move for so long. "Just...doesn't it piss you off?"

"...Piss me off?"

The demon follows after the others, his expression dark.

"Seeing anyone treat Qi Rong like their father."

Lang Qianqiu grows quiet, watching him as they return to the city street.

Ahead of them, Xie Lian stops, thinking.

"...We can't just leave these people here, out in the open..." he reasons.

"Do you think we should bring them back to where Banyue and Pei Su are?"

Hua Cheng is quiet for a moment, then—

"Perhaps we should wait a moment, your highness."

Something about his tone gives Xie Lian pause.

"...Is there a problem?"

Hua Cheng lifts a finger, one of his butterflies drifting over to land on it.

"...It would seem that Xuan Ji isn't quite as gullible as we expected."

It takes Xie Lian a moment to understand what he means.

Then...he begins to hear the voices drift over.

That Which was Never Ours

Chapter Summary

> “General?” Banyue frowns, looking like she might climb down to check on him more thoroughly, but—
>
> “STAY AWAY FROM HIM!”
>
> The shriek is so sudden, so shrill, it throws both of them off guard.
>
> When Pei Ming turns his head, he sees something rounding the corner.
>
> Crawling across the ground, dragging one leg behind her—long, tangled hair, shrouded with a bridal veil.

In the lower region of the imperial city, Pei Ming leaps down from a nearby roof, shaking another layer of soot from his robes.

"...You're sure you want to go on with the others?" Banyue calls after him.

She's leaning over the edge of the rooftop, where he left her with Pei Su. One of the few undamaged buildings in the city—keeping them up and away from any possible rats that might want to attack.

"I can't exactly sit around and wait it out, can I?"

"...Can't you?" Pei pauses at that, turning his head back to look at her—finding Banyue pinched with concern. "You don't look well, general."

And in fairness—he doesn't.

He's pale, the stubble on his chin having formed into more of a beard at this point—visibly exhausted.

It's not the first time that someone has expressed concern for him recently—and he wouldn't even say that she was the most persistent about it.

And yet.

Coming from someone that Pei has never been particularly kind to, it...it makes the General rub his forehead with a groan.

“General?” Banyue frowns, looking like she might climb down to check on him more thoroughly, but—

“STAY AWAY FROM HIM!”

The shriek is so sudden, so shrill, it throws both of them off guard.

When Pei Ming turns his head, he sees something rounding the corner.

Crawling across the ground, dragging one leg behind her—long, tangled hair, shrouded with a bridal veil.

Her dress is bloody and torn, soot coating her hands and feet.

“IS THIS YOUR NEWEST WHORE?!”

Pei Ming glances up at Banyue, then back at the newcomer.

“…Excuse me?”

He squints, trying to see her face through the veil and dark, matted hair.

“DON’T TRY TO DENY IT!” She snarls, pointing a clawed finger in his direction. “I SAW HER FAWNING OVER—!”

“…Do I know you?”

The female ghost freezes, her finger trembling for a moment in shock.

Pei can tell that they obviously have met—but he can’t recall having been with anyone recently enough for them to hold a grudge like this.

“…Ha…” One small, breathless laugh escapes her as she sits up on her knees. “You…you’re teasing me, aren’t you?”

Her hands claw at her veil, yanking at it.

“Trying to get the bride to show her face…you…you’re still such a dog!” She giggles, her voice cracking as she rips the fabric aside, finally showing her face.

And still, when she looks up at the general…

It takes him a moment.

He's had quite a few women over the years—and has only been with one person for the better part of the last century, give or take a few decades, but…

"…Xuan Ji?"

Just hearing him say her name earns a delighted sigh from the female ghost, but…

Pei Ming is gawking at her.

Not…in a positive way.

The general takes a step back, looking her over with utter shock.

"…How did you end up like this?" He mutters, shaking his head. "And what the hell are you wearing?"

"I…" Xuan Ji's jaw drops, agog. "What…do you mean?"

Pei glances over her gown with mild disgust. "Is that from one of the girl's you murdered on Mount Yu Jun? Have you so little shame?"

"From one of the…?" Xuan Ji starts to repeat him, almost numb. "EXCUSE ME?!"

"You murder nearly twenty brides, but that question is offensive?"

"I BOUGHT THIS WHEN I WAS ALIVE!" She shakes her head, shaking her fist at him. "DON'T INSULT ME BY CALLING ME A THIEF!"

Pei Ming stares at her, and miles away, listening through the recording of a wraith butterfly—his answer makes Xie Lian smack his palm against his forehead.

"…For who?" He asks blankly, his brow furrowed with confusion. "Were you engaged before? You told me there wasn't…"

He doesn't even finish his sentence before he sees Xuan Ji's face darken, claws extending as she lunges for him.

"ARE YOU MOCKING ME?!"

"…WHAT?!"

He barely manages to avoid getting throttled, catching her by the firearm.

“I BOUGHT IT FOR OUR WEDDING!” She snarls up at him, eyes red.

“…Our wedding?!” Pei’s eyes narrow with age-old frustration as he shoves her back. “How many times did I tell you I DIDN’T WANT THAT?!”

“AND HOW MANY TIMES DID I SHOW YOU THAT I DESERVED IT?!” Xuan Ji claws forward, grabbing him by the sleeve. “AFTER EVERYTHING I'VE DONE—HOW COULD YOU TREAT ME SO COLDLY?!”

“…Deserved it?” Pei Ming repeats her, caught between frustration and exhaustion. “Xuan Ji…”

“I BETRAYED MY COUNTRY FOR YOU!” Xuan Ji cries, refusing to let go of him this time, her claws digging into the flesh of his forearm. “I DESTROYED MY LEG FOR YOU!”

Pei Ming doesn’t even wince, trying to shake her off. “Do you think I WANTED any of that?!”

“YOU DIDN’T STOP ME!”

“…Stop you?! You were a grown woman! A GENERAL no less! Your actions were your own—and I never USED the plans you tried to give me.” He shakes his head, “Xuan Ji, I was always clear with you about what I wanted—“

“And why should that be more important than WHAT I WANTED?!”

“You can’t love someone out of OBLIGATION!” Pei Ming can feel her nails digging even deeper into his flesh, already wounded from being bitten by Bai Jing before, but—

He doesn’t care.

“It wouldn’t have mattered WHAT you gave me, don’t you understand?! I didn’t feel that way!”

“But I—!” Xuan Ji grits her teeth, tears slipping down her cheeks. “BUT I LOVED YOU SO MUCH! WHY WASN’T THAT ENOUGH?! WHY WON'T YOU EVEN GIVE ME A CHANCE NOW, AFTER EVERYTHING I’VE DONE FOR US?!”

“This wasn’t FOR us!” Pei Ming glares. “It’s for YOU! It’s ALWAYS been about you!”

“I GAVE UP MY ENTIRE LIFE! I—!”

“NO!” The general snaps, losing what little remaining patience he has. “I SPARED your life in the first place, or have you forgotten?! You had EVERY opportunity to return home and take your place among your people!”

“I WANTED TO STAY WITH YOU!”

“Do you even REMEMBER what you did the last time we saw one another?!” Pei glares, pointing to the scar on his face. “When you nearly clawed my damn eye out?! Was THAT ‘for me’ too?!”

“You…!” Xuan Ji swallows thickly. “You wouldn’t even LOOK AT ME! I lost my temper, I—!”

“And when you didn’t get what you wanted, you crippled YOURSELF to try and FORCE me into a marriage, and spent ALL THIS TIME BLAMING ME WHEN IT DIDN’T WORK?!”

They glare at one another, each vehemently angry, neither backing down.

“YOU WOULD HAVE CHANGED YOUR MIND ONE DAY!”

Xuan Ji had always known that he would.

Pei Ming wasn’t any different from the colts her father used to raise on their estate.

Young, proud, powerful.

He loathed being controlled, or caged in.

But eventually, if you don’t let go—any colt will tire out.

If he had just kept her around a little longer, until he was older, he would have been ready to settle—

“It’s been NINE CENTURIES,” Pei Ming’s eyes are just as bright now as they were back then, burning down at her like the sun sinking into the horizon.

“All you’ve been since then is a BAD MEMORY for me, understand?!”

That actually makes Xuan Ji flinch, her anger faltering; and—

“General?” Banyue stands on the edge of the rooftop, watching the two with concern. “Do you need assistance—?”

Xuan Ji’s eyes snap up to her, pupils narrowing into slits—not so different from that of a snake—and Pei grits his teeth, gripping her arm.

“LEAVE HER BE, XUAN JI!”

“DON’T YOU DARE SPEAK TO HIM!” She snarls, charging forward with all of her strength. “HE’S MINE , YOU LITTLE BITCH!”

“Wh—?”

“I SAID LEAVE HER ALONE!”

“HA! SO PROTECTIVE OF YOUR NEW LOVER!”

“Lover?!” Pei hisses, “SHE’S NO SUCH THING!”

“YOU’RE LYING TO PROTECT THE WHORE! I’M NOT FALLING FOR IT! I’LL RIP HER THROAT OUT AND MAKE YOU WATCH!”

In their struggle the two end up slamming into the side of the building—fracturing stone, kicking dust down with them.

And when they do—a jar tips over onto its side, rolling off of the side of the roof.

“IT DOESN’T MATTER IF I HAVE A LOVER OR NOT!” Pei glares up at her. “That doesn’t change the fact that I have NEVER loved you! Understand?! And I NEVER WILL!”

“…SHUT UP!” Xuan Ji shrieks, her eyes wild and frenzied. “IS YOUR HEART MADE OF STONE?!”

“AS FAR AS YOU’RE CONCERNED?! IT MAY AS WELL BE!”

“SHUT UP! SHUT UP, SHUT UP, SHUT UP!!!”

Her arms flail wildly as she tries to claw any inch of skin she can get her hands on, and as her eyes flicker around frantically—something catches her eye.

A pile of shattered clay.

THUD!

At first, Pei Ming doesn’t feel anything—only searing heat in his ribs.

But he knows.

He’s all too familiar with the feeling of being stabbed.

When he looks down, he sees Ming’guang buried between his ribs, running him all the way through.

“If you’re incapable of loving someone—“ Xuan Ji locks her jaw, tears pouring down her face. “THEN YOU DON’T DESERVE TO—!”

She falls silent—but not by choice.

Rather, because she's been grabbed around the neck—Pei Ming's hand completely enveloping her throat, squeezing until she falls silent.

"I have." He sounds remarkably calm, in spite of everything—blood dripping from the corner of his mouth.

"I heard you that day, on Mount Yu Jun. I remember what you said," He watches as she lets go of Ming'guang, clawing at his forearm as he holds her by the neck. "Do you?"

"True..." Xuan Ji rasps, staring back at him hatefully, "True love...would burn you!"

Her feet kick at his shins in an attempt to force him to let her go—but with no effect. "IT WOULD REDUCE YOUR HEART TO—!"

"It did."

In her eyes, Pei Ming sees a reflection of every sin he's ever committed.

The person that he used to be.

The war hero that he loathed .

How single minded and self serving he used to be.

How he used to run away from the truth if he didn't like it, refusing to look at it.

How stubborn he used to be, refusing to change, or see any point of view that wasn't his own.

"I fell in love." He watches now as her eyes grow impossibly wide, filling with hurt. "And that was what made me realize that you never gave a damn about me."

"You—!" She shakes her head vehemently, eyes welling with angry tears. "DON'T SAY THAT! Of course I—!"

"No," Pei squeezes her throat tighter. "You don't. You don't know how."

"I DO! ALL I'VE EVER WANTED WAS TO—!"

"I would do anything to see him one more time." Pei cuts her off, and—

His eyes have tears of their own.

"I would break every oath I have ever made."

He reaches down, squeezing the hilt of Ming'guang—

Knowing that his old friend can hear him.

"I would turn myself into a hypocrite."

He never understood Rong Guang when he was young.

Never understood a love so consuming, that it could steal your principles.

The kind of ache for another person that grows overtime, like roots tearing into stone.

The kind of bond that you'd sell your own soul to protect.

"And even if I did all of that, and he never wanted to see me again—I'd be fine with that," Pei Ming smiles faintly.

"Because he would be happy. Because he would be here. That would be enough for me. That is what it means to love someone."

It means wanting them to be happy—even if they can only do that without you.

What Xuan Ji wants isn't love—all she's ever wanted was to exploit.

If Pei Ming knew that Shi Wudu was out there somewhere, happy—

then he could take a full breath again.

If he knew that he could be with Shi Qingxuan, and watch his nephew grow—he could sleep again.

But he could never love again.

Not like that.

"And he loved me ," Pei Ming squeezes her throat as his own constricts with emotion. "He never wanted to change who I was, or the life I lived—he just wanted to be a part of it."

And of all of the regrets the general has had in his life—none of them have ever weighed on him as much as the fact that he never told Shi Wudu how he felt.

That he had lived for so long, he had begun to take time itself for granted—assuming they would never run out of it.

There were so many things he hadn't said yet, thinking that his lover wasn't ready to hear them. So many things he wanted to ask for, but—

He always thought they would have more time.

His arm whips to the side, throwing Xuan Ji by the neck, sending her flying.

"So, don't you DARE say you love me!" He glares, reaching down and yanking Ming'guang out of him, tossing the blade to the ground. "NOT WHEN I KNOW WHAT IT ACTUALLY FEELS LIKE!"

"You..." Xuan Ji hangs her head, nails clawing into the dirt. "...YOU HAVE NO IDEA—!"

She launches herself forward—only to be stopped again, but this time, not by Pei.

When she looks down–-the little girl she was screaming before—the one with the black cloak and long, ebony hair—

She's gripped Xuan Ji by both wrists, holding her back.

"Don't hurt him!"

Pei Ming stares at her—how ferocious she's become in the blink of an eye.

Not the meek, useless child that he once saw her as.

Rather a fierce young woman, unafraid to look Xuan Ji in the eye.

"HAVEN'T I ALREADY TOLD YOU TO BACK OFF, HE'S—!"

"His own person! Not yours!"

Xuan Ji shakes her head, her veil whipping around her, the bell at her hip jingling wildly. "YOU DON'T KNOW WHAT YOU'RE SAYING!"

"I do!" Banyue holds onto her, refusing to let go—and when she looks at Pei—

He's shocked to find the former preceptor shedding tears of her own.

"I know what it means to love someone so much that you would compromise yourself for them!" She cries, even as Xuan Ji rattles her around fiercely, trying to shake her off. "I know what it is to betray your country to protect someone precious to you! But—!"

She stares up at Xuan Ji with determination, unafraid.

She isn't a young, mortal bride—cowering and begging for her life on the mountainside.

Unlike Xuan Ji's other victims—she isn't easy prey.

"But that doesn't mean you can make yourself a burden on the person you love!"

If you do that—then it isn't love at all.

Xuan Ji cries out, feeling something sharp sink into her forearm, looking down to find some sort of snake biting into her—and she glares, finally managing to throw both it, and the child aside.

"DON'T LECTURE ME, BRAT!"

Xuan Ji reaches down to lift Ming'guang again, stalking towards Pei. "I'VE LIVED FOUR TIMES AS LONG AS YOU, WHAT WOULD YOU KNOW ABOUT—!"

But when she lunges forward, prepared to run the general through again—

The sword won't budge.

Pei Ming stares up at it from where he's fallen to the ground—one arm wrapped around his middle, lips parted with shock.

"...You...?" He whispers, unsure at first, until he hears a voice ring out —

"...You think any officer worth his salt is going to watch the enemy attack his general and not do anything about it?"

Rong Guang isn't strong enough to take Xuan Ji on—not after his battle with Ren Song.

But that doesn't mean he can't possess the sword that he used to inhabit, stopping Yushi Huang from being able to turn it against him.

"...You?!" Xuan Ji sneers, glaring down at the blade with disdain. Remembering Rong Guang from her mortal years—

The man had hated her.

"THAT'S RIGHT!" Ming'guang rattles in her grasp. "It's ME you ugly, two timing, gold digging, DOUBLE CROSSING SNAKE!"

Banyue sits up, rubbing her head. "...Don't two timing and double crossing mean the same thing?"

Pei Ming doesn't look over, waving her off.

"He's on a roll, let him have it."

"..." Xuan Ji tosses the sword to the ground, her claws extending as she marches forward, prepare to shred Pei and Banyue with her bare hands, but—

"That's enough, General Xuan. Stop."

Her foot freezes in mid-step.

Once again, not by her own choice. Rather, she—

She can't move forward.

Her shoulders hunch with rage, a darkness passing over her expression, lips twisting into a sneer.

"...Your highness," she whips her head around with a glare. "I didn't know you were here."

The newcomer does not avert her gaze—staring back at Xuan Ji calmly, until the general is the one to turn away, snarling with contempt.

"It's rare that the usurper herself GRACES us lowly peasants with her presence," she hisses. "What did you do to me?!"

The Rain Master pushes her bamboo hat back, letting it hang about her shoulders as she surveys the situation.

"I brought Yulong with me," She murmurs, barely sparing the treasonous general another glance.

Yulong was traditionally the sacred sword of the Kingdom of Yushi—and if wielded by its ruler, the citizens of Yushi can be compelled to obey their commands.

Treacherous as she may be—Xuan Ji is no exception.

"...You dare to use that sword?!" The female ghost snarls.

"You dare call yourself the ruler of Yushi, after the way you took the throne?!"

Yushi Huang tilts her head back, allowing the breeze to stir her hair for a moment—then she lets out a slow sigh.

"Quiet."

And just like that, Xuan Ji's jaw locks shut—even as she struggles.

"Queen Yushi!" Banyue rises to her feet, hurrying to the Rain Master's side. "I heard you got hurt! Are you alright?"

"...Oh? I suppose I did," Yushi Huang shrugs, showing very little sign of any injury. "Here."

She hands the young ghost a pickle jar.

"Put Xuan Ji in this."

Banyue nods eagerly, taking the jar as she goes to do as instructed—and Yushi Huang remains where she is, her hands folded into her sleeves.

Meeting eyes that she hasn't seen in nine centuries.

The same eyes that looked down at her as she took her last breaths.

General Pei.

"…" He struggles to sit up, his hand still pressed against his side to staunch the bleeding, and she moves forward, dropping to her knees before him

"There's no need for that," the Rain Master murmurs, placing her hand over his. "Let me see."

General Pei averts his eyes.

Her hand is half the size of his—but firm as she pulls his fingers out of the way, examining the wound.

"It takes something more serious than this to kill me," Pei mutters, his eyes fixed on the ground, and Yushi Huang looks up, searching his face silently.

"…I know."

The general stares pointedly at the ground for another long moment, seeming to realize she isn't going anywhere before looking up with a sigh.

"…Thank you for looking out for Pei Su," he mutters, clearing his throat—startled when he actually looks at her face, because…

…She's smiling at him.

In a soft, natural way, reaching up to place a hand on his shoulder, brushing the spot from his armor.

"He's a good man," The Rain Master responds quietly. "Anyone is welcome in my temples."

And after centuries of running, shouldering such a heavy weight of shame, remorse, and blame…

Pei Ming realizes that applies to him , as well.

…But why?

He stares at her, open mouthed and dumbfounded, unsure of what to —

"General!"

Xie Lian bursts around the corner with the others, breathing hard from the rush to make it back.

"I heard Xuan Ji had been dealt with—we tried to get here as fast as we could. Are you alright?"

Yushi Huang helps him stand, one arm pulled around her shoulder.

"He will be."

She looks Xie Lian over briefly, eyeing the cursed shackle in his eyes with dismay.

"…Your highness," she clears her throat, and that, along with her aura, gives him a better idea of where she's standing. "Do you remember me? It's been a very long time."

It does take Xie Lian a moment to recall her voice. The last time they met, it was before his first banishment—and he had only been a teenager at the time.

But he already heard Banyue call out to her through Hua Cheng's butterfly—and that's enough to make the connection.

"Queen Yushi," he bows in acknowledgment, folding his hands in front of him. "Thank you for protecting General Pei and the others."

"They had a handle on it without me," she shrugs, her tone serene as she looks down at Ming'guang, discarded on the ground "Lieutenant Rong Guang."

The demon doesn't reply, still lurking from within the blade.

"…I don't think he means harm," Pei offers—which is rather honorable, coming from the man Rong Guang was trying to murder only two days before.

"Good," Yushi Huang nods, "I'll carry him until you recover."

Neither Pei or the sword seem thrilled with the situation, but no complaints are made.

"Lord Rain Master!" The farmers rescued from Qi Rong run to her side, looking their goddess over for any cuts. "Are you alright?!"

“We heard the man in black cut you up pretty good!”

“…You mean Ling Wen?” She blinks, shaking her head. “He didn’t mean to—it wasn’t his fault.”

“Are you sure?”

Her response makes Pei Ming frown, looking down at her suspiciously.

“Ling Wen would never hurt me.”

“…Have you two become close?”

“Yes,” The Rain Master nods.

“…Oh,” The general looks away, his brow furrowed. “I didn’t know you were friends.”

“We’re not.”

His eyes snap wide open as Yushi Huang raises her fingers to her lips, whistling loud and sharp, the sound echoing across the plains.

“Xie Lian.”

It takes the prince by surprise for a moment—but Yushi Huang is among the only Heavenly Officials aside from Jun Wu to actually outrank him. And, given her informal nature—she wouldn’t necessarily always use his title.

(He prefers it to ‘Xianle,’ anyway.)

“…Yes, Lord Rain Master?”

“Is it still your intention to go to the Kiln?” As she asks him this, Xie Lian can hear the sound of approaching hooves. “I’ll evacuate the others—but I can take your party there on my way.”

“…You’re sure it isn’t too much trouble?”

Yushi Huang looks him over, then examines the looming figure of Mount Tonglu behind them.

“…Given the gravity of the situation, I don’t think it would matter if it’s trouble or not.”

As usual, the Rain Master is perfectly practical.

Pei Ming actually finds himself grimacing as she leads him towards the guardian ox, muttering under his breath—

“Actually, I don’t know why I didn’t see it before—you and Ling Wen make perfect sense.”

Much to his utter dismay.

At first, it’s almost impossible to believe that they could all fit on the ox’s back, like the Rain Master is indicating—

Not until the best kicks its hind legs at her urging—growing to twice —no, three times its original size.

More than enough to carry all of them.

But as they start loading up and onto the ox—mortals first, then Pei Su and Banyue, when Hua Cheng goes to follow them…he notices one person hanging back.

Shuo.

Standing off to the side, his expression…conflicted.

“…” The ghost king hangs back, crossing his arms.

The younger demon doesn't speak at first—and Hua Cheng doesn't prompt him, more than aware of the fact that he's waiting for the others to drift out of earshot.

And once they do—Shuo takes a deep breath.

"I don't think I should go with you."

Hua Cheng crosses his arms, taking that in.

"...Is that your way of saying you've made a decision?"

Shuo nods shallowly, unable or unwilling to look him in the eye.

"I..." He lets out a heavy, frustrated sigh, biting his lip. "I wouldn't make it."

Hua Cheng doesn't argue with him.

Not because he thinks of him as weak—

Surviving the Kiln isn't necessarily about strength.

There are plenty of ghosts—like Ren Song—who are strong without the Kiln. But there's a reason only Hua Cheng and He Xuan survived as ghost kings.

Surviving is far more about focus and purpose .

Hua Cheng doesn't have room for fear or self doubt. He feels those emotions, but he pushes them aside.

He Xuan has the uncanny ability to warp his entire personality around a singular goal.

For him, it was vengeance.

For Hua Cheng, it was something far more singular:

Xie Lian.

And after hearing what Qi Rong said in the ruins of the Palace of Wuyong...

If his resentment towards Qi Rong truly is the only thing keeping him tethered to this world...it really wouldn't be good enough.

No matter how prepared Shuo is, or how much strength he's obtained—

If he's directionless, the flames of Mount Tonglu will consume him, leaving nothing behind.

"...What are you going to do instead?"

The forest demon looks to the horizon, thinking.

"That thing that attacked me on the Terrace of Cascading Wine—I still haven't recovered all of the resentment I lost yet. But...it's weird," he mutters, eyeing the fields behind them.

"There are so many ghosts left."

It's true. By this stage—the field should be narrowing. Instead—there are still hordes of relatively low level ghosts, left almost completely untouched.

As though the more powerful demons are ignoring them for some reason.

(That, or they've already been wiped out.)

"If I consume them...I still might not be able to go into the Kiln," Shuo reasons. "But I'll still be more useful going forward."

Hua Cheng stares out in the same direction, frowning.

And then, he says something that leaves Shuo dumbfounded.

"You don't always have to be useful."

Hua Cheng doesn't look away from the fields of Tonglu, even when Shuo whips his head around to look at him, jaw hanging open with shock.

"...Huh?"

Hua Cheng lowers his gaze to look at him.

"You don't have to justify your own existence."

Shuo stares at him, struggling to form words. Unsure how that makes him feel. If it's comforting, or it’s just...

"...What?"

Hua Cheng sighs, his eyes flickering back toward the others—who haven't noticed them lingering behind. Not yet.

"You never tried to do that before."

He doesn't have to specify what he means by that.

When it comes to Shuo, there's only one before that matters.

Before Bao was gone.

Before that—he was never so focused on proving that he could be useful.

That he deserved to be here, even if everyone else was gone.

Because Bao's love, his acceptance, the fact that he needed Shuo—that was a secure attachment. He never felt as though he only mattered to his brother if he remained useful.

Convenient.

And after Bao was gone—no one needed him.

There was never going to be anyone else who would stand by him through anything. Who would love him, even when it was hard.

Shuo knew, when his brother dispersed, that he would never be someone's priority ever again.

And when you know that...

It makes you think that you constantly have to justify why people should keep you around, rather than discard you the first chance they get.

"...I feel like I do," he whispers, swallowing hard.

Hua Cheng's hand lands on his shoulder.

"Do you want to move on?"

It's a question he always asked Shuo, ever since he was small. His head barely reaching Hua Cheng's waist, clinging to the ghost king's side as he watched more and more children pass on into the next life.

He never looked at Hua Cheng when he answered.

He still doesn't now—shaking his head, his voice raw.

"No."

But if he had—he would have known that each and every time, including now...

Hua Cheng was always visibly relieved to hear it.

"You don't need another reason to be here. Not to me."

They don't look at one another—neither one accustomed to conversations like this, and...

There's more that needs to be said—but now isn't the time.

"Knowing that, do you still want to go with that plan?"

"..." Shuo nods, clearing his throat and rubbing at his nose.

Hua Cheng nods, lifting his hand from his shoulder.

"Don't do anything I wouldn't do."

As he starts to walk away, the corner of Shuo's mouth curves up half heartedly.

"And don't do anything you would do, either?"

Hua Cheng smiles faintly.

"Exactly."

He doesn't doubt that Shuo will find more of a drive—a purpose.

Spirits like him don't linger on for as long as he has for no reason.

And Hua Cheng isn't wrong.

Before everything is said and done—Ren Song will find something to utterly dedicate himself to.

But that's a double edged sword.

Purpose can give your life meaning—or, it can be the end of you.

(Because some things are worth dying for.)

As he returns to the Ox, he finds Xie Lian speaking to Lang Qianqiu in hushed tones.

"...You're sure you want to go back for Qi Rong?"

Lang Qianqiu nods, glancing back over his shoulder.

Not at anyone in particular, obviously—just eyeing the path back to where they came from

"He's caused enough damage. We can't let him roam free at a time like this, but...Don't worry, guoshi. I won't get rid of him."

Funny enough—the moment Qi Rong said what he did back there...

Xie Lian had the sneaking suspicion that Lang Qianqiu wouldn't be trying that again.

"...Ready, San Lang?"

"As long as you are, dianxia," the ghost king replies simply, helping him climb onto the Ox.

Once they're settled—with Xie Lian in front, and Hua Cheng sitting behind him, steadying the prince with an arm around his waist, the Guardian Ox of Yushi takes off.

But, unlike a mortal beast—it runs with the swiftness of the wind, leaping hundreds of meters with every step.

Carrying them towards their final destination.

Like chess pieces being deftly maneuvered across the board—carefully placed into their positions for the endgame.

And the place where it all began is the same place where it ends.

The Kiln of Mount Tonglu.

There's only one thing left behind in the square.

All the gods, ghosts, and mortals left it behind—each going on to meet their own destinies.

A small, clay pickle jar. Weakly rolling around, faint screams of protests echoing from within.

No one answers.

Not for hours.

And in an abandoned city on the edge of the world—well.

There’s no reason to think this couldn’t go on for all eternity.

Trapped. Voiceless. Powerless. Unable to move.

Knowing her beloved is still…is still…

Then, there’s a miracle.

Someone finds the jar.

Xuan Ji feels herself being lifted into the air—the tell tale relief in pressure when the lid is opened, eagerly scrambling back out into the world, gasping for air.

“T-Thank you, I—!”

And at first, she assumed the only one who would come looking for her was Qi Rong.

But when she looks up—even Xuan Ji finds herself frozen, dropping to her knees with terror—then sinking into a low bow, her forehead touching the ground.

“M-My lord!” She croaks, too terrified to look up. “I thought—I thought you were—!”

Long, billowing white sleeves blow toward her in the breeze—and Xuan Ji doesn’t move. Terrified of what might come next, until—

A hand lands on top of her head, and a cold, chilling voice speaks out;

“Don’t be afraid, child. I have no intention of devouring you.”

Xuan Ji bites back a sob of relief, her shoulders trembling as she lets the tension deep out of her. “You…you don’t?”

“No, no…” The figure shakes his head. “As a matter of fact—I think we can help one another.”

Finally, she gains the courage to look up at him.

“…We can?”

It’s impossible to see his expression, but…

It feels like he must be smiling.

“I can give back everything Pei took from you—and give you your heart’s desire.”

Xuan Ji’s long still heart begins to pound, lips trembling.

“All I ask is that you tie up a loose end for me.”

“…What is it?” She breathes.

“First,” the figure extends his hand, “do we have a deal?”

In her mortal life, she never would have agreed to such a thing without knowing the terms, but…

She doesn't really have a choice. And even if she did—

Her heart's desire is worth it.

She reaches forward, grasping his hand—and when she does, the transformation is immediate.

Ripped fabric twisting and shifting—new flesh knitting into place.

After spending eight centuries in a wedding dress—

It feels good, wearing her old armor again.

Standing on both legs.

And this—this isn't even her reward.

Her lord tilts his head to the side, watching as his new servant trembles with eager excitement.

"All I want in exchange is something you already want yourself, Xuan Ji."

"Name it," She whispers.

"The person your General fell in love with…" her teeth gnash together at the memory, hands balling into fists. "…What if I told you he was still alive?"

He watches as the female ghost freezes, eyes bulging with shock and rage.

"Change that, and we'll both be satisfied."

Xuan Ji's head snaps up to look at him, eyes glimmering in fierce delight.

"…Where is he?" She snarls, lips pulled back over her fangs.

Miles away, Pei is slumped forward, half conscious—leaning against the one person he's spent his entire life avoiding.

And his ears…

They won't stop ringing.

Static crackling louder and louder, until all he can do is cut off his communication array with a swear, cursing Ling Wen for leaving them in disrepair, but…

Just before he does—there's a whisper. Garbled, but…

'…Pei-Xiong…'

Across the continent, in a city far to the north, a cultivator slumps forward, breaking his meditation pose as he coughs heavily, shoulders trembling.

The teenager beside him offers him a rag to cough into, patting his back.

"You're pushing yourself too hard…"

Shi Wudu grimaces—and when he lowers the cloth from his mouth, it comes away red.

His recovery in the last few weeks has been nothing short of miraculous—held together by nothing but sheer grit and determination.

"I'm fine," he mutters, "mortals aren't meant to access the communication arrays of heavenly officials. Trying to get through is obviously going to put the body under strain."

Jin Feng watches as the fallen god rises to his feet, pouring himself a glass of wine.

Since Pei ordered the temple to offer 'Pei Yuan,' any assistance he needed, there's been ample food and drink to go around.

Shi Wudu hasn't hesitated to help himself to the latter.

"…Then why are you trying so hard to get through?"

Shi Wudu glances at him through the corner of his eye as he swallows.

He was never one to drink to excess before.

Keeping your mental and physical balance is a tenant of cultivation, but…

He can't remember the last time his body felt sacred—so he supposes it doesn't matter.

"Someone has to try to warn him," Shi Wudu mutters, setting his empty cup aside, combing his fingers through his hair, pulling it back. "The emperor sent him to Mount Tonglu for a reason."

Most likely hoping that it would get Pei killed .

With Shi Wudu and Ling Wen out of the way—he's the only one left standing in the upper echelons of the heavenly order.

And unlike the others—he's older, and while his base of support can fluctuate over the centuries like anyone else's…

His core believers aren't easily swayed.

Jun Wu has nothing to hold over him—and he can't just break the man down and watch him fade.

He's been trying that for almost two centuries with little success.

No. If he wants to get rid of Pei—he'll need to kill him.

Luring him to the Kiln might be the easiest way to do it.

"…Where are you going?" Jin Feng sits up, watching as the cultivator throws on a cloak—

The very same cloak a certain martial god left here, before.

"Fresh air," Shi Wudu mutters. "You stay here."

"…Huh?" The teenager frowns. "Why?"

"You wanted help with your cultivation," Shi Wudu shrugs. "You haven't been meditating, you've been staring at me."

The tips of Jin Feng's ears turn red.

"…Oh."

"Maybe you'll have an easier time focusing if I'm not here."

He's blushing and stammering by the time Shi Wudu is out the door, pulling his hood up.

He knows it's not particularly nice to tease the kid—but, it's the easiest way to stop him from asking any more questions.

The thunder rolls as he walks through the streets of Langling—known for its bright summers, but dreary winters.

He's had time since he arrived to learn the layout of the place—and the guard towers placed strategically around the border by local cultivation sects.

The areas are strategic for the locals when it comes to defending from criminals or possible invaders.

For Shi Wudu, they serve another purpose.

He ducks into an alley across from one of said towers, looking around to make sure that he hasn't been seen.

After a moment he steps back out, jumping up, catching his fingertips against the eave of the gutter before pulling himself on top of a neighboring rooftop.

A seal awaits him—eroded after a week of being in place, and he kneels down to redraw it.

Before, when he was a god—he would have placed a barrier array around the entire city, barring any gods and ghosts from entry.

Now, the most he can manage is a spiritual detection array—which isn't entirely useless.

If Jun Wu had the foresight to place that curse on him—it was because he already suspected a possibility that Shi Wudu might survive He Xuan.

But he also knows too much to be allowed to live long—and in this state; he's vulnerable.

Using an array like this—if someone shows up to attack him, he'll have a better chance at being able to flee.

He doesn't expect Jun Wu to come himself. His focus will be on Xie Lian.

No—he'll send an underling.

And Shi Wudu can deal with that.

If he's prepared.

The magic is simple—but ancient. A spell he can manage in this state, even if it means he has to spread seals around the entire perimeter of the city.

Before, he was overseeing trade and finance for the entire continent.

By comparison, this is a small task.

Once he's finished reforming the seal, he Rises to his feet, prepared to move to the next rooftop.

But something stops him.

Voices, echoing from the warehouse below.

An odd time of day—and what's even stranger…

"Did you bring it?"

"Yes…but there's a problem."

Shi Wudu recognizes one of the voices—

Deng Su.

By the sound of it, the other is an older cultivator from the south—one who has come to tutor disciples in Langling, hoping a cultivation sect might take root here.

But why meet in a grain storage warehouse at this hour?

"Considering how much money I paid you and your friends, it had better not be."

"…"

Shi Wudu kneels back down, slipping in through a small window just underneath the roof line—kneeling among the rafters as he watches the men.

Silent as a cat, completely unnoticed.

Deng Su has a long, thin wooden box laid out on an empty table between them—his arms stiff by his sides.

Attempting to hide his nerves.

“Has anyone else managed to bring it back to you before?” He mutters. “We were more than worth your money.”

“Then what’s the problem?”

“…We’ve all tried it—and the spell locking the mechanism is too complex. We can’t make it work.”

“Of course you can’t,” the older cultivator drags the box towards him, pushing at the lid. “It wasn’t built for you.”

When the contents are revealed, Shi Wudu tilts his head.

…A ring?

Why keep it in a box like that? And what sort of spell could be sealing it?

“…But didn’t Crimson Rain take it back from you, Master Yu?” He mutters, watching as the Lord slips the ring onto his finger.

And…

Nothing happens.

“…See?” Deng Su frowns, taking a step back when his prospective buyer whips around to glare at him.

“Are you trying to sell me a fake?!”

“Are you kidding me?!” Deng Su hisses, shaking a finger. “Two of my friends DIED helping get this thing out of ghost city!”

“Then why isn’t it working?!”

“Because Hua Cheng locked the damn thing after you backed out on your deal!” Deng Su shakes his head, snapping the box shut. “That isn’t my fault!”

“Well, I’m not paying an arm and a leg for a whip that doesn’t damn well WORK!”

“Like hell you aren’t!” Deng Su snarls. “I’m getting married soon—and I already committed this money towards a house for us!”

“If the whip doesn’t work—then there’s NO deal.”

The young cultivator gnashes his teeth together, frustrated.

“…You just want Zidian for bragging rights anyway! The Yu clan aren’t warriors like the Jiangs. You’ll never be the rulers of Yunmeng. So, why go to all that trouble—?!”

“Do you have any idea what this weapon can do?” Master Yu slams his hand down, the ring gleaming.

"It was designed for exorcisms. ANY ghost or inhuman energy will be extracted from a mortal body! You don't NEED to be a warrior for Zidian to be useful—people pay a fortune for an exorcism!" He glares down at the amethyst, frustrated.

"And in the hands of a proper warrior—do you know the stories they tell about Crimson Rain Sought Flower, boy?! Do you have any idea?!"

"I know that half of the stories about Hua Cheng aren't even true," Deng Su scowls, pacing along the edge of the table.

"I was in the gambler's den that night, before Paradise Manor caught on fire—and you know what? I didn't see any forked tongue, and he didn't drink anyone's blood. He just tried to trick some cultivator into kissing him after losing a dice roll—!"

"They say he learned how to forge weapons from the same god who smithed every blade in the heavens, countless generations ago! Any weapon made by him is on the same level as a Heavenly Blade! This —!" he shakes the ring on hand for emphasis. "Is worth more to me than your life!"

"...I hope that isn't a threat," Deng Su pauses, looking from the ring, to Master Yu's glaring expression. "Because you can't figure out how to make that thing work either. I've had nearly every cultivator in my temple give it a try—and no one has been able to do it."

"If Hua Cheng has actually locked it...it would take someone as skilled as a Heavenly Official to use it," Master Yu glares, sliding the ring off of his finger as he slams it back into the box. "For your sake—I hope that isn't true."

Deng Su's nails bite into his palms.

"We had a deal! You can't just—!" He pauses suddenly, looking around. "Did you hear that? Did someone follow you here?"

"..." Master Fu looks around, raising an eyebrow. "You think I'd hire someone to steal from a ghost king, then be careless about it?!"

"No, I just...!"

Den Su looks up towards the rafters, but...

There's nothing there.

"...Never mind..."

Shi Wudu straightens on the rooftop, throwing his head back to stare at the sky, feeling somewhat sardonic.

"Was that supposed to be some sort of sign?" He mutters, his voice dry.

He doesn't know who he's trying to talk to.

The universe. Fate.

Himself.

He pulls the hood of his cloak up once more as he walks across the rooftop, moving on to add another seal, but...

When he glances back over his shoulder—there's a pair of eyes watching him.

Perched on one of the higher roof tops, further up the slope away from the sea.

Some sort of bird—large and black.

With sharp, piercing eyes, bearing down on him like a warning.

FLASH!

The sky grows bright with lighting as it strikes down against the sea.

BOOM!

The flash of light forces Shi Wudu to blink—and when he opens his eyes again...it's gone.

"...Well," he mutters, leaping to the next rooftop, starting on another seal. "That might have actually been a sign."

Of what—he doesn't know.

But time will surely tell.

My Dearest Enemy, My Oldest Friend

Chapter Summary

> The beauty of mortality and impermanence is that all things eventually pass. Not just the good.
>
> There is no suffering without relief.
>
> There is no grief that does not one day become a fond memory.
>
> And sometimes, the things we are so certain have gone forever…
>
> "San Lang?"
>
> ...Never left us at all.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Xie Lian loses track of how long they ride through the foothills of Mount Tonglu, steadily climbing higher and higher, until there's a permanent chill to the air.

Not because it's been that long—but more so because he often finds himself dozing, leaning back against Hua Cheng.

In spite of the situation that they might be charging into—there's something comforting about the shape of him pressed against Xie Lian's back, paired with the gentle rocking back and forth.

He's eventually roused by the feeling of Hua Cheng's arm squeezing around his middle.

"Lord Rain Master—it's fine to stop here," Her raises his voice so Yushi Huang can hear him—and the goddess nods, ordering the Ox to a halt.

"Are you sure?"

After all—they've only reached the base of the mountain so far, but...

Hua Cheng nods. "I'm certain."

He helps Xie Lian down, and when Pei moves to follow them—the Rain Master holds him back, her hand firm on his sleeve.

"You're in no condition to carry on."

The general stops, swallowing hard.

The wound in his side won't kill him, but...she's right.

He can't fight like this. Of course—he remembers what Jun Wu said before. His warning about Hua Cheng taking Xie Lian to the kiln, and what Pei Ming should do if it came to that, but…

Even if he thought Hua Cheng would harm Xie Lian—and he doesn’t—

He’s in no condition to stop either of them.

Part of him considers passing that warning on to Xie Lian—if only to help him be vigilant—but…

“…Be careful, your highness.”

Saying that to Xie Lian feels a little pointless—he uses his immortality as an excuse to be anything but careful. Still…

The prince nods.

"You too, General."

Pei Ming holds on as the ox springs forward once again, charging back down the mountainside.

Leaving Crimson Rain Sought Flower and the Crown Prince alone, nearly at the Kiln's doorstep.

"They'll be alright."

Yushi Huang's ever-present sense of calm is probably a sense of comfort, for most.

At a time like this, however, Pei Ming has absolutely no desire to feel comforted.

"There's no way of predicting that."

The goddess glances at him from the corner of her eye.

"...Do you know what you learn after almost a thousand years of watching the rain?"

Pei Ming couldn't begin to guess—but it's not a question that he's meant to answer.

Yushi Huang looks toward the horizon—through the layers of ash.

Knowing the sun is there.

"Storms pass."

Even in a world of immortality, there's no such thing as true permanence.

Decay and rot are always associated with things people don't want to lose .

But just as a beloved king will wither and fade with old age, so will a tyrant.

Monsters will eventually be slain.

The beauty of mortality and impermanence is that all things eventually pass. Not just the good.

There is no suffering without relief.

There is no grief that does not one day become a fond memory.

And sometimes, the things we are so certain have gone forever…

"San Lang?"

...Never left us at all.

Hua Cheng helps him step over an overgrown root as they move through the mountain path, delicately picking their way up the steep incline.

"Yes, gege?"

"...I'm sorry that so much of this burden has fallen on you," Xie Lian sighs.

"I never minded my bad luck when I was traveling alone, but...It feels like I've done nothing but drag you into one mess after another since we met."

Even since leaving Blackwater Manor—not so long ago, but it feels like a lifetime...

He's put him through so much trouble.

"...The matter of Mount Tonglu concerns me too, your highness—you didn't drag me into it."

"Maybe so," Xie Lian frowns, holding onto Hua Cheng's wrist a little more firmly as the path becomes uneven.

"But...something makes me think that you wouldn't have taken the task on if Jun Wu hadn't made that request of me. And now it's just the two of us, and I..."

Xie Lian stops walking for a moment, biting his lip.

"...If it comes down to it, I don't know how much use I'll be."

Hua Cheng stops beside him—and Xie Lian is startled when he feels fingertips brush underneath his chin, tilting his head up so the ghost king can examine his expression properly.

"What do you mean?"

It's ridiculous—Xie Lian can't make eye contact with him, but he finds himself averting his gaze anyway.

"...There's only so much a person can do while fighting blind," the prince mutters, even if it feels like pulling teeth.

He loathes admitting to his own limitations.

Everything he's done since his banishment has been an assertion of self sufficiency.

But Xie Lian knows that he can fail. And each time he has, the consequences...

They've been nearly too painful to endure.

And facing the birth of a new ghost king...

All Xie Lian knows is that the first time he fought a Ghost King, he was at the peak of his power.

No cursed shackles, and all of the wealth, power, and fame that the world had to offer.

And still—he lost.

Then, slowly, he lost everything.

A death by a thousand cuts.

(Or, to be more apt—by a hundred swords.)

"...I wouldn't blame you if you didn't want to be bothered with this," Xie Lian offers, finding himself falling back into old habits. "It's not fair for you to carry my share of the burden—"

In a rare instance, Hua Cheng speaks over him.

"I will never let you face a challenge alone, dianxia."

Hua Cheng always has this way of speaking—a bone deep self assuredness that gives the prince pause, his breath stalling in his lungs.

"I will always be on your side."

Any hope Xie Lian had of regaining the ability to breathe disappears when Hua Cheng grasps his hand a little tighter, lifting it to his lips—pressing a kiss to the back of his knuckles.

A gesture Xie Lian used to be so familiar with.

Back when he was a mortal prince, it wasn't unusual for new vassals to be brought to the throne room in Xianle, kneeling before the royal family, kissing rings and swearing their loyalty.

"And it's never a burden," the calamity concludes, releasing his hand. "Not if it's you."

"..." Xie Lian swallows hard, trying to ignore the jackhammering of his heart, pulsing so hard, he can feel the blood rushing in his ears.

And part of him can't let go of that old habit.

The same one that pushed him to wander off on his own during his first banishment.

The same part of him that prayed that Hong'er would leave him before it was too late.

Because he was a burden.

He is a burden.

And those who stay too close for too long...are inevitably shaped by his own ill-fated destiny.

"...How much further is it to the Kiln entrance?"

Hua Cheng glances ahead of them, eyeing the path leading up the mountainside.

"Not far—maybe two hours at most. But we can travel faster if it becomes necessary."

"...We can?" Xie Lian tilts his head. "Is E'Ming suited to flying?"

Hua Cheng snorts at the suggestion.

"Maybe--but that isn't what I had in mind. I would simply transform into something more suitable and carry you."

Xie Lian pauses, lifting his hand to his chin as he thinks.

"...Like a goat?" He muses, trying to imagine it—and Hua Cheng lets out a loud, surprised laugh.

"I was thinking of something that could fly, but if gege would prefer —"

"No, no!" Xie Lian waves his hands, realizing how ridiculous that his guess must have sounded. "That makes more sense!"

Hua Cheng is still chuckling, and his ears burn.

But that mirth slowly fades as he notices something else, the smile disappearing from his face.

A cliff looming overhead—high and sharp.

Familiar.

One he's seen painted in stone murals several times by now.

"...San Lang?" Xie Lian mumbles, feeling himself being pulled along.

Hua Cheng comes to a halt—seeing what was never depicted in great detail in the murals—which only showed skeletons and smoke.

"...The cliff from the murals," he explains, holding Xie Lian's arm firmly. "We're standing at the bottom of it now."

Xie Lian takes a step forward after hearing that—and notices something strange.

They aren't standing on earth anymore. Or even the craggy surface one might expect from a mountain slope, no—

They're standing on a polished, smooth surface.

Man-made.

"...What is this place?"

Hua Cheng surveys the area, his mouth pressing into a grim line.

The surface they're standing on is a large, round disk on top of the earth—carved and polished obsidian, with symbols etched around the edges.

He recognizes them of being that of Wuyong—but the dialect is so ancient, even he can't read them—

Except for one.

The character for death.

They all seem to spiral inward, meeting one point at the center, and when Hua Cheng looks up...

It's directly underneath the ledge.

"...Human sacrifice."

Xie Lian takes a step back, a notable chill running down his spine. "...What?"

Hua Cheng can't take his eye off of that cliff, feeling a deepening pit in his stomach.

"That's what the mural was showing."

"...That can't be right..."

Any form of blood sacrifice is banned in Taoism—and to Xie Lian's knowledge, it always has been, going against the fundamental beliefs of its philosophy.

Even sacrificing animals is considered taboo—but humans?

Outside of myth--he's never heard of it.

"…Bai Wuxiang suggested it once, hoping to prevent Mount Tonglu's eruption," Hua Cheng explains. "I always assumed he came up with the idea on his own, but…"

Apparently there was already a tradition of such things in the Kingdom of Wuyong.

In which case, it makes the reaction of Tonglu Hudie, Mei Nianqing, and the others…confusing, in retrospect.

Xie Lian turns his head—feeling a presence behind them. Some sort of structure breaking the path of the wind coming down the mountainside.

"Is there another temple?"

"Yes," Hua Cheng agrees, turning around to look with him. "But not for Bai Wuxiang."

It hadn't occurred to Xie Lian until then, but…

It is odd, isn't it?

They've traveled the entire length of Wuyong, and this is the first temple they've encountered that isn't Bai Wuxiang's.

Logically, they should have seen ruins for other gods before. Even if they were from the last Heavenly Dynasty.

"…Which god is it for, then?"

Hua Cheng strains his gaze, looking at the symbols etched into the establishment plaque, but…

"I don't know," he admits.

There's no divine statue or portrait as they walk inside—no establishment plaque.

Nothing to indicate who this god was, or what they stood for—just smooth, dark walls, carved straight from volcanic rock.

And…no altar.

The only other remnant of the worshippers who must have once come here is an etching on the floor of mount tonglu itself, but other than that...

"Is there another mural?" Xie Lian questions, pressing his palm against the wall.

"...It looks like someone was interrupted."

Both of them managed to surmise early on that someone had painted these murals recently—for them to find.

And that said person was Mei Nianqing.

As Hua Cheng knows all too well, trying to warn Xie Lian of Bai Wuxiang.

But someone else got here first.

The mural that was painted is almost impossible to discern now—showing only what Hua Cheng can recognize as the inside of the Kiln, but...

There's a scorched black mark in the center of the image, obscuring whatever it was meant to show of what lurked inside.

Xie Lian frowns, pressing his fingertips over the scorched mark—frustrated.

Unable to shake the feeling that whatever was here before—

It was important. Maybe more important than anything that came before it.

"...If something got here first, we should keep moving."

But just as Hua Cheng turns around to lead Xie Lian out of the temple, he freezes.

The one who destroyed the mural got here first, yes.

And he left something else behind.

Xie Lian's hand tightens in his, tugging at him curiously.

"...San Lang?"

His concern spikes when he feels that...

Hua Cheng's hands are trembling.

Not violently, but noticeable.

He steps closer, placing his other hand on his shoulder. "What's wrong?"

Hua Cheng's pupil has narrowed into a slit, his fangs gleaming—mouth twisted with rage.

"...It's just a threat, your highness." He fights to keep himself from snarling—not wanting to speak to Xie Lian that way, even if the rage isn't directed at him. "We need to move, now."

"...Alright," Xie Lian agrees—trusting that Hua Cheng wouldn't react like this if it wasn't serious, but...

And when Hua Cheng said they should move—he didn't mean that he was going to wait for Xie Lian to lead the way, as usual.

Xie Lian gasps with surprise when he feels Hua Cheng bodily drag him—far more forcefully than he ever would have dared in a normal situation.

"San--?"

His voice is cut off when he feels himself being yanked up into Hua Cheng's arms, and—

In a matter of seconds, the ghost king makes it to the top of the cliff face, clearing it in one leap—leaving the ancient temple and whatever horrifying secrets it may have held behind.

Once they're on even ground, Hua Cheng sets him on his feet again.

"...San Lang, I—" Xie Lian reaches for his sleeve, "I know you want to hurry, but do you hear that?"

Faint rattling coming from the hills and trees—

Almost like whispers, forming words he can almost understand.

"It's the fallen souls of Wuyong," Hua Cheng mutters.

"They get louder the closer you get. They might say disturbing things—but they can't hurt you."

Xie Lian nods, starting to follow as Hua Cheng continues forward—but the ghost king holds him back.

"Give me a moment, gege—I'm going to change forms, I don't want to crush you."

"...Change forms?" Xie Lian murmurs—and after how silly his last guess was, he doesn't want to venture again.

Hua Cheng pauses for a moment, pressing both hands to his temples—forcing himself to calm down.

"...I need to tell you something."

His voice is calm—quiet, in a way.

But the way he says those words—it sounds so...

So desperately important.

"...San Lang can tell me anything," Xie Lian reminds him, his throat suddenly dry.

Hua Cheng doesn't address that, he only says—

"Not here."

"...I don't understand—?"

"I can explain all of it," Hua Cheng's voice...

It trembles, having become somewhat raw.

"Every question you've had since we met—I can explain all of it to you, your highness. But we have to get to the Kiln, first."

"I don't..." Xie Lian frowns, allowing Hua Cheng to step away from him, wrapping his arms around himself as he desperately tries to understand what's going on. "I don't understand...what does this have to do with what you saw down there?"

Hua Cheng glances back down at the bottom of the cliff, his eye flashing dangerously.

It's a vile place.

An evil place.

"...You'll understand everything soon, your highness. You just have to trust me."

Slowly, Xie Lian nods—a small smile on his face.

"That makes it easy, then."

Hua Cheng pauses for a moment, his gaze softening as it lingers upon his god's face, his chest buzzing with countless emotions.

Fear. Anger. Anxiety. Anticipation. But more than any of that—

"...Wait..." Xie Lian pauses, twisting his head around to look up the mountainside.

The whispering was indistinguishable before—but now he hears something loud and clear.

Voices in the distance—closer to the mountain's snowy peak, and two familiar auras.

"...What are Feng Xin and Mu Qing doing here?" Xie Lian mutters, feeling the wind pick up.

Even with it howling down the mountainside, he can hear them—each screaming to be heard over the weather.

“WHAT ARE YOU DOING HERE?!”

Feng Xin, it would seem, is confused about the very same thing.

“I COULD ASK YOU THE SAME THING!”

“I WAS FOLLOWING YOU!”

“WHY?!”

“Wh—?!” Feng Xin isn’t just shouting to be heard over the wind anymore—the beginnings of what must be a full blown blizzard.

"WHY DO YOU FUCKING THINK, YOU STUBBORN BASTARD?!"

"YOU SHOULD BE WITH JIAN LAN AND YOUR SON RIGHT NOW! IF YOU'RE PISSED AT ME FOR NOT TELLING YOU—!"

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT, I GET WHY YOU DIDN'T WANT TO TALK TO ME ABOUT THAT!" Feng Xin's voice is deeper, slightly more difficult to hear over the wind. "YOU DON'T LIKE TALKING ABOUT THINGS THAT HURT YOU!"

Xie Lian finds himself shocked by Feng Xin being…sensitive, for once.

If not…still too blunt for Mu Qing, who panics when anything hits too close to home.

"…HURT?!" He shrieks—and the higher pitch of his voice is far easier to hear. "WHY WOULD I BE HURT?! IT WAS NONE OF MY FUCKING BUSINESS! THAT'S NOT WHY! I JUST DIDN'T WANT YOU TO BLAME ME!"

Xie Lian rubs a hand against his forehead, mourning what little progress could have been made.

"WELL, I DON'T!" Feng Xin shouts back at him. "I SAID IT BEFORE YOU GOT ARRESTED—I KNOW YOU WOULDN'T DO THAT!"

"…THEN WHY DID YOU FOLLOW ME?!"

"BECAUSE YOU DIDN'T COME BACK!"

"SO?!"

"YOU WERE CLEARED OF THE ACCUSATIONS—SO WHY DID YOU KEEP RUNNING?!"

"DIDN'T YOU HEAR WHAT I SAID BEFORE?!" Mu Qing shouts, calling back to what he said outside of the Inn, after that truth came to light. "I'M DONE!"

"WH—?"

"I'M NOT GOING BACK!"

Xie Lian's stomach plummets, and Feng Xin falters.

"W-WHAT THE FUCK DO YOU MEAN?!"

“CONGRATULATIONS!” Mu Qing laughs, slightly crazed and frantic. “YOU’RE GETTING EXACTLY WHAT YOU ALWAYS WANTED! I CAME HERE TO TELL HIS HIGHNESS SOMETHING—THEN NONE OF YOU WILL SEE ME AGAIN!”

“…WHEN DID I DAY THAT WAS WHAT I WANTED?!”

“I’M SORRY, WERE OUR ENTIRE MORTAL LIVES A BLUR FOR YOU?!”

“WHEN—?!” Feng Xin pauses, amending. “WHEN IN THE LAST TWO CENTURIES HAVE I SAID THAT?!”

“YOU DIDN’T HAVE TO!”

“I DON’T WANT THAT!”

“…WHY?!”

Feng Xin’s voice is strained with exasperation—but as always, he speaks plainly.

“…DO YOU REALLY THINK WE CAN JUST WALK OUT OF EACH OTHER’S LIVES, MU QING?!”

To Xie Lian’s dismay…

Mu Qing half screams, half sobs in reply.

“WHY CAN’T WE?!”

“San Lang…” He swallows hard. “The storm sounds like it’s getting pretty bad. We should warn them that we’re down here.”

Hua Cheng doesn’t reply, but Xie Lian sees a silver butterfly dart through the darkness, flying up the mountainside far faster than they could climb.

That’s a good idea—once it’s up there, it can pass on that Hua Cheng and Xie Lian are waiting at the—

Xie Lian feels Hua Cheng stiffen beside him, his expression growing dark.

“…San Lang?”

At the top of Mount Tonglu, visibility is only a few meters ahead.

All Mu Qing can see through the swirling clouds and snow is Feng Xin—who reaches forward, roughly rubbing the back of his glove against Mu Qing's cheek.

"WHAT ARE YOU DOING?!"

"STOP CRYING!"

"FUCK OFF, I'M NOT—!"

"IT'LL FREEZE TO YOUR FACE!"

Feng Xin cups Mu Qing's face in both of his hands, squinting at the tear drops sticking to his eyelashes.

Ironically enough, covered in snow like this—he doesn't look so different from the form that mortals worship.

"IF YOU DON'T STOP, IT COULD FREEZE YOUR EYELIDS SHUT!"

"I…" Mu Qing chokes, staring up at him with wide eyes, then he shoves him back, staggering backwards in the snow. "WHAT THE FUCK?!"

"WHAT?!"

Mu Qing—

All he can remember is being back in the heavens, hundreds of years ago.

Being shoved back against a wall, so certain Feng Xin was about to scream at him over a typo in one of his temples, but…

'Who did it?'

He had been worried about a bruise on Mu Qing's face.

And after, when he kissed him—

' …You taste the same.'

…Have they really been doing this for that long?

"THIS ISN'T FUCKING FAIR , FENG XIN!"

"YOU THINK I DON'T KNOW THAT?!" The martial god glares.

"YOU'RE THE ONE SAYING YOU WANT TO LEAVE ALL THE SUDDEN—!"

"BECAUSE YOU WERE RIGHT!" Mu Qing interrupts him, his throat raw. "BECAUSE I DON'T DESERVE TO HAVE ANYTHING TO DO WITH HIS HIGHNESS, OR—!"

"WHAT ARE YOU TALKING ABOUT?!" Feng Xin frowns, grabbing him by the shoulder, but Mu Qing shoves him off again.

"DID YOU FORGET THAT FUCKING PLAY?!" He sobs. "THAT WAS MY FAULT!"

How could he forget?

Hearing an actor who was playing their friend, screaming in agony.

Begging for their help.

All while a crowd jeered, counting every single cut.

"IF I HADN'T SAID WHAT I DID, HE WOULDN'T HAVE RUN OFF! NONE OF IT WOULD HAVE HAPPENED!"

"YOU COULDN'T HAVE KNOWN WHAT THAT FREAK WAS GOING TO—!"

"THAT DOESN'T MATTER!" Mu Qing sobs, shaking his head violently. "BECAUSE NOW, I KNOW HOW IT FELT!"

Feng Xin freezes, his voice so quiet with shock, it's lost to the wind.

"…What?"

"I CAN'T—!" Mu Qing tears at his hair, shoulders shaking. "I CAN'T LIVE WITH THAT!"

And there's something about the agonized, helpless edge to Mu Qing's voice that makes something in Feng Xin's head crack.

Unleashing a flood of blind terror.

Mu Qing jumps when he feels Feng Xin grab him by the shoulders, and—

He's gripping Mu Qing so tightly, the martial god can't push him away—shaking him fiercely.

“DON’T SAY THAT!” He roars, startling Mu Qing out of his spiral. “DON’T EVER FUCKING SAY THAT!”

The two stare at each other, wide eyed and confused, breathing hard.

“I…”

Rumble…

The two turn their heads, and—

There’s just a wall of white.

Lower on the mountain, Xie Lian feels his stomach sink even further—hearing the tell tale rumble of an avalanche.

“…Dianxia, we have to move out of the way.” Hua Cheng reaches over to grab Xie Lian, who resists—

Running towards the wall of snow instead of away from it, panicking.

“What about Feng Xin and Mu Qing?!”

“Your highness, you can’t reach them, they’re already swept up!”

Xie Lian shakes his head, refusing to turn back. “I can’t leave them! What if we can’t find them—? Mount Tonglu is huge, we can’t—!”

“I promise I’ll find them for you, gege,” Hua Cheng swears, audibly desperate to get him to turn back.

“But if you get swept into a crevasse, you won’t be able to get out on your own. We don’t have enough time!”

Xie Lian swallows hard, his lips trembling—knowing that Hua Cheng is right.

But his hesitation was costly.

Before he can make it back to the Ghost King, who has already transformed, claws reaching out to grasp him—

What feels like a wall of concrete slams into his back, swallowing him beneath a river of ice and snow.

“DIANXIA!”

Xie Lian can’t feel which way is up or down.

All he hears is the roaring of the snow around him, freezing cold—chunks of ice the size of small houses crushing down on him, cracking his ribs.

And over all of that, he hears screaming.

Countless voices, all around him.

“YOUR HIGHNESS!”

“HELP US!”

“I CAN’T BREATHE!”

“MOMMY!”

“PLEASE, MY LEGS WON’T MOVE—JUST TAKE MY DAUGHTER AND RUN!”

“WE DID EVERYTHING YOU ASKED OF US!”

One voice is perfectly clear, speaking as though it might be next to Xie Lian’s ear.

“Do not fall for the cuckoo’s tricks, little prince.”

Xie Lian tries to croak out in response, choking on snow as it fills his mouth and nose, and that voice speaks again;

“What is the only part of our inheritance that we carry to our graves?”

Is…

Is that some sort of riddle? But—?

A scream interrupts his thoughts, loud and blood curdling—louder than all of the others.

A woman, her howl so blood curdling and painful, and Xie Lian can feel it in his gut—

A mother.

“SAN LANG!”

Xie Lian scrambles, panicked, choking and coughing.

The snow got him, too?

“...NO!”

Her howling out screams the avalanche.

“ZHU XIN, SAVE HIM! LEAVE ME, SAVE HIM!”

Zhu…Zhu Xin?

Xie Lian feels his eyes roll back from the lack of air, only hearing that final shriek as he slips out of consciousness.

“SAN LANG!”

“It’s funny,” Pei Ming has one arm thrown around his middle, now properly bandaged, staring at the sky overhead. “It almost looks normal out here.”

They’re on the very edge of Wuyong, having traveled far further and far faster on the back of the Ox than they did before.

Pei Su, Banyue, and the farmers are sitting off to the side, devouring the provisions that the Rain Master brought along with her, leaving the general stretched out beside the road, his arms folded behind his head.

Yushi Huang hums from beside him.

"Once the Kiln shuts, we'll be able to take the mortals to a nearby town for treatment," She explains calmly. "By then, we'll both have to plan our next steps."

Pei Ming will have healed enough to fight by then—his body is already recovering.

"...When it comes to that," Yushi Huang reaches over, lifting up Yulong and sliding it over to him, "You should take this. It's better off in your hands than it is in mine."

"..." Pei Ming sits up, staring down at the sword like just touching it could burn him.

"That's kind of you, Lord Rain Master," he shakes his head, looking away. "But I have no right to touch that sword. It belongs with you."

Yushi Huang sighs, reaching down to pluck something from the ground.

Here, at the very edges of Tonglu, life endures.

Blades of grass poke up through the ash, and with them, small blossoms of iris blossom, untouched by the coming winter.

Soft blue petals curling softly, veins of purple running through them.

"...What makes you think you don't have the right, general? I'm offering it."

When Pei Ming doesn't reply, she gently presses him. "Do you think I don't have the right to give it to you?"

"No."

"Then..."

"You know why I can't take it, your highness," Pei Ming mutters, refusing to look at her.

"...Ming Guang..." Yushi Huang sighs, shaking her head. "We should have spoken about this a long time ago—I'm sorry for that."

The general stiffens, daring the glance at her from the corner of his eye. "I'm the one who has been avoiding you, your highness."

"Maybe," she agrees, fiddling with the flower between her fingertips. "But I never sought you out, either."

That wasn't her responsibility. Pei Ming can't imagine a reason she would have to ever want to see his face again. In fact—he always thought that her absence from the heavens was, in fact, an effort to stay away from him.

"...And I should have," Yushi Huang concludes quietly. "Because I never, ever want to speak my mind," she turns her head slowly, watching him with ancient eyes in a youthful face.

"But...there are so many things that I want to say to you."

Pei Ming swallows hard.

He braces himself—knowing that he's spent a lifetime running from this conversation, but now that she's here...

He doesn't have the right to deny that to her, if talking is what she wants.

"...More than anything else, that I'm sorry."

The general freezes, his mind blank.

Unable to comprehend that phrase—not coming from her, of all people.

"...What?"

Yushi Huang plucks another flower from the ground, twisting the stem until the petals become a blur.

"It's hard, dispelling a myth. Especially when you're the story that people believe in."

"I..." Pei Ming finally gathers the nerve to stare at her, their eyes meeting in a rare instance of clarity. "I don't understand."

Yushi Huang smiles faintly, her nose crinkling—but the warmth doesn't reach her eyes.

No—her gaze holds...genuine remorse.

"I am not a saint, Pei Ming." She explains quietly, her knees pulled up against her chest. "I feel anger, resentment, and fear. I make choices out of spite. And I...I placed a heavy burden on you, and I allowed you to carry it for so long."

Pei Ming can't stop shaking his head in vehement disagreement.

"You—you're..." he exhales shakily, his stomach twisting into knots. "You're the bravest woman I've ever met. You were protecting your family, your country. I...what I did...I have no excuse for."

"...I'll tell you a secret," Yushi Huang murmurs—as though she's speaking to a dear friend, rather than her oldest enemy.

"I hated my family."

Hearing such words coming from her is...startling.

"My father, my brothers and sisters...Every night when I fell asleep...I would pray to the gods to make me a bastard, just so they would send me away." She leans her chin against her forearms, twisting the two flowers in her fingers together, forming a knot between them.

"Just for being born from the lowest concubine...I was like less than a human being to them," she recalls calmly, lifting her eyes to stare at the others, sitting a ways away from them. "How do you think they viewed commoners? Farmers...soldiers?"

She shakes her head somberly, reaching down to pluck another flower.

"There was a war in Yushi long before you or your army came. I had never known anything different."

Except that war was between the royal family, and the common people.

Just as it was in Xuli.

Wars are wasteful acts of theater. A violent cycle of reincarnation in which empires die, only to be reborn once again.

And so often, they're fought by two sides of the same coin.

Xuli and Yushi.

Xianle and Yong'an.

Yong'an and Banyue.

The farmers and the soldiers acting as the metal in between. Flipping round and round, doomed to be crushed when the coin lands, deciding the victor.

"My entire life, no one in my family looked at me. Not until the day I died."

Yushi Huang doesn't recall that day with much feeling one way or the other—a stark comparison to the weight that Pei Ming seems to place upon it.

"When I asked my father to take the crown—it was like that was the first time he remembered that I existed."

He shed a tear for her.

Just one.

Her siblings watched her with distant curiosity. As though they were seeing an exotic beetle speak the human language by some sort of magic.

"I didn't do what I did that day for them," she shakes her head. "If anything—it was to spite them."

"...You saved them," Pei Ming points out, still struggling to follow her train of thought...but Yushi Huang settles her gaze upon him, silently imploring him to listen more closely.

"When you saw me walk out to the city walls, what did that make you think of my father?"

"...That he was a coward," Pei Ming admits quietly.

Much like the other princes and princesses of Yushi—willing to allow the youngest of them to give her life in their name.

"Because he was," Yushi Huang plucks another flower. "They all were. But royalty—it isn't supposed to be that way."

Pei Ming finally sits up fully, his own fingers brushing through the grass. "You don't think so?"

Yushi Huang shakes her head, certain of that.

"...Then what is it supposed to be?"

Yushi Huang has spoken more in this conversation than she normally would in an entire month--and she doesn't hesitate to offer her answer now.

"Something that unites people."

Her death didn't save Yushi. It didn't save her family.

It allowed her people to retain dignity in defeat.

To hold their heads high, even as the old world began to fade away.

Because their final Queen was now the Goddess of the Harvest—and each time the rain began to fall, they knew that she was with them.

"...I still don't know why that means you should have to apologize to me," Pei Ming admits. "Just because your family was cruel...that doesn't change—"

"Intentions matter," Yushi Huang contradicts him quietly. "You intended to save lives."

And Yushi Huang's actions, while brave and selfless, were fueled by far more spiteful intentions.

She doesn't regret what she did.

But she does regret never explaining to Pei that she never viewed him as an executioner, or an enemy.

"...Once you cause enough death, it doesn't matter how many lives you save." Pei Ming swallows down a rush of emotion bubbling up in his throat, remembering how small she felt, drawing her final breaths in his arms. "I realized that when I caused yours."

Battle became such a naked, ugly thing after that.

Pei Ming couldn't find joy in victory, or thrill in the fight itself.

He could only see the ugly outcome that always came with it.

And...he didn't want to fight anymore. Not after that.

He starts after a moment, looking down to find...

Yushi Huang is grasping one of his hands in her own, squeezing gently.

"General...did you know that we met before that day?"

Pei Ming pauses, staring over at her with wide eyes, shaking his head.

"We didn't."

"We did." Yushi Huang smiles fondly at the memory. "It was before the invasion—and you and your officers were visiting the capital during negotiations. You actually had affairs with three of my sisters if I remember correctly."

Pei Ming had forgotten—but now, he's sheepish.

"...Did I say something inappropriate to you?" He mutters, instantly remorseful—only for the princess to laugh softly, shaking her head.

"No, no...you were the first man who ever gave me flowers," her eyes are soft now, recalling how surprised she was, warm with fondness.

He saw her alone, working a garden while the other nobles of Yushi were making their way to the banquet—a beauty among the weeds.

And he thought it was a shame that such a lovely young girl would be left doing chores on a night meant for celebration.

Instead of hurrying on with the other officers to accept a place of honor, he lingered with her.

Offering the young lady an armful of flowers that had been thrown his way during the parade upon their entrance to the city—cheekily saying that each rose paled compared to her.

Yushi Huang had been sixteen back then. Blushing and smiling, unsure of how to respond to such attention—quietly thanking him as she continued about her work.

He invited her to walk into the banquet with him, offering her a dance, and she agreed to come later, but...never did.

She finished her work—only to stop in the hallway, seeing her own dirt stained, farmer tanned body in comparison to the soft, delicately perfumed ladies of the court, and...

The princess carried her roses back to her room, delicately counting each petal—like stars in the sky.

Knowing that she would never be at ease in a place like that, even if—

Even if she wanted so badly to dance with the young soldier who gave her flowers, his smile shining like the sun as he told her that she was lovely.

She isn't surprised that Pei Ming doesn't remember.

But Yushi Huang does.

She remembers rolling onto her stomach in her bed, staring at the moon outside the window, playing out countless scenarios in her head.

Her mortal life was uneventful, filled with hard work and little fun—and it left her prone to daydreaming.

Imagining what it would have been like if they had danced. How his hand would have felt in hers. If she would have had the nerve to say something funny—how he might have laughed.

If he might have called her beautiful again—

Because no one had ever called her that before.

Then, she would fall asleep with one of those roses next to her face, breathing it in with a sigh as she drifted off, dreaming of a happier life.

One that would never be her own.

Yushi Huang isn't ignorant to the real reason that Xuan Ji hates her.

When people tell the story of the General Who Broke his Sword and the Princess Who Slit her Throat, more often than not—they're depicted as star crossed lovers.

When the Rain Master was young, part of her had wished that was true.

It was more beautiful than reality.

The truth behind the fiction was a broken war hero and a princess consumed with disdain.

These myths that people pinned their hopes and dreams upon—each rusted and warped beneath their gilded layers of gold.

Yushi Huang spoke the truth before.

It is hard to dispel your own mythos—especially when that's all the people around you seem to adore you for.

"...Us four famous tales are a rotten bunch, aren't we?" Pei Ming admits tiredly, looking down at their joined hands.

"It's almost like all of our titles are some sort of cruel inside joke."

The General Who Broke His Sword

The Princess Who Slit Her Throat.

The Prince Who Pleased the Gods.

The Young Lord Who Poured Wine.

Each tale holds some twisted irony or painful secret.

The young lord poured wine from a stolen cup.

The prince who pleased the gods was scorned by them in turn.

The princess who slit her throat did so out of spite.

And the general who broke his sword didn't want to fight anymore.

"...Those tales are old," Yushi Huang shrugs.

"Who's to say they're the greatest ones we'll ever tell?"

Pei Ming laughs tiredly, shaking his head—eyes exhausted.

"I'm too old for that, I think. My greatest stories are long behind me."

He hopes they are, anyway.

If he has to go last, finishing this story on his own—then he would rather this be the epilogue.

Yushi Huang squeezes his hand gently, shaking his head.

"I don't think that's true." She murmurs. "What's the point of growing up if nothing comes of it? You've changed so much."

Pei Ming doesn't disagree with her on that.

"...I used to have really strong views on what a king should be myself, when I was young." Pei Ming recalls. "That's what I thought, anyway."

"You don't anymore?"

His gaze slides over to Rong Guang, chained beside the Guardian Ox.

"I prayed to Jun Wu when I was conflicted about invading Yushi...and he told me that we're born with roles to play. Mine...was always to be a soldier."

And Pei Ming had believed that whole heartedly.

When Rong Guang did what he did...Pei Ming had told himself that his friend was using him- trying to push him into being something that he wasn't.

And those things may have been true. But...

Pei Ming is old enough now to understand how fiercely independent he had been.

That so much of his reaction had been driven by the fact that he felt trapped, forced down a path that he had been desperately trying to leave.

"...Now," Pei Ming sighs, thinking back on it. "I don't think we're born to be anything. We grow into who we're meant to be."

Yushi Huang smiles faintly in agreement. "What would you say you've grown into, then?"

"...I don't know," Pei Ming admits after a moment. "I've been lost, lately."

If you had asked him a few months ago, ironic as it is—

He would have said, 'a husband.'

"Well..." Yushi Huang looks up at the sky, seeing a faint outline of the sun, hanging low. "We've grown up together. I don't see why we couldn't figure it out together."

It startles Pei Ming to hear, but...she's right.

In terms of celestial age...they may as well be twins.

"...You have rotten luck," Pei Ming shakes his head, smiling half heartedly.

"After all of these years—you're stuck with me all over again."

The Rain Master turns to face him, sitting up on her knees.

"I'll tell you another secret," she murmurs, reaching for his head.

She lays something there, tangling it amongst the slightly unruly waves of dark hair.

A crown of irises.

Doing so places them face to face—and she looks him directly in the eye with a smile that breaks his heart.

"I have always considered you my oldest friend, Pei Ming."

And finally, like a dam breaking—his lips begin to tremble, eyes welling with tears.

"...I don't deserve it," he whispers, shuddering when the princess wipes one tear away with her thumb.

"Life isn't about what we deserve."

More often than not, it's about what you need.

And now more than ever—

Pei Ming desperately needs a friend.

There's as much comfort as there is an ache in the knowledge that, even when he didn't know it—he has had one all along.

Learning now that sometimes, facing your greatest failures can reveal blessings in disguise.

"...I'm so tired," he admits, another tear slipping down his cheek, shuddering when her palm presses against his jaw.

A simple gesture of comfort, from the last person he ever expected to give it.

"Rest, general."

Pei Su looks over some time later—startled to find his general slumped over in slumber, his head resting against the Rain Master's leg as she strokes his hair, soothing him as he dreams.

Allowing him to sleep while he can, watching him with sorrowful eyes.

Wishing she could shed tears as easily as him.

Like Xie Lian, she was raised in a family that prioritized dignity and grace over transparency.

She feels the same as anyone else, as much as anyone else—but showing it is harder.

It made her clumsy before, struggling to convey how she felt about Ling Wen—even after centuries of watching from afar.

And now, if she could—she would shed tears for Pei Ming.

Because his battle is far from over, and before long...

He'll need to fight again.

It's dark.

But when he sits up...he sees dust motes drifting like liquid gold in diagonal rays of light, coming in through cracks in wooden beams.

Where...

His head turns from side to side, taking in a small, cramped space—distant cheers coming from below.

He leans over, bracing his hand against the wall, peering through the cracks, and...

There's some sort of parade going on in the streets.

Dancers throwing flowers, acrobats cartwheeling ahead. Cavalrymen trotting through, armor gleaming.

And a prince, shining like the sun.

Everything about it feels so familiar—and yet he's sure that he's never been here before. And—

And he hears something behind him.

Quiet, ragged sobbing.

"It isn't fair!"

A child's voice, quietly pleading.

"Please—it isn't fair!"

He turns around to comfort the boy—but when he does, he freezes, scrambling backwards until he slams against the wall.

Staring at the mask on the child's face, even as the boy weeps from underneath it.

"It isn't FAIR!"

Half smiling, half crying.

Xie Lian screams.

So loud, it feels like his ears are about to burst open from the force of it, desperate to get away, clawing at the wood behind him, fingernails ripping.

"IT'S NOT FAIR!"

"IT'S NOT FAIR!"

"IT'S NOT—!"

The prince sits up with a gasp, chest heaving.

"Just..." he rasps, clutching at the front of his robes, feeling around until his fingers wrap around Hong'er. "Just a dream..."

It's ironic—most people know they're dreaming when they can't see clearly.

For Xie Lian, it's just the opposite.

When he reaches down to feel underneath him—it’s a soft layer of grass placed upon a large boulder, and most of the snow has already been brushed off of him.

“…San Lang?” He calls out, looking around for his aura, but…

It’s completely dark.

He’s alone.

He must have lost his boots somehow during the avalanche, his robes torn in places from scraping against shards of ice.

The stone floor of the cave is cool beneath the balls of his feet—and surprisingly smooth.

“San Lang—? Oh!”

Xie Lian gasps when he stumbles into someone, rubbing his nose with his palm as he takes a step back. “I’m so sorry, I didn’t mean to—!”

But when he reaches out to adjust the stranger’s robes…they’re made of stone.

…A statue? Inside Mount Tonglu?

"…What are you?" Xie Lian whispers curiously into the dark, fingertips dragging over robes carved from stone.

Familiar.

The height and width of the figure is eye level with him—but when he reaches to touch its face…

There's a thin veil covering it.

The prince pulls his fingers back, baffled—taking another few steps away from the statue—

Only to stumble into another one—twisting around to steady its shoulders with his hands, startled.

"…What on earth…?" He mumbles, cautiously feeling his way around, hands extended.

Only to find another statue, and another, and another—

In varying sizes and poses, but…

Xie Lian tilts his head back, whispering aloud to himself—

"…A Cave of Ten Thousand Gods?"

He's heard of them before—but they're exceedingly rare.

For the time and dedication they take to build. Hundreds of worshippers could work for decades, and still not come close to finishing the task.

Any god that's worshiped here…must be incredibly powerful, to inspire such devotion.

Xie Lian continues stumbling forward through the dark—hands outstretched in order to avoid knocking into any other statues—

And eventually they come into contact with a softer, familiar set of fingers—

With the tell tale callouses from years of using a saber.

Clink!

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or use without permission.

[image]

CREDIT: BAN

[image]

CREDIT: SYL

GOAT!CHENG

[image]

CREDIT: BAN

Do you know what you learn
after almost a thousand years of watching the rain?

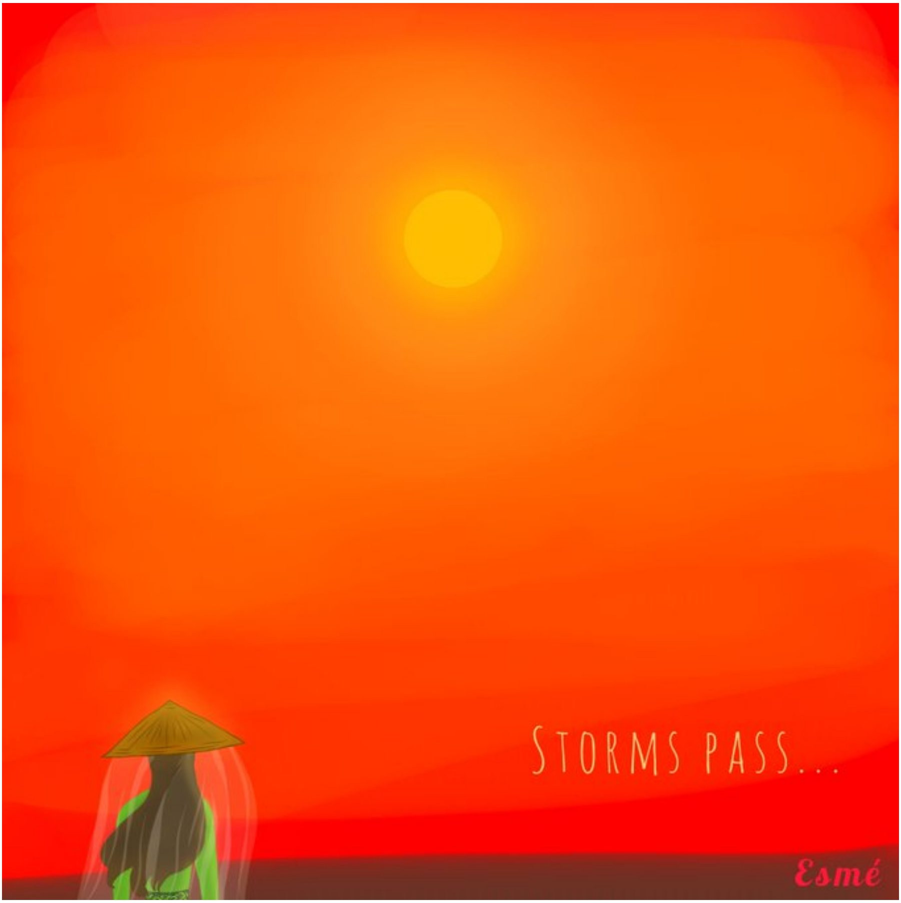
Esmé



STORMS PASS...
Esmé

CREDIT: ESME

Chapter End Notes

Cave of 10,000 Gods Time!

Thank you so much to Ban, Syl, and Esme for their amazing artwork!

xoxo, Evie

The Cave of Ten Thousand Gods

Chapter Summary

> "…In that case, don't you think we should try and see which god is being worshiped here?" Xie Lian mutters, reaching for one of the veils, "It could be the same one from that temple, before…"
>
> But before he can grasp it, Hua Cheng continues tugging him along.
>
> "It isn't."
>
> "…How are you so sure?" Xie Lian asks, almost certain now that the ghost king knows far more than what he's admitting to.
>
> "That place felt evil," Hua Cheng answers resolutely. "This pace doesn't."

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"…San Lang!" A relieved smile spreads across Xie Lian's face as he throws his arms around Hua Cheng's neck, hugging him tightly. "You're alright!"

The ghost king is a little stiffer than usual—but he still hugs the prince back, arms right around his waist.

"Of course—but we should keep moving your highness, we don't have much time."

Right…before they heard Feng Xin and Mu Qing screaming…Hua Cheng seemed desperate to tell him something.

But they had to go to the Kiln, first.

"Alright…but do you know what this place is?"

Hua Cheng is already pulling him along. "Can't say that I do."

That gives Xie Lian pause.

Hua Cheng, who knows everything about everyone…doesn't know about a Cave of Ten Thousand Gods underneath Mount Tonglu?

"…You really don't? But…I thought you spent ten years here."

"The mountain is incredibly vast," Hua Cheng's reply is calm—logical as ever. "Of course, there would be sections that I'm not familiar with."

That does make sense, but…

"…If that's true, how do you know which way we should go?"

Now, there's a brief pause.

"…I don't."

Xie Lian wiggles his wrist in Hua Cheng's grasp, emphasizing how firm and brisk his pace is. "You certainly seem like you do…"

"My luck has always been good," Hua Cheng counters. "If I choose the path, there's a solid chance it's the right one."

He isn't wrong.

But that's always been true—and he's always had Xie Lian choose their path before.

"…In that case, don't you think we should try and see which god is being worshiped here?" Xie Lian mutters, reaching for one of the veils, "It could be the same one from that temple, before…"

But before he can grasp it, Hua Cheng continues tugging him along.

"It isn't."

"…How are you so sure?" Xie Lian asks, almost certain now that the ghost king knows far more than what he's admitting to.

"That place felt evil," Hua Cheng answers resolutely. "This pace doesn't."

Well. He has a point there.

"…Then what's the harm in looking?"

"Remember the veils on the dead brides on Mount Yu Jun?" Hua Cheng reminds him. "Who is to say that the statues won't become violent if you disturb them?"

Another good point, but…

"…I thought you just said this place didn't feel evil?" Xie Lian points out, confused. "If it was filled with traps, wouldn't we sense that?"

"…"

Hua Cheng stops walking for a moment, his shoulders hunched.

"…San L—?"

"We can come back and look at them later."

…Whatever the reason must be…

Hua Cheng really is desperate to get him into the Kiln, isn't he?

But what could he tell Xie Lian there that he couldn't say right now?

"…Alright," The prince agrees, allowing himself to be pulled along.

They delicately weave their way between rows and configurations of statues, Xie Lian following along compliantly, until…

"…HEY!" A voice screams in the distance, echoing off of the cave walls. "CAN ANYONE HEAR US IN HERE?!"

Xie Lian stops walking.

"HELLO?!"

"…It's Nan Feng and Fu Yao…" he mutters, twisting his head around to look in their direction.

Hua Cheng rolls his eyes at the way Xie Lian immediately adopts their disguises, even if they all know who the two "deputy gods" are at this point.

"They'll be fine."

"WE'RE SUFFOCATING!"

Xie Lian is visibly worried, and Hua Cheng wipes a hand down his face, grumbling against his hand—

"That's just dramatic."

"IS ANYONE HERE?! YOU CAN'T JUST LEAVE US TO DIE LIKE THIS!”

“Dianxia—”

“They need help, San Lang!”

“They’re really—dianxia, you can’t just run off here!” Hua Cheng’s voice fades away as Xie Lian charges in the direction of Mu Qing and Feng Xin’s voices, delicately twisting around statues rather than damaging them.

“NAN FENG?! FU YAO?!”

“YOUR HIGHNESS!” Feng Xin cries. "YOU'RE HERE TOO?!"

"YES!" Xie Lian feels himself running around the curved side of a cavern wall, following his voice. "I GOT SWEPT UP IN THE SAME AVALANCHE THAT YOU TOO DID!"

Then, Mu Qing's voice cries out, panicked.

"WAIT! STOP RUNNING!"

Xie Lian doesn’t, only slowing down marginally as he listens to the two argue.

“DON’T TELL ME YOU’RE TOO PROUD TO ASK FOR HIS HELP?!”

“IT’S NOT THAT, YOU IDIOT!” Mu Qing screams. “HE’S NOT GOING TO BE ABLE TO SEE THE EDGE!”

“…The edge—?”

Then, there's no more ground beneath his feet—just thin air, sending Xie Lian plummeting down into darkness, hearing--

"Are you happy?! He's gonna FREAK OUT—!"

"I FORGOT, OKAY—?!"

Why is he going to—?

SLAM!

He lands hard, but into something...relatively soft.

Xie Lian twists around, struggling to sit up—feeling something tacky and stringy wrapping around his limbs.

"W...what is this?!"

"Probably some sort of magical thread," Mu—

'Fu Yao' replies, sounding slightly strained.

"The sort of thing you'd expect in an evil cave."

Xie Lian can't help but think to himself that this cave doesn't feel evil at all. Actually, up until he'd fallen into this pit, there was something distinctly pleasant about it.

"Yeah!" Nan Feng agrees quickly, clearing his throat. "Just magic thread! Nothing to worry about!"

"..." Xie Lian squirms, his face slowly turning green. "...This doesn't feel like thread..." He mumbles, shivers running up his spine.

"It is!" Fu Yao reassures him, "It just feels different because of the evil magic! We're the ones who can see it!"

"...You..." Xie Lian's voice cracks slightly, and both of them wince. "Why are you guys trying...to convince me...this sticky stuff...is thread..."

"BECAUSE IT IS!" They both cry in unison.

"It is, dianxia! There's nothing to be concerned about!"

"It's not from a bug!"

"...WHY WOULD YOU SAY THAT?!"

Xie Lian hears something scuttle in the distance—

And they're done for.

"....EEEEEEEEAKKKKKKKKK!"

Both of the martial gods beside him cringe, unable to cover their ears.

"FENG XIN! KILL IT! WHERE IS IT?! IS IT IN MY HAIR?! GET IT—!"

He flails and twists around violently, screaming at the top of his lungs until the walls of the cave rattle, and Feng Xin squirms valiantly beside him.

"I DON'T SEE ANY, YOUR HIGHNESS! I REALLY DON'T SEE ANY HERE!"

Xie Lian wrenches himself around, coughing, and Mu Qing flinches when he feels something wet land on his cheek, vaguely disgusted at first, assuming it's saliva, but...

"...WHY ARE YOU COUGHING UP BLOOD?!"

"I-I BROKE MY RIBS EARLIER—!"

"AND YOU'RE STILL RUNNING LIKE THAT?!"

"IT DOESN'T MATTER!" Xie Lian cries, "FENG XIN, DID YOU KILL IT?!"

"HE JUST TOLD YOU THAT HE DOESN'T SEE ANYTHING!" Mu Qing snaps at him. "AND YOU COULD PUNCTURE A LUNG!"

"I t...think I already did!" Xie Lian wheezes, "It's fine, Mu Qing, just—!"

All three fall silent.

"..."

"..."

"..."

"...How long have you known?" Mu Qing asks him grimly, staring up at the cavern ceiling, silently willing it to collapse in on all of them.

Xie Lian is still trembling with fear, limbs splayed.

"I...not that long..."

"...It's because Nan Feng, Feng Xin, and Nan Yang sound too similar, isn't it?" Feng Xin mumbles miserably.

"Oh, no..." Xie Lian fights back another cough, still squirming. "I...just thought...you were a big fan of your general, that's all..."

"Don't patronize him," Mu Qing mutters, still glaring at the ceiling. "That doesn't actually help anything."

"...I wasn't trying to..." Xie Lian mumbles, shoulders shaking with another silent cough. "How did you two...end up down here?"

"The avalanche," Feng Xin groans. "It swept us down here ages ago. Our mouths were covered too at first, but we managed to chew our way through and call for help..."

"...Your highness," Mu Qing sighs, "twist to the right—you should be able to get my hands free."

"Oh, so now you're accepting help?" Feng Xin glares over at him, annoyed—only for Mu Qing to send him an equally irritated look as Xie Lian moves to follow his instructions.

"If he's actually punctured a lung, he's drowning in his own blood right now."

Xie Lian shudders—but not because of what Mu Qing said. Rather than that, he's just fighting back the urge to gag as he tears at the spider silk around Mu Qing's wrists, freeing them.

"If I don't work on him soon, he'll pass out," Mu Qing mutters, wrenching one hand free. "And then we'll have to figure out how to get out of here with an unconscious person in tow."

Which is almost as daunting as figuring out how to get free of the silk to begin with.

The moment Mu Qing's other palm is free, he presses them both to Xie Lian's sides.

"...Yeah, it's nearly every single one," Mu Qing grouses, irritated by the way Xie Lian doesn't even seem bothered. "Your elbow has a fracture too, from the look of it..."

"...Really?" Xie Lian blinks, sounding genuinely surprised—and Feng Xin and Mu Qing share a silent look.

Feng Xin watches as Mu Qing works on the prince, and it occurs to him.

"...Didn't you have something you wanted to talk to the prince about? Isn't that why you came here?"

Mu Qing freezes as Xie Lian looks over at him expectantly.

"...We can talk about it later," he grumbles.

"Why? You made it sound pretty fucking important—"

"Because he's the only one who needs to know about it, alright?!" Mu Qing grumbles, pulling his hands back. "There—there's more to deal with, but I need to save the rest of my spiritual power for getting out of here."

The moment he says that—

(Almost as if on cue.)

—a voice calls down from the darkness above.

"Your highness, is that you?"

Xie Lian lets out a trembling sigh of relief, craning his neck.

"San Lang!" He cries. "I knew you'd come!"

"...I did tell your highness, wandering off in a place like this is dangerous." Hua Cheng explains--sounding calm, but...

There's something off. Xie Lian can tell from his tone.

"I'm sorry—I found Feng Xin and Mu Qing, though! They're both alright!"

"He doesn't give a damn."

Xie Lian sends Mu Qing a pleading look, waving it off. "Could E'Ming cut us loose?"

"...E'Ming isn't in a good state right now," Hua Cheng mutters, leaping down into the pit with them.

Unlike the others, his boots don't sink into the silk, remaining free as he walks over.

"It isn't?" Xie Lian frowns, quickly taking Hua Cheng's hand as he uses his claws to slice the prince free, eagerly clinging to his side to get away from the silk. "What's wrong with it?"

"Being this close to the Kiln makes E'Ming unstable."

"How convenient," Mu Qing mutters.

Hua Cheng's gaze lands on him sharply as Xie Lian hands over

Fangxin, giving Mu Qing the chance to cut himself and Feng Xin free.

"Hold onto me, dianxia." This time, Xie Lian doesn't disobey—holding his arms tightly around Hua Cheng's middle as the ghost king lifts his umbrella.

"What about the other two?"

"They'll be fine," Hua Cheng repeats his words from earlier as a gust of wind fills the umbrella, gently lifting the two of them up and over the edge of the pit, depositing them back on the ground above.

"...AHHHHHHH!"

Feng Xin and Mu Qing both shriek as another wind passes through—this one far more violent, swirling them about in a small cyclone before tossing them out, leaving them landing on top of one another in a heap.

"See? Safe and sound." Hua Cheng snaps his umbrella shut.

Mu Qing brushes himself off, straightening his clothes with a glare.

But when he sees Hua Cheng's face…he hesitates.

"…That's what he really looks like?"

Xie Lian swallows down a small bout of jealousy.

Mu Qing and Feng Xin have both seen what Hua Cheng looks like as a child, and a teenager—and now, they're seeing his true form.

Xie Lian has felt it against him, seen a loose outline of spiritual energy, but…

"What of it?" Hua Cheng asks him coldly.

"Nothing," Mu Qing responds curtly. "You just look like…" He glances over to Feng Xin for assistance, but gives up when the general stares back at him cluelessly.

"Ming Guang? I said that before, but it's more noticeable in this skin."

"That's not what I…"

"This isn't a skin," Xie Lian corrects them both, "You heard San Lang just now—this is what he really looks like."

Feng Xin's eyebrows raise. "Really? I thought the resemblance to Pei was intentional since everyone thinks he's so handsome—but I suppose it was a coincidence."

"I wasn't trying to say that he looks like Pei Ming!" Mu Qing snaps. "Just forget it!"

He says that, but Hua Cheng seems lost in thought now, brow pinched, his gaze suddenly distant.

"Besides…what is this place?" Mu Qing mutters, holding Xie Lian by the sleeve.

In doing so, he pointedly situates himself between Xie Lian and Hua Cheng—something the ghost king doesn't fail to notice, his eye glinting.

"It's a cave of Ten Thousand Gods," Xie Lian explains, "Pretty amazing, right?"

Feng Xin frowns, looking around. "Who is worshiped here?"

"I don't know," Xie Lian admits, "I couldn't tell through the veils. But it must be someone pretty important, right?"

"In that case," Mu Qing reaches over, "Why don't we just—?"

FLASH!

"HEY!" Feng Xin draws his bow, "WHAT HAPPENED TO YOUR SABER BEING IN A BAD STATE?!"

Mu Qing is frozen, his fingers outstretched, faintly grasping one of the veils—

And the edge of E'Ming is pressed against his throat, gleaming wickedly.

Not cutting him—but it would only take the smallest movement to change that.

Hua Cheng smiles, cold—but polite.

"E'Ming is just stopping you from causing trouble."

Mu Qing drops the veil—but the saber still doesn't relent.

"What, I can't even touch the stone to feel it?!"

Hua Cheng's smile grows thin, "Not without causing trouble, no."

"…Mu Qing…" Xie Lian sighs. "San Lang told me he would explain everything later, so why don't we just drop it for now?"

Mu Qing stares at him, incredulous.

"Are you kidding?! What if I back off, and he doesn't?"

"That's fine," Feng Xin replies sharply, his bow aimed at Hua Cheng's neck. "Because I'm not backing off until you take that blade off of his fucking throat."

"There's no need for this," Xie Lian points out quietly, "none of us are enemies."

Mu Qing lowers his hand, E'Ming slips away—and Feng Xin lowers his bow, all in that order.

"My, my…" Hua Cheng's lip pulls back into a sneer as he steps forward, leading them through the cavern. "You two are terrifying," he muses, E'Ming flying back to his waist. "I better be careful."

Mu Qing has never been particularly clingy—but he holds Xie Lian's arm firmly as they walk.

"Why are we following him?" The god glares, watching Hua Cheng suspiciously. "What if he's leading us into some sort of trap?"

"I'm just stopping you from causing trouble in someone else's territory," Hua Cheng shrugs.

"This isn't YOUR territory!"

"If you want to run off on your own and fall into another pit, go ahead," Hua Cheng rolls his eyes. "I really couldn't care less."

Mu Qing's expression becomes even more sour as Xie Lian laughs awkwardly, shaking his head.

"San Lang, there's no need for that…"

"Wait, wait…" Feng Xin pauses, looking around. "I'm thinking…"

"Don't strain yourself," The Ghost King replies coldly.

"HEY!"

"Remember, we're not enemies here!" Xie Lian holds his hands up between the two of them, "what were you thinking, Feng Xin?"

"…" The martial god glares at Hua Cheng, clearing his throat. "Well—not many people have ever been able to enter Mount Tonglu, right? So…wouldn't this place have been built by ghosts? Do ghosts still worship gods?"

"…San Lang has never been to this part of the mountain before, so I wouldn't even know who to ask," Xie Lian admits with a frown.

But that sounds correct.

Behind them, their voices seem to fade into the background for Mu Qing.

Who keeps looking back and forth.

From the veiled statues, to Hua Cheng's face—

Then to his hand, twisting something back and forth between his fingertips.

A—

…A red pearl, braided into his hair.

The god feels the bottom of his stomach drop out, falling, falling, falling…

Trying to reconcile that Pearl, with…

Just then, a silvery flicker of light flashes in the corner of Mu Qing's eye, and…everything just seems to snap together with a painful click .

Xie Lian feels Mu Qing's hand tremble slightly where it grips his arm, covering it with his own gently.

"…Mu Qing? What's wrong?"

The martial god swallows thickly as Hua Cheng's gaze turns to him—whispering something that manages to baffle everyone.

"The…guy with the…the butterflies…"

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow, because—

Everyone knows about Hua Cheng's butterflies. That was exactly how everyone knew who it was that he encountered on Mount Yu Jun.

…So, why does Mu Qing sound so terrified?

"…FENG XIN— NOW!"

There was no spoken plan between the two—but the moment Feng Xin hears him scream, he acts on instinct, built on nearly a millennia of fighting together.

His bow snaps up as Mu Qing yanks Xie Lian behind him, firing into the ceiling.

BOOM!

"MOVE!"

They jerk backwards, just as a cave in crashes down around them, a pile of boulders blocking the path between the three of them, and Hua Cheng.

"What are you—?!" Xie Lian sputters, feeling Mu Qing haul him forward, sprinting through the cavern.

"We have to find a way out of here!"

"What about San Lang?!"

"FORGET ABOUT HIM!" Mu Qing snarls, shaking his head. "IT'S BETTER IF YOU NEVER SEE HIM AGAIN!"

Xie Lian freezes, his stomach turning to ice as his heels begin to drag.

…Never see him again?

"What are you saying?!"

Xie Lian won't stop dragging his feet, and Mu Qing gnashes his teeth together, panicking.

"Fine, look!" He reaches over, snatching the veil off of one of the statues—

And Feng Xin comes to a stop beside them, bow still drawn, his jaw dropping.

“…Oh, fuck…”

Xie Lian reaches forward, pressing his fingers over the statue’s cheek, its chin—tracing over the shape of his nose, and…

He yanks his wrist back with a shocked gasp, clutching it against his chest.

“There is only ONE god being worshiped here!” Mu Qing stomps his foot.

“YOU! They’re all YOU!”

He tears off another few veils for emphasis, and Feng Xin’s increasing sounds of shock are enough to confirm to Xie Lian that it’s true, and…

It feels just like the statue Hua Cheng carved for him in Puqi Shrine, many months ago.

“…Well…” Xie Lian’s voice is suddenly small, shocked. “That’s…that’s not…”

“…How do you know they’re all him?” Feng Xin scratches the side of his neck—not trusting Hua Cheng any more than Mu Qing does, but…

Not wanting Xie Lian to be disappointed, either.

“Who do you think was the one handling this one’s robes all of those years?” Mu Qing scowls. “I know EXACTLY what they look like, I would know them anywhere! And he had them right! Down to every last detail!”

He turns to Xie Lian, grabbing him by both wrists.

“Do you remember those dreams you used to have?” He presses the prince, looking him in the eye, staring desperately into the glow of Xie Lian’s cursed shackle, willing him to remember. “Back when we were kids?”

“…What?” Xie Lian frowns, straining to remember.

“Of the man with the silver butterflies!” Mu Qing prompts him, squeezing his wrists tighter. “You said it seemed like he knew you—and he told you to wait?”

All of that—

It sounds vaguely familiar, it's so long ago, Xie Lian can't remember the man's face, but…

The prince's stomach lurches.

He does remember that the man only had one eye.

"I don't know what he wants with you—but he's been watching you your entire life," Mu Qing shakes his head. "He's DANGEROUS, and I can prove it!"

"…How?"

Mu Qing whips his head around to stare at Feng Xin imploringly. "Did you see the thing that Hua Cheng had braided into his hair? The one he kept on messing with?"

The martial god frowns, thinking.

"…You mean that red bead?"

"It's a Pearl!" Mu Qing shakes his head vehemently.

"A Pearl earring! The same one he lost that day during the Parade on the Grand Martial Avenue!"

"…What?" Feng Xin frowns. "Was he wearing Pearl earrings that day? How could you remember?"

"Because I was accused of STEALING it when it went missing!" Mu Qing glares. "Of course I remember what it looks like!"

Both of them pause then—noticing that Xie Lian has been oddly quiet.

And when Mu Qing looks back at him…

He doesn't think he's ever seen Xie Lian so pale.

"…He really has it?" The prince whispers."You're…you're sure, Mu Qing?"

"…Yeah," Mu Qing agrees, struggling to read Xie Lian's expression. "I'm positive."

Feng Xin's eyes drift over Xie Lian's shoulder, only to widen even further.

“…Oh, hell…” He mutters. “Do you think he painted those?”

“…Painted what?” Xie Lian croaks, twisting around.

“…Murals,” Mu Qing explains, shocked when Xie Lian rushes past him, desperately pressing his palms flat against the walls, trying to feel the images.

“What do they say?!”

Both of them pause, looking at each other, and Xie Lian presses his forehead against the wall.

“Tell me!”

“…It just shows what I already said,” Mu Qing mutters, lighting a palm torch, examining the paintings more thoroughly. “One is of the parade I was talking about…you…” His eyes focus on a child falling from the sky—

Like a falling star.

“…When you caught that kid…”

Feng Xin looks to the side, taking in images of a boy in the army—fighting—

“It shows the civil war in Xianle, too…”

Mu Qing swallows hard, baffled by the age of the paintings, because…

“How is Puqi Shrine here?“ he mutters, stepping closer. “You only moved there recently.”

But there it is, clear as day.

With Xie Lian knelt before a loom, working threads together, and…

The same boy beside him, holding threads wrapped around his fingers.

And in every depiction…

The child is painted as something hideous .

Small, broken, and deformed.

“…I don’t know what this place is,” Feng Xin admits. “Some sort of city by the sea, but…you’re there.”

Mu Qing steps forward, examining the beautiful colors of the sunset, molding into the water below like liquid fire.

“…You’re crying.”

And that’s startling, because…

Xie Lian really doesn’t cry often, if at all.

Mu Qing has only ever seen it once, and here…

He’s sobbing, hand outstretched, desperately reaching for something beyond the painting’s frame.

And…

He doesn’t have a cursed shackle in his eyes.

Clink!

The tell-tale sound of a silver bell has all three of them turning their heads, Xie Lian beginning to rush forward as Mu Qing holds him back.

“How did he find us that quickly?!” Feng Xin frowns.

“He…it’s that string on his highness’s finger!” Mu Qing spits out.

“It’s some sort of spiritual device! He’s using it to track us down!”

Feng Xin reaches forward to take it off—but even with Mu Qing restraining him, Xie Lian manages to slap him away.

“DON’T!”

“What’s wrong with you?!” Mu Qing glares. “We didn’t even tell you about the most depraved shit that was on there! The man is SICK! He’s so powerful—if he gets his hands on you, there is NOTHING we can do, do you understand that?!”

“What?!” Xie Lian snaps, not sounding like himself at all. “What else did he paint?!”

Feng Xin clears his throat, his ears turning red. "…It doesn't bear repeating!"

"Either you tell me, let me go—or I will MAKE you let me go!" Xie Lian twists his head around, glaring at them both.

"…I guess we don't have a choice," Feng Xin mutters, rolling up his sleeves.

Just then—Xie Lian feels something slap into his shoulder, hard.

"BE QUIET, AND START RUNNING!" Mu Qing barks, and…

Without Xie Lian meaning to…his legs start moving.

"…Huh?" Feng Xin watches the prince run past him, fists raised. "I thought we were fighting?"

"He was obviously stalling!" Mu Qing glares, dragging Feng Xin with him. "That—that creature got some sort of spell in his head, he wasn't going to listen!"

That's when Feng Xin notices the talisman on Xie Lian's shoulder, and…

He can't disagree with Mu Qing.

The situation is nothing less than insane, and Xie Lian's reaction in the face of that…

It was frightening.

It does seem like the prince was bewitched.

Like the old stories of fox spirits, luring innocent travelers away from the mountain path each night–never to be seen again.

But…

Both of them fall silent as a sharp chill drags through the room—and the very air before them seems to bend.

…An aura so powerful, even the two great martial gods of the south almost choke under it, and—

BOOM!

Ahead of them, unable to stop, Xie Lian slammed into a pile of rumble —not managing to dislodge it, but scraping his face and arms in the process.

"…What is this?!"

Feng Xin and Mu Qing both skid to a stop beside him, staring…

At the same pile of rubble Feng Xin knocked down from the ceiling earlier.

"…How are we back here?!" Feng Xin glares, punching at the rock frantically. "We didn't go in a circle!"

"Unless…" Mu Qing swallows hard.

Unless Hua Cheng somehow managed to create a travel array remotely, and they ran right through it without noticing.

…But even Jun Wu couldn't pull something like that.

"…Just how strong is he?!"

Clink!

Clink!

A sound that has always brought Xie Lian such comfort–and now, it seems to inspire nothing but terror in his friends, their faces growing pale as it comes closer, closer…

Both Feng Xin and Mu Qing leap in front of Xie Lian as Hua Cheng rounds the corner, weapons raised.

"JUST STAY AWAY FROM HIM!" Feng Xin snarls, arrow notched.

Normally, Hua Cheng would have ignored them with a smug little laugh—

But not now.

Now, he…hangs back.

"What is the meaning of this?"

And he sounds…wary.

“DROP THE ACT!” Feng Xin glares, an arrow aimed directly for his heart. “WE KNOW WHO YOU ARE! WE SAW THE STATUES, THE MURALS—ALL OF IT!”

Hua Cheng doesn’t look at them.

From this angle, it’s impossible to see his face.

“…How much did you see, exactly?”

“ENOUGH!” Feng Xin glares. “Enough to know what your intentions are! If you have ANY dignity as a Ghost King—you should NEVER show your face in front of his highness again!”

It takes the calamity a moment to answer–but when he does, his voice is deathly quiet.

Dangerous.

“…And who are you,” Hua Cheng questions slowly, “to order me?”

Feng Xin grows silent, his knuckles white around the bow, and Mu Qing—

“If you could STAND to show yourself to him after what you’ve done, then you don’t deserve to even SHARE THE SAME ROOM AS HIM!”

Something about the viciousness in his tone…actually seems to cut through.

“…His highness saw as well?”

His voice is so small—and behind them…

Xie Lian’s hands tremble.

Mu Qing swallows hard, his own hands trembling violently as he clasps his sword.

“We told him,” he confirms with clenched teeth. “We told him enough. I don’t know—I don’t know if you just feel ENTITLED to him after this many years of following him. I don’t know what you want with him. But he doesn’t owe you ANYTHING! He isn’t YOURS!”

“…” Hua Cheng finally turns his head, looking Feng Xin over, before his gaze finally settles in on Mu Qing.

"You see the monster who hurt you and you in every man you look at, don't you?" He questions, watching as Mu Qing drains of color, stumbling backwards.

"…SHUT THE FUCK UP!"

"What…" Feng Xin's brow furrows, glancing back and forth between them. "What is he—?"

"If you ever imply I would do something like that to his highness again," Hua Cheng's voice is calm—but such an irony, compared to the blood thirst in his eyes. "Those will be your last words."

Mu Qing grits his teeth, his shoulders shaking as his breaths come faster.

"I guess we all would have been BETTER OFF if you had just DIED when you f—!"

He stops—not because Hua Cheng interrupted him, but because…

His voice almost seems to die in his throat.

"…Mu Qing?!"

Feng Xin grasps his shoulder, watching as Mu Qing clutches his throat, spitting out blood, whipping around to glare at Hua Cheng.

"WHAT THE FUCK DID YOU DO?!"

"…Nothing," Hua Cheng mutters, staring Mu Qing down. "I suppose you understand now then, don't you?"

The martial god glares up at him, breathing hard.

"I've never had the luxury of making my own mistakes." Hua Cheng glares right back at him, placing a hand on the sword at his hip. "But you two have reminded me, now…"

His eye slides from Mu Qing, to Feng Xin.

Thirty four, and thirty five.

"We have unfinished business."

He lunges forward in a flash—and Feng Xin and Mu Qing barely have enough time to throw up a shield aura.

BOOM!

Ever since he emerged from the Kiln, no one has seen E'Ming fight seriously.

They still don't, now.

But the blow against their shield is so violent, that even with the combined power of both gods…

It shatters.

And in an instant, there's a flood of silver butterflies—shrieking, each wing as sharp as a razor blade.

Mu Qing and Feng Xin fall into long hardened battle instincts—one taking on the butterflies, rapidly firing off golden arrows of light—

The other crossing blades with their master.

Mu Qing braces himself, both arms trembling from the effort it takes to hold Hua Cheng back.

The Ghost King only uses one, raising an eyebrow as he smirks down at him.

"It would seem that one of us was better suited to sabers after all, General," he muses, watching Mu Qing snarl in defiance, but…

CLANG!

Just as Mu Qing's blade is knocked aside, the wraith butterflies overwhelm Feng Xin, swooping forward to envelop them both…

Wrapping each of them in cocoons of silk.

"…IT WAS BUTTERFLY SILK, NOT SPIDERS!" Feng Xin shouts, incensed. "YOU THREW US INTO THAT PIT!"

Hua Cheng kicks their weapons aside, bored. "You should be grateful that I tried to keep you two out of the way. In fact—you should be grateful that I'm sparing your puny lives now," he sneers, glaring down at Mu Qing. "I'll wait for your expressions of gratitude."

Instead of saying thank you—Mu Qing tries to spit in his face. It doesn't land, with Hua Cheng simply tilting his head to the side to avoid it, but...

Mu Qing has no such luck when Hua Cheng's fist lands against his jaw—splitting his lip.

"...WHAT KIND OF BASTARD PUNCHES SOMEONE WHEN HE'S ALREADY WON?!" Feng Xin snarls at him, wrenching around in his bonds, his face flushed with anger. "YOU'LL PAY FOR THAT!"

Hua Cheng hangs his head, smiling faintly.

His laughter is anything but amused.

"He knows what that was for," he murmurs, slowly lifting his head to look the general in the eye, his own flashing in a painful burst of nostalgia. "Don't you, Mu Qing?"

The god glares up at him, struggling uselessly against his bonds.

"I saved your life!" He hisses. "How did you end up dying, anyway?!"

"..." Hua Cheng's eye drifts over to Feng Xin, then to Xie Lian's back, finding the prince perfectly still.

He places one hand on the stone wall above Mu Qing's head, leaning close—whispering next to his ear;

"The way you should have."

Mu Qing falls silent, his eyes growing wide as Hua Cheng leans back, elbow still braced against the wall over his head, watching Feng Xin as he struggles uselessly.

The jealousy in his eyes soothing an old, inflamed wound, deep in the ghost king's heart.

"...I'm going to ask you one more thing, before I change my mind about returning the favor and saving your life," Hua Cheng murmurs, turning his head back to stare Mu Qing down.

"What you said, just before the avalanche—was it true?"

Mu Qing grows silent and still.

Hua Cheng surveys his expression for a moment—taking that as a yes.

"Who did it?"

And if Mu Qing had trusted him, he could have told him.

If he had —

Things may have been different.

But now, staring up into Hua Cheng's face...

The only thing Mu Qing feels is fear .

"...YOUR HIGHNESS, RUN AWAY FROM HERE!" He cries, squeezing his eyes shut as he waits for Hua Cheng to punch him again, but...

He doesn't.

His gaze immediately turns to Xie Lian who, the moment Mu Qing gave the order, began sprinting back down the hall.

But he doesn't get very far.

Not before white silk appears around his wrists and ankles—and he's sent lurching towards the ground.

But he doesn't fall.

No.

Hua Cheng would never let him hit the ground.

He scoops the prince up in his arms, cradling him carefully.

"DON'T!" Mu Qing struggles uselessly against his bonds, voice cracking as Hua Cheng carries him down the hall. "JUST LEAVE HIM ALONE!"

"HUA CHENG!" The ghost king actually does stop, turning his head slightly when Feng Xin dares to scream his name.

"His highness...he's already suffered enough!" The former guard cries, agonized, watching his prince falling into Hua Cheng's clutches—

Unable to do anything to stop it.

Like so many other things that he was always powerless to stop.

Hua Cheng looks away from him then—disappearing around the corner with Xie Lian in his arms.

"Just...don't hurt him! LET HIM GO! IF YOU DO, HE'LL PROBABLY FORGET THIS EVER HAPPENED!"

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or reuse without permission from the artist.

[image]

CREDIT: SYL

CREDIT: _LEAFSHEEP

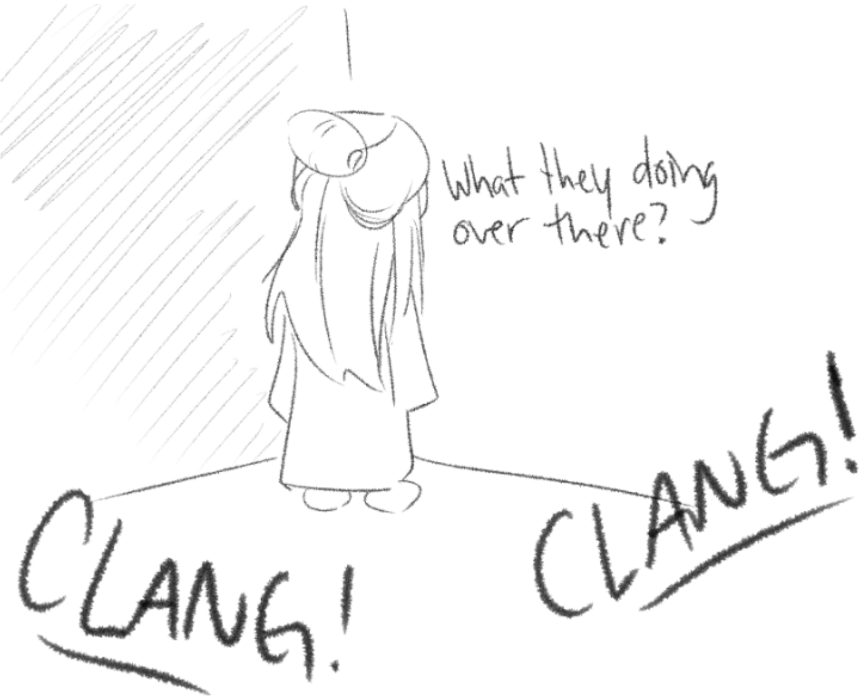
Xie Lian, stuck facing the corner Blairwitch Project Style while Hua Cheng + Fengqing Battle it out



What they doing over there?
CLANG!
CLANG!

CREDIT: MUSINGLOTUS

MEMES FROM THIS STORY

(Art comes in many forms, and this was just too funny not to include.)

[image]

CREDIT: SKULLY

Chapter End Notes

Thank you to _Leafsheep, Syl, and Musinglotus for the beautiful artwork! And Skully for the meme!

xoxo, Evie

You Never Left Me

Chapter Summary

> To the prince's surprise, Hua Cheng embraces him.
>
> Pulling the prince against his chest—pressing his face against his hair, stroking it gently.
>
> Knowing that, in all likelihood, he'll never be allowed to hold him again.
>
> "...How could I possibly let go?" He whispers, his eye brimming.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Feng Xin's pleas echo, then fade as Hua Cheng carries the prince down a dark hallway.

After some time, Xie Lian feels himself being laid down on a soft surface—like straw covering stone.

What he can't see are the ancient remnants of what was once a bedroom.

A makeshift one, anyway.

One where a young ghost dreamed so many years away.

Makeshift scratchings of one face on the walls—early sketches, similar to ones made in chalk made in Puqi Shrine centuries ago, long since faded.

The same room where the mother who forged him told him that he had to stop mourning the life he could have had.

But no one mourns like a ghost.

And he's still mourning now, watching his god laying on a makeshift bed in a cavern of the dead.

Mourning every single day that they spent apart.

Mourning every single day that they will spend apart, when he's cast away.

He reaches around, feeling the talisman on Xie Lian's back—his voice quiet.

"...They put a spell on you?"

Xie Lian can't answer—but Hua Cheng knows he's correct.

Still. He doesn't remove the talisman—not quite yet.

Instead, he reaches for the belt of his robes.

By unfortunate coincidence, that just so happens to be the moment that the talisman weakens just enough for Xie Lian to jerk, but...

It looks like a flinch.

Hua Cheng's hand quickly jerks back, fingers trembling.

"Your highness, I..." He swallows thickly, shoulders slumping.

"...I would never hurt you, or do anything like..." His voice fades, remembering the look in Mu Qing's eyes when they faced each other down in the cave of Ten Thousand Gods.

How disgusted the martial god was by the mere sight of him.

And Hua Cheng wishes he could say that after eight centuries on this earth, he had changed...but...

His voice is still small, that of a lonely child—one who doesn't even think he has the right to pray for salvation.

"Just...don't be scared."

He reaches for him again—carefully parting the front of Xie Lian's robes, and he doesn't even touch the prince's skin.

(He doesn't dare.)

Rather, his butterflies do—swarming in, gently glowing with energy as they flutter around his arms, torso, and face.

Healing broken bones, cuts, bruises, and frostbite from being caught in the avalanche.

Leaving him as good as new—if not still caught under the talisman's grip.

Hua Cheng sits on the edge of the bed, facing away from him—not looking at the prince's bare torso.

"…If…you'll still come with me, I can explain everything," he whispers, slightly slumped over with exhaustion.

Having carried the burden so well, for so long—

But this kind of all consuming terror drains him.

"You'll understand…I promise."

For a little while, anyway.

As soon as he steps away from the Kiln...he'll forget anything that Hua Cheng tells him about his name.

Who he is.

What they were to one another.

The only thing he'll remember are the words exchanged between Hua Cheng, and Mu Qing.

How frightening they must have seemed.

And when he does...in all likelihood, he'll never want to see Hua Cheng's face again.

Hua Cheng—

Before that, Hua Cheng just wants the chance for Xie Lian to know everything, and to...

To ask Xie Lian what he should do.

What Xie Lian wants him to do.

He can't look at Xie Lian's face right now. Can't bear to see what emotions he might find. Dreading that one of them might be fear, but...

Even more than that, terrified that he might see disgust in Xie Lian's eyes.

But before he can even try to build up the nerve...

A voice echoes from behind them, harsh and sneering.

"Hua Cheng—oh my god, you're fucking DISGUSTING! Just what do you think you're doing to his highness?!"

The ghost king looks back over his shoulder—surveying Mu Qing, unimpressed.

"How did you manage to get out so fast?"

Feng Xin stumbles into the room after them, pointing one trembling finger at Hua Cheng, his eyes burning with protective rage.

"You...YOU LET HIM GO RIGHT NOW, CRIMSON RAIN!"

Hua Cheng surveys the two, not bothering to stand up.

"Are both of you tired of my mercy?" He raises an eyebrow. "Or are you just tired of living?"

Mu Qing sneers, his expression filled with nothing but contempt.

"Get your filthy hands off of him! The ugly little toad wants a taste of swan meat?"

He laughs, and...

It rings with cruelty.

"Forget eight hundred years—you could wait a THOUSAND, no, TEN THOUSAND, and he would NEVER want to be touched by a lowly wretch like you!"

Before—even in the pain and distress of the moment, there was little Mu Qing could say that seemed to bother Hua Cheng.

Even when Hua Cheng did lash out—it was with words, or a relatively harmless blow in comparison to what he was actually capable of.

But now—his eye glitters with dark, dangerous rage.

"If you're so eager to die..." He mutters, rising to his feet.

"Fine," E'Ming slides from its scabbard with a menacing gleam. "I don't mind playing executioner."

Behind him, Xie Lian jerks on the bed's surface—but can say little more as the scimitar lashes out, slicing both Feng Xin and Mu Qing at the waists, each of them collapsing.

Each of them rolls on the ground, screaming in pain as Hua Cheng pauses, staring down at their dying forms...suspicious.

He's quick to turn around, returning to Xie Lian's bedside—helping the prince sit up, and...

To the prince's surprise, Hua Cheng embraces him.

Pulling the prince against his chest—pressing his face against his hair, stroking it gently.

Knowing that, in all likelihood, he'll never be allowed to hold him again.

"...How could I possibly let go?" He whispers, his eye brimming.

How on earth could he ever let him go?

What's left of him, if he does?

Stars don't orbit the cosmos again, after they fall.

They simply fade, forgotten by all except those who watched the moment of descending, making a silent wish.

But...Hua Cheng does.

He reaches up—ripping the talisman away.

And the moment Xie Lian is free from its grasp, he springs up—rushing over to his friends, bleeding on the ground.

"FENG XIN! MU QING!"

"Y...Your highness..." Feng Xin rasps, blood dripping from his lips. "He...he's a monster...you...you have to run..."

"He..." Mu Qing reaches up, tugging at his sleeve weakly. "He only...wants to bring you to the Kiln...to devour you...you...you can't listen to whatever he wants to tell you!"

Hua Cheng stands off to the side, arms crossed—almost unable to look at the three of them.

"...A monster?" Xie Lian repeats, his voice deathly quiet. "Then what does that make you?"

Before either one of them can say another word, he rams fangxin through Feng Xin's heart, nailing him to the ground.

"Y-YOUR HIGHNESS!"

"I never said a word to either of you about San Lang wanting to bring me to the Kiln," Xie Lian points out coldly. "Or about him wanting to tell me anything. So, why don't you stop hiding behind those false skins and show yourself?"

Both of the forms on the ground grow quiet, stopping their fake moaning and crying...staring up at Xie Lian with wide, lopsided grins.

Then...there's laughing.

Horrible, deranged laughing—like two jackals in the night.

Not his friends.

Even when Mu Qing and Feng Xin seemed to fear the worst from Hua Cheng—they were never intentionally cruel to him, only wanting to get Xie Lian away.

These...

This is an imposter.

And surely enough—their forms begin to fade, twisting and morphing into a new form.

Blood fading, faces melting into something unreadable.

A tall, haunting figure.

Wearing white mourning robes with long, trailing sleeves.

A staff clutched between his fingertips.

And maybe, on some level, Xie Lian always knew.

Like a prick at the skin, a twinge from a healed bone that can't quite forget the feeling of being broken.

Maybe he sensed it, in Shi Qingxuan's body that night, standing on a mountainside near the Terrace of Cascading Wine.

Maybe he knew it, but he didn't dare say it.

As though acknowledging the horror of the truth could somehow will it into existence.

As though there was just as much to fear in a name, or a memory, as there was in it becoming more.

Reaching back through the past to haunt him.

He can't see the figure's face.

Even if he had his sight—he knows that he wouldn't.

But from beneath his mask...his voice is almost warm.

As though he's greeting an old friend.

"...How are you, Xie Lian?"

The prince doesn't reply—hands trembling at his sides, but...

Somehow, he's keenly aware of how closely his every move and reaction are being watched.

That anything he does now will be used against him.

Before he can move, think, or breathe—

Hua Cheng is in front of him.

Striking out with E'Ming, a move that Bai Wuxiang dodges, moving as swiftly as water, lunging past Xie Lian, reaching out, as if to touch his face, but...

Hua Cheng catches him by the wrist, twisting the limb until it detaches from the rest of his body, falling to the ground.

"That's a bold move," he snarls, eye flashing with warning, "especially in your wife's house."

And just as the White Clothed Calamity got under his skin before—Hua Cheng has returned the favor.

Bai Wuxiang snarls, fingertips sharpening into claws as he lashes out.

He lunges for Hua Cheng's only real weak point—his missing right eye. But the younger ghost is quick to step back—only receiving two deep gashes in his cheek for Bai Wuxiang's efforts, blood dripping down.

And before he can attack again...

A swarm of wraith butterflies swarms the calamity, attacking him in a frenzy, but even then—one of his arms manages to reach out, clawing at Hua Cheng's right eye again.

But this time, a blade slashes out—slicing off his entire arm, taking part of his shoulder with it.

Xie Lian sheathes fangxin as Hua Cheng grabs him by the arm, pulling him from the room, guiding him to run alongside him down the hallway.

And while they do, Xie Lian can't help but cover his hand with his mouth, lips trembling with fear.

"He...He really didn't die!"

Xie Lian chokes the words out—finding that one piece of comfort, the only thing that got him through all of these years with a shred of peace, just..melting away.

"...How did he not die?!"

"That might not have been the original version of him..." Hua Cheng offers comfort, even if…

He himself has no idea how Bai Wuxiang managed to survive—or how he managed to hide himself for so long.

On some level, he should have known—because his curses have lingered on for until now. But…

It takes him a moment to realize that Xie Lian has stopped running—coming to a halt in the hall beside him.

Hua Cheng almost grabs him again, telling him that they need to run, but—

Xie Lian shrinks away from him, hanging his head.

And the events from before come rushing back.

“…Dianxia,” he starts, feeling helpless, but—

“I need to ask you something.”

Xie Lian…

Hua Cheng has heard him a thousand different ways.

Hurt, angry, frightened, happy—and mournful.

But never like this.

As though he’s locking everything behind a door, holding it shut.

“…And I think…” Xie Lian squeezes his eyes shut so tightly, it actually hurts. “I think…this is one you can answer.”

Hua Cheng doesn’t say a word, waiting—watching the way Xie Lian’s hands ball into tight fists at his sides, trembling.

And Xie Lian is right.

“This…precious, noble person…” Xie Lian whispers, “…Who is it?”

There’s no reason that Hua Cheng can’t tell him that.

He tilts his head back, his undead heart squirming in his chest, being dragged to the edge of a cliff.

“…You’re asking like you already know.”

Xie Lian lifts his hand to his chest, squeezing something tightly.

“…It’s true, then?”

Hua Cheng turns away, pressing his forehead into his hand, unable to look at him.

“You…” Xie Lian takes a step toward him, and now Hua Cheng is the one shrinking.

Living in utter terror of the next few moments.

Knowing that he isn’t the one that Xie Lian wants to hear this from.

That Xie Lian has never loved Hua Cheng. Not the way he loved Hong’er.

Or Wu Ming.

Or Feng Xin.

That he's second, third, or fourth best in a race that he has always been losing.

"…You never wanted to know how I felt?"

Hua Cheng once said he wanted to know everything Xie Lian thought and felt. That he could never get bored of it.

But this…

Hua Cheng's voice cracks.

"…Could you…not tell me?"

When it comes to this, Hua Cheng would rather be a coward.

Living with a useless hope that might as well be fool's gold.

But just that hope is enough for him.

It always has been.

"…No."

Xie Lian takes on a wobbling, unsteady edge—as though he's barely holding that door back now, straining at the hinges.

"I'm sorry, but…I really need…"

Hua Cheng stays still, fists clenched by his sides.

"…Okay," he rasps.

Feeling like a man on death row.

He closes his eyes, taking a deep breath—letting it out shakily—and he forced himself to smile.

Even as two streaks of blood fall down his cheeks.

Bracing himself for—

Thud!

For a moment, the universe is beautifully still.

Like floating on your back in a lake, ears slipping beneath the water.

Until all you can hear is your own heartbeat, and the rush of blood inside your ears.

All Hua Cheng feels is a pair of arms, hugging him tightly from behind.

And when the silence fades…

The first thing he hears is a sound that leaves him on the very edge between sorrow, and euphoria.

Shattering him, but relief hides in every beautiful point of fracture.

Xie Lian is sobbing .

Not crying. Or weeping.

Neither verb encompasses how deep every cry reaches.

Coming from somewhere so far inside of him, Xie Lian feels as though he'll never stop.

As though he could cling to Hua Cheng and scream for a hundred years—and he would still have more tears to shed.

And before Hua Cheng can turn around to look at him, to ask him what's wrong, Xie Lian—

"I-I can't…I can't say your name anymore," He sobs, his face buried between Hua Cheng's shoulders.

Feeling the Ghost King go completely still—not daring to move a muscle.

"But…it's…it's you!" He chokes, holding him tighter, until a mortal man's ribs would have been crushed.

"It's you!"

Xie Lian's heart died centuries ago, in a forest beneath the snow.

It beats painfully now, feeling so many things that had been long forgotten.

His body became numb to pain overtime, something you learn from constantly enduring suffering.

Just as a heart does, after constantly weathering sorrow.

But—

He's here .

Hong'er is here, not just on a chain around his neck, but—

In his arms.

And Xie Lian feels everything .

Another sob tears from him, his knees buckling—and finally, Hua Cheng catches him. Twisting around to wrap Xie Lian in the tightest embrace that he's capable of, crushing the prince against his chest.

“You…” the prince's voice cracks, and Hua Cheng…

“…You never left me!” Xie Lian whimpers through a flood of tears, his cheeks soaked with them.

…Hua Cheng is crying, too.

“…This world and the next could come to an end,” he whispers, hugging Xie Lian fiercely.

“And I would never, ever leave you.”

Xie Lian knows .

That day, when he couldn't find him, no matter how many times the villagers tried to suggest that Hong'er had run away—

Xie Lian had known .

He would NEVER leave me.

And when he called out to Hong'er's spirit over the years…so many times…

He had known that, if Hong'er was still in this world—he would have found his way back to Xie Lian.

…And he did .

The emotions crest in his chest as he lifts his head up, reaching up to grasp Hua Cheng's hair, pulling him in, and—

Xie Lian kisses him.

The first kiss he's ever initiated on his own.

Given to the man who has—and will have—every single one of his firsts.

To the only person he's ever wanted to share this part of his life with.

Even if he didn't always know it was him.

Even if he didn't always know Hong'er was there.

But love and faith are two shades of the same emotion.

Sometimes you can't see it, or feel it.

But no matter how miserable, broken, or alone you are—

It is with you in that pain.

And when you climb out of the darkness, clawing your way up that winding staircase towards the light…

It is with you on every single step.

Xie Lian says it now—the words he always wished he had said back then—

A broken maybe, given new life.

"I…I love you!"

They're the most sincere words to ever leave his lips. Said desperately through tears and ragged breaths, sinking into Hua Cheng's bone.

Somehow, more sacred than any prayer he's ever uttered.

And that's when the Ghost King realizes this isn't a dream or trick of the mind.

Because for every day that Xie Lian has whispered good morning to his ashes, Hua Cheng has dreamed of him learning the truth.

He's imagined holding his god in his arms enough times to be ashamed of.

But in all of those years, he never dared to dream of Xie Lian saying that .

And when he does—

Hua Cheng is seventeen years old again.

Heart pounding, curled on his side, replaying the way Xie Lian said ‘My Hong’er’ in his head, over and over again.

My Hong’er.

Silently asking himself—

‘…Did he mean it like that?’

‘Please…god, please…’

‘Did he really mean it like that?’

‘…About me?’

He’s been frozen in shock, ever since Xie Lian pulled him into a kiss—hasn’t moved a muscle since he said those words.

And now, he whispers them again, hoarse—but fierce.

“I-I love you…”

That’s when Hua Cheng understands.

Xie Lian—

He already knew.

Back when Hua Cheng was fighting with Feng Xin and Mu Qing. When the prince couldn’t move or speak.

Xie Lian already knew that he was Hong’er.

But he asked Hua Cheng who his noble, precious person was first .

Holding back his reaction, even if it must have been killing him.

Because even then, he…

He really…

The sound that wrenches itself from Hua Cheng's chest isn't even human .

Xie Lian barely sucks in one surprised breath as he's backed up against the cavern wall—with Hua Cheng's arms cradling his head and shoulders, protecting him from any harsh stone edges.

Kissing Xie Lian like he could reach in and grasp his very soul.

"I love you."

Hua Cheng has said it more eloquently before in his mind.

Carefully weaving his feelings for his god into lines of near poetry.

But not now.

Now, he barely has the composure to say those three words, over and over again, each time there's a gap between their lips.

I love you.

I love you.

I love you.

Whispering each word like a prayer against his skin.

Xie Lian's hands flutter, tightening in Hua Cheng's hair. Overwhelmed, but always pulling him closer, because—

He's never been kissed like this before.

Because Hong'er was always a selfish child. Wu Ming was a selfish teenager.

And Hua Cheng—

His arms tighten around Xie Lian until there isn't an ounce of space left between them, weaving the edges of them together.

Hua Cheng is a selfish man.

He doesn't kiss Xie Lian like a gambler collecting a debt, or a servant granting a request.

He doesn't kiss him as a means of healing or sharing spiritual power.

It couldn't be called sharing air—he's practically stealing every breath as it passes through Xie Lian's lungs.

And his love is still shaking, unsteady, tears slipping down his cheeks as he holds him tight, whispering—

"How long?"

Their noses brush against one another as Hua Cheng leans against the wall, breathing hard.

"…Always."

He can't remember a time when he didn't.

The moment he saw Xie Lian that day, leaning over the side of the city walls—he knew.

The rest of his life, long or short, was going to be for him.

That loving Xie Lian, protecting him, following him—

It's what Hua Cheng was born to do.

"…" Xie Lian's fingers slide down from his hair, stroking over his cheeks—trembling slightly.

"…H…Hon…!"

It's a testament to his endurance for pain that Xie Lian can manage to utter a single syllable of his name—more than Hua Cheng has ever managed—before falling silent.

He tries again, only for a pained—incredibly rare—whimper to rip from his throat.

Hua Cheng presses his forehead against Xie Lian's, shushing him gently.

"Don't, dianxia, it's alright…"

Tears fall from Xie Lian's eyes endlessly, shining like diamonds under the silver light of countless wraith butterflies.

Because it isn't alright.

It could never be alright.

“I…I’m so sorry that I couldn’t protect you,” He chokes, weighed down by centuries of guilt.

Hua Cheng’s smile carries the sweetest kind of heartache there is.

“But you did.”

Xie Lian shakes his head, another sob ripping from him—

Until Hua Cheng’s hand slips down between them, palm pressed against Xie Lian’s chest.

Over his ring.

“You have always kept me safe.”

Xie Lian remembers then, what he was told so long ago—asking if Hua Cheng’s ashes were safe.

That, if the place where his ashes were held was gone…

Hua Cheng wouldn’t have a reason to remain in this world either.

His throat is so thick with emotion—it’s difficult to speak.

“…I missed you everyday,” Xie Lian croaks, wrapping his arms around Hua Cheng’s neck, hugging him tightly.

“I’m so…I’m so sorry that you are alone for so long…”

Hua Cheng shakes his head, nuzzling his face into Xie Lian’s hair.

“I should be saying that to you, gege.”

Because Hua Cheng was never alone—not really.

He had Zhao Beitong.

Then Fai and Xiang.

Bao, Yanlin, and Shuo.

Even He Xuan, as strange as that is to admit.

And the loss of so many of them aches all the more—

Because Xie Lian never got to know them.

“…I spent every single day looking for you,” Hua Cheng mutters, holding him tighter. “And once I found you—I tried to tell you so many times, I…”

“I know,” Xie Lian whispers, breathing him in.

Smelling the wildness of the forest after it rains. Metal and distant smoke.

Finally feeling that joy of familiarity without the sadness and fear of disappointment that used to follow it.

Because he smells like Hong’er.

He smells like home .

Xie Lian makes a small, frustrated sound in the back of his throat, pressing his face into Hua Cheng’s neck.

The ghost king squeezes him gently in response, one hand rubbing up and down the small of Xie Lian’s back.

“What is it?”

The god bites his lip, his toes barely touching the ground, refusing to allow any distance between them.

“…I want to see you,” he whispers.

For so long, Xie Lian didn't miss his sight.

He wasn't interested in seeing a world that didn't have Hong'er in it.

He felt like the last thing he deserved to see was Wu Ming disappearing into darkness—

Not the beauty of the sunset that came after.

There are so many faces that he's never seen. So many places that he wouldn't recognize now.

But when he returned to the Heavens, and Jun Wu asked Xie Lian if he deserved his shackles...

Xie Lian had been content to carry that penance to the end of his days.

But now...the weight of them—something he's long since become accustomed to—

It feels claustrophobic, like he's reeled in with literal chains. Unable to move. To think. To breathe.

And Xie Lian...suddenly doesn't care if he deserves to feel this way or not.

He...

Xie Lian just wants to see him

Hua Cheng holds him closer, his cheek resting on top of Xie Lian's head, taking deep, unburdened breaths for the first time in centuries.

"You will," he promises him, leaning back to look at his face. "I promise."

He strokes his thumb under Xie Lian's eye, staring into his cursed shackle, brushing the tears away. Hesitating at first, only for his god to lean into the touch—like a flower stretching toward sunlight.

In that moment, it feels real to Hua Cheng.

That he can touch Xie Lian.

That it's not only welcomed, but wanted .

Xie Lian tilts his cheek into Hua Cheng's palm, biting his lip.

"...I want to say your name," his voice carries so much longing, it's impossible not to feel an ache.

Hua Cheng's thumb traces down his lip, over his mouth—freeing Xie Lian's bottom lip from his teeth.

Reaching down to replace it with his own mouth—kissing him so softly now, all Xie Lian can do is lean into it with a sigh, eyelashes fluttering against his cheek.

Hua Cheng bears all of his weight with ease, the prince content to sag against him, clinging his arms around the ghost king's neck.

"If it's all the same to you," he murmurs, fingers cradling the back of Xie Lian's head.

"I prefer that you call me San Lang."

"..." Xie Lian smiles faintly, not content—but comforted, fingers finding the red pearl braided into Hua Cheng's hair, stroking over it gently.

"...My San Lang," he whispers against his lips, making the calamity shudder, crushing Xie Lian against him.

"Your San Lang," he agrees breathlessly, feeling a lurching in his chest, a long dead heart straining to beat again.

Always, his San Lang.

Xie Lian pulls back slightly, their lips parting.

"My ha—"

There's rumbling in the distance, and they both look towards it.

Suddenly remembering that, no matter what it might feel like, there's an entire world outside of the two of them—

And danger lurking not far behind.

"...We have to keep moving," Hua Cheng pulls back mournfully—pressing a kiss to Xie Lian's forehead. "He'll be coming."

The mere reminder of him makes Xie Lian grimace, holding Hua Cheng’s hand tightly as they start moving again.

His limbs slightly wobbly, head still spinning as he tries to process the new reality.

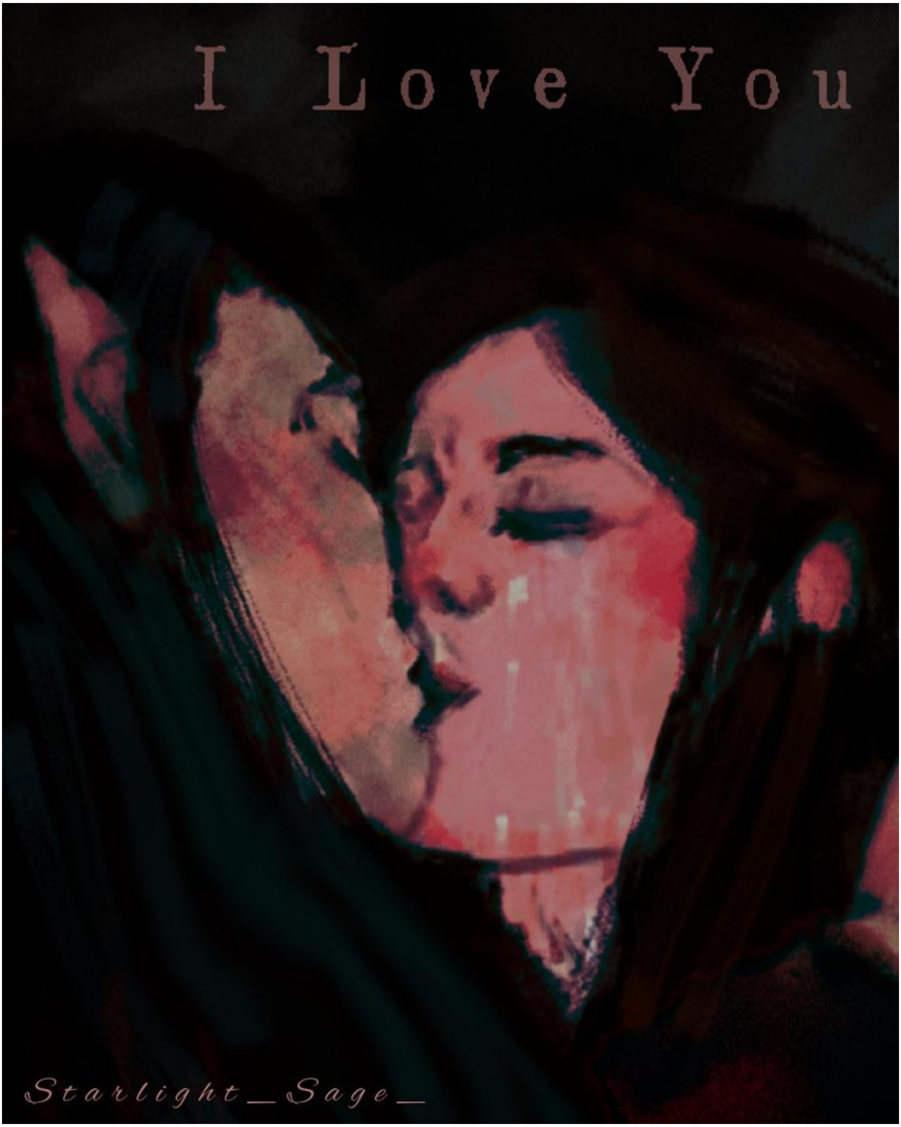
A world so profoundly different from the one he woke up in yesterday.

The world didn’t have Hong’er in it yesterday.

Xie Lian didn’t have hope, yesterday.

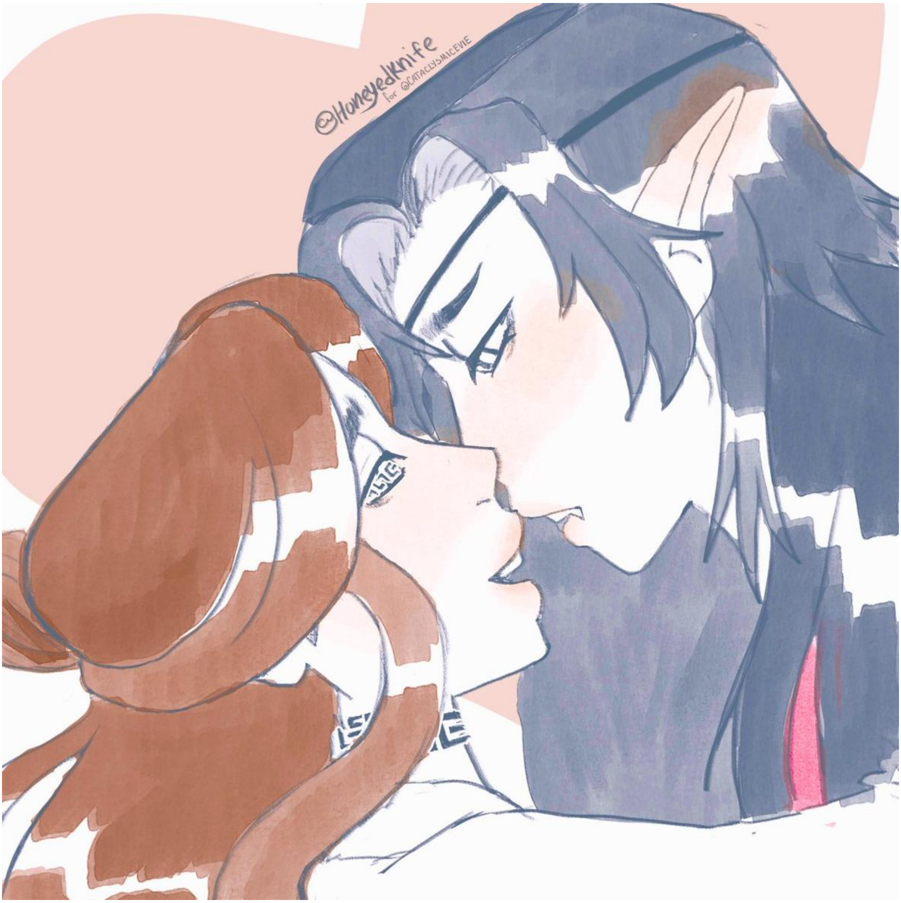
ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or use without permission.



I Love You
Starlight_Sage_

CREDIT: SAGE

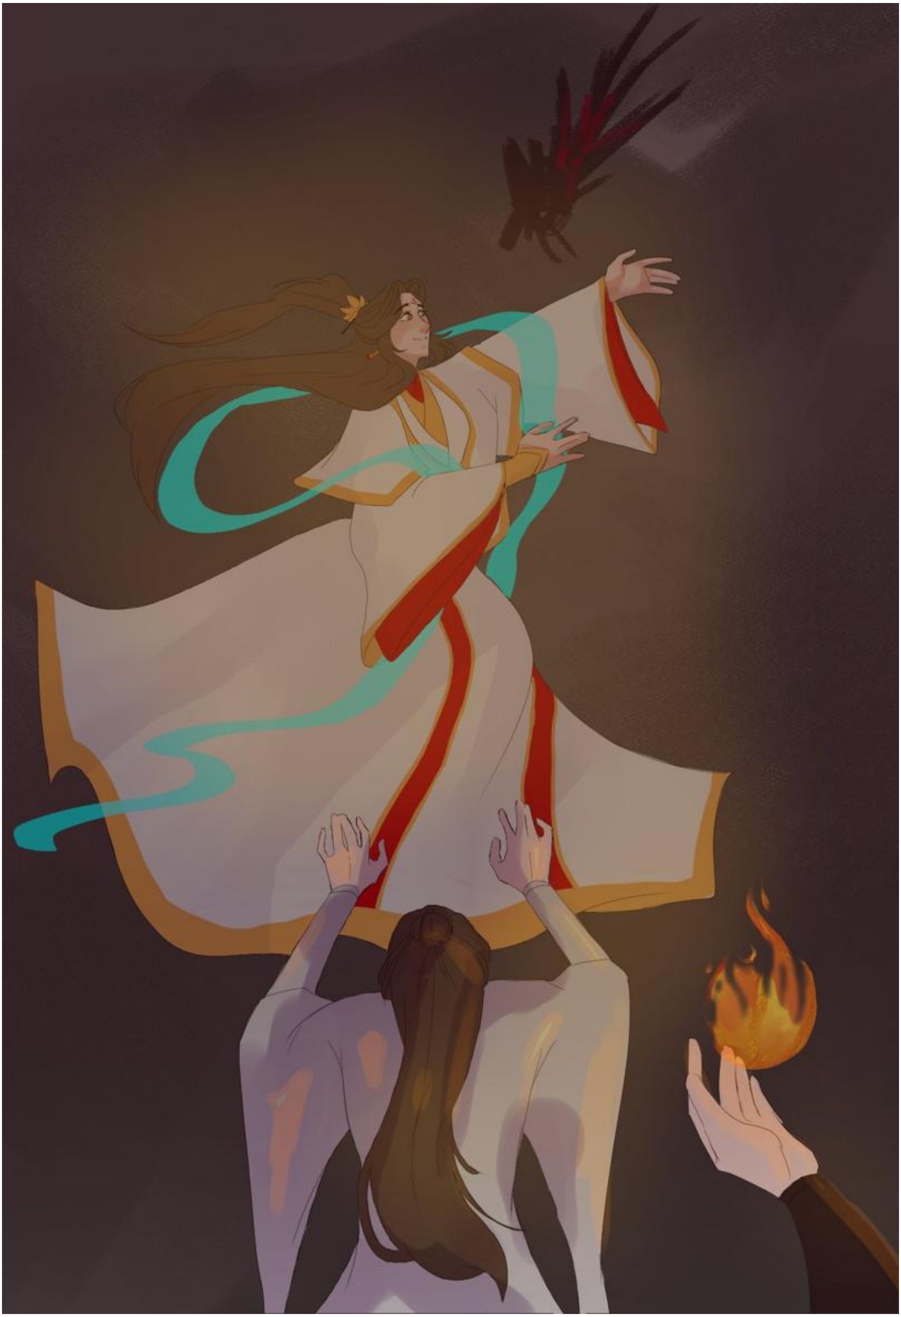


@HoneyedKnife
for @CATACLYSMICEVIE

CREDIT: HONEY

TWT: weiyingtiddies

CREDIT: ASH



CREDIT: MUSINGLOTUS

[image]

CREDIT: SYL

CREDIT: ESME

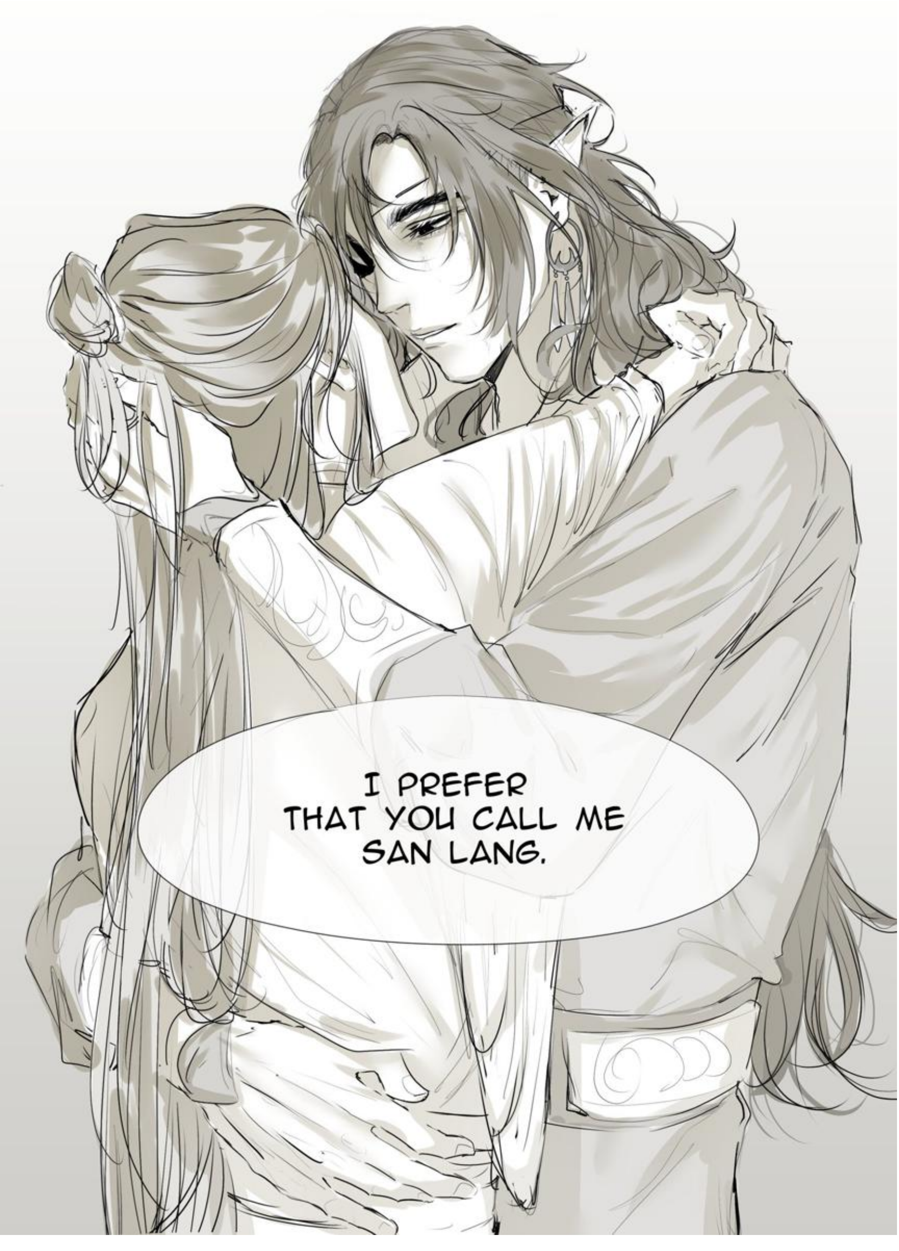
Esmé

CREDIT: ESME



I PREFER THAT YOU CALL ME SAN LANG.

CREDIT: IMAGINARY CANVAS

Chapter End Notes

Let's pat ourselves on the back for surviving a nearly 900k slowburn guys, there aren't many fanfic readers who can say that!

Thank you so much for sticking around for 800+ years of content for this, it's been a WILD ride, and I hope I was able to do the payoff justice!!

Thank you to Imaginary, Cass, Esme, Honey, Sage, Syl, and Ash for their gorgeous artwork, it means so much to me!!

xoxo, Evie

From the Kiln One Supreme Shall Emerge

Chapter Summary

“Bai Wuxiang has returned.”

Those words are all it takes for both of his friends to fall silent.

All four of them understand the gravity of that.

All four of them, survivors of his plague.

All four of them, veterans of his war.

Children of the nation he burnt to the ground.

Victims of his genocide.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

“…If it’s really him…” Xie Lian swallows hard, biting back his fear. “Does he know who you are?”

Hua Cheng thinks it over.

“…I think so.”

The way he used Feng Xin and Mu Qing’s forms to taunt Hua Cheng—

It was so similar to the way he taunted him that night, 800 years before.

In a temple, clutching a ghost fire before a bloody altar.

Xie Lian grimaces, running even faster. “San Lang…if that’s true…”

“What?”

“…He’ll try to use you to hurt me,” Xie Lian mutters, swallowing hard. “I-I tried not to show that I realized who you were in front of him before, but if he’s been watching us long enough…and he knows that I know…”

Xie Lian swallows hard, his heart pounding.

Remembering the thread Bai Wuxiang made before, pretending to be the Venerable of Empty Words on the Terrace of Cascading Wine…

Because that must have been him, Xie Lian is certain of it.

'I'll hang him.'

He squeezes Hua Cheng's hand tighter.

'…Just like I hung Hong'er.'

Hua Cheng squeezes his hand in return, shaking his head.

"Don't be scared, your highness. Bai Wuxiang can do whatever he likes—but he'll never win against me."

He speaks with such certainty, without an ounce of fear for himself.

Xie Lian must be a coward, because…he really can't fathom it.

"…How are you so certain?"

"Because," Hua Cheng guides him through the passage, wraith butterflies flitting past them, charging down the passage to find and attack their pursuer.

"No matter what he does—even if he tries to force me from this world—I'll always come back."

Because Hua Cheng still has someone precious in this world.

And Bai Wuxiang has already tried to get rid of him before.

Hua Cheng was far weaker back then—and still, he survived.

"It's no coincidence that the only time he's shown himself before me since his return was an effort to break gege's trust in me."

Bai Wuxiang doesn't actually want a fair fight.

Xie Lian squeezes his hand, his voice resolved.

"He was wasting his breath."

Even if Hua Cheng's intentions had always been betrayal, Xie Lian would have happily accepted it.

Accepted anything, for the chance to see Hong'er one more time.

"But...how did you know those clones of Mu Qing and Feng Xin were fakes?"

Hua Cheng's lips quirk into a lopsided smile. "I left a butterfly with the real ones. I promised gege they would be alright, didn't I?"

Xie Lian bites back a smile of his own, his chest so full, it could burst.

"...You did."

Even when Hua Cheng was fighting them so ferociously—he never had any intentions of seriously harming them.

"Though you could have been a little more gentle San Lang, they really had no idea..."

Especially towards Mu Qing.

Hua Cheng shrugs, unbothered.

"I didn't try very hard."

They round the corner—back to where Mu Qing and Feng Xin were left behind, both of them struggling fiercely against their bonds.

The minute Feng Xin sees Xie Lian's face, he cries out with relief.

"Your highness! You escaped! You...!" His elation fades when Hua Cheng follows.

Mu Qing glares at the ghost king, struggling even harder than he was before. "If you made some sort of deal with him so he would let us go, just forget it and run! You can't trust him!"

"Yes," Xie Lian feels his way over, loosening their bonds, "I can."

Mu Qing looks over at Feng Xin, then Hua Cheng—his eyes narrowed hatefully. “What did you do to him?!”

“Mu Qing.”

“Your highness, he’s obsessed—!”

“If so,” Xie Lian frees one of his hands, moving onto the other, “It’s mutual.”

His friends freeze, their jaws dropping in unison

"He's…" Feng Xin looks at Hua Cheng, whose eye is sparkling, listening to Xie Lian say that. "…Your highness, I've never been one to judge, but…"

Not true, but Xie Lian lets him go on.

(Affectionately.)

"…You've really lost your mind this time…"

Xie Lian sighs, turning back to Mu Qing, their faces level.

"You remembered who he really was, didn't you?"

Mu Qing hesitates, squeezing the fingers in his free hand to get his circulation back.

"…Yeah…it…doesn't freak you out that he's been following you for so long?"

Since Mu Qing already knows—and Feng Xin couldn't remember much about Hong'er anyway, curse or not…

"I told you about him," Xie Lian explains to Mu Qing quietly. "When you came to visit me during my first banishment."

Mu Qing's eyes snap to Hua Cheng, and he grows still.

Suddenly, he's a kid again—trying to navigate the world after it fell apart. And the painful juxtaposition of seeing Xie Lian, someone he once admired as much as he envied, reduced to such a state.

Broken and hollowed out—left to wander the world like a ghost.

Not out of humiliation, no.

Xie Lian was humiliated when his banishment began—to the point where he couldn't stand being seen in such a state.

But when Mu Qing saw him again…

Xie Lian didn't smile genuinely anymore. Any warmth in his expression was forced.

He was…shattered.

Mu Qing could barely get more than two words out of him the entire time he was there, avoiding Feng Xin, trying to find some peace of mind by checking to see that Xie Lian was alright, only to find…

That he wasn't.

And before long…the reason why became clear.

When Xie Lian admitted to Mu Qing that he hadn't been alone, when he was gone.

That someone had taken care of him.

And…that Xie Lian had lost him.

"You're…" Mu Qing mumbles, his voice hoarse. "You're the…"

'Were you in love with him?'

Xie Lian's voice had been so raw when he answered back then—unable to speak of the companion he lost. Not without losing his composure.

'I…I think I was.'

The prince frees Mu Qing's other hand, squeezing it gently.

"He is."

Mu Qing looks back at Xie Lian's face, and he—

He pauses, staring at the god in shocked silence.

Because the warmth in Xie Lian's eyes…

It isn't fake anymore.

The smile on his lips isn't forced.

He looks—

Like the boy Mu Qing grew up with.

He looks—

…Happy.

Mu Qing blows out a tired breath, his shoulders sagging in what could almost be seen as defeat, and…

He nods.

“Okay.”

“…Okay?!” Feng Xin glares, baffled. “How the hell is it okay?!”

“They already knew each other,” Mu Qing mumbles, watching as Xie Lian moves on to help him.

“I promise, I’ll explain everything to you when I can.” Xie Lian assures him as he works to free his hands—and before Feng Xin can argue, his prince squeezes his shoulder.

“I’m not saying that to procrastinate, Feng Xin. I mean it. When this is all over…”

He grasps his shoulder and Mu Qing’s, squeezing them both.

“I’ll explain everything. To both of you.”

Both of his friends pause, watching Xie Lian as if…

Almost as if they’re seeing a ghost.

“But for now—both of you need to report back to the Heavens.”

Mu Qing hesitates, his expression becoming dark.

“Your highness, I can’t go back.”

“I heard you before,” Xie Lian shakes his head, just as grim. “But you have to—at least once.”

“You don’t—”

“Bai Wuxiang has returned.”

Those words are all it takes for both of his friends to fall silent.

All four of them understand the gravity of that.

All four of them, survivors of his plague.

All four of them, veterans of his war.

Children of the nation he burnt to the ground.

Victims of his genocide.

“Someone has to warn the emperor and gather the martial gods.” Xie Lian explains, stepping back when they’re both completely free.

“General Pei should be at the edge of the fields of Tonglu with the Rain Master—you’ll need both of them. Take them with you when you ascend.”

“…Mu Qing can go,” Feng Xin agrees. “I’ll stay and fight with you.”

He says so fearlessly, without an ounce of hesitation, and Xie Lian can’t help but remember his words, the night of the mid autumn festival.

‘I didn’t promise to protect you until it got hard.’

‘I promised to protect you forever.’

“No…” Xie Lian shakes his head. “Go with Mu Qing. I’ll have San Lang here to help me.”

“You…” Feng Xin looks back and forth between them. “Don’t you need all the help you can get?”

“You don’t understand. Bai Wuxiang will never kill me…”

Xie Lian swallows hard, knowing that much in his bones. “But…he’ll kill both of you, and force me to listen.”

“…” Feng Xin looks to Hua Cheng. “But he’s staying.”

“I’m already dead,” the calamity points out dryly.

Not to mention the fact that Xie Lian honestly would prefer it if Hua Cheng would leave him to face this alone, but…

He would never do that, no matter what Xie Lian said.

“And once you warn the others—we can all face this together. But you have to go—now!”

A silver butterfly slides from one of Hua Cheng’s vambraces.

“There’s a path through Tonglu that never closes,” Hua Cheng explains. “Follow this, and you’ll get out quickly.”

Feng Xin nods, reluctantly listening—but Mu Qing stops next to Xie Lian.

Clearly torn.

"…Your highness," he squeezes Xie Lian's wrist, his voice urgent. "Once you get out of here—find me. Before you speak to anyone else."

It's…an odd request coming from anyone—but especially Mu Qing, of all people.

And he—

"Promise me."

He sounds desperate .

"…I will," Xie Lian agrees slowly, nodding as Mu Qing lets him go. "I promise."

They don't have time to debate it anymore.

Not with the distant rumbling growing more and more violent.

"…We'll see each other soon," he steps back, grabbing Hua Cheng's arm. "San Lang!"

"This way, dianxia!"

They charge down the pathway, in the opposite direction of Feng Xin and Mu Qing, heading back the way they came.

Running towards Bai Wuxiang, instead of away from him.

Eight centuries ago, Xie Lian would have called this an act of madness.

Even now, part of him still thinks that it is, but...

They have no choice.

The further they run, the more spiritual remnants they come across—torn and fading butterfly wings.

Xie Lian's heart sinks.

"I can't believe he was able to kill so many of them..."

"So?" Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow, unbothered. "For every butterfly he kills, I'll send a hundred more. That ancient excuse for a ghost will tire out eventually."

"You..." Xie Lian turns his head towards him, amazed."You really aren't afraid of him, are you?"

Hua Cheng's shoulders are straight, eye staring straight ahead as they move through the caverns at a breakneck pace, no longer forced to pretend to be ignorant to their surroundings.

"There is only one thing that has ever frightened me."

Somehow...Xie Lian knows what it is.

"Can I ask you something, gege?"

"Anything," Xie Lian replies instantly, silently wishing he could see the statues around them.

(There's one in the distance, lying on its back, that Hua Cheng would rather disperse than let him see—but Xie Lian has no way of knowing that.)

"...How did you figure out it was me?"

Xie Lian is quiet for a moment—and his answer nearly knocks the wind out of him.

"I suspected for a long time, actually."

If Hua Cheng didn't have to lead both of them, he would have turned his head to gawk at him.

"...You did?"

Xie Lian nods, thinking back on it.

"I called out for you the first night we met on Mount Yu Jun, remember?"

Hua Cheng does.

And he remembers how crushing it was, realizing that after so many centuries—he still couldn't defy the curse and manage to answer.

"You smelled the same...and the way you led me down the path...it was exactly the way you did it before," Xie Lian recalls quietly. "And when you couldn't answer...I felt like I was losing my mind."

"I'm sorry, your highness," Hua Cheng whispers mournfully. "I tried."

"Oh, no..." Xie Lian looks up at him, shaking his head, "I know you did, San Lang...But after that, being in Puqi Shrine with you...it was so much like it was before. And even though we were supposed to be strangers...it was like you knew me inside and out."

And then there was the time when they were in Qi Rong's lair...and Hua Cheng wouldn't deny that they'd met before, but he wouldn't say it, either.

Or then here was the way Hua Cheng became so frustrated when Xie Lian asked him about Shuo's Xianle accent, saying—

'What if I was from Xianle, too?'

And when they were running from Heaven's Eye and the other cultivators, and Xie Lian asked Hua Cheng about his childhood...

'Please don't ask me.'

Remembering how tortured Hua Cheng sounded breaks his heart, in retrospect.

'I hate lying—so please, don't ask me.'

"But you have to understand, Ho—" Xie Lian doesn't mean to try to say his name this time, it's a pure reflex—one that leaves him clutching his throat with a wince. "...San Lang, every time I thought I found you, and I was wrong..."

Xie Lian presses his lips together tightly, struggling to hold his emotions back.

"It...it was like losing you all over again."

Over, and over, and over again.

"So...even though I wondered, or even hoped...I never allowed myself to seriously consider it."

Xie Lian could only bear so much disappointment.

"Not until Mu Qing told me that you had...the pearl earring I placed on your pyre," Xie Lian's voice turns slightly rough, still raw with grief—even after all of this time.

"That was when I knew it was you..." Xie Lian's jaw locks, his eyes narrowing. "And that Bai Wuxiang must have stolen your name."

"...How did you figure that part out?"

Hua Cheng could have guessed how Xie Lian surmised his identity after Mu Qing told him that, but the curse...

"...I think one of the lost souls of Wuyong told me," Xie Lian admits, his brow furrowed as he remembers the screams he heard, reverberating in his ear. "When we were swept up in that avalanche...I heard a voice—and it was like it was talking to me ...not just a memory."

Whispering words that sounded like a riddle—but when Xie Lian stood there, his forehead pressed against the painted mural on the wall, with Mu Qing asking how there was a painting of Puqi Shrine...

He realized it was the truth.

"...What did it say to you?"

"What is the one thing from our parents that we take to our graves?" Xie Lian recalls, his heart pounding as the rumbling ahead grows more and more violent.

"And the answer...is a name," He breathes as they round the corner. "It goes on our tombstones."

Hua Cheng isn't surprised by Xie Lian's brilliance—that's to be expected.

...But which soul from Wuyong would have been trying to help Xie Lian with that?

"And...I think I know what I have to do now, when I confront Bai Wuxiang..." Xie Lian admits, biting his lip.

"But...I'm not like you, San Lang. I'm...I'm scared."

It feels shameful saying it—but less so when Hua Cheng squeezes his hand, gently reassuring him.

"You don't have to be, gege—no matter where you go now, I'm always with you. I am always on your side."

Even now, hearing Hua Cheng say that...

He smiles, even though part of him feels like crying.

"I know."

But when they round the final turn, reaching the end of the cavern where Bai Wuxiang should be...

There's no one there.

Only a dead end.

"...Where did he go?" Xie Lian frowns—nearly staggering to the side when the mountain rumbles again--but Hua Cheng is quick to catch him with an arm around his waist, looking up with a frown.

"...He's in the Kiln, your highness."

He's beaten them to it.

"He's forcing it shut as we speak."

Xie Lian's heart seizes up in his chest as his grip on Hua Cheng's arm tightens.

"...And what happens if it closes while he's the only one inside?"

"He can break out on his own—the result would be similar to a god passing a Calamity."

So...he'd become even stronger than he was before.

Xie Lian grimaces. "...Is there a way we can get to him before the Kiln closes entirely?"

"...There is," Hua Cheng agrees. "But you would have to trust me—and hold on tight."

Xie Lian's arms wrap around his waist.

"That's easy, then." He smiles softly, and the sight of it is so sweet, Hua Cheng...

Part of him wants to gather his love in his arms and leave this place.

Leave this world behind, as it has proven over and over again—it does not deserve him.

But Xie Lian loves this world.

And as long as that's true, Hua Cheng will fight for his place in it.

He leans down, pressing a kiss against the top of the prince's head—closing his eye for a moment.

Just one.

When he opens it again, he reaches up to the back of his head—slipping aside the black, leather eyepatch that covers his right eye.

"Hold your breath, gege."

Xie Lian does so without question, listening as Hua Cheng sucks in a deep breath, his nostrils flaring.

Though he can't see it, in a scarred, long empty eye socket—

There's a spark.

And when Hua Cheng exhales...

Smoke pours out.

Afterone, two, three breaths...

A wall of fire bursts forth, slamming into the cavern wall, creating a massive, gaping hole to the world outside.

One of his eyes shines like starlight, and the other...

Burns like hellfire, roaring brighter with every breath he takes, pulling the prince into his arms as he leaps forward, out into the ferocity of the blizzard near Mount Tonglu's peak. But Xie Lian...

He isn't cold.

It's almost as though there's a small sun within San Lang's chest--not allowing any of the snow or ice around him to touch his skin, evaporating into steam before it gets too close as they shoot upward, higher and higher—

Directly over the volcano's caldera.

There's a moment before gravity overtakes them—and they float, Xie Lian's hair surrounding him like a halo.

"Your highness!" Hua Cheng shouts to him over the sound of the wind. "Before we face him—there's something you have to remember!"

"What?!"

Hua Cheng's next words leave him stunned—because it's not that Xie Lian forgot ...

"You're stronger than he is!"

It's that he never believed it to begin with.

How could he be stronger than Bai Wuxiang—especially now , a shadow of the god he once was?

Just then, Hua Cheng's lips press against his—and Xie Lian feels a surge of power flowing into him.

That's when they begin to fall back to earth, plunging into the swirling smoke and ash surrounding the volcano's rim.

And Xie Lian knows—

He can't defeat Bai Wuxiang.

He couldn't do it back then—and he couldn't do it now.

But he thinks...he thinks he might have something on his side that he didn't, last time.

And even if that fails—he isn't fighting alone.

He has—

And in the horrifying flash of an instant...

Xie Lian's arms are empty.

Not because Hua Cheng let him go, no.

It's just that one moment, he was in Xie Lian's arms—and the next, he was gone.

Disappearing like smoke.

Xie Lian stretches his arms out, grasping blindly against the dark as he plummets, screaming—

"SAN LANG?!"

Hundreds of miles away, Pei Ming hobbles along, one arm slung around Feng Xin's shoulders, following behind Yushi Huang and the others.

"If...If you were just on the Mountain with those two...how did you make it here so fast?"

"Travel arrays," Mu Qing explains. "Apparently Blackwater and Hua Cheng were preparing for an event like this for some time—they're hidden all over the region, but the butterflies are the only ones that know where they are."

Pei Ming grumbles, his ribs twinging. "...We couldn't have used them before now?"

Feng Xin shakes his head, following the butterfly in front of them to the next portal, ignoring the awkward fact that they're, well...

Using an escape route engineered by the man who...happened to...assassinate The Water Master.

You do what you have to do, but it's awkward.

"Travel arrays don't work while the Kiln is open—but once it starts to close, they start becoming operational again," he explains.

"Just...how do you know all of this?" Pei Su mumbles, exhausted and half starved, chewing on melon seeds the farmers generously gave him.

"...The butterflies talk," Mu Qing grumbles, sounding like he'd rather die than admit it, but...

"...They're actually really informative..."

Pei Ming sends Feng Xin an incredulous look.

"...Did Xuan Zhen just give Crimson Rain a compliment?"

Feng Xin gives him the look of a man who has, to put it simply, given up.

"...If I told you everything Xuan Zhen and his highness have said today, you really wouldn't believe me, general."

They step into another array, a silver butterfly fluttering ahead of them, guiding them into the darkness—and when they step back out again, they're on an abandoned country road.

Outside Mount Tonglu, at last.

For the first time in what feels like ages, they see the sun.

"...You can ascend with the others from here," Mu Qing mutters, stepping away from the group. "I'll be right behind you."

He takes one step away, then pauses in shock, looking around, realizing where they are.

"What?" Feng Xin frowns, setting Pei Ming down.

"We told Xie Lian that we would report this to the Heavens. Whatever is happening with Bai Wuxiang—you're the best healer we have."

Not to mention the best swordsman, after Pei Ming and Xie Lian.

"You'll be needed—"

That's when he looks up, coming to a halt beside Mu Qing.

"...Why...would Hua Cheng and Blackwater design an escape route from the Kiln that leads here?" Feng Xin mutters, his hands balling into fists.

"..." Pei Ming glances around at the ruins surrounding them, raising an eyebrow. "You know this place?"

"...We grew up here."

Standing before them, trees a delicate sea of crimson in the autumn twilight, wind gently rustling through the leaves...

Is Mount Taicang.

The ruins of the capital lay to the North. Mu Qing's village to the South.

And at its peak...

The Temple of the Crown Prince.

And if that's the case...

Mu Qing knows exactly where he needs to go.

"...It doesn't matter why he chose this place, you have to take the others," he mutters. "I'm going to the lake. I'll follow in a minute."

"...The Lake?" Feng Xin frowns, taken by surprise. "Why go there?"

"I have something I need to take care of before I ascend to the heavens, alright?" The Martial God grumbles. "It won't take me long."

But he...

He can't look Feng Xin in the eye now, and not notice—

He seems genuinely terrified that Mu Qing won't come back.

But...why?

Before either of them can say another word—a rumbling shakes the ground around them.

So violently, even Mu Qing nearly topples over, stumbling straight into Feng Xin's chest--too distracted by the commotion to be mortified, whipping his head around to look for the source.

It's impossible to see, but--

A roar rips through the air. So loud, so powerful, Mu Qing feels his ears pop, hands clutching either side of his head as he drops to his knees, Feng Xin and the others doing the same.

"WHAT THE HELL IS THAT?!"

Feng Xin throws an arm out, bracing himself and Mu Qing as a heatwave blasts past them.

"...DID TONGLU ERUPT?!"

"NO!" Pei Ming shouts over them both, rubbing at his ears—aggressively ringing now, buzzing until his teeth almost want to chatter. "THAT'S NO VOLCANO!"

"THEN WHAT THE HELL IS IT?!"

Pei Ming grimaces, using a hand to shield his eyes as he glances back toward the array they just passed through.

Still open—

Firelight glimmering on the other side.

He's only heard that sound a few times in the last millennia.

It's rare .

Behind them, Yushi Huang tosses her rain master hat into the air, summoning clouds to cool things down for the surrounding area—and he swallows hard, knowing whatever this is...

It can't mean anything good for the friends they left behind.

"...It's a dragon."

Keeeeen...

Xie Lian rolls onto his back, coughing.

Keeeeeen...

Ears ringing—either from the explosion of the Kiln closing above him, or the impact of landing on the floor.

Shockingly smooth beneath him—almost like marble.

Keeeeeen...

"...SAN LANG!" He sits up immediately, head spinning violently—but he ignores it, staggering to his feet.

Falling over, knees bruising themselves against the unforgiving surface of the floor—but he gets up again, desperate.

"SAN LANG!"

He feels something odd, then.

Something brushing against his cheek. A ghost of a touch—barely even a whisper.

But when Xie Lian reaches up to touch his face, there...

There's nothing there.

He jerks back, blinking rapidly as he swallows down a lump of fear in his throat.

"...WHO IS IT?!"

A voice finally answers him—calm, quiet—

And yet it managed to fill the entire dark, oppressive void that Xie Lian feels around him.

Pressing down like some sort of nightmare—making it almost impossible for the prince to utter a single sound.

“You know who I am.”

He’s almost…gleeful.

Over the fact that Xie Lian knows that voice from the nightmares that he can never remember.

That his is the voice that the prince can never forget .

Xie Lian scrambles backwards, tripping over his own feet—

Petrified.

“SAN LANG!”

“There’s no need to shout.”

Bai Wuxiang’s voice is as calm as ever as he walks through the kiln, gripping a staff in his hand. “It’s just you and me here. No one else will come—the Kiln is sealed.”

Each step he takes echoes, telling Xie Lian as he gets closer.

Part of him wants to be relieved—because if Hua Cheng isn’t here, then—

Then he’s safe.

But…

Xie Lian doesn’t know that. Can’t know that, when he disappeared the way he did.

Xie Lian's grip on Fangxin tightens as he lifts the sword up, pointing it directly at his chest.

"Where is he?" The god snarls, his voice unafraid—not for himself.

He's never fearless when it comes to himself. But for Hua Cheng…

"Where is he right now?"

"He's gone," the calamity replies simply.

And, despite trying to hide his reaction…

Xie Lian's face falls.

"…What's that supposed to mean?!"

"He doesn't believe in you anymore. Dead. He left. What do you think?"

Each word rings with this harsh tone of finality. Like it actually is the truth. The only thing that could be true.

But…

Xie Lian's hands curl into fists.

Liar.

This man is a liar.

He has always been a liar.

He will always be a liar.

And he can't change the things that Xie Lian KNOWS are true.

"…STOP YOUR NONSENSE!" He shouts, lunging, thrusting the sword towards Bai Wuxiang's chest.

"SAN LANG WOULD NEVER LEAVE ME!"

Bai Wuxiang laughs, parrying the blow with ease. "Alright, alright—I've sent him outside the Kiln. But even if he does arrive—it'll be too late."

Xie Lian’s heart pounds with every word he speaks, struggling to understand. But…

Bai Wuxiang’s tone…

“It’s better that he doesn’t see this,” the white clothed calamity continues, stalking towards him.

“Even if he doesn’t realize it now—he won’t want to see the state of you.”

Even as he whispers Xie Lian’s worst fears into the darkness, it sounds like…

…Like Bai Wuxiang thinks he’s being merciful.

“Who knows if he’ll still want to be with you.”

And on some level, some foundational part of his mind—

Xie Lian knows that he will.

Knows that no matter what he does, or how many times he fails—

San Lang will love him the same.

But knowing that you will be loved and knowing that you deserve to be loved are two very different things.

And Xie Lian…

He knows he’s done nothing to deserve being loved so fiercely. That he could never, in a thousand lifetimes, deserve what Hua Cheng has done for him.

But that's always been the point of Bai Wuxiang, hasn't it?

Rendering him into something completely unlovable.

Xie Lian trembles, fear and rage twisting together, forming a vicious knot in his chest. Pulsing with one thought.

No.

No.

You won't take him from me again.

“...SHUT THE FUCK UP!”

The words tear from his throat in a visceral scream.

The god flies towards Bai Wuxiang, attacking him in a fury. “WHAT DO YOU WANT?! WHY DO YOU KEEP CLINGING TO ME?!”

Bai Wuxiang dodges every single attack—and it only seems to infuriate the prince even more.

“WHY HAVEN’T YOU DIED?! WHY DID YOU COME HERE?!”

What does he have to gain from coming back?

Xianle is gone. The Heavens are in disarray Xie Lian has been a disgrace for eight hundred years.

What more could Bai Wuxiang possibly do?

What else could he possibly take from him?

Ghosts have drive. They remain in this world for a reason.

Why, in thousands of years, has Bai Wuxiang stubbornly refused to fade away?

“Because you’re here.”

Xie Lian freezes, fangxin raised—his eyes wide as his mind struggles to comprehend those words, scrambling around the edges of their meaning.

“...What do you mean?”

No, he...

He couldn't mean...

“Because you’ve come,” Bai Wuxiang replies. “So, I’ve come too.”

He watches Xie Lian's face with a beastly sort of hunger, waiting for the emotions he knows are there to rise to the surface.

Horror. Fear. Disgust.

Helplessness.

That's what Xie Lian has always done before.

And yet.

The prince takes a step back, then...turns away from him.

Fangxin hanging at his side.

His empty hand trembling—until he curls it into a fist.

"...That's why you hated him so much, isn't it?"

His voice trembles, and underneath Bai Wuxiang's mask, a slow smile begins to form.

"Hated who, my prince?"

Xie Lian twists his head, looking back at him over his shoulder—cursed shackles gleaming under the Kiln's light.

And even as blood drips from his lips, he snarls that name—

Here, where all of Bai Wuxiang's curses are at their weakest.

"Hong'er."

Bai Wuxiang's mask is unmoving, its expression forever frozen in place.

But his shoulders stiffen.

"...It makes you sick, doesn't it?" Xie Lian's nails bite into his palm until it bleeds.

"That no matter what you do, I will always choose him over you."

They've played this game of back and forth, cat and mouse, for far too long now.

But Xie Lian isn't a teenager anymore.

Terrified of suffering, loss, and defeat—because he hadn't experienced any of those things before.

The answer to Bai Wuxiang...has always been simple.

People will attack others in the ways they believe will hurt the most.

Because it's what they are the most afraid of.

Xie Lian doesn't need his spiritual power to hurt him.

He doesn't need his sight to hurt him.

When he speaks again—his voice is cold.

"...Tell me, your highness," his fingers uncurl from their fist, hanging loosely at his side.

"Has anyone ever chosen you?"

Xie Lian has fought this man with all of his might. Spent years twisting in his grasp.

And now...

Bai Wuxiang is the one who flinches.

Fingers squeezing his staff until it splinters, taking a step back.

"...Do not call me by that title, Xie Lian," he hisses, like a snake rattling its tail. "Or we might stop being friends."

"Have you ever had a friend, your highness?" Xie Lian turns around, tilting his head to the side. "Or do they just fall in love with the masks you wear?"

"I am losing my patience," Bai Wuxiang warns, but—

His tone is lilting.

Uncertain.

"That's why you wear them, isn't it, your highness?"

“ENOUGH!”

His scream is so fierce, Xie Lian is blown off of his feet—slamming into the wall of the Kiln.

The wind is knocked out of him, feeling something inside his torso crunch as he slides to the floor.

“YOU WEAR AS MANY MASKS AS I DO, YOU INSOLENT CHILD!”

Creeeak…

Xie Lian feels a hand in his hair, yanking his head up, dragging him across the floor.

“SEE?!”

Creeeeeaaak…

“SEE WHAT YOU DID?!”

Xie Lian offers a wry, bloodstained smile.

“I don’t see anything, your highness.”

CRACK!

The slap sends blood splattering across the floor.

Bai Wuxiang seized his wrist, wrenching it forward as he forces Xie Lian to press his hand against the face of the man hanging in front of them.

Heavily bandaged—but Xie Lian knows exactly who it is.

Lang Ying.

“What did you do to him?!”

Cold fingers caress his bruised cheek.

“Don’t be sad, my prince,” he croons, taking satisfaction in the horror in Xie Lian’s eyes. “You never knew him.”

“…Wh…what are you talking about?!”

“It was me,” fingers cup under his jaw, tilting his chin up, sneering. “I never left you.”

Xie Lian’s stomach twists with nausea, long healed wounds burning like molten scars against his heart.

“I will never leave you, Xie Lian.”

“You stole that child’s body?!”

“No, no…” The calamity croons. “He gave it willingly.”

“You’re LYING! Why would he do that?!”

“You know why, your highness.” His palm presses against Xie Lian’s chest.

“In your heart, you’ve always known exactly who the boy was.”

No…

“That was why you fainted when you first touched his face, isn’t it?”

No…

“Why you were so desperate to look after him…”

Xie Lian turns his face away, fighting back the urge to gag when cold breath hits the side of his neck.

“I didn’t steal the child’s body. He gave it to me.”

“You MANIPULATED—!”

“So I could pursue the criminal who destroyed his future.”

Lang Ying was, as Jun Wu is implying—the first Crown Prince of Yong’an.

Infected when Xie Lian laid siege to the palace, so many years ago.

Likely cast out and ostracized until his death, so he couldn’t spread the plague to anyone else.

Suffering for centuries.

Because of what Xie Lian…

The prince presses his lips together firmly, his heart pounding against his rib cage.

Knowing what he has to do.

But it’s like he already told Hua Cheng before, he…

Xie Lian is scared .

But…Bai Wuxiang was right about one thing.

He raises one trembling hand, pressing it against the side of a cold, ceramic mask.

Biting down the nausea in his throat.

Remembering what Hua Cheng said to him.

'You're stronger than he is.'

Maybe not physically, but…

Xie Lian's lips curl into a knowing smile.

"You were so desperate to stand beside me?"

Bai Wuxiang's grip on his hair tightens.

When the prince speaks, he carefully enunciates every single syllable, each word leveled at his captor like a knife.

"The ugly little toad…wanted a taste of something he couldn't have?"

Using the words Bai Wuxiang weaponized against Hua Cheng feels vile on his tongue, but…

From the snarl Xie Lian hears in his ear—

It works.

"I can have ANYTHING I desire, you have run to my arms more times than you can count. OR HAVE YOU ALREADY FORGOTTEN?!"

Blood drips down Xie Lian's chin as he laughs, shaking his head.

"You mean when you wore Feng Xin's face?"

Bai Wuxiang freezes, his hand holding Xie Lian's wrist in a vice grip.

"Or when you burned everything else in my world that wasn't you?"

"…You made your own choices, Xie Lian. I never forced you."

Oh, that makes Xie Lian laugh .

His head snapping back, chest heaving with humorless relief.

"You…you really don't have that many tricks, do you?" He sneers, not flinching when the calamity yanks at his hair.

"You lock every single door except for one, then blame a man for the path he takes out of a burning house." He sighs, breathing hard from so much laughter.

“No one ever chooses the path to you.”

CRACK!

His head whips to the side with another slap as he flies to the ground.

He rolls from the force of it, slamming into the Kiln wall again, this time with so much force, the cavern trembles.

Bai Wuxiang paces like a wounded beast, breathing hard, watching the way Xie Lian’s body had begun to shake with vicious satisfaction.

Until he realizes…

Xie Lian is laughing.

Pushing himself up on his elbows.

“You could wait another eight hundred years…another thousand years…” he smiles, breathing shakily. “And I’ll always choose…H… Hong’er over you.”

He spits blood at Bai Wuxiang’s feet.

The Calamity stares down at him, his gaze cold from frustration.

“…You would really put yourself through so much pain, just to call that worm’s name?”

Xie Lian smiles up at him—

And his words ring with sincerity.

“I’ll call his name a thousand times…before I ever call for you.”

Bai Wuxiang’s hands begin to tremble—and Xie Lian’s last words find that final straw in his resolve—

And they snap it in two.

“…Besides, it isn’t even your name, is it?” Xie Lian whispers. “Your highness.”

Bai Wuxiang hangs his head, staring down at him.

Shoulders rising and falling faster and faster, taking angry, snarling breaths.

"…ENOUGH!"

Xie Lian is thrown down again—this time, into the center of the Kiln. Landing on his back, gasping for breath.

"I've been too gentle with you…" The calamity snarls, and before Xie Lian can sit up—

Thud!

He can't.

There's a hot, burning pain in his gut.

Fangxin rammed through his middle, pinning him to the floor of the Kiln.

The prince does not cry out.

"You have forgotten to FEAR ME!"

Oh, but he hasn't.

Xie Lian raises his hands to struggle, when he feels a mask being lowered over his face—his heart pounding.

Only for both his palm to be run through with a dagger, pinned to the floor above his head.

Xie Lian is terrified .

Trapped, unable to move.

Like a butterfly, pinned beneath a layer of glass.

"What was that you said before…" Bai Wuxiang recalls raggedly, standing over him. "That I would never kill you?"

Xie Lian tugs at his hand weakly, his chest heaving.

"What makes you so certain?"

Jun Wu extends his fingertips, feeling the Kiln groan and resist his commands—

And Xie Lian stares ahead blindly, managing a small, trembling smile as he sees a flicker in the darkness.

A small flutter of silver light.

A wraith butterfly.

“It doesn’t matter…” He rasps.

Lips trembling, stained with blood.

It doesn’t matter what Bai Wuxiang does to him.

“I’ll…” His eyes flutter, that image blurring over his head, looking almost like—

“I’ll…always come back.”

…Like a ghost fire.

Because Xie Lian still has someone precious in this world.

“…I have every intention for you to do so,” Bai Wuxiang responds coldly, glaring at the walls of the Kiln around them, his face bare before the light.

Staring down at his mask upon the prince’s face.

“There were always meant to be four ghost kings, Xie Lian.”

Four ghost kings, for four great tales.

His wife only ever forged three.

“…You’ll have to forgive me, I’m a novice compared to my wife, but…” He smiles.

“Unlike you, I learn quickly.”

His fist grasps at thin air—then catches hold.

“OPEN!”

And after resisting for as long as it can…

With a rumbling groan—the forge of the Kiln groans to life.

And, seemingly from thin air, Bai Wuxiang pulls a weapon of dark steel, golden tunes engraved across the handle.

A blacksmith’s hammer.

Finally, prepared to remake Xie Lian in his own image.

Whether the prince goes willingly, or not.

Xie Lian receives no warning, no indication that it's coming, before—

CLANG!

The hammer is slammed directly into his chest.

Into Xie Lian's heart .

"Oh…"

He smiles, bringing the hammer back again, swinging it down for another blow.

"What a beautiful monstrosity you will be…"

CLANG!

Xie Lian's limbs jerk, blood gurgling past his lips.

"The things that we will do…"

CLANG!

This time, the hammer doesn't strike flesh.

It strikes something hard, and unforgiving.

Diamond.

Xie Lian's eyes suddenly snap open, his shackles burning impossibly bright, because—

Hong'er.

The hammer whistles through the air, ready to make another blow—

And a hand catches it.

Xie Lian's.

He wrenches his hand free of the dagger—not caring if he leaves a hole in his palm in the process.

Sits up, not caring if that means running himself through even further with Fangxin, blood pouring down all around him.

“NO!”

Hands wrap around Bai Wuxiang’s throat.

Crushing it.

“YOU DON’T GET TO TOUCH HIM!”

He slams down to the ground beside Xie Lian, feeling the dagger that once pierced Xie Lian’s wrist plunge into his side.

“YOU DON’T EVER GET TO TOUCH HIM AGAIN!”

Xie Lian’s fist comes down over and over again, not thinking, not feeling anything beyond blind rage and fear.

“YOU CAN’T TOUCH HIM!”

Xie Lian won’t let him.

He won’t.

He’ll kill him.

He’ll—

Then, there’s no more pain.

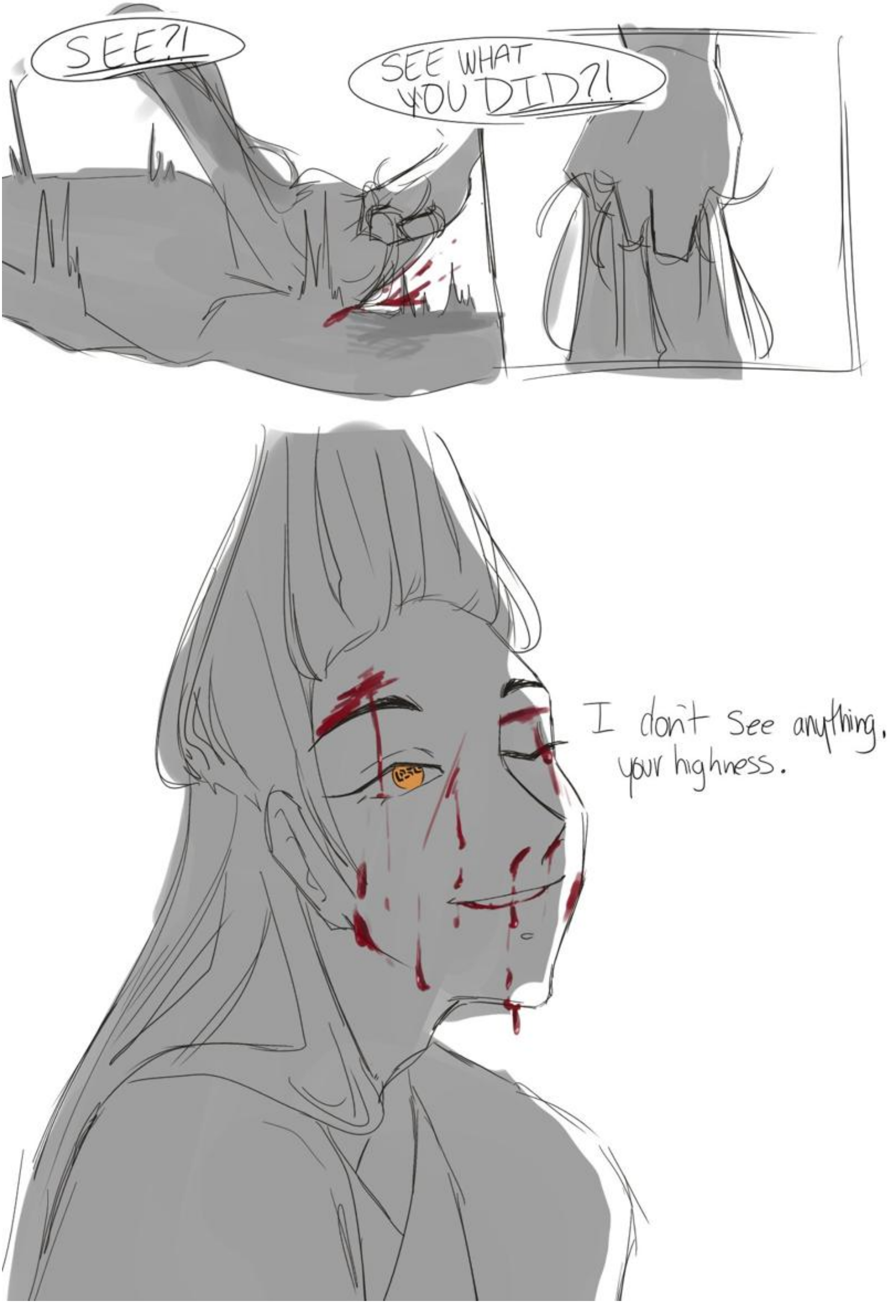
No more Bai Wuxiang.

No more Kiln.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or reuse.

TW // VIOLENCE / BLOOD



SEE?!
SEE WHAT YOU DID?!
I don't see anything, your highness.

CREDIT: MUSINGLOTUS

Chapter End Notes

Thanks to Cass for the beautiful artwork!

xoxo, Evie

From the Cuckoo's Nest

Chapter Summary

> Yes, Guoshi…” the boy mumbles, cradling the bundle of blankets carefully.
>
> He can’t be more than eleven years old, with long, dark hair—crystal blue eyes that jog Xie Lian’s memory as he walks beside them, leaning closer.
>
> “…Mei Nianqing?” He whispers, shocked.

Chapter Notes

> CONTENT WARNING: THIS CHAPTER CONTAINS DEPICTIONS OF SEVERE CHILD ABUSE, AND REFERENCES TO MISCARRIAGES.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

THUD!

Xie Lian lands on the floor with a gasp, scrambling to sit up, fumbling at the front of his robes, reaching inside desperately.

Finding the ring hanging safely from its chain—intact.

Safe.

The prince chokes out a sob, curling in on himself, trembling.

“It’s okay,” he croaks, stroking his fingers over the ring. “I’m okay…we’re…we’re okay…we’re…”

Then he freezes.

Laying sideways on the ground, staring at…

A mosaic tile floor.

And…sunlight.

He…can see.

The prince sits up sharply, pressing both hands to his face.

The wounds from fighting Bai Wuxiang are gone, so…

Is this a dream? Or…

Xie Lian forces his eyes to focus, staring at the mosaic on the floor around him—

Formed in the shape of Mount Tonglu.

Remembering what Hua Cheng told him before.

That, if you fight someone inside the Kiln…

You share their memories.

That…

That was why he provoked Bai Wuxiang.

Terrifying as it was.

And it worked.

"Your majesty…" Xie Lian twists around at the sound of a voice.

Finding a man sitting upon a golden throne.

Wearing robes of black, gold, and red—the royal colors of Wuyong.

Middle aged—and stern faced.

"What is it?"

"…Bai Wuxiang has come to seek an audience," one of the royal attendants explains, bowing low. "It would seem that it is finished."

King Jun Liang instantly sits up straighter, waving his hand in agreement. "Send him in—quickly."

The doors to the throne room open with a groan, and when they do…

A white robed cultivator steps forth.

Wearing a mask—but…not what Xie Lian was expecting.

Not half smiling, or half crying.

It—

It has no face at all.

Just eyes, and no other embellishments to speak of.

“Your highness,” the cultivator—Bai…Wuxiang?—greets him calmly, bowing deeply from the waist.

The King’s reception is warm.

“Guoshi—what news do you have?”

…Guoshi?

“…The birth was a success, your majesty,” Bai Wuxiang lifts his head, dark hair slipping over his shoulders. “Just as I promised.”

“And the Queen?”

“Healthy,” the Guoshi assures him. “But…as we discussed, the circumstances…”

“We’ll discuss them later!” Jun Liang snaps, more than aware of his Guoshi’s constant warnings. “Do I have an heir, or not?!”

“…Yes,” Bai Wuxiang agrees softly. “You do.”

Xie Lian watches the Guoshi—who seems so alien to him, yet bears a familiar name—delivers news that any other father would be delighted to hear.

“Twin sons.”

But the King of Wuyong’s face immediately contorts with…

Horror.

And…

Grief.

Xie Lian reaches forward, baffled, but—

The memory quickly melts away and changes.

He isn’t in a palace anymore—finding earth under his bare feet.

He wouldn’t recognize the place by sight, but…

The slope is familiar.

And Mount Tonglu…

Looks so peaceful.

Soft sunlight filtering down from ancient oak trees, and the breeze…it smells like campfire smoke.

“Keep up, boy!” Bai Wuxiang snaps, turning his head over his shoulder to glare at his student as they climb. “And don’t drop him!”

The King walks beside him—but won’t look back over his shoulder.

Can’t bear to look at Bai Wuxiang’s student, or the babe swaddled in his arms.

“Yes, Guoshi…” the boy mumbles, cradling the bundle of blankets carefully.

He can’t be more than eleven years old, with long, dark hair—crystal blue eyes that jog Xie Lian’s memory as he walks beside them, leaning closer.

“…Mei Nianqing?” He whispers, shocked.

His Guoshi might have been eternally young, in the body of a man in his twenties, but…

Seeing him as a child, and without his trademark white hair…

Is an odd experience, to say the least.

Finally, they reach their destination—

The cliff face.

“Listen well, boy.” Bai Wuxiang glances back at Mei Nianqing, gesturing for him to come closer.

“This will be your responsibility when I am gone, and you succeed me.”

The boy nods seriously, noticing that the baby in his arms has begun to whine.

He bounces it gently, trying to soothe it, and…

Bai Wuxiang barely spares the child a glance.

“Don’t bother with it.”

He points to the bottom of the cliff—where a black stone altar awaits, leading to a temple of matching, polished black jade.

“Do you know this place?”

“…No,” Mei Nianqing admits, taking a nervous step back. “But it feels…it feels wrong, Guoshi.”

Even back then—this place had a tinge of evil to it.

“It is,” Bai Wuxiang agrees, turning to look at King Jun Liang, who won’t look at either of them.

Tenderly cradling his other son in his arms.

“Are you going to explain it to the boy, or should I?”

“…I’m not personally responsible for it,” Jun Liang points out, his eyes narrowed with annoyance, but…

It must be explained, one way or another.

“…For as long as humans have lived in this land, we have lived under the threat of Mount Tonglu.”

Mei Nianqing glances up at the mountain overhead—struggling to believe that.

People have always been raised to stay away from the mountain—knowing it as a sacred place, but…

It hasn’t actually erupted in centuries.

Many actually believe the volcano has gone extinct.

“In ancient times, people avoided its vicinity…but the land was fertile. So, people came—they settled. And over and over, a calamity would strike.” Jun Liang recalls, telling the same story his own father told him, when he was young.

“Over time…our people found a solution to that problem.”

Mei Nianqing looks over the edge, holding the baby in his arms closer, nervous.

“…A solution?”

“Souls.” Bai Wuxiang explains flatly, his voice distinctly disapproving. “Human souls.”

That's when Mei Nianqing realizes, his stomach dropping—

The altar at the bottom of the cliff isn't black at all—no.

It's stained over countless years with long dried blood—made through the sacrifices of an unknowable number of lives.

The horror on his face must be visible—enough so for Jun Liang to roll his eyes, shaking his head.

"It was never our own people. We used prisoners of war—criminals, people who didn't have a right to be here..."

"Didn't...have a right to be here?" Mei Nianqing frowns.

Bai Wuxiang crosses his arms, shaking his head.

"The Kingdom of Wuyong is forged from seven fortress cities. Expanding land—presumably—to create a barrier in case the volcano did erupt again. The people already living in those cities became..."

Unlawful residents.

People who had their homes taken from them by force—and those who were unlucky enough to survive the war, well...

Most of them met their end here, thrown down against the rocks.

"That's..." Mei Nianqing swallows hard, taking a step back.

"Barbaric," Bai Wuxiang agrees. "And while the rulers of Wuyong believed they were stopping an eruption...they only delayed it."

Bai Wuxiang turns his head, looking up towards the mountain's peak, shrouded in snow.

"By stopping several smaller eruptions...they guaranteed a global event would take place."

An eruption so large—so powerful, that not a speck of the kingdom of Wuyong would be left behind.

One that would block out the sun across the continent, killing harvests, spreading mass famine like a plague.

All because of the atrocities of one kingdom.

One family , really.

"We stopped generations ago," Jun Liang grouses—as though that somehow erases thousands of years of unchecked cruelty. "But...it came with a price."

And Mei Nianqing can only guess...that price has something to do with the baby in his arms--now sleeping peacefully.

"Infertility." Bai Wuxiang muses shortly, crossing his arms. "Before—like any other royal family, the Royal House of Wuyong had countless princes and princesses. But, after the human sacrifices stopped...with each generation, fewer and fewer children were born."

Until, eventually—the royal line was lucky to have one child survive to adulthood at all, barely managing to continue on.

"We prayed to the Heavenly Emperor, Zhao Kong, for Guidance," The King of Wuyong mutters, turning away from the cliff, his other son cooing up at him.

"And that was when he sent us Bai Wuxiang from his Grand Temple in the Central Plains."

A cultivator who had achieved immortality, but not ascended as a god—taking place as the Imperial Preceptor of Wuyong.

"What I found, all those years ago...was a curse."

Jun Liang's expression twists with discomfort as Bai Wuxiang explains—but the Guoshi seems calm.

Explaining as easily as he would if he were telling Mei Nianqing about the weather. Military history. Any of their other lessons.

"The Mountain was given a steady diet of souls over the course of millennia—it will take what it is owed, even if on a smaller scale. And in this case...it was taking the souls of the children of the Royal House of Wuyong."

Countless stillbirths. Miscarriages. Children who never lived to take their first breaths.

Soaking the Royal Family in generations of grief and sorrow.

Now, Bai Wuxiang finally turns his head to look at the bundle in Mei Nianqing's arms.

"But never the first born."

In general—once a child is born alive and healthy—it remains untouched by the curse.

But every child thereafter is taken.

In the case of twins, however...

It poses a difficult question, followed by an even more difficult decision.

Who lives, and who dies.

"Are we..." Mei Nianqing glances back over the edge again, his heart beating faster and faster as time goes on. "Guoshi, we're not...we're not going to...?"

"Not yet," his teacher muses. "I've come here to pray to the Heavenly Emperor for guidance."

He takes one child from Jun Liang—who seems incredibly reluctant to let him go, and the other from Mei Nianqing, setting them both on the ground, several feet back from the cliff's edge.

"We wouldn't want a tragedy to take place, and kill the wrong child by mistake."

Xie Lian pauses, watching the agony on the King of Wuyong's face, and Mei Nianqing's obvious fear and discomfort with the situation.

Wouldn't killing any child, regardless of the circumstances, be a tragedy?

The Guoshi of Wuyong kneels before both children, his eyes shut in meditative prayer for several long, painful minutes.

And when he opens them again, even if Xie Lian can't see his expression beneath the mask...

There's no remorse in those eyes.

No sympathy.

No sadness.

"...The Heavens have been generous to you, your highness," Bai Wuxiang murmurs, staring down at both children. "You will not be forced to lose a son today. And, in doing so, you have been given an opportunity to protect Wuyong for future generations."

Jun Liang nearly collapses with relief, clutching a hand against his chest, exhaling a ragged breath as he looks upon his children.

"I...We have?"

"Yes," Bai Wuxiang muses, pointing to the child the King was holding before. "This is your eldest son. Have you chosen a name?"

The King of Wuyong's reply knocks the wind out of Xie Lian's chest—hoping against all reason that it must be some sort of coincidence. That there's some sort of explanation that won't shatter everything he's ever known, but—

"...Jun Wu."

But...this is too far back to be the Jun Wu he knows. He won't even be born for another five hundred years...

Right?

"If you and your family do exactly as I say, he will be the greatest among your lineage," Bai Wuxiang muses, watching the children.

"He will lead Wuyong to greatness, and the people will call him the 'Saint Born Under a Cursed Star.' But, if you fail...He will be the last of your bloodline, and Wuyong will be destroyed."

The King listens closely, growing paler by the moment.

"What...what must we do?"

"Your eldest son must be given the best in this life," Bai Wuxiang explains calmly, watching the infant on the right—

'Jun Wu.'

—wide, gray eyes staring up at him innocently, a shock of dark hair framing his face.

"He must never know pain or suffering."

Even raising a voice to the child would be too much. Only raising him with kind words and gentle encouragement—shielding him from the harshness of the world.

"And your youngest son...must never know a moment of joy." Bai Wuxiang levels the King with a stare.

"It will be difficult for you—but no matter how much temptation you might feel, he must never be shown an ounce of human kindness."

"I..." Jun Liang looks down at the child on the left, visually identical in every way. "How...how are we supposed to do that?"

Who can raise a child that way?

Who could bear it?

And how would it look if they treated a Prince of Wuyong in such fashion?

"Think of it like this, your majesty..." Bai Wuxiang lifts Jun Wu from the ground, placing him in his father's arms. " This is your son."

He tilts his chin down, staring at the child left on the ground.

"And that...don't even think of it as a human being. It's a parasite. One who will kill your child if you allow it into your heart. Understand?"

"I..." Jun Liang swallows hard, unsure.

“…Why would the Heavens ask this of us? What would be gained from it?”

“You will create one soul unburdened by any hardship or resentment,” Bai Wuxiang explains. “And the other—you will turn his soul black with hatred. Then, when he comes of age…”

He looks down at the altar below.

“You’ll cast him down from here, giving Mount Tonglu enough resentment to carry on for generations. What is that, if not for the Heaven’s generosity?” Bai Wuxiang points out quietly. “You need not even raise him as a prince.”

“…We don’t?”

“No,” the Guoshi reassures him, giving one disgusted wave of his hand in Mei Nianqing’s direction, gesturing for him to pick the second child up. “One of your concubines had a stillbirth recently, isn’t that correct?”

“…Yes,” Jun Liang agrees slowly. “But…how does that help?”

That would still make him a prince of Wuyong…and if he was placed with a concubine, she would be certain to treat him with some amount of affection, after having lost a child herself…

“We’ll frame her for an affair and send her away. You kept her bastard out of mercy.”

“…And what will we call the boy?” The king mutters, and Xie Lian—

He can already see the King of Wuyong averting his eyes from the child.

Trying to think of an animal—not his son.

“The name she had already selected if her child had lived, of course—Deng Shihong.”

Xie Lian watches then, as the two children are carried from the mountain—

One to the Royal nursery, surrounded by toys, servants, and family—doted upon by his mother.

And the other…

To Bai Wuxiang’s offices, high in the palace’s aviary.

Alone.

Ignored.

“…But how…” Xie Lian stumbles forward, and with every step he takes, he tumbles through memories.

Flashing forward in months, years.

Watching as a baby is never held. Barely fed.

Learns words by parroting voices—

But no one speaks to him.

Only the birds.

“…They have the same face,” Xie Lian whispers to himself, still protectively clutching the ring around his neck. “How could they have—?”

By the time Deng Shihong is old enough to walk, the answer becomes horrifically, nauseatingly clear.

“NO!” Deng Shihong screams, writing as the guards hold his arms behind his back—so small, unable to do more than cry as the mask is forced over his face, locked into place.

Terrified.

Unable to understand.

“NO!”

CRACK!

“QUIET, MUTT!”

He’s never called by his name.

Only ever insults.

Worm. Toad. Mutt.

And certain things…

“Guoshi!“ The little boy sobs, stumbling, tearing at the mask on his face. “GUOSHI!”

…Don’t make sense.

Xie Lian watches as Deng Shihong stumbles into Bai Wuxiang’s office, crying.

And the same imperial preceptor who implored the king not to show the child any human kindness…

Accepts him with open arms.

“I-I don’t wanna wear it!” The child sobs, clinging to Bai Wuxiang’s leg as the Guoshi strokes his back, shushing him. “W-why can’t I take it o-off?!”

“…Oh little one,” Bai Wuxiang sighs, patting the boy’s hair. “I know, I know you don’t…but you want to go outside, don’t you?”

“…Y…Yes…” Deng Shihong sniffles, shoulders shaking—

And even if Xie Lian can’t see the child’s tears beneath the mask, his heart aches for him.

“Then I’m afraid that this is the way it has to be,” Bai Wuxiang explains, stroking his fingers over the boy’s cheek, covered by a white ceramic mask.

Its own surface molded to look like a child in tears.

“But you can take it off when it’s just the two of us, I promise.”

It’s never Bai Wuxiang to raise a hand to him.

It’s the palace guards who do that.

Ordered to find and harass the child if he’s caught playing.

Beaten, if he’s caught laughing.

Forced to clean fireplaces and scrub floors—always covered in dirt and soot.

But the years go on—and as both Princes of Wuyong grow older…

Things begin to shift, somewhat.

Jun Wu is a beautiful child—bright and eager, following Mei Nianqing at his elbow like a little duckling.

Everything the older boy does, he wants to learn. Everywhere Mei Nianqing went, he had to follow—watching him with adoring fascination.

But there is one thing that the child cannot learn.

How to be denied.

“WHERE IS MEI NIANQING?!”

Shrieking fills the palace hallways.

“BRING HIM TO ME!”

CRASH!

An antique vase, priceless, shatters against a wall as the boy glares at the attendants around him.

“Your highness, he’s visiting his family in the east. He won’t be back until next week—“

“BRING HIM BACK! I WANT TO SEE HIM NOW!”

“Your highness, we can’t—!”

One of the attendants, a young woman, stumbles backwards when Jun Wu slaps her arm—hard—in his frustration.

“BRING HIM BACK!”

It’s not exactly abnormal for a six year old boy to throw a tantrum, but…

No one is allowed to correct him.

The boy isn’t naturally prone to cruelty, no—he’s just—

A normal child, from Xie Lian’s observation. One prone to boredom, selfishness, and fits of temper.

But normal children need boundaries. Guidance.

An understanding of consequences.

Without that, they…escalate.

“God DAMNIT!” King Jun Liang sweeps his hand across the table, sending goblets of wine spilling and shattering across the floor.

His wife doesn’t even react, staring at the wall hollowly—stroking a puppy sleeping in her lap in a slow, methodical manner.

“You promised if we did as you said, I would have an heir that would surpass ANY of our line, and he—he’s just a little BASTARD! He doesn’t LISTEN, he DESTROYS a room every time he has a fit—he’s nearly harassing your student to death—this is A MESS!”

Bai Wuxiang listens calmly.

“He needs to understand that there are consequences to his actions, your grace.”

“But…how can we do that if we can’t PUNISH him?! We can’t even SCOLD him under your instructions—!”

“Oh, but there’s a way to make him learn,” Bai Wuxiang disagrees.

“And to kill two birds with one stone.”

And…just like that, one of the murals Mei Nianqing painted for Xie Lian comes to fruition.

He watches with pained sympathy as Deng Shihong is told, for the first time in his life, that he’s going to have a playmate.

Watches with slow building horror as the boy lights up with happiness, for once not complaining or crying when the mask is strapped to his face, carried downstairs, and, for the first time…

He meets his brother.

Jun Wu, unaware, is just as happy to have a friend his own age.

They run together—play games, and…

At first, Deng Shihong’s fear of the guards, not wanting to be in trouble, is enough to moderate Jun Wu’s behavior, the other twin willing to go along.

But not forever.

Xie Lian watches as Deng Shihong shrinks away from his brother, cringing in the corner as Jun Wu shrieks.

“This stupid thing doesn’t WORK!” He snarls, lifting a mechanical toy, gifted by a senior minister, hurling it against the wall until it shatters.

“I DON’T WANT IT!”

“Jun Wu…” Bai Wuxiang looks up from his book, mournful. “If you break things, there are consequences.”

“…What?” The boy drawls, glaring at him. “What’s a smelly old man like YOU going to do?! I’m the PRINCE!”

“You are,” the Guoshi agrees. “But when you misbehave—someone always pays for it. Prince or not.”

The boy glares, not understanding—

Until one of the guards marches to the corner, dragging his new friend by the arm.

“…What are you doing?”

“I just told you, your highness.”

“W…wait…” Deng Shihong whimpers, dragging his feet. “I didn’t… Guoshi, I didn’t…”

“I know,” Bai Wuxiang agrees, waiting as the guards force him onto his hands and knees.

Xie Lian’s parents never struck him—only ever using their words to scold him when he was wrong.

Over the centuries, he’s encountered parents who would give their children a light slap on the wrist to teach them a lesson, or force them into time out—any number of options.

But when Xie Lian watches one of the guards pull out a whip—

“…Wait, I don’t—!”

CRACK!

…It’s beyond most of what Xie Lian has witnessed, even in eight centuries on this earth.

For large or small infractions—if Jun Wu misbehaves, Deng Shihong is whipped.

The number of lashes increasing, depending on severity.

And…

For a child who was never supposed to know a moment’s unhappiness, Xie Lian watches the shock and fear in Jun Wu’s eyes, each time it happens.

Watches as it rather effectively moderates the child's behavior, but…

The friendship that's created is painfully one sided—even if Jun Wu seems to be unaware of it.

Deng Shihong watching the other child with constant fear, terrified that the boy might do something that results in him being whipped at any moment.

And Jun Wu…

"Why do you always have to wear that mask?" He muses, leaping from one stone to the next in the palace gardens, kicking aside anthills in his path.

Deng Shihong stares at the dirt, watching the little creatures mill about in panic and confusion, their homes destroyed.

"…Guoshi says I can't go outside if I don't wear it," he mumbles, attempting to toe some of the Mound back into place, not looking up.

"…" Jun Wu giggles, stumbling as he leaps to the next rock. "What, are you really ugly or something?"

Deng Shihong presses a hand to his mask, confused by the very notion.

He's never seen his own reflection—so he doesn't know.

"Ugly…" he repeats slowly, thinking.

"Mmm…must be," Jun Wu turns to look at him, examining the mask closely. "But…it's kind of cool. Like guoshi's!"

Then, it occurs to him—and he lights up.

"I want one, too!"

Xie Lian's stomach sinks, watching as the instrument of Deng Shihong's torture for so many years is regarded as an interesting toy by his brother.

Completely un-self aware.

Watches, as a mirroring mask is made—this one molded into a laugh, Jun Wu parading around with him, the twins side by side.

Half…

Half laughing, half crying.

And Xie Lian watches something forming in Deng Shihong’s eyes.

Resentment.

Resentment, watching Jun Wu, who can show his face to the world, treat the mask that has been Deng Shihong’s cage like a fun toy.

Resentment, as Jun Wu snaps and lashes out as his teachers, apologizing when Deng Shihong is bleeding on the floor afterwards, saying—

‘But…at least I didn’t mess up last week, right?’

Resentment, as they turn twelve—and now, Jun Wu is old enough to hold the whip himself.

Ordered to lash Deng Shihong himself when he misbehaves.

There’s love, too.

Jun Wu is his only friend. His only companion.

But the hatred is just so much.

Xie Lian watches as it consumes the boy, bit by bit.

With each strike of the whip.

With every night he goes hungry, sleeping on the cold, hard floor of the palace aviary.

Birds screaming in his ears until he never stops hearing them.

With every offhanded remark that he’s probably hideous , that his mother was a traitor—

That he’s lucky to be alive, and everything that’s happening to him—

He deserves.

For years and years, he’s never told anything different.

Until the day the world showed him beauty.

Deng Shihong doesn't look up, his arms straining as he works to scrub an old stain from the grout between marble blocks on the floor.

His own blood, dried from the beating the day before.

If he doesn't finish before Jun Wu's lessons end, he'll be beaten again.

The Royal Architect passes by him, not saying a word—arms folded behind his back.

He never looks at Deng Shihong when he's here, but unlike the other ministers, he doesn't kick him as he passes by.

In Deng Shihong's experience, that makes him kind.

Thud!

"Oh!"

Finally, the young man looks up—

Only to see a teenage girl on the floor beside him, having slipped on the wet marble he was cleaning—rubbing her hip, which is surely going to bruise.

With long, raven hair, braided down her back—and simple, well made robes.

Not a noble—but not a servant.

And either way, Deng Shihong is more than aware that her falling over is something he could be whipped for—within an inch of his life.

"…I'm sorry!" He croaks, scrambling to her side, offering a hand to help her up.

Expecting to be shoved aside.

But, to his shock…

There's a hand on his own.

Soft, delicate, and warm.

The first time anyone ever touched Deng Shihong without lashing out, sneering, or laughing.

(Everyone aside from Bai Wuxiang, that is.)

And when he looks up…

Amethyst eyes stare back at him.

"…It's okay," she smiles, stealing his breath with a simple look, glancing around them. "I'm the one who wasn't watching what I was doing. Father is always fussing at me over that, I have a 'head full of butterflies,' or something…" she snorts, shaking her head.

Jun Wu would roll his eyes and say she wasn't very lady-like.

He'd see her sun kissed skin and work roughened hands and say she looked like a filthy peasant.

Deng Shihong doesn't care.

"…I like butterflies," he answers quickly—stiff with awkwardness. "They're—pretty."

He's wooden in his interactions—completely unaccustomed to speaking to…

Anyone who isn't the Crown Prince.

The young girl stares back at him, a quizzical smile in place, but…

She does something Deng Shihong has never experienced before.

"…Me too!" She laughs happily.

She's…kind.

"Is that a costume?" He's confused—until she nods towards the mask on his face.

Not jeering or vindictive—only curious.

"…No…"

"…Then what's it for?"

For some reason, Deng Shihong almost doesn't want to tell her, but…

"I'm…ugly."

It's the only reason he's ever been given—so, he wouldn't know any different.

She tilts her head to the side—reaching out to press her fingertips to the cheek of his mask.

“…I’m sure that’s not true,” she murmurs, and Deng Shihong—

He can barely breathe.

“Can I see?”

He could be beaten if they’re caught.

Or worse, they might never let her come back.

Still, he can’t bring himself to tell her no.

She’s careful, delicately lifting the ceramic shell from his face—and when she does, she pauses.

Confused.

Because the young boy before her eyes…

There’s nothing wrong with his face at all.

“…Well, I don’t know who’s been telling you that you’re ugly,” she muses, handing him the mask back. “But they’re lying.”

Deng Shihong looks down at the mask, then back up at her—doubtful.

“…” And something about that loneliness in his eyes, that utter sense of worthlessness—

The girl can’t seem to stand it—leaning forward to place a kiss against his cheek.

“I mean it—you’re handsome.”

The boy sits there, frozen, eyes wide.

“…And I would know,” she clears her throat, suddenly sheepish—not sure why she felt so forward all of the sudden. “Because I’m picky. I’ve never called a boy that before. So! It’s…it’s a big compliment, coming from me…”

Her cheeks are flushed and—

Now his are, too.

“Hudie!” Her father barks from the other room, irritated. “Are you wandering again?! I need the schematics!”

“…Right!” She scrambles around, picking the scrolls up from where she dropped them, tucking her hair behind her ears. “Coming!”

She straightens up, scrolls clutched in her arms—sparing Deng Shihong one last smile, glancing down at his mask.

“Sorry for messing up the floor—and…you really don’t need that.”

She hurries off before her father can shout for her again, and Deng Shihong…

He stares down at the mask in his hands—and he wonders.

Enough to sneak into Bai Wuxiang’s quarters when he’s out.

To slip in front of a mirror, and, with trembling fingers, to slip the mask from his face.

Only to see Jun Wu staring back at him.

At first, he twists around—expecting to see the prince standing behind him.

But…no one’s there.

Slowly, he turns back—watching the reflection do the same thing.

Reaches up to touch his cheek—watching Jun Wu’s face do the same.

And slowly…his expression darkens.

Xie Lian watches as he tells the one person he can—

The person who shares his face.

His only friend in the world.

And feels only dismay, watching the prince’s reaction.

The way his face lights up with excitement.

“…This means your mother wasn’t a traitor after all!”

As though that could bring any joy.

The concubine that supposedly gave birth to him is long gone now, banished from Wuyong when he was a baby.

“Don’t you understand?! This means we’re brothers!”

Jun Wu’s hands land on his shoulders—and he beams.

The same hands that have whipped him countless times.

And even if it was never Jun Wu’s choice—Deng Shihong cannot forget the sting.

“Do you think it would change anything, if they knew?” He asks flatly, and Jun Wu hesitates.

“…I don’t know,” He admits. “But I have an idea!”

Xie Lian hides his face in his hands in the corner, watching as…

Jun Wu sees a wonderful way to make his life easier.

“You can sit in on the lessons I don’t like…my mediation sessions…it’s better than the work you usually have to do, right?”

“…What?”

“You wouldn’t understand,” Jun Wu shrugs, “but when you’re the crown prince…there’s so much you’re not allowed to do! You could stand in for me, while I go do, well…whatever I want! Doesn’t that sound better than what we’ve been doing?”

Deng Shihong stares at him blankly.

“…Does that mean you’ll pretend to be me?”

“What?” Jun Wu shakes his head with a snort. “No—why would I want to do that?” He turns around, glancing at the window. “I’ll just wear a different disguise…hang out in the city, explore the woods, nap—that sort of thing.”

“If we get caught…they’ll—"

“Whip you,” Jun Wu shrugs. “But you’ve been whipped like…what, a thousand times? You don't even seem to notice it anymore. What's maybe getting whipped one more time…to be a prince for a day?"

His brother stares at the mirror, silent.

It takes practice.

The two of them sit in front of a mirror in Jun Wu's room each time they're alone, practicing reflecting facial expressions until they're seamless.

Deng Shihong practices the way the prince speaks, repeating him like one of the song birds in the aviary.

Xie Lian watches as Deng Shihong creates his first true mask with careful precision.

As Jun Wu sneaks him extra portions of food—something he never bothered to think of before, even though his brother was always underfed.

But soon, they have the same build.

And the first time they attempt to switch…

Mei Nianqing finds himself watching with shock as the crown prince sits for his history lesson, his expression perfectly attentive, carefully copying down every single word.

"Your highness…you've done excellent work today."

Deng Shihong glances up, forcing down his own dislike.

Jun Wu absolutely adores his teacher—to the point of near obsession.

And as they grow older, Deng Shihong has begun to suspect it's a very different kind of affection.

"…" He smiles, leaning his chin on his hand, eyes sparkling with adoration as he stares up at Mei Nianqing. "Does that make you happy, Laoshi?"

Jun Wu's feelings aren't returned.

All Deng Shihong has to do to distract him is mild flirtation—and Mei Nianqing shrinks away with discomfort, clearing his throat.

"I'll always be happy to see you succeed, your highness. If you always applied yourself like this…"

The prince smiles even wider, twirling his calligraphy brush between his fingertips.

"If it makes you happy, Laoshi—I'll try my hardest."

Mei Nianqing turns away—not examining his student's behavior quite so closely.

Deng Shihong learns so much .

Learns what people pay attention to, and what they don't.

What people want to see, and how to make them think that's there.

He learns that when he's Jun Wu, people listen to him when he speaks.

When he's Jun Wu, his father smiles at him.

When he's Jun Wu, no one hurts him.

And, while Xie Lian could have predicted the ending the moment the Crown Prince made his suggestion…

That doesn't make it any easier to watch.

To watch, as the Queen comes to his rooms one day while they're switched, smiling at him fondly.

"You've been doing so well with your lessons lately…" She muses, sitting beside him, brushing her fingers through her son's hair. "And everyone has spoken of how kind you've been to the servants…"

The prince leans into her touch, closing his eyes.

"…Is that such a surprise?"

"Oh…I don't know," the Queen sighs, smiling at him fondly. "You…in so many ways, I felt like I failed you as a mother…failed both of—"

She pauses—and the prince stares at her intently.

"…Failed both of who?"

"…" She looks away.

His mother is a weak woman.

Delicate of body and mind.

Obedient to a fault.

But there's a softness to her—an affection that he craves.

"…I misspoke," she whispers, shaking her head. "I just…I realized that you're growing up, Jun Wu."

Her arms wrap around him gently.

"And I'm proud of the man that you're becoming."

Deng Shihong leans his cheek against her shoulder.

Remembering many times, when he was a small child—running to her for help.

Grasping her hand, staring up at her in terror.

And the way that the Queen stared back with disgust.

Screaming for the guards to take the filthy son of a traitorous whore away from her.

It hurts more sometimes, realizing that the world isn't always cruel. People aren't universally unkind.

It's just cruel to you .

People only scorn you.

Xie Lian watches him later, in the aviary.

Sobbing.

Screaming.

Pounding his fists against the floor.

Saying those words over and over again.

It's not fair.

It’s not fair.

It’s not fair .

Remembering how many times the King came up here, holding him off of one of the ledges, watching as the little boy writhed and screamed, terrified of falling.

Saying that he wished he had never been born.

That he wished the boy would just die .

Deng Shihong has the same wish.

That he had never been born.

That he could just fade away.

Because he’ll never be loved as himself.

He’ll never know happiness as himself.

Only as Jun Wu.

And during those brief moments that they’re switched…

He just wishes he could be him.

Not pretend, but really.

And one day, he finally gets his chance.

When they’re sixteen years old—and Jun Wu lounges on the couch beside him, tossing a priceless glass figure over his head, catching it in his palm.

“I’ve been thinking—this time, when I sneak out…what if you came with me?”

Deng Shihong glances up at him, the mask weighing heavier on his face than it ever has—nearly suffocating.

“…What?”

“It’s our birthday,” The prince explains. “And everyone here is so boring…before they drag me off to that banquet—let’s do something together.”

Deng Shihong stares at him, but eventually…

He nods.

Between the two of them, it’s not like he has the power to tell Jun Wu no, anyway.

The prince has turned sneaking out of the palace into somewhat of an art form, both boys slipping out without being noticed.

And when Xie Lian sees where they’re actually going…

A sense of dread begins to fill him.

“…This is where you’ve been going all this time?” Deng Shihong asks incredulously, climbing the mountain slope beside his brother. “Isn’t it dangerous?”

“…Dangerous?” Jun Wu snickers.

“You’ve heard everyone say it already—the volcano is already extinct! Besides, I found something so cool—you’ve GOT to see!”

Deng Shihong frowns, but…he follows him.

Even when they pass a black stone altar, gleaming menacingly in the sunlight.

“…What’s that?”

“Huh?” Jun Wu glances over at it as they pass The temple, his gaze distant. “That? It doesn’t matter. That’s not what I wanted to show you.”

Deng Shihong sighs, looking away.

“If we’re gone too long, people will come looking.”

“We won’t be! Where’s your curiosity?!”

He has none—and doesn’t even particularly care about why they’re here.

He’d rather be going to the banquet that Jun Wu is scorning as ‘boring.’

But eventually…they reach an outcropping near the mountain's peak

—after climbing for what feels like hours.

“Here, through here!” Jun Wu calls over his shoulder, leading his brother into the opening of a cavern.

A massive, endless space—made from white stone. And, despite having no light source…

It shines just as brightly inside as the sunlight does in the valley below.

“…” Deng Shihong follows behind him—hesitant, but curious, rubbing his arms as he glances at the walls around them.

“What is this place?”

“…I don’t know,” Jun Wu admits, “but it feels… powerful , doesn’t it? I’ve been thinking about building a temple here, later.”

“A temple?” Deng Shihong reaches out, feeling the wall beneath his fingertips. “For who?”

“Me,” his twin admits offhandedly. “Y’know—when I become a god.”

Deng Shihong turns to stare at him, eyes narrowing.

“…What?”

“Oh my…”

Both teenagers turn around quickly—each growing pale at the sight of none other than the Imperial Preceptor of Wuyong, his hands folded behind his back—

Watching them both curiously.

“Deng Shihong…when did you stop wearing your mask outside?”

Neither boy answers, and Bai Wuxiang tilts his head to the side, walking around the edges of the Kiln, his fingers trailing against the wall.

"I'm surprised you didn't come to me with questions," he murmurs, sounding almost...disappointed. "You know you could ask me anything."

The boy on the left bites his lip, looking away—and underneath his mask, the Guoshi smiles.

Knowing exactly which one is which.

"But weren't you curious?" He murmurs, footsteps echoing against the cavernous walls around them. "About why your lives have gone so differently?"

The Guoshi looks from Deng Shihong—to Jun Wu.

Who, for once, can't seem to look up.

"Why don't you ask him?" Bai Wuxiang encourages Deng Shihong, staring his brother down. "He already seems to know."

Deng Shihong looks at Jun Wu, who...

Squirms.

"I...I don't..."

"'When I become a god,'" Bai Wuxiang quotes him coldly. "Wasn't that what you said before? If you know that, surely you must know the rest."

Jun Wu's hands ball into fists at his sides, his shoulders hunched.

"...What is he talking about?" Deng Shihong mutters, his voice low.

Bai Wuxiang waits, giving Jun Wu the opportunity to explain—but when he remains silent, he turns back to Deng Shihong, explaining calmly—

"You two have always had identical faces. I'm sure you've surmised that Jun Wu isn't your half brother at all."

Rather, his twin.

"...Don't you want to know why you were raised the way you were?" Bai Wuxiang repeats the question, his tone growing ever so sly. "He knows."

Deng Shihong looks at Jun Wu, who remains stiff, glaring at the guoshi.

"You see what he's doing? He's pitting us against each other!"

"Why would I need to do that?" Bai Wuxiag comes to a halt, his palm pressed flat against the side of the cavern—what Xie Lian is sure, the longer he looks, must be the Kiln. "I'm on his side."

He's always been the only person on Deng Shihong's side.

"Very well—I'll tell him."

Bai Wuxiang turns away from the wall of the Kiln, facing the two boys.

"For thousands of years, the Royal Family of Wuyong sacrificed innocent souls to this mountain to prevent an eruption. Creating a stain of guilt upon the land that will never be cleansed."

It's ironic to think that, a place as beautiful as this, is as close as one can come to pure evil on earth.

"Not in your lifetime. Not in a thousand lifetimes. Not until cultivation expands into regions that we cannot even begin to comprehend."

Until humans discover a way to manipulate resentment more deftly than they can at his point—and with the path that cultivation has taken in this world...

He doubts that will be soon enough to help anyone in Wuyong.

"Eventually, this took a toll on the royal family."

Xie Lian watches Bai Wuxiang tell the same story he did to Mei Nianqing, sixteen years before.

"Cursing them—and the mountain would take every child born to their bloodline...except for the firstborn."

His eyes settle on them. "But the two of you were both born alive."

Leaving the King of Wuyong with a horrible choice.

Choosing a son to sacrifice—or waiting for Tonglu to awaken once more.

"But the gods gave your father an opportunity..."

And now—

Bai Wuxiang's story changes.

"One I advised against. I found it far too cruel."

Xie Lian turns away from the boys, staring at this past version of Bai Wuxiang with horror and disgust, because—

Why is he doing this?

What does he have to gain?

"That your brother should be raised as a prince, never allowed to suffer...and you would live in utter misery."

And the words...

They ring so true, that Deng Shihong is already taking a step back, clutching his chest, heart raging against his ribs.

"All so they could bring you back here, and throw you from the cliffs of Mount Tonglu on your eighteenth birthday."

Two years from now.

Bai Wuxiang's eyes slide to the side, the only visible part of his face from underneath the mask.

"And he knows all about it."

Deng Shihong whips around to look at his brother, who stammers, staggering backwards.

"I-I didn't! I..."

But Jun Wu isn't like Deng Shihong.

He was never forced to learn to lie in order to survive—and he isn't particularly good at it.

He knew.

"You sounded so certain that you would become a god someday," Bai Wuxiang points out. "That was one of the promises the gods made your father the day you were born."

Deng Shihong's eyes bare down on the Crown Prince of Wuyong like a painful weight as he takes a step back from the two of them, shaking his head.

"You...! My father told me a year ago, but so what?! It wasn't my choice, what could I do about it?!"

Deng Shihong takes a step away from him, staring at him with growing...

Rage.

"You knew."

He says the words quietly—emotionlessly. But that's deceptive.

Anger is rising in his chest like a tide, threatening to crack any self restraint he had left.

"...I told my father I disagreed with the idea! What else could I do?" Jun Wu mutters, glaring at Bai Wuxiang. "I let you trade places with me plenty of times, didn't I? I've—I've been trying to make things easier for you!"

"Don't pretend you've done everything you could."

Bai Wuxiang begins walking again, slowly circling the teenagers, arms clasped behind his back once more.

"You can sneak your brother all the way to the peak of Mount Tonglu—but you couldn't help him run away from the palace, and escape his fate?"

"I..." Jun Wu swallows hard. "I never thought about it..."

"No," Bai Wuxiang agrees. "You were too busy planning where to build your temples once your brother is dead." He looks at Deng Shihong, shaking his head. "Do you really think he's ever thought of anyone but himself?"

...No.

No, he doesn't.

"Do you think he deserves anything that he has?"

That seems to snap Jun Wu out of his shock, glaring at the Guoshi as he steps forward, pointing a finger at him commandingly.

"That is ENOUGH! You forget your place, guoshi! My brother and I will discuss this privately." Jun Wu reaches over, snatching Deng

Shihong's hand in his own, "I order you to take us back down the mountain, now!"

Even now, in spite of everything that Bai Wuxiang just revealed--the Prince of Wuyong expects to be obeyed.

Bai Wuxiang does not respond.

Instead, his eyes remain on Deng Shihong.

"I have one question for you, child." He takes a step forward, ignoring Jun Wu's finger extended in warning.

"Do you want to survive?"

The teenager doesn't respond, staring back at him with eyes torn between fear and anger.

"...Do you want to know what it's like to live at all?"

And that's when it occurs to the boy—

That he genuinely has no idea what it feels like to feel alive.

To be on something more than borrowed time, wearing a pleasant mask until his brother returns to pry it away.

"I can help you," the guoshi offers, "but only if you allow me."

"...What are you rambling about?" Jun Wu hisses. "Filling his head with strange ideas. Unless you plan on helping him escape, or changing my father's mind–there's nothing else to be done!"

"Yes."

Deng Shihong’s voice is hoarse at first—but then, he’s able to speak a little more clearer, pulling his hand out of Jun Wu’s grip.

“Yes—I want your help.”

He wants to survive.

He wants to know what it’s like to live .

“…Then you shall have it, my prince.”

There’s a subtle shift in the air—one neither of the boys seem to feel, but Xie Lian does.

Magic.

Ancient, powerful magic.

There’s a brief flash of light, and when both boys look down…

Their robes are the same.

When Deng Shihong pushes up his sleeves…

His scars are gone.

Just as the lights fade, other voices echo against the walls of the Kiln.

“I SAW THEM COMING THIS WAY, YOUR MAJESTY!”

Jun Wu’s face immediately goes slack with relief.

“The guards!”

Whatever Bai Wuxiang was planning, he didn’t move quickly enough!

“WE’RE HERE! WE’RE—!”

The guards storm into the cavern, and when Jun Wu sees their confusion, his smile fades.

“…Guoshi?” King Jun Liang frowns, taking in the scene as he follows his guards into the cave. “What on earth is going on here?”

Bai Wuxiang turns to his King, somber.

“It would seem that Deng Shihong learned of his origins, and brought his brother here to kill him in order to take his place.”

Jun Wu’s jaw drops, turning to defend his brother, to say that he did no such thing, but…

Deng Shihong glares at him, backing away.

“You would do that to me?! After I wasted my time being NICE to you?!”

“I…” Jun Wu swallows hard, glancing at their father, then back at his brother. “I don’t…understand…”

Unfortunately for him—he's never needed to play a role, or project his own power.

It simply was.

But Deng Shihong has spent countless days perfecting his mask. Learning to be something he wasn't.

And now—how he performs.

He runs to Bai Wuxiang's side, holding the Guoshi's sleeve as his brother might have.

"TAKE HIM!"

"But…" The boy looks around, lips trembling. "But I'm not…HE'S NOT THE PRINCE!" He struggles as the guards seize him, "HE'S NOT! I'M J—!"

And now, as Xie Lian watches the former crown prince cough and struggle to breathe, Bai Wuxiang's tricks become clear.

The child can no longer say his own name.

The boy who was once known as Deng Shihong accepts his father's embrace as his brother is dragged away in chains.

He doesn't look back once.

And the greatest irony of all is.

The new Crown Prince of Wuyong plays his role so well that the people begin to adore him.

Before, he might have been viewed as spoiled or intolerable.

Now, he's empathetic. Charitable. The kind of man who stands up for the weak.

In so many ways—he reminds Xie Lian of his younger self.

But then—there are moments.

Flashes of something "Jun Wu" was taught before he knew his own name, before he could speak or take his first steps.

Cruelty.

Because it feels good , to hurt people who deserve it.

When he ‘accidentally’ tramples the guard who beat him the most with his horse—

It feels good.

One day, when he’s preparing for a banquet with the other nobles—his brother, masked, relegated to the corner, makes a dry comment—

“It looks like I never taught you how to lace my boots properly.”

“…”

The Crown prince straightens, turning to regard his brother coldly.

“You’re right,” he muses, his eyes narrowed. “You see, up until I was sixteen, I used to have my servants lace them for me. I usually stepped on their fingers while they did it. I never paid much attention to the things that were beneath me.”

He taps his foot.

“But now, I’ve outgrown such things.” He lifts a glass paperweight from his desk, examining it. “You see—I’m kinder than I used to be. I pay attention.” He glances up at his brother, the light refractions from the glass making his eyes burn dangerously.

“But I suppose I’m still not perfect.”

With a flick of his wrist, he hurls the paperweight against the wall, shattering it.

Like his brother did to countless toys when they were children.

“Oh my…” he sighs, looking at the mess. “I lost my temper.”

Slowly, he looks at his brother over his shoulder, eyes glinting with vindictive satisfaction.

“There are consequences for that, aren’t there?”

Without a word, one of the guards offers him a whip.

In the months since he took his brother’s place, the prince hasn’t lashed out at him.

Hasn't misbehaved, or had him whipped once.

"No matter how much this hurts," he muses, watching as the guards force his brother to his knees,

"Remember, it's my punishment—not yours."

That was something the old Jun Wu used to say to him.

'This hurts me more than it could ever hurt you.'

And when the boy screams louder than he ever has during previous beatings—the guards assume it's because it's been so long since he was whipped.

Not that it's the first time

When it's finished, the prince hands the whip off to the guards once again, glancing down at his brother coldly.

"You know—I think I've grown too old for this sort of thing," he muses, watching as his reflection trembles and bleeds on the floor.

"I think it's time Deng Shihong was returned to his rooms. Permanently."

He watches his brother struggle weakly as the guards begin to carry him from the room.

"You can't do this! YOU CAN'T LET THEM DO THIS TO ME!"

"But what can I do?" The prince asks with wide eyes. "I've already told our father I hate the arrangement. I don't let the guards beat you anymore. Don't you remember how it used to be? You're far better off than you were before."

And Xie Lian can't say that the prince is wrong.

Since the two switched, conditions have been far better for his brother than they were when the show was on the other foot.

And neither of them chose to be placed in this position.

He honestly can't say that either one is to blame.

And yet.

The original Jun Wu was thoughtless, selfish, and childish.

But never cruel.

The new prince is thoughtful, generous, and controlled.

When he hurts someone, it’s intentional.

And it always rings with a sense of righteous justice—

Because he was hurt first.

He locks his darkest secret in the aviary, left with only darkness and birdsong for company.

And from there—

His new life begins.

Xie Lian watches as he rises higher and higher.

Beautiful, brilliant—and so self righteous.

Watches, as he meets the girl with Amethyst eyes and a kind smile again.

This time, in a garden—surrounded by the butterflies she always adored.

Watches, as Mei Nianqing is forced to watch the girl he loves slip away.

Believing that Jun Wu cannot be denied what he wants.

But Xie Lian sees something that Mei Nianqing didn’t see. That Tonglu Hudie didn’t see.

That those who would view her memories later did not see.

The child who was given the name Deng Shihong at birth, who later took his brother's name and title as a means of survival…

He distrusted the world. Human nature. Possessed a gravely cynical view of what mortals were capable of, under the right conditions.

But his love for Tonglu Hudie was genuine.

To the point of adoration.

Or, like his brother with his own Guoshi before him—

Obsession.

The girl who showed him kindness when he was nothing.

The girl who dared look beneath his mask, and tell him that he wasn't a monster.

Determined to give her the life that she deserves.

The life a prince can give her.

There's just one loose end to tie up first.

On his eighteenth birthday, The Crown Prince of Wuyong comes of age in a blood soaked baptism.

Riding up the mountain on horseback, while his brother stumbles behind in chains.

Brought to the same cliff they visited on the day they were born.

Watches, as the child who was born Jun Wu is forced to his knees, his brother's foot against his back.

He no longer argues that the Prince of Wuyong can't do this.

He's painfully aware of the fact that he can.

"…No matter how high you climb," he whispers, lips dried and cracked. "No matter how many names you take, or how many masks you wear," he looks back at the prince over his shoulder. "You will always be my brother."

Mirroring eyes stare at one another.

"…Don't damn me for flipping the coin back in my favor," the prince hisses, his fingers tight in his brother's hair. "Neither of us had a choice."

Through suffering, one brother became cruel.

The former prince smiles.

"We always have a choice, didi."

Through suffering, another brother learned.

The Prince of Wuyong leans down, whispering next to his ear.

“It won’t be that bad, gege. You’ve been whipped what…like, a thousand times?”

His brother doesn’t flinch, hearing his own careless words parroted back at him.

But his eyes hold remorse, and Xie Lian realizes…

He thinks that he deserves this.

“What’s one more moment of pain, compared to that?”

Deng Shihong lifts his head.

Watching the sun rise over his kingdom, one last time.

“…You’ll have to tell me, when you follow.”

Jun Wu jerks back, his teeth grinding together—

And with a solid kick against his back—his brother falls.

Landing on the altar hundreds of feet below with an awful thud.

Blood spreading around him—eyes lifeless and unseeing.

And now, Jun Wu’s secret is perfectly kept.

That’s the trick—one as old as time.

Or, as old as the cuckoo bird.

You never know that a foreign hatchling has taken the place of a newborn.

Not if it kicks the other eggs out of the nest—allowing them to shatter on the ground below.

‘Do not fall for the cuckoo’s tricks…’

And when Xie Lian looks down—

There’s a ghost fire in his hands.

Small, burning brightly.

"…No one caught me, dianxia."

The voice is so small—so frightened and alone.

Xie Lian hugs the light close to his chest, ignoring the chill that runs through him.

A ghost fire always burns cold, after all.

"I tried," the ghost fire whispers.

Just like Xie Lian's teenage self, weeping in his mother's arms.

"I tried so hard, dianxia."

Not speaking of what the prince has already seen—but what he will see.

Still, Xie Lian hugs him close.

The original Jun Wu died here—and while Xie Lian isn't seeing his memories now—

His echoes remain.

Whispering words of sorrow and remorse through time.

"I know," Xie Lian whispers, tears streaming down his cheeks as he accepts the truth.

Watching the Prince of Wuyong grow into a man.

Marrying the girl he fell in love with, when he was so very young.

Having a son of his own—one he adored.

Being praised as the greatest prince Wuyong has ever known.

His face maturing into one Xie Lian knows so well.

The same face of the man who embraced him, when he ascended to the Heavens.

His mentor.

One of his oldest friends.

The man who comforted him, as his kingdom fell.

The man who held him as he wept for Wu Ming.

The man who gave Xie Lian cursed shackles, then asked if he thought that he deserved them.

The Heavenly Emperor.

Jun Wu.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or reuse without permission.

"No one caught me."

[image]

CREDIT: MECHAMISH

Chapter End Notes

> DISCLAIMER: This arc is not intended to redeem Jun Wu or make his actions excusable, but more to fill in gaps as to his motivations and how he became the way he is.
>
> EXPLANATION: For any who are confused -- After the name switch in this chapter, Jun Wu and Deng Shihong completely switch identities. The one who we know in the canon as "Jun Wu" was the tormented child, born Deng Shihong, and the ghost Pei Ming encounters in the chapter titled "The God Slayer" is the child who was raised as the Prince of Wuyong. They switched identities with each other at 16 and have never switched back. For any of those wondering who the Bai Wuxiang posing as their Guoshi is in this chapter, you'll have to wait and see! But all will be explained.

Thank you so much to mechamish for the beautiful artwork!

xoxo, Evie

The Further They Fall

Chapter Summary

> Xie Lian watches, clutching the ghost fire in his hands, as the Prince of Wuyong obtains everything he ever wanted.
>
> But it isn’t enough.

Not a distant relative, or tyrant who happened to bear the same name.

His Jun Wu.

Xie Lian watches, clutching the ghost fire in his hands, as the Prince of Wuyong obtains everything he ever wanted.

But it isn’t enough.

Clans from the central plains won’t stop attacking their border.

Trying to reclaim lands that were once theirs.

To avenge their slain ancestors.

Children are dying. Soldiers aren’t coming home.

Fathers are saying goodbye too soon.

And Jun Wu can feel his father’s eyes fixing on him with suspicion with each failure.

Because he isn’t supposed to fail.

They made an agreement with the gods.

He isn’t supposed to lose.

“…Darling,” his wife’s voice is thick with sleep, her hand gentle on his shoulder. “Why are you sleeping on the ground again? Come back to bed.”

Jun Wu is silent, eyes dark and contemplative.

But still, he turns his head to kiss the inside of her wrist.

Adoring.

"…I can't sleep," he admits, turning his head to press it against her leg, tired. "I can't stop thinking about tomorrow."

Both of his wife's hands press against his cheeks.

"Could we not make peace with them?"

He stares up at Hudie, eyes bleary with confusion.

"…Peace?"

The Crown Princess of Wuyong kisses his forehead.

"The land was theirs. Wouldn't it be better to negotiate with them?"

He grimaces, seeing her rationality as softness.

Her pragmatism as shortsighted.

"They would see that as weakness."

His wife sighs.

(His father would see it as a failure.)

"Come with me."

He's gently pulled to his feet.

Into their son's nursery.

His dresser scattered with small toys that Hudie made—with all of the wealth in the world, still insisting on building their son's crib and toys for herself.

Zhang Wei is sleeping peacefully, delicate lids shut over eyes just like his mother's, cheek resting against a stuffed rabbit as he breathes in and out.

"What's the point," Hudie asks him softly, "in fighting wars of pride—if we don't leave behind a world that keeps him safe?"

She takes her husband's hand, guiding it down to cup the back of their son's head—feeling how soft his hair is.

How small, defenseless, and beautiful he is.

"…How can the world keep him safe if we don't keep our enemies at bay?" He murmurs, eyes filled with fear.

Jun Wu loves his family.

Adores his wife.

Wants nothing more than to leave a legacy for his son—a kingdom that he can rule with pride.

"…I believe we get out of the world what we put into it," Hudie murmurs, looking up at her husband. Pushing his hair behind his ear.

If you're brave enough to show the world kindness—then you help make it a kinder place.

"And all we can do…is prepare our children to face it."

But Jun Wu doesn't see the same world that she does.

He sees a world that doesn't care for what's just or fair.

He sees a world that will decide your fate before you're even born—and doom you to a life of misery.

To fail, before you're even given a chance.

Jun Wu can't fail.

And he won't give his son the chance to experience that, either.

In his desperation, he looks to the one person who has always had the answer.

The one who, even in his earliest days, always gave him a sympathetic ear.

His first Guoshi.

And, despite having retired many years ago to make way for his student…

Bai Wuxiang answers.

Meeting Jun Wu on the same cliffs where they ended the struggle between two brothers, when he was just a teenager.

When the world was a different place.

When he was becoming something.

Before he became afraid that someday he too, would fall.

"…Do you think it was a mistake?"

He sits on the edge of the cliffs, watching the same spot where his brother died.

"…Do you think all of this is happening because I took his place?"

There are worse things than border skirmishes—but…to the Kingdom of Wuyong, it may as well be a disaster.

They've known nothing but prosperity for centuries, shielded from strife by the bloodshed sacrificed on their behalf.

When you aren't allowed to fail—any failure, big or small, can seem like a calamity.

"You told my father his heir would be the Saint Born Under a Cursed Star."

The greatest prince Wuyong had ever seen.

How can he be that, if he can't even defend against clans from the central plains?

"…And who says you cannot be?" Bai Wuxiang muses, standing behind him.

"You told me yourself," Jun Wu mutters, scowling. "The gods wanted him."

The oldest brother.

The one who was chosen.

No one—

No one would ever choose him .

"…That's not your fault, child," a hand rests on Jun Wu's shoulder. "That was a matter of fate."

"…But if my fate was to die here…have I doomed them all by defying it?"

Doomed his wife.

Doomed their son.

Doomed everyone in Wuyong.

“…And what if you don’t?”

Jun Wu stiffens—not with fear exactly.

You stop fearing death the moment you crave it.

But for what the alternative would be.

“If I go now—my son…he’s not even a year old. Who—?”

“I don’t mean anything so drastic, child.” Bai Wuxiang’s hand squeezes his shoulder gently. “Would it surprise you to hear that your brother has not quite left this world?”

“…What?”

“His soul lingers on.”

In Xie Lian’s arms, the ghost fire trembles.

“He already died the way you were meant to—and you have his name.”

“…Yes,” Jun Wu agrees, “But I don’t understand what you’re suggesting.”

Bai Wuxiang kneels behind him, both hands on his shoulders.

Not pushing him off of the cliff before them—but a far more dangerous ledge.

“…What if he could have the rest of your fate, too?”

Xie Lian takes a step back from them, holding the ghost fire tighter in his arms as he watches them weave the spell.

“…He didn’t warn him…” Xie Lian whispers, knowing—

In an effort to make things right…

Jun Wu has doomed himself.

Doomed everything he aimed to save.

The punishment for meddling in fate is a harsh one.

And while Jun Wu succeeds in rebuking the border skirmishes…

Before long, Xie Lian is listening to the pained screaming of his wife.

Finding their son in his crib.

Not sick.

Not hurt.

Just gone.

He watches Jun Wu holding his wife in his arms—listening as she sobs and howls.

Experiencing the most unnatural form of grief.

But not him.

Not because he didn't love his son.

But because his only way of interpreting it is to deny it.

To say that this shouldn't be happening.

He switched his fate with the fated prince of Wuyong.

His first born should have been safe.

So, it couldn't be right.

It must have been a mistake.

A trick.

An attack.

When he finds his wife in their son's empty nursery, weeks later, and he tells her that their enemies in the central plains must have cast a spell to kill their son…

He believes it.

He tells himself that he believes it.

The alternative…would be unbearable.

Xie Lian watches as the Princess of Wuyong takes to her forge…

Realizing, when she draws out her hammer, muscles in her arms coiling and tensing as she brings the hammer down—he's heard this story before.

And it doesn't have a happy ending.

Even as the prince of Wuyong is revered, beloved as a powerful martial god.

And his wife grows more and more distant, arms placed protectively around her stomach, holding the child growing inside of her.

A beautiful, gentle child.

With hair similar to his parents, but…

Clear blue eyes.

Eyes similar to Hudie's father, as the Queen of Wuyong points out—having succeeded after the passing of Jun Wu's parents.

Relatives he mourned—but in a distant way.

Jun Wu doesn't see her lingering gaze when Mei Nianqing leaves the room, but…

Xie Lian does.

All Jun Wu sees is a living child.

One he can barely bring himself to visit, descending from the Heavens on occasion to see his family, but…

Still unable to bear to see the room that was once Zhang Wei.

Toys abandoned.

The crib his wife refused to allow anyone to touch.

And within the heavens…

Xie Lian watches as he walks among the gods who cursed him with hateful eyes.

Never forgiving them.

Completely unable to.

Even as he is lauded as the most powerful among the martial gods.

Adored. Admired.

That resentment is a seed—one that grows.

"…I'm sorry?" The Heavenly Emperor, Zhao Kong, raises an eyebrow. "You'd like what?"

"An audience with the Martial God of the central plains," Jun Wu crosses his arms, glaring down at their game of Weiqi. "Why is it easier to get a meeting with you, than him?"

"Well," the emperor smiles affably. "That would be because I like you, Wuyong."

When the prince does not respond to his flattery, the Emperor sighs, looking down to make his next move.

"Why would you want to meet with him, anyway?"

To Xie Lian's surprise…

Jun Wu's predecessor does not look like the cruel, unfeeling god that would order a man to choose between his children, subjecting one to endless torture.

He looks like a kind, gentle old man.

Xie Lian could see him as someone's grandfather.

And from the lack of armor and no sign of a sword…

Xie Lian realizes the former emperor is no martial god, either.

Rather, from the scrolls and texts carefully stacked around, maps and inventions all over the place—

It would seem he was a civil god.

Or…

Xie Lian looks behind his head, noticing a crimson fan displayed on the wall—the character Huo painted across the front in gold ink.

…The former fire master?

Was that why one was never appointed in the current Heavenly Dynasty?

And...how different did the Heavens used to be?

When Xie Lian glances out the window of the Imperial Hall--the streets look completely unfamiliar, and...

More life.

Gods gathered and laughing together.

Martial gods sparring. Civil gods giving lectures.

Far more lively and communal than the Heavens that Xie Lian has come to know.

His attention is torn away from the unfamiliar Heavenly Capital when Jun Wu speaks again, slamming his own piece down with a passive aggressive click .

"Surely...he has sway among his own believers?"

Zhao Kong sighs, leaning back on his hands—and Xie Lian can't help but also notice...

How different this emperor's manner is, compared to the one he grew up with.

"You two cannot resolve mortal political disputes among yourselves, Wuyong."

"...Why not?"

Xie Lian waits for Zhao Kong to give him the warning he received, when he was just nineteen years old, but...

"Because that completely cuts the mortals out of the equation," Zhao Kong frowns, sending Jun Wu a skeptical stare.

"We're their partners, Wuyong. We aren't here to deprive them of their free will."

Jun Wu grits his teeth, glaring at the board game beneath them.

"...But what if they choose wrong?"

"Then they will learn," Zhao Kong answers gravely.

"History is a valuable teacher."

"Then why does it so often repeat itself?" Jun Wu glares.

"In my experience?" The emperor places down a final tile—winning the game. "Young men think they know best and charge forward on emotion, not looking at the wreckage that lies behind."

But, before Jun Wu can retort—the old man smiles, lifting his hands amiably.

"But that's just my experience. And it is a reflex of old men like me to resent the young—they possess what we covet most."

Time.

"...So, you won't allow me to meet with him?" Jun Wu mutters.

"It's not a matter of allowing you," Zhao Kong hums, clearing their game pieces. "He descended to the mortal realm long ago, and lives among his people. He's likely helping them in their war efforts now—which is why I doubt he will be open to making peace with you."

"That's..."

Xie Lian and Jun Wu speak in unison, echoing the same words across time.

"...allowed?"

"If the mortals pray for your assistance? Of course it is," Zhao Kong shrugs, pouring himself a cup of tea. "We aren't in the business of ignoring prayers, are we?"

Jun Wu takes a cup when it's offered, thinking.

"If your people have prayed to you for help—you're welcome to go to them. Or to visit your wife and son--I'm sure they must miss you dearly. Bolin is...three now, isn't he?" Zhao Kong smiles kindly.

"He seems like a lovely child—you must be proud. I remember when my own son was..."

He trails off, watching the distracted manner in which Jun Wu nods, sipping his tea thoughtfully—clearly a thousand miles away, thinking.

"...But you must be careful, Wuyong." He warns softly. "You are there to guide and assist the mortals. Not control them. You renounced your mortal titles when you joined this court."

Emphasizing, as he already stated, a belief in free will.

"Do you understand, Wuyong?"

A foreign concept, to a child who grew up in chains.

"Jun Wu."

"Yes," the young god answers, distracted. "I understand, your majesty."

He descends not long after that, visiting his wife and son—walking the same halls that used to be his cage.

Standing in the same aviary where he used to sob and beg, pleading with the guards not to force the mask over his face.

Begging his Guoshi for help.

But now...

Now, he finds himself sitting cross legged on the floor, listening to the bird song that he used to loathe.

Meditating.

Unable to look to the other gods for help--limited in means by which he can interfere, but...

He looks to the future, hoping that, by opening the door a crack—

He'll see how to protect his people.

But that's the thing about looking into the future.

It's like walking in the dark blindfolded, fumbling for a doorknob—and opening it just a hair.

You don't actually know what will be waiting for you on the other side —and you have no control over what you'll see.

And when Jun Wu looks ahead...

He sees a time far beyond that of Wuyong.

A world completely unrecognizable to him, then.

And he sees—

Golden flower petals, falling like snow.

A dragon that seems to swallow the sun.

And...

A blade, buried in his own chest.

And when he looks up, to see the man that killed him...

He doesn't actually see his foe's face.

Rather, he sees a flash of the image of his son.

Bolin.

"No..." He rasps, squirming under the image, only to hear the whispers echoing in his head, ringing with truth.

That his demise will come at the hands of Bolin's bloodline.

"That..." Xie Lian frowns, watching as the young god descends into fits of paranoia and confusion. "How could that be true, if all of his son's died?"

They must have, in the fall of Wuyong...

...Right?

But the story Xie Lian watches tells a very different tale.

He watches, as Jun Wu begins to crumble under the weight of pressures and fears...

Watches, as the clans in the central plains begin to gain ground.

And one day, finally—

They make an offer for peace.

With one cruel condition.

The clan leader's wife can no longer bear children—and he has no other consorts or concubines.

And, if they're to adopt an heir...

What could be better, in that case, than a demigod?

Xie Lian knows what Jun Wu's answer will be, but his heart aches.

Watching, as he tells Hudie that she must lose another child.

Knowing that it isn't true.

That the words he offers her about sending Bolin away to save his life —

They're all lies.

That he's only sending him away to protect himself.

Or, if anything, so he won't have to kill his own son to ensure his progeny won't kill him down the line.

But that's the danger of trying to change the future.

Xie Lian watches as Hudie says goodbye to her second son—clutching him to her chest, holding back wails of grief.

Wishing, more than anything, that he could spare her from the pain that she, who should have been a bystander, has been forced to endure.

Knowing how unnecessary it was.

But his sadness quickly turns to shock when he sees the clan banners approaching to take him away.

That the clan Bolin was given to, thousands of years ago—

Was the Xie family.

That the land he was taken to—

Would one day, in the not so distant future, become Xianle .

"...Was that why?" Xie Lian whispers, his throat aching now, knowing what this man will do later.

That he'll destroy Xie Lian's family.

His country.

Murder and curse the boy who gave him hope—who would grow into the man that Xie Lian fell in love with.

Who shut every single door in his face, then gloated when Xie Lian turned to him.

All for a maybe?

For a glimpse of a future that might not even happen?

And yet—in his steps to prevent it, like so many other people who try to change the future...

Jun Wu ensures that it will.

But even through all of his rage, hurt, and confusion—

He grows silent and wide eyed when he sees memories of Jun Wu's third and final child.

The last Crown Prince of the Kingdom of Wuyong.

San Lang.

Not his San Lang, no.

But there's a familiarity to the child that makes Xie Lian's heart ache.

A mischievous smile. Wild, dark hair, braided over his shoulder.

Eyes like two falling stars, glimmering with excitement as he runs through the palace of Wuyong, bringing joy back into Hudie's life—like a sunrise after a long, endless night.

And Xie Lian can't understand it.

Jun Wu spends his days haunted by failures and calamities that might come—

And loses the time he could have had with his Wife and son.

His wife who, in spite of all the grief he forced her to endure—and her own complex feelings towards Mei Nianqing—loved him still.

The son who burned so brightly, showing all of the talent and potential a father could have craved in an heir.

But Xie Lian watches as Jun Wu wastes the years he could have had—dreading the very possibility that he could lose it all.

Xie Lian never got the chance to marry, or have sons of his own.

So many opportunities long gone—most of it by this man's doing.

And when he had those opportunities—he let them slip by.

Until it was too late.

Until, in spite of every sacrifice…

Mount Tonglu awakened.

Small eruptions, at first.

Only small hiccups, compared to what was to come.

Zhao Kong descends, at the request of Jun Wu and the Guoshi of Wuyong…

And Xie Lian sees the Fire Master standing at the volcano's rim, his expression grim.

"Wuyong…" He shakes his head, stepping back. "Tell your wife to order an evacuation of the Imperial City."

Jun Wu stands a few feet below him, his jaw slack.

"…Excuse me?"

"I've suppressed it," the emperor explains. "But that will only last for a few months at most."

"…What do you mean?" Jun Wu stares at him like he's grown a third head. "It can't—we already did everything we were supposed to do! Why would this be happening to begin with?!"

Zhao Kong snaps his fan shut, staring at the martial god in confusion.

"What?"

"What you told my father about my brother and I!" Jun Wu glares, infuriated that now, the emperor pretends he doesn't even know. "My family did exactly what you said! And now…you're saying it didn't even stop the eruption from happening?!"

The emperor stares at him blankly.

"…I don't know what you're referring to, but I wasn't even aware that you had a brother, Wuyong. And I never spoke to your father—much less gave any instructions."

Jun Wu falls silent—numb, as he listens to the emperor speak.

"But I can tell you this—you can't stop a volcano from erupting," Zhao Kong warns him sternly. "You can only delay it. I've done all I can without making the eventual outcome even worse—"

"But my people will be left without a kingdom! What could be worse?!"

Zhao Kong glares. "Tonglu has already been pushed dangerously far out of balance. Take it past the point of no return—and it won't just destroy Wuyong. It will destroy everything. Your people won't even have anywhere to flee to."

"But—"

"Consider this time a gift," Zhao Kong shakes his head, walking away from him. "And use it to save as many lives as you can."

And Xie Lian—

He wishes he couldn't understand why Jun Wu was so agonized by this.

Why it enraged him so much.

Because everything he had been through—everything he had lost, everything he had done—

He was raised to believe it was for one purpose. One final goal.

And now, after seemingly having done everything he was asked—

It was all for nothing.

Xie Lian almost can’t fault him for what comes after.

Watching years of slowly building denial and self delusion manifest itself as, under extreme distress and pressure—

Something in the God’s mind begins to crack.

He really does believe the bridge is possible.

He really does believe that he can do it—all by himself—when the other gods refuse to offer their help.

Because what other option is there?

Other than admitting that, after having gone so far—after becoming this thing —

He would still lose anyway?

It’s not as though he didn’t resort to other acts of desperation.

Like falling into the old ways of sacrificing criminals to the volcano—

Only for his wife to refuse out of horror.

And then—

He tried it anyway—only to be caught in the act.

His atrocities start as small, private affairs—then grow outward, like ripples in a puddle.

It was easy to keep the secret of Deng Shihong when the only man left who knew was an accomplice.

And it was easy to hide what he had done to the other Guoshi.

Because he threw every single witness into the volcano with them—walking away, and telling himself that he hadn’t wanted to do it.

That not wanting something to happen is the same as being blameless for it.

Then comes his greatest crime.

One of negligence and ego.

Not intending for it to happen.

And yet, even if Xie Lian hadn't already been told about the murals…

Even if he didn't already know there was no more Kingdom of Wuyong…

He knew, the moment Jun Wu ushered his citizens onto the bridge—it would fall.

His own son—his last son—

Would fall.

That doesn't make Hudie's screams any easier to hear.

The same screams Xie Lian heard before, slipping underneath the avalanche that came crashing down the mountain.

Horrible, profound agony.

More than any human being could bear.

And once it's done—

There's only one way to erase the blame for what he's done.

Only one way to soothe the rage in his chest—cultivated through so many years of lies and manipulation.

Only one way to not lose the one thing he has left—

His wife.

By turning her grief, her rage—against the only people who could contradict what he's already told her.

Not realizing that he has already begun to use the oldest trick ever used against him.

Telling her that it wasn't him who failed.

It was the gods to blame.

The gods who lied.

The gods who killed their son.

Because blaming them—

Blaming them was so much easier than blaming himself.

And Xie Lian watches, the realization slowly dawning on him as Tonglu Hudie works in her forge—

He's seen every single one of those weapons before.

Wielded by his fellow gods.

Kept in Jun Wu's personal collection.

Except for one.

A small, seemingly un-intimidating dagger.

Not by choice, no.

But because it was forged from the bone ashes of the souls who fell from the bridge that day.

A material so powerful—so steeped in resentment—making a sword from it would make a weapon that could corrupt minds and souls.

But just a dagger is plenty.

The most dangerous weapon she ever forged—

And Jun Wu never lays a finger on it.

She gives it to him one day, barely casting a glance away from the flames of her forge. Barely even acknowledging the way his hand squeezes her shoulder.

Uncharacteristically gentle.

When her husband asks after it later—all she can offer is blank confusion.

A mystery that she will later amount to one of his many, many lies.

When the truth is far more simple.

The thing that took the dagger looked like her husband. Sounded like him. Smelled like him.

But over the sound of her hammer, she—

She didn't notice the lack of a heartbeat.

Xie Lian holds the ghost fire close to him, feeling it shiver with remorse.

“I tried,” it whispers, even as Xie Lian sees so much destruction, it—

“I tried.”

“…I know,” he whispers.

Deng Shihong was barely more than a ghost fire back then. And, while he couldn’t stop Jun Wu from doing what he did…

He did try .

But—even without the god slayer—

Xie Lian watches as Jun Wu and Tonglu Hudie slaughter every single god.

One by one.

Without mercy.

But, finally—there are only two left.

The Wind Master—who has survived not by being powerful, but by having powerful friends.

None of which are left alive.

And the God of the Central Plains. Ancient and enigmatic.

Hudie goes to the Wind Master, and Jun Wu…

Tracks reports of the only god left alive.

A white robed cultivator who lives among the people.

And the strangest part of it is—

After so many years of Jun Wu looking—before his fall, before the war —

He isn’t even hiding.

He finds the god sitting beside Yi Nian river.

Facing away from Jun Wu—not seeming particularly bothered when he hears the martial god approach.

"…If you hadn't spent so long hiding behind your worshipers," Jun Wu mutters, gripping his blade tightly, "Things could have been different."

The god does not look back at him.

If Jun Wu could have found him before the war escalated—maybe he—he would have—

"I never hid from you, your highness."

And when he hears the martial god speak—in such a familiar voice—

He goes very, very still.

Finally seeing the mask sitting on the ground beside him.

White—with no face.

Someone Watching Over Him

Chapter Summary

> The mask he wore only hid one thing;
>
> That he was human.
>
> With graying hair, eyes dark—unbearably cold.
>
> But nothing monstrous.
>
> “...What are you talking about? After everything you’ve put me through—you OWE me an explanation!”
>
> “Why do you think I waited for you here?” Bai Wuxiang murmurs. “I’ve been dying to tell someone. Who better than you?”

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

“You…”

Ever since the emperor confessed to having never heard of his brother—Jun Wu searched for his former Guoshi, never finding him.

Assuming he must have died in the calamity that followed.

“How did you…?”

Bai Wuxiang smiles, watching the sun set.

“You don’t have to ask me how, child. It’s not some great mystery.”

He reaches down, his fingertips dragging through the water.

“I used the greed, fear, and pride of your people against them. Against you.”

He glances back over his shoulder.

“But I never forced you, did I?”

No—he never technically forced Jun Wu’s hand—or his father’s, but he—?

"…Why?" he rasps, one hand pressed against the side of his head, struggling to process the shock.

Bai Wuxiang simply smiles.

"Because Wuyong took everything from me, first. I only returned the favor."

And when Xie Lian sees the face of the original Bai Wuxiang—

He's just a man.

As handsome as one would expect of a god—but still.

The mask he wore only hid one thing;

That he was human.

With graying hair, eyes dark—unbearably cold.

But nothing monstrous.

"...What are you talking about? After everything you've put me through—you OWE me an explanation!"

"Why do you think I waited for you here?" Bai Wuxiang murmurs. "I've been dying to tell someone. Who better than you?"

Jun Wu bites back screams of rage in the face of such calm.

"You want to know why? After everything you know, you can't guess?"

Jun Wu bites down any response, and Bai Wuxiang raises an eyebrow.

"Or have you taken up your brother's tactic of weaponizing your own ignorance?"

"How DARE you—!"

"There is nothing I don't dare to do."

Bai Wuxiang stares back at him, as though they're still teacher and student.

As though no matter how much time passes, he'll always be a child—stumbling around in the dark.

“You can’t guess why a god of the central plains would want to destroy Wuyong?” He tilts his head to the side. “What do you think your ancestors did, once they had captured all of the land they desired? Once there were no more locals left for them to sacrifice for their own wealth and prosperity?”

“You said—”

“Raids,” Bai Wuxiang answers his own question. “Your Kings would send battalions into the desert oases and central plains—wait until the able bodied men were gone and preoccupied—and take the women and children.”

He recalls such horrors calmly, like any other lesson he’s ever taught.

“And these souls had to be agonized, to satisfy the mountain’s fury. So, before they cast them down—those men did what soldiers do.”

What soldiers always do, when they are raised in a society that values certain lives above others.

“No one believed the stories about Wuyong,” Bai Wuxiang recalls. “No one thought human beings could be so vile. Everyone assumed those who were taken were being used for slave labor—or sold as concubines.”

As grim as it is, such outcomes were less horrible than the truth.

“When I came back to my city, and found that my wife and children had been taken—I was horrified. But I was also pragmatic.”

As pragmatic as any man could be, in such a situation.

“I was a swordsman with financial means. I presumed I could find them, and buy their freedom.”

The idea of holding Wuyong accountable at that time never occurred to him.

Because what could anyone do?

“But when I arrived—told them who I was, where my family was taken…”

Bai Wuxiang’s voice grows quiet.

"All they could give me was my wife's jewelry, and my son's boots."

Even now, centuries later, his voice is hoarse with emotion.

"They offered no explanations. No apologies. They thanked me for my sacrifice—and told me they never would have taken Jia Huan and the boys if they had known I was a cultivator."

The memory of that actually makes him laugh.

"To them, my line of work was the only thing that gave their lives any value. And they—" he exhales harshly. "When I asked them why they saved the jewelry and the shoes—they said it seemed like a waste."

Xie Lian covers his mouth, struggling with the nausea overtaking him.

"I was compensated fifty gold pieces for each of them—and sent on my way." He recalls faintly.

"I had three sons. They took my family, and gave me two hundred gold pieces."

A small fortune back then, maybe.

But what difference could that make?

What could that even compare to what had been taken from him?

"I was one of the lucky ones," he looks Jun Wu in the eye. "Because I had something as meager as a pair of shoes to remember my child by."

He was a cultivator. A wealthy one. A man of influence, back in his home.

And there was absolutely nothing he could do.

"Then…I walked out onto the streets of Wuyong…and they were holding a festival. The last one before winter—you know the one."

He glances out over the rivers and fields of the land he has guarded all of these years.

Peaceful, now.

Safe— now .

"And I saw so many healthy, happy children—living upon the ashes of my own. Singing, dancing, laughing."

"They couldn't have known," Jun Wu finally says, his voice strained.

"You're right," Bai Wuxiang agrees. "And I don't care."

Jun Wu balks at that. The blithe admission of being wrong—accepting it—

And expressing that hatred anyway.

"Did that ever stop you from hating your brother?"

His breath stops in his throat.

"He found out eventually. He admitted it, in the cave that day—"

"He grew into someone who knew." Bai Wuxiang corrects him. "Just like the children in that festival did. And their children. And so on, and so forth."

"They—"

"People in Wuyong knew not to go on the mountain."

Jun Wu falls silent again, unable to speak on what his ancestors knew, but—

Even generations later, it was considered a forbidden place.

"We weren't allowed—"

"By what law? You can't even name one, can you?" Bai Wuxiang presses him, and—

He can't.

"You know how far the smell of burning flesh carries on the wind by now, surely."

Jun Wu grinds his teeth, his fist flying out, a solid blow landing on his face.

Bai Wuxiang takes it without complaint.

Bai Wuxiang looks him in the eye—filled with rage, sorrow, and agony.

“…There are no innocents in a society that has been built upon murder.”

Agony that Xie Lian used to feel.

Xie Lian, who genuinely did loathe the people of Yong’an, for a time.

“If you accept a reward in exchange for your silence in the face of evil—you aren’t a bystander.” Bai Wuxiang hisses. “You’re an accomplice.”

Wuyong was a Kingdom of accomplices.

“After I ascended, I spent centuries waiting for them to change. For justice to come. And it never did. Not until the Royal family started feeling the consequences of it. Such a small thing, on the scope of what they did. That their line should simply end.”

But that wasn’t enough for them.

And it wasn’t enough for Bai Wuxiang, either.

“The other families who lost…who lost people to that mountain—they’re all gone now. I was the only one left. And I had no peace. No justice. So,” he looks up. “I decided that no one was allowed to benefit from the deaths of my wife and children. Not anymore.”

No one would live on the land soaked with their blood again.

No one would hold festivals in their graveyards.

No more gardens would grow from fields of murdered children.

“…So—what, you avenged one genocide with another?!”

“No,” Bai Wuxiang corrects him. “You and your brother were my victims. I used you two—and your arrogant fool of a father—to push the volcano out of control. But you slaughtered your own people, Jun Wu.”

Jun Wu balls his fist up—like he might strike him—

But instead, he takes a staggering step back, his hands trembling.

“IF IT'S OVER NOW, WHY ARE YOU STILL LYING?!”

“I’m not,” Bai Wuxiang shakes his head. “I only wanted to make the land uninhabitable.”

Xie Lian can see it now—in his eyes, his voice, the peace he seems to feel.

Bai Wuxiang is telling the truth.

“I’ll never say what I did to you wasn’t cruel.” Bai Wuxiang shakes his head. “Or that you deserved this. But I gave you so many chances, Jun Wu.”

“SHUT UP!”

Then, Xie Lian watches him say the words that make something behind Jun Wu's eyes break in two.

"If you had done nothing—everything would have been absolutely fine."

"...What?" He whispers, lips trembling.

"I only told your father one lie," Bai Wuxiang smiles. “And it wasn’t about being forced to choose one of his sons. Or how he should treat either one or you,” he explains.

“I lied to him about which one was the eldest brother.”

Xie Lian’s jaw drops, just as Jun Wu stumbles to the ground, backing away in shock.

"You..." He chokes, struggling to wrap his mind around that truth, trying to tell himself it's a lie. "You..."

But it isn't.

Bai Wuxiang has no reason to lie about anything now.

"You were always the eldest brother, Jun Wu."

"But—then—why did you lie about it?!"

"Because you were the first Prince of Wuyong to ever understand what it felt like to experience the oppression your family inflicted over the generations."

Bai Wuxiang's words are cruel.

They're unfair.

But they're true .

"You could have been different from any of them."

"Is there any way a child is SUPPOSED to react to being tortured?! Should I THANK you for the opportunity?!"

"I never forced your father to beat you, Jun Wu. Or your mother to turn away from you."

"SHUT—!"

"They barely even questioned me. They didn't even ask for proof."

Bai Wuxiang isn't lying now, either.

Xie Lian saw.

Jun Liang questioned Bai Wuxiang at the time.

Vaguely.

But he took the man on words alone, waiting for no evidence other than that to commit such heinous acts.

"I told them a scary story, and they believed it."

Believed it enough to treat their own child like an animal.

Like less than an animal.

"But, when you turned eighteen—I was always going to tell them the truth. You were always going to take your rightful place. But..." He tilts his head to the side, eyes glinting. "When I saw the two of you in the Kiln...Why do you think I pointed out that your brother could have helped you run away?"

Because, in that moment—they both could have fled.

Run from Wuyong. From everything.

Together.

"I gave you a choice between that, and revenge."

And Jun Wu made his choice, without his hand ever being forced.

(Even if he believed that it was.)

Revenge.

Over and over again, he chose revenge.

"Your brother didn't have to die, Jun Wu. Neither of you did. If you ran—I would have let you both go."

He gave them chances.

"You were always the eldest. Always meant to be the Crown Prince of Wuyong. And if you hadn't switched fates with your brother...everything I told your father would have come true."

Jun Wu would have been the greatest ruler of their line.

The Saint Born Under a Cursed Star.

"...Then why would you even give me that choice?!" Jun Wu snaps, clutching his hands on either side of his head, and—

"Because you were becoming just like your parents, and your brother before you," Bai Wuxiang regards him with such—

Such disappointment.

"I gave you the chance to prove me wrong."

Another chance.

Another missed opportunity.

Another...

"Your sons would have lived, Jun Wu."

A horrified, grief stricken sob rips from the man, forced to his hands and knees on the ground, shaking violently.

"LIAR!"

"Your father could have said no, when I made the god's offer. He could have moved the Imperial Capital to the eastern half of Wuyong. But he didn't want to give up the most fertile land."

"THAT'S NOT MY FAULT!"

"You could have listened to your wife, and entered peace talks."

When the conflict with the clans of the central plains were only border skirmishes.

"You never needed to switch fates with your brother."

"You—you never told me the truth—I—I thought I HAD TO!"

"Zhao Kong gave your people plenty of time to leave."

Jun Wu falls silent.

"But you made the same choice as your father. Even though you knew why the land was cursed."

He knew that the threat of Mount Tonglu was created because the land he was fighting to save had been built on centuries of theft, abuse, and murder.

But he still fought to stay.

"...But now," Bai Wuxiang sits forward, finally tilting his head down, shoulders slumping.

Prepared to rest.

"It's over. Hate me for my part in it. Do what you will with me. I have no regrets. Wuyong didn't deserve to continue to exist."

Jun Wu rises to his feet—sword clutched in his hand.

"But you—you will have to face what you've done, just as I have."

Bai Wuxiang certainly never forced Jun Wu to slaughter the gods. Hadn't expected that, since the prince would have known by then that they were uninvolved.

But in all of Bai Wuxiang's careful planning and manipulations...

Even he never could have understood just how far the Prince of Wuyong would go in order to keep his secrets.

In order to maintain that it was not his fault.

Jun Wu feels nothing when he kills Bai Wuxiang.

There's no satisfaction in killing someone who has already beaten you.

Completely and utterly defeated you.

Even devouring his soul, the way a ghost would—ravenous, trying to fill a void inside of him where a sense of self should be—

There's no relief from his regrets.

And the price for what he's done—

It comes far sooner than he ever could have guessed.

Returning to his wife's side. Shell shocked, lost.

Unsure of what is left of them.

Where they can go.

Part of him is desperate to go back to the garden where he introduced himself to her.

Before the eruption. Before the bridge. Before the wars. Before switching fates.

Back when he had chances. Choices.

Part of them wishes that they could start over, but—

He remembers now, in some far off, distant way, that Hudie is dead, too.

That she took her own life after her ascension to the Heavens, following San Lang's death.

In his anger, grief, and fear of being caught in his own mistakes—

Her fate became an afterthought.

They can have no more children. They—

They can't start over.

Not anymore.

He finds her, kneeling beside the corpse of the Wind Master, her bloody hammer discarded beside her, head hanging.

Hands empty.

Hair loose, like a prisoner on death row, blowing gently in the breeze.

Blood staining her cheeks in small streaks.

Wearing the robes of a queen underneath battle worn armor.

The Martial Goddess whose statues adorn the pathways in Paradise Manor.

Xie Lian kneels beside her, gently holding the ghost fire in his palm, seeing—

Seeing her clutching a small, stuffed fox in her hands.

He knows that look.

Because she's fought to the end of the line.

Won every battle—slain every enemy.

And her San Lang isn't coming back.

He knows that pain in her eyes—the desire to rest in peace, to move on, but—

Something won't let her go.

Then, when her husband approaches—Xie Lian sees something else in her gaze.

Tonglu Hudie always brought out the best in her husband. She was the more compassionate of the two. Fiercely loving. Devoted.

But they married one another for a reason.

Hudie might have kindness in her heart. She might love fiercely, and be capable of great compassion.

But there's a wildness to her, one that she shares with Jun Wu.

A ferocity.

A ruthlessness.

One that he taught her.

Her claws are long—and her teeth are sharp.

Convenient, when Jun Wu used her as his final weapon against his enemies.

His downfall, now, when all of her children's would-be killers are slain—and the only one left to blame is the one actually responsible.

When she looks up, Xie Lian can see it in her eyes.

She knows .

But Jun Wu doesn't. He only watches the back of her head, reaching to place one hand on her shoulder—to comfort her.

To try and fumble for the last thing he has.

His last believer.

“...San Lang would have been—”

Thud.

Jun Wu falls silent, looking down at the blade sprouting from his chest.

Shining black steel. Forged to avenge his own child.

The blade Zhu Xin.

One Xie Lian recognizes now, with grim finality, as the blade he has carried for centuries now.

Fangxin.

When he looks up at his wife, his expression is one of utter shock.

"You..." He rasps, his lips trembling as he stares up at her.

The girl who smiled at him so kindly once.

Who told him he wasn't ugly.

The beauty with a head full of butterflies.

"You..."

The woman who was once the Crown Princess of Wuyong, Tonglu

Hudie.

Now, reforged through grief and dishonesty.

Broken and reshaped in ways that make Xie Lian ache with sympathy.

Into the Executioner of the Heavens.

The ghost story that Jun Wu will come to tell.

Zhao Beitong.

The blade is yanked from his chest without mercy.

Only to be returned once again even more viciously.

“You don’t get to say his name.” She whispers, shaking her head, pulling the blade from his chest again, watching as Jun Wu drops to his knees, gasping from the pain.

“Not to me. Not ever again.”

It's a final link in a fraying chain of sanity.

That one thing—the final thread holding a seam together before it bursts.

Because the one person he assumed he would never lose...

“You...” he whispers, his eyes narrowing. “Even you?”

The one person who never, ever hurt Jun Wu. Who was always on his side. Who always showed him kindness...

Zhu Xin trembles in her hold, but Zhao Beitong doesn’t falter. “Even me.”

...Has turned against him, in the end.

“Even when everyone else burned my temples, and prayed to others, you...”

Jun Wu parries her third attack, but is too wounded to deflect her fourth.

She knows every gap in his armor, after all.

She was the one who forged it.

“…You never turned against me. And now—!”

“It wasn’t that I prayed to someone else, Jun Wu.” His wife whispers, yanking the blade out for the third time, his blood spattering across the ground.

Shattering the belief that his experience was universal.

That she only existed to be a part of his story.

A romantic partner to carry his character development through the necessary subplots in his hero's journey.

A grieving mother whose pain he could avenge.

She always considered herself to be more of a mother than a wife, but —

Mothers are frightful creatures.

There is a world for her that exists outside of him. Thoughts he has never known. Emotions that she has never shared with him.

She exists without him.

She does not need him.

“I stopped praying to anyone, long ago.”

He is the cause of her pain, not her savior.

“And now, there’s only one god left that’s responsible for the death of my son,” She whispers, hitting him again, and again, and again.

“You’ll be patient with me, won’t you? You said I could avenge him, didn’t you?!”

Xie Lian has seen this scene before.

Or no—

He's felt it.

Heard it.

She pierces him over and over again.

Once for every layer of hatred that she forged into the blade.

Once, twice, three times. A dozen times.

A hundred times.

Until he's just another bleeding, broken thing.

Like the world he created.

Xie Lian was that bleeding, nearly shapeless form once.

Broken. Begging for death. Finding a place beyond pain in his mind.

Somewhere between hell and oblivion, experiencing such suffering, his mind couldn't comprehend it.

And now, he knows that was a choice.

That Jun Wu—Bai Wuxiang—Deng Shihong—whoever that man is —

He knew exactly what it felt like, when he chose to do that to him.

He knew exactly what it would mean, to have his own former believers do that to him. And that—

That makes it even more cruel, somehow.

Zhao Beitong kneels before Jun Wu, whispering by his ear—

“You aren’t better than anyone.”

Even through the pain, his eyes widen slightly.

“I want you to know that.” She continues, her eyes narrowed. “You are selfish, arrogant, and greedy. And now—look at you.”

Now, look at him.

The boy who sought power not for the sake of it—but simply to escape the pain and fear of the world he was born into.

“You are just as broken, and frightened as anyone else.”

Only to end up exactly where he began.

“Everyone has left you, and you blame the world. Scream and cry about how unfair it is.”

She leaves the sword Zhu Xin buried in his chest, stabbing deep into the earth beneath him.

“They left you because you weren’t worth following any longer.”

Zhao Beitong turns her back on him.

The last god she ever tore down—unaware of what she, in doing so, had forged.

“Everything you have done—you did it to yourself.”

And from her point of view—he certainly had.

That's the painful thing about being human.

Life gives you a small fragment of a view of the world, and expects you to make sense of it.

Sometimes, you're a boy screaming from behind a mask.

Or a girl, with a head full of butterflies.

An orphan, falling from the city walls.

A prince, who isn't allowed to be anything but perfect.

A guard who doesn't know what to protect.

A servant, who needs a friend.

You might be a good man, who couldn't fix it.

Or a little sibling, always hiding behind your brother's sleeves.

A scared child, watching the world through the crack in the doors of a wardrobe, wondering if you should ever come out.

A general who doesn't want to fight anymore.

The world might call you a princess turned saint, when all you wanted was to be flawed.

Or you could be the daughter of a shoemaker, fingertips stained with ink—desperate to climb so high, that no one will ever look down on you again.

Each a small, fragmentary piece of a broader perspective—the omniscience that is, ironically enough, supposed to be for the gods.

Zhao Beitong saw the monster that the Prince of Wuyong became—but only through his inadvertent destruction.

Her monster is entirely different from Xie Lian's.

Or Hua Cheng's.

Or, though Xie Lian does not know it yet, someone else's.

But there is no one who will ever struggle to reconcile the truth of the situation more than the man at the center of it all.

The man who, Xie Lian is now realizing, has simply kept spinning the same wheel he himself was placed upon at birth—because he doesn't know how to stop.

Or maybe he does—but if he admitted that, then that would mean admitting that all of this is his fault.

And he can't.

He can't, he can't, he can't .

It's in that struggle to reconcile, bleeding and writhing where his wife left him, that Xie Lian watches it happen.

A rare phenomenon—one he's read about, before, but never heard of a witnessed occurrence.

Not one where the victim survived, at least.

As Jun Wu hovers somewhere between god and ghost, his body struggling to put itself back together, he...his soul...

Splits in two.

A cruel imitation of what he once was—

A twin brother.

One half, a god. The other, a calamity.

The world's first.

One, everything Jun Wu wants to be. Everything he allows people to see.

Brave, generous, and strong. The man who would rise again as emperor of the Heavens.

And the other...

The other is as cruel and vindictive as the world that forged him.

As the guoshi who doomed him.

As the family who discarded him.

And when Jun Wu regains consciousness, seeing his lesser self for the first time...

He shrinks away in fear.

Because the man doesn't…

Xie Lian grows silent, remembering what he saw, through Shi Qingxuan's eyes.

Remembering what Ren Song said about the creature that attacked them on the Terrace of Cascading Wine.

He doesn't have a face.

Not really.

There's smooth skin in the place where features should be—thinning in places—showing where the real him is straining to break through.

Like overgrown scar tissue.

And Jun Wu—

He trembles, staring at the worst version of his own reflection.

And he can't—

He can't look at it anymore.

He falls back, palms bracing him against the ground, and—

Looks down, when his hand comes into contact with something solid.

A white, blank mask.

The face that tormented him.

"…NO!" He screams, smashing his first down against it.

Instead of shattering, it simply changes.

Into the face he was forced to wear, shaped into someone weeping.

"NO!"

He tries to smash it again, but…

Now, it's the mask his brother wore.

With a smile he used to think was mocking—never seeing its naivety.

"…NO!"

He smashes it over, and over, and over again.

Until, by the time he's too exhausted to fight back—

A broken, mismatched version of himself remains.

One that feels far closer to the truth than his real face ever has.

Half laughing—

Half crying.

Jun Wu lifts the mask with trembling fingertips, looking from it, to the blank, horrifying image of his other half.

…Placing it over the face of the new "Bai Wuxiang."

"… You did all of this," Jun Wu chokes, face smeared with blood and ash.

Filled with desperation.

Sobbing.

Clutching a body that feels so foreign to him, as it knits itself back together.

Xie Lian understands that sensation.

How so much of you can be cut away, that when your true form starts to grow back—

You wonder how much of you is real, when there's none of your original self left.

Jun Wu lays collapsed like that for countless hours, screaming—and Xie Lian knows that it hurts.

It hurts.

It really, really hurts.

He knows what Jun Wu is thinking.

Help me.

Help me, help me, help me.

Help me, help me, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help me!

Jun Wu curls in on himself, screaming until his throat turns raw, bloody tears dripping down his cheeks.

Because—

It hurts.

It always hurts.

It hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts...it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS!!!

Why can't he die?!

Why could he have JUST DIED?!

But the world doesn't break or shatter. Not the way that he does.

It's still there when Jun Wu lifts his head—broken and teetering.

A white masked figure watching over him—kneeling in the ashes of the Heavenly Capital.

Xie Lian watches as the fallen god rises to his knees—half demon, half heaven—

Taking Bai Wuxiang's face between trembling palms, whispering;

"You'll never hurt someone else again."

A promise that he's doomed to break.

"We'll—we'll be better , this time."

Xie Lian stands in the distance, that ghost fire still flickering in his palms, as he watches Jun Wu try to devour the broken half of his soul.

Knowing that, once a soul is truly split in two like this—there is no mending it.

That, no matter how hard he tries, he will fail.

But Xie Lian watches him try.

Watches as Jun Wu lives among the mortals for centuries—slowly forging the story Xie Lian would be told over a thousand years later.

Becoming a famed mortal General, bringing peace to a warring era—ruling for a time, then ascending.

Xie Lian watches a child that was once so alone, unloved, and without hope—grow into a man who is constantly trying to heal himself.

To rebuild the Heaven he once knew from the ashes of his former friends.

Leaving behind a warped version of what once was.

Watches, as he punishes the lingering spirit of his wife for her perceived betrayal.

Stealing her name. Locking her in the same Kiln where he made his first mistake, so many years ago.

When he was given chances.

When he could have been something different.

Turning her into the villain of his past, allowing himself never to read what's actually on the pages.

And when he seals her inside the Kiln, trapped in the dark with all of his other mistakes—

He tells himself that it's over.

That the past belongs to ghosts and memory.

Watches as the world begins to forget, learning to repeat the story that he's been telling.

As his believers return.

And slowly, but surely—Jun Wu begins to believe the story, too.

That he is a kind, merciful god.

A mentor to the other officials who ascend.

Walking the halls of the Heavens with two hounds trotting at his sides.

Ears perked, watching him with unquestioning affection.

Xie Lian bears witness when he comforts a young, worn down general.

Sitting in the grand martial hall by Pei Ming's side, playing rounds of Weiqi.

And—

The affection that Jun Wu once had for Pei Ming was genuine.

Watching them talk and laugh like old friends.

Irritation flashes in the emperor's eyes when Pei Ming, who seems the opposite of intellectual, always wins in games of strategy.

But he enjoys it, all the same.

And then, finally—

Xie Lian sees himself.

Kneeling on the ground beside Yi Nian bridge, pouring dust over lily seeds.

Uttering words that he now knows, to Jun Wu—must have sounded like a mocking curse.

"Body in abyss, heart in paradise."

Kneeling in the same place, where Jun Wu's heart was shattered.

And—

Xie Lian's lips tremble as he takes a step back, realizing how arrogant and childish those words seem now.

Because what did he know of suffering , back then?

A prince, who had been loved and adored every moment of his life.

Who, at that time, had never known what it felt like to fail.

Had never been blamed for something that was beyond his control.

Had never been forced to suffer on someone else's behalf.

If Xie Lian had lived this life, and seen a young, spoiled princeling utter such words—

He would have felt hatred in his heart, too.

"No..."

He looks down, as the scene begins to change—and the ghost fire in his hands flickers up at him brightly.

"You didn't know."

Xie Lian feels his heart in his throat, watching green flames dance before his eyes, welling with tears.

"You didn't know, your highness."

But Jun Wu doesn't look at Xie Lian and see an innocent.

Because if that was true, then so was he .

If that was true, then why did Bai Wuxiang have to put him through so much pain?

No, no—the Prince of Xianle cannot be an innocent.

In a world so cruel and lopsided—there are no innocents anymore.

Only spoiled, entitled children.

Princes who need to be taught lessons.

And as Xie Lian watches the scene change, he sees what truly happened.

Watching his own life fall apart from a bird's eye view, seeing—

There was no drought in Yong'an.

There was Jun Wu, casting spells to stop the rain.

Blocking prayers to Yushi Huang, to bring it back.

And just like the White Clothed Calamity, the Heavenly Emperor's goal wasn't necessarily to destroy Xianle.

Not in the beginning.

Only to push Xie Lian. To make him see that the world wasn't kind, or fair.

Pushing the people of Yong'an, through drought, famine, and prejudice, to give into their worst instincts.

To show Xie Lian how cruel human beings truly were.

And watching, to his thrill, as Xie Lian did the same thing he did.

Descending to Xianle to try and save his people.

Propping up golden palaces that were always doomed to fall down.

But—

But his temper never snapped.

Even in battle, he was noble. Even when he couldn't cut down Lang Ying—he didn't resort to dirty tricks.

He just tried.

Over and over again.

In an almost infuriatingly pointless way, he tried.

Even when Jun Wu unleashed a plague upon the people, offering a way to save them—

Xie Lian didn't take it.

As frightened and pained as he was...

He didn't change.

Even when Xianle fell, and he became listless and angry as he watched his future burn.

Even when Jun Wu sat in the Palace of the Prince of Xianle with him, and offered the prince a way to escape his punishment—

Just as he had, over a thousand years before.

To become the masked, nameless martial god of the central plains.

The one who slayed the god of misfortune.

And to be without a name—that makes one Wu Ming .

Now, Xie Lian can see something behind Jun Wu's eyes begin to crack once more, when he hears Xie Lian's reply.

"...No," he croaks, shaking his head. "I can't do that."

Jun Wu raises an eyebrow as the crown prince wraps his arms around himself, taking shuddering breaths.

"I would never see my parents again," Xie Lian whispers. "Or Feng Xin, or Mu Qing. And even if I could...w...wouldn't taking a new name...be running away from what I did?"

Now, the emperor goes rather still.

And Xie Lian can see—

Jun Wu can't even begin to comprehend that.

He doesn't want to.

"If this is my fault..." Xie Lian swallows thickly, wiping at his tears. "Then let me suffer for it. Let me be punished for it. My—my people's loss isn't so cheap, that I could just walk away from the blame."

For a moment, there is no reply.

Only his ragged, pained breaths.

A teenage boy, left all alone with the pieces of a war that was never of his own making.

Still, desperately trying to put them back together.

Finally, Jun Wu asks—

“...You think that’s cowardice?”

Xie Lian couldn't have known then, how much hid behind that question.

Back then, he didn't apply with an affirmative, too lost in his own sorrow.

“Even if that means you will be sealed with a cursed shackle?”

“...If that’s what I deserve,” the prince replies quietly, his head hanging low. Then, after a pause—

“...Then Xianle will accept the emperor’s punishment,” he whispers, his voice trembling.

Jun Wu stares him down.

“You will suffer,” he reminds him coldly. “It will be hard.”

“...I know.”

Oh, but he couldn’t have known.

Watching now, Xie lian sinks to his knees.

Seeing his eyes clouded with the blacks and golds of his cursed shackle as his trial comes to a conclusion, and he is exiled.

Knowing, now—that they weren't the punishment he thought he deserved. A penance for the pain he thought he caused.

They were a cage .

But soon, he's cast back down to the mortal realm.

Where he will wander, to avoid becoming a burden on his friends, on his parents.

(But what he didn't know then, was that there was someone watching over him.)

(Always watching over him.)

And Jun Wu is left alone.

Standing in the martial hall, his head clutched in his hands.

It will be years before the Kiln opens again, but—

In the distance, it rumbles.

Filled with resentment, as the earth became stained with blood and suffering once more.

And now, after centuries of rattling the bars of his cage—

Xie Lian watches the shattered half of the emperor's soul wrench free once more.

Climbing free, long white sleeves dragging across the floor.

Streaks of white staining jet black hair.

Xie Lian couldn't tell you which was true.

If Jun Wu's acts of cruelty were caused by the strain of building pressure in the Kiln, and Bai Wuxiang trying to break free.

Or, if they were his own.

The only thing that seems clear is that, once the other half of his soul wrenched itself free—

Jun Wu had no control over him anymore.

Or how far he would go.

But now, standing in the Grand Martial Hall—Bai Wuxiang turns his head.

Up until now, Xie Lian was an observer in the memories—silent and unseen.

But now…

Bai Wuxiang is looking straight at him.

Trembling.

"…You think you're so clever, don't you, Xianle?"

He marches toward him, staggering as Xie Lian backs away.

“Don’t you realize…” He launches himself forward, hands wrapping around the prince’s throat as the ghost fire flares—

“…This goes both ways?”

And just like that—everything is dark.

A Painful, smothering kind of darkness.

One that never lifts.

And Xie Lian hears himself.

“…I know you’re there.”

And—

The sound of feet shuffling away from him.

“Wait!” He cries, stretching out his hand, lonely, so, horribly lonely, whispering—

“…Don’t go.”

No.

Xie Lian claws around him blindly, struggling to gain purchase on something, anything to hold onto.

Because Jun Wu—

He doesn't get to see this.

This isn't his to see.

And—

Xie Lian thrashes helplessly, feeling them tumble from memory to memory, Hong'er's voice flashing in and out, lashing against his heart every single time.

If he lets it go too far—

Bai Wuxiang might have guessed how important the ring was before, when Xie Lian reacted so violently to the hammer hitting it.

But if it gets to that memory—

He'll know .

He'll know where Hua Cheng's ashes are.

But Xie Lian—

He crashes down to his knees, and his hand—

Lands on a pair of boots. And Xie Lian—

He trembles, even now, so many years later, his cheeks wet.

He knows those boots.

He made them.

And he just—

He just wishes the screaming would stop.

Horrible, gut wrenching screams.

He turns his head, numb, ready to beg whoever it is to stop, but—

Oh.

That's just him.

...He's screaming.

Xie Lian sinks forward, convulsing with grief, crying, screaming until the sky might shatter from the force of it, his forehead pressed against Hong'er's legs, unmoving.

...He can't do this.

His hands clutch at Hong'er's knees, breaths speeding to the point of hyperventilation.

He can't do this.

He's going—

He's going to lose him again.

He's—

Xie Lian is going to fail again.

He—

He can't protect him.

"Dianxia..."

A voice whispers, faint and flickering, like a breath on the wind.

"Dianxia..."

Xie Lian can barely lift his head, cheeks swollen and tear soaked as he stares into the endless darkness, but—

There's one point of light there.

Wavering before his eyes.

A ghost fire.

"...I can't," Xie Lian croaks, straining under the weight of the one thing that makes him weak.

"I can't!"

Failing.

Losing him again.

"You can," the ghost fire whispers. "You already have."

And Xie Lian—

He remembers Hua Cheng's hand, pressing against his chest.

'You have always kept me safe.'

Xie Lian bites his lip, eyes shining with tears, kneeling alone in the darkness.

"...I don't know what to do," He admits, feeling like a child again, crashing back down to earth.

"I haven't learned—I haven't learned ANYTHING!"

"Yes, you have."

That ghost fire flickers brighter and brighter, smoldering in the darkness—until finally, it takes form.

The false prince.

The child who was cast aside, after being raised to believe he was destined for greatness.

Forever a teenager—and through suffering, he learned.

He reaches forward, grasping Xie Lian's hand—pulling with all of his might—

Until they both fall backwards, tumbling through a tunnel of endless memories—between the three souls, there's thousands upon thousands of years of them—an ever shifting kaleidoscope.

One of pain, loss, joy, and sorrow.

But all of it is just—

Just life , in the end.

THUD!

And when they land, Xie Lian sits up—dust in his hair, finding—he can see.

See himself, laying in a pit, with a sword through his chest.

And he knows this place.

Knows the figure in dark armor, watching from a distance.

And his heart aches, seeing the way the soldier's hands tremble.

"...Oh, Wu Ming," he whispers, aching to go to him.

Xie Lian was so unfair to him.

But—

This memory isn't from his point of view.

And it isn't from Bai Wuxiang's, either—

He's standing by Xie Lian's side—slyly mocking him, until the prince tells him that he's boring.

(And, that he's blocking Xie Lian's sun.)

No, this is...

Xie Lian turns around, staring at the ghostly figure beside him.

"...You were here?" He whispers, lips trembling.

The one who spent the last two thousand years living as Deng Shihong smiles at him, half in acknowledgement—half in apology.

"I tried, your highness."

That was what he was saying from the beginning, but—

It takes on an entirely new meaning, now.

And it had been so long, Xie Lian almost forgot.

There—

There was a merchant who, several times during the three days he waited, tried to give him water.

To go down, and help him.

Xie Lian always thought he changed his mind because the woman with him—one he assumed was his wife—

But now, watching the scene again, from a different point of view...

Deng Shihong hid each time Bai Wuxiang returned—knowing he would be devoured if his brother saw him.

And when he...

Xie lian turns his head, tears silently falling down his cheeks as he watches the sun rise and set, the rain pouring down, and...

He sees Deng Shihong turning a man back, saying the road ahead was no good, and he'd have to go back through the city to get home.

A rice merchant in a bamboo hat.

One who, under Bai Wuxiang's irritated gaze, stumbles upon a prince in the street, curled up, alone in the rain like a beggar.

Who, after scolding the child for feeling sorry for himself—

He gives him his hat.

Shielding him from the rain.

"...You..." Xie Lian swallows thickly, clutching the chain around his neck as he looks to the teenager, trembling faintly. "...You saved me..."

If he hadn't convinced the rice merchant to turn back…if the man with the bamboo hat hadn't stopped then, showing him kindness, Xie Lian would have…

"No," Deng Shihong whispers, pointing back to the scene below.

Xie Lian, casting his hatred aside.

Xie Lian, willing to face ten thousand years of curses, just to protect the city that destroyed Xianle.

Xie Lian, facing Bai Wuxiang without powers.

Xie Lian, willing to be stabbed by every person in the square, just to protect them from the plague that was looming ahead.

Xie Lian, screaming—

"I WAS NOT A GOD OF XIANLE, I WAS A GOD OF THIS WORLD!"

And—just as the people began to consider it...

It was the merchant who tried to help him before who spoke against it.

"How could we let him bleed for us now, when we wouldn't help him before?!"

He looks around, seeing what his brother never did.

That humans can be selfish, greedy, and cruel.

"It isn't right! How could we live with ourselves, if we did that?!"

But, if you lead by example—

They can also be kind, brave, and decent .

"My brother has never been able to beat you," Deng Shihong whispers, watching the same "Because he always looks for an excuse to see the worst in people."

Xie Lian watches himself ascend for the second time, surrounded by a halo of golden light.

"...You show them that they could be better."

And that, if you ask Deng Shihong, is what gods are for.

Aspirational.

To believe there could be a third path, no matter how hopeless it might seem.

That, by a Heaven Official's Blessing...

No Paths Are Bound.

Xie Lian falls to his knees—not with sorrow, not anymore.

Numb.

Shellshocked.

Realizing now, that every moment he thought he was alone, every moment he thought he failed, even when he did fail—

He was never alone.

He had Hong'er, Wu Ming, and Hua Cheng.

He had Feng Xin— and Mu Qing.

He had his parents. He still has his parents, holding him tight each and every time Ruoye catches him when he falls.

And he—

He had Deng Shihong, too.

"...Were you always listening for me?" Xie Lian murmurs faintly, still reeling.

The teenage boy sits beside him, wearing torn, filthy rags, but—

When he smiles at Xie Lian, it's lopsided—eyes glinting with the simple satisfaction of helping another person.

"...Did you really think that construction crew just decided to dig in the middle of nowhere?"

Xie Lian strains, his mind stretching back to two centuries ago—

The men who discovered his coffin were too terrified to give him much of an explanation, but...

"...I thought they were building some sort of inn..."

"For workers on a diamond mine," Deng Shihong explains. " Someone went and lied about there being a mineral vein nearby..." He winces, puffing out a breath. "They wasted a lot of money, but...they did end up digging up something, at least."

Xie Lian laughs thickly, wiping at his eyes.

"I...I don't even know how to thank you—"

"Don't," Deng Shihong shakes his head, his eyes gleaming with tears of his own. "I..."

He turns his gaze towards Bai Wuxiang, being cut apart by Jun Wu.

"I'm as much to blame for this situation as anyone."

Xie Lian frowns, placing a hand on his shoulder.

"...You tried."

The prince reminds him gently. "Sometimes, that's even more important than succeeding."

Deng Shihong laughs—not unkindly—shaking his head again."...When are you going to start listening to your own advice, Xie Lian?"

The prince falls silent, eyes round--and the ghost looks up towards the sky, thoughtful.

"...I've held his consciousness back as much as I can—but I'm not strong enough to keep him at bay much longer. You..." He looks at Xie Lian, resolved.

"You've always had what you needed to win against my brother." Deng Shihong tells him firmly, even as the memory starts to waver. "Just do...what you've always done."

Xie Lian frowns, reaching for him as his vision starts to fade. "But...what does that mean?!"

Even as he falls through darkness—he hears Deng Shihong's voice in his ears, ringing clear.

"Do what you think is right, your highness—no matter how hard it is."

That, in the end, is what Xie Lian has always done.

And now, as he continues to fall—he sees that light again. Fluttering overhead, plunging down with him, following him into the dark.

His arms outstretched, feeling countless souls streaming past him. Some broken, lost, and alone.

Others reaching, just like him, towards the light.

But sometimes—a soul...

Is a butterfly.

Chapter End Notes

> This has taken us up all the way to the beginning of TGCF Book 5 in the canon timeline! From here, the plotline diverges pretty significantly, so if you haven't read all the way through Book 5 you are (mostly) spoiler free from now on!
>
> Thanks, xoxo
> Evie

Hell Hath No Fury

Chapter Summary

> There's a faint voice in his array, trying to calm him down—
>
> Warning him that, at this rate, he might bring the entire mountain down.
>
> Hua Cheng doesn't care.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

BOOM!

BOOM!

BOOM!

There's a faint voice in his array, trying to calm him down—

Warning him that, at this rate, he might bring the entire mountain down.

Hua Cheng doesn't care.

He returns to his true form, sinking to his knees, smoke pouring out with every breath.

Huge portions of Mount Tonglu have been gauged out from the side of the mountain—boulders the size of temples cast down onto the hills below.

But the Kiln itself—

BOOM!

Hua Cheng slams both fists against the door, the ground trembling beneath it.

It can't be breached.

Not from the outside, at least.

Hua Cheng really will tear the entirety of Mount Tonglu, and the Kiln will still remain intact—like an iron egg, refusing to hatch until something from the inside bursts out.

But he—

He can't wait that long.

Hua Cheng places one palm against the ground, sending his butterflies pouring down, scouting the inner tunnels of the volcano, finding the magma chamber.

"...You feel that, you big, ugly bastard?" He snarls, eye flaring dangerously. "You want me to blow the whole thing?"

In his communication array, there's an irritated sigh.

'Shuo is still in the fields below. And even if he wasn't, you might incinerate half the continent if you force an eruption.'

He Xuan is right—

But Hua Cheng is desperate .

A living being can't break through the Kiln.

If Xie Lian does break through, that would mean he—he—

And if he doesn't .

Hua Cheng felt that blow earlier.

A strike that reverberated straight into his core, making his teeth rattle.

Pain he hasn't felt since he died.

Xie Lian never would have let something touch the ring, even before he knew that Hong'er remained in this world.

If something managed to strike it, even if only once—

Xie Lian's been incapacitated by Bai Wuxiang.

And he's alone , with Bai Wuxiang.

Hua Cheng presses both palms against the door again, claws digging into the volcanic rock, fingers straining.

When he's inside the Kiln, he can control it. But outside—

Outside, he might as well be on the opposite side of the planet.

He gave Xie Lian a significant amount of spiritual power when they were falling—

But to defeat a Calamity?

It's not enough.

The only way he could have a chance would be if he had an ally inside, but it's just them, and Hua Cheng can't—

The Ghost King's head snaps up, eye wide as he stares at the Kiln door, fingers going slack.

'...Are you being quiet because you've decided to destroy the world?' Blackwater questions, his tone suddenly tense. 'Because that's not—'

'No.'

'...Then what are you going to do?'

Hua Cheng rises to his feet, covered in soot, hands nearly black from it, all the way to the elbows.

He turns his head, glancing over his shoulder--evaluating how much space there is between the Kiln door, and the cliff.

'...Hua Cheng.'

Thirty meters, give or take.

Hua Cheng breaches that in one leap, turning to face the Kiln doors once more.

Unsheathing E'Ming from his hip, bringing the blade up—

And slicing deep into his right palm, blood pouring down.

'What are you going to do?'

One eye snaps up, glaring at the entryway of the Kiln with the force of a fading star, one that explodes upon its death.

Fangs extending, thighs tensing—

As he charges.

'Something really fucking stupid.'

'...Hua—!'

BOOM!

Deep, far down within the depths of his soul, the ground rattles.

The flute stops.

A child stops singing a lullaby.

And now, from a long, merciful slumber—

A sleeping god opens her eyes.

BOOM!

Inside the Kiln, Bai Wuxiang slams against the opposite wall—feeling ancient stone fracture and crumble beneath his form.

He sits forward, shaking the dust and rubble from his hair, smirking beneath the mask.

"...Not a bad blow, Xianle," He muses. "Crimson Rain must have given you an extraordinary amount of—"

He looks up—and falls silent.

Xie Lian pushes himself up onto his hands and knees, breathing hard, shaking his head.

"That wasn't...that wasn't..." He looks up—and he, too, grows quiet.

He can't see Bai Wuxiang's actual form—or the walls of the Kiln around them.

But he can see the silver light burning overhead, realizing after a moment—

It's not just one large light, but rather thousands, no— hundreds of thousands of smaller ones.

Wraith Butterflies.

And surrounding them—

An intense aura, one that he hasn't seen before, but more powerful than any he's seen so far, aside from Hua Cheng's.

A vivid shade of amethyst—burning like alchemical flame all around him.

Click...

"My, my..."

Click...

Heeled boots click ominously against the stone floor of the Kiln, robes of black, crimson, and gold silk gleaming menacingly under the light.

A hammer, long forlorn, finally finds its way back into the hands of its master.

Twirled between expert fingers, wielding it far more deftly than the Prince of Pretenders ever could.

Bai Wuxiang's wife stares down at him, head tilted to the side, eyes burning brightly under the light of her wrath, given form.

"You've aged terribly, my love."

"...You're dead ," Bai Wuxiang snarls, scrambling away from her. "CRIMSON RAIN DEVOURED YOU CENTURIES AGO!"

CLANG!

He cuts himself off with a choked cry when her hammer, the same he used to attack Xie Lian before, lands in his chest.

"I was waiting."

He staggers back to the ground—and Zhao Beitong yanks her hammer from his chest, his blood spattering across the floor around them.

“EVEN AFTER SO MANY YEARS, HOW ARE YOU STILL THIS PATHETIC?!” She snarls.

CLANG!

“YOU HAD TWO THOUSAND YEARS, OUT IN THE WORLD!” She snarls, slamming the hammer down again. “TWO THOUSAND YEARS, TO MAKE SOMETHING OF YOURSELF!”

CLANG!

A porcelain mask slams down to the floor, and after countless centuries—

It shatters.

“THIS WAS THE BEST YOU COULD DO?!”

She yanks the hammer back again—

Staring down at his face.

Her husband’s face, after all of these years.

His hair now streaked with gray—

His expression so twisted with hate, she can barely recognize him anymore.

“YOU KNOW NOTHING OF WHAT I’VE BEEN THROUGH!”

Bai Wuxiang snarls, rolling away from the next blow before it can land, snatching Zhu Xin off of the floor, lunging toward her with murderous intent.

"YOU NEVER HAVE!"

CLANG!

She parries his blow with her hammer, holding her own against his strength, muscles straining.

"...And yet," She takes a step forward, pushing him back. "You still haven't found a weapon that I didn't forge for you, have you?"

The Queen of Wuyong smirks, shoving him back until he stumbles, breaking his stance—and nearly strikes him again.

"You've never managed to beat me in a battle where you didn't take me by surprise," Bai Wuxiang sneers, parrying her blow, but—

He can't seem to get one in, either.

"You've never beaten me at all," Zhao Beitong replies, her tone filled with ice.

"And you speak of what I don't know—" She shakes her head, pointing back to Xie Lian with a trembling finger.

"I saw ALL of San Lang's memories—I SAW WHAT YOU DID TO THAT CHILD!" She snarls.

"HOW COULD YOU HAVE CALLED HIM SAN LANG?!"

Xie Lian has seen too many of Bai Wuxiang's memories by now, to not recognize the grief in his voice.

"..." Zhao Beitong looks down at her hammer, streaked in blood. Xie Lian's, and now Bai Wuxiang's.

"...Every mother has her favorites," she murmurs, quietly lethal.

"...You met my youngest, didn't you?" Her eyes slide back over to him, surveying him with...

Utter disgust.

"He returned my dagger to you personally, I heard." Her butterflies swirl overhead—shrieking dangerously. "But not before he saw everything else you did."

Her fingers tighten around the hilt of her hammer—finally witnessing a brief flash of shame in her husband's eyes.

As much shame as this half of him is capable of feeling, anyway.

"...And if I could," She murmurs, her voice trembling with rage.

"I would give all of it back to you tenfold."

Every. Single. Bit.

"..." Bai Wuxiang somehow manages a snort, his teeth streaked with blood.

"What happened to the naive little girl who said she believed we got out of the world what we put into it?"

"You murdered her."

Before he can say another word, the Wraith Butterflies from the ceiling descend upon him, forming gleaming silver chains of spiritual power, hoisting his arms over his head, chaining his feet to the floor.

Zhao Beitong lifts Zhu Xin from where it's fallen to the floor.

"...I gave the world the best of me," She mutters, looking up at him with angry, hate filled eyes, her face illuminated by silvery light.

"And all it gave me in return was you."

"...Do you honestly think I'm afraid of pain anymore, Hudie?" The calamity drawls, unimpressed.

It's the first time anyone has called her by her name in millennia, and —

It had to be him .

Her lips tremble before she forces them shut, slowly curving into a smile as she runs her fingertips over the edge of Zhu Xin.

With the loving touch of a bladesmith.

"...You forget," she looks up at Bai Wuxiang through her lashes. "I was your Guoshi. Not the other way around."

There are things she knows, pain she can cause, that Bai Wuxiang was never taught.

Slowly, the metal begins to glow.

Crackling with spiritual power.

"If you think there isn't a way I can cause you pain," Zhao Beitong pulls Zhu Xin back, "then you are a fool."

The sword plunges into the calamity's chest, and—

Xie Lian can hear it.

A faint, punched out sound of pain.

And it makes him freeze with shock.

You grow up afraid of the monster in the dark. Asking your parents to check every shadow before you can fall asleep, but—

You never expect that monster to whimper when it bleeds.

Zhao Beitong yanks Zhu Xin out, staring up at him grimly.

"It's time we finished this."

The younger generation has been left to live with their mistakes for far too long.

It stops, now.

Xie Lian listens as she strikes Bai Wuxiang over and over again.

Just as he was cut before.

Just as the prince of Wuyong was slaughtered, before him.

And he...

He doesn't know what the right thing to do is, doesn't know what he should do, even after Deng Shihong's words, but...

When he hears a hopeless, broken sob—

He knows this isn't the right thing.

Because Zhao Beitong, even in all of her rage—

She's weeping.

Not for Bai Wuxiang.

Not for herself.

Just—

She sags, crying even harder when she feels arms wrap around her from behind, hugging her tightly.

Reaching up to clutch Xie Lian's forearm with trembling fingers, whispering.

"Did...Did I make him into...?"

The prince shakes his head, hugging her even more tightly.

"No," Xie Lian whispers, not letting go, even when the princess falls to her knees, sobbing. "This wasn't your fault, Hudie."

And hearing—

Hearing her name spoken with kindness, it—

Zhu Xin falls to the ground with a clatter as she turns her head, crying against his shoulder.

"I...I am so sorry," she chokes, clutching the front of his robes. "If...If I had stopped him, back then...You...you never would have..."

Xie Lian keeps one arm wrapped tightly around her back, stroking her hair.

"If you had stopped him, I would have remained the Prince Who Pleased the Gods until the end of my days," he admits, feeling her shudder with guilt.

"...And I might not have ever met San Lang again."

If Xie Lian had to choose between those two things, well—

That makes it easy.

"...I have to finish this," She whispers, catching her breath as she looks up at Bai Wuxiang—bloodied, held back with her butterflies.

For now.

"...No," Xie Lian shakes his head. "You don't."

He rests the side of his head against hers, squeezing her shoulders tightly.

"He's already taken enough from you, Guoshi Tonglu. You don't owe anyone anything else." Xie Lian whispers.

She shudders, and--turns to the side, wrapping her arms around him in return.

Xie Lian falls silent, breathing in through his nose, trying so hard to remain composed, because—

Being in her arms reminds him of being held by his own mother.

"...You remind me so much of my Bolin," she whispers, hugging him fiercely.

"He was good natured, too."

It's strange for Xie Lian to remember that now.

It might have been more than two thousand years ago, but...

Xie Lian is her last living direct descendant.

He might have expected her to find that a little disappointing, but...

That certainly doesn't seem to be the case.

And...

That makes her the last blood relative he has left that isn't...Qi Rong.

Even if the link is distant, and they've never met before today, he...

Xie Lian finds himself hugging her back just as fiercely, his own throat suddenly tight with emotion.

Eventually she lifts her head, sniffing. "I...I have to take care of him, I can't hold him like this forever...and he...my boys..."

Xie Lian nods, squeezing her reassuringly.

"He'll be held responsible for what happened to them. I promise. But..."

Xie Lian looks towards the doors of the Kiln, staring blankly through the dark.

"You have children that are still out there," he reminds her quietly. "And they need us."

Zhao Beitong turns her head towards the door, lips trembling.

Hua Cheng and He Xuan.

She was so jaded and distrusting, when Hua Cheng first came to the Kiln. Refusing to ever forge another ghost king again. Believing that he would only become another weapon in Jun Wu's arsenal.

But...he changed her mind.

He beat her.

And in the centuries since...he's proved her wrong.

So, so wrong.

He changed the sky itself, making it pour tears of blood.

He forged a safe haven for their kind, a place where all lost souls can find shelter.

And he protected children who died too young.

Just like hers .

Zhao Beitong, in all of her life, has never been so proud of anything.

"...Once...once he exits the Kiln again, he'll be even stronger," she whispers, her voice hoarse with emotion. "If I let you out, he'll..."

"This is only a shard of his soul," Xie Lian whispers back. "If you kill him here, he'll just merge with Jun Wu again."

Which, in turn, would also make him stronger.

The only way to deal with the two halves now is to keep them separate—and kill them at the same time.

If they do—he might be finished for good.

"...When you leave here..." Zhao Beitong glances up at Bai Wuxiang hatefully. "You'll forget any connection between this thing and the Emperor. He's cursed his own name."

Xie Lian grimaces.

He guessed that might be the case.

But...

He glances down at his palm, thinking.

"...I’ll figure it out," he answers confidently, leaving her startled.

"...How do you know that?"

"I figured out who Hong'er was, despite the curse," Xie Lian explains with a shrug. "I'll figure this out, too."

But...how could he be so certain?

He squeezes her hand.

"Trust me."

Besides—he's already got a decent hint.

Zhao Beitong stares at him long and hard, before taking a deep breath.

"I can't leave the boundaries of the Kiln—not unless I'm inhabiting someone else's body. I'll try to keep him here as long as I can, but once he gets past me..."

Xie Lian tilts his head to the side.

"...Could you possess me?" He asks, completely willing, despite the fact that he's only known her for a matter of minutes.

Zhao Beitong smiles faintly, biting back a fond chuckle.

"No, child—you're living. It would damage your soul."

She takes a deep breath, her butterflies tightening around Bai Wuxiang as she rises to her feet, lifting her hammer.

"I won't leave this place again until the curse is lifted."

And for that to happen...

Jun Wu and Bai Wuxiang would have to be defeated.

"And...I can't control what he releases to the outside world, once the Kiln is re-opened. You'll have to be quick."

Xie Lian nods, feeling around for Fangxin, lifting it off of the ground—then hesitating.

"...This should be yours," he mutters, handing it to her.

Zhao Beitong stares down at her first celestial weapon—among the most dangerous.

And the blade she has regretted forging the most.

"...I have no need of it," She shakes her head, handing it back. "But you..." She pats the top of his head. "You should have San Lang make you something more suitable."

Xie Lian pauses, smiling back at her.

The idea of a sword from Hua Cheng...actually makes his heart skip a beat.

"Well...if he wants to make me one...then..."

"He will."

She turns back, lifting her hammer.

"You'll have to move quickly. San Lang is just outside. Understand?" She guides him by the shoulders to stand in the correct spot, giving him a direct path forward.

"...Yes," He agrees, reaching up to squeeze her hand.

And then—

He makes the same promise that another young man did, centuries ago.

"When this is over—I promise I'll get you out of here."

"..."

Zhao Beitong smiles faintly, stepping away.

"I hope you are right, taizi dianxia."

CLANG!

Her hammer slams into the ground—and with a slow, violent rumble, the doors of the kiln begin to open once more.

Xie Lian almost smiles, remembering the old saying.

'From the Kiln, only one supreme shall emerge.'

It should be amended now.

To something more like—

' Or, one Heavenly Official who stumbled into the wrong place at the wrong time.'

"NOW, YOUR HIGHNESS!"

The sound of Zhao Beitong's shout sends him charging out, his head aching as he crosses over the Kiln's barrier.

…Parts of his memory blurring.

Just as Zhao Beitong said they would.

But, with his last instance of awareness before the curse takes over—

Xie Lian isn't worried about that.

And once he's out, before he can take a single breath—

Thud!

Arms wrap around him so tightly—he can barely breathe.

"Gege!"

Xie Lian’s feet aren’t actually touching the ground anymore—but he doesn’t care.

Not when his arms are around Hua Cheng’s neck, and they’re holding each other close.

“I did everything I could to get to you,” Hua Cheng’s voice is hoarse, “I thought I was going to go insane…”

“It’s alright,” Xie Lian assures him, craning his neck so he can press their foreheads together. “I wasn’t alone. And Zhao Beitong—she protected me.”

There’s so much more he needs to tell him, but—

Hua Cheng leans back, looking him over—and his expression darkens.

Xie Lian isn’t mortally injured, but…

He’s certainly worse for wear.

One cheek is badly bruised—a split lip, cracked ribs, a stab wound in his torso…not to mention where he was hit in the chest…

“…I’m sorry, your highness, I—”

He falls silent when Xie Lian’s mouth presses against his—a soft, gentle kiss. Far more shy than he was when he first confronted Hua Cheng about his identity, but—

The point of it is more to reassure Hua Cheng, than anything else.

“Don’t apologize, San Lang—you saved me.”

It’s funny—back in the old days, he used to be the one promising Hong’er that, if he worked hard enough, he could be the one protecting Xie Lian one day.

And now that they’re here…

His heart swells with pride at the thought.

Hua Cheng only seems slightly mollified, pressing his lips against Xie Lian’s cheek to heal the bruise there, one of his butterflies swooping down to deal with the wound in his stomach.

Xie Lian jumps slightly, arms tightening around his neck—and the ghost king pulls back.

“…If that’s too much for his highness, we can wait until you get back to Xuan Zhen,” he mutters, sounding slightly bitter about the idea—

But Xie Lian shakes his head, smiling sheepishly.

“No, no—I’m just…I think I’m a little…”

“What?”

“…Ticklish,” he admits.

He doesn’t think there particularly odd—not when Hua Cheng quite literally has a butterfly on his stomach at the moment—

But something about it makes the ghost king chuckle—half amused, half exasperated.

“…Even when you’re wounded like this?”

“Well—”

A low rumbling starts behind them—growing rapidly until Hua Cheng has to tighten his grip on Xie Lian’s waist to keep him standing.

“…Is that Bai Wuxiang?” He mutters, hands against Hua Cheng’s chest. “Is he escaping already?!”

Hua Cheng shakes his head, the empty socket where his right eye once sat flaring with light as he looks around.

“No—Zhao Beitong’s strength is on par with my own. She can hold him for a little while.”

“Then what is it?!”

“…Just because she can stop Bai Wuxiang from exiting the Kiln…” Hua Cheng mutters, pulling Xie Lian away from the Kiln doors, “Doesn’t mean she can stop everything.”

“…Is it going to erupt?” Xie Lian stumbles beside him as Hua Cheng guides him down the path.

“He’s trying that, too—but he won’t be able to breach the main magma chamber—I made sure of that.”

Even if the volcano does erupt—he can’t trigger another eruption like the kind that destroyed Wuyong two thousand years ago.

Not while Hua Cheng is holding it back, at least.

Xie Lian’s mind flashes back to being in one of Bai Wuxiang’s temples, and Pei Ming making a comment about Hua Cheng being adept in fire magic—only for the ghost king to shrug it off.

‘I dabble.’

Enough to hold back a volcano?

Xie Lian opens his mouth to ask, but before he can—there's another violent tremor, this time so strong, Hua Cheng has to jump, briefly lifting them both into the air in order to avoid it.

"...Then what is it?"

"The Souls of Wuyong," Hua Cheng answers grimly.

Watching as a different kind of eruption begins to build.

One of resentment.

"...He's releasing them."

Xie Lian's stomach drops as they descend low enough to find one of the travel arrays that forms the escape route, passing through.

"What will happen when he does?!"

"They'll spread across the continent like a disease," Hua Cheng keeps glancing back over his shoulder as they run, keeping an eye on the mountain. "Attacking cities first. Possessing and corrupting mortal souls, spreading sickness..."

"...Like human face disease?"

Hua Cheng hadn't wanted to say that specifically—knowing how it would make Xie Lian feel.

"It's possible, your highness."

But he doesn't deny it, either.

"...I have to report this to the emperor," he mutters frantically. "He'll have to descend, this time..."

Hua Cheng scowls at the mention of Xie Lian returning to the Heavens —to Jun Wu in particular.

"We'll have to discuss something before you go. But for now—we need to focus on getting out of Tonglu in one piece."

BOOM!

Which is easier said than done.

Hua Cheng is remarkably quick, moving Xie Lian as they flash from one travel array to the next—

But for the magic to be effective, there has to be at least a kilometer between each entry and exit.

And at this rate, they won't...

"HUA CHENGZHU!"

Xie Lian's chest lurches with relief as he turns his head in the direction of the shout.

"SHUO! ARE YOU ALRIGHT?!"

Hua Cheng looks over, finding the demon barreling across the plains behind them—

And, conveniently enough, he's brought their ride.

"I'M FINE!" They have to scream to be heard over the rumbling of Mount Tonglu, the air becoming so thick with resentment, Xie Lian almost chokes on it. "WHAT THE FUCK DID YOU GUYS DO?!"

"IT WAS BAI WUXIANG!"

The mention of that makes Shuo, a child of Xianle, grow ashen.

"...HE'S BACK?!"

"I'LL EXPLAIN WHEN WE GET OUT OF HERE!" Hua Cheng barks.

(If they get the chance, that is.)

"...WHERE'S LANG QIANQIU?!" Xie Lian cries, looking around for his aura, suddenly twisted with worry for his student, but—

"HE CAPTURED QI RONG!"

There's another loud rattle from Mount Tonglu, and he screams—

"HE DIDN'T LIKE BEING AROUND DIAN DIAN WHEN HE'S LIKE THIS, SO HE WENT AHEAD—HE SHOULD BE OUT BY NOW!"

"YOU SHOWED HIM THE ESCAPE ROUTE?!"

"I DIDN'T THINK DIANXIA WOULD BE HAPPY IF HE GOT FRIED!"

Shuo glares at Hua Cheng, the darkness in his cheeks coming purely from the exertion. "I WAS BEING CONSIDERATE!"

(Obviously.)

"...WHAT'S WRONG WITH DIAN DIAN?!" Xie Lian cries out, suddenly concerned for the panda spirit, until—

Hua Cheng wraps an arm around his waist, and with a single leap, they land behind Shuo, riding on the panda's back.

Now shifted into his true form—

The Vengeful Forest Demon, Sen Dian.

Larger than two elephants, fangs bared, roaring as it charges ahead.

Barreling across the plains faster than Hua Cheng could run—

(Run while guiding a blind man and respecting his dignity just a little too much to carry him.)

And devouring any resentful spirits in their path with a snap of its jaws, roaring ferociously.

Shuo glances at Hua Cheng over his shoulder, covered in soot like the rest of them, and in spite of the situation—

He smiles impishly.

'What did I tell you, gege?'

Hua Cheng rolls his eyes, holding Xie Lian close as he keeps them both steady.

'...That a pet would be useful.'

'I guess you could say he made this situation more... bearable ?'

Hua Cheng stares back at him flatly, sliding his eyepatch back in place, unimpressed.

'We'll see if you still think it's worth it when Tai Hua and Heaven's Eye end up in a duel.'

'...SHUT U—!'

BOOM!

Behind them, a black column of cursed energy spews from the caldera of Mount Tonglu, forcing Sen Dian to take a winding path to avoid falling boulders.

Xie Lian's hands both fly up, covering his ears to protect them from the sudden, sharp explosion of sound.

'Hold on, your highness,' Hua Cheng's arm tightens around him, allowing Xie lian to press one side of his head against his chest, more effectively dampening the sound against the thicker material of his robes, covering the other ear with his free hand.

'We're almost there.'

Shuo glances back over his shoulder, looking the two of them over.

It's not like they weren't all over each other before—they were—but now, there's something far more...comfortable about the intimacy between the two of them.

Like...there's an understanding, almost.

Does...

Shuo's gaze turns to Hua Cheng, who is far too focused on Xie Lian's discomfort to notice.

...Does Xie Lian know?

They slip through the last array, and now, with all of those authorized to activate it exiting range—it shimmers and disappears behind them.

Xie Lian lifts his head as Hua Cheng helps him down, breathing the air curiously, finding that...

This place feels so...familiar.

"YOUR HIGHNESS!" The sound of Feng Xin's voice makes Xie Lian sigh with relief, squeezing Hua Cheng's hand before he goes to him.

"Did you manage to deal with Bai Wuxiang? Were you hurt?" He places a hand on Xie Lian's shoulder, looking him over.

"...Not badly," Xie Lian shakes his head. "It's a long story—he's trapped in the Kiln for now, but it won't last. Did you send word to Jun Wu?"

"We tried, but no communications have been going through," Mu Qing's voice drifts over as he walks up the forest path, looking the two of them over with faint relief. "We couldn't even ascend to the Heavens—something is blocking entry and exit."

"...What?"

"I don't know how long it's been going on," Mu Qing mutters, scratching the side of his head. "But ever since we got out of Mount Tonglu—it's been silent. And that was more than a day ago."

...An entire day?! Xie Lian was really in the Kiln for that long?

There were benefits to the delay—Mu Qing was able to heal all of Pei Ming's injuries, and they were able to purge Pei Su of whatever foul concoction he'd ingested, but...

Xie Lian turns back to Hua Cheng, fretful.

"If we can't get a hold of the Emperor—which cities will be targeted first?"

"...Anything with a high enough concentration of humans," Hua Cheng explains, stepping in behind him. "Places like the Imperial City, Qinghe, Gusu...maybe as far north as Langling."

Xie Lian stiffens at the mention of Gusu, his thoughts flashing to Shi Qingxuan, but…

"…How can we possibly defend that wide of an area?" He mutters.

"You don't," Hua Cheng's answer is simple—and seemingly brutal, until he explains.

"The only way you can actually stop it would be by eliminating Bai Wuxiang—anything else would be a temporary measure."

Xie Lian frowns, thinking.

"...If that's the case...then it's more complicated than just having the emperor descend..." Xie Lian mutters. "I...when I fought Bai Wuxiang inside the Kiln, I saw..." He winces, rubbing the side of his head—straining to remember it clearly.

"...The Bai Wuxiang we know...is half of a split soul," he explains carefully, making Mu Qing and Feng Xin stiffen with shock.

Pei Ming, who has been relatively quiet up until this point, looks up.

"How did you learn that?"

"...It would take too long to explain right now," Xie Lian sighs, still struggling to remember. "But...I don't remember who his other half is, I..." He winces. "I don't know..."

Hua Cheng eyes him for a moment, watching the strain it's taking on his god—and squeezes his shoulder gently in reassurance.

"We'll figure it out, your highness."

He says that—but how could he be so sure?

Xie Lian bites his lip, still visibly worried.

How can they even begin to assess the situation, when they can't even reach the Heavenly Emperor, much less figure out the identity behind that mask.

A face blurred in Xie Lian's memories, but…why?

That's when he pauses—remembering there was something else. Something he had to do, the moment they got out.

Hua Cheng reaches down, tucking a piece of hair behind his ear.

"Don't worry, your highness. Give yourself a moment. Whatever it is…"

"It's not that."

Xie Lian frowns, twisting his head around.

"I was supposed to ask…"

Then—

BOOM!

BOOM!

BOOM!

BOOM!

BOOM!

There's a series of loud bangs—no, almost like the tolling of a bell—followed by flashes of blinding light.

…Heavenly light.

And when it clears…

All of the heavenly officials who were once standing around are gone.

Leaving only Pei Su and Banyue sitting on the ground some distance away, staring at the now empty clearing around them in shock.

"…He…really used that?" Pei Su mumbles, shocked.

Hua Cheng, by comparison, is notably less curious.

More like enraged .

Stomping over and grabbing the fallen official by the front of his robes—giving him a harsh shake.

“WHERE ARE THEY?!”

Pei Su swallows hard, rattled by the harsh treatment.

“His majesty—Jun Wu used a spell to summon the entire Heavenly Court,” he answers hoarsely. “But he…he’s never resorted to that before.”

A tactic he would only use in a desperate situation.

But Hua Cheng isn’t afraid. Not the way Pei Su is.

He’s livid .

“H…Hua Chengzhu,” Banyue murmurs, watching as the Ghost King turns away from them, E’Ming slicing into the ground furiously—

Forming a new travel array.

“Where are you going?”

E’Ming flies back to his waist as he begins to step through.

“He wouldn’t summon every official.”

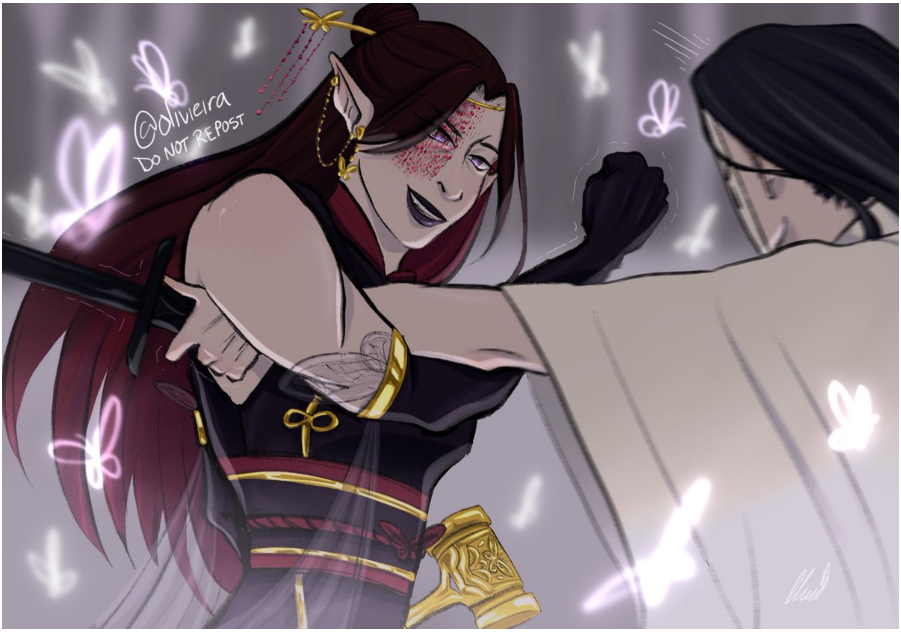
ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or use without permission.



@olivieira
Do NOT REPOST

CREDIT: OLIVIEIRA

Chapter End Notes

Thanks to Olivieira for their beautiful artwork!

xoxo, Evie

Unmasked

Chapter Summary

> "Your highness!" Feng Xin cries, staggering to his feet, hurrying to his side. "Are you alright?!"
>
> "I...I'm fine," Xie Lian mutters, taking his friend's arm gratefully as he helps the prince rise to his feet. "Just... dizzy..."
>
> "All of that noise was probably too much," Mu Qing mutters, standing beside them with his arms crossed. "What the hell is this?!"
>
> They're in the Grand Martial Hall—surrounded by countless other Heavenly Officials, all of them disoriented, loudly voicing their shock, when—
>
> "I would like to apologize to all of you for bringing you back so abruptly."
>
> Finally, the emperor's voice breaks over the crowd.
>
> "A series of critical matters came up at once, and I'm afraid the full court will be required to address it."

“Lessons are dismissed for today.”

Such words seem odd, coming from the mouth of a man who is barely older than most of the students in the room—

But he speaks so sagely, none would question his authority.

And yet, as the students begin to clear out—one remains.

“Master Lan?”

His teacher glances over at him, raising an eyebrow as he oils his Guqin.

"What is it?"

His disciple squirms slightly, half in discomfort, half in righteous indignation.

Which means whatever he has to say—it's bound to be interesting.

"It's about the new student."

Lan An's other eyebrow raises to join the other as he sets down his oiling cloth, waiting.

"I've been training her privately for some time. She's only new to you."

"...But what's the point of her even being here?" His student glares.

"Explain yourself clearly."

"...I understand that you train men and women," he grumbles, crossing his arms. "Which makes no sense to me, given that we're a martial sect—but whatever."

"Then what has bothered you so much about this?"

"...I had to train for YEARS to be accepted to the advanced level!"

He throws up his hands, exasperated. "And I would UNDERSTAND if she was some sort of prodigy—but she ISN'T!"

"...Given that she only started with the basics when I began training her, she's actually doing passably well."

"Well enough for the advanced group?!"

He glares at Lan An, balling his hands up into fists. "I came here to train with the best—not spoiled girls from rich families, who just wanted to learn cultivation to pass the time!"

"..." Lan An sighs, shaking his head.

"If I only accepted the best in the advanced group, I wouldn't be teaching you."

That stops the young man in his tracks, his jaw going slightly slack.

"If you make assumptions about that which you cannot know, you are doomed to fall flat."

The student falls silent, staring at him in faint, dazed surprise.

"...You...but...she doesn't..."

Lan An stares, watching as the young man flails to find a complaint to latch onto, his pride searing from that comment.

"...Could you at least make her dress appropriately?!"

"Appropriately?"

"She dresses like a MAN!" He snaps, shaking his head. "It's ridiculous!"

"...Have you tried on women's clothes?" Lan An raises an eyebrow. "I imagine they would be difficult for training."

"Have you, sir?"

No—but Xiong Li...

Lan An shakes his head.

"Regardless of your opinion—she won't be here for more than the rest of the year, one way or the other. Until then, I expect all of my students to be treated with respect."

Outside--the very student in question has taken to a rooftop on the west side of the city.

Knees pulled up against her chest, twirling a closed fan between her fingertips.

"I thought you'd be at your own temple around this time," Xiong Li comments, dropping down onto the roof ledge to sit beside her.

Shi Qingxuan shrugs, spinning the fan a little faster.

"I said hello to gege this morning."

There's no grave she can visit now—instead, she visits his divine statue at least once a day.

To tell him how the day before went.

To tell him that she misses him.

To tell him that she's sorry.

"Then what brings you out here?"

"...It's away from the other students, I guess."

They don't particularly like her—not that Shi Qingxuan can blame them.

Her getting lumped in with the other advanced students is just another example of people making exceptions for her, even now.

"But..." her eyes drift toward the city square below—one of the areas most damaged by the rampage before Xie Lian's third ascension.

However, one part of the square remains untouched.

"I've never seen a statue like that, before."

"Oh?" Xiong Li follows her gaze.

There's an old, long dried well—the top of it piled over with stone, sealed away from the world.

But, kneeling beside it is a hooded figure of stone.

One hand on the edge of the well—shoulders hunched.

Like a man in mourning.

"...That is a very, very old story."

One that their people had forgotten, in the years that the people of Gusu lived in chains, the name of the city changed to Daqing.

But now, with their freedom—old stories are being retold, and lost things...have a way of finding their way back.

"...You've heard about how, during the days of Xianle, my ancestors were sent to rule the city of Gusu?" Xiong Li murmurs. "I told you about that, right?"

"I think so," Shi Qingxuan agrees. If he didn't—then she heard it somewhere.

"...Did you ever think that was odd?" Xiong Li swings his legs slightly. "This far north? Solidly in what should have been Xuli's territory."

Shi Qingxuan never thought about it, no—but suddenly, General Pei's historic campaign seems a bit more...sensible.

"I suppose so," She admits crossing her arms. "I always assumed it must have meant the people of Xianle were there first."

Xiong Li nods, looking at the city around them, bustling, full of life—so different from one year ago.

"Before Xuli unified into one kingdom—Gusu was founded by travelers from the central plains." He looks down toward the statue, lonely, faceless, hunched next to the well.

"And one of them was a martial god."

Shi Qingxuan perks up, curious. "Which one?"

Xiong Li smiles—having forgotten that Shi Qingxuan was a goddess herself for several centuries. So, for her, the odds she might have known the god are quite possible.

"It was before your time—so long ago, we don't even remember his name."

But his name was never necessarily the most important part of the story.

"Back then, there were raiders from the west—constantly abducting women and children from the central plains, never to be seen again. The martial god of the central plains founded Gusu to protect them."

But as the old stories go—the founder of Gusu was a Vengeful god. A widower, whose children had been taken from him.

"...That doesn't look like any divine statue I've ever seen," Shi Qingxuan murmurs, puzzled. "It's so...it looks like..."

"A normal person?"

Xiong Li nods. "That was the intention. In all of the stories—it's always said that he lived among mortals, rather than as a god. And that he made an enemy of the God of Death. He built the Great Walls of Gusu to keep the people safe—but the city has been tested ever since."

That's what they tell themselves, anyhow—and Shi Qingxuan can understand why.

After countless centuries of being targeted by wars, plagues, and most recently being held hostage for over a century by the likes of Wen Jiao—

It can begin to feel like Gusu is somewhat cursed.

"...Why is he sitting beside the well like that?"

"No one really knows that part of the story anymore, I'm afraid." Xiong Li shrugs. "Some people say his child was thrown down a well. Others say it has something to do with his ascension, but...we'll never know for sure."

Shi Qingxuan stares down at the figure, feeling almost...

Similar, in a way.

Lost. Separated from the ones she loves. In a new city, far from everything she's ever known.

Sometimes...grief can feel like sitting beside a sealed well.

"...Lan An says you've been doing well, lately."

Well—yes.

Well enough to save her own life? No. At the beginning of this process, Shi Qingxuan thought she was incapable of cultivating to that level.

Now, she believes she's able to, but that would take...years.

At most?

She has five months. Probably less than that.

"If you ask the other students, he's playing favorites. And..." Her hand drifts down to her stomach. "I think one or two of them have guessed."

She isn't showing through her clothes yet, but...there are signs.

And once those become obvious—she doesn't know if she'll even be able to train with the others anymore.

Lan An wouldn't stop her, no—

But the other students are already...

She looks up at the sky, forlorn—then grows silent and wide eyed.

"...Xiong Li..."

"Yes?"

"...What's..." Shi Qingxuan rises to her feet, taking a step back, her eyes fixed on the darkening horizon. "What's...what?"

The prince moves with her, following her gaze...and when he sees the cloud forming in the distance—his expression grows somber.

"Get inside."

"Wh—?"

"Go to the palace, and don't come out!" Xiong Li orders her firmly, hand flying to the sword at his waist, leaping down from the roof.

"BUT WHAT IS IT?!" Shi Qingxuan calls after him, slightly panicked.

"...TROUBLE!" Xiong Li shouts back.

His sword catches the wind beneath him, carrying him through the streets—and with one signal, the city bells begin to ring, sending citizens running inside.

Gusu might be a city of rebuilding ruins—but it's also a city of survivors.

Xiong Li lands atop the new battlements—some of them still in construction, and in an instant, his cultivation partner lands beside him.

"...Do you know what it is?" He mutters, gripping his sword tightly.

"I tried communing with the Heavens."

"And?"

"Complete silence."

That's never comforting.

"...Did you try Xie Laoshi?" They rarely reach out, given that he's always...tragically busy, but when they do, he always—

"Nothing."

And that makes Xiong Li's stomach sink faster than anything.

"It would seem, whatever this is—we're on our own."

Normally, this is where Xiong Li would make some wry joke about pitying anyone who has to deal with Lan An after throwing off his afternoon meditation routine, but...

As he watches the swirling cloud grow closer and closer, even he doesn't have room for any jokes.

A swirling mass of resentful souls, twisting around the gates of Gusu in a small vortex—

Until one figure steps out, smirking up at them—wearing robes of red and white, his sword gleaming like black jade.

"Well, well, well..." A familiar voice calls out to them.

"It's good to see you managed to crawl back from the dead, Xiong Li."

Lan An stiffens, stepping in front of his cultivation partner protectively—and Wen Sicong smiles.

Son of Wen Jiao, banished from Gusu after his father was killed by Xie Lian.

"You'll be useful, later."

One who saw taking over the leadership of Gusu as his birthright.

"..." Xiong Li's eyes narrow as he steps around Lan An, glaring down at their former captor—the man who watched a city of hundreds of thousands live in chains.

"I told you to stay out of my city, Wen Sicong."

"...Ah, but you see, it's not your city," the would-be prince smiles, leaning against his sword. "I'm afraid I've been told I can take the entire thing."

"Over my dead BODY!" Xiong Li snarls, drawing his sword.

Wen Sicong smirks, eyeing Xiong Li's throat.

As though he's already imagining a new iron shackle there.

"That can be arranged, little prince."

With a roar, and the notes of a guqin—

A new battle begins in Gusu.

Xie Lian struggles to push himself onto his hands and knees, his head spinning—and to his surprise, one of his arms gives out, sending him crashing back down onto the marble underneath him.

Thud!

"Your highness!" Feng Xin cries, staggering to his feet, hurrying to his side. "Are you alright?!"

"I...I'm fine," Xie Lian mutters, taking his friend's arm gratefully as he helps the prince rise to his feet. "Just... dizzy..."

"All of that noise was probably too much," Mu Qing mutters, standing beside them with his arms crossed. "What the hell is this?!"

They're in the Grand Martial Hall—surrounded by countless other Heavenly Officials, all of them disoriented, loudly voicing their shock, when—

"I would like to apologize to all of you for bringing you back so abruptly."

Finally, the emperor's voice breaks over the crowd.

"A series of critical matters came up at once, and I'm afraid the full court will be required to address it."

The rumbling din of voices grows silent—and Mu Qing finds himself stepping closer to Xie Lian's side—

Watching Jun Wu, sitting upon his throne.

Looking down on every single one of them—all like this is some sort of game, and he’s the only one aware of the fact that it’s being played.

Xie Lian rubs his temple, preparing himself to speak up, but—

“First, I would like to congratulate General Tai Hua.”

That gives everyone pause—including Lang Qianqiu himself, staring over at Jun Wu in a clueless state of shock.

“…Me?”

“On capturing Qi Rong,” Jun Wu explains calmly. “No doubt he’s had a role to play in this mess.”

With a snap of his fingers, the jar under Lang Qianqiu’s arm opens—revealing the green ghost in a puff of smoke—

But before he can scream and shout, or start any of his usual nonsense—he’s gagged and chained with spiritual bonds.

"Given that he's responsible for the death of your family...as you requested before, his fate is for you to decide," Jun Wu muses, eyeing the creature at his feet, head tilted to the side in an almost morbid form of curiosity. "Though I'm assuming you'll want to execute him."

Xie Lian winces—not sure if now is the best time to deal with Qi Rong, who is the least of their worries, but certain that his former student would agree—

And yet...Lang Qianqiu frowns, his expression...

Conflicted.

"No, your majesty. I'd prefer to keep him in custody."

True to his word—Jun Wu doesn’t overrule the decision, but he does seem mildly surprised.

“I must admit—after your prior outbursts in court, I’m surprised by this change of heart.”

“…Spending more time in the mortal realm can reshape your priorities,” Lang Qianqiu mutters. “And I was lucky enough to have a Guoshi who taught me the value of mercy when I was young.”

Xie Lian wasn’t expecting the praise, especially not at a moment like this, but…

His lips twitch into a small, soft smile.

Jun Wu’s eyes flicker between the two, wheels turning.

“…I’m glad to see that you and Xianle have gotten on better terms,” he smiles. “It’s always heartwarming to see a student and his teacher mend fences.”

However heartwarming the moment might be—

Pei Ming is uncharacteristically unwilling to go along with the theater.

“Did you drag all of us here to deal with a creature like Qi Rong?” The general speaks up, raising an eyebrow. “Because in that case, it seems like overkill.”

“…Hardly,” Jun Wu replies flatly. “The moment Xianle returned from Tonglu, I realized how dire the situation was.”

While the two of them are caught up in their discussion—Pei Ming showing a rare stroke of defiance—

Xie Lian's attention returns to something else.

Someone who has been standing beside him this entire time—but...

Also, someone who is used to not being seen.

Used to having nobody look his way, when there's something more important going on.

And in that moment—

Mu Qing forgot to hide the fact that his hands were trembling.

Not until Xie Lian reaches for one of them, squeezing tightly.

Mu Qing grows still, looking up—seeing Xie Lian staring at him intently, and even though he can't actually see the look on Mu Qing's face...

The weight of that spiritual shackle as it gleams up at him feels so heavy.

It must be because Mu Qing told him that they needed to talk before Xie Lian returned to the Heavens, but now...it's too late for all of that.

But, before Mu Qing can tell him they should talk later—

After so many years, he finally asks.

"...Did someone hurt you, Mu Qing?"

The question Xie Lian wished he had asked for centuries.

The question someone should have asked, back then—

And all the more, now.

When Mu Qing is oddly stubborn about not returning to the Heavens, despite being cleared of all charges.

When he seems terrified to be here.

"...I..." Mu Qing stares at him, his voice turning slightly hoarse—eyes flickering towards the throne.

Only to find Jun Wu staring right at him.

Calmly—with no malice in his gaze.

And yet, Mu Qing grips Xie Lian's hand even more tightly, swallowing hard.

"...Xianle," Jun Wu's voice calls to him now—and Xie Lian is hesitant to turn his attention, but...

Mu Qing lets go of his hand.

"It's my understanding that you came into conflict with Bai Wuxiang in the Kiln."

"..." The prince takes a deep breath, turning to him. "Yes."

That sends a wave of terrified whispers throughout the Martial Hall.

Gods who remember the terror that the first calamity unleashed upon the world.

What it could mean, that even Jun Wu could not eliminate him completely.

"And I've learned something important."

Xie Lian steps away from the crowd, approaching the throne, speaking loudly enough that everyone in the room can hear him.

"The emperor did disperse Bai Wuxiang eight centuries ago—but he's reformed."

More whispers echo across the hall, petrified.

'...Is that possible...?'

'If...if he can just reform...how can he be stopped?'

"No matter how many times he's dispersed, he'll just reappear," Xie Lian explains. "Because he's one half of a split soul."

Now, the entire hall goes silent with shock—and Jun Wu raises an eyebrow.

"That's quite a shock."

After all—souls like that are a rarity. Only an object of myth and theory.

The suffering and agony someone would have to go through, for such a thing to occur...is almost beyond human comprehension.

"Are you sure, Xianle?"

"I witnessed it myself," Xie Lian confirms. "His other half is likely unable to control Bai Wuxiang's actions—but as long as he lives, the White Clothed Calamity will reform, over and over again."

Pei Ming crosses his arms, taking that in—trying to think of a way around it, but—

There's something odd.

Jun Wu looks... sorrowful .

"...Then I suppose there's only one person we can ask regarding that matter."

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow, but before he can ask who—

Crack!

With a snap of Jun Wu's fingers, a pair of minor martial gods step forward—

Dragging a man in chains.

Mu Qing and Feng Xin both gasp, stepping towards him.

"...Guoshi?!"

Xie Lian's stomach drops as he rushes forward, "Mei Nianqing?!"

But, before he can get to him—

Pei catches him by the shoulder, holding him back.

"Your highness...it's best if you keep your distance."

"...I thought..." Xie Lian tugs at Pei Ming's grip, but doesn't seriously try to get away, trapped in a daze of shock. "I thought you were in Mount Tonglu?! How did you get captured?!"

"Because," Jun Wu clicks his tongue with disappointment. "He followed you to Mount Taicang."

Mei Nianqing locks his jaw as he's forced to his knees before the emperor, his face streaked in grime and cuts.

As though he's already been viciously beaten.

"Why...would he have followed me there?" Xie Lian mutters, confused. "After all of these years, he finally..."

After eight centuries, why would he try to make contact with Xie Lian now?

Clearly it's because of his past connection to Bai Wuxiang—but why wait until it got this far? He—

"...Your highness, do you really want to know the truth?" Jun Wu asks softly—his tone...cautious.

"No matter how painful it might be?"

Xie Lian blinks, taken aback by the question, but...he nods, and Jun Wu sighs...

As though he takes no pleasure from this.

"When we interrogated him, he told us he had come to slay the other half of Bai Wuxiang's soul."

Confirming what Xie Lian had already said, but...

If that was true, why would he have come to Mount Taicang?

“But now, since we have him here…” Jun Wu rises to his feet, boots clicking as he descends from his throne, kneeling before the once proud Guoshi of Wuyong.

His fingertips slide under Mei Nianqing’s bruised, bloodied chin—gently tilting his face up towards him.

And Jun Wu looks so gentle.

So merciful .

As he asks—

“Are you an ally of the White Clothed Calamity?”

And oh—how those blue eyes stare up at him.

With such wrath.

“…Bai Wuxiang has no allies.”

Mei Nianqing stares back with no fear in his gaze—his shoulders straight, even as two martial gods hold his arms behind his back.

“He only has slaves.”

The grip on his chin grows tighter—however subtle the movement might be.

“And what are you?”

Mei Nianqing almost smiles.

He was never the right sort of person for the role he’s been given.

Never the sort to step forward or speak his mind. And of all of his years, he has only enjoyed two of the roles placed on his shoulders.

A father, and a teacher.

If it had been his choice, he would have married the girl from the garden.

Raised their son together.

Died a happy man.

Instead, he is the narrator of a story that was never of his own making.

The one who survives.

The one who goes on, and on, and on.

If there was someone born to speak truth to power, it was not him.

If there was someone with the strength to topple tyrants—that was never his role to play.

If such a person lived in Wuyong, it was Hudie.

But not him.

And yet, life is not so methodical.

It doesn't look into a man's heart before it assigns his fate, and debate whether or not he has the strength to bear it.

If it did, things would never have come to this.

"…I am the one who failed him," Mei Nianqing replies slowly, his gaze never wavering.

"Many times."

But Jun Wu is just one of his failures.

And at the end of the horizon now, having traveled as far and as long as he can—

Mei Nianqing knows enough to understand that he was an inherited failure.

That he was barely a child that day, standing on the cliffs with his own Guoshi.

That the Princes of Wuyong—and their fates—were an atrocity that never should have been laid at his feet.

But it's been over two thousand years—and just as long since Mei Nianqing has been a child.

And if he can't stop it here—

Then the burden will only grow.

And land on the shoulders of someone even younger.

Even more blameless.

He looks toward Xie Lian, his eyes filled…

With so much guilt, regret, and shame.

“…I’m so sorry, your highness.”

Xie Lian grows still, surprised to find his Guoshi addressing him, rather than Jun Wu.

He’s sorry for so many things.

For thinking he was protecting Xie Lian—when all he ever did was fail him.

For not being there, when his student needed him most.

For—

For running from his past; and abandoning the boy in the process.

“…You’re sorry?” Jun Wu muses, curious.

"That's an interesting choice of words."

Mei Nianqing pales, and Xie Lian's stomach drops.

"I didn't—"

"You came to Mount Taicang to slay the other half of Bai Wuxiang," Jun Wu forces Mei Nianqing to look away from Xie Lian, turning his eyes back to him. "Is that true?"

"...Yes..." The Guoshi of Xianle spits out between clenched teeth, almost like he's been forced to.

Jun Wu nods—and then his face turns sorrowful again, asking the next question as though it pains him—

"Is he in this room right now?"

Xie Lian—like nearly everyone else in the room—takes a startled step backwards, practically paralyzed with shock—

"...Yes..."

Jun Wu sighs, hanging his head.

As though this is one of the most difficult things he has ever had to do.

"...I see."

"I don't..." Xie Lian swallows hard, heart rattling in his chest. "I don't...understand..."

"Xianle," Jun Wu lets go of Mei Nianqing, straightening as he turns away from him. "There's nothing to be afraid of—we already have him in custody."

It takes Xie Lian a moment to understand what he means—at first, thinking they have the other half of Bai Wuxiang in custody, but...

Really, he means they have Mei Nianqing in custody. Almost...

As though he's trying to reassure Xie Lian that Mei Nianqing won't hurt him.

Something that had never even occurred to Xie Lian—not until now.

But why would he? Unless...Unless he was...

Nausea swells in Xie Lian's stomach—and if not for Pei's grip on his arm—

His knees would have given out.

"...If the other half of Bai Wuxiang's soul aged and passed—what do you think would have happened?"

Xie Lian shakes his head, every horrible memory he's ever had flashing through his mind, but—the worst of him—

Could any part of him have ever done that...done that to...

"I...I couldn't..." Xie Lian mutters, but—

He doesn't sound sure.

"Mei Nianqing could have gone anywhere," Jun Wu points out quietly. "But he followed your family. When Bai Wuxiang returned—he sought you out."

Xie Lian shakes his head, lips trembling.

Trying to think of a reason—that what Jun Wu's saying couldn't be true, but—

If he's the reincarnation of the other half of someone's soul—how could he prove that he isn't?

And—what other reason could there possibly be for Bai Wuxiang's obsession with him?

Xie Lian shakes his head, color rapidly fading from his face, his shoulders beginning to tremble—

"He isn't." Everyone looks back to Mei Nianqing, kneeling on the floor, in chains--with absolutely no reason to lie.

"What—?"

"It isn't you, your highness." He repeats firmly. "In a thousand years—you could never come close to being anything like him."

Xie Lian falters, his lips parted—and as Jun Wu's gaze turns back to Mei Nianqing, eyes unreadable—

The prince feels someone rush to his side, grabbing his hand—and whispering into his ear.

"It was him."

Xie Lian grows still, his eyes widening as he hears his friend's voice.

"It was him, dianxia."

Answering the question Xie Lian asked nearly a thousand years too late—

'Did someone hurt you, Mu Qing?'

An act of faith, from the most cynical person he knows.

Someone who has never been believed.

To the point where he would rather lash out, run away, or outright lie to avoid...

To avoid that horrible feeling.

Of telling the truth, and having no one believe you.

For a moment that feels like a lifetime, Xie Lian is silent.

Then—

Mu Qing stumbles as the prince pulls him back—moving him behind Pei Ming and Xie Lian, not...

Not saying a word. Not asking a single question.

Mu Qing bites the inside of his cheek, eyes flickering to the back of Xie Lian—to Feng Xin, watching them both in confusion.

"Your majesty."

Jun Wu looks up, in the middle of trying to wrestle a new answer from Mei Nianqing, who has remained stubbornly silent, coughing blood onto the floor.

Only to find Xie Lian standing in front of him.

Back straight, hands at his sides.

"...Yes, Xianle?"

"For many years, I suspected exactly what you did."

Many of the gods stop, turning their attention to the shackled, twice exiled god.

The Laughingstock of the Three Realms.

Startled, because they never...

Realized how naturally his presence could command a room.

When he desires to.

Having become so accustomed to Xie Lian's unassuming, laughable nature for so long...

They forgot it was a choice.

"When I was young, I was arrogant, entitled, and naive," Xie Lian admits. "Not so different from the mindset of Bai Wuxiang."

Xie Lian cannot see it—

But Jun Wu's pupils narrow—just a fraction.

"In many ways, I thought his destruction of Xianle was punishment for my arrogance--just as you told me. That I had caused all of this pain, but..."

Xie Lian lifts his chin.

For centuries, when standing before the emperor, he has only ever bowed his head.

"If I am not the reincarnation of the Prince of Wuyong, as Mei Nianqing just said—after everything I saw in the Kiln...It..."

Saying the words feels like pulling teeth.

Going against everything he has ever told himself.

Everything Xie Lian was ever taught to believe.

"It wasn't my fault."

But the moment he does say it—

This weight, one the size of mountains, one Xie Lian never even knew he was carrying...

Begins to ease.

Jun Wu stares at him, eyebrows slightly raised.

"...That's an inspiring display of growth, Xianle," he replies, half encouraging, half confused. "But I don't know if now is the time or place to discuss—"

Xie Lian, for the first time in his life, dares to interrupt him.

"And if it wasn't my fault," He murmurs--somehow, even without his sight, able to look Jun Wu directly in the eye.

"I don't deserve these shackles anymore."

That was what Jun Wu asked him, months ago—standing in this very palace.

Not if Xie Lian had learned his lesson. Not if he needed the shackles anymore.

If he deserved them.

And now, he has the nerve to raise his eyebrows in surprise.

"...If that's a discussion you would like to have, of course I would be happy to, Xianle," Jun Wu murmurs. "But now isn't the time."

"...He would be an asset to us fighting Bai Wuxiang," Pei Ming finally speaks again, still standing by Xie Lian's side. "It isn't rational to keep him in chains when facing such a threat."

"...That's what he did last time," Feng Xin says, slowly.

Remembering how infuriating it was, fighting a war with their hands tied behind their backs.

Almost as if there was something placing pressure on them from above.

Something that wanted them to lose.

Something that wanted Xie Lian to lose.

"...Taking the shackles off after this much time would be a delicate process," Jun Wu replies calmly. "It's possible that it could harm him. And for now, we need to focus on who we're going to deal with—"

"If it was dangerous, why keep them on him for so long?!" Mu Qing glares.

Jun Wu's eyes snap to Mu Qing, the one who seemed to set Xie Lian off in the first place—his eyes narrowing sharply. But before he can say a word—

Xie Lian lifts one hand, silencing everyone.

"I think I know why," his voice is calm—nonthreatening. "I just have one question."

Of all of those involved--he's the only one who hasn't been accusatory to Jun Wu.

Not yet.

And his tone is calm—enough so for the emperor to ease, finally turning his gaze back to him.

"What is it, Xianle?"

"Where is the Godslayer, right now?"

Jun Wu grows still.

It's the first time he's hesitated, answering a question—but when he does, he sounds as calm as ever.

"I would assume it's in the armory, with the rest of the Heavenly Arms."

"Why don't you have one of your deputies fetch it, then?"

The silence that follows is deafening.

"...I don't get it," Feng Xin frowns, stepping forward to join the rest of them. "What does that have to do with this?"

Jun Wu's expression is smooth, his brows pinched in faint confusion. "I was thinking the same thing."

"Because it's not there." Xie Lian concludes firmly. "Bai Wuxiang had it, in the Kiln."

With a snap of his fingers—Ruoye unwinds.

Not from around his neck, no—but from around his hand .

Showing a gaping stab wound in his palm—one that is still bleeding, however faintly.

"When I left, San Lang healed all of my injuries."

Including the wounds in his stomach and chest—which were far more serious, and would have taken more time and energy to address.

"But this won't heal."

"...That's quite a leap, your highness," Jun Wu replies calmly. "Perhaps he didn't notice it."

"There's no way."

Pei Ming is the one to say it—and when everyone looks at him, the general just shrugs, throwing both of his hands up.

"I'm sorry, but there's just no fucking way."

He traveled with Xie Lian and Hua Cheng for days in Mount Tonglu—and the ghost was healing his scrapes .

Before Jun Wu can respond to that, Xie Lian shoves his hand behind him wordlessly—

For Mu Qing to examine.

The martial god places his hands over the wound for a moment—palms glowing with spiritual power, but...

"...He's right," Mu Qing concludes, pulling back.

"So," Xie Lian shrugs as Ruoye wraps around his hand once more, sealing the wound. "What I'm wondering is—both times that you were supposed to have the Godslayer in your possession, it turned up in the hands of a Calamity, and a god ended up injured—or worse."

Hearing that—Pei Ming goes still, his own gaze returning to the emperor, turning to stone.

Jun Wu glances around at all of them, wheels in his mind turning—

And there's one person in the room who knows him better than anyone.

Who knows that, if there's an explanation—Jun Wu will find it.

He'll make it someone else's fault—and while everyone is distracted, licking their wounds, he'll perfect the edges of his mask once more, sealing it around his flaws once more.

Like a snake, shedding its skin.

But at this moment—he's unguarded. Thinking.

In this moment, under growing pressure, demanding more and more of his concentration—the mask has slipped.

Now—

He's vulnerable.

"I was protecting my family."

Jun Wu pauses, looking down at the man before him.

Genuinely confused.

"...What?"

Mei Nianqing lifts his head once more, blood streaking down his chin from how many times he's tried to say it.

To tell the truth.

But there's at least one secret that Jun Wu can't stop him from telling.

"I stayed in Xianle for thousands of years," Mei Nianqing rasps. "I inserted myself into countless positions in the royal household over the centuries, I trained his highness, and looked after him—because I was protecting my family."

The only family he had left.

Xie Lian stares at his teacher, his jaw slack, and—

His throat is tight.

Jun Wu hasn't reacted—hasn't processed what Mei Nianqing actually means, not until he says the words:

"Xie Bolin was my son."

The only surviving son of the Queen of Wuyong.

Born under a star of solitude.

Because his parents loved one another—deeply.

And they always have.

Jun Wu doesn't move.

Doesn't take a single breath.

His eyes never leave Mei Nianqing, who still has the nerve to look him in the eye—without an ounce of shame.

"You...always thought he was your legacy!" Mei Nianqing spits, pointing towards Xie Lian, his arm trembling from the strain of defying him. "But he has ALWAYS been the BEST of her—and NONE of you!"

Everyone else watches in confusion—not knowing who Xie Bolin was, but...

"...You're lying..."

Pei Ming looks back towards the emperor, who has taken one step away from the former Guoshi of Wuyong, his—

His expression is still blank with shock.

"She..."

"...Didn't let her husband touch her, after Zhang Wei died," Mei Nianqing reminds him.

"I wonder if he found it strange, when she suddenly invited him back into her bed."

Now, the general's jaw drops—and Jun Wu—

BOOM!

Does exactly what Mei Nianqing knew he would.

Launching himself forward in an instant—pinning his old teacher to the wall by the throat.

So violently—the wall of the Grand Martial Hall cracks beneath him.

Mei Nianqing doesn't express any pain, his feet dangling slightly as Jun Wu's grip on his throat tightens.

"Temper, temper..." He rasps, offering a bloodstained smile. "You used to have such self control."

Jun Wu's grip tightens, and he barely winces.

"That's...why you tortured that poor child, isn't it?" Mei Nianqing's eyes drift to Pei Ming. "You just...can't keep someone's attention on you...for very long..."

BAM!

The punch cracks his jaw—sending blood splattering.

"...I already sent someone to deal with him," Jun Wu replies, his voice dark.

Slowly, he lifts his head—surveying the shocked, horrified faces of the gods standing around him.

Scales of Retribution

Chapter Summary

> "Well," He lets Mei Nianqing go, letting him fall to the ground, his tone...
>
> Completely different.
>
> "It was a good run." He glances around at the lower officials, all of them pale and horrified, rolling his eyes. "Oh, don't look so scandalized. Do you think half of you would be here if there was some sort of moral requirement to entry?"

Chapter Notes

> CONTENT WARNING: there is a moment at the end of this chapter that could be triggering to those who have experienced sexual assault, please continue with caution.

"Well," He lets Mei Nianqing go, letting him fall to the ground, his tone...

Completely different.

"It was a good run." He glances around at the lower officials, all of them pale and horrified, rolling his eyes. "Oh, don't look so scandalized. Do you think half of you would be here if there was some sort of moral requirement to entry?"

He pulls a white cloth from his sleeve, carefully wiping Mei Nianqing's blood from his hands—making sure to pick it out from underneath his fingernails as he walks away.

"Guoshi, Guoshi..." he sighs. "What did you think was going to happen, provoking me like this?"

He tosses the bloodstained cloth down on his throne, rolling his shoulders, letting out a heavy sigh.

As if all of this has been so exhausting, and now—now he gets the chance to relax.

"It was actually rather cruel, if you think about it. Before..." Jun Wu shrugs, twirling his fingers, working the numbers in his head. "I would have gotten rid of maybe...eight of them. But now..." He leans against the arm of his throne, crossing his arms.

Staring at Mei Nianqing with a look of cold pragmatism.

"I'll have to kill them all."

He tilts his head to the side—finally letting that old smirk come through.

The same look he had on his face the first time he looked his brother in the eye, and called for the guards to bring him a whip.

"But not you, Guoshi. I'll let you watch."

He flexes his fingers, mentally preparing himself—then straightens, eyes fixed on one thing.

Xie Lian.

But--before he can take another step towards him—someone grabs his arm in an iron grip.

Stopping his wrist before he can reach for the prince.

"...Ming Guang," Jun Wu sighs, almost irritated as he turns to look at the general. "How is it that you are always so loyal until the most inconvenient moment?"

"You don't want to hurt the prince," the martial god reminds him carefully—his eyes like steel. "Let him go."

Jun Wu tilts his head to the side, watching everyone else in the room —martial gods reaching for their weapons, civil gods backing away...

And he smirks even wider.

"I never said that I included Xianle in that head count, did I?" He shakes his head, laughing softly.

"I never necessarily wanted to hurt you, either...but at a certain point," He shrugs, "It became a matter of convenience."

It was only a little bit personal.

"Besides," his eyes return to Xie Lian, emotions unreadable.

"I have plans."

Several martial gods seem to take this as a sign, all of them lunging at once, but—

DONG!

A loud, overwhelming sound cuts through the air, golden light flashing through the windows as every single god in the Grand Martial Hall falls to their knees, clutching their ears.

DONG!

Even Pei Ming—his teeth clenched—hand trembling as he still clutches onto Jun Wu's wrist, his strength fading.

DONG!

And with the third toll of the bell—

Xie Lian sees every single aura around him suddenly go dark.

As all of the gods have their powers sealed.

"Xianle, Xianle..." Jun Wu clicks his tongue, disappointed. "You're so, so clever, I'm shocked you never thought of such an important detail..."

His boots thud gently against the marble floors as he walks toward him.

"You've spent so much time with Crimson Rain...I'm certain he's told you all sorts of things about Calamities, so," Jun Wu comes to a halt in front of him, using his boot to press under Xie Lian's chin, lifting his head from the ground.

"This was the worst place to expose me."

And now, Xie Lian has the slow, sinking realization...

Jun Wu is right.

He's at his most powerful in his own territory.

Which, for him—would mean the heavens.

That's exactly why he summoned all of the gods here.

Every possible person that could stand against him is now trapped and powerless in a space where Jun Wu is omnipotent and invulnerable.

Jun Wu stares down at Xie Lian's face, contemplative—then, lifts his head, calling the last name anyone would expect—

"Ling Wen."

Pei ming twists his head around—

And to his shock, there his friend is.

Striding forward, kneeling before the emperor.

"Your majesty."

"There's been a sudden influx of openings in management," Jun Wu sighs, almost bored.

"And I don't think there is anyone who would enjoy eradicating general incompetence than you. Would you like your old position back?"

Ling Wen glances around, surveying all of the gods who mistreated her.

Used her.

Never thanked her.

Undermined her.

She looks at everyone—except for Pei Ming.

"Nothing would please me more, your majesty," she smiles—rather unkindly—rises to her feet, then turns to Jun Wu's deputies and underlings, commanding them as if she never left.

"Imprison the officials in their palaces for now."

They immediately go to do as they're asked—the other gods helpless to move—to even say a word as they're dragged from the room.

Except for Pei Ming, writhing furiously, even as he's too exhausted to stand.

“LING WEN!”

She doesn’t reply, facing away from him.

“You won’t even look me in the EYE when you betray me?!”

The civil goddess crosses her arms behind her back, tranquil.

Not even batting an eye.

“That would defeat the point of stabbing you in the back, Pei-Xiong.”

One of the deputies goes to remove Xie Lian—but Jun Wu holds up a hand, shaking his head.

“I’ll escort Xianle myself. Leave him here.”

Mu Qing and Feng Xin struggle at the sound of that, but—

It’s no use.

Within a few moments, the doors to the Grand Martial Hall shut.

Jun Wu kneels down, almost considerate as he lifts Xie Lian into his arms, carefully setting the god down on his throne.

The prince flinches away when he feels Jun Wu grasp at his hand, only for him to receive a warning squeeze.

“Don’t be difficult, I’m being patient.”

Xie Lian swallows hard, locking his jaw—feeling Ruoye coil and hiss with disgust—but orders it to stand down, slithering back up his sleeve as Jun Wu examines the wound on his hand.

“…He’s always been prone to unnecessary violence,” the emperor sighs. “I’m sorry for that.”

The apology…

Actually seems sincere.

Even if Xie Lian’s skin is still crawling with fear—for the other gods, for Mei Nianqing…

For whatever Jun Wu plans to do next.

“…What are you going to do now?” He whispers.

“…” The Emperor looks up, staring at Xie Lian’s face.

Taking in that fear. The sadness—the shattered trust.

Remembering how it felt, when he was on the other side of this.

“That is entirely up to you, my dear prince.”

Xie Lian doesn’t reply—only swallows hard, sitting stiffly.

“See, I know you don’t want any harm to come to your San Lang,” Jun Wu sighs, always considerate in that way. “But, I also know that you must be worried about your friends, too…so, I’ll give you extra motivation to be convincing.”

“…What are you talking about?”

“I know as much about the Kiln as anyone,” Jun Wu explains, tilting his head. “And I know how clever you are. Do you really think it never occurred to me that you might figure it out?”

Xie Lian doesn’t reply—but—

From Jun Wu’s perspective…

It’s rational.

“You heard five bell chimes when I summoned you,” Jun Wu points out calmly. “Isn’t that right?”

He watches the growing horror on Xie Lian’s eyes.

“But there were only four gods present.”

Xie Lian, Pei Ming, Mu Qing, and Feng Xin.

Yushi Huang took her people home—and Lang Qianqiu wasn’t with them at the time.

“You should know me well enough by now, Xie Lian.”

Crack!

With a snap of his fingers—there’s the sound of rattling chains.

“I always have a contingency plan.”

Xie Lian can’t see the way the figure is dropped down from the ceiling, suspended in spiritual shackles—

But he recognizes the aura.

Vividly green, with a burning core-almost like a flame.

Trembling in pain and fear.

“…SHUO!”

Xie Lian lunges forward—only to be slammed back against the back of the throne, and arm locked around his waist.

“Ah, ah, ah…” Jun Wu tsks, watching the demon with morbid curiosity. “Don’t be difficult, your highness. I’m being patient , remember?”

“…Just let him down,” Xie Lian whispers, unable to stand listening to the ghost’s terrified, pained gasps.

Knowing—

That’s how he was hung before.

“Please—let him down!”

“Hmmm…” Jun Wu strokes his hair. “Will you do as I say?”

“I…”

Crack!

Shuo screams—and Xie Lian—

“YES!” He cries, his voice breaking. “Yes, I’ll do whatever you want—just don’t hurt him!”

Jun Wu releases his fist, and the ghost falls to the ground with a sharp thud!

“Good, now—call him.”

Xie Lian hesitates, his ears turning slightly red.

“…Do I need to give you a little more motivation?”

Xie Lian shakes his head vehemently—and, in spite of everything—

Ren Song pushes himself up on his hands and knees, glaring at the emperor.

“It’s because his password is a proposition, you sick, senile old FUCK!”

Before Jun Wu can lash out in response, Xie Lian squeezes his eyes shut, speaking into Hua Cheng’s private array.

“…San Lang!”

His cheeks are bright red, and almost immediately, he hears Hua Cheng’s response—

Half frantic, half delighted.

‘…Gege? Where are you?’

“The…the heavens,” Xie Lian explains breathlessly—knowing Hua Cheng won’t question it.

Not when Xie Lian had to say that.

Twice.

‘Why bring you up in such a violent fashion?’

“…The situation seemed dire,” Xie Lian swallows hard. “His majesty thought I was hurt.”

“You were,” Hua Cheng points out. “If he was so worried, why did he send you to Tonglu with me in the first place?”

“That’s…a good point,” Xie Lian mutters, swallowing hard. “I’ll ask him when I get the chance.”

There’s a pause, then—

“Is Shuo with you?”

“What?” Xie Lian asks innocently, trying not to think about the fact that Shuo is, indeed, trembling in the corner. “Is he not with you?”

“He disappeared when the rest of you did.”

“…Oh,” Xie Lian lets his worry drip into his tone. "Well...Lang Qianqiu was transported here with Qi Rong...maybe Shuo panicked, thinking Lang Qianqiu would execute him, and now he's trying to find a path up here...?"

Hua Cheng's tone shifts ever so slightly. "...Maybe. But he isn't answering me."

"Well...I'm sure he knows you wouldn't approve," Xie Lian points out gently. "He can be a bit head strong."

"Perhaps..."

"But...if you do get a hold of him, Lang Qianqiu said he didn't want Qi Rong killed—knowing that might calm him down."

"Really?" Hua Cheng asks, surprised.

"That's unexpected."

"...It's impossible to predict what anyone will do in a situation of life or death," Xie Lian points out. "I never would have expected you and Mu Qing to get along so well on Mount Tonglu. People surprise you."

There's a brief, pregnant pause.

"...So, there's really not an emergency?" He whines, sounding absolutely petulant. "I was excited to come and steal you away..."

"I mean, there is an emergency," Xie Lian reminds him with an indulgent, if not slightly stressed laugh. "But Jun Wu is making a plan very soon."

"How soon?"

"...San Lang..." Xie Lian's ears turn an even brighter shade of red as he reaches up, twirling a lock of hair around his index finger. "Don't be impatient, it's a serious situation...be good..."

"...But I only got one kiss from gege before he stole you away."

Xie Lian claps a hand over his face, and in spite of everything, his cheeks are on fire.

"Well...when this is over you...I'll..."

He can practically hear the smile in Hua Cheng's voice.

"You'll what, your highness?"

"I...ah..." Xie Lian clears his throat.

He's more than painfully aware of the fact that Jun Wu is listening closely—and that he's suddenly gotten rather...

Rigid with annoyance.

"Kiss you...again..."

"What a breathtaking offer," Hua Cheng replies breathlessly.

Xie Lian doesn't know whether to laugh or cry.

"Maybe we should talk about this later..." The prince mutters, not sure how much longer he can keep this up—though he has to admit, Hua Cheng making him feel like he might die does help take his mind off of the all consuming existential terror.

"Maybe," Hua Cheng agrees. "But, if gege used his San Lang's password more often, we could talk about this all the time."

Now that Jun Wu has heard that password, he finds the idea infinitely unamusing.

"I, ah...I'll reach out when I'm leaving the heavens again."

Xie Lian promises. "You should go to Ghost City until then...since that's where you would be the safest."

"...Gege is kind to worry about me," Hua Cheng replies softly. "But don't keep me waiting long, your highness."

"...I won't," Xie Lian whispers—his voice just as soft.

Just like that, the connection is severed, and Jun Wu rolls his eyes, pulling Xie Lian to his feet.

"Well, that was absolutely charming," He says, sounding vaguely disgusted. "I suppose I shouldn't be surprised."

He pauses, looking down at Shuo, who hisses in retaliation.

"...And I can certainly tell he was the one who raised you," Jun Wu concludes, staring at Shuo like he might at a poorly trained house pet.

"You said you wouldn't hurt him if I did what you said," Xie Lian points out quickly, standing between them.

"And I won't. For now."

Jun Wu reaches forward, grasping Xie lian by the shoulder as he leads him away, towards the exit of the Grand Martial Hall.

"What happens next is dependent on you."

Shuo tries to start after them, but is stopped by a heavy, stubborn chain around his ankle—glaring at Jun Wu.

Knowing perfectly well that, if Jun Wu harms a hair on the prince's head, Hua Cheng will tear him limb from limb, but...

He isn't in a position to push his luck, watching as the two disappear out the door.

The minute they do, he rolls over, yanking at the chain in frustration.

Then—he realizes something.

Turning his head out the window, listening as the bell tolls.

Suppressing all of the Heavenly Officials across the heavens, but...

The sound isn't hurting his ears at all.

"...I'm not a..." he mutters slow at first, then—

He smiles.

Because Jun Wu can only work off of the information that he has—

Which is that Shuo lost most of his resentment after being attacked by Bai Wuxiang on the Terrace of Cascading Wine.

Which was true.

Until Shuo consumed most of the remaining Ghosts in Mount Tonglu.

Now, he's just as powerful as he was before—if not more so.

And he isn't a Heavenly Official, which means...

Shuo leans down for a moment, pressing his ear to the ground—making sure no one else is coming—then he straightens up, clicking under his breath.

Something small wriggles underneath his robes--crawling down one of his sleeves—

Then, a small, furry little head pokes out, staring up at him curiously.

"Qi Qi," he whispers, looking from the Red Panda Spirit, to the chain around his ankle pointedly. "Hurry!"

The animal squeaks softly in acknowledgment, scurrying down to gnaw at the spirit chains, but...

Even with Qi Qi using all of his force—they don't budge.

Jun Wu must have predicted that he would still have some spiritual power left, it seems.

...But he couldn't have bound everyone in the Heavens like that, and if he summoned every official...

"...look at me, look at me!" he whispers urgently, prompting Qi Qi to look up at him, tail twitching. "...Find Yin Yu, and bring him back here!"

The creature tilts its head to the side, as if to silently ask—

'What if I can't find him?'

And Shuo sighs.

"...If you can't, bring Lang Qianqiu—but that is a LAST resort, okay?! Look for Yin Yu! He probably has snacks!"

And that is all of the motivation Qi Qi needs.

Shuo huffs, laying flat on his back as the red panda scampers off, glaring at the ceiling of the Grand Martial Hall.

He can absolutely see why He Xuan left the first chance he got—this place is miserable .

And...for Xie Lian's sake, he hopes Hua Cheng is quick.

The door of the Palace of Xianle slides open with a soft swish , the Emperor's hand firm in his as he leads Xie Lian to take a seat.

"...You can't really plan on killing all of us," the prince points out quietly. "The mortals would start to notice."

They already have.

The death of the Water Master, the most widely worshiped god aside from the emperor himself, was a once in a generation shock for the mortal realm—

But removing every single god?

"Believe it or not," Jun Wu muses, fingertips trailing down his arm, "This wasn't my plan."

Xie Lian sits silently, his lips pressed together tightly, almost to the point of going numb—

And Jun Wu sighs, leaning back.

"We can both pretend your curiosity isn't getting the better of you, or you can go ahead and ask me whatever it is that you're thinking, Xianle."

"...I saw all of Bai Wuxiang's memories, up until the fall of Xianle." Xie Lian blurts out, almost loathing himself for not being able to hold it back. "I saw...that you swallowed him after Zhao Beitong forged the two of you."

Albeit unintentionally, but she did.

“Yes,” Jun Wu rolls his eyes, hand resting on the back of Xie Lian’s chair. “Lovely woman. What’s your question, Xianle?”

“...I don’t know if you’ll answer me honestly,” Xie Lian admits, hands gripping the arms of his chair tightly.

“That’s fair,” the emperor shrugs. “I don’t really trust myself to answer honestly most of the time either.” He drums his fingertips against the chair’s back, thinking. “How about we make a deal?”

Xie Lian doesn’t decline—waiting for the emperor to explain.

“I’ll answer you honestly, if you do the same.”

He leans down, speaking directly next to Xie Lian’s ear, breath tickling in a way that makes the prince lean away.

“A question for a question. Do we have a deal?”

“…Fine,” Xie Lian mutters, gritting his teeth.

“Then ask away, Xianle.”

“…I know you can’t control what he does when you two are separated,” Xie Lian admits. “But when you have his soul contained in your body…who is in control? Him, or you?”

“…” Jun Wu blows out an annoyed sigh.

“You said you would answer me honestly if I agreed to the deal,” Xie Lian reminds him.

“Yes, well, that’s before I knew you would ask the worst one!” Jun Wu, always tranquil, always reasonable—

Sounds almost childish, snapping at him now.

“Why does it matter?”

“…How could it not matter?”

“Because it wouldn’t make a difference, unless…” Jun Wu tilts his head to the side, watching Xie Lian with a curious light in his eyes.

“…Goodness, Xianle—you’re trying to assess my accountability, aren’t you? How noble. How fair.”

“Wouldn’t you want me to be?”

“…It makes no difference,” Jun Wu steps away from his chair. “If you, by some cosmic joke, manage to defeat me—I’m too dangerous to be kept alive. The threat of Bai Wuxiang’s continued existence guarantees that.”

He isn’t wrong. Xie Lian sees flashes of humanity in Jun Wu, but Bai Wuxiang—

He will never stop. Not until he’s put down.

“I was sentenced to die the day I was born,” Jun Wu recalls coldly. “I don’t care how blameless I may or may not be if the outcome is the same.”

“…It’s not the same,” Xie Lian murmurs, eyes flickering around the room, tracking the sound of his voice as he moves. “Not when you care so much about how people perceive you.”

Jun Wu manages a bitter laugh, staring out the window.

“You mean how they remember me.”

Xie Lian falls silent.

“The only merit in this conversation is over whether or not you’ll execute me like a criminal, or put me down like a dog.”

Jun Wu places a hand on the glass, delicate.

So easy to break.

But he can choose whether or not to do so.

“We made a deal.”

Jun Wu pulls his fingers back from the glass, curling them into a fist.

“…The truth would be that I have no idea how to answer you.” The emperor mutters, turning back towards Xie Lian.

“How much of an explanation do you actually want?”

“All of it.”

He—

He laughs .

“No—no Xianle—you don’t.” He wraps an arm around his middle, hunched over for a moment as he composes himself.

“If you knew everything—you wouldn’t want me to explain myself.”

His stubborn silence is answer enough.

They agreed.

“…Fine,” the emperor sighs, losing his mirth.

“…The person you saw two thousand years ago—the man Zhao Beitong assassinated—he wouldn’t have done any of this.” Jun Wu admits, avoiding the reflections in the mirrors around him.

“But that doesn’t mean he wouldn’t have thought about it.”

Xie Lian can’t really see where Jun Wu is going with it, but he listens.

“…When I was about…five, maybe younger—memories are so blurry, when you’re that age—there was a guard, I’m sure you saw the one—with the hunting knives?”

Xie Lian grimaces, nauseated from the reminder.

“…Yes, you remember,” Jun Wu concludes. “So—when he was doing what he did, I just…couldn’t be here anymore. Sometimes I would be lucky, and I’d pass out—but if I didn't…”

His eyes drift to the side, remembering.

“I would imagine hurting him.”

Xie Lian can’t blame him for—

“But that wasn’t good enough.” Jun Wu mutters. “Because I couldn’t hurt his body more than he had hurt mine. But as I got older, my imagination grew. I thought of ways I could torture him, how he would scream and beg—and it felt good.”

The prince doesn't react—and Jun Wu almost smiles.

"I know you understand that much. I've seen you with Qi Rong."

"...I think anyone would understand that," Xie Lian admits. "It's human."

"No, no..." Jun Wu shakes his head. "When someone hits you, you want to hit back. That is human. When someone hits me, I..." He falls silent, staring down at his hands.

"I want to cut off their hand."

Xie Lian's lips press into a thin line, and the emperor slowly circles the room.

Like, if he's going to be forced to explain it all, he can't be expected to stand still, too.

"It's like...there's a perfectly balanced scale between you, and every other person."

As he speaks, he conjures one up between his fingertips—made from pure spiritual power.

All so Xie Lian can see it.

"And when someone hurts me," the scales tilt to one side, "there's this natural desire to push back. To seek justice. To bring those scales back into balance. But when you do..."

Xie Lian's eyes track the golden scales as they shift back into place.

"Do you notice something?"

The prince eyes them silently, thinking.

"...The other side of the scale never dipped below the balancing point."

"Exactly," Jun Wu breathes, staring at the scales in his hand. "And that's why it can't be enough."

Because even if things were restored exactly to the way they were before, that person never knew what Jun Wu felt like.

They were never brought low .

"Even Blackwater's form of revenge wouldn't go far enough for me."

And that—is admittedly brutal.

"I'm not whole again, while the scales are just even." He explains quietly. "I'm not happy. I'm not better. Not until I take it...just a little bit too far. Until I'm the one who committed the greater crime."

Now, the scales tilt in the opposite direction.

"Because in that moment, they're the one who is weak. At that moment, I become powerful. In that moment—I'm not the victim anymore."

And hearing that—

It doesn't make Xie Lian feel angry or disgusted, even if it should.

It makes him...

Horribly sad.

Because that aspect of Jun Wu—it's by design.

The one who set him on this path in life...

Created a scenario where a child felt that his only way of escaping victimhood was by becoming his tormenter.

In the most literal sense of the word.

"So, when I say I imagined torturing that guard...It wasn't just what he had done to me," Jun Wu snaps his fingers, and the scales disappear. "Physically, he had already done the worst—short of permanently maiming or killing me."

Imagining simple physical trauma wasn't enough.

"I imagined myself killing his daughter."

Now, Jun Wu watches the look on Xie Lian's face beginning to change. Unsurprised—knowing that this is the point where it always gets to be a little too far.

"I imagined myself making him watch."

Because then, he would know what it felt like to be helpless. He would feel the reality of what he did to Jun Wu. What it meant to torture a child.

"And it's not that I hated the girl," Jun Wu shakes his head. "Or that I actually wanted any harm to come to her."

He had no opinion of her one way or the other, back then.

"It was just...she wasn't even a person, when I was imagining it. She was just...a means. I gave her no depth. No consideration to what the broader loss of her life would actually mean—I just wanted to hurt him."

Her personhood was only relevant because her father loved her. And through that love, Jun Wu could cause pain.

More pain than what he had felt.

And when he did, he would feel powerful .

"...But you didn't kill his daughter," Xie Lian recalls quietly.

"No, I didn't."

Jun Wu shakes his head. "I knew it was wrong. And I wanted to be a good person."

But Xie Lian is starting to see his point.

Even back then, Jun Wu always had those thoughts.

He saw it, when the prince whipped his brother for the first and only time after they switched lives.

He chose not to hurt him more than necessary.

But he gave into that urge once—and when he did...it felt good.

He enjoyed it.

"And all through what happened to me, to Wuyong, I always held myself back," Jun Wu recalls quietly. "Maybe if I hadn't, things would be different."

He rests his hands on the back of Xie Lian's chair, contemplative. "But I think it begs an interesting question."

He drums his fingertips—and the prince can feel the movements against his back.

"Say you're a sadist, like me—one with decent self restraint."

Xie Lian is almost ready to debate that last point, but—

"What do you do, if you're immortal?"

He closes his mouth, suddenly brought to silence once more.

Because what do you do?

"If I had lived a normal amount of time, I would have died a normal person, I think."

Because in the first century or so of his life—Jun Wu made mistakes. Mistakes with horrible consequences.

But most of them were manipulations by Bai Wuxiang—and very few of them were ever malicious.

"And in the twelve hundred years that followed—I still tried to be good."

To some extent, he really was successful.

Bringing peace to a warring era.

Raising a new generation of gods—even if it was more of a hollow echo of the Heavenly Court that existed before.

"And then...I met you."

Xie Lian has to fight the urge to snap, closing his eyes.

"Was it...really because of that one thing I said?"

Jun Wu actually snorts, covering his mouth and shaking his head. "Oh, no—no. That phrase may have drawn my attention, but..." He looks Xie Lian over. "A spoiled child using a phrase he doesn't understand...is nothing to me."

Of course—it angered him, but it wasn't the only reason.

"Every...every single thing about you reminded me of him."

Xie Lian doesn't need to ask who he means.

His brother.

"And as I watched you succeed, how beloved you were, I couldn't stop myself from thinking..."

Jun Wu stares at the windows again.

Scowling at the faint, warped image of his own reflection in the glass.

"...Was my entire life meaningless? Could he have succeeded all along? Was my survival Guoshi's last cruel joke?"

Ah.

Xie Lian's hands tighten on the chair.

"It was almost as if...If I could make you fail, I would validate...everything I had been through." Jun Wu turns away again.

"I don't know if the other half of me influenced me to do that. I just know that I've always had those thoughts, even before I was split in two."

"If you've always had those thoughts...then how do you not know?"

"Because—" Jun Wu rubs one hand against his temple. "I already told you—when I was young, I would fantasize about horrible things, and I knew they were wrong, but I never struggled to control myself."

And even after the collapse of Wuyong, when he swallowed the other half of him—trying to erase his own failures—he didn't struggle to control his darker impulses.

"But I...ever since that day, I've...gone through phases," he admits.

Ebbs and flows.

Following a noticeable pattern.

"His voice gets louder over time. My temper gets worse. Those thoughts are more frequent—until they're all I think about—and then, Mount Tonglu opens. He goes his separate way, and I...it's quiet again."

Jun Wu's hand still goes to his temple, slowly sliding down his face.

"That's all there is to tell."

His influence might thin Jun Wu's restraint. Might make him slightly less stable—

But he doesn't think he ever lost the ability to choose .

"...Do you think you would have done all of this without him?"

"I don't know."

As Jun Wu promised—he doesn't lie .

"I couldn't know. But...I know it got easier over time."

Because after spending so long trying not to give in to his worst impulses...

It felt good , just doing what he wanted, no matter how horrible it was.

And the next time that barrier began to thin...the next time he was faced with another familiar, young, talented, beautiful god—

He didn't try to fight it.

He told himself crossing those lines didn't matter anymore—because Bai Wuxiang had already done it.

And if he was going to cross that barrier no matter what Jun Wu did—why waste the effort in trying to hold it back?

"But it doesn't matter if he pushed me or not."

Jun Wu walks back around Xie Lian's chair once more, standing in front of him.

"Because he isn't some alien creature that sprung into existence when my wife cut me apart, Xianle." The emperor murmurs, looking down at him, watching as Xie Lian shrinks back from the truth.

"He's just...the worst part of me, given autonomy." Jun Wu shrugs.

And sure, maybe he could twist himself into knots trying to decipher if he had a chance. If he had been given the childhood he deserved, if life had been fair—

Maybe, he would have been a good person.

Or maybe, he was just always meant to be cruel.

There's no way of actually knowing , but...

Jun Wu looks over Xie Lian's face, watching the way his expression contorts with sadness, disappointment—

And resentment.

...He always has a chance at trying to find out.

"Have I appropriately answered your question, Xianle?"

Xie Lian turns his head away, his jaw locked—but he nods.

Jun Wu bends down before Xie Lian's chair now, bringing their faces level as he looks the prince over, taking in every change in his expression.

"Now, what about my question?"

Xie Lian remains silent, waiting, tense—his knuckles white from where they grip the edge of his chair, terrified that he'll ask something, anything about—

"Do you hate?"

Xie Lian's shoulders hunch, and his eyes grow wide.

It sounds so similar, but—

To both of them, who remember the first and only question he asked eight centuries ago, standing on a battlefield of fallen soldiers of Xianle.

The day he met Wu Ming.

The day Xie Lian gave into his worst impulses.

'Do you hate?'

In asking that question—he's already proven part of his point.

That there's a seductive side to anger.

It wouldn't be hard to control your temper if losing it didn't feel so good.

It's hard, being a merciful god.

Easy to project martyrdom, more difficult to actually embody it.

Xie Lian felt good, being a wrathful god.

He felt strong.

And there are moments when he still almost falls back into his old habits.

Like he did in the Sinner's Pit.

Like he did on the Terrace of Cascading Wine.

Like he almost did, in the Kiln.

"...No," he admits, letting out a shaking breath—not seeing the way Jun Wu's pupils shrink in response. "I don't."

Hatred can't coexist with humility. Not really.

Xie Lian feels anger. He feels hurt. He feels wrath.

And sometimes, he acts on it.

But, nearly every time that he has, he has regretted it.

Maybe, back when he thought he knew everything, that he could do anything, he was capable of real hatred.

But all Xie Lian learned from failing so much was that everyone does.

Everyone gets hurt. Everyone gets angry.

Everyone is right, and everyone is wrong.

And when you know that—

It doesn't mean you forgive every single time, or that you stop feeling angry.

It just means blind, utter hatred is something that you've outgrown.

"...Then I take that to mean that you don't hate me?"

Xie Lian leans away until his shoulders hit the back of the chair, but...he shakes his head.

"Because you know the part of me that was kind to you was genuine too, don't you?" Jun Wu murmurs, watching the agonized twist of Xie Lian's mouth.

"You know why I won't kill you."

"...I really hope I don't."

Xie Lian doesn't actually mean to say that out loud—but it does make Jun Wu pause, raising an eyebrow at him.

"...Then I won't waste any more of either of our time, how does that sound?"

Jun Wu grips him by the chin, so quickly, Xie Lian doesn't even have time to react or respond, forcing him to tilt his face upward.

"Believe it or not, I really don't like wasting time or energy," Jun Wu continues, staring down at the prince as he squirms.

"If I could spare myself--and the other half of me, I suppose—the effort of murdering or undermining every single person you love in order to bring you to heel, that's all the better for me." His thumb strokes over Xie Lian's cheek.

Just under his eye.

"...It's interesting that you think you could undermine everyone I love," Xie Lian replies, his voice calm.

But if his hands weren't tightly gripping the sides of his chair, they would be trembling.

"One of them is usually the one undermining you."

Jun Wu's grip turn's bruising—but his thumb is still gentle.

Tenderly stroking the skin just beneath his lid.

"You know, it is remarkably easy to control someone when they don't try to hide what's dearest to them," Jun Wu explains softly. "And I'm sure, the moment he learns the alternative, he'll hand his ashes to me without a second thought."

Xie Lian grows silent and still, his heart hammering against his ribs.

"See, you actually are a bit of a headache for me, Xie Lian."

His thumb drifts just a little bit higher, brushing over the corner of his eye.

"And if you ever really decided to cause trouble, or got out of these shackles...I would have quite the mess on my hands."

"...You just said you wouldn't kill me," Xie Lian whispers.

And out of everything Jun Wu has done...short of killing him...

Xie Lian can't imagine anything he would do that would be so—

"I don't need to."

His next movement is small, almost innocuous in any other situation.

But it triggers a memory in the recesses of Xie Lian's mind.

One hand drops down, not even touching his skin.

Just resting over the prince's knee through his robes—guiding it ever so slightly to the side.

Reminding Xie Lian of that day.

Blinded by pain, not even a human being anymore, just a mass of screams and tears.

That those men almost did.

What Bai Wuxiang almost let them do.

Watching with morbid curiosity until the ghost fire intervened—knocking one man down the temple stairs, snapping his neck.

Xie Lian grows absolutely still—snapping his knees shut.

And he trembles.

Seeing that his message was heard— loud and clear —Jun Wu keeps his hand there firmly, not moving, not forcing anything.

Just a small, horrifying reminder.

"There is one perfectly easy way for me to ruin your cultivation before those shackles come off, Xianle."

Then, he lifts his hand.

He tucks one strand of hair behind Xie Lian's ear, leaning away.

"But I don't want to do that, understand? So—don't force that decision on me."

He reaches up to touch his temple—clearly hearing something in his private array.

"...I'll leave you to rest, you've had such a distressing few days..." He turns away, walking towards the doors.

"I hope you behave yourself. For your sake."

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or re-use.

[image]

CREDIT: RENHUI

I Just Need You

Chapter Summary

> Xie Lian sinks beneath the water with a heavy sigh, pushing his robes to the side.
>
> He's tried opening the communication array over and over again, mortifying as it is, but...Jun Wu sealed communications again.
>
> He's sure that Hua Cheng must have gotten the point, he left enough clues when they were speaking—and his light hearted reaction was enough for Xie Lian to know he knew something was wrong.
>
> But what if he didn't?
>
> Or, worse—what if he's walking into a trap?

Chapter Notes

> content warning: there is no sexual assault or anything of that nature in this chapter, but there is internal dialogue on grooming and the fear of sexual assault that might be triggering

The doors to the Palace of the Crown Prince slide shut behind them—and when they do, Xie Lian crumples.

Clapping a hand over his mouth, his entire body trembling.

Remembering what Jun Wu said, just now.

That things get easier for him, if he's already crossed certain lines.

And the way he made that threat right now, it was so—so obvious—

He's done it before .

And in that scenario—given the memories Xie Lian did see—

It would have to have been after his second banishment.

And that—with everything he now knows about Jun Wu, how he operates, the real power structure of the Heavens—

It's not hard to guess who.

Xie Lian pulls his feet up against his chest for a moment, wrapping his arms around his legs—

And for just a few minutes, a few, quiet, lonely minutes—

He mourns.

The friendship he once had. The mentor he admired.

Everything he thought he knew .

It's hard to say goodbye to something that used to make you feel safe. A part of your life that always felt like a source of security and comfort.

It's hard, letting that go—and realizing that the only person left holding the reins is you.

That you have to decide from now on.

And no matter how old you are, or what you've been through—

That makes the world just a little more terrifying than it was before.

But, eventually—after shedding more than a few tears—Xie Lian pulls himself out of the chair.

He wipes off his face.

And—given how long it's been since he was actually able to rest, or even clean himself...

He strips down, pulling his hair over his head as he slips into the bath. One that he's never bothered to use until now, but...it's there, and the water is magically heated.

If it's there, and he's as filthy as he is—he might as well use it.

Xie Lian sinks beneath the water with a heavy sigh, pushing his robes to the side.

He's tried opening the communication array over and over again, mortifying as it is, but...Jun Wu sealed communications again.

He's sure that Hua Cheng must have gotten the point, he left enough clues when they were speaking—and his light hearted reaction was enough for Xie Lian to know he knew something was wrong.

But what if he didn't?

Or, worse—what if he's walking into a trap?

As he's contemplating that possibility, he goes to fold his robes, sitting on the floor beside the baths—and when he does, something slips out of his pocket, clacking across the floor.

A set of dice.

"..." Xie Lian feels around, scooping them up into his palm.

Remembering what Hua Cheng said, ages ago—

That if Xie Lian threw a set of dice—no matter what he rolled...Hua Cheng would appear.

The prince rests his chin against the edge of the bath, allowing the dice to delicately slip from his fingers, rolling slowly against the floor.

He has no reason to expect it to work, not when Jun Wu has blocked off nearly every other form of communication—but he has to try.

The water steams pleasantly against his skin as he turns back around, sinking down until only his head is exposed, thinking.

About what he can possibly do to get out of here, if Hua Cheng didn't get the message, what...

Xie Lian shudders, hugging his arms around himself even tighter as he shrinks against the back of the bath, tense with disgust.

What he can do, without risking Jun Wu's threat.

Or...

His stomach sinks as he dunks his head under the water, holding his breath.

Xie Lian might just have to risk that as a personal consequence.

Given how high the stakes are—he can't cower away from doing anything just—

Just to avoid his own suffering.

No one deserves to be forced to risk the possibility of going through something like that—even he doesn't, Xie Lian can admit that—

But if the alternative is doing nothing, and watching as the rest of the Heavenly Court is slaughtered—

That isn't really a choice.

So, if that's the case...

Xie Lian presses his hands to his face, head pounding as he forces himself to think.

The only way they can do anything is if the gods—the useful ones that haven't sided with Jun Wu, at least—escape from the Heavens.

But how?

How are you supposed to escape a space where someone is all powerful, when that's the person who is refusing to let you leave?

And he—

Xie Lian pauses, goosebumps tingling unpleasantly down his spine as he remembers one horrible, nauseating fact;

All of the baths he took with Lang Ying, when the child was staying in Puqi Shrine.

Something that seemed absolutely harmless at the time—but now, knowing who it was the entire time, what his intentions were...

Xie Lian tightens his hands around his head, stomach churning.

And, oddly enough—

It isn't his choice to lift his head above water, suddenly coughing and wheezing, trying to suck down air.

"Y-Your highness!"

And...to his shock...it isn't his voice that comes out of his own mouth, either.

"...Shi Qingxuan?"

"Hahaha, it WORKED!"

"How..." Xie Lian sputters, wiping at the water dripping down his face, "How are you doing the soul switching spell right now?!"

"Well..." Shi Qingxuan trails off, scratching the side of Xie Lian's head.

"What?"

"If I tell you..." Her voice turns...sheepish. "You'll judge me."

Xie Lian pauses, his eyebrows knitting together.

"I'm not exactly a judgmental person."

She can't argue with that, he never has been, but...

Shi Qingxuan turns his body around, crossing Xie Lian's arms over his chest.

"...He Xuan visited me before I left the Heavens."

"..."

It must be a comical sight, watching Xie Lian visibly have a conversation with himself, gasping and pointing at his own chest indignantly.

"See! You're JUDGING me!"

"No, no—!" Xie Lian waves his hands frantically. "I was just—surprised you sounded so familiar!"

"...I'm having his child, dianxia," Shi Qingxuan points out, her tone just a little bit dry, even if she's far too fond of Xie Lian to actually needle him.

"I know—"

"You know how those are made?"

"I—obviously—!"

"We're on a familiar basis!"

"I just—!"

Xie Lian coughs, shaking his head. “I thought you two weren’t on good terms after what happened!”

That finally seems to calm Shi Qingxuan down, and after a moment…

“…We weren’t. But he came to see me after gege…” even now, her voice cracks, saying the word, “…died.”

She takes a deep breath, trying to shake off the sadness before it can settle in.

“…He told me that he didn’t kill him, and I believed him. He…wants to make things right.”

And to her shock—

“I believe that.”

Xie Lian accepts it—immediately.

Without question.

“…You do?”

Xie Lian was never convinced that He Xuan was the main culprit behind Shi Wudu's death.

"I saw him in Blackwater Manor, when I was trying to help you talk him down," Xie Lian reminds her quietly. "I don't think his first act after learning he was a father would be... that ."

Murdering his child's only uncle would be a bad place to start.

But that's not the only reason.

When Xie Lian looked back on the events leading up to that day...

There were so many moments where Blackwater very clearly hesitated, with only one clear explanation for it.

He was in love with Shi Qingxuan—and as much as he hated her brother, he didn't want to hurt her.

And even if he could set that aside, knowing what. he does now...

There's one person who had far greater motivation to displace Shi Wudu from power than Blackwater ever did.

That's the one thing that never really occurred to Xie Lian before.

It's easy to forget, because he wasn't a martial god—but in terms of Spiritual Power, Shi Wudu was only second to Jun Wu himself.

More powerful than Mu Qing and Feng Xin—

Even General Pei, in some ways.

By getting Shi Wudu out of the picture before he passed a third Heavenly Calamity—Jun Wu...

He would have been acting in his own self interest.

"...Well...After he explained as much as he could, he gave me these black little spiritual candies for emergencies, and I—"

"Is there an emergency?" Xie Lian cuts her off, suddenly fretful—remembering what Hua Cheng said before, when Bai Wuxiang began to release the souls from within Mount Tonglu.

That Gusu would be one of the targets.

“…Sort of,” Shi Qingxuan agrees. “That’s why I took one of the candies—I can only have a few, y’know—though I don’t think they could possibly make the baby turn out any stranger than—“

“Shi Qingxuan.”

“RIGHT, sorry! There’s a horde of demonic souls attacking the city!”

Xie Lian sits forward, water sloshing over the edge of the bath.

“Are Lan An and Xiong Li there?”

“Yes, but your highness—they’re completely outnumbered. We really need assistance from the martial gods!”

Xie Lian’s face falls into his hands. “There isn’t any help coming.”

Shi Qingxuan pauses, her excitement fading. “…What?”

Xie Lian fights the urge to dunk his head underwater all over again.

“The emperor has gone crazy—or—” he winces. “I suppose he’s always been crazy.”

“What are you talking about?!”

Xie Lian knows he can't tell her the exact truth—not with regards to Jun Wu's identity.

It might seem pointless, given how the entire Heavenly Court knows—but the curse is still active.

"…Jun Wu is allied with Bai Wuxiang."

The curse doesn't mean he can't tell Shi Qingxuan which side Jun Wu is on.

"He's sealed off the Heavens—none of the martial gods can escape right now. And, he…"

Now might not be the best time, but Xie Lian isn't sure he'll get another chance to tell her.

"…I think he was the one who taught your brother how to switch fates."

After all—now Xie Lian knows Jun Wu knew the spell.

And it would explain something else that Jun Wu told him once before —

'The Water Master protects our secrets.'

What else could that have meant?

Shi Qingxuan falls silent, and after a moment—

"…You're sure, your highness?"

"Almost positive," Xie Lian agrees, almost startled by how tightly Shi Qingxuan balls her hands into fists.

"…Why would he ruin all of our lives?! What was the point?!"

Xie Lian suspects he might know the answer—but is too guilty to say it.

While they might be very different in personality…

Shi Wudu probably reminded Jun Wu of him .

"…Nevermind," Shi Qingxuan mutters darkly. "Someone called in my communication array just now."

Impressive, since it’s only been active again for a matter of a few minutes, but—

“Who?”

“Crimson Rain Sought Flower.”

Xie Lian sits up again, even more water sloshing out of the bath next time.

“San Lang?! What is he saying?!”

“He wants me to tell you that he’s coming.”

Shi Qingxuan pauses.

“…And he asked if you could please get dressed before he arrives.”

A shocked shriek escapes from Xie Lian’s lips as he sinks down, the water all the way up to his chin.

“He can SEE?!”

“No,” Shi Qingxuan replies, a little smug.

“I just warned him that you were in the bath right now. I didn’t think you’d want to be caught on unawares.”

But Xie Lian’s mortified reaction clearly amused her endlessly.

“…Tell him Shuo is here,” he mutters, his cheeks hot. “He’s imprisoned in the grand martial hall. And—“

His eyes light up with an idea, standing up as he feels around for a towel, wringing out his hair.

“…Can you still contact Blackwater right now?”

“I couldn’t before, I didn’t have enough spiritual power,” Shi Qingxuan mutters. “But while I’m using the candies, I could…why?”

“…I never reported the array in Blackwater Manor to Jun Wu,” Xie Lian explains. “He wouldn’t have known to seal its access to the Heavens. If you can tell him to open it at the right time—we might be able to open an escape route for the gods!”

“…Oh! Okay! Okay!” Shi Qingxuan agrees quickly, bobbing Xie Lian’s head eagerly. “I can do that, your highness!”

Then, after a moment, she adds—

“And don’t you worry about Gusu, either! Just—KICK THE EMPEROR’S ASS!”

“…What?!” Xie Lian shakes his head frantically.

“Shi Qingxuan, I—you just said you needed—!”

“A god!” Shi Qingxuan agrees. “A fake one will have to do!”

“Wh—?!”

Before he can say anything more—

The spell ends, and his head is quiet again.

“…Just what on earth is she going to try to do?” He mutters to himself quietly.

If he had any spiritual power left, he would use it to use the spell again—

But most of it was burned up fighting Bai Wuxiang in the Kiln.

The best he can do now is pull himself out of the bath, feeling around for a fresh set of robes, and when he does…

Xie Lian has an idea.

The Palace of Ming Guang has never been so desolate.

“…Pei Ming, Pei Ming…” Jun Wu sighs, hands clasped behind his back. “After so many years of dedicated service—this is rather disappointing…”

The General glares back at him, struggling against his chains.

“Service to who?”

“The Heavens, of course,” The emperor shakes his head. “Ling Wen here made such a passionate case to keep you on as Martial God of the North…such a waste of her persuasive talents for you to spurn the offer without a thought.”

“There is nothing to think about,” Pei snarls. “I wouldn’t be serving the Heavens—it would just be your psychotic vanity project!”

Jun Wu winces, clutching his heart in over exaggerated hurt, shaking his head. “That’s so harsh, General—I was even prepared to sweeten the offer…”

Pei Ming rolls his eyes, wrists bruised black and blue from how fiercely he’s been tugging at his bonds, but—

“I had assumed you would want to see him again.”

The general pauses, glaring distrustfully.

“…See who?”

Jun Wu stares back, eyes wide and earnest. “Your Shui-Xiong.”

Pei Ming freezes, his arms going rigid for just a moment—and Jun Wu watches.

Watches his face go through the rise and fall of hope and despair, only to settle on rage once more.

"...That was real fucking low. Even for you."

"What?" He tilts his head. "I'm not lying."

Ling Wen doesn't say a word either, watching Jun Wu from the corner of her eye—and the emperor shrugs.

"I've been around far longer than either of you can imagine. I know spells about summoning souls. It's possible I could reshape his spirit for you."

"...Right," Pei Ming mutters flatly. "And what would I have to do in exchange for this kind, generous gesture?"

"There's a particularly stubborn group of cultivators staving off the assaults on Gusu and Yunmeng," Jun Wu shrugs, examining his nails.

Some of Mei Nianqing's blood is still there—having dried already.

Pity.

"..." Pei Ming shakes his head with a disbelieving laugh. "Oh, so I just go down and slaughter a couple of cities for you, and I get to keep being worked to death by a genocidal maniac? I'm sold."

Jun Wu shakes his head, clicking his tongue with disappointment. "That's rather harsh, Pei Ming. He certainly would have done it for you. He was rather...cold blooded, that one."

The general smiles.

Wracked with grief, but still—he smiles.

"You didn't know him at all."

Or he thinks Pei Ming didn't know him—and he isn't sure which one is more offensive.

"That's quite an assertion."

"Maybe he would have done it for me," Pei Ming admits. "But if I did that for him?"

Especially if it meant putting Shi Qingxuan in danger?

"He'd skin me alive."

He already told Pei Ming as much, the day he lost him.

That, if it came down to it, and Pei Ming could only save one of them —

Shi Wudu would never forgive him for choosing anyone but Shi Qingxuan.

"But it doesn't matter either way, because you're a goddamn liar."

Pei Ming turns away from Jun Wu, glaring at Ling Wen. "Is this how he dragged you into this? Promised he could bring Shi Wudu back? What? Would that ease your conscience?"

Ling Wen doesn't look at him, bowing her head to the emperor.

"...I'm sorry, your majesty—it seems that this was a waste of your time."

"No, no..." Jun Wu shakes his head, sending Pei one last, almost disappointed look. "I wanted him to say yes, too. You never realize how useful someone is, until you have to let them go..."

But—no matter how long you've kept a hound, or how fond of it you might be—

If it isn't going to listen to you anymore, there's only one thing left to do with it.

"But we do what we have to. Then we move on. You understand that, Ling Wen." He glances toward the door.

"I have to deal with the others. I'll give you two a moment to say your goodbyes. Join me in the Grand Martial Hall when you're finished."

With that, he leaves the two of them alone—the Palace doors slamming shut behind them.

"...You couldn't have just played along?"

"What, and agreed to slaughter two cities?" Pei Ming glares at her, squirming in his chains. "Yeah, no—that's not my style."

She glares at him for a moment before turning away, rubbing a palm against her forehead. "You think I like this either?"

"You don't hate it."

"Obviously I don't hate watching those other incompetent idiots suffer," Ling Wen mutters. "But not you. Not the mortal realm."

"Then why are you helping him?!"

"Because what is the ALTERNATIVE, Pei Ming?! You tell me!" She whips around to glare right back at him. "You expect me to be sorry for not dying a hero?!" She points to the window, at the countless other palaces down the rows of the Heavens. "You think ANY of them would have done it for me?! What's the point in being noble about it when they aren't worth dying for?!"

"She is."

Ling Wen falls silent, growing pale, her cheeks a splotchy shade of pink—mostly from the frustration and the stress, but...

"I don't know what you're—"

"You know Jun Wu will spare her, because she's the only goddess of agriculture, right? You factored that in."

Ling Wen doesn't bother denying it—because Pei Ming knows her. Knows the way she thinks, but--

"...You mean to tell me the two of you actually spoke to one another?"

"We did," Pei Ming acknowledges stiffly. "Thanks for letting me know you were lovers, by the way."

"...It was recent," Ling Wen grumbles, arms crossed tightly over her chest—to the point where her ribs almost ache. "Was I supposed to ask your permission?"

"That's not the point, and you know it."

Ling Wen doesn't reply, her stance rigid—but Pei Ming doesn't look away.

"If you do this, you'll lose her."

She still won't look at him, but Pei Ming can see the muscles working in her jaw.

"She's been able to look past quite a bit about me so far."

The Brocade Immortal, for example—something everyone else was eager to ostracize her for.

"You think she'll look past Jun Wu killing all of us?" Pei Ming shakes his head. "Even if she doesn't blame you—you'll still lose her."

"The Emperor won't—"

"She won't stand by and do nothing, Ling Wen. You know she won't. Even if she's the only one left to oppose him."

And if that's the case, goddess of agriculture or not—

Jun Wu will be forced to kill her.

"...Okay," Ling Wen's nails bite into the meat of her palms. "What, you think just because I love her, I'm willing to die for her? Not everyone is a romantic hero like you. "

And why should she be blamed for that? How unfair is it, to be expected to just die instead of trying to save her own skin? When none of them would—

"You'll lose me."

Finally, Pei Ming sees her flinch, lips pressing together into a thin, tense line.

"...You're practically begging the emperor to kill you at this point—that's not exactly shocking."

"No," the general shakes his head. "If Jun Wu wins, I'll die—but if we win, and you chose to stand beside him...You'll lose me, Ling Wen. I won't forgive that."

Pei Ming, her oldest friend.

Pei Ming, who for so long, was her only friend.

"...We can't beat him, Pei Ming. Maybe Crimson Rain could take care of one half of him, but you heard the Crown Prince. We don't have a way of getting them both."

“And you think you’ll have a better shot somewhere down the road when the rest of the martial gods are dead? You think he’ll risk promoting anyone who has a shot at taking him down again?” Pei counters, “Ling Wen—you’re smarter than that.”

“I’m also smart enough to understand that being alive later gives me more options than being dead later,” she mutters. “Not everyone is ready or willing to make their peace with the idea of going down in a blaze of glory—”

“I know what you did on Mount Tonglu.”

Ling Wen turns away from him again with an annoyed grunt—but Pei Ming doesn’t let up

“When Bai Wuxiang was coming towards the two of you—you gave Yushi Huang and her Ox a chance to escape, and allowed yourself to get injured.”

Her shoulders hunch.

"You can't tell me that you wouldn't do it for her. Or that you'd be standing here, listening to me if you wouldn't do it for me." Pei Ming glances out the window, the same avenue of palaces she's been glaring at so viciously. "They might believe what you're saying, but I don't."

"...If I didn't know it would be for nothing—"

"It's not."

Ling Wen turns her head, finally—

Finding her friend looking up at her earnestly—eyes burning with an honesty that has learned the truth all too well.

All too painfully.

"You don't want to be the last one standing, Ling Wen." Pei Ming tells her sorrowfully. "You don't want to be standing over the graves of your friends, and asking yourself if you made the right choice."

Because no matter what you do—it always feels like a mistake.

In a way, she's already standing over Shi Wudu's grave now.

Wishing she could retrace her steps, like walking backwards through the snow, avoiding making new tracks.

That she didn't have to spend the rest of her life thinking about all of the things she chose to look past.

And Pei is right.

She can't think of anything she wouldn't give to avoid feeling like this .

Living with the things that she could have and should have said, the countless possibilities of how they would have been different.

Or, the ability to live without this weight on her.

"...I know you would do it for me," Pei Ming presses her gently. "Because I would do it for you."

So often in life, the bonds that draw the most attention from the poets and writers of history are the romances. But...

Ling Wen drops to her knees beside him with a heavy thud .

Sometimes, when you find yourself at the edge of the world, on the verge of losing everything—

The one most likely to be sitting beside you is your friend.

Bruised and shackled, his hand finds hers.

Your friend, who stood beside you not for lust, or power...

But for you.

Not seeing you for the overworked deputy of a Civil God, or another beautiful woman to conquer—

But someone of value.

Someone worth fighting for—and dying for.

There's a difference between being a necessity, and being respected.

"...Can you really expect a habitual coward to change her stripes at so late a date?" Ling Wen whispers, staring at the ground with wide, tired eyes.

"You've never been a coward, Ling Wen." Pei shakes his head.

"You're a pragmatist—people usually can't tell the difference."

Her lips curve at the corners tiredly.

"And how do you get a pragmatist to join a suicide mission, then?"

His answer is swift—and certain.

"You tell them it won't be meaningless."

Ling Wen looks up at him, wary—and Pei Ming sits forward, chains rattling.

"I can't promise that we'll beat him, Ling Wen," he admits. "And I know we probably won't make it—but I do know a way to make sure he doesn't have a future in this world." His hand squeezes hers tighter, all warm skin and old scars—familiar.

"But I can't do it without you."

His old friend hangs her head—takes a long, uncertain breath, then lets it out.

Slowly lifting her head to stare at the ceiling, resolving herself.

Then, she turns—fumbling at the locks to Pei Ming's chains.

"Then you had better start explaining, because we don't have long."

Yin Yu slams his head back against the wall, staring at the ceiling.

Of course, he got snatched up here—he had a certain Daruma doll in his pocket at the time.

But of all of the places to imprison him—why did it have to be here?

“Are we not gonna talk?”

“…” Yin Yu wipes his hands down his face with a sigh, chains rattling. “About what, Quan Yizhen?”

From his perspective, there really isn’t much to say.

His shidi stares back at him owlishly, one eyebrow raised.

“Where have you been? I looked for you everywhere.”

“…Yeah,” Yin Yu mutters, some of the irritation leaking into his tone. “I know you did.”

He’s had to avoid him everywhere.

“…I was in Ghost City,” he finally admits with a harsh sigh, curling his legs up against his chest as Quan Yizhen stiffens.

“Working for Hua Cheng?”

Given everything he witnessed in Daruma Doll form, it’s not a huge jump, and Yin Yu doesn’t bother to deny it.

“You think anyone else is willing to take on an exiled official?”

“Me.” He answers bluntly, his eyes always so overwhelmingly sincere.

“…” Yin Yu bites back a groan. “Yeah, well—besides you, he was the only one.”

And that—

That draws a rare scowl from his shidi, sitting back against the opposite wall with a sharp grunt, his curls bouncing with every movement.

“Oh.”

“…”

‘Don’t ask,’ he tells himself.

Don’t ask.

Don’t ask .

Don’t a—

“How long?” His tone is short, clipped—and Yin Yu is the one arching an eyebrow now, feet sliding just a little against the marble floor.

“…Blackwater got me an interview three months into my exile. I’ve been with him ever since.”

That seems to make Quan Yizhen’s expression even darker, bafflingly enough.

“That’s over one hundred and fifty years.”

“Give or take,” the former official agrees, watching him in vague confusion.

“And you’re okay with it?”

“…Okay with what…?”

He couldn’t have guessed at his answer before—but when he hears it, Yin Yu’s mind comes to a screeching, mortifying halt.

“Him and the Crown Prince.”

Him and the—?

On one hand, he’s surprised Quan Yizhen was astute enough to notice that, but—

Why wouldn’t he be okay with it?

"...In case it wasn't obvious, I have no interest or say in what Hua Chengzhu does in his personal life," Yin Yu mutters, staring at Quan Yizhen like he's speaking gibberish.

"That isn't healthy."

"...What? He's my—" Yin Yu freezes, his eyes nearly bulging out of their sockets

"Wait—you think I'm—you think we're—"

If it were possible for him to have a stroke, he would.

"YOU THINK HUA CHENGZHU AND I ARE LOVERS?!"

"...You're not?"

"HAVE YOU LOST YOUR MIND?!"

It's a rhetorical question, Yin Yu is almost certain Quan Yizhen was born insane.

"No."

"I—"

It's the most ludicrous thing that Yin Yu has ever heard.

"What would make you think that?!"

"You never came home."

"I—?" He shakes his head, half baffled, half infuriated. "Quan Yizhen, I was EXILED!"

"That's not what I meant."

Yin Yu is beyond listening, his head spinning out with the sheer mention of that possibility—how infuriatingly stupid it is to even THINK—

"Okay—first of all, Hua Cheng has always, always, ALWAYS been after the Prince of Xianle. Got it? Anyone else may as well not exist."

Yin Yu has spent most of the last century and a half catering to Hua Cheng's every possible need. And every single day, there was ALWAYS discussion of Xie Lian, where he might be, and how to find him.

And once he was found?

Hua Cheng has hardly left his side since.

"And even if he wasn't—you think he would go for ME?"

Quan Yizhen looks up at him with a frown.

"What is that supposed to mean?"

"You've MET the man, haven't you?!"

Part of following Hua Cheng around for a hundred years is seeing just how many people fell to their knees to get the chance to crawl into the man's bed, only to be rejected every time.

"Let me make this clear—if Hua Chengzhu WASN'T obsessed with Xie Lian, he'd probably go for any one of the dancers in Paradise Manor first. Or a princess. Maybe an actor—"

"—But—"

"Hell, he might even go for BLACKWATER, or pretty much any other consenting adult on earth—"

"—Shixiong—"

"—maybe even a few Heavenly Officials, he got on with the Wind Master well enough, so if we're bending the rules of reality to the point where he ISN'T fixated on the prince, sure, he might bend his distaste for them at that point—"

"—you—"

"—Then, he'd PROBABLY just try celibacy until he couldn't stand it anymore, and if he got bored with his clones and we were the LAST TWO HUMAN BEINGS ON EARTH, he MIGHT, just MIGHT resort to THINKING about getting into bed with me!" Yin Yu concludes, his chest heaving.

It might be the most depressing display of self awareness in existence, but at least he is perfectly aware of the fact that he is behind the last possible choice for someone who doesn't even want or need options.

"...Why?"

Yin Yu catches his breath, staring.

"What do you mean, why?!"

"...Is he stupid?" Quan Yizhen's brow pinches with confusion. "You're the best."

Yin Yu stares at him, jaw hanging open, feeling like he's been kicked in the head by a horse, but—

He sighs until he feels completely deflated, head against his knees.

"...Have you still not been with anyone, Quan Yizhen?"

The martial god frowns, not understanding why that matters—but he shakes his head.

"You have to be attracted to someone to have that kind of relationship with them, okay? And there are rules about how that works."

Yin Yu holds up a finger. "First—some people aren't attracted to anyone at all, or only attracted to certain genders. That's the most basic part."

Then, he holds up another finger.

"Second, attractive people like other attractive people. Especially if they're selective."

Hua Cheng is, just objectively speaking, one of the most desirable people there is—and it makes sense that he would be with Xie Lian, someone equally interesting and attractive.

"...I don't get it," Quan Yizhen frowns.

"You—"

"Is he stupid?"

"No—"

"And what about you?"

"...What about me?" Yin Yu mutters, clearly not understanding how that is supposed to factor into any of this.

"Are you attracted to people?"

"I—" The former official pauses, hugging his knees tighter. "—Yes, but that's not—"

"What kind of people?"

"I...Men...I guess?" Yin Yu mutters, half distracted.

It's something he would have been mortified by, when they were teenagers—but after over a century in Ghost City, that's the least scandalous thing about him.

"Have you been with anyone?"

"...I...I don't see how that's relevant—"

"You're the one who asked me the same thing."

Yin Yu closes his mouth, and Quan Yizhen notices something interesting.

He blushes from the tip of his nose first, then it spreads to his cheeks, all the way to his neck.

...Cute.

And then, all of that pleasant realization is wiped away by one statement--

"...Sort of?"

Quan Yizhen stares at him—long enough for Yin Yu to squirm, chains rattling lightly.

"I don't know if it counts, really."

"What do you mean?"

"I don't think I want to get into the weeds with you on that one, Quan Yizhen." Yin Yu mutters, shaking his head. "I've had an encounter."

"...What kind of encounter?"

"THAT kind of encounter, what do you want me to say?!"

"Then how have you not been with someone?"

"Well—because we didn't do that MUCH!" He grumbles, "I think he realized pretty quick that he didn't actually want to get information out of me—"

"Who?"

"...What?"

"Who was it? Did he do anything strange to you?"

In an instant, Quan Yizhen's tone has turned menacing.

"...What? No!" He shakes his head, his face having turned a deeper shade of Crimson than most of Paradise Manor. "I mean—nothing I wasn't curious about, and it was really mostly the other way a—"

"Who?"

"...Blackwater, okay?!" His voice cracks with mortification.

Quan Yizhen doesn't react at first, his face blank as he takes in that information.

"...You mean the one pretending to be Ming Yi?”

"Ah...yes," He groans, covering his face with his hands. "But it was before all of that! It was a couple of months into my exile!"

And to be brutally honest, considering just how many people in the ghost realm—all three realms, really—that Blackwater has taken into his bed for one reason or another...

Honestly, it isn't particularly strange that Yin Yu was almost one of them.

It wasn't bad. Actually, it was really rather nice, until He Xuan pulled him up by the hair, sounding vaguely bored as he asked—

'Actually...how would you like a job, instead?'

A few hours later he was mortified, depressed—but employed.

And has been ever since.

They laugh about it now.

Well. Blackwater laughs. Usually while Yin Yu is in the middle of feeding his demonic fish skeletons, paid with the money that Hua Cheng loaned him in a strange, never ending cycle of debt.

Yin Yu prefers to pretend that his continued status as a virgin is a choice, rather than simply a result of the beginning of the most humiliating—and only—job interview of his life.

Quan Yizhen is silent for a moment, digesting that information.

"...I still don't get it," he finally mutters—his voice pointedly annoyed—to be expected, after what he just learned, but—

"Get what?"

"That doesn't explain why he wouldn't want you."

"I—!" Yin Yu looks up, only to choke and fall silent when he sees Quan Yizhen so close.

"…" He averts his eyes quickly, swallowing down the heartbeat in his throat. "…I don't know what you're trying to say—"

"You're beautiful."

The only sounds that come out of Yin Yu's mouth after that are strangled and incoherent as he shakes his head vehemently.

"You…Quan Yizhen…" his voice trembles.

Filled with so many years of insecurities, an utter belief in his own lack of worth.

"I didn't say all of that because I wanted you to try to make me feel better."

"I'm not—"

"I'm not special!" Yin Yu croaks, shrinking away from him.

"I know that might be hard for you to accept," his voice wavers slightly. "I know it's hard to grow up, and realize the people you looked up to weren't that great. But that's the truth, okay?" His eyes shine with tears in the dim light, shining in through the palace windows.

"I…I've never been special. Not like you. And—" His voice cracks as he hugs himself tighter, shoulders trembling.

"If I couldn't have been the smartest, or the strongest—I wish I could have been the kindest," he whispers.

But he wasn't even good enough for that.

"But I'm…I'm so jealous of everything, and everyone all the time," he croaks, knuckles aching and stiff from how long he's been clutching his shins, throat aching, nose burning from holding back the urge to burst out crying.

"E-Especially you."

Quan Yizhen stares back at him, round eyes from shock.

"…Me?"

"Yeah," his Shixiong rasps, burying his face in his arms. "Because—everything is so EASY for you! You're strong, you're—YOU'RE the beautiful one—and brave—you never get scared of anything! And I—!"

A small, choked sob tears out of him.

"It doesn't matter how hard or how long I try, I'll NEVER be like you! Don't you—?!"

He looks up, a tear slipping down his cheek, ready to look him in the eye, but—

Now, he can't speak at all.

Not with the mouth pressed against his.

And in spite of what he might have expected—not that Yin Yu ever imagined this before, or even wondered—

Quan Yizhen is so careful, kissing him so gently, it aches.

He doesn't pull back very far—and Yin Yu is too dazed to react when he says—

"I don't need you to be strong."

His forehead rests against Yin Yu's, their noses bumping together as he speaks.

"I'm strong enough for both of us."

Just as the fallen god's mouth twists with dismay—

Quan Yizhen kisses him again—just as gently. Whispering;

“I don’t need you to be brave.”

He can be brave for both of them.

Yin Yu makes a small noise in the back of his throat, heart pounding as the shackles around them rattle, his shidi lifting his hand to cup the back of his head, fingers knotting in his hair.

“I don’t need you to be kind.”

But between the two of them—

Yin Yu has always been the kindest.

“You…” Yin Yu gulps, hands trembling as he shakes his head, breathing hard. “You’re don’t know what you’re—“

The next kiss isn’t quite so gentle—lingering—and Yin Yu’s eyes widen, then…slide shut.

Almost irritated that, like everything else—Quan Yizhen is a natural at this , too. Even if it’s to Yin Yu’s own benefit.

“You’re beautiful,” Quan Yizhen repeats firmly, pulling back to look him in the eye.

“And I just need you.”

Not the person he wishes he could be.

Not the person everyone needed him to be.

“You…” Yin Yu’s eyes are half lidded, lips still parted when Quan Yizhen pulls back. “You had a childhood crush, Yizhen, this…this isn’t…”

He’s silenced again, and this time…he doesn’t even try to fight it.

His eyes shut again, the tension in his posture growing slack as Quan Yizhen’s forearms rest on the wall on either side of Yin Yu’s head, caging him in with his arms.

“You don’t have to want me back,” the words are so…self aware, coming from him—they take Yin Yu by surprise.

"But that's how I'm always going to feel."

Not a childhood crush. Not something that once brought comfort and stability, that he craves out of nostalgia.

Yin Yu swallows hard, eyes out of focus as they drift to the side, looking at Quan Yizhen's arms around him.

"J…just how long are these chains, anyway?" He mumbles faintly, shivering when Quan Yizhen's cheek presses against his. "They really aren't that good if you can just cross the entire room—"

"I pulled it out of the wall."

Yin Yu eyes the chunk of stone on the ground behind him, the chain still attached.

"…Of course you did," he mutters, shaking his head. "You…you're really so…"

He looks up at Quan Yizhen through his lashes, unsure.

For the last century, every time he thought of his shidi, it was like his stomach turned into a resentful, agonizing pit.

Lost in his own disappointment, loathing his own ineptitude, but…all this time…

Was he missing him , too?

And Yin Yu—

He doesn't know how he feels.

But he—

His arms slide around Quan Yizhen's neck as he pulls him in, knees falling open as they lean against the wall.

He just knows that they're probably going to die tomorrow.

That Quan Yizhen's curls feel so familiar under his fingers.

He just knows—if he's going to go—

He wants to know what it feels like, kissing someone who thinks he's special.

Even if it's just once.

"You're so stubborn," he mutters between breaths, shuddering when teeth lightly pull at his lip. "You…should've…moved on…"

The next kiss is deeper than the others, a little clumsier—their inexperience finally catching up with both of them, but—

It has Yin Yu's toes curling inside his boots, regardless.

Quan Yizhen's mouth is heavy against his jaw, the side of his neck, his voice raw with feeling—

"I just want to come home."

The words, like everything else about Quan Yizhen, sound so simple—but they aren't.

Still, deep waters.

"…But I was the one who was—"

Yin Yu stops, eyes wide, lips swollen.

And Quan Yizhen was looking for him.

"…You—"

He falls silent, pulling back and jerking his head to the side, staring over Quan Yizhen's shoulder, which just makes the Martial God lean closer to him, protective.

"…Qi Qi?" He whispers.

Quan Yizhen's eyebrows raise. "Who?"

"…Here! Come here!"

A small shape prances forward, crawling into Yin Yu's lap, nose twitching.

"…Is Shuo here?" Yin Yu whispers, pressing his fingers to the spirit's forehead. "Why isn't he with—?"

Then, as he listens to The message it has to tell him, he grows pale.

"…We have to hurry," he mutters, squirming to hold his wrists out to

Qi Qi, offering him the chains. “Can you chew through these?”

“Who’s Shuo?”

“Hua Chengzhu’s ward,” Yin Yu mutters, watching as the red panda starts gnawing in the metal links. “He’s been captured.”

“Is it that important?”

Yin Yu looks up, his eyes burning in a rare instance of passion.

“…He’s a brat—but he’s a good kid. And during my exile—he’s the only one in Ghost City who has always been willing to help me.”

Even if Ren Song was, admittedly, a lot of work.

And the moment Quan Yizhen hears that the demon was good to him—

That’s really all he needs to hear, yanking his other wrist free, allowing Qi Qi to gnaw off the rest.

“Alright. Let’s go.”

Yin Yu stands up, and…

As he walks beside his shidi, there’s a new warmth in his eyes.

Bravado

Chapter Summary

> "Ah, Qi Rong."
>
> The Green Ghost falls silent, for once—snapping to attention when the Emperor's voice echoes from the door.
>
> "I see you've made yourself comfortable."
>
> Qi Rong bows his head, hands clasped behind his back.

"...My, my, my..." A jeering, all too smug voice cackles, his voice echoing through the grand martial hall. "You feeling alright, Ren Song? You look a little...torn! HAHAHA!"

It takes a moment of the demon slowly revolving, suspended upside down, before he's facing him head on.

"See, that was just weak."

Even hanging upside down, his expression manages to be completely unimpressed.

"...Huh?"

"Throwing that pun back in my face when it doesn't work isn't funny , it just makes you look stupid," Ren Song explains, rolling his eyes.

"See, back when I used it, it worked, because Lang Qianqiu had ACTUALLY cut you in half. You using it now just doesn't work."

"...Okay, you know what? FUCK YOU, you LITTLE SHIT! Look how the tables have TURNED! How's THAT?!"

The demon wrinkles his nose, thinking.

"...No, that doesn't exactly work either," he shakes his head. "You'd have to make some sort of joke about me being upside down. OH!" His face lights up. "You should have asked me how I'm HANGING IN THERE! Now THAT would have been funny, HAHAHA!"

"WELL NOW YOU'VE ALREADY SAID IT!"

Qi Rong snaps, crossing his arms. "How am I supposed to fucking use it?!"

Ren Song snorts, rolling his eyes. "You were never gonna come up with that, Qi Rong."

"What the fuck are you—?!"

"Because you're not actually funny," the demon explains, slowly revolving around again. "You're just loud, and you swear a lot. That doesn't make you funny. We talk about it all the time at the yearly meeting."

"...The fuck are you on about now?!"

"Oh," He winces. "The yearly meeting of ghosts people actually give a fuck about. At Blackwater's place…No invite?"

"Oh," Qi Rong rolls his eyes right back at him, "I'm gonna go cry my eyes out, I didn't get invited to the moldiest, most DEPRESSING place on earth!"

"You mean your bed?"

"YOU SON OF A FUCKING—!" Qi Rong's hands ball into fists, cocking one back, but—

"Don't!" Guzi cries.

"Don't hurt him, dad!" He grabs Qi Rong by the sleeve, holding him back. "Shuo gege is a good person! He took care of me!"

"He's a fucking MENACE!"

"You're just mad at me because I'm funny and you're not," Ren Song drawls, revolving back to face him again.

"Last time I checked, you're loud and you swear TOO!" Qi Rong glares. "We're the SAME!"

"No, no," Ren Song shakes his head. "I've got personality. Flair. Sarcasm. Layers , y'know? Face it. Every ghost has to be one of two things: Scary, or funny."

The most basic rule of being undead, you can ask anyone.

"Hua Cheng and He Xuan? Scary. Me? Funny. You? Annoying," Somehow, even suspended upside down, arms chained behind his back, Shuo shrugs. "Ever heard someone say, 'Oh no, this ghost is haunting me, he's so annoying! ' ?"

Qi Rong balls his hands up into fists once again, looking like he STILL wants to throw a punch at him, but—

"Ah, Qi Rong."

The Green Ghost falls silent, for once—snapping to attention when the Emperor's voice echoes from the door.

"I see you've made yourself comfortable."

Qi Rong bows his head, hands clasped behind his back.

"Yes, yes, your majesty was very generous for setting me free!" He simpers, all while Ren Song rolls his eyes.

"...And I see you've been talking with your old acquaintance," Jun Wu muses, his eyes sliding over to the demon.

"Oh," Ren Song wiggles a little, prompting himself to revolve until he's facing the emperor. "You're back! Good. You know, I've just been...hanging around, had time to think—"

(The use of the aforementioned pun makes Qi Rong wince in regret that he didn't think of it.)

"—and I've realized something."

Jun Wu raises an eyebrow, waiting patiently. "Go on."

"Thank you—see, I just don't think I'm important enough to be here," Ren Song explains evenly. "I mean—gods, calamities? All of that is above my paygrade."

He can't really gesture with his hands the way he's used to, which just leaves him wiggling his feet for emphasis.

"And the manipulation you used on the prince earlier? Sublime—very toxic, I was so impressed...but since that's all done with, I think I should go home now—"

"See, if I did that..." Jun Wu tilts his head, crossing his arms. "I'd be giving up another bargaining chip against your father."

Ren Song nearly gags, shaking his head. "He's not my—! Okay, you know what? I see your train of thought there, but he's not gonna care! Really!"

Shuo would be surprised if it was even factored in at this point, honestly.

"You've already got the prince, he's really not going to care about anything else besides that! You really haven't got a reason to keep me around—what's the worst that could happen if you send me—?"

Jun Wu reaches up, grasping the demon by the hair—stopping him from rotating any further as he looks him in the eye.

"I think I'll take my chances. Besides—I've promised you as a gift to Qi Rong here, when this is all over with."

Slowly, Shuo's expression turns sour with annoyance.

Then he smiles, saccharine.

"...You know, from this angle? I don't care what everyone else says, the receding hairline isn't that noticeable at all."

Qi Rong nearly falls over with the effort not to let out a shocked laugh.

“…Oh, I see what this is,” Jun Wu muses, his grip tightening in the boy’s hair until he winces. “You’re trying to get me to disperse you, rather than draw out the torture. Or is it because you think it will motivate your master even more?”

He tilts his head.

"I don't know if that's noble, or pitiful."

Ren Song breaks character for a moment, lips pulling back over his fangs.

"I suppose you'd have more experience with the latter, wouldn't you?"

Something about the man just makes his skin crawl.

He reminds Shuo of his father.

His actual father.

Jun Wu doesn’t say more—but seems to have lost his patience with indulging the conversation any further.

Crack!

With one snap of his fingers, the demon’s screams echo across the hall—cries of total agony.

"...Say, Qi rong," Jun Wu looks down at the green ghost, raising an eyebrow. "Why don't I go ahead and reduce him to a ghost fire for you? That would be karmic justice, don't you think?"

Qi Rong is abnormally quiet—eyes sliding from Jun Wu, to Shuo—trembling in his chains.

Then, to Guzi—whimpering and hiding behind his sleeve.

Tears welling in his eyes.

"...Nah," he shakes his head, reaching up to pick at something between his teeth with one of his claws. "I'm planning on eating him, see? Loses all the flavor if you turn him into a ghost fire."

Jun Wu shrugs, not seeming to particularly care either way.

“Suit yourself. I have one more visit to make—and a delivery to receive. Do with him as you will.”

Leaving the two ghosts glaring at one another.

“…Aren’t you gonna eat me now?”

“I’m saving you for LATER!”

Jun Wu walks away as their voices fade, taking in the tranquility of the streets, devoid of any other gods.

He almost thinks he might prefer it this way. And now, he’s close to having the Heavens to himself once more.

As for the mortal realm, well…He’s set things into motion.

WHACK!

“Ow!” The teenager grumbles, dropping down onto one knee, rubbing the back of his leg. “Why do you always have to hit me like it’s for real?!”

The older cultivator takes a step back, twirling a wooden sword between his fingers.

“Training should be realistic.”

“…I thought martial gods were supposed to be the ones who used swords,” Jin Feng grumbles, rising to his feet.

“There are exceptions to every stereotype,” the cultivator shrugs. “Especially if there’s a martial god willing to teach you.”

Jin Feng shakes his head, rolling his shoulders to work out a day’s worth of bruises. “And you did?”

Shi Wudu smiles faintly.

“The best.”

For once, it’s a quiet day in Lanling—the sky a pale shade of blue—the wind crisp, but clear.

One of the few days in the winter that has everyone in the city venturing outside. Children playing, parents drying their laundry—

Or, in their case, training.

“Couldn’t I have…a cultivation path with more meditating…and less swords?” Jin Feng pants, exhausted.

“…Maybe four centuries ago,” Shi Wudu rolls his eyes. “But cultivation has been going in a more martial based direction. Ever since…”

He trails off, losing his train of thought—staring at something over Jin Feng’s shoulder.

“Ever since…what? Pei Yuan? You listening?”

The wind starts to pick up, reading through the loose strands of his hair, blowing past his face.

Chimes hung on roof eaves begin to ring—and Shi Wudu’s expression turns dark.

"…Get inside."

Jin Feng pauses, sword half raised. "…Huh?"

"Find your sister, and get inside!"

Since arriving in the city of Lanling, the cultivator known as 'Pei Yuan' has kept a relatively low profile. Always keeping his voice lowered—his hood pulled up and over his head.

Now, he throws it back—barking out orders with a commanding air that has Jin Feng rushing to obey.

At first, one of the alarms in his array was tripped on the south western section of the city border.

That could be disrupted by something as minor as a ghost fire—not something to worry about.

Now? It's the entire western half.

And the sky…is growing dark.

"…Shit…" he mutters, turning on his heel, running back towards the Temple of Ming Guang—trying to figure out how to warn them as best as he can—

They're the only trained group of cultivators in the city, aside from the temple of the Heavenly Emperor.

And he won't go there.

The majority of the citizens just stop and stare at the clouds forming overhead, unsure of what to make of the sudden change in weather, and—

Given that he's known as the local exile who tried to drown himself twice, Shi Wudu knows they won't heed his warnings to go inside.

BANG!

The temple doors slam open, banging against the walls as he charges inside, startling the group within—deep in the middle of their afternoon meditation.

"...Excuse me, young man!" The head cultivator rises to his feet, "What is the meaning of this?!"

"The city is under attack!" Shi Wudu shouts, pointing out the door. "If you don't force the civilians to get inside now, EVERYONE is going to die!"

"...Uh..." Deng Su laughs awkwardly—but not really.

More like in the sense that he wants to seem affable—but he's really snide.

"...It looks like someone's been hitting the wine a little too hard again, kid—HEY!" He shouts when the teenager grabs him by the front of his robes.

"I've had just about enough of you, you incompetent fucking brat," Shi Wudu hisses, eyes flaring.

"I'm—" Deng Su sputters, attempting to writhe away from him, "I'm OLDER than you!"

"No," Shi Wudu shakes his head. "I'm over four HUNDRED years old, and as far as I am concerned, I am SURROUNDED by ignorant children."

"...He's really lost his mind..."

"Did he ever have it?"

"Look," Shi Wudu whips his head around, glaring at the head priest. "You're out in the hinterlands, so odds are word hasn't reached you yet—but Mount Tonglu opened weeks ago. Every single time that happens, the Emperor opens a blockade. This time—it failed."

"...How would you even know that?!"

" Because ," the teenager snaps, shouting over them, "Ming Guang was sent to Mount Tonglu personally. He said as much to Jin Feng when he visited the temple a few weeks ago. That would be a last resort for the emperor."

Or, an attempt to get Pei Ming killed.

"He would have sent the General there to prevent the birth of another ghost king—but there is a massive cloud of resentful souls over the city, which means...it failed."

And that could very well mean...

"...And we're just supposed to take a madman at his word?!" One of the disciples mutters, staring at Shi Wudu distrustfully. "I know General Ming Guang ordered us to give him assistance, but he's clearly INSANE!"

"You don't have to take me at my word," Shi Wudu mutters.

"Yunmeng would have been alerted first based on its location, and they probably sent riders out to warn all of the other heavily populated cities. Since we're the furthest out, our warning would come last, but it should be getting here at any—"

BANG!

Speak of the devil.

The doors slam open, just as they did before—with a young cultivator in purple robes staggering through—

Clearly, as Shi Wudu predicted, a junior from the Yunmeng Sect.

"M-Message for the Head Cultivator of Lanling!" He cries, falling down in exhaustion.

A scroll is clutched between his fingertips, quickly handed over as one of the disciples from the Langling sect runs to fetch him water.

"I...I'm sorry, I ran as hard and f-fast as I could, but—I...think it's too late," He rasps, lips dry and cracked. "T-They're already here!"

"W...what on earth...?" The Head Cultivator mutters, his own face going gaunt and pale as he looks over the scroll—and Shi Wudu ignores him kneeling beside the boy from Yunmeng.

"Kid—look at me, have you heard anything about Gusu?" He presses, grabbing him by the shoulder.

"Do you know what's happening in Gusu?!"

"I..." He takes several gulps from the flask of water offered to him, trembling. "I think...they were the first city in the east to be hit...they should be under siege by now..."

His eyes drift to the side, where the other cultivators are just finding their bearings—but Shi Wudu snaps his fingers in front of his face, drawing his attention back.

"Don't look at them, they can't help you. Look at me. The cloud—could you see faces inside of it?"

"N...No..." He rasps, shaking his head. "It...It's just...dark..."

"...It's not a plague cloud then," Shi Wudu mutters, turning to the other. "Look—that thing outside is a mass of resentful souls. How many of you are proficient in exorcisms?"

The group turns to look at one another, then, finally, one of the older priests raises his hand.

"When that thing comes down—those souls are going to possess any human being who isn't at a high enough cultivation level, and they'll start killing each other." He explains.

"Your best bet is to get people inside and try to exorcize the rest."

"Wait, you—" the head priest finally looks up from his scroll, just in time to see Pei Yuan march back out the temple doors. "Where are you going?!"

They swing shut—and he receives no answer.

Outside—chaos is already beginning to unfold.

Dark clouds of smoke pouring down from the side, the people of Lanling running through the streets in a panic, screaming.

Shi Wudu elbows through them, pulling his hood back up as he makes his way through the crowds, focused.

With everyone else running in the opposite direction, it's easy for him to make it to the stables, finding an abandoned horse—and just as he starts to toss the saddle over it's back—

"Pei Yuan gege?" He freezes, his shoulders hunched. "Where are you going?"

Standing just behind him in the doorway of the stables, gripping the door frame tightly—

Is Jin Feng's younger sister, Jin Qing.

Hair in two braids, eyes wide and frightened.

"...Your brother was supposed to get you inside," he mutters, not turning back to look at her.

"He..." She swallows hard, glancing back over her shoulder. "...There's something wrong. Are you leaving?"

"...It's nothing personal," Shi Wudu concludes, tightening the straps on the saddles. "But my little sister is in Gusu—and she needs me."

"...But we need you, too!"

Shi Wudu grits his teeth, squeezing his eyes shut. "And that sucks, kid—but you already got one divine rescue. That's more than most mortals get, and I'm fresh out of miracles, understand? She's pregnant, and I can't just—"

"Gege helped you!" Jin Qing croaks, pleading.

"We both did! Every single day since he found you here! You can't just leave him to die!"

"...I'm sorry," Shi Wudu mutters, his voice rough with emotion. "But there are cultivators here, you can pray to—”

"They're useless, and you know it! And—!"

Her voice cracks.

"And you're the only god who's ever answered me!"

She can't see it with his back turned—but his fingers tremble where they grasp the reins.

"If you don't do something—he'll die. Please, you—you don't understand, he's—!" Jin Qing whimpers, tears pouring down her cheeks.

"He's all I have left!"

"..." Shi Wudu's jaw is clenched so tightly—it aches.

He lowers his head for a moment, pressing it against the surface of the saddle.

Two tears falling down his face, silent.

Because he know, even if he moved as quickly as he could—

He probably wouldn't make it to Gusu in time to make a difference.

Because he does understand what Jin Qing is saying.

And he also—

He also knows that, for things to be like this—

Pei Ming is probably dead.

Knowing that—it's like he can't breathe.

He takes two slow, deep breaths, thinking—

This is probably exactly what he deserves.

Exactly what He Sheng felt, all those years ago.

But he...

He exhales, pulling the last strap on the saddle into place.

"Please!" Jin Qing cries helplessly. "You can't—!"

She falls silent, however, yelping in surprise when Shi Wudu turns around, lifting her up onto the horse—climbing into the saddle in front of her.

"You hold on tight—and you do /exactly/ what I tell you to, understand?"

She barely has time to nod, wrapping her arms around his waist before he urges the horse forward, barreling down the chaos of the city streets—

Returning the same way he came.

The Temple of Ming Guang.

"Do you know where Jin Feng is?"

"N-Near the Temple of Wind and Water!"

She presses her face into his back, arms tightening around his ribs—frightened by the sight of people around them, collapsing to the ground, clutching their heads and screaming.

"H-He was acting strange!"

"Okay, okay—don't lift your head, alright?! Keep it down!"

She does as he says, not lifting her face from the back of his robes until they reach the temple steps—and when he dismounts, he keeps an arm wrapped around her head as he carries her inside, covering her nose and mouth until the doors are shut behind them.

Only—

Only to find all of the Cultivators he warned earlier exactly where he left them.

The disciple from Yunmeng is practically passed out on the floor, and the others...Seem to be gathering materials to barricade the doors.

"...Oh my god..." His voice is faint. "...You were really just going to hide in here and let EVERYONE outside die?"

"You..." One of the younger cultivators sputters, shaking his head, "You heard him, it's too late! They're already here!"

"So what, you're not even going to TRY?! This is YOUR city!"

“If we just had to perform a few exorcisms, that would be one thing!” Another disciple cries. “But only one of us even knows how! We aren’t prepared for this!”

“And neither are your FAMILIES!” Shi Wudu snarls, shaking with anger. “They’re the ones DYING OUT THERE!”

And who knows how many will even be left by the time the smoke clears.

“You think we like this?!” The Head of the Cultivators spits. “We don’t have a CHOICE but to wait for assistance!”

“Did you not hear the kid?! There isn’t anyone COMING!”

“If we die here—who will protect the survivors?!”

“SURVIVORS?!” Shi Wudu roars, watching as the men before him shrink in fear.

If Pei Ming was here, this is where he would make a speech.

Something about bravery. Nobility being found in sacrifice.

He's a leader, that way.

Shi Wudu isn't. And he never has been.

He isn't kind. He's loved good men, but he's never been one of them.

"…You think I want to go out there and die for strangers who don't even know who I am?" He mutters, his voice cold. "I'm going out there because it has to get done."

One way or the other. No matter how badly he wants to try to get to his own family.

"And as far as I am concerned, I am surrounded by worthless COWARDS!"

A few of them have enough shame to flinch.

"You better hope I die out there," Shi Wudu growls, fists clenched. "Because if I don't, I'm going to make sure your wives, your children, your parents—ALL of them know EXACTLY where you were when they NEEDED you!"

He looks toward the Head Cultivator, sending him a withering gaze of disgust.

"And I'll find the body of every single person who died on YOUR watch—and I'll make you dig their graves."

"…Forgive us for not being a crazy, suicidal FREAK like YOU—!"

BAM!

The punch lands squarely on Deng Su's nose, breaking it with a loud crunch .

When the cultivator tries to lash out and hit back—Shi Wudu catches him by the wrist, hanging his head with a faint, bittersweet smile, shaking his head.

"I've never been crazy," he mutters, shaking his head. "I'm just stubborn. It takes me a long time to stop and listen."

He lets Deng Su go, closing his hand tightly around something in his palm as he turns away.

It took him a long, long time to listen to the words an old friend once told him.

But once he did—

The world didn't look the same as it did before.

"…Sometimes better to get hurt, or to fail, than become something that you can't live with."

He walks back towards the temple doors, giving Jin Qing one last glance.

"Don't come out until it's over—no matter what you hear. Understand?"

She nods—wide eyed as she watches the fallen god exit the temple—

Standing tall.

And to his surprise…

Someone follows behind him.

Not the cultivators from the Temple of Ming Guang, no—they were a lost cause.

But the messenger—the teenage cultivator from Yunmeng.

"…Aren't you too tired to fight?"

"Maybe," the boy mutters, gripping the hilt of his sword. "But I'd rather go down fighting than hide in there like some rat. Do you… have a plan?"

"…Somewhat," Shi Wudu mutters, running down the steps. "What's your name, kid?"

"Jiang Ning."

Inside the temple, Deng Su sits up, struggling to staunch the blood pouring from his nose—and finally, he notices something.

His ring finger—

It's bare.

"Well, Jiang Ning," the dark haired teenager murmurs, slipping something onto his hand. "You know how to use that sword?"

"…Not as good as my brothers," he admits, hurrying down the steps behind him. "But pretty decent!"

There are countless people running in the streets now—the whites of their eyes and veins in their necks turned black.

Screaming.

Ripping each other apart.

"…THEN DO YOUR BEST TO KEEP THEM OFF OF ME!" Shi Wudu has to shout now, to be heard over the screaming.

"I'LL DO THE REST!"

Not because he's ready, or because he wants to.

Simply because someone has to.

In the streets below, a small boy runs around a corner, only—

Only to find he's met a dead end.

"…"

He turns around, biting his lip as he stumbles backwards, falling to the ground.

"J-Jiejie…" He whimpers, eyes filled with tears. "W-What are you doing?!"

His sister staggers forward, a broken shard of glass clutched in her hand, blood dripping from her fingers.

"Just…stay…still…" She whispers, lips twisting into a lopsided smile.

But it's not her smile.

Not anymore.

"D…don't…" He pleads, trembling as she comes closer.

"J…Jiejie, please…!"

He screams, his back hitting the alley wall as he throws his arms up, eyes shut—

“JIEJIE, STOP—!”

CRACK!

Even behind his lids, the boy can see the flash of light.

And when he opens them, he…

Sees his sister on the ground.

Disoriented, but—

Her eyes are clear again.

“Jiejie!” He sobs, crawling to her side, “Jiejie, it’s me!”

She groans, turning her cheek into his hand when he reaches for her, and…

When the child looks up—he sees a man running away from them.

A cultivator, dressed in black.

And in his hand—is a whip.

One that curls and thrashes like a living thing—a snake that falls down thunder with every flick of his wrist.

And when he brings it down again—

Purple streaks of lightning paint the skies of Lanling.

Shi Qingxuan has never been much of a fighter.

Her brother made efforts here and there, taught her methods of self defense—how to play dirty, if she needed to.

But most of the hard work was always left to him. Shi Qingxuan has learned more about actual fighting in the last months than she has in four centuries.

That being said, there is one thing she has always excelled in.

Running away.

Which she is doing now, to great success.

Leaping over stall counters, sliding through alleyways—dodging demons—rats the size of people in some cases, horrifyingly enough—

And all the while, she pops another black piece of candy into her mouth, wincing at the bittersweet taste, calling out—

'HE-XIONG!'

She doesn't actually know what she expected, calling out for him like this, but—

'Shi Qingxuan?!'

It wasn't for him to answer immediately.

'...Oh...Haha...you actually answered...Hi!'

She dives around a corner just before a giant set of teeth sink into the wall.

'Of course I answered, you—!' He almost calls her a moron, like he normally would, but—

Their dynamic is still a little too tense for that at the moment.

'...What's wrong?'

'Well...hahaha...it's...haha...'

Shi Qingxuan!'

'THE EMPEROR!' She shrieks. 'He's gone crazy! Lost his mind! He's working with Bai Wuxiang!' She repeats everything Xie Lian told her in a messy jumble, running into an empty building—only for the creatures to charge in after her. 'All of the gods are imprisoned in the Heavens right now!'

'...But you're safe?' He Xuan asks slowly—and Shi Qingxuan knows him. Better than he'd ever want to admit, and she—

She can hear that he isn't surprised. Able to move on from that news without asking any questions.

'Uh...haha...yeah! I'm fine!'

'...Shi Qingxuan...'

'But—Xie Lian said you could use the array in Blackwater Manor to open up an escape route for them!' Shi Qingxuan recounts breathlessly, hurrying up the stairs. 'Is that right?!'

'...I could,' He Xuan agrees cautiously. 'But that means it would take me more time to get to you.'

'...That's fine!' Shi Qingxuan bursts through a door leading onto the rooftop, pumping her arms. 'I don't need you! We're fine!'

'...We?'

She takes a running leap, /barely/ catching the next rooftop with her fingers, arms trembling as she pulls herself up.

'Yes, we!'

She rolls onto her back, breathing hard, one hand on her stomach.

'We are FINE! Haha...'

His silence is doubtful—and Shi Qingxuan is already winded, but she forces herself to sit up.

The rats chasing her don't dare to make the leap, left snarling and flailing on the ledge of the opposite roof, eyes gleaming.

'...Look, you know me,' She mutters. 'I'm the biggest crybaby ever. If I was in danger, don't you think I'd be begging you to come save me?'

He still doesn't seem particularly convinced, and she gives up on that.

'And even if I wasn't—saving me is kind of pointless if our son is born into a world ruled by a psychotic god in cahoots with Bai Wuxiang, don't you think?'

'...cahoots?'

'YEAH, HE-XIONG! CAHOOTS!'

Shi Qingxuan pulls herself to her feet again, using small amounts of spiritual power in her feet as she leaps from one rooftop to the next.

'I've got Lan An and Xiong Li here to keep me safe—you focus on getting his highness and the others out of there!'

He Xuan can't say that isn't the best plan–-because it is , and they don't have another choice.

If Jun Wu manages to wipe out all of the martial gods—then that's it.

Game over.

'...I just...before you go, I need you to tell me something.'

'What?'

'...What did Jun Wu do to my brother?'

The silence on the other end of the communication array is long—and telling.

And it's so conflicting.

All of the pain and distrust she feels towards him. The anger and shock she has about Jun Wu.

Her grief for her brother.

Every single bit of it is pulling her in a different direction, and yet—

She can't help but feel an ache in her chest, when she hears He Xuan's voice. A reluctant sense of longing.

Some part of her that, in spite of everything, feels safe when he says her name.

But even if this might be the last time they ever speak—

Shi Qingxuan needs to know.

'...There are things I can't say, Shi Qingxuan,' He Xuan's response is quietly remorseful. 'I promised.'

For just a moment, she stops running.

'...Then what can you tell me?'

'I...can tell you that your brother was in a lot of pain.'

He said that before, when he came to her in the Heavens—but...now, she knows who was causing it.

'I can tell you he felt trapped. And...that the emperor hurt him…badly.'

She flinches, holding a hand over her mouth.

'But I can't say any more than that.'

She knows, but—

It's telling to herthat even if it meant risking his own life, with every single god hunting him...the first thing He Xuan did was get Shi Qingxuan away from Jun Wu.

No matter how risky it was.

And knowing that, all she can think of is—

'He'd never let me go.'

How hopeless her brother sounded that day in their palace, when Shi Qingxuan suggested that they could just go, leaving the Heavens and everything else behind.

And she—

Shi Qingxuan can't stop thinking about what she said.

Words she's desperately wished she could take back ever since—and now, she never can.

'I wish he wasn't my brother.'

He probably died believing that.

And—knowing He Xuan wasn't the one who killed him—that her brother did that to himself —

Was it her fault?

Did he leave…because he thought she didn't want him to come back?

The guilt is gnawing and heavy—and she—

Shi Qingxuan doesn't know how to live with it.

Other than being…

The sort of person he would have wanted her to be.

'…Shi Qingxuan?'

'…Right,' She lets out a shaky breath. 'Okay—I just have one other question.'

After her first, he's a bit wary.

'…What is it?'

'So…the bracelet you gave me…'

She wipes her hands down her cheeks, looking at the black bangle sitting on her wrist, veins of gold running through it.

'What about it?'

'Is it…like…pretty durable?' She mumbles, spinning it round and round.

'…What?'

'I mean—it's sturdy, right?'

'…As sturdy as anyone could reasonably expect? Why are you—?'

'So…stronger than your average metal, right?'

'Shi Qingxuan.'

'He Xuan.'

'Why are you asking me this?'

'Why aren't you answering the question?'

'Because it's a bit nerve wracking for OBVIOUS FUCKING REASONS?!'

'I'm obviously not asking because I WANT to break it!' Shi Qingxuan whines. ' Think of it as more of a precaution!'

'Against what?!'

'He-Xiong!'

'…FINE, it's sturdy, happy?!'

'YES, THANKS, GOOD LUCK ON THE ARRAY IGOTTARUNBYE

HAHAHA—'

'SHI QING—!'

The connection goes dead.

"…Okay," Shi Qingxuan mutters, pressing a hand against her stomach. Barely able to feel the small swell there, but—

It grounds her.

"It's just you and me, baobei," She mutters, pacing on the rooftop. "I need you to be a team player, so don't make me throw up again, okay?"

She's honestly shocked that she was able to get this far without getting sick already. The moment Shi Qingxuan found out about her baby—everyone immediately treated her as though she had, in an instant, become incredibly fragile.

But…weirdly enough, since coming to Gusu—she's actually in better physical condition than she was as a goddess.

Xiong Li made the point that this didn't make her helpless, and…

Shi Qingxuan locks her jaw, taking a deep breath.

…Maybe he was right.

With three more leaps, she makes it onto one of the balconies leading into the Palace, reaching up to press her fingers to her temples once more.

'Xiong Li?'

'…Shi Qingxuan? Did you make it to shelter?'

'Yes—barely. How's the fight going?'

'We…we can't keep up for long.'

She can hear it in his voice—

Cultivators are dead. A lot of them from the sound of it.

'Okay, I…' She swallows hard, running through the halls. 'I have a plan—no one else has to die today.'

‘…What? How?’

‘You’ll see, just…wait for my signal. Oh—and Xiong Li?’

‘…Yeah?’

‘Xie Lian was imprisoned here for over a year, right?’

‘…We both were. Why?’

‘Which room was he in?’

Once the connection is severed, she skids around the corner, running to the room Xiong Li described, and…

“…Holy shit .”

Shi Qingxuan isn’t prone to swearing.

Her brother always said it was classless—though when he wasn’t in public, he was as prone to cursing as anyone.

But in Shi Qingxuan’s entire life—she has never been surrounded by so many beautiful clothes.

Of every color, pattern, and style.

“…Okay, Okay…” She takes a shaky breath, looking around. "Just...just..."

Her fingers tremble slightly as she pushes her hair back, centering her focus.

"Just try to do it the way he would," she mutters to herself, pulling the back of spiritual candies from her pocket—

Taking three more.

An hour later, outside of the city walls—a battle is waging.

Smoke from dispersed spirits pouring through the air—cultivators strewn across the battlefield, dead and bleeding.

"...I'll admit it," Wen Sicong smirks, wiping the blood from his sword. "You fight well for a dog."

Lan An stares him down, not stained by a single drop of blood.

"It's funny...a few months of freedom, and you people start to think that you actually matter ," he sneers, shaking his head. "You were born to serve my father—to serve ME!"

Lan An's reply is one of utter calm, in spite of the death and destruction around them.

"Even a dog would never serve a jackal."

Wen Sicong's eyes widen, his mouth twisting with rage.

"You..." He hisses, shaking his finger in front of him. "You're funny , you know that?"

The pained moans and screams of humans and demons alike echo around them.

“But you know this is pointless, don’t you?” He sighs. “No matter how many you kill, Bai Wuxiang will just send me more.”

Until eventually—even the great city of the north will fall once more.

Lan An’s eyes narrow slightly, prepared to say—

“Then so be it—“

“NO!”

Both men fall silent, looking to the right as Xiong Li dives between the fighting, waving his arms.

“No need for that!”

“Wh—?”

“WE SURRENDER!”

Just like that—everyone around them grows still.

“…What?”

Lan An’s eyes narrow. “Xiong Li—”

He’s the one with the most at risk. Wen Sicong will just kill the rest of them, but Xiong Li—

He’ll use Lan An’s partner to imprison the city again—keeping him alive as the lock to a cage.

“You were right!” He pants.

“We’re outnumbered—and we—we could never rule Gusu,” he explains, face flushed with exertion as he stands before Wen Sicong—the exiled prince watching him curiously.

“That’s why—our leader has granted you an audience!”

Wen Sicong raises an eyebrow. “…Leader? Isn’t that you?”

"You...you said it yourself, right?" Xiong Li lifts his head, raising an eyebrow. "We...we wouldn't have any idea how to rule ourselves ...we're just..." His eyes slide over to Lan An, silently speaking into his array.

'Trust me.'

"...Born to obey."

In a matter of minutes, the screaming across the city grows silent—the hordes of monsters retreating behind the city gates, watching with beady, hateful eyes as Lan An and Xiong Li walk through the streets, leading Wen Sicong and his officers.

"...I have to admit," Lan An mutters, watching the men following behind them. "I didn't realize the Ghost Realm had any military structure."

"Oh, they don't," Wen Sicong sighs. "They're all disorganized savages I'm afraid. But that's going to change with new management."

"...I wonder if Hua Cheng might have something to say about that," Xiong Li mutters under his breath, leading Wen Sicong up the steps of the palace he once called home.

"Oh, he won't have a choice," their enemy drawls, kicking the double doors aside.

"Before all of this is over, Bai Wuxiang is going to string him up and leave his spirit out to fade into nothing...fitting, isn't it? His symbol is the butterfly, after all...and those are so short lived." Wen Sicong muses. "He's lasted far too long."

"...Butterflies are just as often considered a symbol of freedom," Xiong Li points out.

"And rebirth from death," Lan An recalls faintly. "But if you find them so frail, I'm sure they won't frighten you when he comes back."

Wen Sicong freezes in mid step.

"...What?"

"Oh," Xiong Li glances over at him, his eyes round. "Did your master not warn you? Crimson Rain is good friends with our leader. He's here all the time. He might be on his way here now, with all of this mess going on."

"He..." Wen Sicong sputters, his face blotchy. "You...!"

He shakes his head, stomping ahead of them. “You’re both BLUFFING—where is this leader of yours hiding, anyway?! Or are you just stalling for time—?!”

BANG!

The doors directly ahead fly open, a powerful gust of wind bursting forth with a—

WHOOSH!

A few of the men standing nearby are blown off of their feet—leaving only Lan An, Xiong Li, and Wen Sicong standing, gripping onto the doors.

“WHAT THE HELL WAS—?”

“Oh my…”

Wen Sicong grows silent, turning his head to look inside the Grand Hall, and—

Thud!

Perfectly manicured hands grip a gilded fan, snapping it against her palm—painted nails gleaming red.

“I wasn’t expecting such an interesting guest to wind up on my doorstep…”

Thud…

Wen Sicong falls silent, his mouth hanging open as he watches the woman approach him.

Even Xiong Li has to do a double take, because…

He met Shi Qingxuan when she had lost everything. When she was as low as she had ever been.

But now, wearing fine robes, hair delicately arranged, dripping with jewels—

He remembers something rather important.

For centuries—

She was worshiped as the most beautiful woman in the world.

Thud…

She continues walking along one of the surfaces of the long tables—conveniently placing her two feet above the rest of them—

And Wen Sicong swallows hard, clearing his throat.

Half tempted to slap himself—just to shake himself out of it.

"Who…who are you supposed to be?! How are you ruling my city?!"

"Your city?" She raises an eyebrow, snapping her fan open, holding it in front of her face with practiced poise. "It was a gift from Crimson Rain."

"Hua Cheng?!" Wen Sicong sneers. "And why would he give a city to you?!"

"He didn't," she shakes her head, fanning herself. "He gave it to my husband. A reward for their alliance. My dearest isn't fond of it here—so he allowed me to use it as a little getaway. Quaint, isn't it?"

If there's one skill you learn, growing up rich—it's how to make something, even a very desirable fortress city—feel cheap.

"…Who the hell is your husband?!"

"The righteous hand of retribution," she answers softly, watching as Wen Sicong grows paler by the moment.

"When you sit in the middle of the open sea, so terrifyingly vast and alone—he is the fear that you feel.”

She takes another step forward, and Wen Sicong…

He actually takes a step back, watching her distrustfully.

“When you slip under water just a little too long, and you realize that you can’t breathe—he is the pressure that you feel in your lungs.”

Each snap of her fan is crisp and smooth, lightly stirring the air around them, stirring her curls.

And when she finally speaks his name—Wen Sicong’s knees almost buckle.

“He is the Blackwater that Sinks Ships—the Demon He Xuan.” She steps down from the table.

“And I am the only thing in this world that he loves, so,” she tilts her head, eyes glinting dangerously.

“You want to be my friend.”

Wen Sicong’s nostrils flare as he struggles to compose himself, standing up straighter.

“That still doesn’t tell me who you are.”

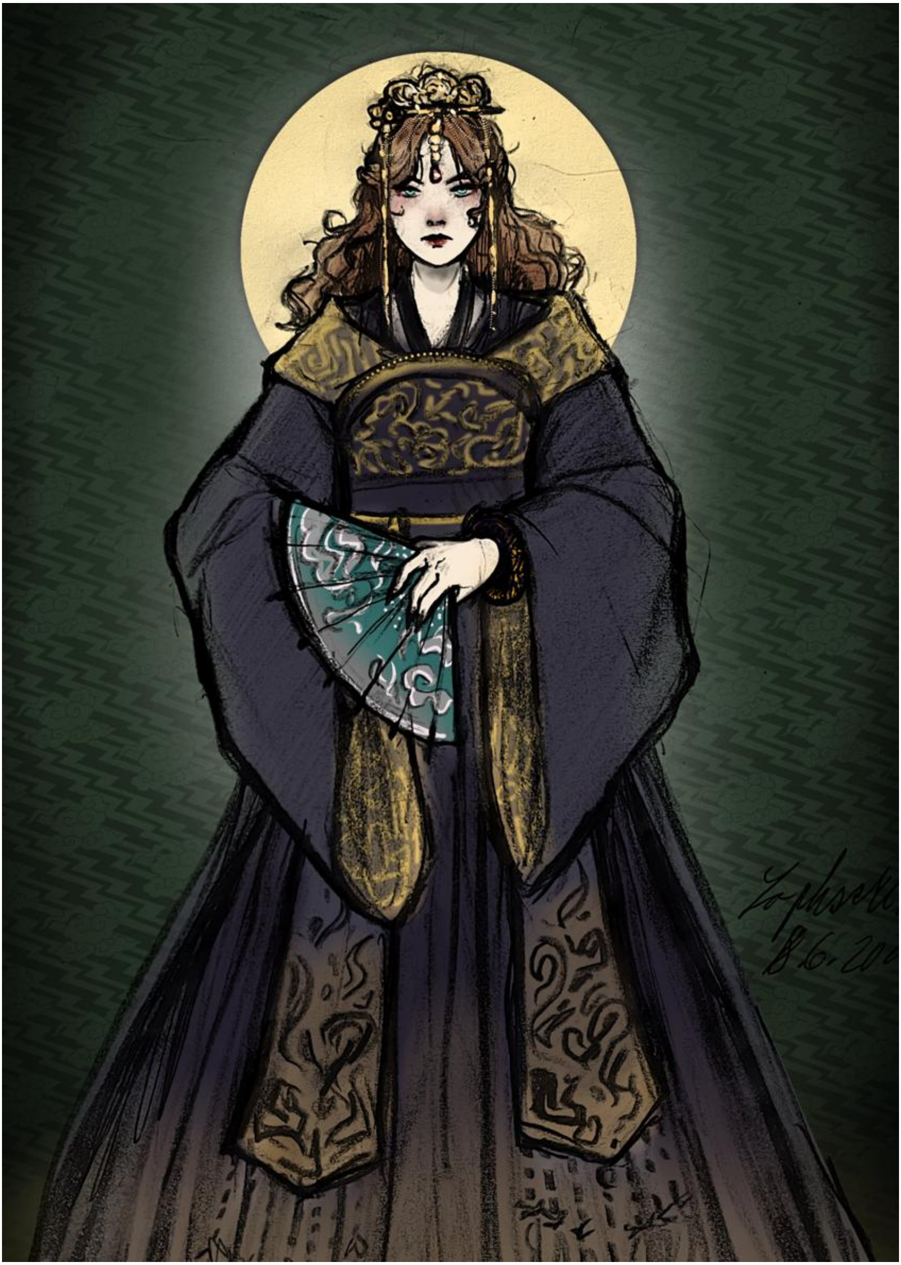
“Oh, me?”

Red lips curve into a glittering, indulgent smile.

“I’m just the Wind Master—Lord Shi Qingxuan.”

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or reuse.



CREDIT: SOPHSCRIB

For a brief animatic of Xie Lian and Shi Qingxuan dealing with the giant spider, look here

Special

Chapter Summary

CLANG–!

“It’s no use.”

A voice echoes from the other end of the hall, tired and ragged. “You won’t be able to break out of that without a spiritual device.”

Shuo looks down at his ankle with a grimace—swollen and bleeding, but the chain is left undamaged.

“…I thought you were still out cold.”

Chapter Notes

Content Warnings for this chapter: lots of violence and existential crises

See the end of the chapter for more notes

CLANG!

Shuo shudders, almost nauseous from the pain—

But still, he keeps trying.

Using a broken chunk of marble from the wall—slamming it into the spirit shackle around his ankle.

Over and over again, to no avail.

CLANG!

CLANG!

CLANG–!

“It’s no use.”

A voice echoes from the other end of the hall, tired and ragged. “You won’t be able to break out of that without a spiritual device.”

Shuo looks down at his ankle with a grimace—swollen and bleeding, but the chain is left undamaged.

“…I thought you were still out cold.”

“I…I was,” the older man winces, rubbing his jaw. “I only just came to. I take it you’re the one they call Ren Song?” The teenager nods, facing away from him on the ground. “I see. I’m—“

“Mei Nianqing. Royal Preceptor of Xianle,” Shuo recalls flatly. “I know who you are.”

“…I suppose you overheard everything from before, then.”

“Sure,” Shuo agrees. “But my parents used to talk about you, so I already knew your name.”

Mei Nianqing raises an eyebrow curiously, watching as the boy continues to struggle against his chains, then—

He realizes.

“…You were from Xianle,” he breathes, watching the boy with fascination. “I thought Xie Lian and his friends were the only survivors.”

“Thanks to people like you.”

That response catches him off guard.

So cold—and bitter .

“But my family wasn’t rich, and my parents weren’t nobles,” Shuo mutters. “So I guess you wouldn’t give a shit.”

“…The situation back then was complicated,”Mei Nianqing mutters. “But that doesn’t mean I didn’t care—"

“If that’s what you tell yourself to sleep at night.”

Shuo rolls his eyes. “And I didn’t survive, by the way.”

“You—"

The demon looks back over his shoulder.

“My brothers who didn’t die fighting in the war? The plague got them. I came from a big family, and I was the last one left.”

Left to a father who just…

Didn’t want him anymore.

“I used to blame the King for letting us down. Or even his highness. But now…it’s pretty obvious they had no fucking clue what they were up against. But you,” his eyes flash. “You did.”

Mei Nianqing sags with a heavy sigh.

“You knew, and you left us.”

“…I couldn’t have stopped him if I had. I just wouldn’t have survived long enough to expose him now,” Mei Nianqing admits. “Defeating him has never been my destiny.”

Shuo snorts disbelievingly.

His smile is sharp.

“Destiny.”

"You don't believe me?"

"I think destiny is an excuse people use to get away from taking responsibility for anything," The ghost mutters, pushing his fingers between the shackle and the swollen skin of his ankle, wincing. "Like old men who want to justify outliving people who died for their mistakes."

It's been eight centuries, and every night when he closes his eyes—

Shuo still remembers the death. The pain. What it's like to watch the end of the world, and realizing it can go on after the loss of everything you had ever loved.

Almost like you never existed at all.

"…You wouldn't credit your surviving until now as a matter of destiny?" Mei Nianqing asks him softly, wiping the dried blood from his chin.

"Ha!" Shuo barks out a laugh. "He'll no."

"What makes you so sure?"

"Because I'm not special." He mutters.

"If I had a destiny, it was to die in any sleep, and have my own father throw my body in a ditch like yesterday's garbage."

Left to rot there, his bones abandoned and forgotten.

Until years later, when someone came looking.

Shuo's spirit had still been that of a six year old at the time, barely twenty years since his death.

And he had been so, so scared.

Trembling like a leaf, hiding behind Hua Cheng's leg as he stared at the ruins of his family home.

Telling his gege that he didn't want to go back. That it wasn't important.

That it didn't matter.

Only for the Hua Cheng—a newborn calamity, one the entire world had learned to fear—

To kneel down beside him, hands heavy on his shoulders as he looked him in the eye.

‘It matters.’

Shuo’s corpse wasn’t grotesque by then—just bones, covered with years of leaves and grass.

And he couldn’t stand to look.

Because that would make all of it—the fact that he was dead —real.

That he was never going to grow old. To have a family again.

Hua Cheng never said a word about it—building a small pyre.

No one ever tells you how lonely it is, to have a funeral attended only by ghosts.

To sit in front of your own pyre, watching it burn, and know that no one is mourning you.

Because you didn’t matter.

There was no family plot for a tombstone of any kind—his is in Ghost City.

Next to Bao and Yanlin. With all of the other children who were rescued from Mount Tonglu that day.

But as hard as Hua Cheng looked, he was never able to find Bao’s ashes.

Buried in a mass grave of plague victims. Unable to distinguish him from hundreds of other souls lost there.

If he hadn’t died that way, Qi Rong wouldn’t have been able to disperse him by destroying the entire field of ashes.

If it wasn’t for the plague, he wouldn’t be gone.

And if there was such a thing as destiny—

Shuo was born to rot on a forgotten hill, never to be remembered again.

“…People like Xie Lian and Hua Cheng—no matter how awful things get, they always land on their feet eventually.” He mutters.

That’s just how it works.

Because they have to.

"People like me just...die in the background. You don't even think about it," he shakes his head, glaring at the growing bruise on his leg. "It's an afterthought. Maybe there's a plaque commemorating it somewhere—but you don't know our names."

That's why Shuo doesn't trust men like Mei Nianqing. The ones who claim to be righteous, but abandon the helpless without a fault.

Unlike Hua Cheng—his hands covered with blood, but...

He remembers the name of every single child he's helped move on to the next life.

"But you didn't stay in that ditch, did you, boy?"

Shuo doesn't look back at him, and Mei Nianqing sighs, his feet sliding across the floor in a fruitless attempt to push himself up against the wall, but–

With his hands bound, and his ribs broken—there's no use.

"Only because Hua Cheng found me and felt sorry for me."

"...And from what I hear, he's a bit of a patron of lost children," the Guoshi observes quietly. "But none of them have lasted the course. Not like you."

Shuo doesn't look up, glaring at his own reflection in the polished marble beneath their feet.

"...Sometimes, destiny is an excuse," Mei Nianqing admits slowly. "I won't say that I haven't used it to bring myself comfort more than once. But..."

He glances toward the throne.

Empty now, but remembering the man who once sat there.

Destiny can also justify acts of incredible cruelty. Injustice and obscenity.

"Sometimes, believing in destiny can make us capable of things we would not be otherwise."

Sometimes, an excuse isn't always a bad thing.

"Moments of immense bravery and personal sacrifice—all because we believe it's our destiny. That might be an excuse—but it's also a comfort. It brings courage."

Giving up your own control over the outcome—in order to give yourself the strength to see it through.

"I don't like my role in this story any more than you do, boy. But I couldn't think of another way to save Xie Lian's life."

Shuo stiffens, shocked.

"...Save his life? You watched him suffer and you—"

"Did nothing," Mei Nianqing agrees. "Because I was weak. I am weak, compared to Jun Wu. Everyone is. But if I had told the prince the truth back then—what do you think would have happened?"

At that point, Xie Lian would have known far too much.

He would have died .

He was barely more than a teenager himself at the beginning of his banishment. If Jun Wu had wanted to kill him then , it...

Would have been like leading a lamb to slaughter.

"...How is it any different now?" Shuo mutters, pulling his knees against his chest. "And if it was to protect him—why did you leave him alone to suffer for eight centuries? Do you even know what he's like now?"

"I—"

"He doesn't feed himself." Shuo presses his cheek against his knee, glaring at the wall. "He doesn't remember to, because he's been hungry for so long, he doesn't notice it anymore. He doesn't cry. Not even when a normal person would. He won't say anything when he's injured."

Not out of pride or toughness, but simply because he just doesn't notice.

"...I haven't even known him for that long, and I know that isn't normal," Shuo looks back at Mei Nianqing, shaking his head. "I doubt that is anything like the prince you trained, is it?"

Mei Nianqing stares back at him, pale and weary.

Because—

He knew a boy who would push away his plate—not because he wasn't hungry, but because he was a picky eater.

Who cried over playtime cut short, or a scraped knee.

"...And I would get it if he was just some awful brat that you were eager to get off of your hands," Shuo swallows hard, pushing off thoughts of his own death once more. "Not your family, not your problem."

"I—"

"But you said he WAS your family!" The demon glares.

"THAT'S what you told Jun Wu! That you were protecting your family—BOLIN'S family. How is abandoning them protecting them?!"

"...I didn't mean to—"

"What?!"

"I didn't MEAN to abandon him!" Mei Nianqing cries, his voice cracking. "I LOOKED!"

Shuo falls silent.

"I couldn't interfere with the war in Xianle," Mei Nianqing shakes his head. "I tried to steer the King away from the path he went down, but...Jun Wu was always one step ahead. It was like being a rat in a maze. By the time the war began—there was nothing else I could do."

If he had, Jun Wu would have discovered him—then killed him.

And then, there would be no one left who knew the truth.

The curse on his name wouldn't even be necessary if there was no one left who remembered it.

"What happened to his highness was..."

Mei Nianqing cringes, closing his eyes from the horror of just remembering it.

"It was profane. Cruel. Every single thing you want to call it. But I still believe that's better than Jun Wu killing him. When he let him go into his second banishment, I thought..."

He exhales sharply, with years of built up frustration. "I thought I could find him again, and help him train until he was ready to face him."

With the emperor's attention off of him—it should have been easy, but—

"But the shackle on his ankle, it..."

It hid Xie Lian from him at every single turn, just as it had from Hua Cheng.

Just as it had from Xie Lian's friends.

Mei Nianqing wasn't able to find him until he ascended again, and after that, well…

He always had gods and ghosts around—making approaching near impossible.

"…And as for how it's supposed to be different now, well—" Mei Nianqing shrugs. "He's been in the unique position to cultivate without interruption for eight centuries. Most gods are distracted by duties indulgences—but not him."

Making him far more powerful.

"But…" Shuo frowns, "He can't use any of that with his cursed shackles, can he?"

"…No," Mei Nianqing admits. "I'm still working out the kinks in that part of the plan."

"…" Shuo sinks back against the wall with a groan. "VERY comforting!"

"At least it's better than—!"

Thud!

Both of them turn their heads, shocked to find a small hole opening in the floor of the grand martial hall—and after a moment—

Shuo's face breaks out in relief.

"Yin Yu!" He half whispers, half screams as a familiar face appears, the exiled official crawling out.

The moment he sees that Shuo is uninjured, Yin Yu seems to be just as relieved as he is—

Rushing to Shuo's side, pulling the boy into a tight hug.

"Are you alright?!"

For a moment, he doesn't respond. Eyes wide with shock, and—

Just a little wet.

"Y-yeah!"

He clears his throat. "A little banged up, but most of it was my fault, I…" he glances over Yin Yu's shoulder, only to see a broad, curly haired young man staring at him curiously, "…You brought back up?"

"General Qi Ying, martial god of the west," Yin Yu mutters.

Shuo's lips part, eyebrows raising in surprise. "You two worked things out?!"

"Ah…sort of—"

"We're getting married."

Shuo stares, his jaw hanging open as Yin Yu nearly falls over, dropping the earth master's shovel before he can smash Shuo's spirit shackle.

"We—we are NOT, we never even talked about—!"

"Doesn't seem like a terrible outcome," Shuo mutters, not quite able to take his eyes off of Quan Yizhen's forearms.

Yin Yu sends him a sour look, but the martial god glows from the compliment.

"We—we're not even—this isn't the time to be discussing that!" He hisses, smashing Shuo’s shackle. “It is WAY too soon.”

Quan Yizhen crosses his arms with a shrug.

“I didn’t say when we were getting married.”

“He’s got you there.”

“BOTH of you, just—!”

He pauses, turning his head to stare at the man chained down the hall, raising an eyebrow. “Isn’t that…?”

“Mei Nianqing,” Shuo confirms, all of them having already seen the confrontation that led to this entire debacle, and…

“…We should take him with us.”

Yin Yu hesitates, glancing back at the tunnel leading out.

“We might not have enough time—”

“He has a plan for helping the prince get rid of his cursed shackles,” Shuo explains, amending—

“Sort of, it’s got some kinks.”

Yin Yu lets out a reluctant sigh, but…

That really isn’t a possibility they can just ignore.

He crosses the distance to Mei Nianqing, taking the earth master’s shovel to the guoshi’s chains as the older man eyes him curiously.

“…You used to be martial god of the west as well, didn’t you?”

Yin Yu looks up, his face darkening for a moment—then shakes his head.

"That was a long time ago."

Nothing seems that long ago to Mei Nianqing—not anymore, but he doesn't argue.

"Crimson Rain took a former god into his service," he muses, surprised. "What a strange man."

Strange isn't the word Yin Yu would use—not for that reason, anyway.

"...He's been generous to me," He mutters, helping the Guoshi to his feet once his shackles are broken. "Let’s go."

And that's the part that hurts, later.

The thought that will leave the ones who walk away lying awake in bed at night, eyes tracing the divots in the ceiling as they rewind this moment over and over again, trying to think of what they could have done differently.

Because...they were so close .

Close enough to almost be in arm's reach of the tunnel—

Until they hear the doors to the Grand Martial Hall open.

And after that—everything happens so fast.

Shuo feels the floor sweep out from under him—landing on something hard and flat with a quiet thud .

His eyes fly wide open as his arms scramble, trying to wrench himself free, ready to scream, but—

A hand locks over his mouth, forcing him to be silent, an arm wrapped tightly around his middle, keeping him still.

Mei Nianqing.

Crouched behind the throne with him—hiding.

"Ah," Jun Wu's voice echoes across the martial hall—and in spite of Shuo's pointed attempts to seem so fearless before, now, clutched in Mei Nianqing's arms...

He trembles with fear.

Only comforted by the silence of his lungs and heart.

The living aren't so lucky.

"Yin Yu," His eyes slide to the earth master's shovel, still clutched between the Martial God's fingertips. "As inconvenient as ever, I see. Did Crimson Rain order you to do this?"

The exiled official doesn't reply, stone faced—and Quan Yizhen steps in front of him.

"Oh..." Jun Wu raises an eyebrow, lips curving into a wry smile as he looks between the two of them. "Did you two make nice?"

He takes a step forward, watching the way Quan Yizhen doesn't budge, and his smile widens.

"Qi Ying—you don't even have a sword , what are you doing?"

The Martial God doesn't respond, not dropping his defensive stance, and Jun Wu...

"Well, isn't that adorable? So protective of your shixiong...but doesn't it bother you," the emperor muses, "That he would never do the same?"

Yin Yu flinches, growing pale. "I—!"

"I don't care."

Jun Wu and Yin Yu look at Quan Yizhen at the same time, shocked—but the Martial God's expression is unchanging.

"That's not why I protect someone."

The answer is so jarring to Jun Wu, visibly taking him aback, but also —

It takes him back to many, many years ago.

Watching a prince standing on the shores of Lang'er Bay. Streaked with blood and grime, beaten down nearly beyond recognition, but—

'That isn't why I help people.'

His face contorts for a moment, his hand balling into a fist at his side.

"...And what exactly can you do?" He sneers, lifting his head.

Yin Yu looks up, heart leaping into his throat as he grips the earth master shovel a little tighter, but—

Before he can move, say a single word—

BOOM!

It takes one palm strike.

Quan Yizhen is sent flying, his shoulder slamming into the wall—cracking the marble underneath him, coughing up blood.

"YIZHEN—!"

"You don't have your powers," Jun Wu reminds him coldly, shaking out his fist. "Without them, what are you? What can you do?"

His eyes flicker to Yin Yu, then back to Quan Yizhen, struggling to get up.

"...You know, you released two very valuable prisoners, Yin Yu," he muses, sending another blast of spiritual power Quan Yizhen's way, forcing him to stay down.

"I'm sure you know that either one of them was more valuable to me than you."

Yin Yu doesn't reply, eyes flickering around—clearly desperately trying to think of some sort of clever trick or escape, but—

There isn't one.

"However, I could be convinced to spare your life."

Yin Yu swallows hard, looking back at the emperor—

Startled to see how close Jun Wu is now, not having even noticed the man moving.

"W...What?"

"See," Jun Wu's eyes slide to the side for a moment, taking in Quan Yizhen's expression as he reaches out, grabbing Yin Yu's chin.

"It's actually a bit more convenient for me, working with someone spineless like you," he explains calmly, watching countless bouts of emotion flickering through Yin Yu's gaze. "So, you tell me—would you like an end to your exile?"

Yin Yu grows still, almost speechless.

“…What?” He croaks, staring up at Jun Wu with wide eyes, shaking his head. “You…why would you do that?”

“You weren’t useless, back then.” Jun Wu rationalizes. “If I don’t have any other martial gods…I need someone to step in and fill their place."

Someone obedient.

Someone who couldn't get such an opportunity fairly. Who is bound to Jun Wu from a sense of obligation—but also dependent on him as a source of relevance and power.

Yin Yu grows silent, fingers gripping the earth master's shovel tightly.

And he—

He can't look at Quan Yizhen.

Bleeding on the ground, still struggling to rise to his feet—even after a blow from someone as powerful as Jun Wu.

Still struggling to protect him, after not even trying to argue with the emperor when he said that Yin Yu wouldn't do the same.

'I don't care.'

Because he—

(He doesn't need Yin Yu to be brave.)

"…What…" He swallows hard, his voice hoarse, forcing him to clear his throat. "What would my role…be?"

"…If Ling Wen is my right hand, you will be my left," Jun Wu assured him quietly. "It's a generous offer, Yin Yu."

He won't get a better one.

Jun Wu watches the hesitation in his eyes. The hunched set of his shoulders. Every sign of wavering—drinking it in with satisfaction.

"…You could be so special , Yin Yu," he murmurs, giving his shoulders a squeeze.

Special.

"You just need to learn how to take what you want. Do you know what that is?"

"…To be a god," Yin Yu whispers, his voice so fragile in its uncertainty.

As if he's struggling to resign himself to what comes next.

Jun Wu offers his hand.

“Then be a god.”

Yin Yu isn't sure what is harder.

Reaching out to take it—or the fact that Quan Yizhen doesn't even tell him not to.

Doesn't even seem hurt by what is nothing less than a cruel betrayal, but…

The moment Jun Wu takes his hand—a weight is lifted.

Like, for the first time in decades—he can finally take a full breath without something pushing him down.

And when Yin Yu looks down at his wrist—there's no cursed shackle.

No black ink stretching across his skin like a burning scarlet letter, telling the world that he failed.

And now, after so many years of resentment and regret—

It's just…gone.

There's something strange about it.

Even as Jun Wu lets go and begins to turn away, Yin Yu still stares at that newly bare strip of skin, feeling his strength slowly begin to return.

And it's strange. So very, very strange.

To think that so small a thing carried so great a weight. That it could be removed so easily.

That the one who put it there gives and takes freedom so easily.

Like nothing more than a cheap bargaining chip.

Slowly, his fingers curl into a first.

Behind the throne, Shuo just barely manages to peek his head around.

In time to meet Yin Yu's gaze.

And when he does—

The Ghost Officer smiles.

Not happily. Not with guilt or apologies.

Just—just—

Destiny is double edged.

Shuo watches him mouth one word, his stomach dropping through the floor as he struggles, unable to make a sound, even as he tries to scream against Mei Nianqing's hand.

'Run.'

BANG!

The earth master's shovel sparks and groans, crashing against the emperor's skull.

Jun Wu freezes in mid step, eyes narrowed—just one drop of blood sliding from his hairline as Yin Yu turns on his heel, ready to flee.

"YIZHEN, GET TO THE—!"

Thud.

Quan Yizhen blinks blearily, struggling to wipe the blood out of his eyes.

His head must have been cut when he slammed against the wall before—the blood just won't stop coming, but—

Why…

Why is Yin Yu just standing there?

"Oh, Yin Yu…" Jun Wu sighs, standing just behind him. "Blind bravery isn't for the weak, is it?"

He yanks something out of the God's back, and Yin Yu almost staggers, until—

Jun Wu grabs him by the shoulder.

Pulling him in, only to drive the blade into his back once more.

Thud.

“You hear it, don’t you?” The emperor whispers in his ear. “It’s still ringing.”

The bell.

Jun Wu might have given Yin Yu his godhood back, but—

The bell never stopped ringing, suppressing the powers of all of the martial gods in the Heavens.

Including him .

Jun Wu yanks the blade out again—a special delivery, as he had mentioned before.

Thrown from the doors of Mount Tonglu—straight into the hands of one of his underlings.

This time—he brings the dagger down into the martial god’s, striking high—

With cruel precision, rupturing the femoral artery.

“I want you to know that this was pointless,” Jun Wu whispers.

Watching the horror dawning on Quan Yizhen’s face.

“You don’t even get to die a hero. Just a miserable little footnote compared to your friends. How miserable. But…”

Seeing the familiar dagger flashing between Jun Wu’s fingertips.

“…It’s been ages since I killed a god.”

He says the words with vicious satisfaction, tucking the dagger back into his sleeve as he steps away.

A conscience is like a muscle. One that grows stiff and uncompromising when you don’t stretch it frequently enough.

Yes, it’s been thousands of years since he killed a god.

But now, it’ll be easier next time.

And he doesn’t think of Yin Yu, not really.

He isn't a person in the emperor's mind then—not so much as a vehicle of wounding his master.

If he can't use him as a traitor—he makes decent enough cannon fodder.

The moment he lets the god go—Yin Yu falls to his knees, crumpling to the floor in a broken heap.

And—in spite of the fact that he's bruised and bleeding, swaying as he rises to his feet.

Quan Yizhen snarls .

Staggering forward with a fury.

Even with his vision blurring with every step he takes.

Even when his body screams in silent protest.

"FIGHT ME!"

Jun Wu barely glances back over his shoulder, rolling his eyes.

"It wouldn't be much of a fight, child."

Quan Yizhen still stumbles after him, breathing hard.

It doesn't matter.

Doesn't matter if it's the emperor. Doesn't if he can win. Doesn't matter if he doesn't make it.

Because—

Because it's his shixiong.

And Quan Yizhen is strong.

Strong enough for both of them.

He said he was strong enough for both of them.

So—

Why is Jun Wu just walking away? Why won't he finish it?!

He—

“A…A-Yizhen…”

The martial god grows still, his eyes wide, slowly filling with tears.

Yin Yu holds a hand against his leg, trying to staunch the bleeding, but—

It’s pointless.

“D—Don’t….”

Slowly, Quan Yizhen’s lips start to tremble, a tremor that comes from deep inside—spreading through his limbs until he’s trembling all over.

“…SHIXIONG!”

He falls twice, badly concussed—but he doesn’t stop.

Not until he gets to him.

Sliding to his knees, bracing Yin Yu against him.

Holding him in his arms tight—too tight, making the god cough and wince, loosening his grip frantically as he looks him over.

“You…you…” He keeps blinking rapidly, as if at some point, what he sees is going to change.

In just one more blink, they won’t be here anymore.

They’ll be back in the temple that held childhood in its halls. Where Quan Yizhen never felt like too much.

When his Shixiong’s eyes were still so bright.

One more blink, and there won’t be so much blood —everywhere.

But the truth is that every blink is the ticking of a bomb, or a clock.

Counting down to the worst moment he’ll ever have.

The world doesn’t change shape or form when you close your eyes, no matter how hard you try to look away.

“…Xuan Zhen…” He mumbles numbly as the doors close. “You…I’ll… I’ll take you to…”

He starts to gather his Shixiong in his arms, lifting him, but—

A pained cry makes him stop, lowering him back down.

“N…no…” Yin Yu shakes his head, weakly grasping Quan Yizhen’s sleeve.

“He can’t…”

He can’t do anything.

Not for this.

“…No,” Quan Yizhen shakes his head, his voice dull and numb, ringing with denial. “No, no, no!”

“A-A-Yizhen—”

“Don’t do this!” He pleads suddenly, like it’s a choice.

“Shixiong—don't do this!”

Yin Yu tries to touch his cheek, fingers trembling—and when he can’t, Quan Yizhen catches it, pressing his face into Yin Yu’s palm clumsily, tears pouring down his cheeks.

And now, when the doors are shut, and the shadows have fallen—

Mei Nianqing’s arms go slack.

“…YIN YU!”

Shuo tears free from him, running across the hall, falling to his knees—skidding the last few feet as he makes it to the ghost officer’s side—

Terrified of how pale his friend is.

His skin ashen, lips turning blue.

“…” He looks over his shoulder, desperate.

“HELP HIM!”

Mei Nianqing hesitates, looking at the growing pool of blood on the floor in dismay.

“I…Oh, my dear boy—I wish I could, but—”

“I-If it’s about that STUPID fucking bell, just—!” Shuo reaches down, yanking up his sleeves. “TAKE MY SPIRITUAL POWER, I have plenty!”

He offers his wrists up, cheeks soaked with tears. “JUST TAKE IT!”

“…I’m not a god either,” Mei Nianqing answers hoarsely, unable to bear the sight of Quan Yizhen, rocking back and forth, clutching his shixiong as he trembles violently. “That isn’t the—”

“You’re not even gonna try?!” Shuo glares, pointing at Yin Yu with a quivering finger. “He stayed back to help YOU! He probably saved YOUR LIFE! You—you HAVE TO HELP HIM!”

“…” Mei Nianqing shakes his head with a sigh, knowing what the outcome will be.

But still—

He tries.

Kneeling down behind Yin Yu, holding a palm over the god’s leg—the fatal point of injury—his hand glowing with power.

In most cases, the power of the dagger itself is absolute.

Only one god has ever survived a fatal blow—and under very specific conditions.

When Shi Wudu cut his own throat—

He cut through a cursed shackle in doing so.

And, just before the emperor placed the cursed shackles upon his body, the Water Master attempted to renounce his godhood.

Meaning—the instant that shackle was broken—

Shi Wudu reverted back to a mortal man, severing the connection to his divinity.

Not only did the shackle absorb some of the force, leaving the wound shallower than it would have been—

The God Slayer is aptly named.

It’s designed to kill gods— not mortals.

Mei Nianqing had to resuscitate him—to drag the broken pieces of his soul back to his body in the minutes after his death—

But after that, he was able to use magic to stabilize him, and mortal medicine for the rest.

In this case…

No matter how much spiritual power he pours into Yin Yu's injury—the result is the same.

Because…

He's the very thing the dagger was designed to destroy.

Shuo and Quan Yizhen watch, hope in their eyes fading, the longer it goes on. It—

It isn't working.

"…" Shuo hunches over, fangs digging into his lip until it starts to bleed, his shoulders trembling.

Mei Nianqing doesn't comment, watching the mass of resentment in the boy's soul burn brighter than before.

Smoldering with newfound hatred.

When he rises to his feet, stalking towards the door—

Mei Nianqing follows, giving the two gods a final moment of privacy, asking;

"Where are you going?"

"…Where do you think?" Shuo mutters, drawing one of the daggers strapped to his thigh.

"He'll only kill you too."

"I don't care," the boy hisses—

The tears coming out of his right eye are streaked with blood.

"I've killed a god before."

Even if he can't kill the emperor—Shuo can make him bleed.

"It's a waste."

"HE KILLED—!" Shuo bites his lip, lowering his voice.

Not wanting to make these last moments any more painful than they already are.

“…He killed my friend,” he whispers hoarsely.

And there’s such a heavy weight of guilt that comes with that.

Knowing that, if he hadn’t been too afraid to make a break for the Kiln…

If he had tried , maybe he would have survived.

Maybe he would be a calamity right now. And if he was—

He could have done something. Could have protected Yin Yu. Could have helped Xie Lian. Could have done—

Done something .

But, after so many years of begging to grow up, when he got the chance—

Shuo ran away.

Like a scared little kid.

“…There’s no use in killing yourself in a grand gesture.”

“Unlike you,” the boy hisses, “I’m not comfortable with climbing over my friend’s bodies to survive.”

He places one hand on the door the grand martial hall, prepared to die in the streets of the Heavenly Capital, but—

Mei Nianqing grabs him by the scruff of the neck, dragging him back.

“You think I’m a coward? Fine. But this? This isn’t bravery, boy—it’s selfishness.”

Shuo flinches, baring his teeth with a hiss, but—

“He did that to protect you. To protect Qi Ying. I didn’t climb over my friends bodies—I ran. I ran as far and as fast as I could, because the only way I could stomach them dying was making it mean something.”

He grabs Shuo by the front of the robes and gives him one hard shake.

“If you want to die for something? Fine. But when you do—you better make it count . Don’t insult your friend by throwing it away so cheaply.”

There’s such intense conflict in the boy’s face. Warring against the urge to ignore him, go out and fruitlessly attempt to rip Jun Wu apart, but—

After a moment, his face just falls into his hands.

Weeping out of helpless anger.

Grief for his friend.

Because—

It’s been almost two hundred years since Bao.

And he still couldn’t protect him.

But his pain, his grief—

It can’t quite encompass the agony in Quan Yizhen’s ragged, trembling breaths, whispering—

Quietly begging Yin Yu not to go.

Not to leave again.

And it's hard—because Yin Yu doesn't sound like he's dying, not really.

He just sounds tired. Groggy, even, his breaths slowly becoming quick and shallow.

"Yizhen...listen..." His fingers twitch weakly against the martial god's cheek. "Look...look at me..."

It feels impossible to even lift his head—but he does, eyes swollen, shedding countless tears.

"You..." Yin Yu swallows thickly, dizziness overtaking him for a moment. "You...have to be good...Don't...just run off on your own, when I'm..." He closes his eyes, shivering.

"Stay...stay with his highness, okay? They'll...they'll need your help..."

"I'm not leaving you, shixiong," Quan Yizhen shakes his head, tucking his face against Yin Yu's neck once more. "N-Not ever again—"

"Shhhh..." Yin Yu's arm trembles with the effort, but...

He still strokes his fingers through Quan Yizhen's curls. Just like he always has, ever since they were children themselves.

It's almost jarring now, to think that, only a matter of minutes ago, his shidi said the words—

'We're getting married.'

Something that seemed so daunting, the moment he said it—and Yin Yu has no idea what he would have done, if he had lived long enough, but—

Right now, it feels like he would have.

"I...I'm okay," He rasps, his words sending new trails of tears down Quan Yizhen's cheeks.

"I'm...I came home."

It just rips right through him. His arms holding Yin Yu tighter and tighter, breaths bordering on hyperventilation.

It's cold. It's spinning. In and out, with Yin Yu less and less aware of what's going on. Where he is.

Just of Quan Yizhen—crying.

Whispering that he's sorry, over and over again.

And it's almost funny—because for so many years of his life, he craved an apology from Quan Yizhen. Not for anything he really did , but making him feel so...painfully average.

But now, it's just the opposite.

"Don't...don't be sorry," he whispers, his hand growing limp and still in Quan Yizhen's curls. "You...you were...the only one...who made me feel..."

His head drifts to the side, a faint smile on his face, and there's a small, rattling exhale.

Then—there's only silence.

It’s hard to know which hurts more to listen to—

The silence of Yin Yu’s heartbeat, or Quan Yizhen’s weeping.

Begging, but it’s hard to say who.

“It hurts…” he rocks back and forth, head still pressed into Yin Yu’s neck. “S-Shixiong, I d-don’t like it here…”

Yin Yu’s head hang’s limply, eyes unseeing, lips forever frozen in a final, bittersweet smile.

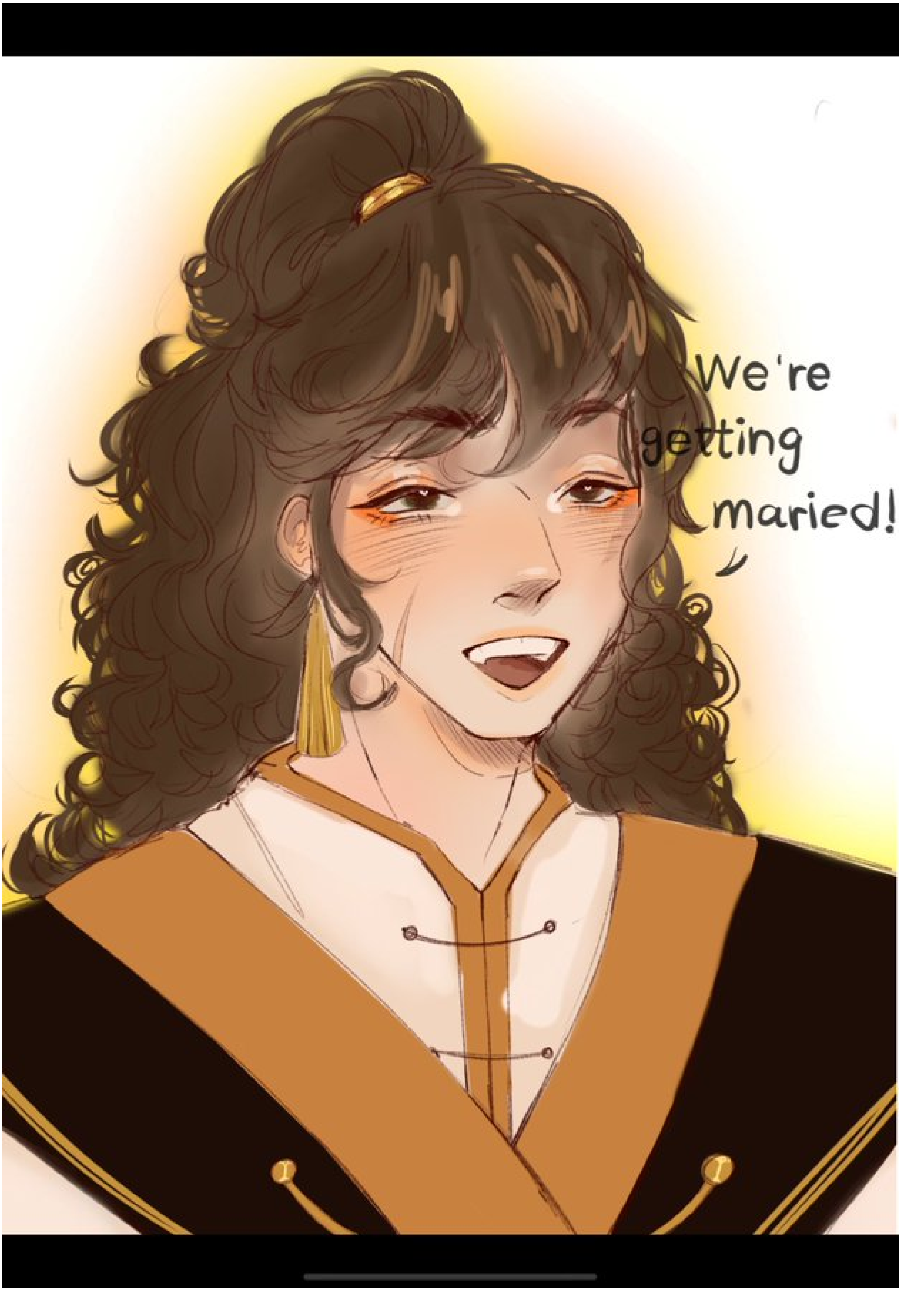
“I-I wanna go home now…It…It hurts…just…make it stop…make it stop….MAKE IT STOP!”

He screams, but no one answers.

Because when you’re a god…who could you pray to?

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or reuse.



We're getting maried!

* gets killed

CREDIT: LILY

SHUO'S PYRE

CREDIT: EVE

Chapter End Notes

He did not, in fact, get the raise.

(Respectfully)

It Makes One Ache

Chapter Summary

> The Rain Master, known for being almost painfully courteous, interrupts him.
>
> “One of the boys from the village helped me bring souvenirs from the mortal realm. Do you mind watching over him while I meet with the emperor?”
>
> Xie Lian stares blindly, his lips parted with confusion.
>
> “I…I don’t see a problem with that,” he agrees slowly, baffled. “But—”
>
> “We’ll talk later,” Yushi Huang assures him, turning to walk away. “Good luck, your highness.”

Chapter Notes

> TRIGGER WARNING: this chapter deals with themes of grooming and the possibility of sexual assault, and could be triggering for certain readers. Please proceed with caution!

Xie Lian hates the quiet.

There aren’t any animals here. No natural breeze, or even the babbling of a river.

Just the sound of his own breath and heartbeat—

And his thoughts.

Endless, terrifying thoughts, slowly spinning from the worst possibility to the next.

Left to wonder where his friends are. If they’re hurt. If they’re alive .

When Jun Wu is coming back. What he’ll do, when he does.

If the plan will work. If Shi Qingxuan was even able to reach Blackwater at all.

If San Lang—

Knock, knock!

He turns his head, cautious.

Not sure if he should trust anything right now, but—

If it was Jun Wu, he wouldn't knock.

He pushes himself to his feet, feeling along the walls as he cautiously makes his way towards the doors, squinting, until…

A familiar spiritual aura comes into view.

Xie Lian exhales a sigh of relief, pushing the doors open as fast as he can—

"Lord Rain Master?!"

"Your highness," Yushi Huang smiles, calm as ever. "I've come to report to the emperor on my experiences in Mount Tonglu."

Xie Lian pauses, his heart leaping into his throat as he glances around, listening for any trace of Jun Wu—any glimpse of the man's aura.

"I don't…I don't think now is such a…"

But then, something strange happens.

"I don't have time to catch up, we'll have to do that later."

The Rain Master, known for being almost painfully courteous, interrupts him.

"One of the boys from the village helped me bring souvenirs from the mortal realm. Do you mind watching over him while I meet with the emperor?"

Xie Lian stares blindly, his lips parted with confusion.

"I…I don't see a problem with that," he agrees slowly, baffled. "But—"

"We'll talk later," Yushi Huang assures him, turning to walk away. "Good luck, your highness."

Xie Lian pauses again, his eyebrows knitting together as the teenage farmer steps over the threshold.

...Good luck with what?

He opens his mouth to ask as she walks away—but it only takes one sound to keep him silent as the doors to the Palace of Xianle slide shut.

Clink!

Clink!

"Gege, gege..." The youth sighs, setting a basket of vegetables down on the table.

"If someone makes you disappear one more time, this one might have to resort to something drastic—"

Before he can even finish his sentence, his prince is in his arms, hugging him tightly around his neck.

"San Lang!" He breathes out all of the tension in his body. "You came!"

Hua Cheng grows taller and broader in his arms as he shifts back into his true form, the worn clothes of a farm hand melting back into fine crimson robes—and when Xie Lian's arms don't loosen even a bit, his toes end up dangling from the ground.

(And he doesn't care at all.)

"Of course," Hua Cheng sounds a little startled at first--

Because he's known the truth the entire time, having grown so accustomed to keeping his distance from the prince, he—

He never considered what it would be like when Xie Lian knew.

And even if he had—he never considered the possibility that Xie Lian would return all of his feelings, or if so, that it would be in the same way.

But now...

His arms wrap around Xie Lian's waist, holding him close.

"There's nothing in this world that could keep me from you forever, your highness." He murmurs, pressing their foreheads together.

Xie Lian swallows hard, his heart leaping into his throat, and he—

He tilts his face up, pressing their mouths together in a brief, chaste kiss.

Hua Cheng makes a small, pleased sound in the back of his throat, raising an eyebrow when the prince pulls away. "What was that for?"

Xie Lian lowers, his face, clearing his throat.

"When we spoke before—I said I would..."

The Ghost King's eye brightens, remembering.

Xie Lian had promised to kiss him again, after Hua Cheng complained of not getting enough affection from him before he disappeared.

"Apologies, gege—your San Lang was teasing you," he muses, his smile widening and dimpling as he notices how red Xie Lian's ears are. "I knew something was wrong the moment you called me."

Xie Lian looks up with a frown, anxiety welling up in his chest, wondering if he had made Hua Cheng think he wouldn't want to call him—

"Why?"

But the answer is shockingly simple:

"You used my verbal password."

When the prince doesn't respond, Hua Cheng's gaze turns slightly mischievous.

"Unless that was a request?"

"...San Lang!" Xie Lian rasps, even more mortified by the part of him, somewhere in the back of his mind, that mumbles—

'Not right now.'

"Apologies, apologies..." Hua Cheng says that, but the laughter makes it hard to think his remorse is sincere. "What I mean to say is—gege is so shy, you wouldn't say it unless it was truly an emergency. And it was obvious you couldn't speak freely."

Even if that wasn't enough of a clue--Xie Lian's reference to Mu Qing on Mount Tonglu was a clear lie, something he would only say to signal to Hua Cheng that they were being overheard.

So, of course Hua Cheng was eager to ask for more affection when Jun Wu was listening.

If he could have, he would have been far more offensive and specific—but at that point, it would have been far too much at his god's expense to be worth Jun Wu's potential suffering.

"But," Hua Cheng amends, his voice far quieter, his fingertips rubbing slow circles into the small of Xie Lian's back. "I know gege is shy," he repeats gently. "If my teasing makes him feel like he has to—"

"I wouldn't if I didn't want to," Xie Lian blurts out, slightly pink.

Half embarrassed by admitting it, and half distracted by how excellent Hua Cheng's fingers are at working out the tension in his spine with such subtle, seemingly careless movements.

"It's just...hard for me to...It would be easier, if..."

The emotion is too difficult to describe now, not in the limited amount of time they have, but—

Hua Cheng seems to somehow understand the basic premise of it anyway—which makes sense.

He's known Xie Lian longer than almost anyone.

Xie Lian stiffens for a moment when Hua Cheng takes him by surprise—leaning down and kissing him longer and deeper than Xie Lian had dared to before, teasing his lips until the god's fingers tighten on his shoulders, trembling slightly—

"I don't mind taking initiative."

He lifts one hand from Xie Lian's waist, cupping the side of his face in his palm, gently inquiring—

"Did gege miss me?"

"..." Xie Lian turns his face into Hua Cheng's palm—then finds that to be unsatisfactory, burying his nose in the ghost king's chest instead.

"...Yes."

It was hard enough being away from Hua Cheng before he knew, but now?

It's only been a few hours—and they were nearly unbearable.

But when Xie Lian thinks back on what happened in that time, he lifts his head, his expression urgent. "What did Shi Qingxuan tell you?"

"...That the emperor had lost his mind, and that he was allied with Bai Wuxiang," Hua Cheng recalls slowly—and Xie Lian—

He's spent the last several hours thinking of ways he could make Hua Cheng understand without saying the name or identity of who Jun Wu actually is.

"...The emperor was able to bring Mei Nianqing back here with the rest of us," Xie Lian explains quietly. "And when he started interrogating him about Bai Wuxiang...Mei Nianqing admitted to being Xie Bolin's father. Then...the emperor attacked him."

And hearing that, well—

It's enough for Hua Cheng to come to the same conclusion that Xie Lian did--hands suddenly gripping the prince's shoulders as he looks him over again with far more scrutiny.

"...Did he do anything to you, gege? Are you hurt?"

Xie Lian grows silent, thinking back on it.

Compared to everyone else? Jun Wu barely did anything to him.

...Physically.

"He threatened me," Xie Lian admits. "But that doesn't matter now."

"...Threatened you?" Hua Cheng inquires softly.

"It doesn't bear repeating."

It's not that Xie Lian doesn't think Jun Wu was serious—or that he took the threat lightly—

Because how could he?

"...Dianxia, I know learning all of this must have been heartbreaking for you, but you don't need to brush past—"

"I'm not," Xie Lian swallows hard.

He doesn't want to protect Jun Wu. Not anymore. Not—

Not knowing everything that he does now.

But Jun Wu’s threat wasn’t something that began today. It existed eight centuries ago.

When he masqueraded as Feng Xin by the River.

When he chose, of all of the skins he could have worn, to wear Hong’er’s face that day in the temple. Watching with morbid curiosity, contemplating allowing those men to…to…

Constantly going out of his way to touch him, to make Xie Lian—

To make Xie Lian, who had already been robbed of one sense, to dread and fear being touched at all.

Even centuries later, when Lan Qianqiu reached out to touch his Guoshi’s face—

Xie Lian had felt like crying, back then. His stomach twisting and churning.

Even if he knew his student wouldn’t hurt him. That he couldn’t .

When Xie Lian met Wu Ming, he almost asked the ghost to go to bed with him—not because he was ready, or even wanted that at the time —But because he had been terrified that his first time would be…

Xie Lian doesn’t know why he’s struggled so much with admitting it. Maybe because he was humiliated—or he spent the last few centuries trying to convince himself that it was all in his head , that he was overreacting, but—

He can’t think of another instance when he’s ignored his own instincts like that. Pushed down the legitimate fear he had, deep in his bones—

…Of being raped.

He doesn’t know if it was well founded or justified back then. But the moment Jun Wu made that threat—

It felt real .

"…We can talk about it more later." Xie Lian mutters, shaking his head. "He's just worried about what would happen if I lost my shackles. But…" He sighs, pressing his forehead against Hua Cheng's sternum.

"Do you know if Shi Qingxuan was able to speak to Blackwater?"

"…She did," Hua Cheng acknowledges. "He's working on setting up the array in Blackwater Manor now."

Which means it won't be that much longer—and they'll need to be free to move when he does.

"…You aren't going to like it," Xie Lian mumbles, muffled by Hua Cheng's robes.

"But I have a plan."

That, of course, doesn't invoke confidence.

"…What sort of plan, you highness?"

"Jun Wu is going to come back here before long," he explains quietly, "when he does—I'm going to provoke him on purpose."

There's a pause.

"…Gege is right."

"I know."

"I hate that plan."

"I know ," Xie Lian agrees. "But there's only one person who has a chance at fighting him in his own territory, and that's you, San Lang."

"Then let me provoke him, I'm very good at it—"

Xie Lian shakes his head.

"Your best chance is if you catch him by surprise," Xie Lian lifts his face, his expression turning stubborn. "And that means—no matter how angry you are, you have to wait for the right moment. When he's completely distracted."

"Dianxia…"

"Is there a better idea?"

"I provoke him myself." Hua Cheng counters, just as stubborn, but…

Xie Lian's expression isn't wavering.

He hates the idea of relying on Hua Cheng to fight Jun Wu at all, but if he doesn't have a choice—

He's going to give him the best chance of succeeding as possible.

"He won't kill me, San Lang—no matter how angry he is. He will kill you."

He's done it before, in one form or another.

"He's going to say horrible things to me—he might strike me—but choose the moment carefully."

The muscles in Hua Cheng's jaw work silently, his gaze cold.

"There is a limit to what I can tolerate, your highness."

"I know," Xie Lian whispers.

He hasn't forgotten what Hua Cheng said in the temple of Wind and Water, when Shi Qingxuan asked him what was the worst suffering there is.

Watching his loved ones in pain.

Xie Lian would never ask him to do that—not unless he thought there wasn't another option.

"Just do your best, San Lang. That's all I ask."

Finally, with extreme reluctance—the ghost king nods, looking over Xie Lian's shoulder, seeing something behind him.

"…Is that how you plan on provoking him, gege?"

Xie Lian nods, having dedicated the last few hours to puzzling that out, and—

Even Hua Cheng has to reluctantly huff out a small laugh, shaking his head.

"…That'll do it."

"I thought so."

"…" Hua Cheng listens for a moment, ears perking just as Xie Lian hears movement on the streets outside.

Yushi Huang, speaking with Jun Wu—clearly delaying him with her slow, methodical way of speaking, detailing their current harvest of eggplants.

"…We don't have much more time," Xie Lian mutters. "He's coming—San Lang?"

He stiffens with surprise when Hua Cheng cups his cheeks in both hands, carefully examining the prince's face—then his arms.

Eye narrowed resentfully on the wound on his hand that hasn't healed.

Ruoye wiggles slightly, obviously pleased to see him, shivering when Hua Cheng's fingers stroke over it in greeting.

"What are you doing?"

"…If he leaves a scratch on you, I'm cutting something off," Hua Cheng explains calmly. "One for every mark."

And just like that, Ruoye isn't the only one shivering.

Hua Cheng leans down, stealing one more kiss from him—and when Xie Lian feels the ghost king trying to give him spiritual power, he pulls back.

"If you do that, he'll know you're here," he reminds him.

Hua Cheng knows , but he lets out a frustrated growl anyway—not directed at Xie Lian, but—

His god rocks forward onto the balls of his feet, pressing a soft kiss against the calamity's cheek.

"You'll be there the entire time," he reminds him gently.

Comforting Hua Cheng as much as himself, in that case.

"…" The ghost king kisses his forehead in response, gaze burning hatefully past Xie Lian's shoulder.

"I have so much to tell you, when this is over."

Xie Lian's heart is in his throat.

"…Me too," he whispers.

Then, in the flash of an instant, the prince's arms are empty.

"…" He clears his throat, pushing his hair behind his ears as he kneels on the ground, going back to where he was before Hua Cheng arrived, and—

The palace doors creak open.

"Xianle."

The prince doesn't turn his head at the sound of Jun Wu's voice, fingers working calmly.

"Your majesty."

He leans against the door frame.

Admiring the sight of Xie Lian kneeling, even if it isn't towards him.

"I've had time to think," the emperor muses, crossing his arms.

"And this change of circumstance seems a little too…all or nothing, for my tastes."

"…It must be very disorienting for you," Xie Lian agrees quietly. "After playing the same role for so long."

"See?" Jun Wu smiles, pleasantly surprised. "You do understand."

He takes a step away from the door. "I'm not opposed to going back to the way things were before. Not just for you—but for everyone."

Xie Lian doesn't look back at him, but his fingers grow still.

"It just requires…a small sacrifice on your part."

"…What sacrifice?"

"Well, it's logical. You and I have always gotten on so well, Xianle. It's just one thing that's always gotten in the way." Jun Wu explains, eyeing Xie Lian’s shoulders. “One thing that makes you so petulant.”

Watches as the god sits up straighter.

“…If you mean you’ll let us go if I let you hurt San Lang, that’s—”

“No, no…” Jun Wu’s tone is soft. Almost gentle.

A reminder of how he sounded before , a voice that makes Xie Lian’s heart ache.

Knowing that kindness isn’t real.

It never was.

“I know how much you adore Crimson Rain,” he soothes, even if his expression is one of disgust. “What I’m proposing is far more humane.”

“…Humane?” Xie Lian asks flatly, hands tightening in his lap when he feels Jun Wu stroking his hair.

“…What if you never knew he existed?”

Xie Lian doesn’t respond, his body going still.

“You’ve lived with such pain, such grief these last eight centuries…I could take all of that away,” Jun Wu croons. “Do you remember how brave you were before? How strong?”

He lifts one lock of Xie Lian’s hair, watching how the strands shine under the light, slipping between his fingertips.

“You could be that person again.”

If he could just be obedient —things could be as they were before.

"...And don't you think it would be selfish to deny such an opportunity?" Jun Wu muses. "Would you doom your friends, all three realms...just because you can't let him go?"

When put in a cosmic scale—it does sound like he's asking for something so small.

How could Xie Lian place his own happiness over the future of the entire Heavenly Court? The fate of the Mortal Realm?

Jun Wu isn't even saying he'll kill Hua Cheng, just—

Just threatening to erase him from Xie Lian's life.

Making them strangers again.

To Jun Wu, that's mercy.

"No."

The Emperor pauses, pulling his hand back.

"...What was that, Xianle?"

"I said no." The prince replies calmly, still facing away from him. "I'm declining your offer."

Jun Wu's expression darkens.

"...You should be grateful I'm giving you a choice at all ," he sneers. "Ungrateful child."

"It wasn't an actual choice," Xie Lian's voice is decisive—holding that same stubbornness that he tried so hard to break back then. "Not for me."

Xie Lian is capable of sacrificing nearly anything if he can rationalize that it benefits the greater good—no matter the cost to himself.

But not him.

Never him

"If you wanted me to stay out of your way, you should have left me in my first banishment."

The Emperor stops for a moment, intrigued by the thought. "...What do you mean?"

"You didn't notice?" Xie Lian mutters, slowly stroking his thumb over the red string tied around his index finger. "I was becoming content, back then."

Spending his days in his shrine with Hong'er.

"That was why Bai Wuxiang took him away from me."

Because he couldn't stand the thought that the Prince of Xianle might not need him.

Subconsciously, Xie Lian knew that. That was why he tried to make Hong'er leave. Why he felt so much guilt after he was gone.

"But if you had given me a few more years..." Xie Lian shrugs. "I would have given up my godhood. Grown old and died with him. Can you imagine how much easier your situation would be now, if you had?"

Xie Lian certainly would have been happier—he knows that much.

"...You really think I would have allowed you to live such a worthless, insignificant life?" Jun Wu hisses, his eyes narrowing.

"No," Xie Lian agrees. "You'll never stop getting in your own way."

It's almost pitiful.

"...And to think, we could have been such friends."

Xie Lian is quiet for a moment—and there’s something about his response that makes even Jun Wu falter.

“I thought we were friends.”

For so, so long.

But they never were.

Xie Lian isn’t sure if he was ever actually a person to Jun Wu at all.

More of a concept.

A tool.

“…Is this your way of trying to tell me goodbye, Xianle?” Jun Wu asks quietly.

For just a moment—the prince’s eyes shine with tears.

But they don’t fall.

“…Yes,” he whispers. “I even made you a parting gift.”

Finally, Jun Wu looks away from Xie Lian—

Looking past him.

To the recent installation to the palace of Xianle—one Jun Wu thought might make his favorite bird sing inside of his cage, finding home in it, instead of fear.

A loom.

And in his hours of weaving—Xie Lian has created quite a tapestry.

It's the Grand Martial Hall.

Or a slightly less filtered version of it.

The marble is bloodstained and cracked—while the windows are shattered and cold.

No Heavenly Light. No kneeling subjects.

And on the throne—

Beneath every mask, lie, and manipulation, is the man who truly sits upon it.

One with a handsome face—but contorted.

Half laughing, half crying.

Limbs curled and twisted around him sinisterly—

Half man, half spider.

And stretching out all around him is his web.

Countless faces ensnared inside.

Xie Lian. Mu Qing. Even—

Even Shi Wudu, a face Xie Lian only saw once, through memory.

Mei Nianqing. Tonglu Hudie.

Jun Wu's children.

And finally, just over Jun Wu's head, is the twisted and broken form of his brother.

Deng Shihong.

Hanging in a horrific display of guilt.

Superimposed over Jun Wu's image, like—

Like he's the one meant to sit in the throne, and Jun Wu—

Is just a monster.

A pretender .

"…What is this…?" Jun Wu whispers, taking one step back.

"I never remember my dreams," Xie Lian lifts his chin, defiant. "But I always remember my nightmares."

He turns his head, hair slipping over his shoulders as he slowly looks up at Jun Wu, cursed shackles gleaming in an accusatory life.

"That's the only time I saw you for what you really are—isn't it, your highness?"

And oh, what a terrifying thing it is.

To be seen so clearly—after years of hiding.

"…"

CRACK!

Xie Lian doesn't make a sound, crumpling to the floor, a deep cut forming in his cheek from the emperor's ring.

"Oh, Xianle." Jun Wu sighs, muted.

Eyes slightly out of focus.

"I tried to warn you."

Xie Lian pushes himself up on one hand, using the other to wipe the blood off of his cheek.

"…You know something interesting," he smiles, not lifting a hand to defend himself as Jun Wu yanks him up by the hair.

So similar to what Bai Wuxiang did, in the Kiln.

Two halves of the same coin.

"Cuckoo birds…are parasitic by choice," the prince explains. "Their parents could raise them, if they wanted to."

Where Jun Wu's hand grips his hair—it trembles.

"It's a choice," Xie Lian laughs faintly.

"They choose to cast their young aside."

The meaning behind the taunt isn't lost on the emperor.

And as it sinks in, rattling throughout his bones…it turns into rage.

Pure, seething rage.

"I warned you, Xianle," he repeats, dragging him forward. "When I told you about the scales."

Getting even isn't enough for him.

When Jun Wu feels provoked—he has to take it too far.

He has to feel power again. To feel control again.

Xie Lian knows.

But he—

BANG!

His head rams into the wall so forcefully, his ears begin to ring, the world spinning around him.

He hadn't expected to be so disoriented.

Not knowing which way is up or down, not until—

He feels his back hitting something soft, recognizing it as—

As the daybed in the palace of Xianle—one that he's never used.

One hand still gripping Xie Lian's hair, the other twisted in the front of his robes.

"…Every time we fight, you always look like this," Jun Wu purrs, their faces so close, Xie Lian can feel his breath against his lips.

"It makes one ache," those fingers reach for his belt. "Makes one excited."

And Xie Lian knows he should be terrified.

He is terrified.

Maybe it’s the blow to his head. Or the stress—even the exhaustion, maybe.

But the only thing that comes out of his mouth is a strained, frantic laugh—one that makes the emperor pause, staring down at him in confusion, lips parting—

Xie Lian doesn’t actually hear it, at first.

He feels Jun Wu’s body being ripped off of him, an incredible rush of wind, but—

It's so fast, the sound itself is delayed by five long seconds—and when it does come, the sound is so explosive, it nearly blows Xie Lian to the ground.

A roaring, thunderous impact.

Jun Wu’s body is sent flying through the wall of the Palace of Xianle—shattering the pane of glass in an instant, sending it raining down across the streets of the Heavens—flipping head over heels, rolling across the ground violently—

Slamming into the gates to the mortal realm.

BOOM!

The Great Gates of the Heavens groan under the impact, but remain firmly shut—

And when Jun Wu looks down, in place of his right hand…

He sees a bleeding stump of a wrist. But when he looks up again, he—

He just sees two gleaming, red eyes—burning like hellfire.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or reuse.

...YOU NEVER LEFT ME!!
martiart

CREDIT: MARTA

The Burning of the Heavens

Chapter Summary

> “And as far as I’m concerned—you were already a dead man.”
>
> “…A dead man?” Jun Wu shakes his head, his other hand finally beginning to grow back completely, fingers sprouting forth. “You could come at me with everything you have—and you could never kill me here.”
>
> “No,” Hua Cheng agrees.
>
> Then, he does something strange.
>
> He sheathes E’Ming, and with a snap of his fingers—his armor disappears.
>
> Leaving his arms bare, dark ink from his tattoos sticking out sharply against his skin.
>
> “You’re right,” he agrees calmly, coming to a halt. “You're invincible in your own territory.”
>
> His eye drifts upwards, evaluating the simulated sky above.
>
> “But your territory isn’t.”

Chapter Notes

> CONTENT WARNINGS: graphic violence, property damage, minor character death.

A wolf—almost completely black from head to toe—launches itself forward, jaws snapping around his other hand—severing it at the wrist.

But when Jun Wu kicks upwards towards its ribs, attempting to wrap his leg around it’s torso and crush it—

It disappears. No—

Changes.

Into a python, slithering up Jun Wu’s leg with lightning quickness—

Constricting until the bone snaps.

And when Jun Wu attempts to bring his elbow down—

It slides up his torso, over his shoulder; and behind him—

Jun Wu hears a roar, a tiger's claws raking down his back.

Jaws clamping around the emperor's neck and squeezing, Jun Wu's eyes widening as he's slammed back against the gates again, realizing —

Hua Cheng is trying to force him to choose between opening the gates to the mortal realm, or—

Losing his head .

Luckily for him—he embraces the virtues of a third option.

Sending a blast of spiritual energy from his body—forcing the calamity to let go, sending him flying back—and by the time E'Ming strikes out, gleaming with deadly aim—

CLANG!

It strikes armor.

"…well," Jun Wu grouses, white plated armor gleaming as he struggles to reattach his right hand. "That was effective. Classless, but what else could be expected."

He surveys Hua Cheng carefully.

Because Jun Wu isn't the only one wearing armor now.

Hua Cheng's typical silver vambraces gleam on his forearms—but the jewelry that typically adorns his chest has transformed into a breastplate—along with bronze Pauldrons on his shoulders.

But his upper arms are completely bare—making Jun Wu raise an eyebrow.

"I don't think I've seen armor with such obvious weak spots," he points out, and with one step, he flashes to Hua Cheng's side, sword aimed upwards, to strike the bare point beneath his arm, but—

CLANG!

It's an earlier Jian model—one of her starters.

Lightweight—but lacking the durability of the others.

Hua Cheng catches the blade between one of his vambraces and E'Ming in a pincer move—and with a twist of his wrist, snaps the weapon in two.

"Calamities aren't so fragile, you'll find."

The pieces fall with a clatter.

He eyes Jun Wu's full set—

Knowing every single point of it, having seen the memories of the smith who forged each plate.

"I don't need to hide behind that much steel."

His words are even as the two circle one another—but his gaze—

It's just as bloodthirsty as the wolf that took his hand.

Just as vicious as the python that snapped his leg.

Just as ferocious as the tiger that mauled his throat.

"...I must say, this is horribly romantic," Jun Wu sneers. "Throwing your life away without hesitation."

Hua Cheng doesn't rise to the bait quite so easily, instead, offering the only response that could make Jun Wu's eyes flare with rage;

"To die for the Crown Prince is my greatest honor," He repeats softly, tilting his head, fingers tightening around the hilt of E'Ming.

Knowing that the emperor must have been watching, that night.

Must know that those were Hon'ger's last words.

And even now, after so much time and effort—

Hua Cheng says them just as easily. Just as sincerely.

And for Jun Wu of all people—

It tastes so bitter.

"...Or maybe I won't kill you," Jun Wu breathes, summoning a new blade into his hand, twirling it between his fingertips as the two circle one another.

Limping slightly—still missing one hand.

"Maybe I'll reduce you to a ghost fire, then make you watch."

Watch him finish what he started .

Hua Cheng's eye doesn't turn back to Xie Lian, the way Jun Wu clearly intends for it to—

(The prince is only half conscious at the moment, and Hua Cheng has several butterflies watching over him already.)

"You think you'll be able to?" Hua Cheng smirks, E'Ming trembling in his grip. "How many times have you tried to get rid of me already? It drives you mad, doesn't it?"

From the way Jun Wu's jaw locks, it would seem so.

"As far as you are concerned, I'll haunt you to the end of your days."

There is no version of Jun Wu's future that doesn't have Hua Cheng in it, standing in his way. Stealing Xie Lian's attentions and affections.

Taking things that should be his .

"...You must understand that this is pointless though, don't you? Fighting me here of all places?"

Jun Wu gestures to the scene surrounding them. The empty streets of the Heavens. His body healing from wounds that would have killed just about anyone else.

"You took me by surprise—but what can you actually do now?"

Here, where the emperor is invincible.

But timing—

It’s really quite a thing.

First, he hears his communication array rumbling to life, a familiar voice uttering one word:

'Ready.'

And, further down the martial avenue, the doors to the Grand Martial Hall slam open.

"HUA CHENGZHU!"

Hua Cheng doesn't take his gaze off of Jun Wu, lifting his hand in acknowledgement of Shuo's voice, knowing that the demon would never interrupt him during a fight. But when he hears what the boy has to say—

"YIN YU IS DEAD!"

E'Ming grows still.

"THAT BASTARD KILLED HIM!"

The Emperor watches the way Hua Cheng's expression remains unchanged, eyes glittering in sadistic amusement.

"Poor thing, receiving such a cold reaction from his only ally…"

"Call me what you like," Hua Cheng replies, his tone frigid. "I don't make a habit of showing sadness in front of sadists."

He's as possessive over his own grief as he is of anything else—and he would never allow Jun Wu to take pleasure from that.

"And as far as I'm concerned—you were already a dead man."

"…A dead man?" Jun Wu shakes his head, his other hand finally beginning to grow back completely, fingers sprouting forth. "You could come at me with everything you have—and you could never kill me here."

"No," Hua Cheng agrees.

Then, he does something strange.

He sheathes E'Ming, and with a snap of his fingers—his armor disappears.

Leaving his arms bare, dark ink from his tattoos sticking out sharply against his skin.

"You're right," he agrees calmly, coming to a halt. " You're invincible in your own territory.”

His eye drifts upwards, evaluating the simulated sky above.

“But your territory isn’t.”

Jun Wu barely has time to process what he means, raising his blade as Hua Cheng lunges—

But the calamity simply leaps over his head.

For centuries, he’s been called Bane of the Heavens.

Hua Cheng never found the name particularly apt.

If anything, he did the Heavens a favor, slaughtering the thirty three. Trimming poisoned, diseased limbs from the base of a tree, allowing room for new growth.

But now—

Now, he intends to earn it.

Xie Lian lifts his head, ears ringing, nausea spilling over until he’s forced to retch, stomach heaving.

But past the ringing, and the blood rushing in his ears—

He hears what he first mistakes as thunder, or an earthquake. Or another avalanche, like on Mount Tonglu.

But after a moment—

He recognizes it as a roar—but far louder than any he’s ever heard before. From a creature he’s only heard of in stories, told to frighten him as a child.

A dragon.

Not the calm, elegant creatures associated with rain and rivers.

Not even like the ferocious water dragons Shi Wudu summoned to battle his third calamity.

Xie Lian can smell nothing but the smoke—feel the ash falling like snow.

“Is…that…?”

A shard of rubble crashes down from overhead, and the prince is too disoriented to move, but—

Boughs of iron wood stretch over him in a canopy, shielding him from the impact—and when Xie Lian smells the trees overhead, he looks around, swaying.

“Shuo?!”

“Here!” He slings Xie Lian’s arm around his shoulders. “The portal is in Ming Yi’s old palace! We have to move!”

Xie Lian stumbles along with him, struggling to keep his balance. “W…What about the others?!”

The next roar is so loud, the demon has to scream to be heard:

“HUA CHENGZHU IS TAKING CARE OF THAT!”

As he speaks, a shadow passes over them, each beat of his wings making the wind blow past them in violent gusts.

A long, serpent like body—crimson scales cladding it in near impenetrable armor—talons longer than spears, gleaming with veins of silver and gold.

Sweeping around, tail cracking like a whip with each turn—coiling its body around the largest structure in the heavens:

The bell tower.

Squeezing until it crumbles—sending the bell that’s been ringing for the past few hours slamming down with a final—

GONG!

The emperor is directly on his trail, blasts of energy missing his body by inches at point, lunging forward to stop him, but—

ROOOOOOOOOAR!

Forced to flee backwards when the square is engulfed in a sea of flame, watching as the celestial metal of the bell melts down.

Knowing what that means.

That all around the capital—

A sleeping army is beginning to wake.

In more ways than one.

“YOUR HIGHNESS!”

Xie Lian winces, waving his arm weakly. “F-FENG XIN! WE’RE HERE! IS MU QING—?”

“HERE!”

He exhales harshly with relief.

“WHAT IS THAT THING?!”

“It’s—” Xie Lian has to lean heavily on Shuo, who has been helping him across the burning wreckage without complaint. “IT’S SAN LANG! He’s creating…an opening for us!”

“What?!” His friends catch up to the two of them. “Stop for a second!”

They skid to a halt, Mu Qing immediately reaching for the blood on Xie Lian’s cheek, looking him over.

“Did you get hit?!”

Xie Lian shakes his head—then immediately regrets it, knees wobbling as Shuo braces him.

“N…Not by the blast…the emperor…”

Mu Qing pales.

“What did he do to you?!”

“I…” Xie Lian squints, “I don’t…really…”

He remembers showing Jun Wu the tapestry—getting slapped—

Then everything else was muddled, until Shuo found him.

“I think I hit…He hit my head…”

“…Sit him down for a second.” Mu Qing kneels down in front of him. “Follow my finger with y—” he stops, curling his index finger back down against his palm sheepishly, staring at the cursed shackles gleaming back at him.

So much for that—or checking the size of his pupils.

“…Squeeze both of my hands.”

Xie Lian does, and after a moment Mu Qing looks up at him, frowning.

“…Is that as hard as you can?”

“No…” Xie Lian slurs, “Don’t wanna hurt you.”

Mu Qing huffs an infuriated, reluctantly affectionate sigh. “But you’re using the same amount of force with both?”

Xie Lian n—

“Don’t move your head if you don’t need to, just say yes or no.”

“…Yes…”

Mu Qing stands up, pressing his hands to either side of his head, visibly stressed.

“His right side is weaker than his left.”

“What does that mean?!”

“…He can’t die,” Mu Qing mutters, stating the obvious. “But his shackles slow his healing rate enough…if we don’t get him down to the mortal realm fast—"

“You can’t help him here?!”

Mu Qing glances at the chaos around them, annoyed.

“Obviously NOT!”

"...Blackwater is opening a portal out of here in his old palace!" Shuo speaks up, blanching slightly when both martial gods look toward him, suddenly reminded of his presence. "We can escape through there!"

"...Can we trust that?"

"Yes..." Xie Lian mumbles. "He's...good..."

Feng Xin and Mu Qing look at one another, clearly each having their doubts, and Shuo offers:

"He promised Hua Chengzhu that he would get Xie Lian out of here safely."

"...Oh." Mu Qing nods. "Then we should go now."

Feng Xin gawks at him.

"Okay, since when are you so trusting of Crimson Rain?! You still haven't explained—"

"And now is NOT a good time!" Mu Qing snaps back at him. "Could you ask when we're not facing imminent death?!"

"Lately that is ALL THE TIME!"

"Okay, when his highness isn't WOUNDED!"

Mu Qing looks down at Xie Lian, thinking. "He really shouldn't even be walking on his own."

Best case would be transferring him carefully—gently—on a stretcher, but—

BOOM!

...That isn't happening.

Xie Lian feels himself being lifted up, and in a matter of seconds, even though it's been centuries, he finds himself in a familiar position.

Hanging from Feng Xin's shoulders, the martial god charging through the rubble with Mu Qing and Shuo flanking on either side.

Mu Qing keeps glancing over at them, eyeing the way Xie Lian's cheek is resting on Feng Xin's shoulder, wishing they could—

"...Ruoye!" He calls out, not expecting much, but—

When the bandage wriggles one end up, tilting—almost like it's looking at him curiously—

Well.

"...Stabilize dianxia's head!"

The spiritual device wiggles in silent acknowledgement, slithering up to wrap around Xie Lian's neck and the base of his skull, stopping his head from moving around too much as they run.

Not ideal, but better than nothing.

"YOU KNOW!" Feng Xin calls over the roaring of the battle overhead. "THIS IS KIND OF LIKE OLD TIMES!"

Mu Qing looks up at him, hair falling in his face, covered in the ash falling from overhead. "WHAT ARE YOU—?!"

Then, he sees the familiar position.

Feng Xin, carrying Xie Lian on his shoulders—the two of them, moving side by side.

Except Xie Lian is half conscious, instead of asleep—and they're escaping the heavens, rather than sneaking back into a palace. And—

And Feng Xin is looking back at him, this time.

"...YEAH," Mu Qing mutters, looking away. "EXCEPT FOR THE KID!"

Making an unusual addition to their trio, but—

"...I'm from Xianle, too!" Shuo offers, leaping over a piece of rubble to keep pace with them.

"HEAR THAT, MU QING?" Feng Xin grunts.

He lifts an arm, catching a falling chunk of marble against one of his vambraces, shattering it, rather than let it hit the other three.

"JUST FOUR KIDS FROM XIANLE, TRYING TO OUTRUN A PSYCHOPATH! THE USUAL!"

In spite of everything—

Mu Qing actually laughs a little.

"Does everyone else know to go to the Palace of the Earth Master?"

"Yeah," Shuo nods, having spoken to Hua Cheng briefly in their communication array before he went, well...airborne. "Someone spread the message!"

"...Who?!"

Jun Wu glances back over his shoulder, finding himself...figuratively and literally, caught between a rock and a hard place.

Hua Cheng can't kill him, but he's making it very clear that he can raze the entire Heavenly Capital to ash—

And Jun Wu can't seem to catch him.

Getting close here and there, but always seeming to just barely let the calamity slip through his fingers, raising another structure, making it very clear—

If Jun Wu doesn't open the gates, he'll break them open himself, eventually.

And when he looks back over his shoulder—

That is the other problem.

Watching countless gods running away from the destruction—free to move since the destruction of the bell. And leading the charge—

Is none other than the Rain Master, riding her Guardian Ox.

The beast rears back, snorting as she lifts Yulong over her head, hair streaming behind her as she guards the path, looking the emperor in the eye—not holding an ounce of fear.

"EVEN YOU, OLD FRIEND?!"

The edge of her sword gleams in the firelight.

"I keep better company."

Jun Wu wrenches his head to the side, looking at the deputies and martial gods he appointed personally—officials who have nothing without him.

"If a single one of them escapes—you're ALL going into the fire, understand?!"

The group balks, but...see no choice.

But when they start to go after their fellow gods, swords raised, they...

Round the corner, growing still at the sight of one man, blocking the path to the palace of the earth master.

Just one, but in this case...

"Well," Pei Ming crosses his arms. "How are we doing this?"

The other officials stop, looking at one another unsurely, and the General shrugs.

"You could all come at me at once, or, if that's too embarrassing for you, you can form an orderly little line, so you can tell the emperor you lost to me one on one. I'm not particularly picky."

"...You think we want this?!" One of the younger officials cries out, looking agonized. "He's going to kill us if we don't!"

"And I'm going to kill you if you do," Pei strokes his chin. "Or you throw down your weapons, and I let you pass with the others."

Most of the deputies throw down their weapons without hesitation, sprinting past Pei Ming desperately—almost relieved for the opportunity to get away, even if it means giving up whatever privileges staying might have afforded them.

It's the other martial gods who remain.

"Okay," He acknowledges those who remained, rolling up his sleeves, and asking the same question as before. "How are we doing this?"

There's still hesitation on the other side—the one in the front rolling his eyes, looking back at the rest.

"Are you idiots kidding?! He's been half dead already, ever since the Water Master went and got himself killed! He probably WANTS us to kill him—!"

CRACK!

The other gods watch in silent horror as Pei Ming appears behind him, snapping his neck in one quick twist of his hands.

The man is dead before he hits the ground, with Pei kneeling down to pick up his sword, testing the weight of it in his palm as he straightens up.

"Actually, I am dying to have a talk with the old man, so I'm pretty motivated right now."

His eyes glint dangerously as he looks up, pushing his hair out of his face, holding his weapon aloft with the other.

“So,” he repeats, staring them down. “How are we doing this?”

The gods look at each other grimly, then—

They charge as one.

Good.

It’s less boring that way.

The Palace of Ming Yi is mostly abandoned, covered in dust and forgotten scrolls—

And endless barrels of stored food, but that isn’t much of a shock.

In a rare show of volume, Yushi Huang shouts over the crowd—

“THE ARRAY IS ON THE LOWER LEVEL! MOVE IN SINGLE FILE IF POSSIBLE!”

“…Single file?” Mu Qing mutters, skeptical. “What kind of transportation array requires that?”

“There’s…a lot of us,” Xie Lian’s cheek is still slumped against Feng Xin’s shoulder, struggling not to fall asleep. “And if it’s like the one… San Lang used before…”

“Before?”

“He must have meant when Hua Cheng stole him away from his palace before the mid-autumn festival,” Mu Qing recalls. “Back when I…”

“Punched me.” Feng Xin nods. “I remember.”

Given how he deserved it in that instance, however…he doesn't complain.

"What was it like back then?"

Xie Lian can think the words, but his mouth struggles to obey, speech slurring.

"…Tunnel…"

"…Tunnel? Your highness, you—Feng Xin, don't let him fall asleep!"

"You think I have any control over that?!"

But when they step through the entrance to the array—it becomes clear.

Most transportation arrays are like doors. The minute you step through, you're already in your next destination.

But traveling all the way from the Heavens…is slightly more complicated.

In this case, there's a narrow, winding path—but not exactly like a tunnel, either.

There are steep drop offs on either side, leading down to…

Mu Qing peeks his head over, the lava pits below illuminating his cheeks.

"…Is Blackwater trying to help us escape, or kill us faster?!"

Shuo taps his fingers to his temple, listening.

"…It's not on purpose," he explains. "He says he didn't have much time to open a new pathway—and Jun Wu is actively trying to close it."

Leaving an unstable, incomplete result.

Mu Qing wants to gripe more—but even he realizes it was a nearly impossible task.

But now, it leaves them with only one choice:

Hurrying in a line down a long, uneven path—

With only certain death awaiting them below, if they're unfortunate enough to fall.

"…There's no way everyone in the Heavens is making it out at this rate."

"Nope," Feng Xin agrees. "But it's better than no one getting out."

Which was certainly the alternative.

"…Is this an every man for himself sort of situation, you think?" Feng Xin mutters, moving them down the path. "Or is someone in charge?"

Mu Qing's first instinct is to open his mouth and say of course there is, but—

That question becomes more complicated when the person trying to kill you is the person who was in charge.

"…If we go for the former, it'll be easy for Jun Wu to pick us off."

"Right," Feng Xin nods, having had the same concern. "So, who is it?"

And that—

That question isn't as easy to answer.

"…Let's just focus on getting out of here and helping his highness first," Mu Qing mutters, rubbing his temples.

Shuo keeps watching the three out of the corner of his eye, finding the experience of walking beside them somewhat…surreal.

It was strange enough meeting Xie Lian in the beginning—the famous crown prince from his childhood.

But here, with his friends…

Seeing the two famous generals of the war he grew up surrounded by, Feng Xin and Mu Qing, feels almost...surreal.

Watching them bicker and worry like normal people—all while faced with a situation that couldn't be further from mundane.

Admittedly, some of the magic of fame had already worn off from watching them scream and argue outside of the Inn over who the father of Lan Cheng's child was, who was in love with who, all while wearing disguises that no one was actually fooled by—

But still, it's surreal.

Even now, walking down a path surrounded by gods—creatures Hua Cheng historically taught him to fear, to the point where he was sick with terror after killing the true earth master—

They're...surprisingly helpless, when the cards are down.

Fleeing from the Heavens in a rushed, panicked mass—some of them more collected and dignified than others, but—

For the most part, they seem terrified. And in some places, the progress has turned into more of a stampede than a calm evacuation.

All of which he could watch with calm observation—maybe even distant pleasure, given how he was raised to dislike heavenly officials as much as fear them, but—

When he sees one face in the crowd, stumbling, getting elbowed closer and closer to the edge...his stomach drops.

"...Kid?" Mu Qing twists his head back, watching as Shuo turns around, running back the way you came. "Where are you—?"

"...GUZI!" He elbows and shoves his way through the crowd, struggling to keep sight of the boy. "GUZI!"

"HEY!" Someone grabs his forearm, trying to stop him, and when the demon whips his head around, fangs bared and hissing—

Lang Qianqiu glares back at him, glancing at the officials around them, tense. "What do you think you're doing?! You have to get out of here!"

And Shuo flaunting his very obvious demonic nature on a path crowded with Heavenly Officials isn't exactly smart.

"...Sorry for embarrassing you in front of your comrades ," He hisses, yanking his hand out of Lang Qianqiu's grip.

"That's not—!" Lan Qianqiu grits his teeth.

"Could you stop being a brat for one second and just—!"

"Guzi is here! " Shuo snaps, and the martial god's entire expression changes. "At this rate, he's going to get shoved off of the array! He's getting trampled!"

At that point, Lang Qianqiu is running with him.

"THERE'S A MORTAL CHILD!" He shouts, far louder than Shuo could, managing to get a few of the officials in their path to move out of the way, shoving past the rest as Shuo darts ahead, but just as he manages to snatch the child up in his arms—

BOOM!

A great force presses down from above, rattling the path around them—screams echoing across the array as those unfortunate to be close enough to the edge are sent tumbling down into the fiery pits below.

And Shuo—

He feels the tug of gravity in his stomach, dragging him down.

In some distant way, he knows this means that Jun Wu must be attacking the palace of Ming Yi above—that the entire pathway is in danger. But for some reason, all he can think to do is hold Guzi tighter against him, knowing that it could be worse.

It's better than going alone.

There's nothing worse than that.

But—

THUD!

Shuo feels himself land back down on the path again—hard, eyes widening with shock, and in the span of what could only be a few seconds, nothing more—

Everything happens so fast.

He hears Guzi scream, in the most gut wrenching voice—

"DAD!"

And he just—

Feels himself lunging forward, arm thrust out, and the next thing he knows...

He has his heels braced against the edge, pulling back with all his might—gripping the hands of his worst enemy.

Qi Rong.

"...You..." Shuo stares down at him, speechless. "Why...WHY WOULD YOU DO THAT?!"

The green ghost struggles, gripping his wrist with both hands, feet kicking helplessly.

"I DON'T KNOW!" He snaps. "WHY WOULD YOU CATCH ME?!"

"...I don't know," Shuo answers hoarsely.

"Dad!" Guzi cries, rushing over, only for Shuo to whip his head around, snarling—

"He ISN'T your Dad! Stay away from the edge!"

The boy flinches, staring back at him with wide eyes.

"I...I know he's a ghost!" Shuo and Lang Qianqiu both stop, staring at him.

"But he's nicer to me than my actual dad was! He protected me! And he didn't leave me behind!" Guzi croaks, tears rolling down his cheeks.

That's more of an insult to his birth father than a testament to Qi Rong , but...

"THEN LISTEN TO YOUR OLD MAN AND STAY BACK, BRAT!"

Shuo looks down at Qi Rong, eyes round with shock as the ghost glares at Guzi. "LAST THING I FUCKING NEED IS A USELESS ASS KID GETTING IN THE WAY, GOT IT?!"

"Didn't leave you?!" Lang Qianqiu grumbles, pulling Guzi away. "He KIDNAPPED YOU! MULTIPLE TIMES!"

"I WANTED TO GO!" Guzi screams, trying so hard to get back to him, kicking and screaming.

"He—" Shuo shakes his head, fingers tightening around Qi Rong's arm. "He's NOT your dad, Guzi."

"HE IS , HE—!"

"Your dad—" the demon locks his jaw, "—he's the person who makes you feel safer than ANYONE else in the world!"

Someone who could make him feel safe in a place like this, with the world crashing down around them.

"Your dad wouldn't call you a useless brat!"

Shuo swallows hard, shaking his head. "He—He wouldn't let you be hungry, or scared—and he—he wouldn't make you feel like you had to have a REASON to stay around!"

Because when someone loves you, you don't have to justify your own existence.

You don't have to be useful .

He won't throw you away because of the body you were born with. He won't leave you alone.

He'll find you, no matter how many times you get lost. He'll help you, no matter how many mistakes you make.

It—

It doesn't matter how many times you fail, as long as you're still here.

"...MAYBE THAT'S WHAT YOUR DAD DOES!" Guzi shakes his head vehemently. "BUT MY DAD IS DIFFERENT! AND THAT'S OKAY!"

"I DON'T HAVE A—!" Shuo stops, shocked when—

When a pained sob rips from him, shoulders trembling.

Maybe it shouldn't be a shock, after everything that's happened today. Being tortured by Jun Wu. Watching Yin Yu die right in front of him, but—

Qi Rong seems just as shocked as he is when Shuo's tears land on his cheek.

Lang Qianqiu hands Guzi off, kicking and screaming, to Mu Qing, the three of them having stopped to help—then rushes forward, wrapping his arms around Shuo's waist as he starts to heave him back up, but—

But Qi Rong won't budge.

"What...what the hell!" Shuo grunts, veins popping in his forehead as he pulls with all of his strength, muscles in his arms straining.

"Yeah..." Qi Rong looks down, seeing—

A flood of resentful spirits lunging up from the flames, hands gripping his ankles.

"...THIS IS WHY THIS ANCESTOR DOESN'T PLAY FUCKING HERO!" he grumbles, trying to kick his feet, but—

It's no use.

"...Shuo," Lang Qianqiu grunts in his ear. "You have to let him go."

The demon freezes, his heart leaping into his throat.

"NO!" He thrashes, breathing heavily as he pulls with everything he has. "I'M NOT GOING TO OWE THIS PIECE OF SHIT ANYTHING!"

Qi Rong looks back down again, lingering for a moment, and when he lifts his head—

For the briefest moment, his eyes find Mu Qing.

Neither of them are particularly likable, in their own ways. Each deeply misunderstood. In Mu Qing's case, more tragically.

Qi Rong has never been a creature that was actually meant to be pitied.

But Mu Qing was the first and only person to protect him when it was needed.

"...HA!" He shakes his head. "YOU THINK YOU'D FUCKING OWE ME, YOU LITTLE IDIOT?!" His eyes snap back to Ren Song, gleaming in the fire light. "DON'T YOU SEE?! THIS MEANS I BEAT YOU! I BEAT BOTH OF YOU!" He taunts Xie Lian, blinking groggily from Feng Xin's shoulders.

"YOU WANTED TO DIE A HERO SO MANY TIMES—AND LOOK WHO'S DOING IT FIRST!" He shouts, brimming with vindication. "YOU THINK YOU'RE TOO GOOD TO BE MY FAMILY?! IT DOESN'T MATTER, I DID SOMETHING ELSE YOU COULDN'T! THIS ANCESTOR HAS A SON!"

Then, his eyes return to Shuo one last time.

"AND YOU—AFTER EVERYTHING I'VE DONE TO YOU, HOW MANY LIFETIMES OF PUNISHMENT DO YOU THINK I'D HAVE TO GO THROUGH?! THIS...THIS WAY I GET OFF EASY!" He cackles. "I KILLED YOUR BROTHER; I KILLED YOUR FATHER—AND I GOT AWAY WITH IT!"

In spite of everything—Qi Rong isn't a particularly spiritual person.

He's never believed that gods were all powerful and all knowing. His cousin rid him of that belief ages ago.

And he doesn't know if reincarnation is really what awaits you, when your soul moves on.

Part of him always believed there was nothing—just oblivion. And he took comfort in that fact.

That he could haunt this earth, but his actions would never haunt him in return.

That what he did didn't matter, if there were no consequences in the end.

There were things his father taught him before he was old enough to understand. Things he was complicit in before he knew what they meant .

And he couldn't understand it when he died, and all of the things that endeared Qi Rong to his father…

Disgusted everyone else.

The king and queen never said it with words—simply showed it with this helpless, hollow lack of affection.

Tolerating him—but never telling him where he was wrong. Presuming he was beyond saving.

There's no way of knowing at that point if he actually was.

But it felt hopeless.

And when a certain White Clothed Calamity came knocking—it felt like the world made sense again. He knew how to gain someone's acceptance again.

If the path to it was foul—he had never been shown another way.

And it didn't matter—because when you let go, you're just gone .

It wasn't until Guzi that part of him began to wonder. Wonder the same thing any parent does.

What kind of life your children will have after you.

The memories that you leave behind.

If there's any justice after death, he's already hopeless—because Xie Lian is right.

If he ever tried to look back and take an honest inventory of himself—of everything that he's done—

It would eat him alive.

But.

But if there's nothing after you die, you don't have to even out those scales. It doesn't matter.

It's more about who you leave behind.

How they remember you.

Giving a boy one thing to look back on, and say—

'My dad did that.'

Because he isn't going to have anything else left of you.

"…You didn't kill my dad," Shuo mutters, staring down at him in confusion.

His father died of old age.

Happy. Loved.

And for once—Qi Rong doesn't scream. Doesn't swear. Doesn't curse his enemies.

He just—

He just smiles, canines glistening in the firelight.

"Sure I did—ask my shitty cousin all about it."

Then, for a brief moment, he flexes his arm, pulling up to whisper close to Shuo's ear.

When he pulls back, Shuo—

He hates him. He really fucking hates him, he'll never forgive him, but —

He can't stop crying.

And he hates the fact that he's crying for him. Hates the fact that he's scared. Hates knowing that he'll never—

"Funny or scary, right?" Qi Rong looks back and forth between Shuo and Lang Qianqiu, letting out one final, howling cackle. "LOOKS LIKE THIS TIME, THE JOKE IS ON YOU TWO FUCKERS!"

But this time, in this one, solitary instance—

Shuo can see that he doesn't mean it.

"DON'T!"

Finally—

Qi Rong lets go.

Plunging out of sight as Lang Qianqiu yanks Shuo back over the edge, arms wrapped around him tightly as the two end up sprawled on the ground.

"DAD!" Guzi screams, reaching out uselessly over Mu Qing's shoulder, sobbing as the god carries him away, not allowing him to look.

"DAD!"

Shuo is frozen for a moment, looking at the spot where Qi Rong disappeared, waiting for him to burst back up, screaming that he fooled them again. Or for him to get lucky one more time. Or for this to be a dream. But—

None of that happens.

And eventually...

The demon notices how tightly Lang Qianqiu is holding him. Even when the threat of falling has passed. In spite of the fact that there are countless other gods around to see it.

He's clinging onto Shuo like—

Like he's afraid he might disappear.

But Shuo…

His body is still solid, showing no sign of disappearing.

Even though he doesn’t know why anymore.

His face turns into Lang Qianqiu’s sleeve—muffling his tears for a moment, rather than instinctively pushing him away.

Not struggling when Lang Qianqiu rises to his feet, pulling the forest demon along with him.

“We have to hurry,” he mutters, coaxing Shuo into continuing on down the path. “Who knows how many more hits this thing can take.”

And even if they did—

Xie Lian needs treatment—now.

Above—

The Heavens all around have been reduced to morning more than a burning pile of ash. With even the gods themselves having retreated.

With Jun Wu caught between smashing down the remaining foundations of the Palace of Ming Yi, or—

Stopping Hua Cheng from burning the rest

His body smashing through the windows of the Grand Martial Hall—columns of flame bursting the roof open as he rakes the walls with his claws, tearing them down.

A hall that has stood over the three Realms for thousands of years, and now—

It's just rubble.

“Well, well…” When the dragon speaks, it’s low and rumbling, filling the sky of the burning city as he climbs atop the rubble, eyes gleaming. “It seems someone built his throne on a grave.

Jun Wu knows it’s a distraction—to keep him from destroying the tunnel.

But still.

He glances back over his shoulder—lip curled with disdain.

“As victors often do.”

“Oh, but you should know better, your majesty.”

Jun Wu has never heard his title spoken with such contempt.

“The souls of the slaughtered rarely go quietly.”

As he speaks, Jun Wu sees them.

Swirling piles of ash, rising up and coiling around his ankles, dragging him down, down, down.

He can't see their faces. Can't see their voices, but—

He feels their wrath.

The old gods. Slaughtered and fallen.

Wrathful after countless years of living beneath his feet—only able to catch glimpses of the heavenly light they once enjoyed by peeking through gaps in the floorboards.

And as he struggles, obliterating their souls one by one—

Hua Cheng slams through the gates.

Leaving the false emperor alone in his kingdom of ashes, struggling beneath the souls of his murdered comrades.

Calamities are frightful things.

Wrathful spirits that could lay waste to an entire nation.

But now—

A single calamity has eradicated an entire realm in one day.

But this is not the end—not even close.

Hua Cheng barely touched the emperor—simply darted around him while he broke the gilded bars of his prison.

Now, he has no place to imprison his victims.

Now, he has no place left to hide.

The real battle—

That starts now .

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or use without permission.

[image]

CREDIT: RAUCH

[image]

CREDIT: REN

[image]

CREDIT: MECHAMISH

You Won't Go Alone

Chapter Summary

> “San…San Lang…?”
>
> They were…just in his palace, weren’t they? Or—no, no that isn’t right.
>
> There was a dragon.
>
> No.
>
> San Lang was a dragon—
>
> “He’s preoccupied at the moment.”

The first thing Xie Lian registers is the sense of dampness. The smell of salt and brine.

“San…San Lang…?”

They were…just in his palace, weren’t they? Or—no, no that isn’t right.

There was a dragon.

No.

San Lang was a dragon—

“He’s preoccupied at the moment.”

He recognizes Pei Ming’s voice—surprised by how dark his tone is, but —

“Lay down,” Mu Qing’s voice is in his ear, a hand on his shoulder as he stops Xie Lian from sitting up.

“Where…” Xie Lian swallows, struggling to get his lips to form words. “Where are we…?”

“Blackwater Manor.” The minute Feng Xin says it, Xie Lian realizes how familiar their surroundings feel—

Remembering that day.

More painful than most of his recent memories—feeling like he had failed Shi Qingxuan, and…given how it ended…

It’s no surprise Pei is angry.

Even if Blackwater had a right to take Shi Wudu's life...

If it were Hua Cheng, in the exact same circumstances—Xie Lian knows he couldn't look past that or forgive it either.

Lang Qianqiu glances around, carrying Guzi on his back. "...If this is his lair, then where is he?"

"Pretending to be a deputy civil god in the corner," Ling Wen's tone couldn't be more dry, and in the distance—they hear a quiet curse of annoyance.

"...It was worth a shot."

"Wait," Feng Xin turns to Ling Wen. "Since when were you back on our side?!"

She doesn't bother to answer, turning her attention to Pei Ming, who already has the ghost king by the front of the robes.

"We're in his territory now, Pei-Xiong. You really want to try that?"

The General pauses, his fist pulled back—arm trembling with fury.

"...And before you get any ideas of trying to repeat what Crimson Rain just did, I'd like to remind you that we'll drown if you destroy—”

"I got it." Pei snaps, his jaw clenched as he lets He Xuan go, sending him an absolutely venomous look. "I'll deal with you later."

He Xuan didn't lift a hand to defend himself when Pei first grabbed him—and doesn't attempt to do so now, answering calmly;

"We'll have a lot to talk about."

A statement that seems infuriating to Pei Meing, who wants to do anything but talk.

There's faint rumbling overhead, prompting Blackwater to look up, pressing his fingers to his temple.

"...That's not good," he mutters under his breath, walking towards the exit.

"Just where are you going?!"

"The Emperor already knows I was the one who created the escape route," He Xuan mutters. "And it wouldn't take a genius to figure out where the destination would be."

And it would seem that if he can't use the Heavenly Capital as a prison—

He'll just use it as a bomb instead.

Dropping the ruins down on top of Blackwater's territory with the intention of destroying it—and simultaneously killing any witnesses inside.

"Hua Cheng is dealing with him above," the water demon explains, cracking his neck.

"I have to assist."

Mu Qing can't stop looking between Xie Lian, and the man he once knew as Ming Yi. Already aware of the fact that the man had ascended as a god after killing the previous Water Master, but—

He never realized that Ming Yi's form was intentionally unimposing.

By comparison, the man before him is far taller—nearly as tall as Hua Cheng and the emperor himself. Broader.

Not someone who could easily melt into the background behind the bright charm of Shi Qingxuan's personality, like he could before.

"...We have to get his highness out of here," Mu Qing finally speaks up, addressing the far more pressing issue. "He needs to get back to Mount Taicang."

"Mount Taicang?" Feng Xin turns to look at him, baffled. "Why would we need to go back there?"

"The array will remain operational as long as I'm within the territory," He Xuan mutters. "Ling Wen knows how they operated back when I used to develop them for the Heavens—she can direct people as needed."

With that, he disappears through a hidden exit.

“…Do you think Hua Cheng actually needs help, or He Xuan just wanted to get away from Pei Ming?” Shuo mumbles, still a little shell shocked—and Mu Qing sighs.

“Both.”

Pei stares after him for a moment, then turns to look at the array on the ground.

Remembering.

‘ You would have been perfect.’

The look on his face, when he pushed him away.

‘And I’m so sorry.’

Sorry, because he knew Pei Ming never wanted to go first.

Grief bubbles up in his chest, the pain still so overwhelming, it nearly drowns him.

But it doesn’t.

He exhales harshly, picturing his face clearly.

Even after having so many loves, and living through so much grief—

Nothing ever prepares you for what it means to grieve the love of your life.

You can only breathe through it, one exhale at a time.

But Pei squeezes that feeling down. Crushing it between his palms into a small, manageable size.

He puts it in a box, locking it away, to be opened and examined later.

Then—Pei Ming does what he’s always done.

“Ling Wen—have you reconnected the communication arrays?”

“Just now,” she agrees, rolling up her sleeves. “Yours should be active.”

Pei Ming presses his hands to his temples, listening.

It’s not ideal, but at the moment—

He's the last god living with a base of worshippers even comparable to Jun Wu's.

"…Most of the deaths have been in the imperial city," he says after a moment of listening to prayers.

There are skilled cultivation sects in Yunmeng, Gusu, and Qinghe, so it isn't a shock that they could hold off longer but—

Langling is oddly quiet.

"…Anyone who isn't willing to fight, Ling Wen will evacuate you to Yunmeng." He raises his voice to be heard over the crowd of officials. "If you do, and we fail—the emperor will hunt the rest of you down. If we win—this will be considered resigning your godhood."

That causes terrified murmurs to echo through the crowd.

"…You're just hanging us out to dry either way! You're saying we can't be gods unless we're willing to die out there?!"

"That's exactly what I'm saying," Pei replies, not affected by the outrage.

"This is one of the only situations where we're expected to make ourselves useful."

"But you—! You don't even have the AUTHORITY! You can't take someone's—"

"If we get through this, there is a very short list of people who could end up in charge of whatever is left."

Pei crosses his arms. "And I can tell you that every single one of them will have you exiled for running away. Civil gods—" Pei Ming pauses, looking at Shuo. "Would they be allowed in Ghost City?"

The forest demon stares back at him, surprised that Pei would ask him, but…

Given that Hua Cheng is obviously busy—there's nobody else he could ask.

"…Yes. But I can't promise they'll be popular—"

"It's the safest place for anyone who can't fight at the moment." He nods to Ling Wen, who activates the array. "Any martial gods who aren't willing to fight—say so now."

He doesn't have to ask Yushi Huang where she stands, and, well—

There aren't any other elemental masters left.

"The rest of you will be deployed to the Imperial City to await orders. Tai Hua and Qi Ying—stay back."

Of course, giving any orders to Quan Yizhen is redundant at the moment. The martial god of the west has been quiet since they arrived, and he—

He still hasn't been willing to put him down.

Not yet.

The movement through the chamber this time around is far more organized than their rushed exit from the Heavens—with Ling Wen quickly dividing the gods into groups, calling their names and destinations as they step forward, disappearing through the array one by one.

And as he watches the chamber begin to clear—Mu Qing finds himself more exasperated than ever.

"Look—we don't have time to wait any longer, we need to get the prince to—"

"Mount Taicang," Feng Xin recalls, Xie Lian's head resting in his lap. "Why there?"

"..." Mu Qing stares at him for a moment, his lips pursed. "...Hua Cheng and Blackwater could have had that escape route from Mount Tonglu leading anywhere—but they chose Mount Taicang. There has to be a reason."

"And how do we know if that helps us?"

"If Hua Cheng was the one who made it—" Admitting it feels like pulling teeth, but Mu Qing spits the words out. "He did it for Xie Lian's sake."

"Heal him here," Pei Ming mutters, taking a flask from Ling Wen, tilting his head as he knocks back three deep swallows.

"But—"

"Blackwater isn't suppressing anyone's abilities, it shouldn't be an issue for you, and—" He points to Xie Lian, who has slipped back into unconsciousness. "Jun Wu could have incapacitated him plenty of other ways. He wanted his highness disoriented for a reason."

Mu Qing's guess is far worse than Pei Ming's.

"The prince implied he learned critical information about Jun Wu and Bai Wuxiang—and how to defeat them—in the Kiln. We can't plan for the situation until we know what we're dealing with."

Pei Ming already has the beginnings of a plan—but Blackwater Manor is a fortress. Jun Wu will break through eventually, but it's better than Mount Taicang, an exposed ruin.

He doesn't intend to leave one of the only defensible positions they have without a strategy.

He turns away from them, moving to help Ling Wen with the array. "Let me know when he's awake."

Mu Qing stares after him for a minute, his lips turning pale from how tightly he's pressing them together—and Feng Xin watches him suspiciously.

"What's with you?"

Mu Qing casts an annoyed look his way, pushing his hair out of his face, pulling it up into a ponytail. "The fuck is that supposed to mean?"

"You seem so worried—I don't get why you didn't start working on him as soon as we got here," Feng Xin mutters, frowning.

That's what he's always done before, when someone was seriously injured. Especially Xie Lian. He didn't even wait to completely break free from the Butterfly Silk before healing his ribs in Mount Tonglu—and that wasn't nearly as severe.

"..." Mu Qing looks around them.

Most of the other gods are focused on following Pei Ming's orders, filing to leave—or huddled together, whispering nervously. But—

Still, no one is looking their way.

Feng Xin knows that look.

That sharp, defensive expression, one that most find abrasive, but...

In Feng Xin's experience, it usually just means he's panicking.

"...Hey," He lowers his voice, leaning closer to avoid being overheard. "Did someth—? Hey—!" He starts to cry out indignantly when Mu Qing grabs him by the front of his shirt, yanking him over.

But...

Then, he's just frozen in abject shock, lost in the feeling of a familiar pair of lips against his own.

(The one person who was still looking, Shuo, turns around sharply, slinking away from the scene in discomfort.)

And while it's not necessarily the time or the place, Feng Xin is just on the verge of sinking into it, one hand drifting up longingly towards Mu Qing's hair, but—

That's when the other martial god pulls back, turning back to Xie Lian, leaving Feng Xin in stunned silence.

"Wha..." He starts, then stops, lips parted—tingling slightly. "What was that for?!"

And of course, now Mu Qing seems more than happy to get started, palms glowing as he places them on either side of Xie Lian's head.

"Shut up!"

"...The fuck?!" He sputters.

"I thought we weren't doing that anymore?!"

"...It's not like we ever had an explicit agreement one way or the other," Mu Qing sneers, glancing around again to make sure no one saw.

"I thought you DECKING me was a pretty CLEAR INDICATION—”

"I've decked you before!"

"...So, now we ARE doing that again?"

"No!" Mu Qing shakes his head vehemently, his hair slapping Feng Xin in the face—a final blow to the man's sanity.

"But you just—!"

"If the mother of your child is going to ruin my life because she thinks you've been in love with me for centuries, I might as well do what I fucking want , right?!" Normally, Mu Qing would shout those words at him, but given their surroundings—he's forced to hiss.

"...So...what, you needed to kiss me to work up the motivation to heal dianxia's head wound?!"

"No—”

"Then that's just what you wanted to do?!"

Mu Qing grits his teeth, squeezing his eyes shut. "I just needed a little help, alright?! Will you fucking drop it?!"

That taps into Feng Xin's prior worries, making him think back on all the strange behavior from before, suddenly staring at Mu Qing with renewed concern.

"...Since when do you need help with something like that—?"

Both of them fall silent, however, when Xie Lian stirs.

On the far side of the chamber, Pei Ming watches the final groups disappear through the array, arms crossed—deep in thought.

"...Am I staying behind with the rest of you?" Lang Qianqiu mutters, feeling...

Out of sorts.

Still struggling to make sense of recent events.

For the last few months of his life, everything he did revolved around Qi Rong.

Tracking him down. Capturing him. Holding him prisoner. Then he would escape, and the cycle would begin again.

But now...he's gone.

And for some reason, even though it's only been a relatively short period of time—

Lang Qianqiu struggles to imagine himself going back to the life he lived before.

It feels strange, looking to his fellow martial gods to decide his next steps.

...When did that start?

"No—I'll be sending you to Gusu," Pei Ming explains carefully, still listening carefully as prayers come in and out. "There aren't any distress calls coming in. You should be able to handle it on your own, but..."

He needs someone to secure Shi Qingxuan.

And out of the martial gods he can afford to spare—Lang Qianqiu is the only one he trusts.

"And what about the regions further north?"

"North of Gusu?" That only leaves Lanling, where there's been near silence. "I re-deputized Pei Su and sent him that way."

“…Are you allowed to do that?” Lang Qianqiu asks, surprised.

Pei Ming raises an eyebrow, lifting his flask to his lips once more. “Given the situation? We need all the hands we can get.”

And the punishment feels even less binding now, knowing Jun Wu’s true motives.

Lang Qianqiu falls silent, watching the others leave as he waits for his turn. And when Pei Ming turns his head…

“Hey—you.”

Shuo glances up from where he’s been leaning against the wall, his arms crossed—essentially just trying to stay out of the way.

“You were the last one to leave Mount Tonglu with Hua Cheng and Xie Lian, right?”

“…Yeah,” He agrees quietly. “Why?”

“How are they keeping Bai Wuxiang trapped there?”

“…That’s hard to explain,” he mutters. “But there’s a ghost holding him at bay inside the Kiln.”

Pei Ming rubs the back of his head, thinking. “But that won’t hold.”

“…” Shuo shakes his head in agreement. “She’s locked to the Kiln’s location. Once he gets past her, there’s nothing left to stop him from escaping.”

“If he did escape—what do you think he would do?”

It’s hard to predict a narcissistic psychopath, but…from the perspective of a ghost? Shuo knows what he would do.

“Most likely? He’ll try to join back up with the emperor.”

And once he does—defeating him will be impossible.

“…And just how strong is Bai Wuxiang on his own?”

Shuo breathes in carefully through his nose, steadying himself as he remembers the Terrace of Cascading Wine.

“About as strong as Hua Chengzhu. Probably stronger, even if it’s not by much.”

Pei Ming falls silent for a moment, thinking.

“…I have to say something to the emperor first,” he mutters, rubbing his chin. “But then I’ll have to go back to Tonglu myself.”

Ling Wen stiffens, shaking her head. “That’s a terrible idea. The other martial gods won’t follow anyone but you—”

“Sending anyone else right now would be a death sentence,” Pei Ming mutters. “And the one person who could be an asset in this situation is trapped under three cursed shackles. Unless you have a better idea—”

“That won’t work.”

The two fall silent, looking back at Shuo.

“Mei Nianqing seemed to have a plan for dealing with Dianxia’s shackles,” Shuo explains slowly. “You should speak to him. But you would never make it to Mount Tonglu in time to stop him.”

Pei Ming glances back at the travel array.

“I planned on taking the same route you did.”

Shuo follows his gaze—and the set of his mouth becomes grim.

“You can’t do that, either.”

“There’s no one else—”

“Hua Chengzhu and Blackwater designed that path so a very limited number of people could use it,” he mutters. “You aren’t one of them. It won’t open for you.”

And even if they could get him there—he’d be trapped with no means of escape.

Shuo closes his eyes.

There’s so much behind them.

Qi Rong, falling.

Yin Yu, mouthing the word ‘run.’

How tightly Lang Qianqiu held him, thinking he would disappear.

“But it will for me.”

When he opens his eyes again—there’s an icy level of calm settling across his expression, and Pei Ming…

Just stares at him, shaking his head.

“I can’t ask you to do that.”

“You didn’t.”

“You’d die out there, kid. Again. You wouldn’t do anything but buy us time—”

“I know.”

He’s remarkably calm, discussing it with such a pragmatism—Pei Ming is reminded of the ghost’s actual age.

“But you need time, and I’m the only one with a way in and out that isn’t already fighting Mount Tonglu outside. You can win without me. You can’t win without time.”

The rumbling outside is a painful reminder of that fact.

“…How much could you realistically give us?”

“A few hours.”

With the type of combat he specializes in, he doesn’t actually need to be stronger than Bai Wuxiang to occupy him.

He’s mentally unstable. If Shuo can distract him—then he can hold him there for a time.

Long enough for the others to be ready.

“That would be a huge risk to take without that much reward…”

“It’s not a huge risk,” Shuo shakes his head.

He's disposable. Anyone else who could go right now wouldn't be. "And I'm the best person to do it."

"That's—”

"I've spent more time on the terrain of Mount Tonglu than Hua Cheng has."

When Hua Cheng was locked in the Kiln with Zhao Beitong—the children could do nothing but wander.

He knows the mountain and the terrain surrounding it better than anyone.

His spirit was locked upon the mountain for so long at such a young age—that when Hua Cheng did start to teach the boy magic, his abilities were shaped by it.

Forests, for where he was hung by Lang Ying.

And arrays that mimicked the Kiln's magic in form and function.

"I'll try to send a message when I—” Shuo pauses, taking another deep breath. "When I go down, so you know he's coming. I wouldn't tell Hua Chengzhu or Dianxia where I went, either. If they come after me and it ruins the plan..."

Then, he died for nothing.

"I didn't say I agreed—”

"You can't stop me from going, and there's no one else." Shuo reaches down, pressing his palm to the array. "I don't need you to agree, and I don't need your permission."

Too many have died for this already.

When it begins to glow bright red in response—Pei Ming feels his stomach sink.

Knowing that he can't stop him from going, and even if he doesn't go —

If Bai Wuxiang makes it out, they'll all die anyway.

"...Is there anything you want me to tell them?"

When Shuo looks back over his shoulder, raising an eyebrow—the general explains;

"If you don't come back."

He says if, because he's kind.

They both know he won't come back.

Shuo opens his mouth, his breath hitching—then he closes it, hanging his head.

All of the things he wants to say, all of the things he really wants them to know—

He doesn't think Hua Cheng would want to hear it, anyway.

It might make him feel guilty, because—

Shuo always knows he's wanted more than anyone wanted to give him.

It's not fair for him to ask for something that his own father wasn't willing to give him. It was never anyone else's responsibility to fill that place in his life.

Especially not his.

"...Just tell him I said thanks," he mutters as the array opens.

"For everything."

It would take too long to list all of the things he has to thank him for.

With that, he leans forward—disappearing through the travel array, leaving nothing behind.

He lands on the ground below with a thud, hands tightening around the earth beneath his hands.

Shuddering when he feels a warm, wet nose pressing against his cheek, and now—

Now, the tears finally fall, gasping for air as he sits back, rubbing at his eyes.

"Y-You don't have to come with me," he chokes, shaking his head. "I-It's okay..."

The forest spirit rumbles quietly, his roughened tongue licking the tears off of his cheek.

But it shows no sign of turning away.

It would never.

A choked sob rips from Shuo's chest as he turns his face into Dian Dian's fur, shuddering.

Qi Qi's head pokes out of the collar of his shirt, chattering quietly as he nuzzles his face under the ghost's chin.

Of course, they won't leave.

Animals are kinder than humans, that way.

They never forget love and protection, once it's given.

They never let you go alone.

He holds them both close, shoulders trembling for a moment, before rising back to his feet.

Looking around for the next portal, following the path back—

"WAIT!"

Ren Song freezes, his foot lifted in midstep.

A hand wrapped tightly around his wrist.

"WHAT'S WRONG WITH YOU?!”

The ghost doesn't look back, his shoulders suddenly hunched.

Knowing that, if he looks back into those eyes, he might not be able to do this.

"Why the hell would you follow me?!" He mutters, trying to tug his hand out of the martial god's grip, but—

Lang Qianqiu won't let go.

"Because you're throwing your life away when you KNOW you can't beat him—”

"It's not ABOUT beating him!" Ren Song finally looks back at him, glaring—

And now, the Prince of Yong'an can see the tears of anger and frustration in his eyes.

"You think I WANT to do this?!"

He hisses, staring up at him. "I DON'T! I'm not a martial god. I wasn't a soldier or a trained fighter in my mortal life. Of course I'm fucking SCARED, and I'm PISSED! Because after all this fucking time, I'm gonna die RIGHT WHERE I STARTED! And that's so—!"

"Then DON'T!"

Lang Qianqiu's hand is still tight on his wrist, pulling him back. "No one is MAKING you do this—!"

"But that doesn't change the fact that everything I said back there was TRUE!"

And they both know it.

"Someone has to go. Someone has to do it. And if I die, it's not—”

"DON'T SAY IT'S NOT A BIG DEAL!" Lang Qianqiu snarls, his grip tightening, and Shuo—

Ren Song balks, leaning away in shock.

"DO YOU HAVE ANY IDEA—?! GOD—YOU MAKE ME SO FUCKING CRAZY!"

"Then just LEAVE!" The ghost snarls, yanking away, but—

"I DON'T WANT TO!"

Ren Song doesn't speak, holding out one palm to stop Dian Dian before the spirit starts to snarl in defensive aggression towards the martial god, but—

"Has it ever occurred to you for ONE GODDAMN SECOND that I might UNDERSTAND HOW YOU FEEL?!"

Something about that makes Ren Song flinch.

"HOW COULD YOU HAVE ANY IDEA?!"

"...Shuo," Lang Qianqiu laughs, but there's no amusement in it. Only pain and exasperation. "We've been chasing each other around for months, and you never noticed?"

He's noticed plenty.

Like how Lang Qianqiu has a permanent crease between his eyebrows, and it only goes away when he's sleeping, or smiling. He doesn't do either often.

Or that he never goes back and forth between his dishes when he eats a meal.

He always has to eat one thing at a time, methodically, and he'll go red in the face if you mix anything together.

He's noticed the way he plays with Guzi—carrying the boy around on his shoulders, sparring with toy swords--wondering if that was what his own father did with him.

But Shuo never once thought they were alike, or that Lang Qianqiu could ever understand how he feels—or what he's been through.

Because how could he?

"...You think...what? I don't know what it feels like to have nobody? To have someone that was supposed to protect me leave?"

Shuo falls silent, shaking his head. "...You have—”

"Ren Song," his voice is raw with emotion, eyes shining. "I don't have anyone."

The ghost doesn't speak, his throat suddenly thick.

"I was seventeen when I lost everything in my life that ever mattered to me."

His father. His cousins. His friends and comrades.

"For three hundred, I thought it was done by the person closest to me. And I—I didn't have Hua Cheng, or Paradise Manor. I didn't have Yin Yu or Blackwater. I had General Nan Yang. And he did his best , but..."

But Lang Qianqiu didn't know how to be close to anyone anymore. Didn't know how to trust anyone.

He was so hurt, so filled with anger and loss.

Even before his ascension, he never had a wife or children. Never made friends as close as he did before.

And when he found out the truth—it didn't feel like Xie Lian had done him a mercy.

It was like learning in one moment that your oldest friend, your first love—he didn't betray you—

He just let you think he did.

For so long.

And Lang Qianqiu can't even be angry about it. Can't even resent him for the damage that was done.

Because he put Xie Lian through something so much worse.

Even if he didn't know Xie Lian was a god, or what locking him that coffin would mean.

He has to live with that.

"...And even when I found out that Xie Lian wasn't the one who did that to me, I found out it was my best friend."

And it makes him sick now, thinking of how many years he spent mourning An Le.

"It's hard..." Lang Qianqiu starts, then has to clear his throat, his eyes wet. "It's hard for me to care about anyone, or believe that anyone cares about me. So yes, I know how you feel. Even if we weren't born in the same times or places. Even if you think I'm just a spoiled prince who doesn't know anything—”

"I don't," Shuo's rasps, eyes wide.

Sure, he did in the beginning. And to be fair, that was exactly how Lang Qianqiu acted when they first met, but...

"...But that doesn't change the fact that someone has to go," he finally whispers, looking down at where Lang Qianqiu is gripping his wrist, and…

"And that doesn't mean I have to let you go alone."

The biggest difference between Ren Song and Bai Wuxiang are gaps in age and spiritual power.

Lang Qianqiu can't offer anything in terms of years.

And he knows he isn't supposed to follow him. That they drive one another up the wall. That Gods and Ghosts, despite his Guoshi's clear refusal to adhere to that rule—aren't supposed to fraternize.

Lang Qianqiu knows he isn't supposed to care about Ren Song.

But he does.

And whatever power or strength he has left, even if it comes to little in the end—

He'll give it.

Because he is never losing someone he cares about or watching them walk away again—

Not without trying to stop it.

"..." The ghost blows out a shaky breath, looking away.

"...Fine, just—here," he mutters, pulling his wrist out of Lang Qianqiu's grip. The prince frowns, worried the forest demon is about to make a break for it and leave him behind, but—

Ren Song reaches up to his neck, unfastening the choker there.

"You want to help? Fine." He ignores the terrified, wobbly feeling in his stomach that comes from the bareness of his own throat, shoving the necklace against Lang Qianqiu's chest. "Hold onto that for me. And don't let anyone else touch it, understand?"

Lang Qianqiu stares at the necklace, catching it in his palm.

Black leather, with an emerald in the face—he's never seen the ghost go without it.

"...Why?"

"Because," Ren Song bites his lip, staring pointedly over Lang Qianqiu's shoulder.

"No matter what happens to me—if that stays safe, I can come back."

If his will is still strong enough. He couldn't come back from total dispersement, only Hua Cheng has ever done that—

Even if he's reduced to a ghost fire—if his ashes are safe, he'll come back.

And the meaning of that doesn't seem to be lost on Lang Qianqiu—who can't stop staring at the necklace now, his eyes wide.

Between the emerald and the leather, there's a small locket of black steel—one that Hua Cheng forged centuries ago.

To hold Ren Song's ashes.

"...And there's one other thing," He mutters, clearing his throat and looking away. "Because if we're going to do this, we're both probably gonna die , and if you don't want to you can just say no, just don't fucking make fun of me, okay? Because I've never done it and I just —!"

Lang Qianqiu's fingers close around the necklace—then he reaches out, fingers grasping Ren Song's chin as he drags him forward.

Not thinking, just—

Just doing the thing he's been thinking about for months now.

The ghost is frozen when he pulls back, lips tingling, staring up at him in silent wonder. And of every reaction that might have been appropriate for this situation.

He lets out a nervous little laugh, the pointed tips of his ears turning red.

"...What?" Lang Qianqiu frowns—and he doesn't have the benefit of being dead, so his cheeks are completely red— "Wasn't that what you wanted me to do?"

"I mean, yeah, but..." Ren Song laughs again, covering his mouth. "I didn't think you were gonna do it, and..."

He shakes his head, clearly trying to shake the shyness and embarrassment off, eyes glinting mischievously. "If you're gonna kiss someone right before you face certain death, I just wasn't expecting it to be a peck, you know?"

"I—!" Lang Qianqiu's jaw drops, his face on fire.

"Hahaha, I don't know what I—HAHA!" He bends over, arms wrapping around his ribs. "You're so—!"

"I didn't want to just ASSUME, you didn't say how you WANTED—!"

"YOU DIDN'T EVEN LET ME FINISH EXPLAINING—”

"OH, SO YOU WERE GONNA ASK ME TO KISS YOU DEEPLY?!"

Shuo really never thought that, faced with a situation like this, he could ever laugh, but—

He does, until his stomach aches, and tears prick at the corner of his eyes.

"I GUESS WE'LL NEVER KN—!"

That's when a small, embarrassing yelp escapes him as he stumbles forward, yanked by Lang Qianqiu's hand grasping his hip, and—

The kiss that follows couldn't be described as a peck at all.

It's the kind of touch that makes him feel pleasantly off balance.

Like when you just start falling, and all you feel is that exhilarating leaping in your stomach.

Clutched so close in someone's arms, your arms wrapped around their neck, feet not touching the ground.

And he—

Shuo hasn't been this close to a living person... ever .

He never realized how warm it is, being alive.

Having Lang Qianqiu in his arms feels like holding a small sun in his hands.

The martial god breaks away briefly, both of them breathing hard, faces close.

"You're such a smart ass, you know that?"

Ren Song manages a laugh again, but this time it's more breathless than anything else, one fang peeking out as he smiles up at him impishly.

"I've been told that's a part of my charm—!"

The third kiss makes his eyes slip shut, fingers sliding into Lang Qianqiu's hair.

Part of him wishes they could leave, now. Just turn around and forget the rest of it.

And the rest of him knows that they can't, sighing when they have to break apart.

"...We should—”

Both of them stop before either one can say the words 'go,' turning their heads to stare.

Standing about ten meters behind them, arms crossed, is the last person either one of them would have expected—

Quan Yizhen.

Now that he's been noticed, he raises one hand in greeting.

"I followed you."

"...We gathered..." Shuo mutters, feeling a little faint. "...how long have you been standing there?"

"The entire time."

"He's been standing there the entire time," Lang Qianqiu repeats faintly, turning around and scratching his head, his entire face turning maroon.

"Were you going to say anything...?"

"No."

"He wasn't going to say anything," Lang Qianqiu repeats again, sounding like he might pass out.

"Are you just going to repeat everything he says?!"

"UNTIL HE STOPS SOUNDING LIKE A PSYCHOPATH?! SURE!"

"Congratulations."

Both of them turn back to Quan Yizhen, waving their hands wildly in a panic.

"That wasn't what you thought it was!"

"It wasn't what it looked like!"

He looks back and forth between the two of them, nonplussed.

"...You weren't kissing?"

"...We were. But we're not—!"

“That was because we’re going into a near death situation, and I’ve never kissed someone before!” Ren Song holds up his hands, shaking his head frantically.

“Oh.” Quan Yizhen nods, taking in that situation. “I’ve done that before.”

“…See?” Lang Qianqiu sags with relief, “He gets it—!”

“And I loved him,” Quan Yizhen concludes, arms still crossed. “Then he died.”

Ren Song turns around, his face in his hands.

That was a nice reminder.

“No offense, but that’s kind of a fucking downer…”

But after a moment of listening to Lang Qianqiu fume and protest, he turns around—getting to the heart of the matter.

“…Why did you follow us?”

Quan Yizhen walks over, his pace calm, but steady as ever.

“Yin Yu and I were going to get married.”

Last that Shuo can remember, Yin Yu didn’t exactly seem to be on board with the idea—

But he isn’t going to dispute that now, not when the poor man is grieving.

“Yeah…”

“And Yin Yu used to take care of you.”

The reminder brings a lump to Ren Song’s throat.

“…Yeah,” he agrees quietly, biting his lip—

Looking up when Quan Yizhen claps a hand on his shoulder firmly, standing beside him.

“Now, I’ll take care of you.”

Lang Qianqiu stiffens, not loving the sound of that, but…

Before he can say anything, Quan Yizhen looks over, staring him down with bright, golden eyes—looking almost like a lion on the verge of pouncing.

Stating calmly:

"Disrespect him, and I'll break your legs."

With that, he leads a visibly shell shocked Ren Song onward down the path, leaving Lang Qianqiu standing there, mouth agape, shoving the choker underneath his armor.

"...What...the fuck just happened?"

It's not like they have much of a choice to talk after that, though—not while they're charging through one portal after another, retracing the path back to Mount Tonglu.

The one place everyone else wants to get away from.

With Ren Song and Quan Yizhen riding on Dian Dian's back, and Lang Qianqiu just beside them, astride his tiger.

Not because he couldn't have ridden with them if he wanted to, he just—

He has a rocky relationship with the panda, alright?

Each time they burst through one array and into the next, the terrain shifts—growing darker, the air becoming acrid and thick with resentment—but when they burst through the last one, Ren Song holds up his fist, indicating for everyone to come to a halt.

"...Why did we stop?" Lang Qianqiu frowns, sitting up a little straighter as he looks around. "I thought we had to hurry."

Ren Song's answer, while quiet—only serves to baffle him with how certain he sounds.

"We're here."

The martial god frowns, looking around.

"What?"

That can't...that can't be right.

"We are," Quan Yizhen agrees, holding one arm around Shuo's waist from where he's seated behind him on Dian Dian, sniffing the air. "Smells right."

Like ash and death.

"But then..." Lang Qianqiu and Ren Song look at one another—grim.

“…Where is Mount Tonglu?”

Before, the mountain dominated the entire landscape—so vast, you could see it from hundreds of miles away.

Now, they’re supposedly right on top of it, but…

There's no mountain in sight.

"…Holy fucking shit…" Ren Song whispers.

"What?!"

"They…" he looks around, his jaw still slack. "…Destroyed it…"

"Destroyed it?!" Lang Qianqiu shakes his head in disbelief. "How?! Wouldn't that have made it erupt?!"

"No," Quan Yizhen's voice startles them both.

He's already slipped off of Dian Dian's back, kneeling down to press his palm against the earth.

"…The underground sections of the mountain are still intact," he clarifies quietly.

Including the magma chambers.

"But…where's the Kiln? Does that mean Bai Wuxiang has already—?"

As Lang Qianqiu spouts off his questions, Ren Song creeps up to the canyon rim—finding the new landscape that awaits him.

Huge, jaggedly sharp spires of rock—curved upwards toward the sky. Like angry black waves of a storm, permanently trapped in time.

And deep down, beneath the swirling clouds of smoke and resentment—

There's a hard, round formation—almost like an egg in the bottom of a nest.

"…Okay," Ren Song mutters, taking a deep breath. "They're still in there."

But not for much longer.

"…What's the plan?"

"…" Shuo drops his back down beside him, rolling up his sleeves. "My arrays mimic the Kiln's magic. If he bursts out and falls straight into it—he might not realize he's actually escaped."

He might think he's still in the illusion.

Then, he'll be trying to fight the Kiln's magic—Zhao Beitong's consciousness and memories. He won't be looking for Ren Song at all.

The longer they can keep that up, the longer they can hold him back.

"Okay," Lang Qianqiu mutters. "What do you need in order to do that?"

"…Spiritual power," Shuo mutters, staring down at the pit grimly. "A lot of it."

Quan Yizhen nods, leaning over to—

"Woah, woah, WOAH!" Lang Qianqiu glares, shoving his fellow martial god's face away from Shuo's. "What are you doing?!"

Quan Yizhen stares back, confused.

"…Lending spiritual power? Wasn't that what you two were doing before?"

"NO!" Lang Qianqiu barks, all while Shuo adjusts his hair, clearing his throat awkwardly.

"It was more of a 'have that sort of experience before you die' kind of thing," he mutters,

"…But you said it wasn't like me and shixiong…"

"It wasn't!"

Quan Yizhen seems hopelessly confused, and Lang Qianqiu pinches the bridge of his nose.

"You don't NEED to lend spiritual power like that!"

"Oh." Quan Yizhen frowns.

"Someone should tell Crimson Rain."

In an instant, Ren Song understands the source of the confusion—and his face falls into his hands, mortified.

"…Oh my gods…"

"What?!" Lang Qianqiu glares. "I don't—!"

Then, he remembers what he walked in on when he chased after those two escaping the heavens.

“That SON OF A—!” He rages, cutting himself off when he notices Shuo glaring at him, arms crossed, one eyebrow raised. “…Don’t look at me like that. It’s not like—!”

The ghost’s gaze is unrelenting, and he sighs, offering his hand morosely.

“Whatever.”

“Nice save.”

He holds out his other hand for Quan Yizhen to take, closing his eyes for a moment as he absorbs energy from both martial gods, his skin pulsing with power.

When he opens his eyes again, they almost seem to crackle in the darkness.

“Both of you—get behind me!”

The moment they step back, Ren Song’s nostrils flare, closing his eyes—focusing on the power under his skin. On the building resentment in his gut.

The anger and fear he felt, after Yin Yu. The confusion and loss that followed Qi Rong.

It’s a trick that Blackwater taught him, a long time ago—

Dangerous, but effective.

Stoking your rage, your grudges—and using it as fuel to increase your power.

Even if that risks allowing it to consume you.

When he opens his eyes again, they’ve turned completely black.

That’s when he reaches up, sinking his teeth into both of his palms before crouching down, slamming both hands into the earth—

And the result is almost immediate.

Lang Qianqiu and Quan Yizhen stumble back as the ground begins to violently rumble.

Before, he's either used pre-existing trees to form an array, or constructed small groves to entrap his enemies.

This time, an entire forest sprouts around them—wood jagged and black, roots gnarled and twisting, branches reaching for the sky like broken fingers.

Here, upon the world's largest graveyard—a collection of burial mounds as far as the eyes can see, holding the souls of his long dead brothers and sisters—

A child of death spins a web to catch the devil himself.

Now—all they have to do is wait.

And it won't be long.

Echoes

Chapter Summary

“What’s the last thing you remember?”

Xie Lian’s lips press together, trembling slightly.

Not like before, when he was straining to remember.

Now, it’s because he does remember.

“…I provoked the emperor on purpose,” he mutters, his throat dry, having nearly lost his voice from the screaming before. “And San Lang…”

“Burned the entire Heavenly Capital to bits,” Mu Qing pulls his fingers back.

The first thing Xie Lian becomes aware of is the fact that he’s sitting up, leaning back against Feng Xin—feeling Mu Qing’s hands against his temples.

“…That’s…better,” he mumbles, eyelashes fluttering. “Are we still…in Blackwater…?”

“Yes,” Feng Xin agrees, his voice softer than normal, letting the prince rest against him as much as he needs to. “It’s safe for now.”

“What’s the last thing you remember?”

Xie Lian’s lips press together, trembling slightly.

Not like before, when he was straining to remember.

Now, it’s because he does remember.

“…I provoked the emperor on purpose,” he mutters, his throat dry, having nearly lost his voice from the screaming before. “And San Lang…”

“Burned the entire Heavenly Capital to bits,” Mu Qing pulls his fingers back.

“…He did?”

"More or less," Feng Xin agrees, still struggling to process the fact that the Heavens—as they knew it—is just gone. "None of us had ever seen anything like it."

Mu Qing watches Xie Lian, who seems…

Oddly quiet, digesting that information.

"…Your highness, did something—?"

"Was that what you wanted to tell me before?" Xie Lian speaks over him suddenly, reaching out to—

To grasp Mu Qing's hand tightly, leaving the martial god staring at him in shock.

"That he hurt you?"

"…What?" Feng Xin stiffens, his expression darkening. "Who hurt you?"

Mu Qing glances back and forth between both of his friends, a lump in his throat.

Even now, with nearly all of the other Heavenly Officials having left already—

It's still so hard to say.

And part of him doesn't want to talk about any of it now.

But…

There's something about the look on Feng Xin's face—it almost has a weight to it, and he can't…

"…When I was arrested, and he interrogated me, he…" Mu Qing ducks his head, swallowing hard.

His cheeks burning with shame.

"M-made me…talk about things that…h-happened to m…me and my…it…"

Of the stuttering. The weakness. The secrets. The fear.

The tightest chains in life are the ones that you're left to carry on your own.

No one ever told Mu Qing to hide what happened back then. It was never something explicitly stated with words.

It was all punctuated with looks. Silent, judgemental stares.

Being told that it was dangerous to go around telling lies.

That he just wanted attention, because his father wasn't adoring anymore.

But silence—it felt like a chain around his neck. Tightening every single day, weighing him down.

And part of him thought—getting rid of the person who was hurting him, hurting his sister—would fix it.

But nothing ever did.

And the worst part is—Mu Qing knows he placed that chain around himself. Forged it link by link over the years.

Because he would have rather died, than admit to anyone that he was struggling.

That he had been hurt.

And after eight hundred years—he hasn't really changed.

Because his first instinct was to hide.

Which is why he—

Mu Qing is dragged out of his thoughts by Xie Lian—squeezing his hand so tightly, it almost hurts.

"It won't happen again."

And it—

It's ridiculous, really.

Because Xie Lian is covered in blood—locked in three shackles, and for the last few hours, he's barely been able to string a sentence together, but—

In an instant, it feels like they're seventeen again.

And it feels—

For that moment, it feels safe again.

Feng Xin hasn't found the words to speak.

His relationship with Mu Qing—something between rivals, friends, enemies, and something far deeper than either of them would like to admit—

It's always been complicated.

He's lost count of how many times they've hurt one another.

But this time—

When he sent Mu Qing back to the heavens, he wasn't trying to hurt him. He was trying to stop him from disappearing, but—

All he did was throw him at the emperor's mercy.

This is his fault.

And he—

"You're awake." Pei Ming's voice cuts through the silence.

He kneels down beside the three of them, looking Xie Lian over.

"Welcome back to the land of the living."

Xie Lian knows it's a common phrase—but highly ironic when they're hiding in the lair of a ghost.

"Yes…What's the situation?"

"Crimson Rain and Blackwater are outside dealing with Jun Wu. It seems like his plan is to slam the burning remains of the capital down on top of us," Pei Ming explains quietly. "But before we make our next move, I need to know what you learned in the Kiln."

More than Xie Lian can actually say.

"…Capturing or imprisoning them isn't an option," he mutters, trying his hardest not to remember what Jun Wu said before.

About being put down like a mad dog.

“And they have to be killed simultaneously.”

Xie Lian suspects Jun Wu really did destroy Bai Wuxiang in Lang-er bay, likely hoping that would be the end of him.

And when Zhao Beitong left him, he really was dying.

As long as one half survives, the other is bound to reform.

“…Right,” Pei mutters, rubbing his temples.

That creates a logistical nightmare.

The only being that has any level of certainty of being able to take on even one half of the two is Hua Cheng.

He can’t be in two places at once. Not without seriously reducing his effectiveness.

After that, Shi Wudu might have had a chance—

If he was still here to fight, anyway.

Which implies his destruction was of far more intricate design than what Pei Ming is willing to consider at the moment.

That leaves him.

Pei Ming is many things, but he doesn’t lack self awareness.

He knows his strengths and weaknesses, and what his capabilities are.

He can beat the emperor in terms of military strategy, or give him hell in a one on one fight—

But he couldn’t defeat him.

But—

Strategy is about more than just forming plans for attack and defense.

It’s about knowing what your enemy is thinking. What your enemy is planning.

And when Pei Ming looks at Xie Lian—

In an instant, everything is brought into stark clarity.

The words Jun Wu told him weeks ago, when it never occurred to him that Pei Ming might one day be his enemy.

Xie Lian has the largest reserves of spiritual power out of anyone .

And when he stood in the grand martial hall and asked for his shackles to be removed…

Jun Wu almost seemed to become desperate, struggling to explain why he couldn't grant Xie Lian's request.

"…Ling Wen, bring the Guoshi of Xianle over here."

"Mei Nianqing is here?" Xie Lian frowns, listening to the sound of their approach.

Ling Wen has the Guoshi braced with one arm around her shoulders, guiding the cultivator to kneel down beside them.

"I heard you had a plan for breaking his highness's shackles," Pei Ming cuts to the heart of the matter, wasting no time. "Is that true?"

Mei Nianqing groans slightly as he takes a seat beside the three—a strange variation on their positions from Xie Lian's youth.

"…Somewhat," he agrees faintly, rubbing his arm.

Still bleeding and bruised from his beating before—but Mu Qing makes no offer to help, watching with cold curiosity.

"There are wrinkles."

Xie Lian grows quiet and distant—listening as they discuss the matter, but far more preoccupied with what that would mean.

He's grown up with his shackles.

Tragic as it might seem, he doesn't remember what it's like to be free.

And when he asked Jun Wu to remove his shackles, before—

Part of him always knew that his request was going to be denied.

"…The most obvious ways are that Jun Wu releases him on his own, or he's killed." Mei Nianqing mutters, reaching over to touch his student's throat, examining the shackle there, but—

To his surprise, Xie Lian leans back sharply. Not exactly a flinch, but—

He's changed.

"Obviously…that isn't going to happen," Mei Nianqing concludes, pulling his fingers back. "In which case, we have two options."

"Which are?" Pei Ming prompts quietly, urged by the explosions from outside.

"…The first is the safest, if we can manage it," Mei Nianqing sighs.

Outside of that, they go from dangerous—to impossible.

"You cracked the shackle in your eyes in Gusu your highness, remember?"

Xie Lian paused, shaking his head. "…No, that was the cursed iron shackle. It damaged the shackle in my eyes when I broke it."

And that was, even by Xie Lian's warped standards, very painful.

"No—when you broke the iron shackle, you temporarily held the resentful energy inside of it. During that surge, the shackle in your eye was damaged."

Most likely because it was the most exposed.

"…It would require us to find a way for you to wield resentment again in that manner," Mei Nianqing concludes. "Which is the wrinkle."

Xie Lian only held it for the briefest moment, when the cursed iron shattered. Cultivators don't work with resentment, by design.

To do so would put the mind and body through unimaginable anguish—and even if it were possible, they don't have time to learn how.

If they had a few cursed iron shackles laying around, maybe they could—but even Xie Lian doesn't think he could stand doing that so many times.

"…Do we need to call Hua Cheng down here?" Pei Ming mutters, scratching his head. "He has enough resentment—"

"He wouldn't," Xie Lian shakes his head, thinking. "He wouldn't damage my body like that—he would insist on finding another way.”

Which they don’t have time for.

“…But he isn’t the only one here who deals in resentment,” the prince looks up sharply, coming to the realization.

And just as Pei is frowning, looking around for some ghost he might have missed—

“Ruoye!”

“…Your spiritual device?” Mu Qing frowns, watching as the bandage wriggles up Xie Lian’s arm. “What could it possibly—?”

“Ruoye isn’t a device,” Xie Lian corrects him quietly, revealing more about the bandage than he ever wanted to, but—

The situation calls for it.

“It’s a demon—forged from…suffering,” he concludes, remaining as vague as he can.

And even now, after centuries, it still Carries the resentment Xie Lian once felt.

The bitterness and disappointments of his father.

The regrets of his mother.

Not to mention the fact that it’s been feeding on Xie Lian’s blood for an entire day, binding the wound on his palm.

“Good, good,” Mei Nianqing examines him, thinking. “It’s better to work with the shackle on your ankle for now—in case this goes wrong.”

Xie Lian sits forward, only wincing slightly as the pain in his head begins to fade, pulling down his boot.

“Wrap the device around your fist again—yes, just like that—and try to feel for the area between your skin and the shackle—"

“There…” Xie Lian frowns. “There isn’t.”

His shackles might as well be tattoos—there’s no way to get underneath them.

“Concentrate, your highness—focus your mind. You should be able to feel the weight of it—"

Xie Lian can, he always can, but there’s no edge, no way to get under it.

“—now, just curl your fingers beneath—"

“I can’t…”

“Just focus,” Mei Nianqing pushes him, a panicked edge to his tone. “Imagine it in your mind, you’ll feel it there.”

But when Mu Qing looks down—

He just sees Xie Lian clawing into his own ankle, bleeding, with no success.

“Try channeling the energy from Ruoye into the shackle now, as much as you can.”

Xie Lian obeys his teacher, his jaw clenching, but the more Mu Qing watches him…

He sees his friend grow paler with each passing moment—and the tiniest, almost imperceptible grunt of pain.

“…Stop,” he mutters, grabbing Xie Lian’s arm as he sends Mei Nianqing a sharp glare. “STOP! It isn’t working!”

And if it’s that bad on his ankle—

Now on earth could Xie Lian do that to his eyes?

“…You said there was another option,” Pei Ming looked at Mei Nianqing.

The Guoshi sits back on his heels—looking just as strained as his student is.

“…Yes, I’ve seen one god use it before with success, but…”

“If you know it’ll work, why are we wasting our time with this?!” Mu Qing snaps, pulling Xie Lian’s arm away from his ankle.

“Because it’s far more dangerous,” the Guoshi explains softly. “And the damage is permanent.”

His eyes remain on Xie Lian's face, watching as the prince bows his head, waiting.

"…We'll have to cut them off. And there's only one device in existence that could manage that."

"…Please don't tell me he means that dagger…" Feng Xin frowns, one hand tightening on Xie Lian's shoulder. "One of them is on his NECK! That would kill him!"

"Not necessarily," Mei Nianqing looks at him, wary. "I saw one god do it by slitting his own throat—but you wouldn't need to take it that far."

Behind them, Pei suddenly grows still—watching the Guoshi closely.

"If you cut the shackle vertically at any one point—it should shatter. A doctor could do it safely."

And with Mu Qing with them…that seems quite feasible.

"…It doesn't matter how careful I am with his eyes," Mu Qing points out flatly. "It would be almost impossible to avoid blinding him permanently."

Knowing all too well where Mei Nianqing is going with this.

The idea that he instilled in them—but especially Xie Lian—when they were young.

Far too young.

That often, the truest form of service was to make great personal sacrifice.

Xie Lian is silent for a moment.

Surprised to find himself on the verge of tears.

It's not that he ever had any hope of seeing again. Not that there was ever a moment when he thought he deserved to.

But now—there's one thing in the world that he wants to see—

So badly.

More than he's ever wanted anything.

And giving that up—

It hurts.

“…Your highness—"

“It’s fine, Mu Qing,” Xie Lian’s voice is even—calm, in spite of it all. “I…”

He looks up with a smile.

“I wouldn’t remember the difference anyway.”

He says that, but…

It’s the saddest smile Mu Qing had ever seen.

“…Your spiritual power and luck are sealed in your other two shackles,” Mei Nianqing reminds him quietly. “Breaking those might be enough to create a surge that would shatter the shackle in your eyes on its own.”

He says that—but he doesn’t sound certain.

“If there’s no other way, then that’s just what we’ll have to do,” Xie Lian shrugs, steeling himself.

“…There’s just one problem,” Pei Ming glances back over his shoulder, towards the exit.

“Jun Wu has the god slayer now.”

Xie Lian’s stomach plummets.

“…He does?”

Pei Ming nods, having heard the story from Qi Ying already. “He had someone fetch it for him from Mount Tonglu—and used it to kill Yin Yu.”

The news makes Xie Lian lose the rest of the color in his face, hands balling into fists in his lap.

“…Which means someone has to go get it from him.” Pei Ming steps away from the group. “Where was it you said you needed to go, Xuan Zhen? Mount Taicang?”

Mu Qing nods, still looking thoroughly displeased with the situation.

“We’ll set the array to that destination.”

Pei Ming snaps his fingers, his robes shifting from his ceremonial wear that he can typically be found in when wandering the Heavens—

To his battle armor, gleaming menacingly in the light.

“When that thing comes down on top of this place—use it to escape.”

“…But what about you?” Feng Xin frowns, looking around them.

With Mei Nianqing and Xie Lian this state, and something obviously wrong with Mu Qing—

That leaves just him to protect the three of them.

“I’ll have to hope Crimson Rain or Blackwater gives me a ride out of here.”

He adjusts the buckles on his armor briefly, pausing to stare at the familiar scratches in the metal, his mind racing.

“…Which god?”

When no one answers—he speaks again, his voice demanding a response.

“Which god did you see break their cursed shackle with the god slayer?”

Mei Nianqing is quiet at first, seeming to wrestle with what his words should be, and whether or not they’re a mercy.

The truth rarely is.

And yet—it begs to be told.

“…I have spent the last centuries visiting the Kiln periodically, hoping to unlock its secrets.”

But over the years, he’s found far more questions than anything close to an answer.

“…That was how I saw the former Water Master use the God Slayer to cut his own throat.”

The others stiffen in shock—but Pei Ming doesn't turn back.

Doesn't say a word or acknowledgment.

And in his quiet agony, Pei Ming doesn't notice the missing detail.

The intentional gap in information—but one that Mei Nianqing cannot explain.

That he said that Shi Wudu used the blade to cut his throat.

But not that he took his own life.

When the general moves to leave, Mu Qing snaps out of his train of thought, shaking his head. "You'd be an idiot to go out there without a real weapon! You don't have a chance of getting the dagger off of him!"

"He won't be," a voice speaks up from the corner.

Xie Lian is almost embarrassed to admit it, but Yushi Huang's presence is so quiet, he had nearly forgotten her entirely.

"And he won't be going alone, either."

Pei Ming sends her a weary look. "I already told you, I could never use—"

"I know," she agrees quietly.

Yulong is still sheathed on her back, after all.

But when she holds up a small pickle jar, rattling slightly under her palms—

Pei Ming takes a step back, shaking his head.

"He wouldn't help me in a bar fight, much less go after the emperor —"

"I'd never follow a king or an emperor into battle," a voice calls out, magenta smoke pouring from the jar. "I guess in that way, I've really never changed."

Pei Ming falls silent, watching his old lieutenant materialize.

Holding the broken halves of Ming'guang in his hands.

Echoing the words he said so many years ago, when they were young

"…" Rong Guang hangs his head, his hands tightening around the blade. "If you'll forgive this foolish old man for his mistakes."

…And slowly, his General reaches out to take his arm, squeezing.

"…Only if you forgive this stubborn old fool for running away."

Rong Guang smiles faintly—finding peace in the knowledge that, after so many years, two old friends can outgrow the things that drove them apart.

His body glows for a moment, resealing itself inside of the broken halves of the blade—and as his form disappears, he utters the words—

"Death upon all tyrants, isn't that right?"

Pei Ming grasps the hilt of his old sword, staring at his unchanged reflection in cold steel.

Finding bittersweet nostalgia how, in the strangest ways, echoes of your youth always find their way back home.

"…Death upon all tyrants," he agrees softly.

And now, with a broken sword and a fallen princess—

The general walks into battle surrounded by old friends.

"Ling Wen—" he calls out without looking back. "Initiate Operation Echo."

The civil goddess doesn't even look up, pressing her fingers to her temple with one hand, resetting the travel array with the other, working in perfect synchronization.

"Operation is now in progress."

CRASH!

The sky rumbles with the force of a hundred crashes of thunder, the sea roaring ferociously below.

"What's wrong, your majesty?" A voice sneers, "Scared of getting a little wet?"

The heavens make an almost grotesque sight, now.

A burning pile of rock, suspended several hundred meters above the ocean's surface. Shards of rubble causing violent splashes when they fall into the churning current.

CLANG!

"…That's quite a blade you have there," The emperor sneers, forcing Hua Cheng back when he parries. "Maybe I'll add it to my collection once I've scattered you to the wind!"

CLANG!

Sparks shoot out each time they clash, smoke swirling around them in a thick haze.

"I'd say the same thing about your blades," Hua Cheng smirks, "but they never belonged to you to begin with."

And paradoxically, Jun Wu is no thief.

Hua Cheng has met many over the course of his years, dining among gamblers, thieves, and murderers--men who steal for the thrill of it. For pleasure.

Jun Wu steals because he has no other means of possession.

It's almost pitiful.

Hua Cheng has also lived in a world where nothing was ever truly his.

Knowing nothing from birth but the hollow ache of hunger in his stomach. The bitter envy of watching other children have what he did not.

It made him selfish. It made him greedy.

But he is not prone to pity.

"I'm going to enjoy this," Jun Wu's tone is deceptively calm, eyes flaring with hatred. "More than you can possibly imagine."

CLANG!

The Heavens sink a few feet further in a violent rattle, Hua Cheng's fangs gleaming in a murderous grin.

"You underestimate my imagination."

His eyes flash over Jun Wu's shoulder in a brief instant—lifting one leg to kick him solidly in the chest, a move the emperor dodges.

Only to slip close enough to the edge for something to wrap around his ankle, constricting tightly.

An exposed spine—one forming the end of what once would have been a fish's tail.

And the force of its pull is so great, so unrelenting, even Jun Wu cannot stop himself from being yanked over the edge, plummeting from the fiery remains of his territory.

He just barely manages to save himself from being yanked down into the treacherous waters below, reaching down to hack at the skeleton of what was clearly once a vast sea serpent—freeing himself just in time to land on one of his blades, flying back out of reach.

Looking up to find Hua Cheng circling overhead, and Blackwater prowling the waters below, his face almost impossible to catch in the darkness of the sea—

But it's there.

And that invisible presence is almost as haunting as the sight of Crimson Rain from above.

Jun Wu is more than vividly aware of the fact that, if he falls into that water—he isn't coming out again.

Which makes it feel all the more like some sort of cosmic joke when it begins to rain, fat drops landing heavily from above, pelting and rattling against his armor.

He flicks his hair out of his face irritably, drawing another blade as he whips in an out of range, snapping his fingers to make the downpour cease but—

It only seems to come down even harder in response.

"..." Jun Wu glances down, snapping his fingers again.

Crack!

And again—

Crack!

...But nothing.

His bangs begin to stick to his forehead from the onslaught of moisture, and when he looks up...there's a figure in the distance.

Calmly watching him as she rests upon her sword, the veil of her bamboo hat blowing gently in the breeze.

And it might seem harmless, but—

This type of rain will absorb spiritual power from anything it touches—a form of collection that the Rain Master rarely uses, but occasionally resorts to in times of need.

"...Oh, my dear princess," he glares, rearing back his blade.

"How you disappoint me."

CLANG!

His blade meets steel again—

But not that of E'Ming.

"I can assure you," familiar eyes glare back at him, equally soaked by the rain--but not burdened by it. "The feeling is mutual!"

Pei Ming presses down so firmly, the emperor is forced to swing backwards, sending the General a scathing look.

“Oh, has someone decided to pull his head out of the sand?” He hisses. “How brave of you, waiting until it was four on one—!”

CLANG!

“I’m sorry,” Pei Ming snarls, “I know your preferred targets are scared teenagers—but you’ll have to make due with ME!”

Jun Wu braces again, using his other arm to block a salvo sent by Hua Cheng.

“I don’t know what you’re—!”

“WHAT DID YOU DO TO HIM?!”

Pei Ming doesn't know which is worse.

The fact that he knows, deep in his bones, that something is profoundly wrong —

Or the fact that after everything else he has admitted to, or relished in taunting the others with—

Jun Wu won't even say it.

"…I don't know what you're talking about," he hisses, arms straining as he pushes Pei Ming back again. "That's—"

"YOU HAD SO MANY GODDAMN CHANCES TO LEAVE HIM ALONE!"

CLANG!

"AND FOR WHAT?!"

CLANG!

"HE DIDN'T WANT TO TAKE YOUR PLACE!"

CLANG!

And that's the part that sits in his chest like a weight, when he remembers.

Because all he wanted—everything he ever did—

Was just to keep his family safe, and happy.

And to that end, he did horrible things.

Human things.

But how could that have been a threat?

And Jun Wu's answer, when it comes—is the same as it was last time.

Maddening in its simplicity—and it's utter inhumanity.

"…Because he didn't love me as he once did."

And that answer makes Pei balk now, eyes widening with disgust.

"…He wasn't another one of your PETS!"

Not a hound to be put down by its master when it no longer obeys him like it once did.

“And why shouldn’t he have been?” Jun Wu glares at him, raising his voice to be heard over the rain. “How could any of your small, insignificant existences ever be anything but that to me?”

This time, when he strikes the general—it’s nearly enough to knock Pei off balance, barely able to brace himself.

“I could have given him everything—and he threw all of that away. For what? For you?“ The emperor sneers.

He looks Pei Ming over with something between condescension and self loathing. “You think an ungrateful child who rejected every gift I ever gave him was worthy of passing a third calamity? That any man who would sentence others to suffer in his sister’s place deserved mercy?”

“AND WHO TAUGHT HIM HOW!” Pei Ming snarls, wiping the blood from his jaw after they clash again. “WHO ARE YOU TO JUDGE SOMEONE ELSE’S SINS?!”

“THE ONE WHO GAVE HIM EVERYTHING HE HAD! WHO GAVE ALL OF YOU WHAT YOU HAVE!”

With each blow, he knocks Pei Ming closer down to the waters below.

“THE ONE WHO MADE YOU MARTIAL GOD OF THE NORTH! WHO MADE HIM THE WATER MASTER! WHO HAS PROVIDED THE LIFE OF LUXURY YOU WERE SO EAGER TO INDULGE IN, UNTIL YOU COULD NO LONGER STOMACH IT!”

Thud!

There’s a sharp pain in his ribs, and when he looks down—

He sees the rusted end of a harpoon sticking out from his abdomen, hooks digging into his skin.

“It’s not the lifestyle people can’t stomach,” Blackwater snarls, yanking on the connecting chain from below. “It’s you, and you KNOW it!”

Jun Wu grits his teeth, reaching down to yank the weapon from his body, but—

The barbs make that nearly impossible.

"That's why you can't even SAY what you actually did to him!"

Creeeaak…

The chain groans with every pull, dragging him down.

"Because you're vile, and that's all you've ever BEEN!"

Jun Wu can't remove the harpoon in time to stop his fall—but he does manage to snap the chain, grunting as he levels out again.

Snapping off the head of the weapon before yanking it out properly.

"…If I'm vile, what are you?" He sneers. "Lying, to get the wind master into your bed? Dooming her to the most painful death? You think you're in a place to pass judgment on me?"

Pei Ming could never, in countless lifetimes, feel tempted to defend Blackwater—

"SAYS THE MAN WHO PUT A CURSED SHACKLE ON HER BROTHER!"

It's all Jun Wu can do in that moment, dodging attacks from below, to the side, and above.

"It wasn't the first time."

Blackwater's words only seem to enrage Pei Ming further, making him slam forward more aggressively with every blow, Jun Wu's movements becoming slightly more sluggish under the torrent of the rain.

"You did it so often, the moment he felt them appearing again, he thought that was the only way out!"

After all, Jun Wu had told him enough times.

'You know how to get out.'

"WERE YOU THAT SCARED OF A FAIR FIGHT?!"

And in that moment, getting hit from all sides, dragged further towards the waters below, bombarded with accusations from He Xuan and Pei Ming—

The emperor finds himself overwhelmed.

"…ENOUGH!"

BOOM!

A violent wave of spiritual energy bursts out, knocking them all aside.

And to Pei Ming's shock, when he hits the surface of the water—

He doesn't sink.

"A FAIR FIGHT?! DO YOU THINK THERE'S SUCH A THING AGAINST ME?!" Jun Wu snarls, shaking his head. "I SLAUGHTERED AN ENTIRE DYNASTY OF GODS BEFORE YOUR BLOODLINES EVEN BEGAN!"

His voice roars over the churning of the sea, like a wounded lion.

"You serve at MY pleasure! YOU LIVE UNDER THE FREEDOM AND SECURITY I PROVIDE! AND THEN YOU DARE COMPLAIN ABOUT THE MANNER IN WHICH I PROVIDE IT?! I'M THE ONE WHO—!"

Then, Jun Wu stops himself.

Not because he doesn't have more to say, or because his rage has begun to ebb, no—

But because Pei Ming is laughing.

Sitting back on the water's surface, wiping the blood from his split lip with the back of his hand.

"…What's so amusing, General?" The emperor hisses, balling his hand up to deliver another strike. "Is this what they call laughing in the face of death?"

"It's really damn funny," Pei Ming looks up, blood dripping from his temple.

And what he has to say—

It makes Jun Wu grow silent, blood rushing in his ears, stomach twisting with an emotion he hasn't felt in years:

Panic.

"When a god as ancient and powerful as yourself doesn't even realize his communication array has been open this entire time.”

And now he watches with great satisfaction as the blood slowly begins to drain from the emperor’s face.

Realizing that, for the entirety of their battle, his communication array was connected to his own temples.

All ten thousand of them.

Hearing confused prayers from millions of believers—crying out in disbelief and outrage.

“…There’s something Ling Wen always used to tell me,” Pei smirks, his breathing ragged.

“Never cross the man who makes your shoes.”

Because if you do…

You’ll never know what’s beneath your feet.

Or in this case, never use and abuse the one who controls all of your connections to the mortal realm.

You never know when or who might be listening.

Operation Echo, it seems, was a resounding success.

“…You can destroy every single god that’s left to oppose you,” Pei Ming glares up at him with a fierce grin.

Not one or happiness, or relief—but filled with the sheer thrill of victory.

“But what about them?”

Jun Wu doesn’t need the other gods for his long term survival—

But no god can survive or maintain power without the support of believers behind them.

People will forget with time, they always do—then he can return with a new name, a new story, but…

It sets him back for centuries. Maybe even a millennia.

A blow that weakens him in the long term—and one the emperor never would have foreseen.

The quiet has dragged on dangerously long, with Jun Wu facing away from them—his face hidden.

"…That was clever, Ming Guang," his voice is low, almost lost to the roar of the sea. "But you've always been far more cunning than people gave you credit for. I was fond of you for that reason."

Fond enough to keep him around for this long.

Pei Ming rises to his feet—unaccustomed to standing on the surface of the sea—but it's as firm as iron beneath his feet.

"Your fondness has never earned anyone mercy—so I think I'll pass."

Jun Wu looks up at the storm, rain streaking down his cheeks.

"…Maybe it doesn't make me merciful," he admits. "But it does bring me remorse."

Pei Ming shakes his head, disbelieving, "As if you're capable of such a thing."

And when Jun Wu looks back over his shoulder, his eyes flash.

With such a familiar emotion.

Blunt, instinctive cruelty.

"I assure you, I am…" His face tilts, illuminating one half with a flash of lightning.

And his next words—they make the entire world seem to stop, freezing in time.

"…It broke my heart , watching your son die."

In an instant, there's nothing.

No breath in Pei Ming's lungs. No heartbeat in his chest.

Only paralyzing terror.

"…What?" He croaks, hair sticking to the back of his neck in the downpour. "You…when I asked to look for him, you…"

“Of course, I knew where he was.” Jun Wu muses, rubbing his chin. “I was watching that woman from the beginning.”

‘…General Pei had a son?’ He Xuan reaches out inside their array, ‘I guess that shouldn’t be a surprise, but…’

The silence on Hua Cheng’s end has never been so deafening.

“…WHAT DID YOU DO TO QING YUAN?!” Pei Ming snarls, taking a step forward, but—

Jun Wu holds his hands up innocently, a faint, satisfied smile on his lips.

“Absolutely nothing. I just watched.”

The general falters, blood roaring on his ears.

“I waited for her to pray to you.”

But of course—she never did.

“You know, now that I look back on it…you nearly found him many, many times,” Jun Wu points out with a wry smile. “He was a soldier in the Xianle civil war. One of the youngest in the entire army. Tell me, Ming Guang—are you proud?”

Pei Ming stumbles, pressing one hand to the side of his head.

“…Why?”

“Pardon?”

“I was NOTHING but loyal to you back then!” Pei Ming’s voice is so grief stricken—

The wetness on Yushi Huang’s cheeks has nothing to do with the rain.

“I DID EVERYTHING YOU EVER ASKED OF ME!”

Nothing hurts more than the loss of possibility. Knowing that a locked door once stood wide open.

“…What could you have done?” Jun Wu raises an eyebrow. “You could hardly look after yourself back then. Not only that, the boy was hideously deformed—"

“YOU THINK I GIVE A DAMN?!”

Pei staggers forward, and—

Now, He Xuan can see a darkness forming around the general, his eyes practically glowing red with rage.

“How could you not have? He would have been a disgrace—"

“HE WAS MY SON! WHAT COULD A HELPLESS CHILD HAVE EVER DONE TO EARN SUCH CRUELTY?!”

Jun Wu smirks, taking a step back as the General lunges, driven wild with anger.

“Helpless isn’t how I would put it…”

(For what a headache he’s become, Jun Wu wouldn’t say it applies.)

“You know something?! For someone who thinks he’s so clever, you are SO DAMN PREDICTABLE!”

‘I think…’ He Xuan watches wearily. ‘ He might be going into Qi Deviation.’

That might have been why Jun Wu did this in the first place, but—

“You told me you saw him die, but you won’t say HOW!” Pei Ming snarls. “WHICH MEANS A CHILD FACED DEATH MORE HONORABLY THAN YOU!”

If he had wept, or begged for his life—Jun Wu would have gloated about it. Used it as another means of torturing Pei Ming.

But he—

He might never know his son’s face, or even his name.

But now, he knows one thing about him:

That he was brave .

And as much as that aches—

It’s the first time Pei Ming had felt such a pure, overwhelming surge of pride.

Mixed in with so much pain, hatred, and regret.

Jun Wu waits until he gets closer, reaching into his sleeve with a sly smile, but—

He finds nothing.

Thud!

And when he looks down—

The all too familiar hilt of a dagger is buried in his palm.

Pei Ming twists it viciously before yanking it back.

“Looking for this, you bastard?!”

When He Xuan sees the look on his face, the panic, he…

“HUA CHENG, SNAP OUT OF IT, HE’S ABOUT TO—!”

And just like that, as if it’s strings have been cut—

The burning remains of the Heavens come plunging down, crashing into the sea with unimaginable force.

Creating waves thousands of feet tall—with the surface force of pure concrete.

Yushi Huang can’t feel which way is up or down, her body aching and broken from the force—

But somehow, she manages to bring her fingers to her temple, screaming into the communication array—

‘GO NOW!’

There’s roaring all around her—from the water, or…

Something else.

SMACK!

The general sits up sharply, hacking as he clutches at his throat, feeling a palm slap against his back with a crack!

At first he's almost disoriented enough to mistake it for an attack, but —

Then, he starts coughing up sea water.

One of his ribs is definitely broken, his entire body left battered and worse for wear, and when he doesn't hear Ling Wen's voice scolding him for being an idiot, he looks up to find…

Hua Cheng, of all people—kneeling in front of him, watching Pei Ming intently.

"…Did you.." Pei Ming rasps, his voice roughened from salt water and screaming. "…Save me…?"

From someone who has seemed indifferent at best to anyone who isn't the crown prince—

The idea of it seems almost bizarre.

And at first—Hua Cheng doesn't answer.

His expression strained, jaw clenched—like there's something he wants to say, but—

"…I'm sorry."

Pei Ming winces, rubbing the back of his head. "What?"

"About your son," Hua Cheng replies shortly, standing up. "Can you walk?"

It almost seems even more bizarre to Pei Ming that the calamity would express condolences, but…

It's oddly touching, in its own way.

"…Thanks," he mutters, struggling to sit up—and after a moment, Hua Cheng loses patience, grabbing an arm and pulling him to his feet.

It's not particularly dignified, carrying Pei Ming over one shoulder, and Yushi Huang over the other—but circumstances demand it.

‘Is it contained on your end?’

‘…Contained?!’ Blackwater snarls in return, not particularly happy to hear from him. ‘My lair is COMPLETELY destroyed—!’

‘The one I paid for.’

‘—and now I’m trying to contain the largest outbreak of tidal waves in HUMAN HISTORY! SO NO, IT IS NOT FUCKING CONTAINED!’

Hua Cheng pulls a set of dice from his pocket.

‘Isn’t it within your area of expertise?’

‘Need I remind you I’ve only been in this position for a VERY SHORT PERIOD OF TIME?!’

‘Yes,’ Hua Cheng agrees flatly. ‘Seems like the former water master would be extremely useful right now. Shame someone didn’t warn you getting rid of him was a bad idea.’

‘You KNOW I wasn’t the one who—you know what? I’m gonna need a long, long break from you after this is over.’

‘Enjoying the bliss of fatherhood, I’m assuming,’ Hua Cheng grumbles, his tone uncharacteristically bitter.

‘What was—?’

‘Nothing. You do your job, I’ll do mine.’

And for now—Hua Cheng’s one and only objective is to get back to Xie Lian.

The same place where Jun Wu will follow, the moment he gets the chance.

The place where everything started.

And with a rattle of the dice—

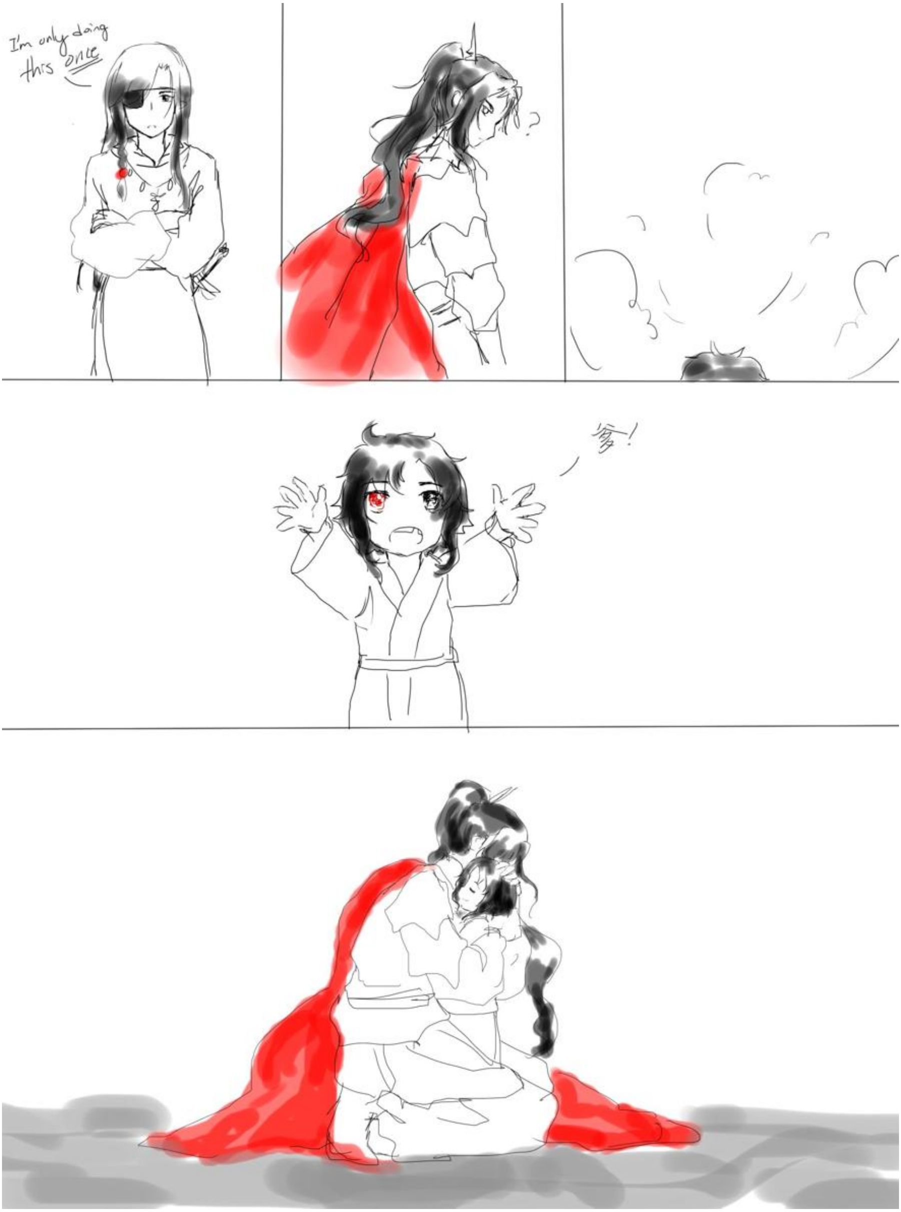
Clack!

Clack!

They’re off.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or re-use.



I'm only doing this once
?
爹!

CREDIT: CHOUX

And a fan animatic can be found here. !

You Can't Have Him

Chapter Summary

> "...What..." Jin Feng rubs the back of his neck, groaning. "What happened...?"
>
> Shi Wudu clears his throat, reaching down to help him up. "The city was under attack by resentful spirits. I exorcized you."
>
> Jin Feng looks around him—seeing countless other citizens of Lanling, just like him. Disoriented, slowly coming back to their senses.

CRACK!

The teenager falls to his knees, the heels of his palms scraping against the ground. His head pulses, tongue crackling with this strange, tingling sensation, and—

“A FAIR FIGHT?! DO YOU THINK THERE’S SUCH A THING AGAINST ME?!”

A voice booms through the square.

Unfamiliar to him, but when he turns to look...

It's coming from the temple of the emperor, projected at the highest possible volume.

“I SLAUGHTERED AN ENTIRE DYNASTY OF GODS BEFORE YOUR BLOODLINES EVEN BEGAN!"

Jin Feng rubs his shoulder, wincing as his bones creak.

“You serve at MY pleasure! YOU LIVE UNDER THE FREEDOM AND SECURITY I PROVIDE! AND THEN YOU DARE COMPLAIN ABOUT THE MANNER IN WHICH I PROVIDE IT?! I’M THE ONE WHO—!”

Laughter fills the air, just as unfamiliar as the voice from before, and when Jin Feng looks up...

He finds Pei Yuan standing beside him, face tilted upwards, listening with rapt attention.

“…What’s so amusing, General? Is this what they call laughing in the face of death?”

And when the fallen god hears his voice—

“...It’s really damn funny."

Tears slip down his face.

“…When a god as ancient and powerful as yourself doesn’t even realize his communication array has been open this entire time.”

When he saw that the blockade of Mount Tonglu had failed—the only reasonable explanation to come to was that...

That he was never going to hear Pei Ming's voice again.

In part, Shi Wudu always knew that, as long as the curse existed, he would never see him again. Not with his true face or name.

And even that ache of separation wasn't as painful as living in a world without him in it.

But he—

"...He's alive..." His hand trembles as he reaches to wipe the tears from his cheek, breaths slightly unsteady with emotion.

He's alive, and he—

He's done what, for so many years, Shi Wudu told himself he couldn't do.

Shown the world what Jun Wu really is.

And now, he can't stop himself from remembering every moment when his lover held him close, saying the words;

'Talk to me.'

'You can tell me anything.'

And he never did, thinking to himself—

That it would just get Pei killed, and nothing would come of it.

Now, he finds himself gripped with pride. Proud of Pei Ming's strength. His cleverness. His bravery.

And regret—because Shi Wudu should have had more faith in him.

More faith in so many things.

"...What..." Jin Feng rubs the back of his neck, groaning. "What happened...?"

Shi Wudu clears his throat, reaching down to help him up. "The city was under attack by resentful spirits. I exorcized you."

Jin Feng looks around him—seeing countless other citizens of Lanling, just like him. Disoriented, slowly coming back to their senses.

"...Was under attack?" He mutters, legs wobbling as he steadies himself. "Did you...?"

The fallen god shrugs, zidian crackling faintly against his palm. "Turns out one of your little friends had stolen a celestial grade weapon."

And in the hands of the right person...

Even without his godhood, Shi Wudu trained continuously for four centuries, passing two Heavenly Calamities, and had been in the midst of passing his third when he fell from grace.

Which means, even in this state, with the proper equipment—his technique is still unmatched.

Luckily for Lanling, these resentful spirits were low level—only dangerous because they arrived en masse.

If it had been a savage ranked ghost, that would have been an entirely different story.

"...And!" A teenager speaks up from behind Shi Wudu--streaked with blood and sweat, practically dead on his feet. "He had help!"

Jin Feng frowns, looking from Shi Wudu to the newcomer, using one arm to hold his ribs. "...Who is he?"

"Jiang Ning!"

"I didn't ask you—"

"He can tell you his own name," Shi Wudu mutters, distracted.

"Yeah," the Jiang Cultivator frowns, hunched over with exhaustion, gesturing tiredly in Jin Feng's direction. "I'm getting some very negative energy from you, considering I just saved your life."

"YOU—!" Jin Feng glares. " YOU didn't save my life, HE did!"

Shi Wudu snorts, shaking his head. "I exorcized your body." He pulls back his sleeve, showing how thin his arms still are, not having had time to recover since his fall. "You think I was doing the sword fighting?"

Given that Jin Feng has yet to defeat the former water master in sparring, every part of his body seems to sag at the reminder.

"See?" Jiang Ning pants, leaning against the side of a nearby house. "I'll accept your never ending gratitude for the life debt whenever you're ready."

"I think I'll have more important things to do than pay a life debt to some bumpkin from Yunmeng—"

"Big talk for a guy who just got rescued by a sixteen year old."

"...He's younger than me?!" Jin Feng croaks, horrified.

"Only by two years, why?" Shi Wudu mutters.

(As someone who has lived for nearly half a millennia, he wouldn't understand.)

Jiang Ning straightens up, having pushed through the initial fatigue, descending into a point of giddiness beyond exhaustion.

"Yeah, and I didn't get possessed by any of those spirits either," he shrugs. "Guess my cultivation level is just too high..." He tilts his head to the side, looking down at the older teenager.

(Who just so happens to be three inches shorter.)

"But I guess us country bumpkins just have more time for training, out in Yunmeng..."

Then he pauses, wrinkling his nose in confusion. "...And wait a minute, why are YOU calling me a bumpkin? It's not like Lanling is some paragon of culture or anything—"

"YOU—!"

"No, no, he's right," Shi Wudu waves them both off.

Lanling is a northern trading outpost, so it isn't exactly cultured compared to anywhere else, either.

And as someone who grew up in a cosmopolitan center like Qinghe, Yunmeng and Lanling both feel small to him.

"Who's side are you on, Pei Yuan?!"

"...You two met like two minutes ago, stop acting like there's a blood feud," Shi Wudu shrugs, turning his eyes away from them. "Besides, mortal grievances are petty to me."

"Haha..." Jiang Ning snorts, shaking his head. "You talk so strangely, gege..."

"DON'T CALL HIM THAT!"

"Jin Feng. Don't make me hurt your feelings."

The teenager balks, limping after him as feeling starts to come back into his legs, still holding his ribs. "I-I don't know what you're talking about! It's just—! Disrespectful to your little sister!"

"She wouldn't care."

Maybe Shi Qingxuan would have before—she was possessive over him, even if it was in a harmless way. For centuries, all they really had was each other.

But...after everything that's happened...

'I wish he wasn't my brother.'

He doubts she would even bat an eye.

"...You have a sister?" Jiang Ning perks up, following close behind them both, even if his legs feel like lead.

"Pregnant. And too old for you."

"...If she's your meimei, how could she be too old for me?" The cultivator tilts his head, looking between Shi Wudu and Jin Feng.

They look the same age, which should mean that Pei Yuan's little sister would be close to his own age.

"Besides, you didn't say she was married! I love kids!"

"Yeah, you still ARE a kid."

"A kid who saved your life. Maybe you should call me gege, huh?"

"YOU LITTLE—!"

"Little? Are we projecting now?"

Shi Wudu, who is currently the same height as Jin Feng, looks over his shoulder sharply—and Jiang Ning holds his hands up, laughing awkwardly.

"Sorry, sorry gege! Collateral damage, I wasn't thinking!" He tilts his head to the side, "But...is she married?"

"...Not exactly," Shi Wudu looks away, continuing to make a beeline down the street. "It's complicated."

"So...the father isn't in the picture?"

"He is."

(Shi Wudu would assume so, knowing him as he now does.)

"...You don't think he's good enough for her or something, then? Because after this experience, I think I've proven my—"

"He's a good man, so if she had to be with anyone..." Shi Wudu trails off, irritated. "Why are you so persistent on the subject? You've never met her."

"Well," Jiang Ning tilts his head to the side, looking Shi Wudu over. "If there's a family resemblance, I really can't go wrong."

Jin Feng rounds on him, his face flushing dark red, nearly incoherent with indignation, and Shi Wudu pinches the bridge of his nose.

"Oh my god, not another one..." He takes a deep breath. "Look, I'm also too old for you , I'm too old for both of you—"

"And he's crazy about this other guy, so I wouldn't even bother," Jin Feng grumbles, crossing his arms.

"Is this really the time—?!"

"Okay, okay," Jin Feng holds up his hands, now mirroring Jiang Ning's position, "But hear me out."

"I'd rather not."

"Odds are…you aren't getting your you-know-what back."

Jian Ning stares as Jin Feng gestures to…well…the cultivator's entire body.

"…What?" He whispers, slightly horrified by the amount of possibilities that leaves open. "What is he missing?"

"And your body is…nineteen? So, in that scenario—hypothetically, I don't mean me, I just mean in general—I'm not too young for you! Or any eighteen year old!"

"Yeah!" Jiang Ning agrees, baffled, but going along, "Or a sixteen year old!"

"No, you're too young."

"I'm BARELY YOUNGER THAN YOU—!"

"Let me phrase it like this: it wouldn't matter what age either of you were, it's just the most inappropriate aspect of it. Understand?"

"What, so it'll just be people in their sixties or something—?"

Jiang Ning, lacking context, makes a slightly horrified expression—and Shi Wudu sighs harshly.

"It won't be anyone."

"Not even in a few years—?"

"You've never been in love before." Shi Wudu stops, looking Jin Feng dead in the eye. "If you had loved someone as deeply or as long as I have, you wouldn't even bother to ask me something like that."

He turns around and keeps walking, leaving the two teenagers in a slight stupor.

"…You weren't kidding about him being crazy about some other guy…" Jiang Ning mutters, slightly dazed by such a romantic show of loyalty.

“…Yeah,” Jin Feng agrees, more deflated than anything else. “I know.”

“Wait…” Jiang Ning walks a little faster. “Where are we going?”

"The port," Shi Wudu explains curtly, ducking through another row of houses. The streets are relatively quiet now, the possessed having been exorcized and moved back inside.

"...But why?"

"Because," he mutters, sliding around the corner, "Something's wrong."

Shi Wudu learned one sight before any other, sitting in his father's lap as he watched the day float by through his office window.

Ship sails.

After so many years, he could tell you the cargo capacity of any vessel, just from one glance at its mast.

Even from all the way back in that square, he could tell;

The ship masts here are oddly low. Far more so than they were this morning.

And when they reach the shore, and Shi Wudu sees the exposed docks...he can see why.

The tide has retreated far further back.

And of course, Jiang Ning, being from Yungmeng, knows exactly what that means.

"...Shit..." he mutters, taking a step back. "Now, of all times?! But there wasn't even an earthquake!"

"That we know of," Shi Wudu corrects him, his heart pounding in his chest.

He looks back over his shoulder, seeing mountains in the far distance, but...

There's not a near enough point with high ground for them to reach.

He turns his head back toward the horizon, squinting.

"...Get everyone to the boats."

"What?!" Jiang Ning flinches at the thought. “Are you crazy?!”

“No,” Shi Wudu turns around. “The deeper the water is, the further the wave has to spread out. They don’t crest until they reach the shallows.”

Meaning if they can just move past the bay before it hits, they could ride it out.

“…What, are you some kind of sailor or something?!”

His father owned a thousand ships in his lifetime, and Shi Wudu has had a thousand times more pay tribute to him over the years.

“Something like that.”

“People won’t listen!”

“Oh, go to the temple of Ming Guang first.”Shi Wudu looks back at the building in the distance with a sharp glare. “They’ll listen to me now, I’m sure. Get everyone moving fast. NOW!”

In a larger settlement, this wouldn’t have been possible—but Lanling is a northern outpost, one with more ship capacity than people.

If they’re quick enough—there’s no saving the town structures, but the people have a good chance at survival.

The only problem is that the tide has retreated enough to leave some of the ships beached, and Shi Wudu doesn’t have time to assemble a crew to refloat them.

It’s funny—the water never used to feel cold to him.

Pei Ming used to laugh about it—seeing the younger god lounging in a stream, assuming that meant it was warm enough to swim in, only to be shocked by the frigid cold.

It’s like ice, now.

Of all of the things he's let go over the years, put aside and moved past without any thought or remorse—

He never thought there was a time when water itself could feel like a stranger. Something foreign and cold, soaking against his skin through his boots.

The wind blows harshly against his hair as he kneels down, dipping his palm beneath the retreating waves, watching the horizon with sharp discernment.

"...What are you doing , He Sheng?" He mutters, mostly to himself.

His oldest enemy—and now, the person that he knows best.

He Xuan wouldn't just allow something like this to happen, putting this many mortal lives at stake. And if it's happening this far north, in a protected cove like Lanling—it must be happening everywhere.

But what could have caused that?

If it was an earthquake large enough to cause something like this, they would have felt it.

Mount Tonglu is on the completely opposite end of the continent, so it can't be that either.

The only thing Shi Wudu can think of is something falling into the sea from above.

But it would have to be something absolutely massive to displace that much water—and he can't even begin to imagine what that would be. A falling star? Some sort of calamitous battle?

Even his third calamity wasn't so destructive.

And Shi Wudu doubts He Xuan can handle it.

He's aware of the fact that he ascended after Shi Wudu's 'death,' but he's only been in this position for a short time.

Even Shi Wudu, after centuries as Water Master, would have struggled with this.

He Xuan was most likely forced to prioritize.

And if Shi Wudu was in that position—

The north is sparsely populated, compared to the central and southern coasts.

It's a rational choice, but—

Shi Wudu grits his teeth, sweating in spite of the cold. Straining to connect to the water. To make it move.

It's more than what the average mortal cultivator could do, but—

Shi Wudu has sunk entire navies. Changed the tides. Swept the fortresses of rulers who offended him into the sea with a flick of the wrist.

Surely he could refloat a few boats?

But, when nothing comes…

Shi Wudu grits his teeth, straightening up with an annoyed glare, smacking his own wrist harshly.

Something he used to do when he was young, every time he made a careless mistake.

"You're not the water master anymore."

And, as Jin Feng oh so painfully reminded him, even if his intentions were good—

He'll probably never go back to his old life again.

Never see his sister again.

Never see…

He presses a hand to his face for a moment, lips trembling.

It hard, wanting one thing so badly—

And it's the only thing you can't have.

…But he's alive.

Shi Wudu has to remind himself of that, his hand balling into a fist by his side.

He's alive .

The ring sits heavily against his finger, gleaming when he looks down at it.

At the end of the day—weapons forged on such a level are designed to work in tandem for spiritual energy.

And rarely for a singular purpose.

Your only limitations are your skills, and your own resourcefulness.

“Don’t destroy the boat, don’t destroy the boat, don’t destroy—"

CRACK!

The whip flashes, slamming down against the shallows with deadly force—sending the waters churning and crackling with electricity.

But it doesn’t shock him, and to his relief—

It doesn’t shock the boat, either.

Saltwater is a natural conductor—when lightning strikes its surface, it spreads out like a web, or roots from the tree.

In Zidian’s case—it does the same.

But with spiritual power.

And if he can just place it correctly—

He can drag the ships from the shallows.

He breathes out harshly, eyes burning bright as the storm clouds brew in the distance.

And he gets to work.

“This is a waste of time,” Deng Su grouses, but still, he carries a child in each arm, leading the people to hurry down the streets.“Lanling doesn’t flood in winter! It never has!”

“That’s what I’m trying to tell you,” Jin Feng glares, helping his own group, stopping to pound on doors and call people out of their homes. “It’s not a NORMAL flood! The tide is further back than I’ve ever seen it!”

“…If that’s true, why are we running towards it?! Are you crazy?!” Another one of the cultivators from the Temple of Ming Guang speaks up, his voice cracking with terror. “We should be going for high ground!”

“THERE’S NO HIGH GROUND YOU CAN REACH IN TIME!” Jiang Ning snaps.

“…Who’s he?!”

“THE BRAT WHO SAVED YOUR UNGRATEFUL LIVES!”

Jiang Ning might have an irritated old woman slung over his shoulder, but the smile he shoots at Jin Feng actually seems to glitter.

“I’m growing on you, aren’t I?”

“…”

“You don’t have to say it, I can tell—!”

“…How the hell did he do that?”

Jin Feng’s shocked utterance knocks him out of his smug gloating, and when Jiang Ning looks down towards the docks…

He’s just as baffled.

When they left—over fifteen Ships in the merchant fleet had run aground.

But now…

They're floating out past the shallows—at risk of being dragged further out as the ocean retreats even more—

But usable.

"...How did you—?"

"Start loading people up—now. You don't have any more time."

Jin Feng, Jiang Ning, and the other cultivators grow silent as 'Pei Yuan,' walks past, parting to make a path for him without a word.

Before today, he was regarded as a pitiful thing. A lost, broken soul.

Now, almost none of them can meet his gaze.

"...What about you?"

"I already said, there's another wave of resentful spirits coming," his tone is calm, watching the brewing darkness in the west, on a collision path with the storm clouds in the east. "Someone has to stay behind to deal with them."

Jin Feng almost trips over his own feet.

"What?!" He cries, handing off the children he was carrying as people start to climb onto small barges, rowing their way towards the larger boats to make their escape. "Lord—W— Pei Yuan! "

Deng Su walks past them, silently eyeing Zidian on Shi Wudu's hand, but...he looks away.

Hands bitterly balled into fists at his sides.

"Look—you might be stronger than the rest of us—but you're not a...y'know...anymore!" Jin Feng reminds him, practically frantic as he gestures towards the boats. "If you stay here, you'll drown!"

"That would be ironic."

Jiang Ning looks back and forth between the older teenager, eyebrows raised. "...Just how many inside jokes do you two have?" he mutters, baffled.

Every other sentence out of their mouths doesn't make sense.

"Go to the boats with your sister, Jin Feng."

"Not without you!"

"I won't die," Shi Wudu assures him. "But every second you waste arguing with me is one you could spend helping these people get out of here."

"But—!" Jin Feng glares, watching the fallen god's back as he walks away. "How can you know that?!"

Shi Wudu disappears around the corner, the breeze playing through his hair.

"...Because nothing is ever that easy for me," he mutters, just a little bit bitter.

He tried to take his own life twice in his first few weeks after arriving in Lanling, after all.

And now, with all of the citizens either already in boats or fleeing towards the harbor…

It’s so quiet.

Laundry left out on the lines—toys scattered in the street, abandoned where children dropped them in order to flee.

The breeze from the impending storm rattles through wind chimes hung from roof eaves, their tones an almost mournful sound.

Drifting through the city like birdsong through an empty nest.

Shi Wudu hears a swoop of wings from behind him, turning his head, but…

Ding…

He closes his eyes, listening to an unfamiliar chime—like the tinkling of a soft bell.

His fingers are quick, combing his hair back and away from his head, pulling it into a high, neat ponytail.

Using a familiar golden pin to lock it in place.

A dragon carved into its face.

Ding…

The bell echoes again, this time Accompanied by the sound of footsteps, each landing heavily against the earth.

He turns around, half expecting to find a possessed citizen he had missed during the first wave of fighting, but…

Instead, there’s a woman in armor.

One with long, dark hair—pulled halfway out of her face. Tall for a lady, matching his own height—

A sword gleaming at her side.

“…If someone from Yunmeng or Gusu sent you here to help, you’re a bit late,” he warns, raising an eyebrow.

Oddly enough, that seems to annoy her.

“What do you call yourself, child?” She sneers, looking up and down with a disdainful gaze.

Shi Wudu’s other eyebrow follows the other, raising sharply.

“…Pei Yuan,” he answers flatly. “And you are?”

She doesn’t immediately answer, gripping her sword even more tightly.

But when she takes in the sight of those eyes…

The Water Master wasn’t ever as known for his beauty as his younger sibling was—but his statues always had real gems in the eyes, or the most vivid of paints.

Because his eyes were said to be so sharp, they gleamed like sapphires.

The stranger’s mouth curves at the corners, slowly beginning to prowl around the edges of the square, watching him closely.

Shi Wudu crosses his arms, taking a relaxed stance.

Watching every single movement she makes from the corner of his eye.

“Poor thing…” She purrs. “A lost, broken soul…that must be so humiliating for such a prideful man…”

His posture stiffens, not turning around as she walks behind him—but keenly aware of where she is.

“…Though I am shocked that Pei Ming would be so besotted by a child like yourself…”

"...The emperor sent you," Shi Wudu concludes flatly, his jaw clenching.

For her to know his identity, and to be able to allude to it without consequence...

That would only be because the one who cast the curse was the one who told her the truth.

The one who sent her here.

"Clever, clever..." She looks him up and down, wondering if this was truly a task from Jun Wu, or a reward.

She had been slightly intimidated by the idea of attacking the Water Master himself, but...

This is just a mortal teenager.

Weak—and totally vulnerable.

"...If you know who I am, I'm surprised you would age yourself by calling someone four centuries old a child," He muses, hair slipping over his shoulder as he tilts his head to the side.

He doesn't need to see her scowl in response from behind him to feel satisfaction.

“And what of someone nine centuries old?” She sneers, eyes flickering about the terrain, evaluating points of escape.

A trained fighter, then.

“That gap in experience doesn’t seem to bother you.”

Just speaking of him aches—but the mortal doesn’t show it.

“He’s pretty spry.”

Her teeth come together with an Audible snap as he examines his nails.

“And if the emperor sent you here to kill me, I really don’t understand why you care about who I had in my bed , much less our age difference.”

“Don’t play STUPID with me!”

Finally, he turns his head to look at her—thoroughly unimpressed.

“I promise, when someone comes to kill me, being coy isn’t at the top of my priority list. Have we met before?”

He thinks he’d remember the face and the aggression—but he also likes forgetting unpleasant things.

“…Oh, I see what this is,” Xuan Ji laughs hollowly, shaking her head. “Pretending like you don’t recognize me—trying to make me think he never told you about me—!”

“Told me about you?” Shi Wudu rolls his eyes. “What, you’re a former lover of his? That doesn’t narrow it down.”

“I’m not a FORMER LOVER!” She snarls, eyes glowing red with rage. “We were to BE MARRIED!”

And once she says that, Shi Wudu knows exactly who she is.

“…Oh,” his voice might have been disinterested before—but now it turns frigid.

“You’re that woman.”

Xuan Ji pauses in her circling, eyes widening with satisfaction. “HA! And you tried to pretend you hadn’t heard of me! I bet he could hardly keep my name out of his—”

“He hated speaking about you, actually.” Shi Wudu strokes his thumb over the ring on his finger.

“He’s always prided himself on having good taste, it’s hard remembering such a lapse in judgment.”

Pei Ming really does pride himself on having generally chosen well with his partners, even if he’s chosen many, and often.

Beautiful, intelligent, skilled—and challenging.

That was part of what made it so hard to push him away, in the beginning.

Facing away from Pei Ming in bed, pretending to be indifferent—grumbling something about how he was exhausted, and the General should find someone else to sate his needs.

But then Pei’s lips would find his pulse point, and he would speak into his skin, leaving the Water Master shivering with every syllable—

‘Where could I possibly go that would compare to this?’

Compared to him.

‘Any other bed would be lackluster by comparison.’

Part of being desired by a man who prides himself on taste is the thrill of feeling so deeply valued.

He almost wishes he could live inside the memory of that feeling a little longer, but—

“If his taste is so wonderful, as the love of his life , I’ll take that as a compliment .”

Shi Wudu’s eyebrow raises even higher, and he shakes his head.

“Oh, you misunderstood my reaction just now,” he turns, and now, rather than her circling him—they’re circling one another. “I didn’t recognize you because you were actually going to marry Pei Ming.”

He flicks his hair back over his shoulder, and—

The brat has the nerve to smirk.

“You’re just the only woman he’s been with who also happens to be delusional.”

The air around them grows thick with resentment as her eyes burn with rage.

“You DARE—!”

“If he promised to marry you, then you would be his wife,” Shi Wudu shrugs. “He keeps his word, no matter how unpleasant it may be. But you already know that you aren’t the love of his life. Otherwise, you wouldn’t have scurried all the way here just to kill me.”

It’s a cruel form of irony that he’ll say such things in order to get under Xuan Ji’s skin, but he doesn’t actually believe it.

Pei Ming loves him—and their friendship has always been genuine.

But he’s the love of Shi Wudu’s life—and Shi Wudu is a love in his.

That isn’t something he would ever resent Pei Ming for, either. He understands it.

Because while he’ll never love someone in the same way as Pei—he’ll never love anyone as much as Shi Qingxuan, either.

She’s been the joy of his life.

He also knows that, at some point, she outgrew him. That Shi

Qingxuan didn't need him the way that he needed her.

And that's okay. That was his job.

In the most important relationships of his life—he never expects his affections to be returned with the same force or depth.

Because he can't just love someone in a mild, graceful sort of way.

It's consuming . It's driving.

To the point where there was nothing he couldn't do to protect someone he loved—but there's a flip side to that coin.

There was also nothing he wouldn't do for someone he loved.

…That's how he ended up here, in this situation.

"I suppose I can thank you for one thing, though," Shi Wudu muses, tapping his brow bone. "The scar really does suit him."

But that's also all Xuan Ji is, at this point.

An old scar that refuses to heal.

She stops walking, her knuckles white and aching from the tightness of her grip on her sword.

"…You would mock me, for what he put me through?" Xuan Ji whispers. "Have you no shame?"

Shi Wudu has no idea how maiming him is something Pei Ming put her through, but who can say.

"…If I was going to be tempted to mock you for something inappropriate, it would be to say that the only thing I need to do to avoid a fight with you would be climbing a flight of stairs," he looks her over. "But mocking people for physical infirmities is classless."

But Xuan Ji wasn't injured in battle. She wasn't born with a deformed leg.

She intentionally ruined her leg, all for the love and attention that a man could not and would not give.

And from the look of it—Jun Wu has already healed her leg to aid her in taking him down.

"…Bravado doesn't suit everyone," Xuan Ji admits, raising her blade. "But it suits you. I suppose that shouldn't be a surprise. This is a relief for you, isn't it?"

She steps toward him, metal soled boots landing heavily against the street.

"Ending your suffering, rolling around in filth with these mortals. You tried to take your own life, if the emperor's words were true…"

When she examines the angry red scar on his throat, she thinks so.

"We both know you will never see him again, anyway. Why fight it?"

Part of him does still crave death. Not the afterlife or relief from his suffering, but sheer oblivion.

Something beyond memory, fatigue, or regret.

He might have agreed with her yesterday.

He certainly would have, the day he arrived in Lanling.

And it's not even that he doesn't feel tempted by it now.

Saying otherwise would just be a lie.

Shi Wudu looks back over his shoulder. At the brewing clouds. The ships shrinking further and further back in the sea.

And for a moment, it looks like he's making peace with it.

Like, in the face of every other option—letting go might be the easiest option.

In that sense, Shi Wudu doesn't think there is any difference between the living, and ghosts.

You have to want to remain in this world. To live. You need a reason .

Without it, you fade.

His entire life, he slowly disciplined himself in the act of pushing aside his own wants, needs, and emotions in favor of whatever was most important at that time.

When he was a child, he wasn't allowed to express fear or pain. Not without putting Shi Qingxuan in danger.

After their parents died—he put his own youth aside, transforming himself from brother to guardian.

There was no room for immaturity or weakness. He let go of his own dreams—and it wasn't difficult for him. He can't even remember what he wanted, back then.

And when there was a chance to save Shi Qingxuan's life, even at the cost of his own conscience…

He did it. And while he knows he'll never deserve pity, not after the damage he caused—

Shi Wudu also knows that he paid an unimaginable price.

It wasn't something that he could have realized before.

Not when it was so easy for him to swallow down the ache in his chest, every time Pei Ming looked his way.

To hide the depth of his feelings like an ugly little secret, because—

He felt so unworthy of being loved back.

Like his love was a burden, one that the General would only grow to resent him for. And Shi Wudu would rather adore in secret than ever know what it felt like to disappoint him.

It was a fear of rejection, yes—but he also placed Pei's independence before his own happiness.

That was never difficult for him. It hurt, but the choice itself was always easy.

And maybe that's why, after so many years desperate to get out—he was so willing to take his own life when Pei Ming and Shi Qingxuan learned the truth.

Because then, they had suddenly become aware of what he had known all along.

That he wasn't strong. That his loyalty was a burden holding them back.

That he had earned his name:

A tyrant.

And Tyrants are never as powerful as they seem—they're just afraid .

That was when it became so heartbreakingly obvious that the best thing for them—for Pei Ming, Shi Qingxuan, and He Sheng—

Was if he just disappeared. Fading into nothing more than an old scar.

And unlike Xuan Ji, he hoped so badly that they could heal from him.

Letting go wasn't hard.

Actually—it was remarkably easy.

But now—

"…No."

Now, knowing why she's here, he can't seem to do that.

Now it's Xuan Ji's turn to raise an eyebrow, having been on the verge of attack when the former god steps out of reach.

"You think you have a choice?" Her lips pull back over her fangs, glinting in the dimming afternoon light. "I only offered to make it easy for you. A mercy—"""""

"No," he repeats coldly, shaking his head.

Mercy requires empathy.

She has none.

"You think that he'll have room in his heart for you if there's no chance I could walk back into his life. But he left you centuries before I was even born."

It's a delusion. A bargain you make, chasing the love of a man who will never change his mind.

"You're just here because if you can't have him, no one else can."

And he—

For the first time in so long, since he was a child, even—

He feels this angry sense of desperation in his chest.

No.

No.

'You can't have him.'

This feeling of—

Of being unwilling to let go.

"…But no matter what you do to me," he murmurs, flicking his wrist —the light from zidian's violet glow reflecting in his eyes as it flickers to life.

"He will always be mine."

Even if it's pitiful. Even if he's just like her, clinging to the love of a man he isn't worthy of.

Knowing that Pei Ming must be so angry and disappointed in him, for the secrets he kept. For the crimes he committed.

And even still, it—

It isn't easy this time, letting go of his wants, it's impossible .

Because when Shi Wudu showed that hair pin in his temple—Pei came.

Because even if the general nearly shook him to death on the docks that day—

When Shi Wudu woke up, he was surrounded by the smell of him, the warmth of a familiar cloak around him.

And in spite of how miserable his situation was, he was so happy.

Because Shi Wudu heard his voice today.

Because—

'He's mine, and you can't have him. '

"If you manage to kill me, I'll show you what a real haunting looks like," he hisses.

He won't leave this world.

Even if it's only to protect Pei from her.

"…You think you have even the slightest chance against me, in that weakened form?" Xuan Ji's expression contorts with rage. "I'm almost INSULTED!"

Maybe.

But he also isn't a defenseless teenage bride.

So, he's still better off than her other victims.

And when each of them launches forward, finally prepared to pounce—

Shi Wudu knows his chances are poor.

And yet…

With the thunder roaring overhead and the sea at his back, an eagle's cry piercing through the air like a call to battle—

He isn't afraid.

Not anymore.

My Friend

Chapter Summary

> “…Mu Qing?”
>
> “What?”
>
> The martial god pauses, stiffening when Xie Lian reaches out to grasp his sleeve.
>
> “…What’s wrong with your spiritual powers?”

Chapter Notes

> TRIGGER WARNING: mentions of implied child sexual abuse, past shaming of sex work, and violence

See the end of the chapter for more notes

THUD!

Xie Lian sits up quickly, movements quick and unbalanced from the adrenaline, Ruoye frantically twisting around his palm, trembling with fright.

“…It’s alright,” the prince whispers, stroking his fingers over the silk bandage, trying to find his bearings.

He can smell maple trees—and a faint hint of rain—but he isn’t sitting on bare earth. There’s something hard beneath him, digging into his side in places.

“You didn’t hit your head again, did you?” A voice grumbles, and Xie Lian perks with relief.

“We had to get out of there so quickly—there wasn’t time to do anything but jump in the array blindly…”

“Mu Qing,” he sighs, reaching over to grasp his friend by the wrist. “…Where’s Feng Xin?”

And his muffled reply—it comes from underneath both of them.

“Here…”

He didn't have much of a choice, when they were falling through the array—he was the only one operating at his full power, so he was the one to break the fall.

"You're so much thinner than you used to be, I thought you'd be lighter…"

"It's not me," Xie Lian explains, not taking offense. "It's the shackles."

Without them, he probably weighs little more than he did as a child at this point, but…

He can't help but feel a little guilty, allowing Hua Cheng to carry him so much, even if he's never complained.

But that reminds him—

If they were able to escape through the travel array in Blackwater Manor—what about Hua Cheng?

Or Pei Ming and Yushi H—?

"If you're worried about Crimson Rain," Ling Wen speaks, finally making her presence known, "he's on his way here now."

The weight of the red string on his finger is enough to tell him that Hua Cheng is still safe, but—

Now that they're separated, Jun Wu won't be coming after the ghost king—

He'll be coming after Xie Lian.

Which means they don't have any time to waste.

And now, with his head back to normal, and a brief pause in the fighting—there's something that's finally caught his notice.

"…Mu Qing?"

"What?"

The martial god pauses, stiffening when Xie Lian reaches out to grasp his sleeve.

"…What's wrong with your spiritual powers?"

He noticed before—but didn’t have the time or coherency to ask—

But he can’t see any of Mu Qing’s spiritual aura anymore—just darkness.

“…That’s—"

“This isn’t a situation where you can just push it off until later,” Feng Xin sits up, rubbing the small of his back with a wince. “That was why you kissed me before you could heal his highness, right?”

Mu Qing’s eyes snap over to Xie Lian, who has stiffened—the tips of his ears slightly red.

“…You didn’t have to bring that up…”

“Oh, don’t worry on my account,” Xie Lian waves his hands awkwardly. “San Lang and I share power that way all the…”

He started to blurt out that explanation as a way of making Mu Qing feel comfortable, only to realize that would absolutely have the opposite effect.

“…I just mean…well…”

Mu Qing sighs, unbuttoning his sleeve.

“When we were imprisoned in the Heavens, Jun Wu came to my palace.”

“It seems like he came to everyone’s…” Xie Lian mutters, his expression darkening.

“He didn’t come to mine,” Feng Xin looks the two of them over, adjusting his armor. “Guess I didn’t have anything he wanted.”

And hearing him say it like that—

Xie Lian’s expression darkens, reaching out to grip Mu Qing’s forearm tightly.

“What did he do to you?”

Hearing him sound like that—it catches Feng Xin’s attention, sending it sharpening in on Mu Qing with narrow focus.

“… What? What are you—?”

What is Xie Lian so worried about? He doesn't—

Mu Qing rolls up his sleeve, bringing Xie Lian's hand over to feel—and both of his friends understand in an instant.

All too familiar with the sight and feel of a spiritual shackle.

And when Mu Qing sees how relieved Xie Lian is, letting out a trembling breath—

He frowns.

"…What did you think he had done?"

The prince shakes his head vehemently, hair whipping around his shoulders.

"It doesn't matter."

What matters is that he didn't do that .

"…That's why I wanted to come back here," Mu Qing mutters, choosing to let the matter go—for now. "I knew there was a good chance the emperor would shackle me—even before we left Mount Tonglu."

Which was why he hadn't planned on going back .

"How did you know that?" Feng Xin frowns, reaching over to snatch Mu Qing's wrist, glaring down at the dark, twisting black pattern. "Why the fuck would he do that do you, if he already knew you hadn't committed a crime?!"

Mu Qing doesn't answer—just hangs his head.

"Neither of you would understand," he mutters—in a tone that is so easily mistaken for being bitter, or resentful.

But Xie Lian knows better.

"…If you don't want to say because you're ashamed—that's exactly how he wants you to feel," the prince reminds him quietly.

"That's how he wins."

Mu Qing's throat is so thick—it hurts.

And he is ashamed. So, so ashamed—but he…

"…He was trying to turn me against you," the martial god admits hoarsely."Ever since the mid-autumn festival."

Feng Xin's stomach twists with nausea.

Remembering a locked door.

Mu Qing begging Feng Xin to just leave him alone.

And the emperor stopping him when he came back a final time, planning to kick the door in.

"…That's why he came to see me," Mu Qing swallows hard. "He thought…if given the chance, I would…"

He freezes, his heart leaping into his throat when he feels a palm press against his cheek.

And when he looks up—

Xie Lian smiles.

"Then he doesn't know you at all."

"…" Mu Qing stares back at him—biting his lip, eyes shining with unspoken emotions.

"…Go to the lake."

Feng Xin starts, so distracted by watching the scene—he almost didn't realize that Mu Qing was speaking to him.

"Huh?"

"I already said—I knew I was going to be shackled if we went back," he mutters, clearing his throat. "I stored as much of my spiritual power in it as I could. I'll need to work on General Pei and the Rain Master when they get here."

There's no way they weren't hurt in that blast, even if Hua Cheng is probably just fine.

That bastard always lands on his feet.

Feng Xin sends him an annoyed, reluctant look—knowing that they don’t have much time to waste—

But that also means there isn’t time to argue with him, either.

And when he walks away…Mu Qing turns around, scanning the area surrounding Mount Taicang for Ling Wen, but…

She’s halfway down the slope, examining possible exits—far out of earshot.

“…I have something I want to say to you.”

Xie Lian stiffens, surprised by the quiet, unsteady tone of Mu Qing’s voice.

“And I don’t know if I’ll have the chance or the nerve to say it later.”

“…What is it?” Xie Lian frowns. “I don’t understa—"

“I’m sorry.”

The prince grows still—and Mu Qing’s hands ball up into fists in his lap, his face downturned.

He’s not sure if it means much, when it comes eight centuries too late.

But it’s…better than nothing, isn’t it?

"...Not...Not for leaving," he explains carefully, refusing to acknowledge why. That he knows that—

'It was a RELIEF!'

Xie Lian wasn't sad to see him go.

And Mu Qing had his mother and sisters to look after—they didn't have anyone else to protect them.

"But...everything else..."

"Mu Qing—"

"When I realized who Hua Cheng was, I..." The martial god sits back, his chest aching with shame and regret. "I knew why I was one of the gods he challenged."

Because he was there that day.

The day that he's spent countless lifetimes wishing he could take back.

"I know...you've probably already guessed why I did that..." He swallows hard, "And I know it doesn't change anything, but you would be wrong."

It was never because Mu Qing hated him.

He resented Xie Lian—but he always knew that the prince had never done anything to deserve it.

Mu Qing was just—

Painfully young, scared, and alone, and Xie Lian was never cruel or unfair, but—

Sometimes, just being around him made Mu Qing feel worthless .

And in part, he left because he had his family to look after—that was the most important reason.

But it wasn't the only one.

The day he left, when Xie Lian was still gone, before he lost Hong'er—

It was because Mu Qing couldn't stand to be around Feng Xin anymore.

Because there's nothing that hurts more when you're nineteen years old, kissing the boy who took up permanent residence in your head over a bowl of congee, and—

And he says Xie Lian's name.

"…But I never told anyone," Mu Qing mutters—doubting Xie Lian will believe him.

"I never started those rumors about you. And even hearing them—"

His voice wobbles for a moment—and he has to stop, struggling to compose himself.

"You heard everything I said to Jian Lan in that Inn, didn't you?"

Xie Lian winces, biting his lip.

"…I didn't mean to."

Mu Qing knows—Xie Lian wouldn't eavesdrop on something like that on purpose.

He isn't that kind of person.

"…It wasn't just happening to my sister," he mutters, unable to look at Xie Lian.

To see the look on his face.

He doesn't know what he'll find.

"…Mu Qing—"

"It was a long time ago—and I'm fine now," he cuts the prince off shortly. "And I'm not saying it because I expect your forgiveness, or to make an excuse for the way I treated you, I just—"

He wraps one arm around himself, squeezing his eyes shut.

"When people told those rumors about you…you aren't actually like that…"

Mu Qing was the one who has to explain what impure thoughts were, during their cultivation training with Mei Nianqing, because as the prince said—

'How am I supposed to know if I'm having an impure thought if I've never had one before?'

"…But I was…" Mu Qing whispers.

Back then, even if the rumors could never have been close to who Xie Lian actually was—

To Mu Qing, it felt like hearing about himself .

Because back then—

He felt disgusting.

He felt ashamed.

And in spite of how much pain, fear, and anger he felt—he was also a teenage boy, trying to figure out what and who he wanted, and—

Mu Qing hated himself.

He still does.

He always has.

"…" Xie Lian knows that Mu Qing isn't like that at all, he never has been—

And it shouldn't have mattered if he was.

He's seen so much evil and cruelty in the world. Kindness, too.

And the idea of being ashamed of that—

It seems so remarkably silly, now.

And even if the worst things that Mu Qing had done were purely out of spite—

He would still be far from evil. Not even close to the worst person Xie Lian has ever met.

"And those things I said that day, when I came to see you…after…"

Mu Qing is, for once, relieved that Xie Lian can't see his face.

Because he can barely keep his voice even—but he can't stop the tears that are falling.

"…I'm sorry."

Now, Xie Lian is hanging his head too.

Mostly because his own throat is suddenly tight.

"It…It was fucked up," Mu Qing admits, remembering how it was the one and only one he ever provoked Xie Lian to curse at him. "And I never should have said it. I just…"

One tear slips from his cheek, landing on his hands in his lap.

"…I thought I would have been the last person you would have told… and when I r-realized I…"

Xie Lian told Mu Qing that he had fallen for a man first.

"It m-made me think you…used to t- trust …m…me…"

"I do, " Xie Lian whispers, but Mu Qing is too lost to hear.

To notice that Xie Lian is speaking in present tense, not past.

"…And I just…Back then…G-god, I feel so f…fucking s- stupid…"

"You're not—"

"I a-am!" Mu Qing snaps, pressing the heels of his palms to his eyes in frustration, trying to stifle the tears.

"Because all I w-wanted back then w-was to b-be y-your—"

It feels mortifying to even say it, given how thoroughly Mu Qing wrecked things—because that was what he always did last then, pushing everyone in his life away—

But he chokes it out, frame trembling.

"F-F- Friend!"

But Xie Lian—

He always deserved a better friend than Mu Qing knew how to be.

People like Feng Xin, or Shi Qingxuan. Hell, even Quan Yizhen, weird as he is—

But not Mu Qing.

…Riiiiip.

He looks down—only to find Xie Lian bent over, ripping a piece of cloth from the hem of his robes—surprisingly clean, in spite of the chaos of the day.

Using it to reach forward, feeling around for Mu Qing's jaw, and then —

The prince carefully dries the tears on his cheeks.

Mu Qing is frozen, almost numb with shock, having no idea how to react, and—

There's a whoosh of air behind them—and the tell tale sound of a travel array opening.

…And that makes him shrink away, even as Xie Lian watches on in dismay.

Clink!

Clink!

"…San Lang!"

Xie Lian barely gets the name out of his mouth before arms are wrapping around him, holding him so tightly, it's almost painful.

"Nice…" Mu Qing grumbles, rising to his feet. "Just drop the two injured gods like a pair of rocks, why don't you…"

"It's fine…" Pei wheezes. "I honestly wasn't expecting to get a ride to begin with, so…"

Mu Qing goes to him first, only to be waved off.

"Help…The Rain Master. She got…hit worse than me…"

For some reason, Hua Cheng snatched him up before the wave even hit—and he still isn't sure why.

Xie Lian is being gripped so tightly, he's barely even able to lift his head. "San Lang—"

"I am never doing that again," he whispers fiercely—and the calamity hasn't ever spoken to Xie Lian like that before, but—

He can understand why.

"I'm sorry, I know it was hard—"

"I'm sorry," Hua Cheng interrupts, leaning back to look him over, delicately placing both hands on Xie Lian's face as he examines his head. "I shouldn't have waited.'

"You did as I asked, San Lang," Xie Lian reminds him, but that doesn't ease his anguish.

"I shouldn't have."

And he should have taken Jun Wu's head then and there, consequences be damned.

He should have gotten there before he touched a hair on the prince's head. He—

Xie Lian's hands press against his cheeks, derailing his thoughts from spiraling further.

"If you had done anything differently, we might not have gotten out at all," his thumbs sweep under Hua Cheng's cheekbones—

Something he used to do when he was younger—whenever he wanted Hong'er to stop sulking.

"And I knew I was safe the entire time."

And it's not that Hua Cheng is sulking now—Xie Lian knows he has every reason to be upset, but…then, he leans down suddenly, and Xie Lian—

His ears are burning from being kissed out in the open, even if Mu Qing is already attending to Yushi Huang—

"…Ho ho."

It's a small little laugh—not particularly surprised, serving more as a polite reminder that Pei Ming is still present—

And it's enough to set Xie Lian's face on fire .

"…General!" He leans away from Hua Cheng sharply, clearing his throat. "I hope you aren't badly hurt!"

Pei Ming looks them over—from the prince's flushed face, to Hua Cheng's impassive, shameless stare—and he waved it off.

"I've had worse," he mutters, watching as Feng Xin returns, carrying a canteen, handing it over to Mu Qing as he works on the Rain Master.

"Did you manage to get a hold of it?" Feng Xin asks, kneeling down to offer some of his own spiritual power to aid in Pei Ming's healing process.

Hua Cheng glances over, just in time to see the general lift the dagger from his sleeve.

"Give it here," Mu Qing murmurs, taking it by the handle—

Surprised by how heavy such a small blade is. Tiny, in comparison to the sabers he uses.

"…I've stabilized Yushi Huang enough for her body to recover on its own. But you two are going to be easy targets for Jun Wu.”

Pei Ming winces, his left arm having gone mostly limp since he broke his shoulder—muscles aching as bone slowly knits back together.

“I agree, but it’s not as if we have anywhere to run.”

“…That’s not necessarily true,” Xie Lian speaks up, lifting his chin. “Even Jun Wu doesn’t know where the Royal catacombs are. Ling Wen should be able to get the two of you there safely—and it’s far enough underground to shield you from any kind of battle.”

When Xie Lian was small—he was sent there to take shelter with his mother, hiding with other civilians and servants from the court when the Emperor was said to be facing a Heavenly Calamity in the central plains.

And even then, the rumbling seemed distant, sleeping in her arms.

And now—

Xie Lian swallows back a new form of pain, thinking back on that memory.

Knowing that Jun Wu was behind the war that led to her eventual death.

“…Running from a fight isn’t my style,” Pei grouses, throwing an arm around Ling Wen’s shoulders as she reaches his side.

The civil god rolls his eyes, switching to his male form—giving himself enough strength to support Pei Ming, all while carrying Yushi Huang on his back.

“You’re lucky you didn’t die in that last stunt—and you’re no good to anyone until your arm is back to normal.”

She’s right—but Pei Ming still loathes it, glancing back over his shoulder at Xie Lian, Hua Cheng, Feng Xin, and Mu Qing, all crouched together.

Three children of Xianle, kneeling in the ruins of what was once their home.

And the fourth…

Pei’s eyes settle on Hua Cheng.

And for some reason, when he sees the ghost king's hair—how now, on the heat of battle, there's a slight curl to it—

The sort of texture that waves and tangles when it's wet.

For some reason, he—

He remembers sharp eyes, and a challenging smile.

The sound of music in a tavern

Dice falling across a table.

'Aren't you going to wish me good luck, my lady?'

Her words linger in his mind, as they grow further apart.

'Oh no, I don't think I have any to spare for you.'

'Why is that?'

'In my experience, those who deserve good fortune need it the most.'

'Is that your way of saying you find me undeserving?'

'Oh no, it's even worse than that.'

That was when she smiled at him—like they were two accomplices, legs delicately crossed at the ankles, shielding her face with a fan so no one could see just how close they were.

'I find you infuriatingly capable.'

He was early in his godhood, back then—with an air of sorrow and anger that hung around him like shackles.

But being near her—

He remembered how to smile again. How to laugh the way he once did.

'How is that infuriating, love?'

And she smiled then—as if she knew something that he didn't.

'I suppose I'm just a selfish woman.'

And a fierce one, at that.

He can still remember laying by her side upon a grassy hill, watching ships come and go from the harbor, when she told him her parents had found her a husband.

'…You always seemed to enjoy being a socialite. Won't marrying into a wealthy family please you?'

She barked out a disbelieving laugh at the sound of that, glaring up at the sky spitefully.

'I think being snatched away by a Fox spirit would be preferable—or a dragon. I've always wanted to see one, you know. Have you ever—?'

'…And what about a god?'

No one would ever believe him, if he tried to say that there had been a woman he had been willing to slow down for.

Even Shi Wudu seemed to struggle to reconcile himself with the idea that Pei Ming had asked someone for marriage before.

'…Not a god.'

Though, he supposes the most unbelievable part of the tale is the fact that she said no.

Kindly—with faint sorrow, her hand gentle against his cheek.

'You're a good man,' she whispered, contradicting his own self loathing, back then. 'But you're an exception among your kind.'

She wanted no part of that life—and he could never blame her for it.

But he also couldn't have known what fate awaited her, if she remained among the mortals, and he—

Why is he thinking of her now? Just...because of what Jun Wu said about their son?

How Pei failed him?

Back near the mountain's summit, Hua Cheng is watching wearily as Mu Qing starts a small flame, using it to sterilize the blade of the dagger.

"Why does he have that thing?"

He can understand the value of getting it away from Jun Wu—but that doesn't seem to be the only purpose

And Xie Lian braces himself—knowing exactly what he'll say.

"You can't kill Jun Wu and Bai Wuxiang simultaneously," he explains carefully—and Hua Cheng doesn't argue him that point. "And with nearly everyone else incapacitated..."

"We need to break his shackles." Mu Qing concludes flatly—and Xie Lian was right.

"Absolutely not."

Hua Cheng's reaction is immediate.

"San Lang, I know it isn't ideal—but we don't know another way—"

"Then we'll think of a better one."

"...I really wish we could , but we don't have the time—"

"Couldn't we just cut his foot off at the ankle with a normal blade?" Feng Xin suggests suddenly, rubbing his chin, only to glare back when Hua Cheng sends him an acidic look.

"Hey, I don't like it any more than you do! But at least it's an idea—!"

"Oh, you're right, and thank you for your contribution," Hua Cheng sneers. "What was your plan for his throat? A little decapitation?"

"Obviously NOT—!"

"It won't work," Xie Lian shakes his head glumly. "I've had my foot amputated plenty of times—and the shackle always grows back with it."

(He's also had his eyes poked out more times than he can count with the same results, but that seems a little too gruesome to share.)

The three surrounding him grow still, silently horrified by that information.

"...And we don't know if this would work, either," Hua Cheng mutters, glaring at the God Slayer hatefully. "Which is why we're not using it."

"I don't think that's your call," Mu Qing glares, "and you're right, we don't know if it's going to work."

He sits back, pushing his own sleeve up to the elbow;

"Which is why we're trying it on mine first."

"...What?!" Feng Xin sputters—and he wasn't happy with the plan before, but now, he seems to be even less on board. "What if it goes wrong?! That's your sword hand!"

"And Mei Nianqing said the incision wouldn't need to be big." Mu Qing mutters, his brow pinched with focus.

"...No, Feng Xin has a good point," Xie Lian frowns. "My ankle is less of a loss than your hand—you're a swordsman and a doctor, they're more valuable than my—"

"If I cut on the top of my wrist, at most I'll nick a tendon. A small injury could heal without magic."

But the ankle? It has far more connective tissue involved, and while it's not as important for fine motor skills—it's weight bearing. The neck is even worse, and the eyes —

If they're going to try this, Mu Qing's wrist has the lowest risk of permanent damage.

"And if it does work—you think you could safely use it on his neck? Or his eyes?"

"I have no idea," Mu Qing admits. "But I also know I won't do it if I think I'm going to risk his life or permanently maiming him."

"...I'd be okay if I was a little mai—" Xie Lian starts, trying to ease the stress of the situation, but—

"No." All three of them speak in unison, each sounding slightly exasperated.

"The point is, I'm only putting myself at risk right now, so shut up and let me work."

Hua Cheng seems to decide that he is comfortable with that risk after a moment, shutting his mouth. And if Feng Xin still has concerns—

They're put to the side by a flash of light and a nearby rumble, the earth shaking faintly underneath their feet.

...A travel array.

And from the feel of it—one that powerful could only be coming from one being.

Mu Qing leans against Xie Lian's side, bracing his arm between them to keep it still, even as the ground moves. "Both of you keep him off of us while I get this done!"

Hua Cheng and Feng Xin pause, looking at one another.

It's not exactly a position either one of them expected to be in—but the situation doesn't give them time to express any distaste for the idea.

Now, they have to move.

Jun Wu shakes the ash and dust from his hair, brushing the dried blood from his armor with a flick of his wrist.

"Xianle..." He muses, eyeing the overgrown ruin around him. "Time has not been kind to you."

Whether he's speaking about the man or the kingdom remains to be seen.

It's easy now, to stand upon this mountain and remember what it used to be. How the Kingdom used to shine with prosperity and promise.

And the young prince who was born here. The boy Jun Wu watched grow.

It's a pity that it all came to this.

Even if he's the architect of this outcome, he isn't blind to the reality that it is, in fact, a tragedy.

CLANG!

He raises his sword, barely catching the blow from E'Ming in time—sparks flying from the edge of his blade.

"It must be strange for you, being back here."

Hua Cheng doesn't reply, not gripping E'Ming with his own hands—rather using the weapon like a fifth limb, attacking the emperor viciously and without a single moment of hesitation.

And with his own hands, he wields a guandao of black steel, inlaid with gold.

The spear moves deftly in his grip, spinning in and out of parrying range, coming down with daunting force each time Jun Wu goes to block him.

CLANG!

CLANG!

CLANG!

"...A jack of all trades, aren't you?" The emperor sneers, his expression twisting with annoyance as he's forced to block the polearm with his own blade, using the edge of his vambrace to fend off E'Ming.

"You know that means you're a master of none, yes?"

CLANG!

The next blow is so powerful—it comes with a painful reminder, forcing Jun Wu to take one step back, bracing himself.

They aren't in his territory anymore.

Hua Cheng pulls back, only to lunge forward for another strike, using the guandao and E'Ming in a pincer maneuver.

"My Gusohi taught me that a man should be a master of any weapon he forges—or else it might fall out of his control." His eyes flash viciously. "You're familiar with that problem, aren't you?"

Jun Wu doesn't know which offends him more.

What Hua Cheng is implying, or calling Jun Wu's wife his teacher.

"There isn't enough familiarity in the world to save you once I'm through with—"

CRACK!

Jun Wu stumbles back once again, startled, and when he looks down...

There's a crackling bolt of spiritual energy sprouting from his breast plate. Not piercing his armor, but a close call.

Fired from none other than the bow of Nan Yang.

"Has anyone ever told you that you talk WAY too damn much?!" The general snarls, three more arrows notched.

"I get it, it was probably fucking EXHAUSTING hiding what a piece of SHIT you are for so long!"

CRACK!

CLANG!

"But it's okay to NOT BE YOUR GODDAMN SELF SOMETIMES! OR ALL THE DAMN TIME!"

Honestly, Feng Xin never had any love for the emperor of any kind.

He respected the man. Did his duty, and followed orders—as anyone would expect of someone in his position.

But he always found something about Jun Wu to be just a little too slick in nature for his liking.

Like an octopus that can find the smallest hole in a net, using it to squirm its way out of any predicament.

Feng Xin pushed that feeling aside. Because he swore an oath of loyalty when he ascended as a martial god.

Because there's a way to things, in the Heavens. Because Xie Lian trusted him. And because—

Because if there was something wrong with him, Mu Qing would catch onto it.

Little did he know, Mu Qing had—

He just didn't trust Feng Xin enough to tell him.

But Feng Xin would prefer Jun Wu's fake, cloying, manipulative persona to this.

The openly taunting, gloating, arrogant opponent that stands before them now. And he has no reason to be so assured. Maybe so, if he were facing anyone else—

But here, Hua Cheng has him evenly matched.

And with Feng Xin's help—

CLANG!

CRACK!

CLANG!

Jun Wu is outmatched.

Hua Cheng's relentless assault is keeping both of the emperor's hands occupied, blocking each of his weapons—giving him no time to shield himself when Feng Xin's arrows slip in between Hua Cheng's blows.

Jun Wu is able to ward them off with a spiritual barrier—but only once for every three bolts. And the longer this goes on, the more likely his armor is to wear down.

Which is why he shouldn't be so arrogant, or boasting.

He isn't winning this encounter.

So...why is he?

If it were anyone else, Feng Xin would cock it up to sheer hubris or stupidity—

But that can't be true.

Feng Xin might not be a deductive genius like Xie Lian, or as innately cunning as Mu Qing, but he has never been a fool .

Jun Wu has kept a group of the most capable and intelligent people in all of human existence on a tight leash for the last thousand years. Even more than that when one considers how long his reign has been.

You don't last that long, hiding your intentions and manipulating everyone around you, if you're too arrogant to see your own position clearly. It requires perception. Guile. Always thinking beyond your opponent's reaction.

So, why is a man like that wasting his time boasting?

Further up the mountain, Xie Lian grips Mu Qing's hand tightly, using his other hand to grip the martial god's elbow—holding him steady as Mu Qing carefully slices into his own skin.

And the moment he does—his brow pinches with an instant flash of pain.

Far more than what one would feel from any other kind of blade.

"...How the hell was Shi Wudu able to do this to himself?" He mutters under his breath, forcing his voice not to break, even if it trembles slightly.

Though, given the type of wound on his throat that Mu Qing found when he performed the autopsy—it wasn't a carefully made incision, like what he's performing now. More like a last second slashing of the neck. One with little to no hesitation.

He didn't have to feel how painful it was during the act—only after, when he was already dying.

But making a slow incision like this? It's agony.

In part, Mu Qing is sure it must have something to do with the fact that, as someone who has been a god for more than eight centuries now, he's grown unaccustomed to the mortal sensation of pain.

He still experiences physical pain as a god—he isn't so far removed from it as Xie Lian, for example. But somehow, knowing that the wound will inevitably heal makes it hurt less.

But not now.

Now, he feels like he has to fight to cut through every millimeter, lips trembling as he struggles to keep his hand level, even with Xie Lian's help holding him steady.

"...If you need to stop—"

"Already halfway there," he spits out between clenched teeth, toes curling, nails scraping against the soles of his boots from the discomfort. "It'd be pointless to pull out now."

Especially when he hasn't hit a tendon yet.

If he keeps on moving vertically, there won't be any serious damage to his hand. There's blood dripping down his wrist, dropping down onto the grass beneath them—but little other sign of physical distress.

Even so, it makes Mu Qing feel wary of having to do this to the prince.

Not on his ankle or throat—Mu Qing knows he could perform both without serious risk to Xie Lian's life or athletic ability.

But his eyes?

Even if Xie Lian's pain tolerance could handle that–-and Mu Qing is disturbed to say that it might—

Is he willing to put his friend through that kind of agony? Even if it is to save the world as they know it?

The further the knife moves through the shackle, the more of a reaction there is. Mu Qing can see dark sparks of light flickering around the cursed shackle, swirling angrily in protest.

And watching it now, he struggles to understand how they, as Heavenly Officials, found cursed shackles to be anything but sinister in nature.

Xie Lian grimaces each time he feels Mu Qing tremble against him—holding him tighter in response.

Partly out of anxiety, but also because Mu Qing can't afford to flinch right now—not even a little bit.

If he does—he might permanently damage his fine motor skills in that hand, something they can't afford to risk.

Then; it occurs to him.

'...Feng Xin?' He calls out in the god's private array, having no doubts as to whether or not his friend is listening.

'Start aiming your arrows on the right side of his armor—just underneath the third rib. If you focus there, San Lang will follow!'

'Got it,' Feng Xin agrees shortly. ' But why there? And why not tell Hua Cheng yourself to make sure he gets the message?'

Because Xie Lian can barely stand saying Hua Cheng's password in a hostage scenario, he isn't going to willingly say it with Mu Qing sitting right there.

'When I fought him before my second banishment—I struck him there! His armor should still have a weak spot from where I broke through!'

He hasn't had his beloved wife to fix it for him since then, after all, and would have had to settle for a lower quality armorer to fix it.

Leaving him with a singular point of vulnerability in his armor.

Xie Lian doesn't need Feng Xin to confirm that he went with that strategy—he can already hear the clashes growing to a fever pitch, the martial god and the ghost king each giving their all to take Jun Wu down.

Even if that action would be ultimately futile, they could at least incapacitate him first. That would buy them all the time they needed to handle—

Mu Qing stiffens harshly beside him, hissing sharply, the muscles in his neck straining as he applies firm, controlled pressure to his wrist, his body quivering from the pain—

And Xie Lian can barely stand it anymore.

"Mu Qing," He pleads—not pulling the god's hand aside, too worried that he would accidentally hurt him in an attempt to help him, but desperate. "That's enough, we'll have to try some other—!"

BOOM!

The God Slayer, after sliding millimeter by millimeter at a painfully slow pace, goes through the last centimeter of the cursed shackle like butter.

When it does, it releases an almost violent blast of energy—sending them both flying, each sprawled a few meters away from one another on the ground.

Mu Qing sits up, hair mussed, breathing hard, and when he looks at his hand...it's bleeding, still stings like a bitch, but—

His wrist is bare.

It's light again.

And the pulsing, crackling warmth that Mu Qing can feel flowing back into his body, coursing through his veins—

It's spiritual power.

"...It worked," he whispers, his ribs aching as he sits up, rolling his wrist to test his range of motion. "...Guoshi was right...It...it actually works!"

And when Xie Lian looks over to confirm—he sees the blues of Mu Qing's aura confirm it, clear as day.

“…We’ll work on your ankle first,” Mu Qing mutters, moving to brace Xie Lian’s leg as best as he can. “You have to stay completely still, your highness.”

Xie Lian steels himself, reaching down to brace his palms against the ground.

“I understand.”

CLANG!

CRACK!

Each impact from E’Ming and the arrow strikes raining down is thunderous, narrowing in on one point of focus and until the armor visibly begins to warp in response, but—

“You should have taken my olive branch when I gave you the chance,” Jun Wu muses. “It’s fascinating to stop and wonder what kind of god you might have become.”

The reference to Hua Cheng’s ascension is enough to make Feng Xin falter, nearly dropping his bow in shock.

“…What?!”

“As if I would ever bow to you, ” Hua Cheng snarls, slashing him again.

There’s only one man Hua Cheng would be brought to his knees for;

And he’s also the only god who would never ask him to kneel.

That’s when Jun Wu smiles—

Still gloating.

“It’s adorable that you think I ever planned on giving you the choice.”

It’s like Jun Wu told the prince before—

It is remarkably easy to control someone who doesn’t make an effort to hide that which they love most.

Before Hua Cheng can land another blow, the emperor snaps his fingers.

Crack!

And then—

There's a blood curdling scream.

A sound Hua Cheng has only heard once in his life. One that has haunted his every waking thought since.

The scream he heard, the day he died.

And hearing it now—

It brings the ghost king to a halt, eye wide, hands trembling.

Xie Lian wrenches his mouth shut, hands trembling as he claps them over his face—trying to keep quiet.

Mu Qing is left below him on the ground, looking up in silent horror as—

As the crown prince is dangled in the air—hung from the shackle on his neck like a noose.

His shackles burning gold, like flames embedded in his skin—twisting and digging deeper into his flesh.

Feet flailing.

Tears falling from scorching eyes as he fights with everything he has to keep quiet, but—

It hurts.

"YOUR HIGHNESS!"

It really, really hurts.

So much that it takes up all of the space in his mind. No fear, no sadness, hope, or anger—

Just pain.

Wanting nothing more than for it to stop .

For someone to help him.

Why…

Xie Lian whimpers, trembling, surrounded by darkness.

Why won't anyone help him?!

Help me.

Help me, help me, help me.

Help me, help me, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help, help me!!!!

Where's Feng Xin and Mu Qing? Or his parents? He…he wants his mother, he…

Hong'er…where's…

Another scream rips out of him.

It hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts...it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS IT HURTS!!!!

And it's that second scream that knocks the resistance out of Hua Cheng's spine.

That makes his knees buckle, hitting the ground heavily.

Because it's not just agony—

It's a howl of fear and grief.

Screaming his name.

"HONG'ER!"

He falls silent again, straining to remain quiet as he's dragged down the hill by his shackles, hanging limply in their grip—

And Jun Wu smiles, holding his hand out in front of him.

“I’m only going to ask you once—and I hope you choose your answer very carefully.”

The emperor eases his grip slightly—leaving Xie Lian hanging overhead, gasping with relief, but still agonized—

And Feng Xin, who had been staring up at the prince with horror, suddenly looks back at Hua Cheng with wide eyes.

Realizing exactly who he is.

That the four of them—

They’re all that’s left of this place. A forgotten kingdom—and a fallen prince.

All of it was taken too soon.

And now—

“Where are your ashes?”

Now, it seems like even the burning embers of Xianle are about to be snuffed out.

And Hua Cheng's answer—

"I've never had them."

It's enough to make Jun Wu pause, his brow furrowed. He's more than prepared to unleash more pressure on Xie Lian to make him talk—that isn't the problem. But—

Hua Cheng isn't lying .

"...What?"

He can't bring himself to look away from Xie Lian, his eyes burning with pain and hatred, his resentment swirling with more power for every second that he has to watch his love in agony.

"I was a ghost fire for months after my death. I had no control over my ashes back then."

Logically, that has to be true, Jun Wu knows that, but—

He also knows that Xie Lian never would have left Hua Cheng's ashes, or buried them. Not when the prince had clung so desperately to the idea of Hong'er lingering in this world for so long.

...Did he hide them?

If he had, he would have returned to a certain location periodically to check on them—but the god was truly nomadic in his exile.

So, what could it be...?

He turns, looking up at the prince thoughtfully—and in the moment his attention is divided—

CRACK!

Hua Cheng lurches forward, catching Xie Lian in his arms when he plummets back towards the ground, crushing the prince to his chest, and behind them...

Jun Wu drops down on one knee.

Not by choice, but...

His achilles tendon has been slashed.

Through the smallest gap in his armor, something that couldn't have been done with anything but the curved, lethal edge of a saber, but E'Ming didn't move the entire—

CRACK!

Something slides past him on the ground, and just like that—

His other ankle goes, too.

Mu Qing rolls to his feet, his saber flashing in one hand, wielding the god slayer with another.

"His recovery time for an injury like that is THIRTY SECONDS, GO!"

He couldn't have used the dagger for it—he needed an angled blade.

But now, he has Jun Wu on his knees.

Feng Xin doesn't hesitate, having fought by Mu Qing's side for so long, they move together like one fighter, rather than two.

With Mu Qing instinctively dropping out of the way of his arrows, and Feng Xin knowing exactly where and when to hit to narrow Mu Qing's attacks.

And that's the part about Mu Qing that Jun Wu had forgotten. What, in all honesty is quite easy to forget when his medicinal skills are as useful as they are—

Xie Lian and Pei Ming are the best swordsmen in the Heavens—but Mu Qing is very close behind.

And there is nothing more deadly than a swordsman with a surgeon's aim.

"CRIMSON RAIN!" Feng Xin looses three arrows in one pull, arms straining as he looses a hail of bolts in order to create openings for Mu Qing's blade. "WE DON'T HAVE MUCH TIME!"

Hua Cheng presses his forehead against Xie Lian's cheek for a fraction of a second, gritting his teeth.

He's conscious, but struggling to re-orient himself, limbs trembling.

And he would rather use this moment to take his god and escape, but —

He knows that he can't.

When he lets Xie Lian go, a cloud of wraith butterflies appears, cushioning him as he sinks back to the ground, Hua Cheng launching himself back into the fray.

Wielding E'Ming directly, giving the weapon far greater force.

Mu Qing slides directly under the attack as Jun Wu parries, the sparks from the clashing weapons landing on his cheeks as he brings his own saber up, slashing the blade through the gap in the bend of Jun Wu's elbow, severing the tendons there.

Each move is precise—like the emperor is a marionette, and Mu Qing is methodically cutting off his strings.

And with three limbs incapacitated, only one arm remains.

Jun Wu can't block all three of them with that. Mu Qing and Hua Cheng divide at the last fraction of a second, with the ghost king knocking the emperor's blade from his hand, snapping it in two—

And the martial god spinning the God Slayer into a reverse grip, bringing it down on the weak point in Jun Wu's armor with a—

THUD!

He feels the metal fracturing, can smell blood when he hits the flesh beneath—

And in that moment, the emperor grows desperate.

BOOM!

The blast of spiritual power is strong enough to even send Hua Cheng flying back, stabbing E'Ming into the earth to stay grounded

Feng Xin isn't as lucky, smashing back into a nearby tree, and Xie Lian —

He hears a sharp gasp, immediately recognizing it by Mu Qing, who wasn't blown away by the blast.

But only because Jun Wu was already gripping him by the hair, holding the god against him like a shield.

"I see I wasn't wrong to want you on side," Jun Wu hisses, fingers twisting around in Mu Qing's hair with a vicious grip, but when he reaches to take the god slayer out of Mu Qing's hand—

It's already gone, thrown far out of reach.

"...You really are too clever for your own good," he mutters, shaking his head. "But no matter."

His hand slides around Mu Qing's throat. "I don't need that trinket to kill you. It's just a little short cut."

Feng Xin staggers to his feet, several of his ribs having been broken—but he doesn't give a damn.

"DON'T FUCKING TOUCH HIM YOU BAST—!" He flinches when Jun Wu starts to squeeze Mu Qing's throat in warning, making the general squirm with discomfort.

Hua Cheng grimaces, watching the predicament with a tense eye.

He's never been fond of Mu Qing—for obvious reasons.

But he takes no pleasure in the fact that, once Jun Wu has someone in his grip like that—it's a lose-lose situation.

They attack—he kills Mu Qing.

They don't attack—and there's the same inevitable result.

There's nothing they can do now but w—

"Put him down, your highness."

Those words alone make the combatants freeze—even now, struggling to breathe, Mu Qing's eyes grow wide.

And Jun Wu—upon hearing that title—grows completely rigid, the hairs on the back of his neck standing up.

"...Excuse me?" He asks quietly his voice turning lethal, but—

When he looks back, just like Hua Cheng—he freezes in terror.

Xie Lian can barely stand.

Even now, his knees wobble—on the verge of giving out.

But his voice is firm.

"Let. Him. Go."

The God Slayer, tossed aside by Mu Qing when Jun Wu caught him–is now gripped in Xie Lian's hand.

Held directly over his own heart.

And when Jun Wu sees that—

His lips twist into an infuriated snarl, knuckles white from how tightly he's gripping Mu Qing's throat.

"You stubborn CHILD!" He snarls, but—

Even through his armor, Mu Qing can feel the emperor's heart pounding.

"You'd rather throw your life away—after everything you've been through—than give up this stupid farce and return to my side?! And for what?! For—”

"My friend."

Mu Qing freezes, eyes widening as he stares at the prince, blood rushing in his ears.

"He has always been my friend," Xie Lian repeats emphatically. "And I won't let you take anyone else from me, even if that means I have to take what YOU love most!"

Even if admitting that makes him feel slightly sick.

Acknowledging what Jun Wu feels for him as love.

Because Xie Lian is so, so lucky.

He's been loved by so many people in his life. Loved so long and so passionately by one believer, that it carried him through any suffering.

It showed him, even when he was in his lowest, most hateful state, that he loved the world.

That he loved everyone in it.

His people. His family. His friends. Even his enemies, in the end.

He's loved one man for so long, with such endurance, that it is embedded in his soul, forging him into something new.

Something imperfect, but—

Beautiful.

That is love.

He can't look at the damage Jun Wu is doing, and call this love. Or anything other than a warped desire to create someone who could understand him.

But to the emperor—that's exactly how he sees it.

"...You wouldn't dare," Jun Wu mutters, but...

He doesn't sound sure.

Xie Lian raises one eyebrow, a familiar bandage slithering up his arm, coiling around his neck protectively.

"Look at Ruoye, and tell me that again," he counters calmly.

Digging the dagger in just enough to break the surface of his skin, blood pricking up through his robe.

Hua Cheng can't move, can't breathe, can't speak, his eyes fixed on Xie Lian's face, shoulders rising and falling rapidly, and Jun Wu—

His face twists with frustration, looking down at Mu Qing in his arms with vehement resentment.

".. .Fine," he murmurs. "I'll let him go."

He allows Mu Qing's feet to touch the ground, making sure Xie Lian hears the sound—still using one hand to grip the martial god by the throat.

"How can I trust that you mean that?" Xie Lian mutters, still gripping the dagger tightly.

"...I swear, I won't kill him." Jun Wu promises evenly. "You have my word, Xianle."

And Jun Wu might not be an honest man, but he's proud.

If he gives his word—he'll keep to it.

Xie Lian doesn't let go of the dagger—but he pulls it back just a little.

Jun Wu's grip on Mu Qing's neck loosens—enough for the god to take a shuddering gasp, coughing—

But just as he's about to let him go—his hand shifts from Mu Qing's throat, gripping him by the hair—

And he yanks his head to the side.

Silent enough for Xie Lian to be unaware of it—and fast enough for Feng Xin and Hua Cheng to have no time to react.

Sinking his teeth into the martial god's neck—drawing a shocked scream from Mu Qing's lips.

And in an instant, it's over.

Mu Qing crumples to the ground as Jun Wu leaps away, both of his legs having healed from the attack.

But—

CRACK!

CRACK!

CRACK!

CRACK! CRACK! CRACK!

Feng Xin fires one bolt after another, eyes burning red, not thinking, not hesitating, roaring with anger.

"WHAT THE FUCK DID YOU DO?!"

He moves to chase after him, but—

A pained moan makes him stop, arms trembling, throat scorching with rage.

But he turns back, rushing over to gather Mu Qing in his arms.

"What the hell did he just do?!" Feng Xin mutters, looking him over.

Mu Qing is staring up at him blankly, breathing hard—

And he's grown so pale so quickly, Feng Xin feels his stomach plummet.

He grabs Mu Qing by the chin, pulling his head to the side, and when he looks at the teeth marks...

Mu Qing's veins are inflamed around the wound—

And there's a blackness spreading from it, creeping down his throat like dark roots, spreading to his jaw, all the way down to his collarbones.

Feng Xin looks back at Hua Cheng, utterly frantic.

"What did he do?!"

Xie Lian kneels down beside them both—

And he knows the answer already, reaching over to push Mu Qing's bangs out of his face with trembling fingers, finding his skin scorching and damp.

"...It's Death Qi," he whispers.

Watching as Mu Qing's aura is pierced with darkness.

"...What do we do?!" Feng Xin hisses, looking between Xie Lian and Hua Cheng—the latter of whom has stored the God Slayer in his belt, refusing to take his hand off of the prince's arm. "He broke his shackle, can't he heal it?! He heals himself all the time!"

"T... trying..."

Feng Xin looks back down at him, his lips trembling as he watches Mu Qing writhe weakly in his grip, pressing a hand to the side of his neck, hand glowing faintly as he tries to heal the wound, but—

It clearly isn't working.

"...Do you not have enough?" Feng Xin whispers, and without a care for the fact that they aren't alone—

He leans down, kissing Mu Qing fiercely, giving as much of his spiritual power as he can.

"Take it—take it all, okay?! I don't fucking need it!"

Mu Qing shudders, shivering violently—only for Feng Xin to wrap his cloak around him, holding the martial god against his side, and Xie Lian turns to Hua Cheng, desperate.

"...Is this like what happened to Shuo at the terrace of Cascading Wine?" he whispers.

Remembering how, back then—Shuo was able to recover by drinking Hua Cheng's blood, cleansing himself with the Ghost King's power, but—

Hua Cheng shakes his head.

"...Shuo isn't the same as Jun Wu or Bai Wuxiang," he murmurs. "But he's still a ghost, gege."

Ghosts will still have a violent reaction to particularly toxic Death Qi, but—

Nothing like what will happen to a mortal, or, even worse—

A cultivator.

"...The more pent up resentment a living soul has, the worse the reaction is."

"Fuck..." Feng Xin groans.

In spite of everything—Mu Qing almost laughs.

"F...Fuck you too..."

"I didn't mean..." He shakes his head, pressing his forehead against Mu Qing's. "What else can we do? Why did he even do that?!"

"Because he's the only healer around right now," Hua Cheng mutters. "And it buys him time."

It prevents Mu Qing from using the God Slayer to shatter Xie Lian's shackles—and he was the only one with the requisite experience to do it.

And—he did hit Jun Wu with the God Slayer earlier—leaving the emperor injured.

He's likely fled to the base of the mountain to deal with the issue before trying to take them on again—and when he does, the only one in proper physical or mental condition to fight will be Hua Cheng.

Hua Cheng, who knows Xie Lian can be strung up by the shackles again at any moment.

"...I've only seen this happen to mortals," Hua Cheng mutters. "I can't say with certainty how it would affect a god."

"Could you take a fucking guess?!" Feng Xin snaps, rubbing Mu Qing's arms to try to get some warmth back into them as his partner starts to shiver violently.

"The Qi would need to be purified before his spirit is thrown too far out of balance, and his spiritual energy grows out of control," the ghost king explains slowly. "And the best person to perform a ritual like that—"

Would be a medicinal god, like Mu Qing himself.

Jun Wu's move was cruel—but strategically sound.

"...What about the lake?" Feng Xin asks hoarsely, looking up. "He said he put as much of his spiritual power in there as he could—would that help?"

Hua Cheng hesitates, thinking it over, before reluctantly admitting;

"It couldn't make things worse, but I'm not..."

Feng Xin rises to his feet with Mu Qing in his arms, Xie Lian stumbling close behind as he makes his way down an old, familiar path.

They walked here together once—all four of them, many years ago.

Back when Hong'er refused to be carried by anyone but Xie Lian, arms trembling as he pressed his face into the Prince's neck.

He smelled like safety and comfort—maple leaves gently falling all around them.

And in that moment, being in Xie Lian's arms was so peaceful, that he forgot the pain of his beaten, broken body.

Now, someone else is being carried, and rather than Feng Xin and Mu Qing, it's Hua Cheng and Xie Lian walking behind.

Hurrying through an ancient, overgrown path.

It's easy to remember when the stones were freshly swept and polished smooth. When Xie Lian was young and slender, arms held aloft, giggling as he refused to let his feet touch anything but scattered tiles leading to the lake, calling back for Feng Xin to hurry up and catch him.

Butterflies rushing around them, ducking in and out of the canopies above. Xie Lian had always been terrified of insects, but never them—beaming with delight when they landed in his hair.

And when he got around the bend, ducking beneath the boughs of two maple saplings—the clearing would open up, leading to a large, still lake.

Those maples tower now, reaching almost impossibly high.

But the lake is the same.

Clear and calm, in spite of the chaos and bloodshed of the world surrounding it—staring back up at the world above like a mirror. Reflecting its pain, but remaining as still as ever.

Feng Xin doesn't even slow down.

He rushes to the water's edge, walking until it reaches his knees before kneeling down, carefully lowering Mu Qing onto the surface—submerged up to his shoulders, with Feng Xin still cradling him in his lap.

Mu Qing's eyelids twitch for a moment, then flutter open—long eyelashes moving delicately against his cheek—

Impossibly dark eyes staring back up at them. But not a flat sort of darkness—rather the kind that has an impossible depth to it.

An abyss that could drown you, but you would never really mind.

Because it always feels like home, somehow.

"The..." Mu Qing's gaze drifts to the side, eyes growing in and out of focus as he takes in the scene around them. "The cherry tree...is still...here..."

Xie Lian kneels down beside them both, swallowing down the building emotions in his throat.

Remembering when they were young—and he found Mu Qing here, picking cherries up from the ground, a tipped over basket laying on the ground nearby.

Looking back on it, it feels so painfully obvious that the other cultivators on Mount Taicang were bullying the boy, but...instead of asking what was wrong...

Xie Lian simply told Mu Qing that he could take as many cherries as he wanted.

It seemed kind, at the time. But...he's almost ashamed of that memory now. Of how oblivious he was to what Mu Qing was going through.

How it was so much worse than the other children being cruel, or a toppled basket of fruit.

But it took Xie Lian centuries to ask the question that actually mattered, and now, so soon after—

It might already be too late.

"Is it doing anything?" Feng Xin presses his palm against Mu Qing's cheek, and despite the coldness of the water...it's still scorching to the touch. "Come on...look at me... C'mon..."

He rocks backward slightly, carefully pushing wet strands of hair away from Mu Qing's face.

He's spent their entire lives complaining about the way the martial god always insists on having so much of his hair loose. The way it always gets in Feng Xin's face. How Mu Qing always reacts like a whining princess when Feng Xin so much as touches it, but—

Now, he handles it as carefully as he would if it were made from spun gold. Like something infinitely precious.

"...Don't..." Mu Qing shudders, light flickering in his palms as he tries to harness more spiritual power, even as his body struggles. "Don't...be mad..."

"I'm not—!" Feng Xin lowers his head, pressing his face into Mu Qing's shoulder. "I'm not mad , okay? Stop putting words in my mouth. You...you always..."

His arms tighten around him, like Mu Qing could slip beneath the water and never resurface again.

"You..." He sniffs, shaking his head. "You're gonna be fine. You're always fine, you—”

Feng Xin's voice breaks, and Xie Lian's heart goes with it.

"Goddamn it, Mu Qing!"

He waits for some snarky comment, for Mu Qing to complain that Feng Xin just said he wasn't mad, but...

Mu Qing's palms grow dim, and Xie Lian watches as his aura grows dimmer, feeling so helpless, when he says—

"D...Dianxia?"

His tone is so unfamiliar at first—small and uncertain—but after a moment, Xie Lian realizes it isn’t that.

It’s nostalgic.

“...I’m here,” he murmurs, reaching down to grip one of Mu Qing’s hands, squeezing it gently. “I’m right here, Mu Qing.”

"I…I'm sorry…"

And Xie Lian's heart aches.

"Oh, Mu Qing…there isn't anything to—"

"I…I think I'm sick…" he rasps, staring overhead blankly. "I…if I sleep a little more, I can…before your lessons are…"

His words are slurred and unsteady, and—

Xie Lian can hardly bear to listen.

"…That's okay," he whispers, his voice cracking. "You take the morning off and sleep. It'll be alright."

"Your…" Mu Qing grimaces. "Your dad…"

"Is my problem," Xie Lian assures him, squeezing his hand gently. "It's…I-it's okay , Mu Qing."

Of course, he can handle it gracefully. He can hold Mu Qing's hand, and try to make him feel safe and comfortable as everything around him slowly fades, but—

Feng Xin can't.

"…The fuck?!" He shakes his head, heart pounding in his chest.

"Feng Xin—"

"NO!"

Feng Xin can barely even see through the tears in his eyes, crushing Mu Qing against him.

"Don't you DARE fucking sleep—don't—you can't—"

"This isn't about us—"

"You CAN'T leave me!" Feng Xin snaps, somehow managing to sound infuriated, even as tears drip from his chin.

"…But you…" Mu Qing's brow pinches, "You're the one always leaving me…"

"I never mean to!" Feng Xin sobs, shaking his head. "I'm just a fucking idiot , okay?!"

"You—"

"If you leave—every morning, I'll wake up, and I'll be pissed at you. Is that what you want?!"

One of his hands cups the back of Mu Qing's head, sobs ripping from him uncontrollably.

"I already think about you when I wake up, but then it'll be about how much I fucking hate you!"

"You…" Mu Qing's eye lashes flutter sharply. "You think about…?"

"If I wanted to figure out what life was like without you—I've had PLENTY of time to do it, okay?!" Feng Xin snaps. "Guess what, I DON'T! And after all of that—you're just gonna LEAVE ME?!"

Beating the odds of pain and exhaustion—Mu Qing's eye twitches.

"It's…not like I can help it…"

"That's not fucking FAIR!" Feng Xin could almost throttle him, if he wasn't holding onto him for dear life. "You wanted me to care?! Congratulations, I DO! You want me to never stop thinking about you?! DONE!"

"B- Bullshit—"

"JIAN LAN WAS TELLING THE TRUTH, YOU IDIOT!"

Even Xie Lian leans back in shock, his jaw hanging open that Feng Xin would say that now.

"Because no matter who I'm with, or what I'm doing, it's always you! It's always been YOU! And EVERYONE else can see it!"

"I…wh…you said you weren't…how is that my fault?!"

"Because you're always LOOKING AT ME like that! And saying shit I think about for hours later! Always acting like such a piece of shit, but always doing the right thing in the end anyway, and—"

"Are you mad at me, or—?!"

"And you MADE ME CONGEE , YOU BASTARD!"

Xie Lian pauses, sensing Hua Cheng sending him a confused stare, and shrugging as if to say—

'I honestly have no idea.'

But Mu Qing—

His eyes snap into focus for a moment, bright and aware—

And then he's fuming.

"…And you're telling me all of this NOW?!"

"When else was I supposed to say it?! You run away from me every single time I try to talk to you—!"

"You should have MADE ME!"

"Have you ever seen what it's like to try to 'make' you do ANYTHING?!"

Mu Qing glares up at him venomously. "You fucking MORON, you—!"

Then he cuts himself off, wincing from the pain—and Feng Xin noticed something else—

Something that wasn't there before.

A streak of silver running through Mu Qing's hair—starting at the temple.

"…What's happening?!" Xie Lian whispers, trying to check Mu Qing's forehead again, but—

It's gotten too hot to touch at all.

"…Well," Hua Cheng starts, his voice dry, "before, the Death Qi was completely overrunning his system and devouring him from the inside out."

"And now…?" Xie Lian murmurs, hopeful.

"It seems your friend was able to upset him enough to trigger his own spiritual power into fighting back, but…"

Hua Cheng pauses, watching another streak of silver spread through.

“…That isn’t necessarily a good thing.”

Feng Xin frowns, eyes flickering between Mu Qing, squirming more violent in his hold, and Hua Cheng—frantically trying to understand.

"...How can it be worse than the alternative?!"

Hua Cheng pulls Xie Lian back by the shoulder. "Sometimes a quick death is easier."

Normally, if he tries to move the prince, and Xie Lian shows a hint of resistance, he won't force him.

But this time, his grip is like iron—Insistently pulling Xie Lian behind him.

"Easier than what?!" Feng Xin snaps, feeling Mu Qing's limbs start to tremble violently.

"His spiritual energy is fighting it," Hua Cheng explains slowly. "But he has no way of controlling it."

Which means both sides will rage out of control.

And rampaging spiritual energy usually means—

Xie Lian's eyes grow wide, his stomach plummeting.

"...Feng Xin!" He tries to get to them, but Hua Cheng holds an arm out, keeping the god behind him. "LET HIM GO!"

"What?!"

"HE'S ABOUT TO—!"

Mu Qing's eyelids snap open, and when they do—

The whites of his eyes have turned black.

His lips part, and a silent scream wrenches out of him, back arching painfully, and—

Resentment is pouring off of him in thick waves, making Feng Xin wince, but—

It isn't until he feels a flash of pain across his cheek, three deep scratches sinking in, that he realizes.

Mu Qing doesn't recognize him anymore.

"RUOYE!" Xie Lian shouts, sending the bandage flying towards his friends, shoving Feng Xin out of the way as it encircles Mu Qing, forming a magical barrier.

"What's—?!"

Xie Lian's answer nearly makes the entire world go still.

"He's gone into Qi Deviation, Feng Xin! He doesn't know who we are!"

And if they get too close—

Mu Qing will attempt to kill them both.

He already is, snarling, straining to get past the barrier created by Ruoye, white light bursting forth each time he strikes the bandage.

The sound that rips from Feng Xin's chest—

It's a kind of sorrow that Xie Lian is painfully familiar with.

Because usually, it takes weeks, years of flawed cultivation to push someone to this point.

Jun Wu did it in minutes with one blow, poisoning his soul.

And once this point is reached, it's almost impossible to turn back.

Xie Lian hangs his head, teeth aching from how tightly his jaw is clenched. Wishing there was something he could do, that there was any god with them who specialized in purification, or even a cultiv—

"...Gusu..." He mutters under his breath, his stomach lurching—then he looks up, looking in Feng Xin's direction blindly. "...You HAVE TO GET TO GUSU!"

"What?!"

"There's a cultivator there, his name's Lan An—"

"One of the teenagers who ascended with you last time?!"

"Yes!" Xie Lian nods quickly. "He's been training Shi Qingxuan—and he used a spiritual cleansing ceremony on me while I was in Gusu. I don't know if it'll work, but—"

But at this point, it's Mu Qing's only chance.

"How am I supposed to—?!" Hua Cheng pulls something from his pocket, tossing it towards Feng Xin with a—

Clack!

Clack!

Feng Xin looks down, staring at the dice in his palm with a dark expression. "Oh, for the love of—not these again—!"

"They'll take you there and back," Hua Cheng mutters.

Mu Qing is too unstable to be moved—he might just end up killing Feng Xin in the process—

But Ruoye can hold him long enough for Feng Xin to find Lan An and come back. Just, hopefully...

It won't be too late for Mu Qing when he does.

Feng Xin eyes the dice distrustfully, remembering all too well how that ended last time, but...

He doesn't have time to waste.

His wrist flicks as he tosses them into the air, the dice snapping together crisply—and with one step forward, he's gone.

Xie Lian sags, his head in his hands--flinching as he listens to Mu Qing's snarls, mixed with sounds of pain—

But Hua Cheng's hand on his shoulder is a heavy reminder.

"Feng Xin will do everything he can for him—but Jun Wu never intended on retreating for long."

Xie Lian knows that he's right—and the thought of that makes him slump even further, his heart in his throat.

Because...they're the only two left standing.

"If Mu Qing can't remove my shackles, I don't know—”

Hua Cheng's lips press against his forehead, and he grows still.

"Don't be afraid," the ghost king murmurs, repeating the same words he told Xie Lian before, when they were running towards the Kiln together. "You're stronger than him, your highness."

"..." Xie Lian's head sinks forward, pressing against Hua Cheng's chest.

"...San Lang..." He bites his lip, heart aching as he listens to Mu Qing.

As he thinks about everyone and everything that they've lost.

Of how many times he's failed.

"I don't think that's true," he whispers, voice wavering—

And Hua Cheng helps him to his feet.

"Walk with me, gege."

Xie Lian shivers, heart aching at the idea of leaving Mu Qing like this, even if he doesn't have a choice, but...

He smells the forest around him. Wild, but clean.

There's a familiar hand holding his own—gentle, with firm callouses from gripping a saber.

With each step he takes, there's the gentle ring of silver bells--and with the faint rush of wings, a gleaming butterfly flutters ahead of them, drifting on the bells.

Xie Lian found him again, on a mountain. Even if Hua Cheng couldn't answer him back then.

But even so—it was never hard, taking his hand.

And it's so easy right now, being led so carefully, Hua Cheng guiding him by the elbow.

Just as he used to.

But it's not quite the same.

The man guiding him isn't a stranger—and Xie Lian isn't a stolen bride.

Though, as Hua Cheng reminded him—he never pretended to be the ghost groom. He just—

He was there for Xie Lian.

Just as he tried to imply that night in Puqi Shrine, when the prince simply smiled and laughed it off, agreeing that he seemed to have time on his hands.

It almost hurts now, thinking about how badly Hua Cheng must have wanted to tell him the truth that night.

But...

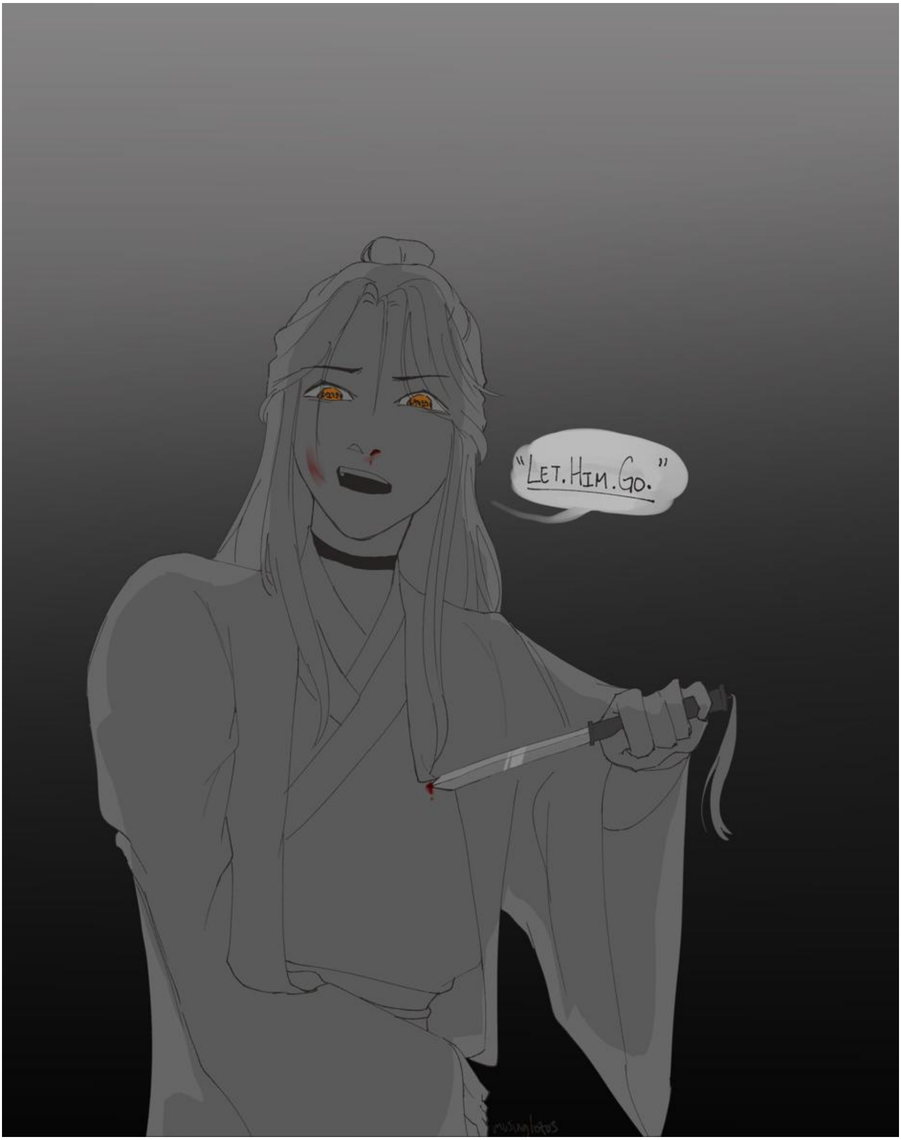
Xie Lian's hand tightens in his.

Now that he has him back—he won't ever let him go. Not ever again.

...Even if fate doesn't plan on giving him a choice .

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or reuse.



"LET. HIM. GO."
musinglotos

CREDIT: CASS

[image]

[image]

CREDIT: SYL

A funny little video about the creative process.

Chapter End Notes

Mu Qing wake up, I don't like this, mU QING WAKE UP

The Young Lord Who Poured Wine

Chapter Summary

> Sometimes, Shi Qingxuan can’t help but wonder if she’s been prey for so long, that she’s simply fallen in love with the throat of being devoured.
>
> But it’s also given her a certain level of appreciation for the act of the hunt.
>
> “…And what do you know of the other elemental masters?” She murmurs, watching him with coy eyes and a sequin smile.
>
> Wen Sicong raises an eyebrow—but opts to indulge her.
>
> "...The stories say that you, the Wind Master, are beautiful and beloved by Gods and Mortals alike," he recalls, dragging his fingertip around the rim of his wine glass. "It's easy to see why, now."

"...A toast!" A voice barks across the banquet hall, echoing across the ceilings as he raises his glass. "To our esteemed hostess!"

Servants linger towards the edges of the room, watching their "guests" with thinly veiled loathing.

More like their captors.

But the lady of the gathering raises her glass in return, her smile glittering with promise.

“To my esteemed guests!” She calls in return, tilting her head back as she empties her glass, waving her hand to queue the servants to start the music once more.

“Thank you for bringing some entertainment to this lonely housewife,” she sighs, walking behind their chairs, spinning in a lazy, aimless dance.

“…Housewife,” Wen Sicong snorts, watching her with a heated gaze. “I can hardly imagine that.”

Shi Qingxuan's smile is light and infectious, one dimple flashing at him as her eyes sparkle in the candlelight.

"Oh, but it's true—He Xuan keeps me under lock and key."

"Then he is a fool."

"Or wise," she counters, stopping at the opposite end of the table. "If you had a prized jewel in your possession, would you leave it out for any common thief to take?" Her head tilts, curls slipping over her shoulder as one of the servants steps forward, refilling her glass.

Wen Sicong sits further back in his chair, knees spread lazily.

"...I suppose," he agrees, not bothering to hide his interest as he watches the goddess move about the room. "But does a woman like yourself have any need for that? You're one of the great elemental masters, after all."

Shi Qingxuan's smile doesn't fade—but it shifts .

She barely remembers her parents. Their faces are faint in her mind, and when she tries to picture them—

Her gege is all that ever seems to come to the surface.

But there was one story he used to tell her over and over, shortly after they died—because it was her favorite.

One that Shi Qingxuan's father used to tell her—even if she can't remember his voice when she tries.

About a princess, beloved by all. Vivacious and kind. With a light that shined so bright, a shadow always crept close behind, wanting to swallow her whole.

The King and Queen were clever, and they hid her carefully, disguising her as a shepherd's daughter. And she was content to lay among the lambs, singing lullabies and watching the clouds go by.

Still, no matter where she went, she couldn't help but shine.

But the shadows couldn't touch her—if she just never looked back.

Thinking back on that time, Shi Qingxuan can't understand why she adored that story so much. Maybe it was just nostalgia, or the way her brother would play with her hair as he told it, tickling her at intervals.

When she recounted the tale to Ming Yi later, half asleep in his arms, he said something that surprised her.

That he actually found the story to be rather sad.

And Shi Qingxuan couldn't understand it at first, because the princess lived happily ever after.

'She did,' he replied back, then, his chin resting on top of her head. 'But the monster died alone.'

'...But isn't that what monsters do?'

'In fairytales, maybe.' He agreed. 'But I've never thought of those as happy stories. Far too reliant on perspective.'

She didn't understand it back then—because Shi Qingxuan had always been the princess.

Shining as brightly as she could, and never looking back over her shoulder.

But once she did...

Her shadow wasn't a monster at all—but rather a man.

And oh, how she adored him.

Adores him still, even when part of her knows it would be easier if she didn’t.

Because he was selfish, and he hurt her.

But that doesn’t mean she hasn’t thought about all of those years she refused to look back.

Leaving him alone in the dark. Unloved and unseen.

But beyond that love—somewhere past the goodness and familiarity that he’s allows her to glimpse through the gaps in his disguise—

Sometimes, Shi Qingxuan can’t help but wonder if she’s been prey for so long, that she’s simply fallen in love with the throat of being devoured.

But it’s also given her a certain level of appreciation for the act of the hunt.

“…And what do you know of the other elemental masters?” She murmurs, watching him with coy eyes and a sequin smile.

Wen Sicong raises an eyebrow—but opts to indulge her.

"...The stories say that you, the Wind Master, are beautiful and beloved by Gods and Mortals alike," he recalls, dragging his fingertip around the rim of his wine glass. "It's easy to see why, now."

Shi Qingxuan smiles at him, silently urging him to continue.

"The Rain Master is said to be gentle and generous—at least among the mortals. Whispers among the other realms say that she's rather reclusive..." Wen Sicong sighs, rocking backwards. "Of course, now everyone with a line to the Heavens knows Ming Yi was Blackwater all along..."

He tilts his head to the side, watching her curiously. "I'm shocked that you two were able to move past such a betrayal."

Shi Qingxuan shrugs, taking another sip from her glass. "I suppose a lack of context would make it confusing to prying eyes."

Wen Sicong waits with curiosity, but it doesn't seem that she's particularly eager to enlighten him.

One of his officer's looks up from the meal, tearing at a lamb shank with his fingers. "...Here's what I've been wonderin'—are you a man, or a woman? The stories are mixed."

Wen Sicong glares at him irritably. "Don't be rude, we're her guests—”

"We came to take the city, how are we guests—?"

"Both." Shi Qingxuan's answer is simple and immediate enough to surprise them both. "I'm happiest when I can change as I like."

It's been hard, trapped in their female form for so long. Xiong Li has been far more kind and understanding about the situation than anyone else ever has. Giving them men's clothes, treating them as a man on days when they need it.

But sometimes, they ache for their old body.

"...And Blackwater doesn't mind?"

Shi Qingxuan's eyes snap to the officer's—beautiful, but sharp.

"There is no form I could take that my He-Xiong wouldn't adore," she replies curtly, finishing off the remainder of her glass, her attention returning to Wen Sicong.

"And what of the other masters? What do you know of them?"

He's as relieved to get away from the subject as she is, gesturing for the servant to return to fill their glasses again.

"The thunder master was killed centuries ago, and there has been no fire master in this dynasty."

Shi Qingxuan nods with each statement, marking them off as correct, until...

"...And after your brother was killed, Blackwater replaced him as the new Water Master, isn't that correct?" Wen Sicong recalls. "Even if he turned the assignment down rather bluntly."

That is certainly one way of putting it.

"Though I'm assuming it couldn't have been too much of a blow for you," Wen Sicong shrugs, lifting his newly filled glass. "Given how you married his killer."

"He Xuan did not kill my brother."

Slowly, the room grows still and silent.

Shi Qingxuan looks down at her cup for a moment, staring at her reflection for a moment.

"And I don't need to ask you what you thought of my brother," she mutters, shaking her head.

Not when the emperor was so careful to ensure people saw what he wanted them to see.

The Water Tyrant.

Or, even worse, the tales that worshiped him as imperial consort, Goddess of the Moon, waning as Jun Wu's power grew.

"But everything you think you know about him is a lie."

Lies Shi Wudu told to protect himself. Lies Jun Wu told to destroy him.

"...He was the cleverest person in the room," she recalls softly. "The best to his friends, and the worst enemy that you could ever have."

The one she could always go to for advice. Could always confess her mistakes to, knowing—

Gege would make everything alright again.

"...Everyone has always loved me," Shi Qingxuan agrees softly, her brow furrowed. "Everyone has always called me beautiful. But I could never have been so happy or endearing to them, if I had not been raised to always know that I was loved."

Shi Qingxuan is only the person she is because of him. All the traits that make her so agreeable and pleasant to everyone else—

She couldn't be that person without him.

And all of the things he sacrificed for her. All the pain he endured for her sake.

In the end, the story her father used to tell her wasn't true.

Shi Qingxuan had two twin shadows, lingering just behind her at all times—she just never turned her head to look at the pain that they were experiencing.

And just like all monsters, her brother died alone.

In so many ways, he and He Xuan were so similar, she just—

She never could see it. Not until it was too late.

"...But what often gets lost when people tell stories of us is that he is my brother," Shi Qingxuan finally continues, her voice steadier than before. "And people fail to understand that we actually do carry family resemblances," she explains, walking behind the chairs of her guests once more. "I just package mine in a more palatable way."

He has their father's eyes, for example. She has their mother's laugh.

Shi Qingxuan was gentle, kind, and carefree because her brother created a world that allowed her to be.

But her brother isn't here anymore.

"When I was young, Xuli was ruled by the wealthy, and my brother was the wealthiest of them all." She recalls quietly.

And Shi Qingxuan was still being hidden from the Reverend of Empty Words, posing as the young lord's sister, Mingxia.

"There was a man who tried to have me abducted to be used as leverage against him in some political dispute..."

They never even reached Shi Qingxuan's chambers.

"When my brother caught him, he placed his head on a pike before the city gates." Her footsteps echo faintly against the cavernous ceilings overhead. "There was no trial. No possibility of mercy. He was seventeen at the time."

"...And you mean to say that shows a resemblance between the two of you?" Wen Sicong muses, both eyebrows raised. "My lady, I fail to see your point."

Shi Qingxuan's smile only seems to grow wider—and her dimples far sharper.

She and her brother actually share the same smile, when they know that they're about to win. Bright eyes, a victorious flash of canines.

"My brother would do absolutely anything to protect the people he loves," she clarifies. "Even at the expense of his own conscience."

Shi Qingxuan stops on the opposite end of the table once more, staring Wen Sicong down, delicately grasping her cup between her hands.

"What do you imagine I would do if someone came to my home, and placed my child in danger?" She asks, one hand resting against her stomach.

Wen Sicong pauses, eyes following her hand. The dress was cut loose before, as those of that style often are—

But when Shi Qingxuan presses her hand there, he can see the slight curvature of her stomach.

Thud!

One of his men slumps forward, his head landing in his plate.

Several others follow suit.

Thud!

Thud!

Thud!

And those who don't, well—they fall to the side, clutching their throats, wheezing and coughing, their faces turning blue.

When Shi Qingxuan sets down her glass, only for the rattling to knock it over—

Revealing water.

Of course, they weren't poisoned from the beginning—Shi Qingxuan waited, speaking silently with Xiong Li through their communication array, waiting until most of the citizens of Gusu had been evacuated through the tunnels beneath the city.

Then, she gave the signal.

Asking Wen Sicong what he knew of the other Elemental Masters.

That was when the wine poured was laced with poison.

That was when their fates were sealed.

Wen Sicong watches his officers fall one by one, unable to move from the shock, rooted in his chair.

But unlike the others, he shows no sign of collapse.

He hadn't drunk enough of the wine.

Shi Qingxuan closes the distance between them, manicured nails resting on the table--just next to his unfinished glass.

A potential offer of mercy. But—

She knocks it over.

The dark liquid runs over the tablecloth like blood—and Wen Sicong's lips pull back into a snarl, looking up at her with bubbling fury.

"You little bitch—!"

CLANG!

Something cold and heavy slams against his temple, making the invader see stars.

A black bangle, gold veins running through the sides. What he mistook for a simple piece of jewelry before, but—

Now, Shi Qingxuan yanks a golden chain from around her neck, ancient, of magical make—

And she wraps it around his own.

Slipping behind Wen Sicong's chair, sliding down the back of it as she pulls, using the chain as a makeshift garrote, the bangle used as a counterweight—

Crushing in on his larynx until it's crushed.

From then on, he can only writhe, uselessly gasping for air.

Shi Qingxuan doesn't relent.

Not even when the chain digs in, slicing into her palms until they bleed, blood dripping down her wrists.

Not until Wen Sicong grows still, burst blood vessels turning his eyes red as they stare up at the ceiling, unseeing.

Her grip loosens, arms trembling from exhaustion as she slips the locket back around her neck, and the bangle back onto her wrist.

Not caring about the blood that stains them, or if it gets on her in the process.

"...Well," she rasps, holding her stomach. "We're murders now."

Despite being as old as she is, Shi Qingxuan has never killed anything before. Not even an animal.

Now she's killed ten men.

One of them with her own hands.

She sends a quiet nod towards the last remaining servants, who turn to flee down the hidden palace passageways.

'Is it finished? ' Xiong Li asks her in the array, his tone cautiously optimistic.

Shi Qingxuan looks up at the table of slaughtered guests, wiping the blood from her cheek with the back of her hand.

'Yes,' she agrees, her tone resolved. As frigid as her brother's, years ago. 'And the city?'

'The citizens have been cleared out, and the gates have been sealed. We'll have to wait until this is all over to come in and clear the rest of the demons out—but they won't be able to leave Gusu and attack anyone else.'

Shi Qingxuan sighs with relief, but...that's not the only thing Xiong Li has to say.

'And...Lan An says that the Martial God of the South is here.'

That's the last one that Shi Qingxuan would have expected, and it gives her pause.

'What? Which one?'

'Feng Xin.'

Shi Qingxuan frowns, reaching for the tablecloth to wipe the rest of the blood from her hands, wincing as the cloth drags over the cuts on her palms.

'What's he doing here? Did someone send him to help?'

'Not exactly.'

...Of course not. Why would their luck turn around now?

'Xie Laoshi sent him here—apparently their friend is hurt, and Lan An is the only one who can help...' Xiong Li trails off, audibly worried. 'Of course he agreed to run off with them right away, no matter how dangerous it might be.'

'That leaves you finishing the evacuation alone,' Shi Qingxuan mutters, pulling her dress tighter around herself as she leaves the banquet hall, making her way towards the last escape tunnel.

The rest were sealed, preventing the citizens from being followed—leaving one for her.

'...It's not so bad,' Xiong Li assures her . 'It's a little cramped and dark down here--but these tunnels open up near the Cloud Recesses. Once we're there, there's nothing to do but sit back and enjoy the fresh air. You'll love

it!'

Shi Qingxuan smiles.

'...It sounds nice.'

She rounds the corner, pulling an explosive talisman from her sleeve, distributed to seal the tunnel behind her as she escapes, but...

Something's rattling beneath her shoes.

The former goddess pauses, the echoes of her footsteps fading in the air.

Thud...

'Shi Qingxuan?'

"..." She looks back over her shoulder, the talisman crinkling slightly as her hand balls up into a fist.

'Shi Qingxuan?!'

'Sorry,' she mutters, taking a step back. 'I got distracted—I'm right behind you.'

But even as she tries to keep moving—it finally rounds the corner.

On one hand, it almost makes sense.

Jun Wu would have known that, outside of Yunmeng, Gusu had the most skilled cultivation sect in the world. And, with two ascended cultivators here—they wouldn't be an easy target.

Wen Sicong seemed to think that the emperor was going to make him a god, but...

He made the same promise to his father, many years ago—only to turn him into the opposite.

Figuring that out doesn't make it any easier to see the clawed paw round the corner.

Thud...

"What..." Shi Qingxuan starts, stumbling backwards, landing on her backside as she stares ahead with wide eyes, realizing—

When she killed Wen Sicong, the power Jun Wu granted him went into effect.

Not as a god, but—

The creature rounds the corner with a roar.

As a demon .

One that nearly takes up the entire height of the hall—one that almost looks like an enormous bat, with a head and chest covered in dark fur, leathery wings, and eyes that burn like red hot coals.

And when it looks at Shi Qingxuan, it's a killer...

It reveals its fangs in a macabre imitation of a smile.

"Lady Wind Master..." It doesn't have vocal cords that would allow it to speak like a man—and yet, its voice rumbles all around her, whispering through the shadows.

"...I haven't finished my meal."

Shi Qingxuan gulps.

"I...haha..." She glances back over her shoulder, taking in the sight of the tunnel entrance.

Knowing that even if she could make it, she wouldn't have time to seal it—leading it straight to the citizens of Gusu trying to escape.

"Haha...hahaha..."

She pushes backwards with her heels, looking back at the exit—then Wen Sicong approaching.

"W...was it something about the food?" She mumbles hoarsely, bursting into nervous peals of laughter. "I...ha...hahaha...I'm sorry...haha...it's been a while since we...hahahahaha..."

Her foot slips, and she barely manages to catch herself on her elbow. "I-I'm really...ahaha...so sorry for the...hahaha...ha... HAAAA!"

She cuts off with a scream when a spined tail lands in the floor next to her, sending cracks through the marble.

"I'M SORRY HAHAHAHAHAHA!"

Shi Qingxuan rolls to her feet, sending one last look at the entrance to the tunnels, then...

The talisman flies out of her hand, attaching to the door.

BOOM!

The explosion rattles the halls—and she's back to exactly where she started.

Running for her life.

Sliding as she rounds the corners, arms flapping around her in her panic, with Wen Sicong's monstrous form following her in an almost hilariously similar path. Slamming into the wall when he rounds the corner, wings scrambling.

"HAHAHAHAHAHA I HATE THIS SO FUCKING MUCH!"

One of the claws almost gets her in the back, and Shi Qingxuan wails with hysterical laughter, hurrying up a flight of steps.

(This is one of the cases where she and her brother are not quite so similar: fighting and bravery is easy for him. For her...not so much.)

"THERE'S NO NEED TO BE SUCH A BAD SPORT ABOUT THIS HAHAHAHAHA YOU TRIED TO KILLMEFIRST HAHAHA IT'S JUST FAIR YOU DON'T HAVE TO KILLMEBACKOKAYWECANJUSTSHAKEHANDSANDWALKAWAYEVENTHOU HAHAHA!!!"

She's about halfway there when Wen Sicong starts to follow, using his talons and claws to rip the path open wider, allowing him to climb through—

And when he does, it makes the staircase begin to shudder, collapsing just as Shi Qingxuan reaches the top.

"AHHHHH HAHAHAHA!"

She catches herself with her forearms on the landing, legs swinging wildly as she manages to pull herself over, fleeing down the corridor as Wen Sicong scrambles up through the wreckage.

Well, that answered one painful question.

Even if Shi Qingxuan manages to squeeze into a small space, he can just rip the palace apart trying to get to her.

Which, in retrospect, means she did the right thing, not going into the escape tunnel.

Even if that feels like a death sentence at the moment.

But it also means that there's nowhere she can go.

He'll catch her inside the palace. He'll tear through the underground before she gets deep enough to run away.

Even if she manages to get outside, then he can fly, and—

There's the rats.

And even though she's doing a decent job outrunning him now, she's human.

Her endurance will run out far before his does.

Shi Qingxuan knows that help isn't coming. She can't even open her communication array to call for He Xuan, she doesn't have enough power left.

She used the last of it calling Xiong Li, and he would have heard that explosion and assumed that Shi Qingxuan made her escape.

And even if she could—he's the only one left who can finish the evacuation. Saving Shi Qingxuan would cost thousands of lives.

So, she's on her own

With no powers, an unborn child, and no way of escaping Wen Sicong. Or killing him.

The thought almost exhausts her prematurely as she runs out onto the palace roof, listening as the demon shatters columns and windows behind her, struggling to get to her.

What can she do? If no one is coming--shouldn't she be focused on dying in the least painful way possible? Like falling from a great height? Or using some of the left-over poison? But she—

Her hand drops down to her stomach, and she grimaces again.

Then, she turns her head.

"...Maybe..." she mutters, staring into the distance, doing some math with her fingers in the air.

Estimating height, weight, calculated force per inch.

...Maybe...she could...

There's a horrible crashing sound as the entrance bursts open behind her.

No more debating.

Shi Qinxuan makes a running start, leaping onto the next roof over, scrambling down to the lower levels as Wen Sicong circles overhead, wings flapping aggressively.

Rousing the rats below from their slumber—beady red eyes glittering to life.

Shi Qingxuan grits her teeth.

"That's right," she snarls, running though the second level of an abandoned house. Scrambling out onto a balcony, leaping from one to the other, grateful that the buildings are placed so close together.

If she was on the rooftops, she'd be a sitting duck for Wen Sicong.

Now he's forced to fly over the alleyways, waiting to see where she'll pop back out.

But here—the rats make a beeline for her, crawling up the sides of buildings, following the same path.

"KEEP ON CHASING ME, YOU LITTLE FREAKS! HAHAHAHA! I—THAT'S FINE! I DON'T CARE HAHA!"

(She clearly does, but her pursuers don't have the wherewithal to understand bravado.)

The further she goes, the paler she becomes, speaking more quietly now.

Not to Wen Sicong, or the rats.

Not even to herself.

"I don't know if I'm going to make it," Shi Qingxuan mutters. "I don't know if you can even hear me."

Some of the women she's spoken to think your child can hear your voice, later in pregnancy. That they like the sound of it.

But she isn't that far along, and—

Her son couldn't understand her anyway.

But still—she tries.

"But even if I don't survive this—I haven't learned how to purge the resentment from your spirit, so—" She winces, pulling herself over the railing of the next building, not having any time to falter. "You—You'll turn into a ghost fire, if that happens."

Or a fetal spirit.

Either way, the thought of him being deprived of the chance to live hurts her, more than words could ever express.

"And your father..." Her voice wobbles, but she says the words clearly. "He'll come and find you, okay? He'll...he'll take good care of you. I promise."

She knows, without a single doubt, that He Xuan will. Because he—

He's a good man.

Shi Qingxuan said she needed time the last time she spoke, and she meant it, but—

Part of her knows that she could never stop loving him, no matter how hard she tried.

And even if she could—

Shi Qingxuan doesn't want to give up on anyone else she cares about.

Not ever again.

Not even herself .

But still, she says the words, leaping through the last rows of buildings.

"Just...No matter what happens..."

She makes the final jump, catching herself on a reinforced set of scaffolding—

Lining the sides of the new walls being built around Gusu.

Her hands grip the ladder rightly, blowing her bangs out of her face—and she starts to climb.

"I love you, Baobei."

The ladder is rough under her palms—and she feels like she’s going to slip more than once, wearing a dress like this.

But she doesn’t stop.

Even with Wen Sicong right behind her, powerful flaps of his wings sending roaring gusts of wind her way, nearly blowing her off.

But still, she holds on.

Pulling herself up the layers of scaffolding, moving higher and higher as the ground shrinks away underneath her.

Trying not to think, to pretend that she’s turned small again, climbing trees while her brother worked inside.

“You can do this,” she mutters, her arms trembling as she makes her way into the highest platform.

Connected to a series of ropes and pulleys, being used to drag enormous blocks of limestone to the top of the wall. And when she leaps over, grabbing onto the rope—Rats follow. Crawling up the robe behind her as she climbs—

But that’s the thing about rats.

They are eaters by nature, consuming everything around them without a thought.

“You’ve nowhere left to run, Lady Wind Master…” Wen Sicong’s voice echoes below. “All you can do is fall.”

Maybe that’s true.

That’s all she can think about, feeling the rope burn her already bleeding palms, whimpering from the pain as she pulls up with all of her strength.

But, it’s like she said—rats will eat anything.

Including rope .

And if you can estimate the speed of degradation based on the size of the rat’s teeth, the bite force, and the downward pull on the rope—

You can calculate exactly when and how it will break.

Sending the two tons of limestone dangling from the bottom crashing down.

Shi Qingxuan can’t look down to see the results of her work—not when the release of the rocks weight sends the end of the rope she’s still hanging onto flying violently through the air, but—

BOOM!

The accompanying roar of pain tells her it was a direct hit.

But when a rope carrying that much weight is suddenly released…

It spins in a violent circle, hundreds of feet around the ground, shaking her like a rag doll. And with her palms already slick from the blood—

It flies out of her hands.

There’s a moment, the briefest, most heartbreaking instant, when she remembers how it felt to fly.

But now, as gravity wraps around her like an unforgiving blanket—

Shi Qingxuan begins to fall.

Hands outstretched, heart pounding.

And in spite of a lifetime of running away, of never looking back, of hiding behind her brother’s sleeves—

Shi Qingxuan isn’t afraid in this moment—no.

She’s anguished , knowing—

Knowing that she’ll never hold her son.

“…I’m sorry,” she whispers—

But it’s lost to the wind.

CRASH!

Wen Sicong’s roars are drowned out for a moment as all of Gusu is swallowed up in a resounding rumble.

His wings shake violently, forcing the rats swarming around his body off of him as he rights himself, throwing his head back to roar again with warning.

He tries to look around, to see the wreckage that’s been wrought—

But for a moment, there’s only this harsh, blinding light, engulfing the square around him.

Followed by a warmth unlike anything he’s ever known.

When it fades, he’s left nursing an injured wing, burning red eyes peering through swirling clouds of dust, until—

Until a powerful burst of wind roars through the streets of Gusu.

Blowing back the dust and smoke—

Revealing countless bodies of dead rats around him.

And there, standing in the epicenter of destruction, is Shi Qingxuan.

Hair falling loose around her shoulders, whipping around her violently from the force of the gale.

“…WHAT IS THIS?!” The creature snarls—

Only for eyes filled with emerald light to stare back at him.

Gusu is an ancient city.

A powerful place.

One bred in generations of endurance. The earth itself is soaked in magic.

When she replies, her voice echoes with power.

“I already told you.”

And now—a god has ascended upon the streets of Gusu once more.

“I’m the Wind Master.”

As she says this, her gaze turns down to her sleeves, reaching inside to pull out two fans.

The very same she had been training with, just when this entire mess began.

Taken from the Palace of Wind and Water—The characters Feng and Shui painted across the front.

Thrumming with power—stained by the heavenly light of her ascension.

Forged into two new spiritual devices.

And when her eyes snap back up—

Wen Sicong immediately takes a step back, raising his wing joints, prepared to take flight—

But she doesn’t let him get far.

Each fan snaps open with smooth flicks of her wrists, arms twisting gracefully as she summons winds from the North and South, hot and cold fronts swirling violently when they crash together.

Forming a cyclone overhead.

And even as he flaps his wings violently, desperately trying to escape—

Wen Sicong is dragged inside, roaring with protest until the wind silences him, snatching the breath from his lungs.

And with each twist of her fans, Shi Qingxuan begins the process of ripping him apart.

Shredding his form bit by bit, scattering his soul until nothing remains. Sucking the remaining rats into the cyclone all the while, sending them into oblivion with their master.

And Shi Qingxuan supposed she could chalk it up to the burst of power that accompanies ascension, but…she’s still surprised.

After falling back into being a mortal, how could she be this strong upon her return to godhood?

But when the dust begins to settle—she gets her answer.

The worst part about her newfound mortality was, after so many years, being left in silence.

But now, when she hears the faint whispers…

Shi Qingxuan sinks down to her knees, eyes wide and brimming with tears.

‘Lady Wind Master…’

‘Protect me…’

‘…Help my son…’

‘Give me wisdom…’

“…They…” Shi Qingxuan’s voice comes out as a croak, her mascara running down her cheeks, hands trembling in her lap. “…They never stopped praying to me?”

She had been so certain that all of her believers had already abandoned her, but…

They…

They never left .

She uses one hand to cover her mouth, pressing her other over her stomach, slowly coming to terms with something else:

Shi Qingxuan is going to live .

Her child is going to live.

And she saved them both on her own.

When no one believed she could.

And now, as her full communication array flickers back to life—

His voice is the first and the loudest among them.

‘Shi Qingxuan?!’

A small sob rips out of her chest as she reaches up to wipe her eyes, clearing her throat.

‘H-He-Xiong?’

‘Are you hurt?!’

‘No…No, we…we’re both fine,’ she murmurs, sitting back on her heels, surrounded by corpses and wreckage. ‘ Gusu is safe now.’

‘…Then what the hell did you do with my ashes?!’

A wet laugh escapes her as she hugs the bangle tightly.

‘I…may have bashed a man’s head in…’

‘…You did WHAT with my WHAT?! Is that—is that why you asked me if they were DURABLE?!’

‘And you were right, THEY ARE!’

‘I gave you those so you could feel more secure about TRUSTING me, not to be used as a MELEE WEAPON QINGXUAN!”

‘IT WAS A CHAOTIC SITUATION!’

‘Don’t give me that, you didn’t sound desperate when you asked, you PLANNED IT !’

‘I didn’t have anything else on hand that would have worked!’

‘What, so there wasn’t just a brick laying around?!’

There was, but she couldn’t disguise that as a stylish accessory, could she?

‘I wanted it to feel like we were fighting together, and it did!’ She pleads . ‘Like you were a big strong man, protecting me…’

‘Shi Qingxuan.’

‘He Xuan?’

‘How many times have I willingly grown a pair of breasts for you?’

‘…Haha…’

‘…And you think appealing to my manhood is effective emotional manipulation.’

‘Well,’ she crosses her arms. ‘You do get off on it when I say it isn’t going to fit.'

'That's different.'

'How—?!'

'BECAUSE YOUR LIFE AND MY ASHES ARE NOT IN DANGER IN THAT SITUATION!'

Actually, if her brother had been aware of the situation back then, it very well could have been.

But...

Her laughter fades slightly.

She supposes that isn't a concern anymore.

'...Where are you?' She asks after a moment. 'I want to see you.'

She wants to show him.

'It's...' And now, she hears just how exhausted he sounds. 'It's a long story, but I had to stop seven tsunamis today—and I'm not even certain I caught them all.'

Certainly not the furthest north, anyway.

Shi Qingxuan's eyes widen with shock. 'How..?'

'...The short of it is that Hua Cheng destroyed the Heavens, and Jun Wu proceeded to throw the burning remains on top of my territory, which is now also destroyed.' He Xuan recalls cataclysmic facts with a tone of dry irritation. 'Most of the Martial Gods are defending the Imperial Capital. Mu Qing has gone into Qi Deviation. Yin Yu is dead. No one knows where Tai Hua, Qi Ying, or Ren Song are, and Pei Ming and the Rain Master are safe, but too wounded to fight.'

Shi Qingxuan can barely take all of that in, her jaw hanging open.

'But...it's only been a day!'

'Longest day of my fucking afterlife,' He Xuan grumbles. 'And now it's just me, Hua Cheng, and the prince left standing, and...' He sounds reluctant. Slightly pained, even. '...I want to see you too,' he admits quietly—his tone slightly gruff.

He's been wearing disguises and telling lies for so long—it's terrifyingly vulnerable for him to be honest.

But when he is, it makes Shi Qingxuan feel like she could melt to the ground.

'But I made a deal with Crimson Rain years ago, and I have to help him see this through.'

Which could be dangerous for him, but...

'...Okay,' Shi Qingxuan whispers, pulling her knees against her chest . 'You're...going to fight the emperor?'

'...Him, or Bai Wuxiang.'

Shi Qingxuan clutches the bangle close to her heart.

'...Make him bleed, He Xuan.'

The tone of her voice startles him.

How cold it is—almost bloodthirsty.

But her next words leave him somber:

'For gege.'

'...I will, Shi Qingxuan.' He replies softly. 'I promise.'

She nods, twisting the golden locket around her neck—scraping the blood away.

'And make sure you bring my best friend back to me.'

His parting response, even after everything that's happened, still makes her smile.

'...Who's that?'

His voice fades, and she's left alone—watching the sky overhead.

In the next few hours she'll stay here, watching the sun rise over the streets of Gusu, listening to prayers.

And when that time passes, she'll face the world—

Only to find it has forever been changed.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY (tw// blood)

Do not repost or reuse.

[image]

CREDIT: FAE

Children of Death

Chapter Summary

> "Instead, I allow you to continue on. You pretend you're free of it, but…" Bai Wuxiang tilts his head to the side. "You're still a slave to my whims, Hudie." His thumb slides over her chin delicately.
>
> "I'm the one who made you into a mother, after all."

Chapter Notes

> CONTENT WARNING: blood, gore, psychological torture, referenced grooming and pressured consent, death

The air itself tastes like blood, rolling down her throat with every inhale.

Clang!

A hammer clatters to the ground, then rolls onto its side with a faint thud.

"…This…" A voice hisses from the dark, rasping with exhaustion, "Is why I could never let you go, my love…"

His hand brushes through her hair, pushing wayward pieces from her face.

"No one challenges me quite like you…" he muses, watching as dark tresses slip through his fingers. "Even after all this time."

Violet eyes stare up at him hatefully.

"You don't want a challenge."

If he did, he wouldn't have forced her to spend two thousand years locked inside this cage, forced to watch the world outside.

Unable to break free, and unable to move on.

"…I would destroy you if I didn't," he muses, watching her broken down form.

Bleeding and exhausted.

“Instead, I allow you to continue on. You pretend you’re free of it, but…” Bai Wuxiang tilts his head to the side. “You’re still a slave to my whims, Hudie.” His thumb slides over her chin delicately.

“I’m the one who made you into a mother, after all.”

His claws dig into the underside of her jaw, leaving faint imprints in their wake. "And I'm going to destroy the 'children' you have left before I scatter their ashes before your eyes—”

He stops when something wet lands on his cheek.

Blood, from his wife spitting on his face.

"You didn't make me a mother," her voice is guttural, screamed raw and scorched with smoke. "A man doesn't make anyone a mother." She looks up at him through her lashes, fangs bared.

"I chose to be a mother. My sons made me a mother. You took them AWAY from me!"

Even now, after fighting him alone for nearly a day of constant battle, she still manages to snarl with the wrath of centuries of resentment. Unable to rise to her feet, but—

"How could you have made me a mother when you were never ONCE an actual father to our children?!"

"...Is this where you insult me more than you already have by telling me my Guoshi was visiting our bed in my absence? Because he already told THE WORLD, don't you worry—”

"He did!" Zhao Beitong admits without an ounce of shame, or remorse.

"But he was also the only one who comforted your wife after you gambled OUR SON'S LIFE AWAY!" She reminds him with a wrathful glare. "And San Lang was on this earth for nearly THIRTEEN YEARS, and Mei Nianqing was more of a father to him than you EVER were!"

"You knew I had responsibilities—to my people, to my believers, and you chose to marry me anyway—”

"CHOSE!" She laughs, sagging forward on her hands, shoulders trembling with amusement. "I was a commoner, being Courted by the Crown Prince. What choice did I have?!"

She was a young woman back then—one whose father was considered new money, an artisan with a tenuous position at court.

Rejecting the prince could have meant her father losing his commission. It could have meant losing her position as a guoshi.

She would have been ostracized.

Tonglu Hudie learned to love her husband, but it didn't come quickly or easily to her.

"And I married a prince, not a god! If you wanted that, why did you EVER take a wife, or have children at all?! Why would you put us through that?!"

“…It’s fascinating that you think I had any more of a say in it than you, my dear.”

With one more flick of his wrist, another shard of obsidian flies into her chest, pinning her to the floor of the Kiln.

“I suppose that’s what makes loving you so tragic.”

As much as they might have loved one another—they never understood each other.

But she doesn’t need to understand Bai Wuxiang.

Not for what he has in mind.

And now, with the Goddess of the Kiln forced into submission—

A calamity begins to emerge.

His palms press flat against the edge of the Kiln, soaked in Zhao Beitong’s blood—and with a slow, thunderous rumble, the doors begin to open once more.

And outside—

It’s dark.

Black as pitch, in spite of a crimson moon shining down.

The ghost king pauses, looking back over his shoulder—

Only to find that the Kiln behind him has disappeared.

And when he looks back ahead…

Only darkness awaits.

“…You don’t have any other tricks to play, do you?” He murmurs, but something stops him.

The sound of a flute.

Notes drifting through the air—beautiful, but somewhat shrill, like the notes hanging in the air are in slight tension with one another.

Bai Wuxiang turns his head, sleeves weighing heavily against his arms, wondering—if he hasn't left the Kiln, what memory is it showing him?

A child's laughter falls—careless and free, with a longing note that—

That makes Bai Wuxiang reach for his chest, startled.

By the way it tugs at his heartstrings.

Something bumps against his side as it runs past him;

A little boy with long, impossibly dark hair.

And when he looks back over his shoulder—

Bai Wuxiang recognizes those eyes.

Somewhere between silver and amethyst, mimicking the contrast between his parents.

But the last time he saw them, it was in the face of an infant in his crib.

And now, he whispers—

"...Zhang Wei?"

The child stops a few feet ahead of him, back turned.

A small toy flute clutched between his fingers, reminiscent of one that his mother made for him, when he was too small to even use it.

Insisting that the boy would be musical, from the way he hummed in his crib.

Bai Wuxiang loved their son as dearly as any father loves his first born, but he struggled to see everything that his wife did, in Zhang Wei's future.

She was able to see an entire personality, an entire person, and he just saw...

Lost possibilities.

But when the boy turns his head to look back at him, the ribbon holding back his hair fluttering in the breeze—

He doesn't have a face at all.

Rather, he has the same visage Bai Wuxiang possessed, when his soul first split in two.

A face without features—only scar tissue.

There are faint, pained sounds, almost like—

Almost like he's trying to speak through it. To scream and cry about the fact that he's trapped.

And all Bai Wuxiang can do is stumble back, falling to the ground with shock.

"You...you died, " he mutters, shaking his head.

Small, innocent hands reach upwards, fingernails tearing at overgrown scars.

Until finally, his lips crack open.

“You gave me away.”

And that—

That makes the calamity snarl.

“LIAR!”

Bai Wuxiang hadn’t known.

“HE LIED TO ME!”

He lunges forward, claws extended, ready to rip the illusion apart.

The Kiln simply replays past and future events. Memories that haunt you. Futures that await you, or alternatives that are never meant to be.

But it's never been explicitly sadistic like this before.

But the moment his claws make contact, his son disappears, leaving Bai Wuxiang crashing to the ground, empty handed.

Beneath him—it's like the surface of a lake. Completely smooth, but so dark, with no hint of what lies beneath.

His own warped reflection stares back at him.

…Bai Wuxiang's lips twist into a snarl as he pulls his fist back, ready to slam it back down into the image, when—

"F…father?"

This time—

This time, it's a voice Bai Wuxiang knows all too well.

He turns around, only to find another young boy standing before him.

A beautiful child, bearing an almost elven face—wild, dark hair braided over his shoulder, and eyes like two fallen stars.

"…San Lang…" he whispers, taking a step forward. "San Lang, I'm—"

"San Lang," another voice comes from over his shoulder, speaking over him.

"You know better than to wander into the temple so late. Your mother worries."

The child bites his lip, hanging his head.

"…It's not tomorrow yet," he whispers. "He'll come."

Bai Wuxiang listens to the answering sigh, and…

Watches his Guoshi approach, kneeling with his son.

"…I know you wanted your father to be here," Mei Nianqing murmurs, placing a hand on his shoulder. "But you had a nice day with your mother and I, didn't you?"

San Lang sits down, pulling his knees against his chest.

“He promised!”

“…He has believers who need him—”

“But why are they more important than me?!” San Lang sobs, hugging himself tightly.

“San Lang—”

“I pray to him too!” The prince shakes his head. “I pray so hard but he—he’s never here!”

“And I know it hurts him more than you can imagine, but he has duties.”

“So do you!” San Lang whimpers. “So does mother! But you’re always here!”

For every milestone, heartache, and…

Birthday.

“…San Lang,” Mei Nianqing squeezes his shoulders gently. “Your father loves you.”

“Don’t.”

“I’m n—”

“Don’t LIE!”

San Lang buries his face in his knees.

“If you love someone—you don’t LEAVE THEM!”

Bai Wuxiang takes a step back.

“You don’t let them feel so—so— WORTHLESS!”

“Careful, San Lang—remember where you are—”

“What?! So he can hear me, even if he’s not here?! I HOPE HE DOES!” San Lang lifts his head, eyes red and tear swollen. "I hope he knows that I HATE HIM!"

"You don't mean that—”

"YES I DO! AND HE HATES ME TOO!" The child weeps, caught somewhere between pain and indignation.

Because his father never came to a single one of his celebrations before, but—

Your tenth birthday is supposed to be important.

In Wuyong, it's the year that a prince is given his first duties and presented before the royal court.

And his father wasn't even there.

Mei Nianqing strokes the boy's hair, pulling him in for a gentle embrace as San Lang presses his face into the Guoshi's shoulder, sobbing.

"I know you're disappointed, and I'm sorry," he murmurs. "But this is who your father is, and if you expect that to change..."

Then he'll only be disappointed again, and again, and again.

Like he already has been.

It was one thing for Bai Wuxiang to have seen this thousands of years ago, knowing that he couldn't return to the mortal realm until he had solved the current crisis.

It's another seeing it now, knowing that he never got to make things right.

Knowing that this was the man his wife was in love with.

That the one he trusted to protect his family in his absence usurped his place in it.

"No..." He growls, stalking forward. " No!"

Maybe Bolin was Mei Nianqing’s son all this time—

But San Lang and Zhang Wei were his.

“That man is not a part of this family! HE ISN’T YOUR—!”

He grabs San Lang by the shoulder, but when the boy turns to look at him—

Bai Wuxiang stumbles back, falling to the ground.

That small, beautiful face is covered in soot now.

Unblemished skin begins to blister and melt away, revealing the bones underneath.

His lips can barely pull back over his teeth, charred and black—

“You let me fall.”

For a moment, the scene flashes.

Showing a glimpse of Bai Wuxiang's brother, broken and bloody on the ground, eyes unseeing.

Because he was pushed.

And then, in an instant, it's San Lang again.

His body crumbling into ash, disappearing into the surface of the lake.

"No...No, nonono no NO!"

"Even a tiger won't kill its own cubs..." A whisper floats in his ears, crawling under his skin until his teeth begin to chatter.

"No..." He hisses, slamming his fist into the lake over and over again. "No, no, no, no, NO!"

But the surface isn't black anymore.

And now—

Bai Wuxiang watches a different child fall.

One with the right side of his face covered in bandages, wild dark hair, plunging through the sky like a falling star.

But someone catches him.

A masked, golden prince holds him close as flowers fall down like rain.

Watches as the child is held close, his trembling frame secure in the teenager's arms as he whispers—

"Don't be afraid..."

And it's so easy to see it now, the immediate spark of adoration in the boy's eyes as he stares up at Xie Lian, clinging to the front of his robes.

Bai Wuxiang shakes his head, leaning back, stretching out with his consciousness to fight the grip of the Kiln, but—

He doesn't feel it there. Not in the way that he did when he was fighting Xie Lian.

What—?

But even when he turns around, more scenes flash before him.

Of Xie Lian, kneeling by a riverbed—reaching out and catching the boy's hand.

Begging him not to go.

Forcing Bai Wuxiang to witness the relief in the prince's eyes when Hong'er doesn't run away.

To watch how Xie Lian heals in his presence, like a flower stretching back towards the sun.

And when you're forced to watch something a second time, it brings all of these small details that seemed so inconsequential before back into the foreground.

How Xie Lian’s shoulders always seem to relax when he hears the sound of Hong’er’s voice.

The fact that he leans into it when the mortal touches him, rather than cringing away.

Bai Wuxiang glares, shaking his head as he takes step after step backwards, but everywhere he looks, everywhere he turns—

There's just more.

More flute melodies, drifting through the air.

The sound of his wife screaming.

More of San Lang's sobs as his body burns.

When that reaches a fever pitch—he lashes out with his blade, not looking for the Kiln's presence anymore, but just anything that he can grasp hold onto—

And when he does, his sword finally lands on something solid.

Thud!

It's drawn back slowly—dripping with blood.

In the world outside—a figure stumbles from the forest, coughing, and Lang Qianqiu surges forward, grasping him by the shoulders.

"Did he figure it out?! Did he hurt you?!"

Ren Song sways slightly in his grip, holding one hand over his ribs.

"...He's starting to."

The wound in his side is deep, but regenerating at a rapid pace as the ghost grasps onto Lang Qianqiu's arm, reaching for Quan Yizhen's hand with the other.

"How much longer do you think we have to keep this up?" The prince of Yong'an looks back over his shoulder.

He's been doing that this entire time, for once desperately hoping that Hua Cheng will appear, prepared to take a task that is far beyond them off their hands, but—

"Lang Qianqiu..." Ren Song rasps, wiping the blood from his mouth.

"What?!"

"You...need to prepare yourself for the possibility that no one is coming," he coughs wetly, spitting blood onto the ground—expelling what built up in his lungs as his form recovers.

"But Hua Cheng knows we're here, right?!"

"..."

"...Hua Cheng knows we're here, right?!"

Ren Song pulls back from him, tightening his ponytail as he gets the rest of his energy from Quan Yizhen.

"They'll get here as soon as possible to deal with Bai Wuxiang anyway.

Knowing we're here wouldn't make them come any faster."

"That makes sense," Quan Yizhen shrugs.

"...I BEG TO DIFFER!" Lang Qianqiu glares, only to be aggressively shushed by Shuo, loudly whispering—

"Look, I don't know why you and Crimson Rain are so weird about acknowledging the fact that he RAISED you—"

"—that's a really broad term—"

"But he would CARE!"

"I know!" The ghost snaps. "If you think I'm under the impression that he doesn't care about me at all, you've misread the situation, alright?"

He also knows that Hua Cheng would have never allowed him to come here in the first place, had it been up to him.

But he also knows that, if Hua Cheng knew where he was and what he was doing—he would be forced to choose between competing priorities.

And Ren Song knows what Hua Cheng would choose—but that doesn't mean he wants to have that confirmed.

"...But just because I didn't tell him doesn't mean that nobody knows we're here," he mutters, shaking his head as he looks back towards the forest. "And either way..."

His fingers tighten around his ribs, stomach twisting with nausea.

"He can't do that a hundred times."

Lang Qianqiu frowns, struggling to understand the reference, but the ghost makes no move to explain.

Ren Song has targeted humans over the years. Abusers. Molesters. Murders and predators.

But in all of that time, he's never seen memories so vile .

And it's not that Bai Wuxiang isn't capable of doing that again, it's just...

Ren Song knows that he can't survive it.

"How much power do you have left?" He mutters, looking between the two of them.

"...About half," Lang Qianqiu winces, visibly tired.

Quan Yizhen scratches the inside of his ear—seeming remarkably impassive for someone deep in enemy territory, facing certain death.

"I've used a sixth of mine."

Both Ren Song and Lang Qianqiu turn to stare at him, shocked.

"...How?!"

The martial god of the west shrugs, crossing his arms as he leans back against one of Shuo's trees.

"I'm projecting this into the dreams of my worshippers."

"Why would you do that?!"

Hee shrugs again. "They get excited if they think I'm about to fight and send me prayers."

Quan Yizhen doesn't resort to that often, but when he does, it results in an enormous surge in his power.

Which he would have used before in the Grand Martial Hall, if Jun Wu hadn't blocked all communication with the outside world.

"They're really weird that way."

Lang Qianqiu sends him a baffled, exasperated look.

"When would you ever have the room to call anyone else weird?"

Quan Yizhen stares back at him with that constant, deceptively expressionless look.

"You're weird."

"...What?!"

"You pretend to be angry a lot. It's weird."

Quan Yizhen understands pretending not to be hurt or sad, because those emotions can make a person seem weak to their enemies.

But pretending to be angry seems like a complete waste of energy.

"You are objectively the weirdest god in the Heavens!"

"Everything I do makes sense to me."

Lang Qianqiu grits his teeth, certainly not pretending to be angry now, because of COURSE everything Quan Yizhen does makes sense to HIM, but—

"We don't have time for this," Ren Song interrupts them both. "Quan Yizhen, give me more."

He offers his hand without complaint—but it isn't fast enough, forcing Ren Song to resort to sinking his teeth into the martial god's wrist, drinking directly from the source.

Rumble...

The trees around them shiver, and he winces in anticipation.

"...I might not come back out again," he mutters, wiping his mouth as he pulls back. "If Bai Wuxiang comes through—he's a ravenous ghost like Blackwater and I. He sees any source of spiritual energy as food. Make him chase you to stall for time."

However much they have left.

Lang Qianqiu swallows hard, wanting to say more, to do more, to stop him, but—

Ren Song disappears back within the trees, hand slipping just out of reach when he grasps for it.

Leaving the martial god staring into darkness—praying that the ghost is wrong.

"...They're beautiful," he admits quietly, fingertips drifting near the edges of the pond, watching the fish glide beneath the water's surface.

Scales like jewels of white and blue, spots of red across their backs.

"You don't keep them in your own palace," the emperor observes.

Shi Wudu smiles faintly, pulling his fingertips back from the water's surface. His body aged to its peak form when he ascended—but it's only been two years since then, and he feels far younger than he looks.

"The cat would torment them, I'm afraid."

The memory is slightly warped, stemming from a time when Bai Wuxiang lurked within the recesses of the emperor's soul—

But the sight of his fingertips brushing the Water Master's hair from his cheek is clear enough.

"You're the first since Yushi Huang to deputize a beast."

Shi Wudu seems a little sheepish, being reminded of that fact—but he shrugs it off, nonchalant.

"Qingxuan would have been devastated if we left him behind, he's known him since he was a kitten—”

"And how is Shi Qingxuan's cultivation going?"

And just like that—the light in Shi Wudu's eyes quickly begins to fade —

Replaced with nothing but fear.

"Oh, no need to look like that," the emperor assures him, patting the side of Shi Wudu's head. "You know your brother is safe here, don't you?"

"...Yes," he whispers, the second half of that statement going unspoken, but felt.

For now.

But if he doesn't ascend, he'll never be able to leave the Heavens either. And Shi Qingxuan is such a free spirit...

Shi Wudu was already forced to raise him behind the protective walls of their childhood home. Underneath the disguise of his little sister, 'Mingxia.'

He can't bear the idea of sentencing his brother to an eternity within a gilded cage, even if it saves him from his fate...

It feels cruel .

But what else can he do that he hasn't already done?

"...There was always the possibility that he was never fated to ascend to begin with," the emperor muses, watching Shi Wudu from the corner of his eye. "But your little exchange should have solved that."

It's funny.

Up until now, Ren Song had only ever heard He Xuan's narrative of the Water Master, describing him as a unfeeling, inhumane tyrant—

But in this memory, the mere mention of what Shi Wudu has done makes him visibly nauseous, covering his mouth with his hand.

"...But even if he has that young man's fate now, he wouldn't have his natural skill or talent," Jun Wu muses. "He'd need additional help with his ascension."

"...I've been planning to take time aside to train him myself," Shi Wudu mutters, his brow furrowed. "I know he seems silly to those who don't know him well, but he's just a teenager, and he does have talent —”

"Of course you'd think that, you adore him." Jun Wu sighs. "But don't let that blind you to what the situation calls for. And you won't have time to train him."

"...But he needs—”

"I need my Water Master," the emperor's tone isn't exactly scolding, but Shi Wudu still seems to grow sheepish in response. "You have responsibilities to more than just your brother now. But...that doesn't mean I'm not willing to help you."

That seems to catch Shi Wudu's attention—and when Jun Wu feels the young god's eyes on him, he smiles.

"...How?"

"There are spiritual devices that can assist in accelerating cultivation," he explains easily.

“You’ve already purchased some of them for your brother—but nothing could quite compare to what I have in my personal collection…of course, we would need to be discreet, it would be a blatant act of favoritism.”

Shi Wudu frowns, pulling his hand away from the lake once more.

It's already difficult for him to socialize among the other gods, because of how the emperor has publicly singled him out. So early into his ascension, many far more senior gods find it offensive.

"…If that's the case, then why would you—?"

He grows still, eyes wide as another mouth presses against his own.

They never close, his body stiff and unsure of how to react, and—

It's obvious from his reaction that it's his first.

There's a flash of sadness in his gaze—like someone who knows something has been stolen.

But when the emperor pulls back, there's none of that.

Only carefully curated embarrassment and surprise, cheeks flushed, lips parted.

"Because I do have favorites," the emperor murmurs, looking him over with a keen, admiring eye. "And what's so wrong with that?"

The Water Master says nothing, but when Jun Wu leans in to kiss him again—

He's more than aware of what is on the line when it comes to remaining in the emperor's good graces.

So he doesn't push him away, accepting it.

At the time, Jun Wu interpreted his stillness as shyness

Not for the quiet resignation that it actually was.

But the scene melts away, leaving his arms empty—

And it's followed by a sharp contrast.

"…Are you sure you don't need me to carry you?" Pei's voice rings clear—terribly amused.

"…Yes…"

The Water Master's voice is slightly slurred, and the culprit is easy to see from the fireworks overhead—

A mid-autumn festival decades ago.

"I can't tell if you're drunk, or just that exhausted." Pei Ming laughs fondly, following him down the street.

"…No…"

"No?"

"No." The water master stumbles slightly over the curb, only for his friend to catch him by the elbows.

"You should let me carry you Shui-Xiong." The general needles him lightly. "It'll be less of a blow to that pride of yours than falling over in the street."

Shi Wudu stops ahead of him, tilting his head back, gazing at the lanterns overhead.

"…I hope you didn't drink that much because you came in second," Pei smiles, watching the Water Master with nothing but warmth and longing. "You'll surpass me before long."

"No…"

"Shui-Xiong, Shui-Xiong," the general sighs, smiling a little when he can see the slight tinge of visible annoyance in the water god's expression. "I've not seen you drunk in three hundred years. What's the occasion?"

"I had to sit next to you all night…"

Pei clutches his chest, as if wounded.

"You had to drink that much to find me tolerable?"

Shi Wudu rolls his eyes. "I drank…that much because I love…" He spins around to face him, but overestimates his own balance—

And when his face lands in Pei Ming's chest, he doesn't move

"…Love what?" The general questions, resting one hand between Shi Wudu's shoulder blades—steadying him.

"…Wine," Shi Wudu rasps, still not lifting his head.

Pei Ming clearly wants to tease him just a little more, but…

“I see,” he murmurs, rubbing Shi Wudu’s back. “Does that mean that you—?”

“I want to go home.”

It‘s the first thing he’s said clearly since they left the celebration, grilling the back of Pei Ming’s robes tightly.

“Yes, I’ve been trying to get you th—”

“With you,” Shi Wudu corrects him. “I don’t want my bed.”

The general pauses, fingertips tangled in the younger man's hair.

"You're too drunk for what happens in my bed," he reminds him—seeming far more endeared than anything else—

And Shi Wudu rocks up onto the balls of his feet, pressing their mouths together.

Pei Ming stiffens, humming as he holds him closer.

"...That's very nice," he murmurs, pulling back to kiss his forehead, "but you're still very drunk."

"After I sleep, then," the Water Master amends, hugging him tightly around the neck. "Unless you don't want..."

It's hard to tell if Shi Wudu is a clingy drunk, or an honest one. In any case, the hesitance he displays when experiencing a fear of rejection is very real.

"...I always do," Pei Ming murmurs, lifting the Water God up in his arms. "But only after you sleep."

Shi Wudu lets out an annoyed groan of protest, only for Pei Ming to hold him closer.

"Relax kid, I won't let anyone see me carrying the great Water Tyrant, your secret's safe with me."

And it's contradictory—the way Shi Wudu relaxes, but grimaces at the same time.

As though he knows that Pei is telling the truth—

But it's the secrets that aren't with him that he worries about.

It isn't just one moment like this. One instance that throws the contrast between the way Shi Wudu reaches for Pei, but cringes from Jun Wu.

It's countless.

And Bai Wuxiang is forced to watch them.

Over and over again.

Forced to watch as the Crown Prince stands before the Heavenly Court once more. Disgraced, with shackles in his eyes—

And all he can talk about is Crimson Rain Sought Flower.

Every single time, he's asking about him. Trying to get back to him, to help him, thinking about him—

And he doesn't even know who the man is yet, that's the worst part.

Knowing how easily he's pulled back into Hua Cheng's orbit. How effortlessly.

The images begin to take on a pattern, a painful rhythm that pulls him into a cycle.

The sound of a flute. Zhang Wei's scarred, blank face.

His wife screaming, thrusting Zhu Xin into his ribs.

San Lang sobbing in Mei Nianqing's arms as he crumbles into ash.

Xie Lian, catching Hong'er in his arms.

Shi Wudu kneeling on the ground in shackles.

Xie Lian, with a bloodstained smile.

"You were so desperate to stand beside me?"

"Enough…enough of this…"

The flute chimes again, and Bai Wuxiang moans.

"I said STOP!"

There's an empty crib, and his wife's paralyzing sobs.

San Lang falling, screaming, begging someone to catch him.

Xie Lian, laying in the streets by Lang'er bay, a sword through his chest.

Shi Wudu breaking the Brocade Immortal apart. The first time Jun Wu saw a new rival.

Xie Lian ascending again, saying the words, those awful fucking words —

' Body in abyss, heart in paradise.'

Xie Lian in a Gambler's Den, cheeks flushed as Hua Cheng named the terms of his bet, guiding him to shake a cup of dice.

But—

Bai Wuxiang grows still, watching the memories swirl and churn around him.

"Oh…I see it now," he murmurs, eyes narrowed into slits. "Very clever."

Because this memory isn't his .

He's never seen this one before.

His hand shoots out, and this time, he knows exactly where to look.

"It's the little bird that likes to hide in the trees," he muses, catching his attacker by the throat.

Holding him in the air, squeezing.

"You're a resilient little thing, aren't you?"

His head tilts to the side, taking in the sight of the ghost they call Ren Song.

Such promise.

"I nearly devoured you, last time we met," he murmurs, eyeing the array around them.

It's intricate. Elegant, even.

There are far more powerful beings who couldn’t manage this.

“…Though I suppose I was right to do so.”

Clearly the child has the skill required to become something far more dangerous than a mere savage ghost.

And there is far more hatred in his eyes than what Bai Wuxiang found the last time they met.

"Tell me child," he muses, squeezing Ren Song's neck just a little tighter, knowing that it won't inhibit the ghost's ability to answer. "What's your birth name?"

He obviously didn't grow old enough to receive a courtesy name before his death.

Ren Song offers him no answer.

"...You...want to know because you think I'm someone important?" he snorts, shaking his head—even if his range of movement is limited in Bai Wuxiang's grip. "Sorry to disappoint you, but..."

Thud!

Thud!

There are two sharp pains in Bai Wuxiang's back—and the body in his hands disappears in a rush of autumn leaves.

"...My mother worked in a tea house, and my father was a soldier." Ren Song snarls from behind his ears, yanking his daggers from the calamity's back.

It doesn't matter who your family was. How much wealth you had in life. What name you carried.

A knife is a knife, and you'll bleed like anyone else.

Bai Wuxiang wrenches his head around, hissing—

Only to come face to face with his brother, bleeding and shattered.

"Liar..." He whispers, broken teeth and bones grinding as he speaks. "Liar..."

Bai Wuxiang slashes at the specter, twisting around to stab outwards with his sword, but...

San Lang stares back at him, eyes wide, blood dripping from the corners of his mouth.

"F-Father?"

Bai Wuxiang's eyes drift down to where the blade is buried in the teenager's chest, lips trembling.

"I...I didn't..." He shakes his head vehemently, yanking the blade out as he turns around, attacking around him blindly.

Reminding himself that this isn't Tonglu.

These illusions are designed to cause or exacerbate madness. They aren't real. They aren't the—

"I hate you."

Bai Wuxiang grows still, staring straight ahead.

The prince kneels on the ground before him--the same as he was back then.

So beautiful, so new, so perfect.

Xie Lian tilts his head to the side, two silken strands of hair falling across his cheek, pearl earrings jingling softly as he moves.

"...My mother says we're not supposed to hate anyone," he admits slowly. "She says it's a double edged emotion. But..."

He looks up at Bai Wuxiang.

"I hate you."

But he doesn't scream the words in anger, like he did before.

"I'm not scared of you. I don't feel sorry for you. I don't care about you at all. You're less than worthless to me, because all you do is break things."

"Like you?" Bai Wuxiang sneers, teeth gleaming sharply as he takes a step forward.

But Xie Lian only smiles.

"You did everything you could to bring that outcome in Xianle, didn't you? And all it took to unravel everything you had done was one peasant boy. How pathetic."

The calamity stalks toward him, hands trembling with rage.

"You would rather roll around in the mud with that mongrel than change your ways?!" He snarls, grabbing him by the shoulder. "All because you—?!"

"Love him."

That wrenches an enraged howl from Bai Wuxiang.

But with one violent shove to his shoulder—

Xie Lian falls.

The terrain around them shifted without Jun Wu ever noticing, warping itself into...an all too familiar cliffside.

Bai Wuxiang stands at the edge, his face growing impossibly more pale.

"No..."

He drops down to the bottom, somehow even more affected by this than he was by the sight of his own sons dying, gathering the prince's shattered, unmoving form in his arms.

"NO!" He screams, shaking him uselessly.

Almost like a child that's been throwing a beloved toy at the wall over and over again, only to be shocked when it breaks.

And no matter how tightly he holds the prince—

He still crumbles to dust in Bai Wuxiang's arms, fading away into nothing.

Bai Wuxiang rocks back and forth on the ground, hands covered in soot, eyes wide and unfocused as something inside of him begins to break.

"It's not..." He whispers, lips dried and cracked. "It's not real...it's not...it's not..."

The scene starts to shift again, but—

Somewhere between desperation and a sudden burst of awareness, the calamity twists around, snatching something up between his claws.

Bringing his blade down over and over again.

"It's not real, it's not real, IT'S NOT REAL!"

His sword comes back soaked in crimson—and around them, the darkness begins to flicker.

Showing shards of volcanic stone piercing into the sky above—gnarled, twisted roots surrounding them as trees sway in the breeze overhead.

Blood drips down Ren Song's chin.

Eight stab wounds are visible through the front of his robes, blood pooling through the fabric.

But his hand grips the blade of Bai Wuxiang's sword, holding on fiercely, stopping the calamity from pulling it out one final time.

"Do you...even know where we are right now?"

Bai Wuxiang stares, tugging at the blade irritably.

Of course he knows where they are, how could he not—?

BOOM!

The blow to his chest is enough to send him flying off of his feet, slamming back into an awaiting blade, the weapon running through his heart.

Quan Yizhen pulls his fist back, spikes of metal bent around his knuckles and in between his fingers, giving his blow the force of a hammer, even if he didn't bring a blade with him.

And when Lang Qianqiu pulls his blade free, kicking the calamity in the back—

He laughs.

Bai Wuxiang falls down to his knees, and he laughs.

"What's so funny, you fucking freak?!" Lang Qianqiu snarls, pulling his sword back—and Bai Wuxiang doesn't stop him from stabbing him again, allowing the blade to run him through.

"There's...so much to choose from."

His eyes drift between the three, watching as Quan Yizhen stalks toward him, fists clenched menacingly.

"The Martial God of the East...The Martial God of the West...and a child from the Central Plains, all fighting as one. It's almost auspicious."

He laughs again, not seeming to feel an ounce of pain from the sword piercing his body—almost leaning back into it, like the reminder of a blade is a comfort to him.

"But even more ironic...is the fact that you never would have been a prince without me."

There would be no Lang clan without Bai Wuxiang. No Kingdom of Yong'an.

No General Tai Hua. No Gilded Banquets. No Guoshi Fangxin.

"But I want you to know something, boy." Bai Wuxiang tilts his chin back, looking up at Lang Qianqiu from where he sits on his knees.

"He prayed to us every single day that he spent in that coffin, begging for help."

His lips curve upwards with satisfaction when Lang Qianqiu's eyes grow wide with horror—

And pain.

"After enough time, he did not beg for freedom. He begged for death. So," Bai Wuxiang lifts one hand, "Tell me, prince—"

His sword flies back into his grip, ripping itself violently from Ren Song's body, leaving the ghost limp and bleeding on the ground.

"What do we do, when faced with the wicked?"

CLANG!

By the time Bai Wuxiang lifts his blade to attack—

Lang Qianqiu has already pulled his own sword free, raising it to parry.

CLANG!

CLANG!

CLANG!

"Maybe..." The martial god growls, sweat dripping from his temple. "You should remember who taught a man how to use a sword before you go and PISS HIM OFF!"

He might not have Xie Lian's innate talent or skill—but he's trained hard, and in the same sword form.

It's swift, overwhelming, and leaves little holes in his guard, making it far more difficult for Bai Wuxiang to look for an opening—and all the while—

BOOM!

Another blow lands in the middle of his back, knocking him forwards and into Lang Qianqiu's blade once more.

And it's almost unfair .

Any other opponent would be easily outmatched by two martial gods pummeling him from either side, raining blows faster than the calamity can block them.

Most gods would fail under such an onslaught. Most ghosts, too.

But not a calamity.

Somewhere in the hail of blows, he sticks out both hands—

One catches Lang Qianqiu's sword, snapping it in two—the other grabbing Quan Yizhen by the neck, twisting him around until he slams the martial gods together, sending them flying.

BOOM!

They land so violently, a crater arises around the two—rendering them unconscious in an instant.

Totally vulnerable, ready to be devoured.

Bai Wuxiang's tongue peeks out, wetting dried and cracked lips, when —

"HEY ASSHOLE!" Ren Song screams out. "YOU DIDN'T LET ME TELL YOU WHERE WE ARE!"

Bai Wuxiang doesn't even look back, blood staining the sweeping sleeves of his robes, gray streaked hair loose, blowing in the breeze.

"You can tell me all about it, after I kill your friends—"

"You should listen, your highness."

And that voice is enough to make Bai Wuxiang stop walking, turning to look back over his shoulder.

Only to find his Guoshi, kneeling on the charred earth, holding Ren Song's bleeding body in his arms—supporting the young man enough to help him sit up.

Not like the Mei Nianqing that he saw in the illusions Ren Song cast before—a painful memory, or a taunting specter of loss.

The ghost doesn't have enough strength left to cast a spell that intricate—not after how many blows Bai Wuxiang landed on his spirit.

No, this is him, in the flesh—and the sight makes Bai Wuxiang snarl.

"You dare show your face before me?" The calamity whispers, eyes flaring with rage. "HERE, of ALL places?!"

Mei Nianqing's answer is maddening in its simplicity:

"Of course, I dare."

He braces Ren Song against his body, holding a hand against the ghost's shoulder as he hacks up blood, clutching his ribs.

"This place isn't ours anymore, your highness. That changed long ago."

"...What joke is this?" Bai Wuxiang hisses, lifting his blade. "This is where I lost everything. Where everyone betrayed me! Where my CHILDREN—"

"It's a graveyard," Ren Song rasps. "For my brothers and sisters."

Those who died in the civil war and plague that followed in the greatest numbers—

The lost Children of Xianle.

An entire generation of souls snuffed out. Crammed into the fields of Tonglu when they entered the afterlife. Some of them used as cannon fodder for more powerful ghosts, but—

Most of them met their end here, at the hands of the ghost of Lang Ying.

This land was already cursed, before it became soaked with even more blood, death, and despair.

"These are the burial mounds of the Children of Xianle," Ren Song lifts his chin, looking Bai Wuxiang in the eye.

And like those who have shaped him—

He shows no fear.

"Lang Ying tried to release human face disease again, the same way you showed him the first time."

But with more children, more suffering—

More resentment.

"Hua Cheng killed him before he could unleash it," Ren Song recalls quietly. "And every single one of the remaining souls tied to it has moved on, or been dispersed."

But the land still carries the stain of what happened—teeming just beneath the surface. Not unlike the magma chambers beneath Mount Tonglu.

"Except for me."

Ren Song is the last one.

He is not the last survivor of Xianle—

But the rest are soldiers.

Gods and Calamities.

He is the last innocent.

The last child of a madman's war.

"...And what of it?" Bai Wuxiang questions coldly. "Am I supposed to feel remorse? Or pity you?"

The ghost smiles, and for the first time in all these years—

He feels this release in his chest. An unburdening of tension.

And he thinks that's what peace must feel like.

"I don't need you to be sorry. I don't care how you feel."

"How brave."

"Baoshan."

Ren Song sits forward, spitting blood onto the ground—and when he looks back up at Bai Wuxiang, he smiles.

Unkindly. With such wrath, but—

The intention to make it count.

"My birth name is Baoshan Shuo, and I curse you."

The words sound so simple—but they carry weight.

He presses his palm to the ground, allowing the Burial Mounds to taste the blood of Xianle once more—eyes burning like wildfires.

As he holds all of his resentment in the palm of his hand—all of the pain of his brothers and sisters—

And he makes it count.

"I curse you. I curse you. I curse you."

He repeats the words three times, watching as Bai Wuxiang stares at him, baffled.

"...You would throw your existence away so fruitlessly?" He muses, his head tilted. "The curse of this land does not work on me."

He's a killer.

Baoshan Shuo smiles, eyes burning brighter and brighter, until they mimic the effect of sunlight—burning until Bai Wuxiang is forced to shield his eyes, squinting.

"Are you sure about that?"

And then, with dawning horror, Bai Wuxiang realizes what he is dealing with.

A child born into war and famine. Raised in the shadow of two calamities. And the man who taught him magic…is a ghost who has spent almost his entire existence under the burden of one of Bai Wuxiang's curses.

And with that upbringing, Ren Song learned something crucial.

The conditions of a curse are dictated by the one who releases it.

This curse doesn't leave murderers exempt.

And for the first time in countless years—

Bai Wuxiang clutches his face, making faint cries of pain, staggering away from the two.

"What...HAVE YOU DONE?!"

His fingers dig into his skin, only to find—

It isn't even anymore. With large lumps rising in his cheeks and throat, openings tearing open in his skin—

And the whimpers aren't coming from him.

They're coming from the faces tearing through his flesh.

Human Face Disease has been unleashed once more.

On one person.

It can't be spread to anyone else. It can't be cured.

It's fused to Bai Wuxiang's very soul. And if he attempts to rejoin Jun Wu—

It will fuse itself to the emperor as well.

"Release it..." Bai Wuxiang moans, straining under the maddening cries of agony filling his ears—

So painfully reminiscent of his wife. Of his sons.

"RELEASE IT!"

Ren Song cackles, his voice echoing through the air.

"What makes you think anyone would give you mercy?"

Bai Wuxiang can't even form words in response, only an animalistic howl as he scrambles forward, claws and fangs extending—

CLANG!

Only to meet the resistance of steel.

"...Oh guoshi," the calamity sneers, speaking louder to be heard over the din of voices. "Has someone finally decided to take their head out of the sand?"

Mei Nianqing rises to his feet, holding his sword aloft.

"I turned my back on the children of Xianle once," he admits, staring back at his student.

The boy he failed so profoundly .

"Never again."

"...You'll die," Bai Wuxiang reminds him coldly, not sparing any of the empathy or sorrow that his master would for him. "You don't stand a chance against me."

"I know," the guoshi agrees softly.

He knows his value has never come through his strength, or his bravery.

It comes from his willingness to endure sorrow, regret, and shame—all in the purpose of waiting for the day he could tell the truth.

Until someone came along who was strong enough. brave enough.

If that time isn't now—then it will never come.

And he's tired of running.

Even if the gesture is mostly hollow.

Knowing before he started that it would only take ten strikes for Bai Wuxiang to bring him to his knees, his sword cast aside. One arm hanging limp and useless, the other barely managing to support himself, stopping him from collapsing.

"...After this many years..." Bai Wuxiang mutters, his voice screamed hoarse as he holds a blade to his former master's throat. "To think you would throw your life away so easily..."

Mei Nianqing doesn't tremble, or try to flee.

He raises his chin, offering his neck freely.

"I didn't throw it away, child. I can assure you of that."

And even now, after all of these years of loss, distance, hatred, and death—

Hearing his former master call him a child makes the calamity hesitate.

CLICK!

CLICK!

CLICK!

And Mei Nianqing was right.

Bai Wuxiang looks down—

Only to see chains locked around his ankles.

Like wraith butterflies—made from pure spiritual power.

Larger than manacles, twisting until his bones break.

The same chains that ships use to weigh anchor, sinking down deep into the ocean depths.

Mei Nianqing knew those last few minutes would accomplish exactly what the three of them had set out to do.

To buy time.

Just enough for another Ghost King to arrive.

...Just not the one that Bai Wuxiang expected.

And now that he's here—he doesn't pay Bai Wuxiang any mind.

Kneeling on the ground with a young ghost in his arms, holding him close as his form begins to warp and flicker.

"Don't...don't look so sad..." Shuo croaks.

He Xuan doesn't look up—but blood falls from his chin.

"You were the one throwing a huge fit...saying we weren't a big happy family..."

"Shut up," the ghost king whispers—and it's the words he doesn't say that Shuo hears the most clearly;

I lied.

"You should've called for help sooner."

"It wouldn't have changed anything."

He Xuan closes his eyes, regret searing him like a brand.

Thinking of all of the years he spent, chasing revenge for the family he lost.

Never seeing what he had. That he—

All these years, he still could have been someone's older brother, if he had just stopped to look.

"...Besides, I...I didn't think...I'd ever get the chance to...find someone who hurt me, and...hurt them back..." Shuo whispers.

And he did.

The man who unleashed the plague that killed his mother. Bao. His other brothers.

The man who cursed Hua Cheng.

Shuo got him.

He didn't get a funeral. He didn't get the chance to look his killer in the eye, or to even see the man receive justice.

But he left a mark on Bai Wuxiang that will never be lifted.

And even if he doesn't matter, even if he is nobody—

He did something important .

"...He should be here," He Xuan mutters, turning his gaze back to the portal behind him.

Knowing that he can't take Shuo back now. Even if it didn't mean risking Bai Wuxiang following him—

They don't have that much time.

"...That's okay," Shuo whispers, but...his voice cracks. "I'm kind of glad that he isn't. I don't...wanna be another sad memory, y'know?"

He's never had someone mourn him before, and he—

Shuo doesn't want that. He never has.

And this—this isn't so bad.

It was so much scarier, last time.

He isn't alone, now. He knows he's safe.

And when He Xuan's arms tighten around him—Shuo knows that he's being held by someone who cares.

That was all he ever deserved.

"He Xuan..."

"You shouldn't talk any more—"

"You're gonna make a really good dad," Shuo rasps.

He Xuan can't bring himself to lift his head, not wanting to show the boy the look in his eyes—or make these moments about his pain, but —

"...You were always a good kid," he whispers. "And he's proud . You know that? He—"

Shuo's form grows impossibly light, wavering.

He Xuan has experienced more pain and loss in his life than any man should have to. But—

It never gets easier, feeling someone you care about slip away in your arms.

Your first love. Your little sister. Your oldest enemy—

And now, part of the family you didn't know you had.

"I know," Shuo whispers.

He didn't before, but—

In those last few moments, there's no room for denial.

No more energy for being afraid of admitting who raised you. The face you imagine, when someone asks you about your father.

Your real father.

In that sense, he supposes he got lucky.

Because even when no one had to take him—Shuo still somehow ended up with the best. And that makes it hard, because—

He really doesn't want to go.

But all seasons change. Leaves fall—and in the end, they blow away.

He Xuan remains still as the spiritual remains drift around him—maple leaves swirling in the air, brushing against his hair before they float away.

To somewhere better, he hopes.

A world with more kindness than this one.

And when he finally lifts his head—

The whites of his eyes have turned black, giving the gold of his irises an unnatural hue. Fangs extended as he rises to his feet, chains gripped in either of his hands.

"I warned your other half before," he recalls, his voice low.

"That the next time you saw me, you'd die."

The ground beneath their feet begins to rumble.

Ancient waterways, soaked with resentment and corpses, rushing to the surface with a bloody vengeance.

Black waters bubbling up through ash and bone.

"And I'm a man of my word."

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or reuse

CREDIT: XIUYING

CREDIT: XIUYING

[image]

CREDIT: REN

The God Who Drowned

Chapter Summary

> “I have a question, before I die.”
>
> Xuan Ji whips her head around, pieces of hair sticking to her face, her armor soaked from the rain.
>
> “That’s a change of tune,” She snarls. “What is it?!”
>
> “You’re doing this because you love him.”
>
> That isn’t a question—just a statement, even if he doesn’t believe it’s true.
>
> “Why else would I be here?!”
>
> “Do you care if he’s happy?”

Chapter Notes

> This is a shorter chapter, but the next two that follow are very long, so I didn't know how else to split it up! Sorry!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

BOOM!

A barrel explodes, sending shards of splinters flying in every direction, salted fish hurling into the air.

One of them lands against the general’s cheek, making her grimace with disgust as she claws it away, leaving a wet mark behind.

“Hiding like a little rat…”

Her eyes drift through the market, peering between empty stalls, looking for a twitch of movement.

A sign of life.

“You made it seem like you were ready to go down in a blaze of glory before…” she sneers, blade dragging against the ground. “Did somebody get cold feet?”

She sends another fireball into a nearby stall, making it explode into a ball of smoke, sparks flying.

“It really is such a shame that you’re a man…” She hisses. “Otherwise, I could dress you up like another bride before I show him your CORPSE!”

“I’d still probably pull the wedding dress off better than you.”

The voice echoes from different points in the square, making it impossible to tell where it’s coming from—and Xuan Ji shrieks with fury, destroying an entire store front in her wrath.

Across the square, Shi Wudu slumps further down against the ground, his back pressed against the counter of a glassware stall, vases and cups clattering around him with every strike Xuan Ji makes.

As it turns out—taking on a ghost given power from the emperor himself when you don't have your godhood is easier said than done.

The deep claw marks in his ribs are a testament enough of that.

"I was going to be MERCIFUL to you!" Xuan Ji snarls. "I was going to let you die with DIGNITY!"

BOOM!

Behind him, another stall explodes.

"But now, I'll string you up before the city gates and let you ROT!"

Shi Wudu rolls his eyes, stretching out one leg carefully, using it to nudge a polished silver serving plate on the shelf in front of him, carefully adjusting it until the reflection shows Xuan Ji, pacing in the square behind him.

“THEN HE’LL SEE HE NEVER SHOULD HAVE WASTED HIS TIME ON A WEAK, SPINELESS CREATURE LIKE YOU!” She howls, looking around wildly—

And reflection wavers, growing fuzzy at the edges. Not because her form has changed—

But because the plate is rattling.

Trembling with the shelf underneath it as the ground begins to rumble.

Shi Wudu's gaze snaps upwards—

And it's time to move.

CRACK!

Xuan Ji screams, staggering to the side when the white hot surface of Zidian slashes against her back.

"I have a question, before I die."

Xuan Ji whips her head around, pieces of hair sticking to her face, her armor soaked from the rain.

"That's a change of tune," She snarls. "What is it?!"

"You're doing this because you love him."

That isn't a question—just a statement, even if he doesn't believe it's true.

"Why else would I be here?!"

"Do you care if he's happy?"

Xuan Ji stumbles, seeming almost confused by the question.

"…He makes me happy—!"

"That's not what I asked," Shi Wudu reminds her coldly, thunder roaring as lightning crashes overhead. "After everything that's happened, has he ever given an indication that he actually wants you?"

Xuan Ji swallows hard, his words stoking ancient flames of rage in her heart.

"He…he used to cross the entire country in one night, just to see ME!" She shakes her head vehemently, clinging to the memory of the love she once had. "I gave up EVERYTHING for him—betrayed my country, destroyed my leg—THERE'S NOTHING MORE I CAN GIVE!"

"You think showing such a lack of principles would woo a man who values honor above all else?"

Shi Wudu lifts Zidian, curling the weapon around him in an arc of light as she lunges for him again, lightning meeting the steel of her blade with a violent—

CRACK!

"Do you think he ever could have been happy, obtaining victory by such dishonest means?"

Xuan Ji glares, deflecting Zidian with the side of her vambrace, wincing when the whip cracks through steel.

"It meant we could have been TOGETHER—!"

"He's never put that aspect of his life first." Shi Wudu shakes his head. "Actually, I can't think of anything that would disgust him more than the fact that the world is ending, people are dying everywhere—and instead of doing anything to help, you're here . Trying to kill someone you think of as some sort of rival for a man who doesn't want you."

Shi Wudu is more than aware of the fact that he doesn't cut a particularly heroic figure.

"Who would ever want a psychotic, traitorous bitch for a wife? Did it ever once occur to you that you weren't good enough?"

He doesn't espouse grand morals, or speak of good and evil.

Shi Wudu knows, after everything he's done, he has no right to pretend to be a good person.

But he's spent a lifetime sharpening his knives, and he's more than prepared to use them on her.

Stoking the rage inside of her until she's wild with it—focused on nothing but him.

"YOU THINK YOU'RE SOMEHOW MORE DESERVING?!" She screams, eyes growing black as coal. "I'VE HEARD THE STORIES ABOUT YOU, WATER TYRANT! A THIEF AND A MURDERER! A SYCOPHANT TO THE EMPEROR!"

A startled, angry laugh slips from Shi Wudu's lips.

"…You're right," he mutters, "I'm a vile creature. I'm a thief. A murderer. A liar and a cheat. But I am not a sycophant."

If he was, Jun Wu never would have discarded him.

Shi Wudu is here because he was strong willed and disobedient .

“Then what would you call yourself, an uppity little brat like you, enjoying his favor for so long? Why would he send me for you personally, if it wasn’t personal? What were you, his whore?!”

Shi Wudu doesn’t flinch—even if his fingers tremble.

“…I suppose so.”

He was bought and paid for after all, even if he never understood the price, or what he was giving away.

“But that isn’t an insult, and I never claimed I deserved Pei Ming. I know I don’t.”

How could he, after the pain and damage he’s caused?

“…I just love him,” the mortal admits.

He’s always loved him. Before he even knew what it meant. Even when he desperately tried not to. He loved him before he even knew his face, daydreaming as he watched a divine statue from a terrace window.

He loves him in a way that feels as fundamental as walking. Something he’s always innately known how to do, if he’s willing to take the first step.

Almost as if part of his soul has always been meant for loving him—like a flightless bird that can only soar in his presence.

“I love him, and I want him to be happy,” Shi Wudu mutters.

Even if that happiness comes from someone else. He’s too selfish to be happy, if Pei Ming fell in love with someone else.

But he would never stand in the way.

“That makes someone as vile as me better than you.”

“…It doesn’t matter if you’re better after I kill you,” Xuan Ji reminds him, leveling her blade with his chest. “And there’s nowhere left for you to run.”

The thunder crashes with a violent rumble, lightning illuminating their faces in sharp relief.

"I don't need to."

Xuan Ji looks down now—

Finally seeming to notice the ground shaking beneath her feet.

"…What the hell?" She mutters, looking up—

Just in time to realize the darkness on the horizon wasn't the storm clouds at all.

Rather, it's a wave.

"Hope you know how to swim."

BOOM!

Shi Wudu has never been fond of pain.

He's familiar with it. He can endure it. But he's never learned to greet it like an old friend, the way braver men do.

No—he accepts it with quiet dread, and waits for it to end.

But this isn't pain.

Even as the force of the water breaks his bones, swallowing his body like a small creature, trapped in the body of a great monster—

The pain isn't what grips him.

It's chaos.

His body slipping round and round between the currents. There is no up. There is no down.

Only water.

He wonders now, in some distant way, if he was feared like this.

It's hard, rendered into something so weak, to be faced with the immensity of the power that he once had.

Knowing that he wielded it selfishly.

Now, there's just the crushing weight of water dragging him down .

His back hits the street below—and when he opens his eyes, it's impossible to see through the chaos of debris, sand, and silt.

But even now, in that darkness—there's one point of light.

A hallucination—expected, given the oxygen deprivation, but—

It's a ghost fire.

One he saw in someone else's memories, floating at the bottom of the sea.

The soul of a good man, who drowned.

And when he remembers—

Shi Wudu grows still, fractured arms reaching upward.

Knowing now, with no shadow of a doubt, how He Sheng felt back then.

But when his hand brushes through the flickering flames—

They're warm. Like a small heartbeat in the palm of his hand. Baffling, because a ghost fire always burns—

Thud.

There's a sharp, searing pain between his ribs—and he sucks in a pained gasp, water filling his lungs.

Xuan Ji drives the blade home, the metal running him through, pinning him to the ground below, even with the water twisting and churning around them.

Desperate to stop his heart with her own hands.

Even if it means being pummeled by the currents herself.

Because even if everything the mortal said was true—even if Pei would never want her, even if he's disgusted with her—

Maybe there's worth to be found in killing such a legendary man.

Like slaying an albino tiger for the glory of its pelt.

She may have lost everything in pursuit of Pei Ming's heart—

At least she can return the favor by slaying the greatest son of Xuli where he stands.

Or, should she say drowns.

But legends are fickle things.

Great tales passed through the ages.

Whispered around campfires, sung by mothers as they rock their children to sleep.

A princess who slit her throat.

A general who broke his sword.

A prince who pleased the gods.

A young lord who poured wine.

For as long as many can remember, there have always been four.

In the days that follow—one of them will no longer hold the titles that they once did.

There will always be four great tales whispered from one corner of the continent to the other.

But now, there will be a new story to tell.

Xuan Ji squints through the dark, twisting her blade deeper, waiting to feel his heart stop, but—

Two points of light stare up at her through the darkness.

Cerulean eyes, filled with an unnatural light.

And when she attempts to pull back—a hand grasps her forearm.

Keeping her exactly where she is.

Xuan Ji attempts to rip herself away, and his broken, mortal arm shouldn't be able to hold her, but—

His grip is like iron.

BOOM!

Lightning strikes the sea overhead, bringing flashes of light all around them.

BOOM!

For the first time—lightning strikes the same point twice.

And now, it stretches far beneath the waves, encircling the two in a crackling, wrathful web of light, hair flaring out around them from the static shock.

Xuan Ji trembles from the force of it, teeth rattling.

And when she looks up—

A long, spidery arc of power stretches down from the sky in the blink of an eye.

Now, Xuan Ji watches lightning strike thrice.

Followed by a sound that dwarfs the rest—

CRASH!

And a light that frowns everything else out.

That of the divine.

It clears the water around them—creating a small, spinning maelstrom in the center of the wave as it spreads across the land.

Standing in the center of it all is a young man in dark robes—a golden pin in his hair. Arcs of electricity curling around his body like armor.

Known from henceforth as The God Who Drowned.

The Thunder Master, Shi Wudu.

And with every step he takes—the storm overhead roars with fury.

He flashes in and out of sight with each crash of lightning, and when he does—

He strikes Xuan Ji.

A bird circles overhead, untouched by the storm—its caws matching pace with the thunder strikes.

And when Xuan Ji is brought to her knees, burned and bleeding, hacking up smoke, on the verge of returning to a ghost fire—

The storm grows silent.

She lifts her head, armor scorched and broken—

Only to find Shi Wudu turned away from her, hands lifted towards the sky.

And even now, when water is no longer his affinity—

He's able to guide the sea back to its proper place, waves growing calm under his grip.

Leaving the two of them soaked, in the ruins of what was once Lanling.

"…" Xuan Ji lowers her chin, glaring at the flagstones hatefully. "Get on with it."

Shi Wudu doesn't look at her, staring at the sea as it returns to its normal state.

"Did you say something?"

Xuan Ji gnashes her teeth together in humiliation, nails biting into her palms.

"If you're going to disperse me—you'd better GET ON WITH IT—!"

"No."

His response is so calm—so unbothered, it makes her falter in the midst of a rush of bravado.

"…what?" She asks hoarsely, her throat still singed from the lightning blasts.

Shi Wudu shrugs, turning his gaze back to her.

"I'm not the merciful type."

He doesn't make Xuan Ji ask him what he means—he's more than willing to elaborate, kneeling down before her.

"You will never see Pei Ming again." He promises her quietly. "He will never hear your voice again."

She'll never hurt him again.

And in this state, where Shi Wudu has reduced her to little more than a ghost fire—she can't hurt anyone else, either.

"It doesn't matter what you do, how long you wait, or how hard you try—I won't allow it. So," he straightens. "If you really can't find another reason to linger on in this world—go on and disperse yourself. I won't give you the dignity of going down in battle."

He leaves her there, alone in the street.

Broken and powerless.

Lacking much in the way of a plan, the shock of his newfound divinity slowly beginning to sink in.

He…

Shi Wudu sinks down, sitting on the crumbling steps of the remaining temple of Ming Guang, staring at his hands.

When he forced himself to begin cultivating again—Shi Wudu constantly reminded himself that you don't need to be a good person to ascend. That he didn't need to deserve it.

Ascension has far more to do with fate and chance than anything else.

And yet, he had been so certain that door was closed for him forever.

That, if the world was fair, he would die in a place like Lanling—powerless and alone.

But life has never been about what you deserve. It just is.

The moon sinks low in the sky as the citizens of Lanling begin to sail back into harbor—forced to beach their ships with all of the docks reduced to rubble.

Finding everything they once knew destroyed, but—

They're alive .

All because of one man.

"…Guess you're homeless now, huh?" Jiang Ning lifts a broken store sign, examining it curiously. "You're always welcome back in Yunmeng—if you can stand the boredom that is."

Jin Feng rolls his eyes, snatching the sign from his hands.

"I'm staying here, thanks."

The one good thing about everything being destroyed is that everyone in the city is in the same boat now, wealthy and poor cultivators suddenly on a level playing field.

"What, and cultivate with deadweight like them?"

"No…" Jin Feng mutters, tossing the sign aside. "Maybe I'll start my own sect."

He thinks it over, looking at the rubble around them.

And maybe build a taller house when he does…

A tower, even.

Shi Wudu watches the moon sink low, the sky beginning today warm near the horizon as the sun approaches.

Even the emperor's temple has been rendered to the foundations—but Ming Guang's remains.

Damaged, but still standing.

He turns the hair pin round and round between his fingers—the gold gleaming with heavenly light, stained by his ascension.

But it still feels the same—warm and familiar against his palms.

"…Where did you get that?"

When Shi Wudu looks up—

A mask settles over his face—heavy and white, molded to look like it's shedding tears.

Hiding his expression from someone who might recognize it.

A young man in armor stands before him, wary.

"…My General sent me to offer assistance, and it seems like a new god has ascended," he explains, still staring at the pin in Shi Wudu's hands. “…Was that you?”

And as if the day couldn’t become any more strange—

The stranger rises to his feet, pulling Pei Su into his arms.

“I’m glad you’re alright.”

Pei Su remains stiff in his confusion, eyebrow raised—trying to understand why the man’s voice sounds familiar, and for some reason…distorted.

“Take me to him.”

“…What?”

"Your general," the new thunder master murmurs, pulling back. "Take me to him."

In any other scenario—Pei Su would hesitate to bring a stranger to his general while he was already injured, and under such strange circumstances, but...

Something tells him that he should .

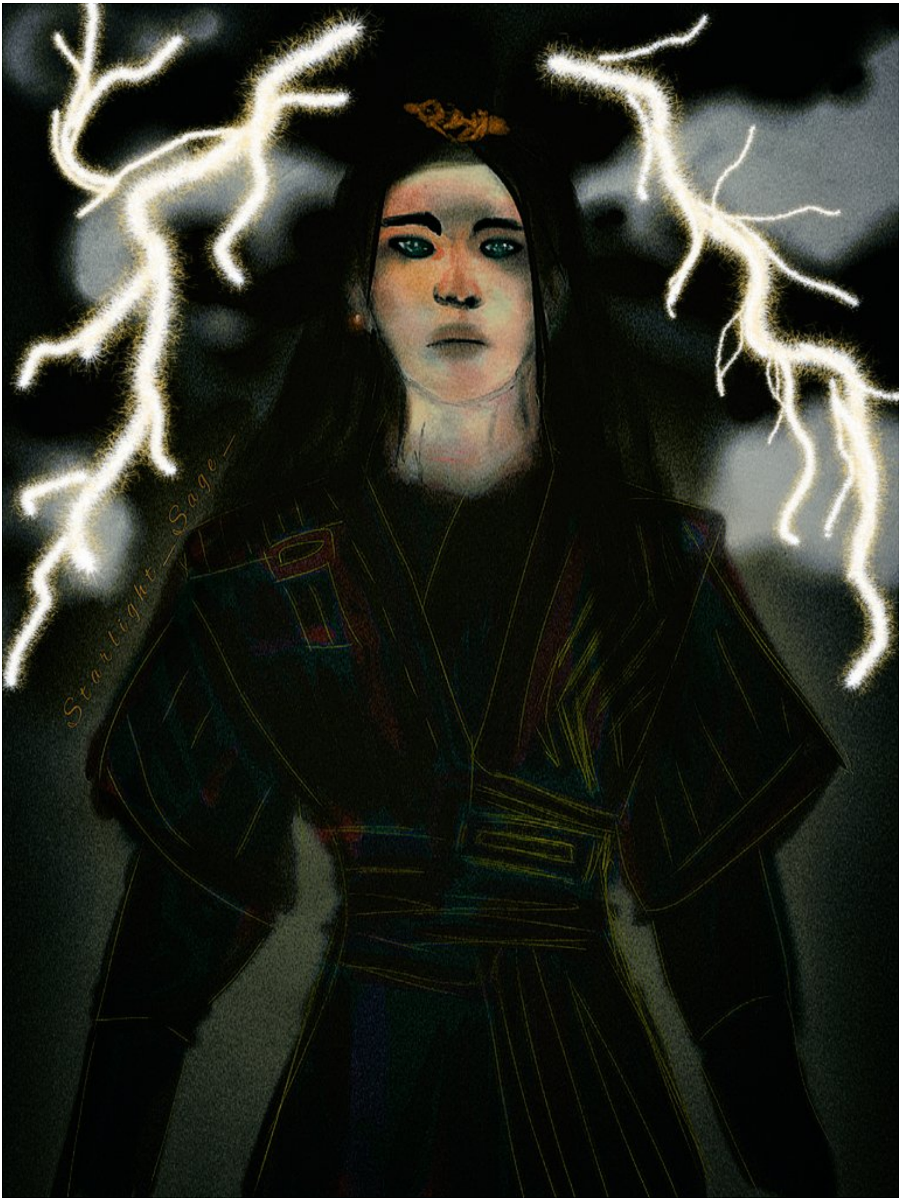
ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or reuse.



Starlight_Sage_

CREDIT: SAGE

[image]

CREDIT: FAE

Chapter End Notes

Thank you guys so much for taking the time to read a million words of this story! I know it's a lot of time and effort to put aside to consume my work, and I'm so grateful! I couldn't do all of this without the kindness and support, I appreciate everyone who has been following this fic so much! I hope you all have a wonderful day, and please send birthday wishes to taizi dianxia!

xoxo, Evie

He Doesn't Tell Stories Anymore

Chapter Summary

> "...What's gotten into you?" His father asks, squeezing him tight. "Bad dream?"
>
> The little boy nods, refusing to lift his head from his shirt—hugging his father as tightly as he can.
>
> "You went away, and I couldn't f-find you a-again..."
>
> Mu Shen shakes his head, lifting the boy to his feet. "I'd never leave any of you, A-Qing, you know that."

Chapter Notes

> !!!IMPORTANT CONTENT WARNINGS!!!
>
> This entire chapter focuses heavily on complex trauma, child abuse, childhood sexual abuse, and the aftermath in ways that could be seriously disturbing for some readers. No actual molestation or abuse is shown on screen, but it is heavily implied, and the results are shown in detail. It also focuses heavily on victim blaming. For those who need to skip, you can safely read the scene with Mu Qing and his father, then should stop reading the chapter at the point where the woman arrives in the market. I will place a summary at the end of the chapter for those who need to skip. Thank you!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

It's warm.

It's quiet.

Everything is soft and easy around him.

There's the sound of a fire in the hearth. The lazy woofs of a dog outside.

Soft leather presses against his cheek, cracked and familiar, pushing his hair behind his ears.

"A-Qing..." A voice scolds without bite, "I keep telling you not to sleep here."

The little boy groans, curled up into a ball beneath the window, enjoying a warm patch of sun.

"Just a little longer, baba..."

His father's laugh is indulgent, filled with warmth.

At some point, Mu Qing forgot the sound of it.

Now, it makes him sit up, lifting his arms frantically as he crawls into the man's lap, holding him tight.

He smells like pine and sawdust from long days in the mill, and when his arms wrap around his son—

It's safe. So safe.

"...What's gotten into you?" His father asks, squeezing him tight. "Bad dream?"

The little boy nods, refusing to lift his head from his shirt—hugging his father as tightly as he can.

"You went away, and I couldn't f-find you a-again..."

Mu Shen shakes his head, lifting the boy to his feet. "I'd never leave any of you, A-Qing, you know that."

Mu Qing does know, holding his father's hand tightly as he follows him out the door.

His father is the smartest, the bravest. Smiles the widest and laughs the warmest.

And Mu Qing loves him.

Loves him so much, he doesn't know how to talk about him when he's gone.

Doesn't know how to answer his little sisters when they ask him what their father was like.

They could never ask their mother without making her weep.

All Mu Qing could do was hold them, and say he was sorry.

Sorry, because his embrace could never feel as safe as their father's arms.

Mu Qing had so many memories of him, and they had so little.

"Why don't you help me, then?" His father murmurs, setting him down.

It's easy, being in this memory. Back when everything was green and golden, carrying a stack of firewood nearly as tall as he is, helping his father fill the tinder box to the brim.

Back before they worked in golden palaces, surrounded by fake smiles and sharp tongues.

Back when his father was a wood cutter, and Mu Qing had never wandered further than the forest surrounding his village.

Helping his father set traps for rabbits and wild hens, hiding in trees as Mu Shen looked for him, snarling like a make-believe monster.

And nothing ever hurt more than he could stand, even when it felt like the entire world at the time.

Holding back tears as he walked up the hill to their house, only for his father to kneel down and squeeze his shoulders.

"A-Qing—what's wrong?"

It was some trivial thing—the butcher's sons picking on him because he was small for his age.

"A-and t-they s-said I w-was…"

"Shhh…" his father hushes him, stroking his hair. "Take your time to get the words out, it doesn't matter how long it takes you to say it—I'll listen."

Mu Qing swallows thickly, his face blotchy and red.

"They…" He screws up his mouth, forcing himself to slow down and sound out each word. "Said I…was…was s-stupid…"

"What?" His father's eyebrows raise. "Why would they say something silly like that?"

"Can't…t- talk…"

Mu Shen frowns, pushing the boy's hair behind his ears.

"You know that's not true. Mu Qing—look at me."

When his son doesn't comply, Mu Shen taps his fingers under his chin, making him look up.

"Your thoughts just move faster than your mouth does, that's all."

Mu Qing shakes his head, eyes shining with tears.

"Y-you a-always…"

"Shhhh…" his father hushes him gently, reminding him to slow down, and Mu Qing takes a deep breath.

"You…always…say that…"

"Because it's true," Mu Shen murmurs. "You're brilliant , A-Qing."

The boy grows silent, disbelieving, and his father sighs—sitting back in the grass as he pulls his son into his lap.

Part of him knows that he should be old enough not to be held like a little kid anymore—but Mu Qing rests his cheek against his shoulder anyway, holding on tight.

Part of him doesn't ever want to grow up. Wants to stay here, when he would catch fireflies in his hands to show his sisters. When he could ride on his father's back if he got tired on the walk home.

He doesn't ever want to grow too old for this.

"…You know why they pick on you, don't you?" His father murmurs, stroking his fingers through the boy's hair.

"I'm st…d-dumb…"

"No," Mu Shen shakes his head. "Because you're special."

"I'm n-not—"

"You are," his father's voice is firm. "You have no idea."

If Mu Qing is special, he doesn't have reason to think it'll be in a good way.

“The others…t-think I’m…a c-cry baby who…gets m-mad too…too easy…” he mumbles, only for his father to hold him tighter.

“That’s just because you care. Never be sorry for caring so much.”

He scratches the back of Mu Qing’s head gently—something he’s done ever since the boy was small, soothing him after a tantrum, or helping him back to sleep after a nightmare.

“And it might be hard for some of the children in the village—seeing how special you are.”

“W…Why?”

“…Because you could be anything you want to be,” Mu Shen explains carefully. “You could do incredible things, Mu Qing. Not everyone is blessed with so much talent.”

They used to say that about Mu Qing’s father, years ago.

He’s heard the stories.

That his father was one of the brightest young men in their village. That he even went to the Royal capital as a teenager, hoping to cultivate on Mount Taicang.

The details on why it didn’t work out were always carefully kept out, when he was young.

Just that it had something to do with the daughter of a wealthy man—and that his father wasn’t welcome in the capital any longer.

As a cultivator, or anything else.

“…What about you?” Mu Qing whispers, his cheek slightly warm and numb from resting on the bone of his shoulder.

“Hmm?”

“You’re special,” he points out. “You could be anything you wanted to be too, baba.”

Mu Shen blows out a harsh breath, thinking.

“…There’s nowhere I’d rather be, or anything else I’d rather be doing than being right here, with my son.” He answers easily. “It’s the most important thing I’ll ever do.”

Mu Qing blows his bangs out of his forehead, mimicking his father's breathing on a moment of biting sarcasm, and Mu Shen smiles.

"Say it."

"Huh?"

"Say that you're important."

He should have appreciated it more, back then.

How lucky he was, to be loved so much.

"Baba…" he groans, squirming.

"I'm not letting go until you say it."

"…'M important…" he mumbles, red around the ears.

"And smart."

There's another groan, and Mu Shen chuckles.

"What's this, you don't think my son is smart?!"

He gasps, faking offense. "I'll have to defend his honor!"

Peals of giggles erupt from Mu Qing's throat as his father tickles his sides.

"I-I'm smart, okay?! I'm smart!"

"And adorable!"

"Baba!"

"What?! You insult my son again?!"

"I AM your son!"

"Are you really?" His father teases. "I could have sworn my Mu Qing was taller."

The child squawks in indignation, and the two fall back onto the grass, play wrestling and laughing.

"There's my little tiger!"

They've done this countless times—and it always works.

Mu Qing's tears are always forgotten as they lay in the grass, counting the stars, his father pointing out the constellations as his little sisters wander out to join them, comfortable and sleepy on warm summer nights.

Nights so clear, the stars look close enough to touch.

His father whispers for them to hold on tight to the grass, to make sure they don't float away.

And Mu Qing is old enough to know better—but he still holds on so tightly.

"...Baba?" He whispers, lips trembling in the dark.

"What is it, A-Qing?"

"...Don't let go.”

He rolls over, grasping the front of his father's robes.

Why did you let go?

"Don't let go!" Mu Qing sobs, holding on as tightly as he can, but...

Every time he has this dream, he's never able to stop it.

There's a flash in the corner of his eye, and when he turns his head—

He's standing in the middle of the market in his village, holding a basket as his mother picks out vegetables from a nearby stand.

But there's always something in the memory that doesn't seem right. That sets his teeth on edge.

A woman who doesn't belong.

Dressed in silk robes, with pearls dangling from her ears, and gem encrusted combs in her hair.

Watching him, her gaze painfully intent.

Mu Qing was only ten years old, but even then, the hairs on the back of his neck began to stand up.

He takes one step back, then another, reaching for his mother's skirts.

"...Mama?" He mumbles, tugging again. "Why is that lady staring?"

Mu Qing’s mother follows his gaze—and when she sees the strange woman across the square…

Her face grows pale.

“Mama?”

She grabs his hand, clutching it tightly.

“We’re leaving.”

“But I don’t—?”

“ Now ,” she mutters, dragging him from the market without another word.

He never saw his father again, after that.

Mu Qing wasn’t there when they took him. His mother couldn’t look him in the eye and say where he had gone.

Not back then.

But when he found her in their bedroom, weeping as she clung to his father’s coat—

Mu Qing knew he was gone.

And that was the moment that he stopped being a child.

Right then, watching his mother weep, he felt something inside of him die.

He couldn't be blissfully unaware anymore. Not after that.

Every moment of every day he was watching. Thinking. Worrying.

Learning how to mend clothes while his mother went to work in the Inn. How to make meals for his sisters when she took another job in the local wash house.

But with so many mouths to feed, and not enough money to go around...he saw his mother grow desperate.

Taking the only job available that could pay what they needed —and Mu Qing couldn't understand why she seemed so pale and frightened at the time.

"...We have to live in the house?" He asks, sending their home a reluctant last look, his pack weighing heavily against his back.

His mother strokes the back of his neck in an effort to soothe him, but —

Her fingers tremble.

"You and Suyin are old enough to work now," she whispers. "They want both of you, too. Nothing difficult. Just to help with the washing —you two already know how to do that."

Back then, Mu Qing believed her.

Now, watching this memory in replay, he knows better.

Knows all too well the sting of terror that will strike his body when they walk into a palace for the first time, his sister holding his hand tightly.

Seeing that the woman of the house was the same one from the market, that day.

Standing at the top of the steps, pale and drawn, watching them with a gaunt expression--her hand tightly gripping the banister of the stairs, knuckles white.

Watching all of them with silent horror—

But no one quite so much as Mu Qing, her eyes haunting his every move.

Darkness falls across the room, shrouding his mother. His sisters. The other servants.

Leaving only Mu Qing, at the bottom of the steps—and her at the top.

He hated her.

Mu Qing thinks he hated her almost as much, if not more than he hated him .

Because he left scars on Mu Qing, on his family, that could never go away.

But she was the one who came looking for them. Who led the monster to their doorstep and fed them to it.

"...I never felt sorry for you," Mu Qing admits quietly. "Everyone else did. But I found you repulsive."

Because she was so willing to accept pity and sympathy, but, at the same time...

The room around them melts and warps, reshaping itself into one of the palace sitting rooms.

Mu Qing is eleven, and everything hurts, inside and out.

In ways he's too agonized to give name or meaning to. If he does, he thinks he might try to crawl out of his own skin.

"...Mu Qing, was it?" The lady of the house asks quietly.

She has a brittle voice, weak in pitch.

The guards hang over her, flitting to fulfill her every want and need. So careful with her, like she might break.

The bruises peeking from the collar of her dress imply vulnerability. They draw pity.

Mu Qing's are worse.

"You know it's important not to lie, don't you?"

She speaks as if he’s some sort of ignorant child.

As if a child could ever conceive of making an accusation like that without reason.

“Because my husband is an important man. My brother-in-law is a very important man. You know that, don’t you?”

Mu Qing’s hands hurt.

They hurt, because his skin is dry and cracked from scrubbing the floor. Because his knuckles are bruised from breaking the nose of another servant his age who tried to pull his sister’s hair.

But his nails hurt the most. Ripped and torn. From…from…

"…He hurt me." Mu Qing repeats firmly, fighting back the bile in his throat.

"It's not a crime to strike servants," she points out softly. "Or wives, for that matter."

His fingers start to dig into the edges of his chair—and the pain shocks him enough to flinch.

"…I don't think what he d-did is the same." Mu Qing mutters, and he —

He's trying really hard to be brave.

But—

"Alright." She stares him down, taking a sip of tea. "Shall I call him here, and you can explain exactly what you think the problem is?"

The child grows pale.

"…H-he has t-to…b-be…in the-the r-r-room—?" He spits out, teeth chattering, but—

"Can someone find the boy's mother?" The lady of the house sighs, looking towards one of the guards. "She should be just outside. I'd rather deal with someone who can speak properly."

Mu Qing's mouth twists as his face burns with humiliation.

"I…c-can… talk …—"

"Sweetheart," his mother steps in the room, wiping her hands on her apron before she places them on his shoulders, squeezing gently. "What's going on?"

Mu Qing can't look at her, his shoulder hunching under her hands.

"...He's been making very serious accusations against my husband," their mistress explains, setting her cup of tea down. "But he won't speak clearly or tell us exactly what happened."

His mother grows silent for a moment, then bows her hand—but her hands are still tight on Mu Qing's shoulders.

Staring at his nails, bleeding against the edges of the chair.

"...Forgive me miss," She murmurs. "I've been told I'm a bit slow. But how could he be making serious accusations if he hasn't even told you what happened?"

The lady of the house leans back, her lips pressing together tightly, growing thin with frustration.

"Because he's implied that it's something that should be reported to the authorities, but he won't explain how. What can we be expected to do with such information?"

Mu Qing's mother doesn't say anything for a moment, sending her a look of—

Of such disgust .

So palpable—

It actually makes her avert her eyes with a flicker of shame.

Mu Qing swallows hard as his mother kneels down beside him, gently pulling his hand from the edge of the chair, squeezing it gently.

"What is it you want to tell them? It's alright."

Still—her son won't look at her. Only through the corner of his eye, peeking through his lashes, and when he does—

He can see that his mother is terrified .

Even as she says reassuring words, holding his hand in a show of support. She might even be trying to hide it, but...

It was made very clear upon their arrival that the Qi family hiring them was an act of great charity. That no one else would take the single mother of six, widow of a disgraced man.

If he tells the truth, at best they'll end up on the streets, left to starve.

At worst ...

Mu Qing and his mother could end up...

"..." He hangs his head, pulling his hand out of her grip.

"Mu Qing?" She prompts him again quietly, waiting.

And it's not just for the sake of their survival either, it's—

It’s the sort of thing that you never forget, once you know.

Mu Qing doesn’t want that to be the only thing his mother thinks about, when she thinks of him. He doesn’t want her to feel like she let him down. Doesn’t want it to make her feel as bad as he already does.

“…” She stares at his face, waiting, but when it becomes clear that he isn’t going to say…

She hangs her head, clearing her throat.

“…Apologies, miss. It’s been hard since his father passed…he…” her voice is strained. “He likes making up stories, sometimes.”

Mu Qing does lie sometimes.

He lies about why he does things, about where he was, and what he was doing.

But he would never lie about that , he—

He doesn’t even have a word for what happened, doesn’t understand what it is —

How could he lie about it?

“…It’s alright,” the noblewoman sighs, reaching for her tea once more. “It’s normal for children to act out when they’re grieving. He probably doesn’t even realize that he’s doing it, but—”

Her eyes cut to Mu Qing, shrouded with emotions that he could never understand.

“…You should be careful, boy. Keep making up stories, and no one will believe you when you’re telling the truth.”

Mu Qing has a monster in his chest.

Placed there by a beast of a different kind.

It’s dark, jagged, and ugly. Angry and vindictive.

He feels it there, now.

The spines of its tail digging into him as it coils with fury.

But he wasn't born with the privilege of letting it out, the way his masters do.

Mu Qing's monster is on a leash, locked away as he sits there, silent and still.

But inside, it howls .

It's there when he's at the foot of the stairs, scrubbing the floors until his shoulders ache from exertion. Until he can't feel his fingers.

He doesn't look up, doesn't pause or shift his movement as others walk past.

Invisibility is an art he's carefully practiced, and he wears it like a shroud.

Until one of the servants inevitably places a hand on his shoulder, telling him that someone wants him to clean the floors in the library.

He always has to be asked twice.

He always stops and stares at the door from the end of the hallway, wishing it would just stretch on forever instead of getting closer.

Mu Qing will never hate another room so much.

He knows the wood grain in the ceiling by heart. Has memorized the tiniest tears in the silk lining of the couch by the window.

Even eight centuries later, he could still tell you exactly what the books smelled like. Which floorboards creaked and which remained silent.

There are other things he could tell you, but he never would.

Mu Qing doesn't tell stories anymore, real or make believe.

He always leaves the door wide open behind him, desperately hoping that no one will shut it.

Someone always does.

But Mu Qing doesn't tell anymore.

Every time the door shuts, the monster gets bigger. Angrier. Louder.

With sharp claws and jagged teeth.

“Why would you hit him?” His mother asks, dabbing a cool cloth against a swelling black eye.

“I don’t know.”

His words are always hollow.

“You broke his jaw , Mu Qing.”

He’s never gotten along with the other boys who work in the kitchens and stables—

But now, he doesn’t just use his words when he’s angry.

Now, someone doesn’t have to hurt him for him to hit back.

Mu Qing hits first, and he hits harder.

Sometimes, because feeling something break under his hands makes the monster in his chest grow quiet and sated, and he goes from angry to numb.

Sometimes, because someone moved too quickly near his face. Walked behind him without warning.

Tried to touch him.

But sometimes, the monster slips through, wearing his face to hide its teeth. His hands hide its claws.

“Mu Qing…” his mother shakes his shoulder insistently. “I’ve let you sleep as long as I can, it’s time to get up now…”

Her son doesn’t answer.

His face is pressed into the pillow, desperately clinging onto a dream.

One where familiar leather gloves press against his face, gently rousing him from the floor.

Where arms hold him close, safe, so safe—

And no one ever lets go of the grass.

“Mu Qing!” His mother pleads.

“If you’re late another day this week, they’re going to start docking our pay. We’re still paying for the doctor after your sister had that fever, please —”

“No,” he mumbles, shaking her off, pulling the blanket over his head.

“…What?”

“I’m not going.”

“Mu Qing, you have to—”

“No!” He whimpers, his voice sharply younger than he actually is, tears rushing down his cheeks as he hides behind blankets, desperately trying to remember the sound of that voice, before it rushes away into a dream.

‘ You’re so special , Mu Qing.’

“Mu Qing, I—" her voice grows firm, trying to order him out of bed in a final desperate try, grabbing his wrist and pulling. “You get up this instant—!”

“NO!”

He screams, but it’s not him.

His arms strike out blindly, but those claws aren’t his.

“DON’T TOUCH ME!”

His throat is dry, raw from a monster’s roar taking flight through a child’s voice.

“DON’T TOUCH ME! DON’T TOUCH ME! DON’T TOUCH—!”

THUD!

Something hits the floor loudly, and he’s left lying there, nauseous and disoriented for the first three heartbeats, chest heaving.

But when he realizes what he’s done, it’s so much worse.

“… Mom!” He croaks, crawling out of bed in a trembling mass of limbs.

Finding her knocked to the ground, cheek swelling, nose bloodied.

And Mu Qing can't breathe. Can't think .

His chest is galloping, rising and falling too fast for his lungs to get any air, hyperventilation setting in as he weeps soundlessly, throwing his arms around her middle.

"I-I'm s-s-sorry!"

It's almost impossible to decipher the words coming out of his mouth.

Part of her doesn't even try to.

Holding him close, rocking on the floor with him in her arms.

She asks him again.

Asks him what's happening.

If that man is hurting him.

Mu Qing whispers yes , but he won't say how .

He doesn't tell stories anymore.

"…I'll get us out of here, sweetheart." She promises him, hugging him close, kissing his hair. "I'm looking for another place, I promise."

Mu Qing doesn't move. Doesn't lift his cheek from her shoulder.

They told the others he was sick today.

In part that's true.

"…Why did we even come here?" He whispers hoarsely.

"They…they were the only place that would take us, after your father —"

"After he what?!" Mu Qing weeps, his chest too small to hold what lurks inside of it.

It was something she had wanted to explain when he was older.

"Mu Qing, it's not…"

"What?! Why were they the only ones who would take us?! Why was that woman here the day he disappeared?!" Mu Qing presses, his heart aching and stricken. "Why didn't he come back?!"

"…He didn't disappear, Mu Qing, he never would have left us—"

"Then why did he?!"

"…" His mother hangs her head, left without a choice. "…He was arrested, Mu Qing."

His stomach plunges—and it never stops falling.

He's known for months that his father was never coming back. But—

That takes on a very different meaning now.

"…He wasn't a criminal—"

"I know ," She agrees.

"Then I don't understand—!"

"You know the lady of the house hates Lord Qi," Mu Qing's mother mutters, wary. "She rushed into a marriage with him to find favor."

"…But her sister is the queen! Why would she need—?!"

"Because when you're a rich young woman—there are things you just can't do, Mu Qing. Especially when your sister is being courted by a prince. And—" his mother grits her teeth with anger and disgust. "She couldn't be caught dallying with a disciple with nothing to his name."

Mu Qing leans back suddenly, staring up at her in shocked horror. "Why would he have anything to do with an evil hag like her?!"

His mother sighs, not necessarily disagreeing, but…

"People change, Mu Qing. Especially when life is unkind to them. I'm sure she was enchanting back then."

Mu Qing remembers the look in her eye, when he tried to tell the truth—and he struggles to believe that.

"And when there was proof of the affair she couldn't deny…"

His mother grimaces. "No one was willing to have her. Queen's sister or not. And for Lord Qi to be willing to take her…she had to tell a horrible lie about your father to absolve herself of any blame. He had to leave the capital after that, he didn't have a choice."

"…But…" Mu Qing bites back nausea, focusing on the memory of his father's face.

The kind, gentle, loving man that he knew.

"…You're sure she was lying?"

She bites her lip, resting her cheek on top of Mu Qing's head.

"When he told the story—I felt doubts at first," she admits softly. "When a man says that—it's usually to excuse his own actions. But… he had love letters. Favors she had given him. And when she came to the village…Mu Qing, she wanted your father to take her away."

Assuming that the bright, promising young man she knew would have the means to help her, a decade later.

Only to find him living a simple life with a wife and children—still without much wealth to his name, but content.

And he wasn't willing to abandon that for her .

Mu Qing doesn't need to ask the rest.

Lord Qi must have followed her—because that's what he does.

When he found his wife looking for an old flame—she was forced to choose between telling the truth, or avoiding his wrath.

And Mu Qing's father was taken the very same day.

"…But…" Mu Qing swallows hard, struggling to wrap his mind around the thought that his father could be gone, all for something so—so—

"If he knew there was a horrible story like that about him in the capital, why didn't he run further? Then they wouldn't have found him!"

"…Because he met me," Mu Qing's mother admits. "I offered to leave with him, but…"

She doesn't want to say it, because she knows how it will sound .

And maybe, if Mu Qing was still living the life he'd had a year ago, he wouldn't be able to understand on his own.

Because it might seem romantic when you read stories about couples running off together—but that isn't actually how it works.

It costs money, starting over in a new place. And two young people can endure the strife, but—

When there's an infant involved, it's complicated.

Mu Qing's father couldn't flee because of him .

He was trapped in that village because of him .

He died because of—

"But one of the other maids knows a farmer in the country looking for a wife," his mother mutters, her brow pinched. "He doesn't have any children of his own, so he might..."

It's a shot in the dark.

Mu Qing is an asset—a strong young man who can work—

But no one wants a widow with five small daughters.

"...Was she just going to leave Qi Rong behind?" Mu Qing asks suddenly.

"What?"

His mother is wary, wishing he would just let the subject go.

"You said she came to the village because she wanted Baba to take her away—but Qi Rong wasn't there that day." Mu Qing frowns.

His limbs still feel a little numb, in the wake of his breakdown—head aching.

"She was just gonna leave him?"

Qi Rong is a brat, and Mu Qing never liked him—but he's also little , little enough to need his mother around.

Even he doesn't deserve to be left behind by his own mother.

“…Not every mother is the same,” she murmurs, hugging him tight.

“Not all of them love their children the way they should.” Her grip turns even more fierce, rocking back and forth with Mu Qing in her arms, like she did when he was small. “It doesn’t matter what her plan was—it was never going to happen.”

Mu Qing hugs her back, his arms loose and tired around her neck.

“…I hate them,” he admits quietly. “I hate them all.”

There was a time when his mother tried to tell him not to hate anyone.

Now, she just holds him even tighter.

“I wish they were all dead .”

“…I know,” his mother admits, the bruise on her cheek darkening with every passing moment. “But you don’t beat men like that, Mu Qing.”

Not when you’re people like them , anyway.

“You survive them.”

Tears roll down Mu Qing’s cheek silently—

And he doesn’t think he wants to.

There are moments when he pretends he doesn’t make it. That he’s turned into a ghost, and no one can see him unless he wants them to. No one can hurt him anymore, he’s already gone.

It makes the days bearable, but some things could never be.

“…Gege?”

Suyin is sitting beside him, holding a cup of nails as he replaces a dry rotted piece of wood from the window frame.

“What is it?”

Mu Qing likes work like this. The kind that leaves his mind occupied, hands busy.

“…I don’t want to clean the library anymore.”

The hammer doesn’t fall, and his hands grow still.

“…I know I have to be a big girl now,” Suyin whispers, her nose chapped, eyes red and framed with dark circles. “But I don’t wanna do that.”

Suyin might be the second eldest—

But she’s years younger than him.

“…” Mu Qing lowers the hammer slowly, setting it on the grass. “Why?”

“…It’s s…scary,” she whispers, “A-and it…u-um…”

Arms wrap around Suyin, hugging her tight.

“Shhhhh…” her older brother hushes her softly. “You can take your time to get the words out.”

Suyin lays her head against his shoulder—tired.

“I’ll always listen.”

She bites her lip, arms wrapping around his neck.

“It’s…scary,” she rasps, lips dry. “And…it…it…hurts.”

Mu Qing grows silent, arms holding her almost painfully tight.

“…Does anyone else know?”

Suyin shakes her head.

“…He said he would hurt Mama…”

She’s shivering with fear, clearly worried that he might hurt Mu Qing, too.

It’s far too late for that.

“…He won’t.” Her brother promises. “You don’t have to clean the library anymore.”

She looks up at him, confused, but—

Mu Qing kisses her forehead, ruffling her hair.

“Go play,” he urges her quietly, nodding towards the other children at the bottom of the hill. “Gege will take care of it.”

Slowly, reluctantly, she does as he says.

Mu Qing has said the same thing about bullies before. Or monsters under the bed.

In the end, she supposes this isn’t that different.

Mu Qing stares at the hammer in his palm, mind spinning in countless directions, settling on one thought.

He won’t let anyone call Suyin a liar.

He doesn’t really think after that. There aren’t conscious decisions. Memories turn into flashes.

Setting the hammer down on the kitchen table, trading it for a knife.

The sharpest one. The one they use for slicing bone.

He wraps it carefully in cloth, making sure it won’t cut him, when he hides it under his shirt.

It’ll be found if he puts it anywhere else.

He goes to clean the library—for the first time without being asked twice.

Mu Qing leaves the door standing wide open.

Eventually, someone comes to shut it.

It’s different, this time.

The lady of the house isn’t home tonight.

It’s longer, and he falls asleep after—not even going back to his chambers.

Sprawled on that couch, one arm thrown carelessly across his ribs.

Blissfully unaware.

Mu Qing thought it would be hard. He remembers that. Puzzling around with the idea in his head. What it would mean, doing that to another person.

But he wasn’t a person at all.

People don’t do the things that he did. They don’t feel nothing, when a child begs them to stop.

Monsters do.

He wasn’t a person at all, and it wasn’t hard for Mu Qing to draw the knife across his throat in a quick, clean line—blood spraying.

It wasn’t hard for Mu Qing to watch as his eyes snapped open, soundlessly clutching at his throat, gesturing for the boy to fetch help.

It wasn’t hard for Mu Qing to sit down and wait for his hand to fall limp, and his eyes to slip shut.

It wasn’t hard for Mu Qing to clean up the floor after. Refilling the bucket over and over. Using countless rags. Never looking up from the task at hand.

Even as the body grows cold, and the blood sinks deep into the lining of the couch.

Mu Qing leaves the floor spotless.

But he doesn’t move the body, and he doesn’t clean himself.

He goes to the kitchens—cleans the knife before putting it back exactly where he found it.

Finishes the rest of the dishes, while he’s there.

Then he pulls back a chair from the kitchen table, and he waits.

Half an hour later, the door opens—

And green eyes stare up at Mu Qing, baffled.

“…M’ hungry,” he mumbles, slightly unsure.

The older child seems shell shocked—almost like he doesn’t really see Qi Rong at first, but…

“…Okay,” he rasps, rising from his chair.

It’s harder to move, as the adrenaline fades—but he reheats rice from last night’s meal, giving the boy a warm glass of milk.

He eats quietly, watching Mu Qing with wide eyes, and he asks no questions.

No one in this house ever does.

He’s back off to bed not long after, and Mu Qing waits.

Waits until a maid notices someone left a candle burning in the library.

Listens to the scream as she calls for the guards.

Unsure of what to do—they call for someone more senior.

An officer from the Royal Palace.

Jian Ming has never seen a scene like it.

Not a robbery, or the brutal beating he would expect from a crime of passion.

Someone cleaned the floor, but made no effort to hide the body—or even move it from the couch.

There’s no weapon to be found.

But it’s not difficult to discern what happened when they find a boy in the kitchen—hands, face, and shirt splattered with blood.

Sitting in a chair, looking up politely when the guards call his name.

He steps down from the chair, and when his legs wobble…

Jian Ming crouches beside him, reaching out to touch the boy’s arm—only for Mu Qing to scramble backwards, falling against the chair with a clatter.

That’s when the officer notices his wrists.

Beneath the dried blood, are large, viciously purple bruises.

Shaped like fingers.

He pulls his hand back, his fingers curling into a fist—and his next order makes the soldiers he brought with him pause, staring up at him in confusion.

“Call for a doctor.”

“…Sir…” One of them frowns, glancing towards the staircase. “That can’t help Lord Qi now…”

Jian Ming shakes his head, sitting on the floor—keeping a careful distance from the child.

“Not for him.”

The soldiers look at each other, baffled—but as they move to obey, their commander gives one more chilling order—

“Make sure it’s a woman.”

He doesn’t try to touch Mu Qing again. Just slides a cup of water to him, coaxing him until he drinks one sip at a time, quietly ordering the soldiers to not let any of the other servants leave.

Effectively locking the palace down.

The doctor comes not long after.

She’s young, with freckles around the corners of her eyes and ink-stained fingertips.

Eventually she lifts Mu Qing into her arms when she notices that walking pains him—

And it’s only then that the boy remembers he’s still young enough to be carried.

She takes him to a private room—and it takes time for him to let her look. Nearly an hour of gentle coaxing and reassurance.

That no one else is going to see. That she won’t tell his mother.

That she and his sisters won’t be in any trouble.

And when he finally relents—

Her hands are steady. Her face is carefully trained to be calm, gently reassuring him as she peels layers of terror and shame apart.

The first time he can remember being touched by a stranger without fear—and it was by a doctor.

There are places where she has to open her kit, treating his injuries with careful precision.

He's been hurt like this before—but he didn't know it was something you needed a doctor for.

The pain is bearable, now.

She gives him something to drink—something to keep him calm.

He thinks she was hoping it would help him fall asleep—but he still hears the voices outside the door when she leaves.

Hears her break down and weep, leaning back against the door—trying to keep quiet.

Mu Qing hears, but doesn't understand what there is to cry about.

Listens as she chokes out explanations to Jian Ming—using terms like ' scar tissue' and ' long term damage.'

Jian Ming asks if she thinks Mu Qing will make it, and he doesn't understand what that means—because he isn't dying.

Even if it feels like it, sometimes.

She says that she doesn't know, but children that age can be resilient.

Mu Qing doesn't think he is.

The lady of the house doesn't scream or weep when she comes home. Doesn't ask what happened.

She doesn't need to.

The only question she asks is for Jian Ming.

Asking what they're going to do with the boy .

"…I think it's in everyone's best interest if we call it a robbery," Jian Ming murmurs. "Send him and his family back to the village. He doesn't need to stay around this."

"…You're suggesting we just let him go?" She hisses. "Do you have any idea who my sister is—?”

“Do you think I would have left my wife’s bed to come here on your account?” Jian Ming glares. “Of course, I know who she is.”

“You—!”

“I also know that the condition of your brother-in-law allowing you to live in the lifestyle that you do was that no more children could work in this house.” Jian Ming glances around them as she grows silent. “I’ve counted thirteen in the servant’s quarters since I arrived.”

Mu Qing will remember the words that echoed from underneath the crack in the door for as long as he lives, and long after.

“They’re the maids’ children, and most of them were too young for him anyway, you don’t understand—”

Too young for him anyway.

“You’re foul.”

“If it wasn’t their children, it would have been mine!” She pleads. “I didn’t know what else to do—”

“But now you…what? Want me to throw the boy in a cell? Cut off his head?”

“If he isn’t punished, people will wonder , they’ll talk —they’ll all think that I—!”

“You did.”

The steps back, her hands balling into fists, teeth clenched.

“You…you can’t treat me like this! My sister is—if they find out what you’ve done— both of you will be lucky if you still have your lives—”

“Try it,” the doctor snarls. “And I’ll tell anyone who will listen.”

Lady Qi glares, pulling her hand back as if to strike her. “Don’t forget who you’re addressing , you filthy little—!”

The doctor catches her wrist, shoving her aside.

“I’m addressing a woman who used defenseless children to protect her own reputation.” She hisses.

"And do you really think Captain Jian was silly enough to send for a country doctor for something like this? General Feng is my uncle. Still think you can kill me to keep me quiet?"

She falls silent, taking a step back from them both—and Jian Ming crosses his arms.

"I report directly to the general as well."

And it's a known fact—the King trusts no one as much as General Feng, not even his wife.

"Forget about keeping this quiet—you'll be lucky if he doesn't put you and the boy out on the streets after this." He mutters.

"He can barely stand the sight of you as it is."

Mu Qing listens, their voices swirling around in his head as sleep eventually takes him.

She doesn't get her way—he isn't thrown in cuffs or taken away for execution.

But Captain Jian doesn't get his either.

The royal family has enemies, after all.

No one has the stomach to kill a child to keep it quiet, but…

What's the harm in keeping him in the Royal palace kitchens? It's certainly an improvement from what his life was like before.

A mercy.

A fresh start.

In some ways, it is.

No one is hurting him anymore. The doctor from that night visits. Brings him cakes to take home to his sisters.

"…Did Captain Jian think I was gonna die?"

"Hmm?"

"He asked you if I was going to make it," Mu Qing mumbles, fiddling with a frayed sleeve.

"…" Doctor Feng is quiet for a moment, testing the reflexes in his foot. "You might not have felt it at the time, but you were badly hurt, Mu Qing. Over time, it could have..."

"…But is that what he meant, when he asked?"

Mu Qing doesn't know why she still visits.

She might just care—she seems kind. He trusts her.

But strangers don't help without a reason.

It might just be to make sure he doesn't tell anyone.

She sighs, patting his knee as she sits back.

"…I wish I could say what happened to you was rare."

But it isn't.

He was just the first one who made her cry —

Because he kept apologizing about the couch.

He knew it was ruined, because he hadn't been able to move Lord Qi before the blood sank in.

He was too heavy.

"…You still…have a lot of pain over what happened, don't you?"

Mu Qing doesn't look at her—but he nods.

Doctor Feng's expression is grim.

"…Sometimes, when that happens to a child—they get so sad, and they think they'll always feel that way. And…they give up."

"…But I won't?"

"Won't what?"

"Always feel this way," Mu Qing croaks, lips quivering.

"…Oh," Doctor Feng reaches for his hand, squeezing gently. "I don't think so. You're a tough kid. And someday—you're going to find something that makes you happy again," she promises.

"And when you do, no matter how small it is—you'll know everything is going to be alright. Even if it's hard."

Mu Qing's life has always been hard.

He just wishes that part of it, even a small part—didn't make him feel so bad.

"…I hope so," he whispers.

The women in the kitchens are so fond of him, always sneaking him extra food and pinching his cheeks.

Small things show up outside his door. Small stuffed animals. A golden foil.

Mu Qing never keeps them, taking them back to the palace guards instead.

Afraid of being a thief.

But one day, just as his feet are beginning to feel sure underneath him, just as the nightmares get less overwhelming—

It's all pulled out from under him again.

Not because Mu Qing said a word—but because others talk, and paranoia blooms.

That's how he ends up before the King in a private room. Trembling and stammering, promising that he wouldn't tell, he'd never tell—

And he isn't sure if what he's being offered is a bribe of silence, or a threat.

Maybe a shorter leash, even.

Until the day that segmented his entire life into two phases.

Before them, and after.

Walking behind the Queen like a little shadow, listening as she struggles to recall his name, offering—

"Mu Qing, your highness."

"…Ah, yes—thank you—Xie Lian, this is Mu Qing. He'll be looking after you from now on."

He takes a slow, shuddering breath—he used to work for his cousin, so he knows what to—

"Oh."

A voice calls out, and Mu Qing grows still.

"Hello, then—it's very nice to meet you."

Mu Qing had never met someone like that before.

So beautiful, it's hard to look them in the eye.

He's slightly shorter than Mu Qing, with fuller cheeks—with eyes that remind him of the sun shining across the River, just before sunrise.

He doesn't even try to speak, nodding his head sharply, but—

"Aren't you going to say hello? He's going to be with us every day."

"Oh…"

That's when he sees the boy standing beside the prince.

Older. Taller. Gangly. With deeply tanned skin, and a bruise on his cheek.

And he's giving Mu Qing a weird look, one that makes his stomach twist in a new, entirely unfamiliar way.

"...Nice to meet you."

Mu Qing's eyes linger for a moment—widening, and he looks down, swallowing down the heartbeat in his throat.

"…I promise I'll work hard."

The prince hums, looking back and forth between them for a moment —

Then reaches out, taking Mu Qing by the end of the arm.

"…Wanna see my room?"

The question is baffling, because in what world could he say no? But—

In an instant, they’re off.

Chapter End Notes

> SUMMARY OF CHAPTER: Outlines Mu Qing's childhood. After the scene in the market, his father disappears without explanation. He's moved into the palace of Qi Rong's family when his mother gets a job there, with him and his sister, Suyin, being old enough to work. He has increasing behavioral issues as he works there, and when he tries to tell Qi Rong's mother that he's being abused, he's called a liar and intimidated into silence. He lashes out at his mother, who tells him that his father and Lady Qi used to be lovers. She came to him that day to try and escape her abusive husband, and repeated her sexual assault allegations against him from when they were younger in order to have him arrested. Later on, Suyin tells Mu Qing that she's being abused. Mu Qing kills Lord Qi that night in response, Jian Lan's father is the guard from the palace sent to investigate. Feng Xin's cousin is a doctor who examines Mu Qing, and it's clear he was abused. He's moved into the palace as a servant to be monitored, and eventually assigned to Xie Lian as a bribe.
>
> Thanks!
> Evie

Don't Let Go of the Grass

Chapter Summary

“Do you like books?”

“…What?” He looks up, shocked.

“Books!” Xie Lian repeats, eyes round. “Feng Xin thinks they’re boring, he only likes it if I read to him, and he falls asleep sometimes. Do you like them?”

Mu Qing is an exception among the servants—he can read, his father taught him how.

“…I don’t know,” he admits. “I haven’t read many.”

“Oh…” Xie Lian frowns. “…Wanna borrow mine? What kind of stories do you like?”

Chapter Notes

CONTENT WARNINGS: this chapter still deals with complex PTSD, as well as the aftermath of childhood sexual abuse, victim blaming, and the like. While not as vivid regarding the childhood sexual abuse as the last chapter, reader discretion is advised.

The prince is sitting on the floor, items strewn around him, happily chatting away as Mu Qing sits beside him, unsure if this is what he’s supposed to be doing.

“Do you like books?”

“…What?” He looks up, shocked.

“Books!” Xie Lian repeats, eyes round. “Feng Xin thinks they’re boring, he only likes it if I read to him, and he falls asleep sometimes. Do you like them?”

Mu Qing is an exception among the servants—he can read, his father taught him how.

“…I don’t know,” he admits. “I haven’t read many.”

“Oh…” Xie Lian frowns. “…Wanna borrow mine? What kind of stories do you like?”

“I don’t…” Mu Qing looks away, squirming with discomfort, waiting for the show to drop.

For the prince to make fun of him—or, worse—pity him.

“…Right,” Xie Lian recalls, “you haven’t read many.”

He looks back at the stack of books, thinking.

“…Okay, you can start with my favorite. It’s got sword fights, dragons, ghosts—and the horse talks—”

“You like that one because there’s kissing ,” Feng Xin calls from where he’s lying on the edge of Xie Lian’s bed, hanging upside down to watch them both.

The prince makes a face, picking up a pillow to throw at him, his ears turning pinks.

“No!! It’s SWORD FIGHTS, Feng Xin!”

“Sure, sure—and not because the princess gets caught by the prince—while he’s flying on his dragon—and he looks deeply into her eyes as they miss while flying into the sunset—”

“The horse TALKS and there’s a secret treasure map and—kissing is gross, that’s the worst part!”

“…But all of your favorite books have kissing,” Feng Xin raises one eyebrow, bangs dangling away from his face, and Xie Lian’s jaw drops in mortification.

“Adventure books have kissing most of the time—why are you noticing that?!”

“Because your voice always gets squeaky when you read those parts, and it’s funny!”

Mu Qing clutches the book in question to his chest, looking deeply betrayed.

“…You’ve changed.” He sniffs, looking away.

“…Hah?!”

“It’s puberty.”

“Puberty?!” Feng Xin squawks.

“Mother said you were getting to an age where you were gonna start getting hairy and talking about girls. You’re already hairy, so I guess it was a matter of time—”

“I’m not HAIRY, dianxia, don’t say that!” Feng Xin cries, now equally mortified, eyes flickering to Mu Qing.

“It looks like you have small woodland creatures living under your arms!”

“N-No it doesn’t ! And I’m not talking about girls all the time, you KNOW they make me nervous—!”

“But now you’re trying to make my favorite books all about the kissing, and that’s just ONE SCENE—!”

“I like kissing.”

Both of the other boys stop, whipping their heads around to look at Mu Qing, who averts his eyes with discomfort.

“…In books,” he explains awkwardly. “I don’t mind if it’s in there.”

“See Feng Xin?” Xie Lian slams the book down in Mu Qing’s lap for emphasis.

“Us civilized gentlemen can read books with kissing and not make that the most important part!”

“I never said it was the most important —and—you’re about to start puberty too , y’know!”

“Nope, never.” Xie Lian shakes his head. “I’m not doing it. I don’t want to.”

“…Me neither,” Mu Qing agrees quietly, to which the prince gasps in delight—as though he’s won some sort of battle that Feng Xin has unwittingly dragged them into.

“See! Maybe he’ll cultivate on Mount Taicang with me!” He declares, flopping back on the ground.

“No girls, no kissing—none of that!”

“He already said he likes kissing,” Feng Xin grumbles, rolling his eyes when Mu Qing sends him a look.

“In books .”

“…At least I’m not hairy,” Mu Qing fired back with a slow, cautious little smirk.

“HEY—!”

Mu Qing discovers the first great love of his life: reading.

Devouring the first book Xie Lian loans him—then another, staying up by candlelight, eyes straining from exhaustion. Sometimes reading until it’s already time to wake the prince up for breakfast.

Then, a few months after—in a moment of genuine terror—Mu Qing finds the second.

“There’s nothing to be nervous about,” Xie Lian sighs, rolling back on top of his bed, slipping his boots off of his feet. “I already asked Guoshi, he said it was fine.”

Sure, he made some eye rolling comments about whether or not Mu Qing would be able to keep up, but he agreed.

The servant remains quiet and pale, carefully pulling pins from Xie Lian’s hair, brushing it out when it slips down around his shoulders.

“I know, dianxia.”

He knows, but He’s read the texts for new disciples—

And the word ‘chastity’ jumped out from the page like an angry beast. It’s been spinning around in his head ever since.

Does it count if he didn’t mean too? If he fails, is everyone going to know what happened?

“…Then what’s there to be so worried about?” Xie Lian tilts his head back. “You’re smart—and athletic, too. You’ll be fine, Mu Qing.”

But Mu Qing isn’t listening to him.

He’s listening to that achy, funny feeling in his chest. The familiar spine pricks of a monster’s tail.

Reliving every single thing in vivid detail, wondering if a line was crossed somewhere.

"Mu Qing?"

If it matters that he asked for it to stop. If it matters that he ripped his hands apart, trying to get away.

Xie Lian reaches back to where the servant's hands have gone rigid in his hair, tugging at the comb.

"Mu Qing, that hurts a little bit—"

But it doesn't say people who have willingly kept their chastity. It just said chastity.

His chest tightens, and the monster gets bigger.

Does that mean it doesn't go away ever?

Does that mean it doesn't get better?

But that's not fair. Mu Qing didn't know , he didn't want—

A hand wraps around his wrist firmly, pulling.

"Mu Qing—"

A sound comes through his lips, but it isn't him .

Claws scratch out, but they're not his .

CRACK!

"Don't touch me!"

He's curled up on his side, arms wrapped around his head, breathing hard.

And Mu Qing thought he knew what it was like, to feel scared.

He didn't know anything.

Didn't know the stomach gripping terror he would feel when he sat up, trembling—

Only to see the prince had fallen to the ground, shocked—

A red mark on his cheek.

And Mu Qing can't breathe, can't think .

His limbs grow ice cold, his breaths growing faster.

Every worst possibility crawls out to the front of his mind, paralyzing him.

"I-I-I'm s- so s-s-sorry—" he scrambled backwards, trembling like a leaf.

Thinking of what's going to happen to him, to his mother, to his sisters—

"I…It's okay…"

Xie Lian looks away, rubbing his cheek. "I didn't mean to s-scare you, you were just pulling my hair and it kind of hurt —"

He doesn't know why Mu Qing got so scared, but it's obvious that he was—

And the sound of his voice makes the servant pause.

"…A-are y-you c-c-crying?!" Mu Qing half whispers, half screams, even more terrified than he was before, and Xie Lian rubs his cheek even more aggressively, sniffling.

"I-I'm not trying to! No one's ever hit me before!"

Not ever—and he's certainly never been slapped.

"I'm s-s-sorry—!"

"It's okay!" Xie Lian cries, still sniffling as the tears roll down his cheek. "Just please don't d-do it again, okay?"

"I-I w…w-won't—"

"Good, this…this is good!" The prince wheezes, trying to smile. "I…it builds character!"

(He says, whimpering.)

"Any proper martial god needs to know how to take a punch like a man!" Mu Qing can't tell which one of them Xie Lian is trying to soothe, him, or himself. “Actually, maybe you should hit me again—”

“I j-just p-promised that I w-wouldn’t—”

“Right, I’m sorry—”

Xie Lian thoughtlessly slaps his hand against his own cheek in a frantic, ill-conceived gesture of solidarity—

Then he bites back a wail, clutching his cheek.

“…Y-you’re m-making it worse!” Mu Qing moans, clutching his own face. “W-what’s w-wrong with y-you?!”

“Everything! I’m sorry!” Xie Lian presses his face into a pillow—all so Feng Xin won’t wake up from the next room because of his crying.

They’re both quiet for a minute or two—Mu Qing trying to stop hyperventilating, and Xie Lian pushing down shocked whimpers of pain.

“…W-What’s…g-going t-to happen t-to m-me?”

Xie Lian looks up, staring at him in confusion.

“What do you mean?”

“D…Do you…w-want…me to l-leave?”

The prince continues to stare at him, slowly understanding his meaning.

“…No,” he mumbles—and Mu Qing doesn’t understand.

He doesn’t understand why Xie Lian seems saddened by the thought.

“P…People are g-gonna know …”

When they see the bruise on his cheek. Then who knows what will—

“…No,” Xie Lian repeats—a little firmer this time. Less sniffly. “No one else is going to know about it.”

He looks a little long suffering as he rises to his feet, walking towards the cabinet with a grim expression.

“I’m not that good at making stuff up, so…play along?”

Mu Qing stares, knees pulled up against his chest—but he nods.

Xie Lian mirrors the movement, turning around.

But he isn't prepared for the prince to scream bloody murder, hopping onto the floor hard to mimic a thud , then intentionally smacking his head against the cabinet with a—

Bang!

"FENG XIN!" He wails (crying for real, since he hit himself again), "KILL IT!"

Mu Qing is frozen on the floor—too shocked to move as the guard barrels into the room, shirtless, his hair all over the place, sword half raised.

"WHASHAPPENING—?"

"S-SPIDER!" Xie Lian shrieks, scrambling across the floor to hide behind Mu Qing. "In my BED!"

"I don't…I don‘t see a…" Feng Xin looks around, sword lowering slightly as he squints against the candlelight. "Are you sure it wasn't just your hair on your arm again?" He rasps, still half asleep.

"It was HUGE!" Xie Lian sobs, clinging to Mu Qing's arms.

"Look for it!"

Mu Qing almost feels a little bad, watching as Feng Xin is forced to strip the entire bed down, shaking every pillow case out for a sign of anything with eight legs—knowing the entire thing was a ruse.

(The prince is somber, hiding behind him the entire time.)

But that guilt is quickly replaced with stomach churning confusion as he watches the older boy's bare skin—turning his eyes away, conflicted.

"…Dianxia, I don't see anything. You probably scared it off—"

"But if you don't find it, how am I supposed to go to sleep?!"

Xie Lian moans, shaking his head. "…Mu Qing, can you sleep with me tonight?" He pleads. "I don't wanna be by myself if it comes back—"

Mu Qing's jaw goes slack, and he isn't sure what to say, but—

Feng Xin looks like a kicked puppy.

"…But that's what I always do…"

"Then you can both sleep with me!" Xie Lian shrugs. "My bed is big enough for all of us!"

Mu Qing and Feng Xin look at each other suddenly—then quickly look away, each red behind the ears.

Xie Lian crawls in first, nestling beneath a mountain of pillows and blankets. He likes sleeping with the feeling of being suffocated by softness, surrounded with the pressure of pillows, stuffed animals—one of his dogs.

Mu Qing hesitates, awkwardly sliding in after.

When Feng Xin goes to follow—a foot presses against his chest, heel digging in sharply—and he looks up to see a dark pair of eyes glaring up at him from beneath the blankets.

"Put the woodland creatures away."

"Huh?!"

"Put on a shirt , idiot!"

He grumbles and complains, but he slinks off to find one—crawling in wherever he can fit with Xie Lian and Mu Qing already slumped together, the large guard dog that normally sleeps at the foot of Xie Lian's bed stretched across his back.

Which leaves him wriggling in on the other side of Mu Qing, crowding him in to make more room for himself.

The younger teenager falls silent, waiting for the monster in his chest to roar, raising up his defenses when someone bigger than him presses against his back.

But, for some reason—

It's like the monster has already gone to sleep, and everything is still, easy, and quiet.

For some reason, it's never around when Feng Xin is.

He doesn't know why .

And he certainly doesn't know why he leans back against him, either, relaxing when Feng Xin starts to snore, feeling the vibrations against the back of his head.

"Mu Qing?" Xie Lian whispers, his voice drifting through the dark.

"…Yeah?"

"…What did I do wrong, earlier?"

Mu Qing bites his lip, arms wrapped tightly around his ribs.

"…You didn't," he whispers back. "I was wrong."

He's always wrong. Doesn't know how to be—

"Please?" Xie Lian presses quietly. "I don't want to scare you like that again."

The words are slow—heavy with hesitance as they fall from his lips.

"…I…get scared…when people grab my wrists," he mumbles, his cheeks burning with shame, knowing how stupid it sounds, but—

"Would practicing help?"

Mu Qing falls silent, confused and unsure.

"…Huh?"

"I could hold your hand sometimes," Xie Lian explains slowly. "When you know it's safe…so that way you get used to it, and it's not so scary?"

Mu Qing has no idea if that's how it works, but—

No one's ever tried to make him less frightened before.

"...Okay," he replies, feeling the sheets rustle as Xie Lian slowly reaches over—giving him plenty of time to pull away before he takes his hand, squeezing it softly.

"Is this alright?"

Mu Qing swallows hard, his cheek pressing against the pillow as he squeezes him back.

“…Yeah,” he mumbles, his voice thick.

Xie Lian’s hands are so soft and perfect compared to his—but he never complains.

He doesn’t let go.

Not even when he falls asleep, rolling closer—until Mu Qing is trapped between the prince and his bodyguard.

But it isn’t scary .

Mu Qing holds his hand even tighter, tears slipping down the side of his cheek, landing on the pillow.

And he—

It’s the first time he realizes it.

That he’d been in so much pain for so long, he thought he would never get better.

That he’d never stop feeling so fucking sad.

And now, holding the prince’s hand in the dark—

Mu Qing starts to think that someday, even if it’s not soon…

Things might be okay again.

He wakes up first in the morning—with Feng Xin’s chin digging into his shoulder.

And Xie Lian still holding onto his hand.

This is another memory he wouldn’t mind staying in.

Here or waking up in his father’s arms.

Or when Mu Qing met the last and longest love of his life, sitting on the edge of a kitchen counter, heart pounding as, for the first time, he kissed someone back.

(He made him congee.)

Only sixteen, hands shaky and unsteady as they twisted in Feng Xin’s hair, not caring about how sweaty he was, even if that was the first thing he said when the teenager pulled away.

Or the second time Feng Xin kissed him, when they were arguing over that stupid Pearl earring .

Maybe the third time, when Mu Qing wouldn't stop pointing out a non-existent patch of dirt on his cheek and they ended up pressed behind a pillar, tangled up on each other.

Warm, sweet, terrifying, wrong, good .

Or so many other times, in different corners of the palace.

And Mu Qing always knew.

Always watching everyone else, all the time—like an anxious child, treading the spaces between floor tiles, convinced the world will end if he steps on a crack.

He saw the way Xie Lian watched Feng Xin.

Short, embarrassed glances. Flustered. Unsure.

And he saw the way Feng Xin silently pined after him, because whenever Mu Qing stared after Feng Xin—

He was never looking back at Mu Qing.

And it wasn't fair .

He whispered that to himself over and over at night, scrubbing the floors in the hallways.

Why would he do that?

Why would he kiss Mu Qing like that, then look at the prince that way?

And part of him always knows why.

Knows that he isn't good enough.

Who would look at Mu Qing that way, after everything that's happened? Even if they don't know , he still carries it like a stain.

Like a monster, taking up too much room in his chest.

And sometimes, when it hurts too much—he's cruel to Feng Xin. He knows he is. He's snide and belittling, picking apart every word he says, criticizing everything he does.

But it usually ends with Feng Xin kissing him.

Even if Mu Qing isn't kind, like Xie Lian. Even if he isn't patient, fair, or generous. Even if he could never be that beautiful—

Feng Xin kisses him like this.

Mu Qing had that. That's his .

He clings onto it desperately, even if he knows Feng Xin can't kiss Xie Lian.

Because there are certain things princes can't do—and kissing guards is one of them.

Mu Qing isn't the first or best choice—it just wouldn't matter if anyone caught them.

Who cares if the son of a general eases his boredom with a palace servant? It isn't serious .

And if he had any self-respect, he wouldn't put up with it—

But he doesn't.

Mu Qing doesn't love himself enough for that.

Not even when he's promoted to a deputy god at the age of sixteen.

When his mother doesn't have to work anymore.

When Mu Qing moves them to a new house by the lake, cherry trees blooming all year round.

And then there was a war, and he couldn't.

Mu Qing couldn't look down at his blood-soaked hands, and push Feng Xin's arms away when they wrapped around him.

Even when he was a general at the age of seventeen, he knew he'd never be more than a moment of weakness for the only man he'd ever wanted.

That all they know how to do is resent and hurt each other. To be caught in between crushing walls of want, jealousy, and need.

That still didn't stop him from going to General Feng's funeral.

From standing by Feng Xin's side when they gave him his father's sword.

Xie Lian was supposed to be there—but was caught in a cave by an enemy ambush, protected by one young soldier while he was incapacitated.

But Mu Qing was there.

He was there when everyone else left, kneeling by Feng Xin's side when the young General sank to his knees, muffling his tears behind his arms as his father's ashes were placed in the family shrine.

Knowing Feng Xin didn't have a father like Mu Qing's.

General Feng wasn't gentle, patient, or understanding. Mu Qing watched him strike his son more than once.

That doesn't mean that Feng Xin didn't worship him, spending a lifetime chasing his father's approval.

And it doesn't mean that General Feng wasn't proud, before the end.

That doesn't mean Feng Xin wept for him any less than Mu Qing did for his own father.

And when everyone else leaves, Mu Qing stays.

Knowing that Feng Xin's mother is gone. That he doesn't have any other siblings.

When Feng Xin slumps with grief, Mu Qing holds him.

Even though he's heavy, and his jaw is sharp, aching when he buries his face in Mu Qing's shoulder to weep.

When Feng Xin begs Mu Qing to never bring this up again, he promises that he won't.

But it hurts, that Feng Xin thought he needed to make him swear.

He can't even make it out of bed when the prince makes his way back to camp, hours later—limping, his arm slung around a young boy's shoulders.

Mu Qing is the one who meets them, rushing Xie Lian off towards the medics.

"What the hell happened?!"

"I'm sorry…" Xie Lian leans on him heavily before he's loaded onto a stretcher, bleeding heavily from the ribs. "Is Feng Xin alright? I tried to make it—"

"Forget about that," Mu Qing shakes his head vehemently. "He'll just be glad you're alright. What happened?!"

"…The boy," Xie Lian recalls suddenly, grasping Mu Qing's forearm tightly before the medics can carry him away—paying no mind to his friend's question.

(But even now, he doesn't grab him by the wrist.)

"He saved me, Mu Qing. Make sure he's seen…seen to…I want him to…"

His grip grows slack as he slumps back in the stretcher, the blood loss finally making him faint.

If he was still mortal, Mu Qing would fear for him—

But that isn't the emotion coiling in his chest when he looks past the others, seeing a vaguely familiar face.

He must be close to fourteen years old now. Not the small, bleeding child they brought to Mount Taicang, years ago.

But the bandages on the right side of his face and the scars on his cheek are familiar.

And even if they weren't—

The way he watches Xie Lian is a dead giveaway.

The boy who fell from the walls that day.

The child who brought fire to Mount Taicang when Xie Lian took him there for refuge.

Now, the teenager who brought Xie Lian back bleeding and in pain.

Always watching the prince like a crow with his eyes on a jewel.

"…" Mu Qing sets aside the scroll of supply manifests in his hands, slamming it into an officer's chest as he walks over, arms crossed.

"Soldier."

"General."

The boy says that, but not with the air of respect he would offer Xie Lian, if the prince was still here.

"The Kingdom of Xianle thanks you for your service," he grabs a small bag of gold coins from a nearby table, tossing it into the teenager's waiting hands. "You're dismissed."

Hong'er stops, staring down at the bag in his hand, looking back up at the General in confusion. "What?"

"You saved the Crown Prince. For your heroic actions, you're dismissed from further combat." Mu Qing explains shortly. "I'm sure your family will be relieved."

"I don't have one," the boy answers shortly.

"Your friends, then."

"I don't have those either."

Mu Qing's eye twitches as he turns around, walking away. "You've got time on your hands now. Make some. The world's your oyster."

But the kid won't stop following.

"I'm not injured. There's no reason why I can't fight—!"

"Are you missing the fact that this is a reward?!"

"How could it be a reward?!" Hong'er glares, disgusted. "You're taking away the only thing I—"

"What?" Mu Qing turns around, staring at him harshly. "The only thing you what?"

The teenager falls silent, glaring at him venomously—

And then he says those words .

“To die for the crown prince is one’s greatest honor!”

And it makes Mu Qing a little sick, nearing it.

Not because the kid is unique. There are plenty of teenagers in the army. Mu Qing is barely of age himself.

But because Mu Qing knows the impact those words have.

“…Do you think it makes him happy , having children die for him? Do you think he has any desire for some scrawny kid to die in a battle he has no chance of making a difference in?”

The number of young men who have died with those words on their lips—

It haunts Xie Lian.

And it’s not as if Hong’er doesn’t listen. Mu Qing watches his gaze flicker, processing that information.

“…Then I’ll get stronger.”

“Yeah, sure,” Mu Qing rolls his eyes, turning away. “Good luck with that.”

“You can’t stop me from fighting for him.”

“I can stop you from dying in this army.” Mu Qing stops, looking back over his soldier to glare. “What’s your angle?”

The teenager pauses, nose wrinkling as he stares up at him in confusion.

“What?”

“What are you trying to get out of this? What do you want from him?”

Hong’er almost seems to recoil from the suggestion, as if it disgusts him.

“I don’t want anything.”

“Bullshit.” Mu Qing glares right back at him. “You think you’re the only person obsessed with him? You're not, you're just weirdly persistent —"

"They aren't like me."

If it was possible for Mu Qing to roll his eyes any harder, they would fall out of his head.

He honestly can't tell of the kid is creepy or pitiful, if he's a threat or an annoyance, but—

"You don't even know him. You've barely spoken to him at all. You don't know—"

"I know enough," Hong'er locks his jaw stubbornly. "I don't want anything from him, I just want to help—"

"Yeah, well, you can't." Mu Qing shakes his head harshly. "You wanna help? You're going to bring him Lang Ying's head? Is that supposed to be a joke?"

Xie Lian is a god , what could a child possibly do to help him?

"You'll build him a palace that won't fall when these people come for it? You'll protect him from an entire army ? He wouldn't do those things for you, and you can't —"

"I don't need him to. I don't—"

"Want anything." Mu Qing finishes shortly. "You can say it as many times as you want. That isn't—"

"And dianxia can do anything."

He says it with such firm resolve, and Mu Qing's stomach sinks as he shakes his head.

"No."

"He—!"

"He's a man. Flesh and blood like you and me."

Mu Qing looks back over towards the medical tent with a frown.

"He gets scared of things. He loses his temper. He can fail."

Right now, in this war, Xie Lian is failing for the first time in his life.

“You aren’t doing him or yourself any favors by putting so much faith in—”

“It doesn’t matter if he fails, or if he’s scared of things,” the child frowns—

As if everything Mu Qing is spouting is completely irrelevant.

“I don’t need him to be perfect. I don’t need anything from him. That isn’t why I pray.”

He looks the deputy god over with a glare.

“I wouldn’t expect someone like you to understand that.”

He makes no more attempts to convince Mu Qing—seeing that it’s getting him nowhere.

And Mu Qing is left standing there, his face frozen.

“…Someone like me,” he repeats slowly, watching his officers drag Hong’er away.

He won’t see the child again for eight more centuries—each of them wearing different names and faces.

Each of them trying to serve the same prince in the same ways as they once did.

But next time, the child who fell from the sky will stand by Xie Lian’s side.

And Mu Qing…

Mu Qing’s world crumbled twice before he turned twelve years old.

It crumbles for the third time when he’s eighteen, watching as his prince is placed in shackles, sent to the mortal realm.

More than just powerless—but blind .

No one else was there, when the emperor placed the shackles on him.

As his senior deputies, Feng Xin and Mu Qing were the only ones who remained after the trial.

Mu Qing watched the tears that fell down Xie Lian's cheeks, when the world became dark.

Felt how frightened he was. How his hands trembled, when they returned to the mortal realm.

Heard the pain in his voice, when he thanked Mu Qing for finding a silk bandage to wrap around his eyes, hiding the shackle from prying eyes.

He couldn't imagine anything more cruel.

All of the things Xie Lian loved —

Sword fighting. Calligraphy. Books. Watching the stars at night.

When his sight was taken, he lost so much of what once brought him joy.

What little he had left , after everything else had been taken.

Mu Qing sees no justice in it.

Mu Qing writes his letters for him, even though there's no one left to write to. Reads to him, even though he already knows the book by heart.

Feng Xin sits beside him at night, and tries to tell him which stars are out.

Xie Lian will reach for Mu Qing's hand, fumbling blindly in the dark—

And it breaks the young man's heart, listening as his prince fervently apologizes when he misses, and grasps his wrist.

"…It's alright, your highness." Mu Qing whispers, pressing their palms together.

They try to get him back in the sparring ring—to hold a sword again —

But Xie Lian isn't just heartbroken—he's proud.

He can't stand holding a sword anymore, and seeing how weak he's become.

He can't stand falling all the time, tripping and scraping his hands and knees.

His parents are old, now—they shouldn't have to be taking care of him, but the Queen is with Mu Qing every morning, helping her son get dressed.

Helping him try to remember where the doors and steps are. Which bags are kept where, and how to tell them apart by touch.

It's not as if Xie Lian was remarkably independent before—but now he's entirely dependent on those around him—and he hates it.

Mu Qing stands outside his door some mornings, listening to the muffled sound of him crying.

For Xianle. For his parents. For himself.

When the palace falls, and they're forced to retreat to a remote house in the countryside…

Mu Qing knows it could be worse. It's still nicer than any home he's ever lived in.

But to the Royal family, born to wealth and privilege—it's an unbearable humiliation.

And it's not that Xie Lian told Mu Qing what he was going to do, or that the servant suspected—

He just wasn't shocked when they woke up one morning and found his bed empty—a messy note left behind.

Saying he had gone off to try to cultivate again.

That he doesn't want to be a burden. That he doesn't want anyone to look for him.

But of course, Feng Xin does .

Frantic, morning till night, for an entire month.

Terrified that he might have fallen on the mountain path, or been recognized in the streets.

Mu Qing is beside him, keeping his fears inside.

Finding the situation horribly reminiscent of barn cats who know the end is near, sneaking off to the forest to take their final breaths.

He remembers how profoundly hopeless Xie Lian was, when he left.

Remembers what Doctor Feng told him, all those years ago.

How some children can feel so sad for so long , they don't think they'll ever be happy again.

That they give up.

Mu Qing never says it out loud. That would only cause Feng Xin and Xie Lian's parents needless pain.

At some point, wandering the woods and streets by Feng Xin's sides, hands in his pockets, Mu Qing finds himself relieved that they don't find him.

But he doesn't think Xie Lian is ever coming back, either.

"Feng Xin…"

"Don't."

"We need to talk about it—"

"DON'T!"

"We're wasting time," Mu Qing mutters, breath fogging up in the air in front of him—his nose flushed and stinging from the cold. "We're searching places we've already checked at least three times, he isn't here."

"He might have circled back—he could have gotten lost —!"

"Feng Xin—it's snowing!" Mu Qing throws his hands up, gesturing to the white flurries falling around them. "It's been snowing all week!"

"I know that, alright?! That's why we can't waste any more—!"

"He didn't have winter clothes. He doesn't know how to build a fire—he can't even hunt when he's like this!"

"Why are you—?!"

"If he was out in the elements, we would have found him by now. He'd be too weak to move!" Mu Qing grumbles, blinking the snow off of his eyelashes.

“Wherever he is—he’s either inside and safe from exposure, or he’s gotten so far, we aren’t going to be able to find him—”

“Yeah, or he’s been captured!” Feng Xin glares, looking at the wilderness around him helplessly. “Do you have ANY idea what they’ll do to him?!”

Mu Qing huffs, crossing his arms over his chest. “ Yeah , I think I might have a better idea of that than you.” He sneers, his voice cold.

“The fuck is that supposed to mean?!”

“Nothing, just—you aren’t being logical. If we could find him, so could the enemy.”

Mu Qing shivers when a cold wind blows by, piercing straight through the thin layers of his robes. “It’s probably a good thing that we haven’t seen a sign of him. It means he can hide himself at least—”

(That, or there’s nothing left to hide.)

“A good thing?!” Feng Xin stares at him, his boots sinking deeply in the snow—but he doesn’t seem nearly as bothered by the cold. “You realize if the tables were turned, Xie Lian would never stop looking for you. Not until we found you!”

That’s enough to make Mu Qing flinch.

“We wouldn’t be in this situation if Xie Lian was logical, so—”

“He’s just not the type to cut and run on the people he cares about!” Feng Xin shakes his head. “He—He wouldn’t have left unless he didn’t think he was coming back! He needs us!”

“I’m not saying he doesn’t—”

“I wouldn’t expect someone like you to understand!” Feng Xin interrupts him, snapping tree branches out of the way as he attempts to push deeper into the underbrush. “But I’m not gonna repay him by abandoning him!”

“…Someone like me,” Mu Qing repeats slowly. “What’s that supposed to mean?”

“You didn’t care about him like I did!” Feng Xin is facing away from him, but Mu Qing can hear his voice break. “You think he’s naive, and spoiled—you’re RELIEVED that he’s gone—!”

THUD!

Feng Xin flinches, appalled, reaching up to touch the back of his head.

“…Did you just throw a fucking SNOWBALL AT ME—?!” He turns around, only to get nailed in the face with another ball of snow and ice.

“FUCK YOU, FENG XIN!”

“WHAT THE FUCK IS WRONG WITH YOU?!”

“I HATE YOU, THAT’S WHAT’S WRONG WITH ME!” Mu Qing screams, his hands balled up into fists. “I KNOW YOU’RE SAD, AND YOU’RE SCARED—BUT THAT DOESN’T MEAN YOU GET TO TAKE IT OUT ON ME!”

“YOU SAY FUCKED UP THINGS TO ME ALL THE TIME!”

“THAT’S DIFFERENT!”

“HOW THE HELL—?!”

“BECAUSE I DON’T ACTUALLY MEAN IT!“ Mu Qing hurls another one at him—and this time, Feng Xin has the sense to dodge it.

“Oh, BULLSHIT, you mean it every FUCKING TIME you call me an idiot—!”

“STOP ACTING LIKE A GODDAMN MORON AND I’LL TREAT YOU LIKE A FUCKING PHILOSOPHER!”

Mu Qing shoves him in the chest, hard enough to make him lose his balance on the snow, stumbling to the ground.

“…Alright,” Feng Xin glares, wiping the melting ice from his cheeks.

“Maybe I’m not a reader like either of you. Maybe I didn’t get the chance to study on Mount Taicang, because I never even got to try — but that doesn’t mean I’m stupid!”

“I never said—”

“And I get you two had more common interests, and you made him laugh—and you guys were always talking about shit like it was over my head, but— I WAS HIS BEST FRIEND!" He rises to his feet, shoving Mu Qing just as hard, sending him sprawling.

"I was there from the start! I don't have a family waiting on me after this! I don't have another job I can just go and do, alright?! He is my job! He is my family! I can't just—!"

"You think I don't get that?!" Mu Qing lunges, and they're left wrestling in a snowbank.

"I know what it's like when someone you care about leaves , and you don't know why! I GET IT!"

The snow is in his sleeves, against his neck—and it stings.

"BUT THAT DOESN'T MEAN YOU GET TO TELL ME HOW I FEEL ABOUT HIM, OR THAT I DIDN'T CARE!"

"YOU'RE THE ONE NOT EVEN THINKING ABOUT—!"

"You know what I'm thinking about?!" Mu Qing snaps, rolling on top of him, straddling his waist, hands on his shoulders to keep him down. "The fact that we CAN'T find him right now, I've been with you every single fucking day looking!"

Just as much as Feng Xin has—just as hard.

"But if we can't find him, Xie Lian wouldn't thank us for letting his father get sick , or his mother starve !" Mu Qing sits back. "So, if you want to get lost in the snow and kill yourself looking for him, FINE!"

Mu Qing stands up, and Feng Xin is too startled to stop him.

"I'M going back to try and make sure he has something left to come home to! You do whatever you want—I don't CARE!"

He says that, but there are tears in his eyes when he leaves Feng Xin laying there in the snow.

He says that, but his heart beats halfway out of his chest when Feng Xin returns to the house that night, ashen faced, head hanging low.

He says that, but there's a bowl of hot food waiting for him, sitting on the table in his usual place.

He says that, but Mu Qing moves over to make room for him when

Feng Xin comes to bed that night—even though Xie Lian's room now sits empty.

They shared before to give him privacy.

They share now, because neither of them want to sleep alone with him gone.

And it's a little miserable—but it's also a little happy .

Even if Mu Qing knows he's the only one who could find a way to enjoy it.

Not the days spent hunting or busking. Mu Qing picks up work easier, he has more skills that sell in peacetime.

But Feng Xin tries—and he learns.

And there are days when Mu Qing wonders.

Waking up from a break in the afternoon, slumped on a grassy hillside —only to feel the familiar press of leather against his cheek.

Worn gloves stroking over him slowly.

And when he opens his eyes—

It's Feng Xin's face that he sees. Blushing and embarrassed, grumbling something about how Mu Qing had something on his face before pulling away.

But Mu Qing doesn't move at first.

He lays there, and he wonders.

Holding the grass as tight as he can

Before, they were always arguing when they touched each other—it was an act of snapping restraint.

Now—sometimes—Feng Xin kisses him softly. In passing moments of quiet.

And Mu Qing knows it's only because Xie Lian isn't there—

But sometimes, it feels like he means it.

Sometimes, he reaches for him when they're in bed at night, and it's good.

His lips against his throat, Mu Qing's hands in his hair, legs tangled together.

The first time he rolls on top of him, Mu Qing goes still—whispering for him to stop.

…And Feng Xin does.

Every single time.

He asks why after—but never forces Mu Qing to tell him.

And it—

After that first, nauseating moment when he panicked under Feng Xin's hands, Mu Qing thought that would be it.

But it never seemed to make Feng Xin want him any less.

Some nights, Feng Xin pulls him close, complaining of the cold—saying Mu Qing's feet are like ice blocks.

He says that, but he holds him closer anyway.

When it's quiet, he asks what he'll do later.

("later" Is a gentle way of saying 'If Xie Lian doesn't come back.')

"…Go back to my mother and sisters," Mu Qing murmurs.

He put away every single coin he made before, leaving it for them—more than enough to support them for now, but not forever.

"Try to cultivate again, I suppose. What about you?"

Feng Xin never has an answer.

Deep down, Mu Qing knows it's because he can't picture a future without Xie Lian in it.

Still, part of him thinks about telling Feng Xin that he could come along, if he wanted.

That his mother and sisters wouldn't mind one more.

“…Would you cultivate in the same method?”

The question takes Mu Qing slightly off guard.

“…Why?”

Feng Xin won’t meet his eyes.

“You love kids. I guess I always thought…you’d want them.”

Mu Qing is surprised that Feng Xin noticed something like that—but he isn’t wrong.

“That doesn’t mean I need them.”

He turns his cheek against the pillow, fingertips splaying across Feng Xin’s shoulder blade, tracing the scars there.

Knowing the story behind every single one.

“Do you?”

“…I wouldn’t know how,” Feng Xin admits, staring at the frost on the window.

“But if the person I…”

He never finishes that sentence.

Mu Qing doesn’t know if he actually fell asleep, or just pretended to.

And he doesn’t think he’d like the end of that sentence—so he never asks again.

The weeks turn to months. Then, an entire year.

Xie Lian’s mother never stops watching the window, hands fidgeting restlessly in her lap.

Mu Qing tries teaching her how to cook, when she seems so keen to learn—but it’s not a matter of effort, she’s just a menace.

But whatever she makes, however inedible, has a name.

One day, when they’re elbow to elbow, and Mu Qing is trying to salvage what must have been a pile of dough originally, laughing with her over something silly—

The Queen of Xianle stops to look at him—really look at him, and her smile fades.

“…Your majesty? What’s wrong?”

She looks away, fiddling with the cloth covering the counter so the dough doesn’t stick.

“…I can’t imagine what you must think of me,” she murmurs, the lines around her eyes so much deeper than they were two years ago. “But I’m not without shame.”

“…I’m sorry for laughing, it’s really not that b—”

“You’ve been far kinder to our family than we deserve,” the Queen finally explains, and Mu Qing grows silent. “And I know we have no right to your generosity.”

“…”

Mu Qing wipes the dough from his hands.

“…I was always under the impression that you didn’t know,” he admits, unable to meet her eyes.

“…I didn’t,” the Queen agrees quietly, looking towards the door to her bedroom. “But my husband thinks he’s dying.”

And now, he tells her things.

Things she should have known.

“…I wasn’t sure if I should say anything, once he told me,” she admits, pulling her hands back from the cloth before she ruins it. “I wasn’t sure if silence would be better for you, or giving myself permission to abdicate myself from this…”

This horrible thing .

“…But you’re so good to us,” she whispers, shaking her head. “And I felt so ashamed , I…”

“…I have questions,” Mu Qing admits, his hands tight on the edge of the counter. Shoulders hunched. “If you want to help—”

“I do,” she agrees quickly. “Anything I know, I promise.”

"…Did you know that they weren't allowed to have children in the house?" Mu Qing is shocked that he can ask without stammering, but—

He's never been afraid—not of her.

The Queen of Xianle is a kind woman, even if she's imperfect.

"…I did," she admits softly.

"But I didn't know the actual reason."

Mu Qing turns to look at her, fighting the urge to be distrustful, to say something harsh.

"…What did you think the reason was?"

She bites her lip, her gaze far away.

"I knew my brother-in-law was a horrible man," she recalls.

"I couldn't tell you how many times I begged my sister to leave him—but…I thought the reason there couldn't be children in their palace was…because of her."

Both of Mu Qing's eyebrows raise, and the Queen's expression grows grim.

"She tried to take Xie Lian once."

When he was only a toddler—confused, but willing to go in the arms of someone who looked and smelled so much like his mother.

"She never made it past the palace gates…but I had never been so frightened," the Queen whispers. "I thought she might try it again with another."

"…But you didn't put her in jail? Or at least cut off contact with her?!" Mu Qing stares, appalled by the very thought, but—

"She had just lost a child herself," the Queen explains faintly. "A horrible miscarriage. She wasn't herself."

She really had thought that her husband banning children from the house was because of that —because servants wouldn't have the means to fight back, if a wealthy mistress attempted to take their sons for her own.

She thought that with time to grieve, her sister would get better

She thought, when Qi Rong was born, that the need she once felt would pass.

"…My sister and I were closer than most siblings, when we were small." The Queen admits softly. "I think my husband thought it would devastate me if I knew the truth, but…I wish I had."

She's clearly ashamed now. Thinking of all the years she had Mu Qing in her service, treating him like any other servant—

Not knowing the damage that had been done.

"…What would you have done if you had known?" Mu Qing mutters, his knuckles aching.

"…I don't know what I would have done about my sister," the Queen admits. "I feel so angry and ashamed now, it feels like I would have cast her out. But I don't know if that's hindsight, or…"

Mu Qing's chest is tight—but he appreciates the honesty, on some level.

"…But I never would have allowed your family to stay there," she concludes firmly. And Mu Qing believes her, but—

"And I never would have let that happen to your father. If I had known, I would have—"

Mu Qing takes a step back from the counter, staring.

"…What?" He croaks.

"I…" The Queen stares at him, confused by his reaction. "I thought you already knew."

"…I knew he was arrested because your sister accused him of assaulting her," Mu Qing admits faintly. "…But I never knew the King was involved with…what did he tell you?"

"…That he handled it personally," the Queen admits, her lips growing pale. "Because it was my sister."

And there's a certain implication that goes hand in hand with 'handled it.'

One that sinks into Mu Qing's bones, and twists in his stomach like venom.

It takes him a week to ask.

Sitting behind him one afternoon, applying a salve to the King's back.

An old wives' cure for the lungs that he sneered at, when Mu Qing first tried it—but it helps.

They rarely speak—and Mu Qing's question is calm, but somehow sudden.

"Where is my father buried?"

It takes him a moment to realize what the boy is asking—and when he does, he grows still.

"…My wife spoke to you," he mutters, shoulders hunched.

His hair is more white than gray now, his body more and more frail by the day.

It doesn't make Mu Qing feel any better, to see him old and weak.

No matter how far the King of Xianle sinks, pride sticks to him like a second skin.

"…It provided perspective," Mu Qing's voice is cold—hands working calmly.

"I doubt it."

"What do you mean?"

"I doubt you could understand everything that went into the situation at the time," the King mutters.

He says that, but he doesn't explain.

"…Maybe not," Mu Qing agrees. "I'm a servant. I'll always be a servant. That's what your brother-in-law liked to say."

That makes him wince, at the very least.

"But I know that you already knew you killed my father—an innocent man—when you stood in front of me and threatened me for my silence, acting like it was mercy. But we're both adults now," Mu Qing pulls his hands back.

"We both know the only thing you were trying to do was protect yourself."

"I had no reason to think your father was innocent at the time—"

"And you had a reason to think he was guilty?" Mu Qing shakes his head. "I'm not your wife. I'm not your son. You can't do that with me."

"What's that supposed to mean?"

"Using some manipulative explanation about the pressures of ruling, or saying that I'm a child, or a woman , and I couldn't possibly understand your choices." Mu Qing mutters, wiping off his hands.

"You think you can just—?"

"I can do whatever I want to you," Mu Qing stares at him sharply. "I could kill you here and now, and leave this place without consequences. Because you're not a king anymore—you're nobody."

Less relevant than Mu Qing's father was. At least he knew how to work .

At least he never tried to make his children feel like they were stupid, and taught them what they needed to know in order to survive.

"What pressures of kingship kept you silent when I was feeding you for the last year? When I made sure your wife had shoes on her feet?"

Mu Qing stands up, shaking his head. "Was it when I spent an entire month searching for your son in the ice and snow?"

"…This has always been your life," the king stares at him, appalled. "How could you expect us to adjust—?"

Mu Qing laughs, equally disbelieving.

"You are a grown man who never learned to take care of himself. That is your fault. I was a child, you know what I lived through—because of YOU! And you have the audacity to feel self-pity?! To accept my help?! At least your wife has a speck of decency —"

"I was NOT responsible for what that man did!" The king whips his head around to glare at him. “I had nothing to do with it—I told them not to let any more children in that house—”

“You killed my father on an accusation ,” Mu Qing glares. “You gave a rapist a palace.”

“I didn’t give him a palace,” the king winces, struggling to sit up on his own. Mu Qing makes no move to support him. “He was already wealthy. I never condoned or allowed —”

“‘My brother-in-law is a very important man,’” Mu Qing replies flatly. “That's what she said.”

If you allow people to hide behind the shroud of your power, you’re responsible for the damage they do.

“…When I tried to tell the truth, she said—”

“Does it even matter anymore?” The king mutters, exasperated. “We’ve all suffered. We’ve all lost. It was ten years ago.”

Mu Qing takes a step back, his lips pressed into a thin line.

“The best thing you can do for yourself is pretend it never happened. You’re a man now, and you still complain like a—”

“Where is he buried?” Mu Qing repeats his original question, his voice low.

Feng Xin glances up, startled when Mu Qing rushes past him, stomping down the front steps.

“…What the—? Did something happen?”

The servant doesn’t answer, slamming the door behind him.

“Mu Qing!”

He’s past the tree line by the time the first sob rips out of his chest.

At some point he stops running, hand resting against a tree, clutching one hand over his heart as he gasps, crying so hard, it takes the breath out of him.

“Hey—”

“Go AWAY , Feng Xin!”

"Not until you tell me what's going on—did you and his majesty get into a f—?"

"It doesn't matter!" Mu Qing shakes his head so violently, it hurts. "Just g-go b-b-back!"

"Like hell!" Feng Xin snarls, grabbing his shoulder and spinning him around. "Who the hell got you this upset?

"It's n-not worth it—"

"How can you say that when you're like this—?"

"BECAUSE YOU WOULDN'T BELIEVE ME ANYWAY!" Mu Qing half cries, half screams. "AND IT WOULDN'T CHANGE—!"

"WOULD YOU STOP PUTTING WORDS IN MY GODDAMN MOUTH?!" Feng Xin snarls, snatching his wrist before he can walk away.

"Don't make up ideas in your head of what I'll do before you even give me a fucking chance to react!"

Mu Qing grows silent, tears slipping down his cheeks—staring at the hand enveloping his wrist. Looking up at Feng Xin's face—torn between frustration and worry—then back down.

Waiting for the roaring to crop up in his chest.

For the teeth and spines and claws, his breaths short and trembling.

Waiting for the world to feel like it's ending. Waiting for the monster to take his voice, to take his hands—

But nothing ever comes.

"…Why is it always you?!" Mu Qing croaks, his voice breaking, all while Feng Xin stares at him in growing confusion.

Why does everything only feel okay when I'm with you?

"Mu Qing—I'm not a mind reader," Feng Xin half grumbles, half pleads . "What are you talking about—?"

Mu Qing grabs him by the front of his shirt, pulling him in. It's not unusual—most of their embraces are impulsive and over emotional—

But Mu Qing is almost never the one who starts it, and he never kisses him so desperately.

And Feng Xin could never push him away.

Hands in his hair, tangling together in the constant unanswered question—

'I don't know why I want you, but I do.'

Mu Qing wants to be here, when Feng Xin is kissing him like his life depends on it. Like he means it.

Like a first and best choice.

He doesn't want to be in the next moment.

When his foot slips on a loose rock, Feng Xin's arm tightens around his waist, holding him steady.

When Mu Qing feels those words against his lips:

"Careful, dianxia—"

And they both grow impossibly still.

"…Fuck," Feng Xin mutters, pulling back. "I didn't mean—"

He doesn't get another word out before Mu Qing shoves him away—hard .

As a year's worth of cautiously built trust crumbles in an instant.

"It was a reflex, Mu Qing, don't do this—"

"A reflex?!"

"Because you tripped , not because I was—I wasn't thinking about—!"

"It doesn't matter—I don't care!"

"Mu Qing—"

"It's not like we're anything to each other," Mu Qing snarls, stomping away from him. "You want to pine after a prince who LEFT you without a second thought?!"

Feng Xin stops following, eyes widening with hurt. "WHATEVER! I could never be that pathetic!"

Mu Qing isn’t there when he comes back.

Isn’t there when he wakes up in the morning, or any of the days after.

And that’s how he ends up here.

Sitting on a familiar hillside.

His old house is gone now, burned down at some point in the war.

Suyin is buried in the meadow at the foot of the hill, where she used to look for wildflowers.

Mu Qing’s fingers knot and tangle in the grass as the starlight shines down.

Knowing now that his father never left.

That he was buried under this hillside all this time, alone and forgotten.

Somehow, that hurts Mu Qing more than he ever thought it would.

Thinking about how all this time, he was there.

He was right here .

Mu Qing slumps back on the grass, rolling over onto his side, allowing it to press against his cheeks, swallowing his tears.

He knows what comes after this memory.

That he finds his mother and sisters again. Takes a position as a deputy in another Martial God’s palace.

That he buries her beside his father, when she goes to sleep one night, never to wake up again.

After that—

After that is so much shame , and he—

Mu Qing shakes his head, curling into a tighter ball.

“…What is this?!” He whispers.

What kind of dream is this?

Warm leather gloves press against his cheeks, and it's quiet.

It's safe here.

It doesn't hurt here .

"It's time to come home, A'Qing."

He sits up, face tear stained, hair tangled and blood streaked.

"…Baba?" He whispers.

His father holds him close, stroking his hair.

"I'm so sorry," he presses his face against Mu Qing's shoulder, holding him so tight . "I never wanted to go."

The tears have been falling for so long—Mu Qing doesn't think they'll ever stop.

"I know," he whispers, hugging him tighter, curling up against him. "I—"

"Murderer."

Mu Qing's father tightens his arms around him, and when the god looks back over his shoulder—

He sees himself .

Eleven years old, a boning knife in his and—covered in blood.

With silver streaks in his hair.

"I…" Mu Qing swallows dryly. "I didn't have a…"

The monster smiles.

"…But we liked it though, didn't we?" Its voice takes on a strange, echoing quality.

"We like hurting people."

"…No!" Mu Qing shakes his head, reaching back for his father, but—

He's alone.

"Then why is that all we ever do?"

Mu Qing tries to turn away—

Only to find his mother there, with a bloody nose, her cheek swelling.

But that was an accident , he didn't mean—

But in the blink of an eye, it's Xie Lian sitting there.

Filthy. Kneeling in the mud—eyes covered in bandages.

"Mu Qing—tell them!"

Mu Qing takes a step back, his heart leaping into his throat.

"…It was a mistake ," he moans, covering his mouth with one hand. "I didn't mean—"

His own words echo around them—so loud, it strains his ears.

"I BET YOU'RE GLAD HE ISN'T HERE TO SEE YOU LIKE THIS!"

Mu Qing can't stop shaking his head, watching Xie Lian's face turning dark with hurt and anger.

"THAT GUY YOU FELL IN LOVE WITH!"

"I didn't…" Mu Qing shakes his head, knees wobbling. "I wasn't trying to…I j-just w…wanted—"

To make Feng Xin know how it felt .

He wasn't thinking about what those words would do to Xie Lian , beyond the fact that it just—

Xie Lian didn't know everything Mu Qing had been through, but back then, everything felt so unfair .

"…What the fuck , Mu Qing?"

And he knows that makes it worse.

He knows that means he—

Mu Qing might have wanted to be Xie Lian's friend—but that didn't mean he deserved it.

That didn't mean he was a good friend.

"When you left—it was a RELIEF!"

"Careful, dianxia…"

"…H-He wouldn't s-say that—" Mu Qing whispers.

Trying .

"Why would he pray to you?"

"My husband is a very important man, you know."

"IT HURTS!"

Mu Qing sinks to his knees, hands clutching either side of his head. It's —

It's that okay again, but this time, it's really Xie Lian.

Screaming, begging for help as—

As a sword is rammed into him, over and over again.

A feeling that Mu Qing now knows all too well.

"FENG XIN! MU QING!" He screams, writhing in agony. "HELP ME!"

(My fault.)

Mu Qing stumbles forward, reaching for him.

(All my fault.)

"IT WAS HIM!"

Jian Lan's finger points squarely at his chest, sending him falling backwards.

"He's a MURDERER!"

A snarl rips from Mu Qing's throat, eyes growing darker, more streaks of silver shooting through his hair.

"YOU LYING FUCKING BITCH —"

"She didn't lie."

His younger self is there again, standing over him with a Cheshire grin.

“We like hurting people—”

“No we DON’T —!”

“Gege, I don’t wanna clean the library anymore.”

“Stop—”

“It’s not good to tell stories about important people, Mu Qing.”

“Please!” He sobs.

“She was in love with my best friend, too.”

“How did it feel?”

“How many times did it happen?”

“Did you fight? Why didn’t you fight harder?”

“Did part of you enjoy it?”

“It’s been ten years, can’t you just let it go?!”

“KILL ME!” Mu Qing screams, the voices growing louder.

Crowding in around him until he can’t stand it anymore.

“I DON’T WANNA DO THIS ANYMORE!”

“It’s always been you!”

A sharp twang echoes through the air, cutting through the voices.

A song Mu Qing doesn’t know , but—

“…You made this for me?”

Feng Xin’s voice comes with it.

Mu Qing twists his head around, tearful and disoriented.

“You still taste the same.”

“…I never thought Xuan Zhen was a bad person.”

“Thank you, Fu Yao.”

“I heard it was a special young lady’s birthday…who else could I take to the festival with me?”

“No…” Something tugs at his sleeve, and when Mu Qing looks down…

Cuo Cuo is his arms.

In his cleansed form. Tugging at Mu Qing’s hair, staring up at him with his father’s eyes.

No crying.

Mu Qing bites his lip, leaning down to press their foreheads together.

“…You deserved better,” he whispers, cheek pressing against his hair—soft against his skin.

They both did.

“…Wanna see my room?”

“Do you like books?”

Mu Qing holds the child tighter, his lips trembling.

“I could hold your hand, sometimes…”

The music grows louder, gentle plucks of strings filling the air.

“You are so special, Mu Qing.”

It’s almost like relief, but it’s straining, fighting against something.

A pain with a gravity to it—one that threatens to sink its claws in and drag down .

And in an instant, everything grows cold and dark.

Mu Qing watches as a door slides shut. A tall, broad figure turning the lock.

He glances back—green eyes gleaming in the darkness.

“I think it’s just us, now.” He speaks quietly, watching as the boy on the ground begins to shake.

“Why don’t you put that down and come over here?”

Mu Qing looks down at his arms—and they’re empty. Looks behind him—and he’s alone.

“…No…” he scrambles backwards, his voice weak. “NO!”

He strains his ears, fighting to listen to the music.

“Don’t be childish…”

The ground tilts forward in that moment, almost like gravity has reversed, leaving him ready to plunge down into a starless night.

Down where the monster is waiting.

With cruel thoughts and intentions, words and claws that aren’t his, and it’s so hungry .

And he almost falls, stomach lurching painfully as his body begins to drop, but—

He doesn’t let go.

A sob rips from his throat, hands clutching at the grass as his body dangles.

“Mu Qing isn’t like that!”

“I won’t let go—I promise.”

“He’s my friend!”

Tears slip down Mu Qing’s cheeks.

“He has always been my friend!”

“I DON’T WANNA KNOW WHAT IT’S LIKE TO LIVE WITHOUT YOU, OKAY?! YOU DON’T GET TO LEAVE ME BEHIND!”

“…Help…” He croaks, fingers clinging tighter as the music gets louder, filling his ears. “Help…”

Suddenly—gravity rights itself, and he isn’t falling anymore, slamming back down against the ground.

And when he looks up—

It isn't dark.

There's a spilled basket on the ground in front of him—cherries scattered across the ground—

And a hand, held out in front of him.

"Was someone hurting you, Mu Qing?"

The prince's eyes are sorrowful, filled with remorse. And Mu Qing—

He's sorry too.

He's so, so fucking sorry.

But this time—he grasps Xie Lian's hand, and he holds on tight.

"…Yeah," he admits, his voice small and broken.

"Really bad."

Xie Lian's other hand presses against his cheek, wiping the tears away with his thumb.

"I'm sorry, I'm so sorry—" he whispers, but Xie Lian stops him.

"It won't happen again," he murmurs, and somehow—

Mu Qing believes him.

Allows the prince to pull him to his feet, picking up his basket.

"Let's go home," he's gentle, leading Mu Qing down the path.

Mu Qing doesn't look back at the hill behind him. Doesn't listen to the voices that call.

He follows his prince, listening to the music.

"…Okay."

There are soft notes drifting through the air. Gentle humming in his ears.

And warm, familiar leather—stroking against his cheeks.

"…Ba…baba…?"

Hands cup his cheeks—and it's cold, in a sharp, piercing way.

Wet.

He's soaked.

"…Mu Qing?!"

His eyes flutter for a moment, lashes sticking together—Vision blurring in and out of focus—

Only to find Feng Xin staring down at him. Covered in blood and soot, eyes frantic—and when he meets Mu Qing's gaze—

He sobs .

Clutching Mu Qing against his chest, clinging to him.

"Don't EVER do that to me again!" He half shouts, half weeps, holding both arms around Mu Qing's back. "I'll—I'll fucking—"

"Kill me?" Mu Qing rasps, dazed and disoriented.

"Yeah!" Feng Xin croaks, pressing his face into Mu Qing's neck. "I'll fucking KILL you!"

Mu Qing pats his arm weakly, breathing hard, his heartbeat slowly beginning to calm.

They're—

They're near the lake on Mount Taicang—with the cherry trees.

Beside him, there's a white robed cultivator he's never seen before, a guqin in his lap.

But no Xie Lian or Hua Cheng.

"What…?"

"Is his hair going to stay like this?" Feng Xin mutters, twisting his fingers through it.

"Most likely," the newcomer replies, audibly exhausted. "I've never heard of someone coming back from Qi Deviation this severe—it's bound to leave a mark."

Qi…Deviation…?

Mu Qing glances down at the water, trying to see what he's talking about, and—

His hair has turned completely silver.

He reaches a hand up towards his cheek weakly, shocked, and Feng Xin is so undone, he comments without thinking.

"Don't be pissed, I like it—"

Then he stops, wincing, knowing exactly what Mu Qing is going to—

"You think what matters most to me is that YOU like it?"

"I never said—I just meant—"

"Meant what?"

"It's beautiful, alright?! That's all I was trying to fucking say!" Feng Xin snaps.

"I don't know why you have to turn everything I say into a damn atta—!"

He doesn't finish that statement, because his mouth is soon occupied.

Mu Qing's arms are shaky—but they hold on around his neck tightly, water sloshing around them.

And Feng Xin—

His arms tighten around Mu Qing's waist, his heart leaping into his throat.

Because Mu Qing—he hasn't kissed him like this since they were teenagers .

And when their lips part, the first thing he says is—

"…Did you just call me beautiful?"

Feng Xin flushes, growing hot around the ears, prepared to backpedal, but—

Mu Qing is smiling.

And Feng Xin can't remember the last time he's smiled at him like that , either.

If he ever has.

"…Yeah," he admits hoarsely, pushing a lock of hair behind his ear. "I did."

"…And you meant everything you said before?" Mu Qing asks slowly, most of it coming back in flashes, but—

He remembers the most important things.

And when Feng Xin nods—

Thud!

"OW!"

"And you waited until I was DYING to say anything?!"

"You never let me TALK!"

"When did you ever try to—?"

There's a deep, violent rumble in the ground below—and flashes of light in the distance, the sun slowly beginning to rise—

Too bright to be lightning.

"What's that?" Mu Qing struggles to sit up—but Feng Xin helps him.

"…I wish I knew."

A Soul's Worth

Chapter Summary

It’s cold and dark, the stone smooth and unforgiving against his cheek.

Everything hurts—more than he thought it was supposed to.

He thought that was supposed to stop.

But it hurts, and it’s cold, deep down in his bones.

But when he looks up—he knows this place.

He’s been here before.

Chapter Notes

This chapter was very short, but I couldn't think of another way to split it with ongoing content, apologies!

THUD!

It’s cold and dark, the stone smooth and unforgiving against his cheek.

Everything hurts—more than he thought it was supposed to.

He thought that was supposed to stop.

But it hurts, and it’s cold , deep down in his bones.

But when he looks up—he knows this place.

He’s been here before.

Recognizes the small, flickering points of light overhead.

Ghost fires.

One black door, to the left—and a red one to the right.

This place has never been frightening to him.

He came here for the first time when he was fresh from the fields of Mount Tonglu. So small, he had to hold Hua Cheng’s hand as he climbed the stairs back out.

But that way is closed to him now.

The only man who can open it isn't with him.

"…Didi?"

Shuo's eyes flicker over momentarily—widen, then sharply look away, his jaw growing tight.

"You're not really here," he mutters. "Qi Rong destroyed you."

"He did," Bao agrees, sitting on the ground—leaning against the black door. "But people see strange things when they die."

"…But we're already dead," both brothers point out at the same time.

An inside joke they used to tell.

And even now, it makes Shuo laugh, wincing as he holds his side.

"…It's been really shitty without you," he admits, sitting back against the red door.

"Oh," Bao's smile softens—forever sixteen, but always his big brother. "I don't believe that."

Shuo grunts, leaning his chin against his knees. "Well, then I'm glad you're not actually real. You'd be disappointed."

"I don't believe that, either."

"Pah."

"…How's that old man of ours?"

"Better." Shuo admits, twisting a curl around his finger. "Happier. Not because you're gone, just…he found him."

Bao's eyes light up, and his smile widens. "Really? Remember the tally marks he used to keep on the wall?"

In spite of it all, a laugh bubbles up to Shuo's lips

"Yeah, we kept on having to make a bigger step stool for Fai so he could reach—"

"—and then Yanlin knocked it over on day ten thousand?" Bao snickers, shaking his head. "I thought Hua Chengzhu was gonna disperse—"

"Geeze," Shuo giggles, sitting cross legged. "You could be a little more sensitive, it's a little too soon for me—"

Then they're both laughing, and—

Shuo never realized how much he missed laughing with him.

"…What's he like?"

"The prince, you mean? Weird—but great."

Which makes sense, in retrospect—Shuo never expected Hua Cheng to fall in love with someone normal.

How could he be, when he'd been looking for one man for so long?

"He's…kind, brave, generous. Funny, but he usually isn't trying to be. And he…" Shuo bites his lip.

"He sort of reminds me of Hua Chengzhu sometimes. It's not that they're alike—they couldn't be more different—but the way he makes you feel, when he's around…"

Shuo hadn't found that feeling of safety from anyone else.

Not until nights spent with Xie Lian in Puqi Shrine.

That's the one thing that makes this easier—even if Shuo doesn't really want to go.

Knowing that Hua Cheng won't be alone again in paradise manor, when all of this is over.

He's spent so long missing him.

He deserves to be by the side of the man he adores.

"…Are you scared?" Bao glances over at the door behind Shuo's shoulders, eyebrows raising.

They all know that's the one he'll be taking.

It's ironic—Shuo has doubted so many things about himself. His worth. His purpose. His future.

But he's never thought of himself as a bad person.

Whatever comes next—he doesn't feel like it could be that bad.

"…" He pulls a leaf from his hair, crumbling it between his fingers. "I know we don't have any control over what our next lives are like," he admits.

"But I've always kind of had this dream of what my next one would be like."

It's hard—because he knows how childish and embarrassing it is—

But that never made him stop hoping for it.

"Yeah?"

Shuo pulls his knees against his chest, resting his chin against them.

"…That if Hua Chengzhu ever had a son—a real one—it would be me," he admits in a small voice.

That maybe he wouldn't be the most important person in his world—but he wouldn't feel so disposable either.

"That you and I would be brothers again. And we'd have a sister, and —"

"…We weren't real enough the first time?" Bao tilts his head, watching Shuo with that irritating, discerning gaze.

Always picking up on the things he never actually meant to say out loud.

"You know what I mean," Shuo mutters, lowering his eyes again. "I'm not—"

"He's not like our old dad, Didi." Bao points out softly, watching as Shuo shrinks.

Eyes filled with an ancient pain.

"He would never throw you away like that."

"…I know he's not like him," the ghost agrees, small flames flickering around them like fireflies.

“But I’m not—”

“Good enough?”

Shuo doesn’t answer, and Bao sighs.

“Didi, you’ve gotta grow out of this—it’s a nasty habit.”

“I—”

“Whether or not Hua Chengzhu tells you what you wanna hear has nothing to do with you being good enough,” Bao shakes his head.

“He can’t make you good enough. Neither can the prince, or Qi Rong, or that boy you—”

“We’re not talking about boys,” Shuo cuts him off, his cheeks splotchy and pink. “And I know they can’t. I know I’ll never be—”

“How did you forget the first story we ever knew?”

Shuo lifts his head, staring. “What are you—?”

“Of the man who died a thousand times—but always came back. The god who cast himself back to earth, to protect the orphans of the streets. The man who made the sky rain tears of blood. The—”

“I didn’t forget Hua Chengzhu.”

“You forgot he was an orphan from Xianle, just like you.”

Shuo pauses, his eyes growing wide, because—

He had forgotten that.

“No one gave him permission to be special, Didi.” Bao points out softly. “He didn’t spend all this time waiting for Xie Lian to acknowledge him.”

He spent eight centuries fighting to get stronger even if Xie Lian didn’t acknowledge him.

Because just being useful to him would be enough. And that makes it all the more ironic, remembering—

'You don't have to make yourself useful to justify your existence. '

…Hua Cheng wanted more for Shuo than he—

Shuo's throat tightens, and his knuckles grow white against his shins.

He wanted more for Shuo than he wanted for himself.

"…If you're ready to go, then he wouldn't hold that against you," Bao looks at the red door again.

Remembering how many times Hua Cheng brought them here—always giving them the chance to move on.

But always carrying them back when they chose to stay.

"But I don't think you are."

"…I don't think I get to pick this time, gege," Shuo whispers—shoulders slumped.

He's been dispersed—and he doesn't have the strength to reassemble his spirit. Not after using all of his resentment to unleash human face disease on Bai Wuxiang.

There are consequences to curses like that. He can't just cheat—

"That doesn't mean you don't get to try."

As Bao says this, Shuo turns his head to the side—

Seeing a table of stone—one that's sat empty for centuries now.

But even still, he can see the specters of the gamblers who once sat there.

One round with bright eyes, the other lanky and pockmarked.

Each kinder than they seemed.

Shuo is slow, sliding up from his seat against the red door--ghost fires shivering in the air, slinking close to him, as if trying to give the fallen ghost a hint of warmth.

But a ghost fire always burns cold.

The table sits as empty as ever, left alone for centuries now—

But a set of dice still sit on top. Black, with characters painted in gold. Waiting for the chance to be thrown.

"...Hua Cheng bets his entire soul every time he rolls, you know," Shuo murmurs.

"That's how he wins every time."

Because the base value of his soul is high enough, it tilts luck in his favor. Because any stake lower than that wouldn't be enough to open the door.

If Shuo tries the same thing and loses—there's no second chances.

No red door.

No waiting around, hoping that his luck gets better.

Just oblivion.

But Shuo isn't sure if reincarnation is any better--because he won't be himself. He'll be someone new. All of his feelings, memories, and experiences--those are wiped clean, the moment he moves on.

He has no control over who he'll be, or what he'll do after that.

He won't be him , he'll be some stranger, living someone else's life.

And Shuo—

He lifts the dice, rattling them against his palm gently.

For the first time, understanding why Hua Cheng took that risk.

Because there isn't a huge difference between oblivion and the unknown--and if you still have people you care about, something precious to you in this world—

Fighting to stay, fighting to come back…It might be a riskier bet—but it's always the better one.

But, unlike Hua Cheng, Shuo can't say that he throws the dice with any measure of confidence.

CLACK!

CLACK!

He crouches down on the floor, throwing his arms around his head, waiting for his form to disperse into nothing, but…

There's a low, rumbling groan.

One he knows by heart, after so many years.

And at first—there's part of him that doesn't actually want to open his eyes. That doesn't believe it, but—

When he does, there's a white door waiting for him: standing wide open.

A pair of dice sits alone on the table—gleaming in the firelight.

Two sixes.

And it’s one thing, to want to believe you’re good enough.

It’s another to bet your soul, knowing in your gut that you’ll lose—

And having the universe turn around, and say that it’s enough.

That you’re enough.

The world always likes to push this idea on you, when you’re a kid.

That everyone is equal. No matter what your name is, or where you were born. Regardless of how much money you have in your pocket, or the gender you’re given at birth.

It’s supposedly the natural order of things—and yet the very nature of humans is to separate based on differences.

To sort different qualities as good or bad. To rank certain people over others.

Sometimes, no matter how smart you are, you’ll never be a scholar.

There are people who work themselves to the bone their entire lives, and they die penniless.

How can everyone be equal , when fate treats everyone unequally?

And at some point, very early in his life—

Shuo began to believe that he was never supposed to make it that far.

That whatever fate he possessed—it wasn't a kind one.

Because he was thrown away by his father. Because he was left to hang in that tree, by Lang Ying. Because for so many years, he was just lost .

But now, he understands.

Gods and ghosts are two sides of the same coin.

If ascension isn't determined by class, wealth, and family name—

Neither is the strength of a soul.

"…Gege," he breathes, picking the dice back up, "Gege, did you see —?"

But when the ghost turns around—

Only ghost fires await him, flickering gently in the dark.

"…" Shuo swallows hard, turning back to the waiting door, his throat thick with emotions.

For most people, dead doesn't actually mean gone.

But when it does, it's hard to accept it.

Still.

He makes his way to the open door—old enough to climb the steps on his own now.

Sometimes, you can spend your entire life feeling as though you're struggling up the steps of a winding staircase.

One foot after the other, never feeling the distance you've climbed.

Not until you reach the top, and see what's waiting for you beyond.

Grooooooooan…

There's a low rumble—and when the passageway finally opens into the light—

Shuo has no memory of this place.

An impossibly large cavern with smooth, white walls—a ceiling so high, it’s impossible to see where it ends.

And he isn’t alone, either.

There’s a woman—one with dark hair and amethyst eyes, her cheeks streaked with blood.

Sitting up on her elbows, staring at him with equal curiosity.

And Shuo almost feels a stroke of fear, until—

A silver butterfly lands on his shoulder.

And then—he knows he’s safe .

At First Sight

Chapter Summary

Xie Lian can tell sunrise must be coming.

He can hear the birds starting to wake, and feel the morning dew on the grass beneath his feet.

And now, being here—it's almost like being a teenager again, walking towards the grand temple for his lessons.

"…This reminds me of when I brought you here," he recalls softly, squeezing Hua Cheng's hand.

That draws a ghost of a smile to the man's lips.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Xie Lian can tell sunrise must be coming.

He can hear the birds starting to wake, and feel the morning dew on the grass beneath his feet.

And now, being here—it's almost like being a teenager again, walking towards the grand temple for his lessons.

"…This reminds me of when I brought you here," he recalls softly, squeezing Hua Cheng's hand.

That draws a ghost of a smile to the man's lips.

"Does it really?"

Xie Lian nods, remembering carrying Hong'er up the mountain—how tightly the boy clung to him, back then.

"...You felt so small in my arms back then," he recalls, not seeing the way that smile quickly fades into something a little more sheepish.

"Yes," he agrees, "I suppose I got taller in eight centuries."

"Sooner than that," Xie Lian shakes his head.

"You were taller than me, when you..."

Xie Lian lowers his chin, biting his lip—only for Hua Cheng to reach over and grasp his chin, pulling it free with his thumb.

"I wanted to be taller, even back then."

"...You did?" The god tilts his head. "Why?"

Hua Cheng watches him from the corner of his eye, one hand still resting in the bend of his elbow.

"Because then you might forget how small I used to feel in your arms?"

It's not something he would normally say, and only for the intended result—the smile on Xie Lian's face.

"Gege..." The ghost king whines, but Xie Lian persists.

"You were so cute , San Lang—how could I forget that?"

That was part of how he knew, carrying the ghost king in his child form as they raced towards the gates of Mount Tonglu.

"You could try."

"I won't."

Hua Cheng can't ever seem to make himself look away from him—his gaze impossibly full with every emotion—

But mostly longing.

The ground begins to even out beneath them—and Xie Lian's chest begins to sink with dread.

It hasn't slipped his mind that this isn't a scenic walk.

That Jun Wu will be returning soon, and when he does—

Xie Lian doesn't know what to do .

He effectively has Xie Lian taken hostage, with the shackles on his body—who's to say he couldn't do that again?

Hua Cheng didn't give up his ashes last time, but…

If it meant having to save Xie Lian from that —he would.

And the thought of that makes him desperate.

“San Lang?”

“Yes, gege?”

“I need you to promise—no matter what he tries to do—you won’t tell him where your ashes are.” Xie Lian looks up, his gaze fiercely determined.

And Hua Cheng softens, shaking his head.

“Gege doesn’t need to worry about that.”

“How could I not—?” He falls silent, his heart skipping a beat when Hua Cheng presses his palm against the god’s chest.

“My ashes have always been in the safest place they could be.”

Xie Lian swallows hard, covering Hua Cheng’s hand with his own, knowing how much faith the ghost king has in him, but—

Xie Lian doesn’t know if he deserves it.

He’s failed to protect Hua Cheng so many times—what could he do, if Jun Wu came to take them?

“…But now, if dianxia could forgive this one for being presumptuous—your San Lang has something to ask of you.”

Xie Lian looks up, his heart aching. “It’s not presumpt—”

“You love me.”

Just hearing the words makes Xie Lian’s face burn, heart fluttering with embarrassment.

“…I do,” he agrees quietly.

He said as much in Mount Tonglu, holding onto him—crying his heart out as, for the first time, the world gave something back to him.

But outside of the heat of such a moment—shyness finds him.

“Could dianxia say it again?”

Now, the heat in his face is even worse , but—

Xie Lian clears his throat, squeezing his hand tighter on top of Hua Cheng's.

"…I love you," he says—quietly, but with sincerity dripping from every syllable.

Unable to see the utter bliss in Hua Cheng's face, when he says it.

"This is where I become presumptuous—because I have something else to ask of you," he murmurs, allowing the world to fade around them for a moment. "And it's a very selfish thing to ask."

His prince tilts his head to the side, curious.

"What is it?"

Hua Cheng's other hand comes up to his face, gently brushing his hair from his eyes.

"There's someone more precious to me than anything else in this world." He explains softly. "Everything I am, everything I do—it's all for him."

Suddenly, Xie Lian's chest is tight.

"…I know," he whispers, his throat dry, but—

Hua Cheng's fingers brush under his chin, tilting his face back as he presses a kiss to the prince's forehead.

"Please—don't treat him so carelessly."

"…" Xie Lian slides his arms around Hua Cheng's neck, hugging him tightly.

He can't promise that he won't get hurt again. Or that he won't be placed in a situation where he has to put himself in danger, but…

"…I'll try," he promises, the tips of his toes barely brushing the ground when Hua Cheng's arms tighten around his back, holding him closer.

And Xie Lian knows why Hua Cheng is asking him this. Feels the weight of the god slayer in his sleeve like another shackle, but…

What other way is there? How can Hua Cheng be in two places at once, and fight enemies like Jun Wu and Bai Wuxiang? He—

“There’s one other thing I was wondering about,” Hua Cheng interrupts his thoughts, knowing they don’t have much more time. “But I didn’t get the chance to ask you before.”

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow. “…What is it?”

“In the Kiln—you met her.”

His eyes widen in remembrance.

“…Yes,” he agrees. “She was…fearsome.”

As a martial god himself—Xie Lian would use nothing short of the word amazing , but—

“Did she tell you anything about Jun Wu before you escaped? Anything you can remember?”

Xie Lian squints, thinking.

“No…” He frowns. They didn’t have time to talk about much , given everything that was going on—and Xie Lian can only remember parts. “…She told me she was sorry, that she would hold back Bai Wuxiang as long as she could, and…”

His nose wrinkles with concentration.

“…I tried to return Fangxin to her,” it’s hers, after all. “She didn’t take it, but she said something about having you replace it, eventually.”

He realizes how that sounds after a moment, shaking his head awkwardly. “Not that I would expect—”

“Gege,” Hua Cheng chuckles.

“You do remember I gave you my entire armory, don’t you?”

Xie Lian blanches.

Yes, he remembers , but he didn’t think Hua Cheng was serious about that—

“Do you think in eight hundred years, I didn’t make a sword specifically for you?”

“I—”

CLANG!

Sparks fly from clashing steel behind them—E’Ming flying out to parry the blow before it can even come close to Hua Cheng’s back.

The ghost king doesn’t turn around, still holding Xie Lian in his arms.

“My my,” he muses, squeezing the prince close. “Who’s classless now?”

“…Civilized tactics can be put aside when a fox thinks he can sneak away with a crown jewel, I suppose.”

The breach in the emperor’s armor has been resealed—and aside from a slight favoring of his right side when he walks—he seems completely uninjured.

Hua Cheng bares his teeth—but it’s Xie Lian who speaks first.

“San Lang hasn’t taken anything that wasn’t already his.”

Jun Wu’s eyes widen sharply, and Xie Lian doesn’t mean it the way it sounds , but—

You could still knock Hua Cheng down with a feather after hearing it.

“Exactly,” he repeats faintly—fingertips unintentionally digging into the small of Xie Lian’s back.

Jun Wu looks at the prince, his eyes narrowing with anger.

“…Xianle—I don’t think I’ve ever been so disappointed.”

Days ago, those words would have crushed him.

“That makes two of us.”

But not anymore.

Hua Cheng flashes away from Xie Lian’s side to parry the emperor’s next strike, crossing blades with him again and again, not showing an ounce of fear.

CLANG!

CLANG!

“…I’m only going to ask you one more time,” Jun Wu murmurs.

Their arms are straining as they push against each other, eyes glaring viciously—each trying to break the other’s guard.

“Where. Are. Your. Ashes?”

Hua Cheng’s smile is fierce, fangs gleaming.

“How about I show you mine if you show me yours?”

CLANG!

They could go on like this endlessly—but Jun Wu has been worn down by so many rounds of fighting—

And he didn’t come to play fair, or enter some climactic conclusion.

He came to end this—and end it quickly .

His eyes slip over Hua Cheng’s shoulder, back to Xie Lian’s face.

He’s watched the prince since his birth—through every trial, joy, and disappointment.

“…I hope you understand I didn’t want this,” he says softly—knowing that, even from a distance, Xie Lian will hear him. “As a matter of fact —it breaks my heart.”

“What heart?” Hua Cheng snarls, pressing harder, on the verge of making Jun Wu’s knees buckle, but—

There’s a pained gasp behind him.

One that, after what happened on the Mountain, makes Hua Cheng’s blood run cold.

“You forced this choice on me, Xianle.”

But when Hua Cheng turns his head—he doesn’t see the shackle on Xie Lian’s neck glowing the way it did before, when Jun Wu used it to torment him. No—

Black marks start to sprout across the prince’s jaw like ink, curling and twisting.

Forming a fourth shackle.

Xie Lian stumbles, hands clawing at his mouth, voice straining and changing, as Jun Wu—

As he begins to seal something else away.

“W-what is t-this?!”

“What you asked for,” Jun Wu replies calmly as Hua Cheng shoves him back. “Don’t you remember?”

When they were in the Heavenly Capital months ago, and rather than deny the allegations of the Gilded Banquet—

Xie Lian asked Jun Wu to place another shackle on him as punishment, sealing his voice.

“You’ve caused so much death. So much destruction.”

Xie Lian’s knees hit the ground.

“Yin Yu is dead. Your friends are dying. Countless mortals have lost their lives already—all because you couldn’t do as you were told . And for what?”

CLANG!

“You were content to roll in the mud with humans for almost a thousand years.”

CLANG!

“You never stopped to care about what I was doing then , but you’ve started now? Has ‘exposing the truth’ brought anything but suffering?”

Xie Lian winces, struggling to speak, clutching either side of his head.

Feeling growing pressure in his ears.

A fifth shackle.

“You think you can outthink, out fight, out smart the world?” Jun Wu sneers, struggling to hold Hua Cheng back, adding the new shackles straining his strength, but—

He won’t need much.

“You aren’t different from me, Xianle. And if you don’t change—you’ll FALL!”

Xie Lian winces as their voices become distant, shoulders trembling under the weight.

It’s crushing him.

He can’t, he can’t, he can’t .

Jun Wu’s voice is still there, faint—demanding.

“WILL YOU CHANGE? WILL YOU CHANGE? WILL YOU CHANGE?!”

A pained sob rips from Xie Lian’s throat as he shakes his head vehemently.

Knowing what “changing” means for Jun Wu.

Xie Lian joining him—or becoming just as ruthless as he is.

“I WON’T!” He screams, even as his jaw tries to lock itself shut. “I WON’T CHANGE!”

He won’t change, because there are mothers who give even the most meager of meals a name, just to make their sons smile.

He won’t change, because there are children who will leave bowls of food outside of a blind man’s shrine, even when he has nothing to give in return.

He won’t change, because there are mortals who will pick you up from the ground and give you the hat from their own head, just to shield you from the rain.

He won’t change, because there are friends who promised to protect him forever—not only until it got hard.

He won’t change, because even after so many years of hurting each other, there are friends who will stand beside you.

(Even when they think they’ll never have your forgiveness.)

He won’t change, because there are little girls who spend centuries defending those who scorned them

He won’t change, because there are students who learn the hardest lessons—in ways that you never meant to teach them.

He won’t change, because when he was standing alone in the dark—someone reached through a bridal veil to take his hand.

He won’t change, because every single time he fell, someone caught him.

He won’t change, because even when he was so sure he would be forced to face the endless stretch of time alone—his Hong’er came back to him.

He won’t change, because golden palaces will always fall.

That’s the point of building them in the first place.

Xie Lian won’t change, because he never hated this world—even when it hated him.

Xie Lian won’t change, because he loves this world.

And he loves the people in it.

And now, even as his voice starts to grow fainter and fainter, as the world around him grows closer to silence—

Xie Lian screams out.

“I WON’T CHANGE! EVEN IF IT’S PAINFUL I WON’T CHANGE, EVEN IF I DIE I WON’T CHANGE, I WILL NEVER CHANGE!!!”

Kindness is never weakness.

Being gentle does not make a man meek.

And it requires far more strength than it takes to become cruel.

Xie Lian reaches for the dagger in his sleeve, croaking out an apology to Hua Cheng as his jaw seals shut, knowing that he doesn’t have another choice, but—

A hand rests over his own, stopping him, and before Xie Lian can struggle—

He hears a voice in the distance, small and faint;

“You don’t need it, your highness.”

Xie Lian shakes his head weakly, fingers trembling as he feels Hua

Cheng enter his communication array.

'You've always been stronger than him. '

The prince twists his head back and forth, golden shackles gleaming painfully in the morning twilight, tears creating paths through the blood and grime on his cheeks.

'I'm not, San Lang—not like this, he has millions of believers, I—'

'So what?' Arms tighten around him, forcing him to set the dagger aside. 'He had millions of fools following him. But you? For you, even just one person is enough.'

Xie Lian's eyes grow wide.

One person is enough?

'San—'

Lips press against his, and there's no more thinking.

No more breathing.

Xie Lian doesn't even think he can feel his own heartbeat anymore—not with the surge of power coursing under his skin.

Pulsing louder, brighter, until it consumes every part of him.

Until Xie Lian feels his ears popping—a roaring rush as sound returns.

Until his jaw unlocks, lips parting as Hua Cheng kisses him deeper, a sound of surprise slipping from the back of his throat.

His foot jerks with shock, feeling something around his ankle snap —

But Xie Lian doesn't feel any pain.

And it's too much, it's so much power, he finds himself writhing in Hua Cheng's grip, struggling to push him away, because he can't take it , but—

The ghost king grips the back of his head firmly, not allowing Xie Lian to squirm away from him.

Not this time.

Not until something around his neck shatters, and Xie Lian starts gasping for air, arms trembling, because—

In eight hundred years, he had forgotten what it felt like to take a full breath. Clinging to the back of Hua Cheng's robes, until—

Until, after so many years of fumbling around, staring into the darkness—

Xie Lian sees a crack of light.

Then another.

And another.

Fractals of gold filling the darkness, stretching out like spidery veins—until finally, there's no more shadow.

Only blinding rays of light.

It's overwhelming , paired with the power coursing through his body, the roaring in his ears, the thundering of his heart—

But as it all begins to fade, it doesn't grow dark —

It just becomes clear.

And for the first time in eight hundred years, the first thing Xie Lian sees with his own eyes is a young man.

One with sharp features—wild, dark hair, and a leather patch over his right eye.

His left is a falling star, sparkling down at him like a wish.

Wearing crimson red robes and silver vambraces, butterflies edged across the surface.

Xie Lian has never seen him before—

And yet, he would know him anywhere.

He would know him by the scent of the forest all around him. By the touch of his hand.

He would know him by the silver bells on his boots, jingling as he holds Xie Lian closer, their noses bumping together.

Clink!

Clink!

Xie Lian would know him without memory of him, like a wound on his soul—one he'd never wish to be healed from.

He would know him if he didn't know himself , has known him with so many different faces, names, and lifetimes—

And every single time, he's been loved by him.

Been saved by him.

All those years ago—Xie Lian caught him once.

And Hong'er caught him every time after.

Now, he reaches up with trembling fingers, pressing his palm against his believer's cheek—

And Hua Cheng stares back into the eyes that saved him first.

That loved him, when he never thought he could be worthy.

That gave him a reason.

Xie Lian smiles—so much that it hurts—his eyes swimming with tears that hold no hint of sorrow or pain.

His thumb strokes across Hua Cheng's cheek bone—just under the leather of his eye patch.

He whispers to him, his voice raw—but brimming with adoration.

"…Handsome."

A wet, shocked chuckle slips from Hua Cheng's lips, eye widening.

"I always tried to tell you," his prince reminds him with a shaky smile.

"You—You did…" Hua Cheng pushes his hair back, only to be pulled in for another kiss, this time softer—Xie Lian's hands in his hair.

"My handsome, brave San Lang," Xie Lian whispers against him, feeling Hua Cheng shudder in response.

He doesn't want to move. Doesn't want to let go yet.

Doesn't ever want to let him go again.

But they aren't finished yet.

"…Come back to me?" He whispers.

Hua Cheng presses their foreheads together, his hands squeezing tight around Xie Lian's waist.

"Always," he swears, making the same oath again, and again, and again.

And now, he helps his god to his feet.

"You'll tell me when?"

Xie Lian nods, hands aching as he's forced to let him go, but—

"Oh, and Dianxia."

He looks up just in time for something to be placed in his hands.

A long, white scabbard—one that fits perfectly in his palm.

Just like it was made for him.

"This is—?"

"I already told you," Hua Cheng smiles.

Normally, a sword has its name painted across the hilt—but in this case, for obvious reasons—

It simply bears the golden effigy of a flower.

"Everything I have is yours."

But this—this was made especially for him.

Hua Cheng lifts his palm, sparing Xie Lian one more look—his gaze brimming with an emotion Xie Lian never would have expected to see. Not when someone was looking at him, anyway—

Pride.

"See you soon, gege."

CLACK!

CLACK!

BOOM!

CRASH!

ROAAAAAAAR!

Lang Qianqiu can barely move, his entire body wracked with pain as his eyes crack open—swollen and stinging from—

…Salt water.

He's been moved above the valley that was once the foot of Mount Tonglu, left on a stone outcropping along the ridge, and when he sits up—

He sees that the land below has been flooded with water—enormous, skeletal spines appearing and disappearing between the waves.

"…What the hell is that?" He rasps, rubbing his head—finding Quan Yizhen sitting beside him.

In better shape, though not by much, legs dangling over the edge as he watches the scene below.

"Blackwater is fighting Bai Wuxiang," he explains quietly, watching the two clash.

Several sea serpents of bone, twisting and curling around a man-made lagoon, caging the two calamities in, even as Bai Wuxiang slams into them over and over again, desperately fighting to escape.

"Think your other half can help you?" He Xuan asks him darkly.

"No one can."

Every single time Bai Wuxiang even manages to get a finger outside of the perimeter, golden chains appear, dragging him back in.

"…We're evenly matched like this, you fool!" Bai Wuxiang snarls, straining against his bonds. "At this rate, we'll just destroy each other!"

"Fine."

Bai Wuxiang looks back over his shoulder, incredulous—and He Xuan raises an eyebrow, completely unfazed.

"It seems you forget I'm vengeful to a fault until it stops being convenient for you."

"Vengeful?!" The elder calamity repeats, incredulous.

He's soaked to the bone, his face covered in growths—splitting into new mouths, screaming, multiplying by the minute.

"Why would you be vengeful against me?! I orchestrated it so you could GET your revenge, you idiotic little—"

CRACK!

He Xuan's claws leave three deep marks.

"…It's almost infuriating," He Xuan sneers, pulling his hand back in disgust. "How many lives you destroy without even remembering the most minute details."

"I—"

"Gave a desperate teenager what you framed as an easy out —and I hated him for that," He Xuan admits slowly. "But he never tried to tell me it wasn't his fault. He never tried to push the blame on someone else."

"He was weak ," Bai Wuxiang retorts, hair damp, sticking to his cheeks. "He wanted to reap the benefits of ruthlessness, but couldn't live with the responsibility—"

"What do you know about taking responsibility for anything?"

A lifetime ago, when He Xuan could have been many things, he chose to be a scholar.

Nose buried in countless texts, fingertips stained with ink.

A son of a ship builder—but when he prepared for his civil exams, he studied countless philosophies.

And in every single one—the but-for cause of harm bears the most responsibility.

Jun Wu taught Shi Wudu that spell, hoping he would use it.

He used He Xuan's future, his sister's future, Qin Meirong's future—

All as tools for blackmail, to keep a promising young god in check.

Without him—it never would have happened.

And Bai Wuxiang can't even admit to that.

But even if that was the only thing—

He Xuan has other grudges held against Bai Wuxiang.

"I haven't forced anyone to suffer through something I myself wouldn't—"

He Xuan lashes out suddenly, gripping the hair on the back of the calamity's head, slamming it down.

THUD!

"Really?" He Xuan snarls, fangs bared as he watches blood drip from the calamity's temple. "Someone's held you down like this, then?"

Golden chains wrap around his wrists, his ankles, his throat, dragging him down to his hands and knees.

"Someone's put you in shackles?"

He Xuan isn't even remotely vile enough to even consider putting this thing through the other forms of pain it's caused.

And even if he was—even touching him this much makes the man sick.

"What—are you trying to avenge him?" Bai Wuxiang hisses, disbelieving.

And when he begins thrashing, the chains binding him start to break.

"I don't know if that makes you pitiful, or a goddamn Saint ," he rises back up to his knees. "Either way—you're a failure . If you'd rather be destroyed in his account then so BE IT!"

His hand shoots out, grabbing one of the skeletal serpents wriggling around them—ripping off a section of spine, the bones sharpening in his hands as he levels them against He Xuan like a blade, knocking him back.

“You were one of the few who could have walked away from this,” Bai Wuxiang points out over the roar of the sea, his gaze cold and unforgiving. “But you’d rather die before your son takes his first breaths—”

CLANG!

Steel meets bone, grinding and crushing.

An old, worn battle ax has cut the bone through—sliding deep into Bai Wuxiang’s palm, where even more faces are springing forth.

Screaming for mercy.

“If it means he’s born into a world without you?” He Xuan’s eyes are a burning sea of hatred. “Happily.”

Even if he has no intention of losing today.

(He promised Shi Qingxuan that he would bring their best friend back.)

Bai Wuxiang shoves him back again, stumbling to avoid the waves churning all around.

Up until now, he’s always used a blade to fight his battles.

Elegant weapons—those that allow him to cling to some guise of civilized nature, even when he’s been reduced to something far more barbaric.

But now, he’s forced to lower himself.

Claws extending, fangs bared—eyes turning black.

With that, and the faces spreading across his skin—he doesn’t look human at all anymore.

More like something pulled from the recesses of a nightmare—never meant to see the light of day.

And yet—it suits him more than any mask he’s ever worn.

It’s more honest, in a sense.

“…You think you’re different from all the others?” Bai Wuxiang rasps, claws glinting in the pale light. “You think that in two thousand years, there weren’t others who tried to stop me? Stronger than you. Braver than you.”

“Maybe,” Blackwater admits, unfazed. “But I doubt you let them get that far before you clipped their wings, did you?”

“It wouldn’t have MATTERED!”

The fighting between them becomes a bloody thing.

Violent swings of an axe. Claws and teeth, saltwater sinking into their wounds with a vindictive sting.

"There is only one who has ever come close to taking me from this world," the first calamity admits, blood dripping down his jaw. "But I've found her heirs to be lackluster."

He Xuan's breaths are wet and ragged, ax gripped tightly in his palm.

"Says the one who wasn't willing to fight Crimson Rain in the Kiln," he sneers, raising an eyebrow.

Of course, between communicating about the fall of the Heavens, He Xuan heard .

Says the creature who places any god who could stand against him in chains.

He would have done the same to He Xuan already, had the new water master not rejected the Heavens from the moment of his ascension.

Bai Wuxiang skids backwards, feet balancing on the surface of the water.

"I'll be more than willing to fight him when he fails to save you from —"

Bai Wuxiang falls silent, eyes whipping to the side, tracing a new source of movement—a point of light, glinting as it darts through the waves, the clouds of soot and smoke.

And when it flutters past him, landing on Bai Wuxiang's arm, He Xuan's eyes grow impossibly wide.

A maple leaf—gleaming like molten bronze.

Made from pure spiritual energy.

Followed by one—then another, and another, until Bai Wuxiang is swarmed with them. Slicing into his skin, making it easier for He Xuan's chains to drag him down .

When He Xuan looks back over his shoulder—

The doors to the Kiln stand wide open.

Bai Wuxiang follows his gaze—only to find her standing there. At the very edge of the barrier.

As far as she can go.

Hammer clutched between her fingertips.

Hair loose, blowing around her shoulders in the wind.

And even from this distance—he can see her mouth the words, even if the sound is lost to the wind.

'It ends here. '

His gaze narrows with hatred, teeth bared in a vicious snarl.

She can't hurt him anymore.

No one can.

There was a time when she believed that.

When she buried two sons and had a third ripped from her arms.

Believed that he was inescapable.

And each time she found herself on the verge of bringing another ghost king into this world—Zhao Beitong refused.

She lovingly named each after her lost sons, then swallowed them whole.

Until the third.

Until she met a young man with a fire in his heart that burned so brightly—she was forced to turn her eyes away from the shadows.

To look back on a world she had forsaken.

Hua Cheng didn't make her think the world wasn't cruel.

He didn't make her think that Bai Wuxiang's defeat was certain.

But he made her remember that it is always better to rage and claw and bite than to fade quietly into the shadow.

That the nature of a ghost is to fight .

That when you send your sons out into the world, you know it's a brutal existence. That they'll suffer and break and struggle—and sometimes, they don't come back to you.

But even in all of that pain—they live a life. Painful, beautiful, and it is theirs .

All you can do is love them as much as you can before you feed them into it.

Love them, and teach them.

Teach them to be more dangerous than what waits in the dark.

To have longer claws and sharper teeth.

With that in her heart, she forged Crimson Rain Sought Flower.

And when she met a young man with nothing left in his heart but hatred and vengeance, and held him in her arms. Seeing not what he had become--but what he was. What he would be again.

A good man.

Black Water Sinking Ships.

Two ghost kings, for two ages of pain and peril that passed through this world. Reflecting unfathomable death, suffering, and injustice.

Now, this earth finds itself on the precipice again—

And Zhao Beitong had three sons.

There were always Four Great Tales of the Heavens.

They were always meant to be paired with Four Great Calamities.

And when the bell tolled, a knock landing on her door once again—she found a child of revolution and war.

A lost soul, found over and over again.

Who has always had a reason to remain in this world—one he didn't recognize himself, hiding it under layers of self-doubt, but one Zhao Beitong knows all too well.

A fierce devotion to one's family.

Now, she forges her final Calamity—

Autumn Twilight Shrouding Forests.

THUD!

Bai Wuxiang breaks his gaze from his wife's face—

Looking down at his bleeding stump of a wrist.

Two daggers gleam viciously, one turned black with the calamity's cursed blood, dripping down into the waters below.

"...That's a desperate move, even for her," Bai Wuxiang hisses, watching as the child of Xianle stands before him now.

With eyes like twin wildfires, leaves whipping around him in a fury, mixing in with the maelstrom of waves.

"Turning a child into a weapon."

"You're one to talk about desperation," Ren Song mutters, feeling a hand land heavily on his shoulder.

He turns his head, finding He Xuan staring down at him with a painful mixture of emotions—

But more than anything else, relief .

"Don't ever do that again."

"..." Ren Song smiles up at him, shaking his head. "You're always bossing me around, but I'm older than you, you know—”

"What? Expecting me to call you gege?"

"Couldn't hurt ," he shrugs, looking back at Bai Wuxiang. "And she didn't help me so I could kill you."

No. That task has always belonged to someone else.

Bai Wuxiang watches the two Ghost Kings, prowling around him like wolves circling a kill.

But he's no frightened deer. He's a predator on his own, waiting to make his own meal out of them.

"No one can kill me now."

"Is that so?"

A hand lands in Ren Song's hair--heavy, but reassuring in its weight—ruffling it softly.

Clink!

Clink!

"I've heard conflicting reports on the matter."

A silver saber rattles in its sheathe.

"I suppose I'll have to see for myself."

His gaze flickers towards He Xuan and Ren Song momentarily—conveying a silent message—and the waters around them slow, growing still.

Bai Wuxiang has an opening to run now —

But he doesn't take it.

Watching as He Xuan and Ren Song move back.

"...You're arrogant enough to fight me alone?" The White Clothed Calamity stares, his eyebrows slowly raising—

And Hua Cheng simply smiles.

It isn't a kind one.

"It won't be much of a fight."

Not with Xie Lian half a world away, and He Xuan and Ren Song moved out of range.

Jun Wu has always been careful to face Hua Cheng in a situation where hostages were involved—and Bai Wuxiang would be no different.

But without that threat present—it leaves him free to fight without regard for anything else.

Nothing, except for the kill .

And for the first time, when faced with an attack—

Bai Wuxiang dodges.

Flips away from E'Ming, rather than attempting to block it with his arm, or allowing himself to take the damage in order to gain an opening.

Almost as if he knows this fight is going to be different.

As if he fears allowing the scimitar to touch him.

His hand lands on the newly exposed earth as the waters slowly begin to retreat back to the river banks, finding a weapon discarded from earlier, barely raising it in time—

CLANG!

But when he looks up, it isn't into the famed gaze of the greatest calamity, one of dark leather and an eye like a flame—

No, he looks into the eyes of a teenager, dressed in the armor of a different time.

One eye dark as pitch, the other red as blood.

Scars on his cheeks—a nose twice broken, and healed as many times.

Wielding a saber far more simple than E'Ming, but more than strong enough Bai Wuxiang, forcing him back.

"I haven't been able to wear this skin since I died," he admits in the voice of a young man.

One who never screamed or begged for mercy, not until the very end.

The one Bai Wuxiang never broke .

A reminder that only makes the calamity gnash his teeth in frustration, shoving him back.

"Who wants the face of a useless child?"

But—

CLANG!

Another blow rains down—this time, from an entirely different direction.

Bai Wuxiang parries a blade of black steel, gleaming wickedly against his own.

Wielded by another young man--this one in black armor, and—

A white mask covering his face.

Smiling.

Born into this world in a moment of pure anguish and rage—and dragged out of it the same way.

The one who denied Bai Wuxiang of what he desired most ardently, back then.

Xie Lian, alone.

"...Clones?" He mutters, disbelieving. "You actually mean to fight me with clones?"

CLANG!

This time, he blocks a teenager with eyes like two fallen stars—wearing robes the color of maple leaves, wild, dark hair braided over his shoulder.

The same boy who fell into the Sinner's Pit.

"Oh, no," Hua Cheng corrects him softly.

THUD!

Something slams into the calamity's back, just between his shoulders, and he twists his head around--only to find a ghost fire, flickering in the pale light.

"Consider them visual aids—to jog your memory. It seemed like a senile piece of trash like you might need it."

"Hardly," Bai Wuxiang replies coldly. "Your failures have been nothing if not memorable —”

CRACK!

This time, when he goes to parry the next attack—

His blade crumbles upon impact. Shards of steel embedding themselves in his forearm and shoulder.

E'Ming gleams up at him.

Wielded by a man in crimson robes and silver vambraces, leather covering his right eye—

And a wicked, bloodthirsty smile, his gaze glinting with vicious promise.

"Before I erase you from this world, you're going to do something for me."

Long ago, this creature stole something from him. Leaving him wandering alone in the dark for countless centuries, fumbling blindly for the light.

Now, Hua Cheng wants it back.

E'Ming's edge rests beneath the Calamity's chin, waiting.

"You're going to say my name."

Bai Wuxiang towered over him once.

A daunting specter of power, holding Hong’er’s entire soul in the palm of his hand.

But that was all a mask—half laughing, half crying.

This was always lying beneath.

This warped, miserable, pathetic thing .

“…You think you can torture anything out of me now?” Bai Wuxiang rasps, hands glowing white hot as he welds the broken shards of his sword back together.

Hua Cheng's smile widens.

And the ground beneath them shudders.

"You think you're beyond suffering?"

If he does, then he is a fool.

"What if, when I'm through with you, there's nothing left?"

The earth groans violently as they clash.

"Not even the ruins of Wuyong."

Not the palace he once called home. The empty frames of his temples. Not even the altar where his brother fell.

"You hear it, don't you?"

CLANG!

Each time they clash, Bai Wuxiang's blade is fractured and remade, weaker each time.

But he hears it, even from hundreds of miles away.

Rolling Thunder, rocking the continent from the scale of its force.

"Someone is burning your temples."

All ten thousand of them.

"When I'm through, there will be no trace that you ever set your feet upon this earth," Hua Cheng swears. "You won't be around to fool Anyone with a new name or disguise. It will be as if you never existed."

People will forget him.

" He won't," Bai Wuxiang snarls, clinging to the one vindictive point of victory, watching the ground crack around them.

Lava from the chambers beneath the remnants of Mount Tonglu bubbling forth.

"You think he ever COULD?! HE—"

“He will.”

In spite of Bai Wuxiang sneering about Hua Cheng’s use of clones—it doesn’t feel like fighting one opponent.

It feels like fighting four .

CLANG!

CLANG!

“There will come a day when he’s been free from pain and fear for so long, he’ll forget what it felt like.”

Hua Cheng will make sure of it.

"He'll look over his shoulder, and stop expecting to see you there. He'll dream again, and it won't be about you. Every scar on his body will heal. And it will be like you. Never. Existed."

Every single word is punctuated by a following blow.

Hua Cheng will rebuild the ruins of Xianle if he has to. Erase every trace of Human Face Disease from this earth. Destroy texts and erase oral histories, until there isn't a whisper of him left.

Any lingering thought of him will be reduced to nothing more than a story to scare children.

But never a name. Never a face. Only a formless monster that exists in between the pages of a story. One that ends , the cover slamming shut with the final chapter.

Bai Wuxiang's sword falls—not because his hand stopped holding it—but because his arm has been hewn away at the shoulder.

By a white masked shoulder with a black saber.

The other is the next to go.

Ripped apart by a youth in robes the shade of maple leaves.

Something wet lands on his cheek, swallowed by countless screaming faces, swirling across the calamity's skin, and when he looks up—

The sky has begun to rain blood.

Hands lock down on his shoulders, forcing him to his knees.

"Say it."

His jaw locks shut in stubborn refusal, but—

He watches now, as lava flows pour down the valley, rushing towards the ruins that were once his home—beginning to swallow it whole.

Listens, as his temples are raised to ash.

And it's—

"Say it."

It's painfully familiar.

Just like—

"Say it."

Just like last time.

And he doesn't, he can't—

"SAY IT!"

Finally, through clenched, blood stained teeth, Hua Cheng hears his birth name, his full name—for the first time:

"P...Pei Hong..."

The boy born beneath a Star of Solitude.

To two parents who loved one another, but never got the chance to see him grow.

The boy who fell from the city walls, only to be caught in the arms of a prince.

The child who refused to leave this world. Who would not be erased. Who will never be forgotten.

Thud .

Bai Wuxiang looks down—only to find a blade buried in his chest.

The cursed scimitar, E'Ming—pulsing with spiritual power.

Shredding his soul apart.

“You should be grateful to me, you know.”

Hua Cheng has been waiting so long to say those words.

“Without me...your story would have been so boring .”

Little more than a hideous villain, lurking within the shadows of a story. The sort that snatches babes from their cribs. Locks princesses in ivory towers.

“Look at the role you got to play. Beautiful, isn’t it?”

Even if Hua Cheng would never call it such—he doubts anyone else could have pulled this off.

The longest lie in history, perpetrated by its greatest killer, wearing the mask of a friend.

And no one suspected a thing.

"You said that the prince loved fairy tales."

E'Ming twists in his chest, forcing a rattling gasp from the creature, the screams of the faces on his body growing louder.

“And look at you now. A hideous little creature...desperately in love with a prince,” he sneers the words back at him, speaking next to his ear.

"But he would never have you. And even if you tried..."

No one ever would.

A lifetime ago, Hua Cheng would not have dared to say these words.

Would have found it too presumptuous. Too shameful.

But he—

"He is mine ."

Hua Cheng has always been a selfish man.

He knows that he'll never deserve him. That it's the cruelest joke in the world, for Xie Lian to be held by a lowly creature like him.

Hua Cheng has always been his, and for some reason, in some fit of madness—

Xie Lian chose him.

Those are the last words Bai Wuxiang hears, before his form begins to cave in on itself.

Swirling and contracting, spiritual aura screaming and flickering—

Until nothing is left but a ghost fire, floating in the palm of his hand.

And Hua Cheng doesn't let him go.

Chapter End Notes

> drum roll it's been a long journey, but this is no longer a blind! Xie Lian fic anymore! we made it!

Body in Abyss, Heart in Paradise

Chapter Summary

Jun Wu staggers backwards, clawing at the horde of butterflies as they hover around him, wings slicing with every beat—

“ENOUGH!“ He clenches his fist, sending out a shockwave of spiritual power, surprised to find—

He feels surprisingly light.

Like a weight has been lifted.

After countless rounds of battle and mounting exhaustion—

He hadn’t expected such a sudden rush of relief.

And for a moment, that brings a surge of confidence, watching as the wraith butterflies around him wither.

“Well, Crimson Rain…” he muses, “looks like you’ve tired out.”

Chapter Notes

CONTENT WARNINGS: death, gore

Jun Wu staggers backwards, clawing at the horde of butterflies as they hover around him, wings slicing with every beat—

“ENOUGH!“ He clenches his fist, sending out a shockwave of spiritual power, surprised to find—

He feels surprisingly light.

Like a weight has been lifted.

After countless rounds of battle and mounting exhaustion—

He hadn’t expected such a sudden rush of relief.

And for a moment, that brings a surge of confidence, watching as the wraith butterflies around him wither.

“Well, Crimson Rain…” he muses, “looks like you’ve tired out.”

But when he turns around—Hua Cheng isn't anywhere to be found, and—

It's…snowing?

All around him, as far as the eye can see, falling down as the sun rises over the central plains.

But when Jun Wu reaches up to catch a piece between his fingertips—

It's a flower petal.

Gleaming gold—composed of spiritual power.

Falling around him like snow.

"It's just us, now."

His voice is as soft as it ever was—and yet it echoes, filling the air around them like thunder.

That's when the emperor sees him.

Walking lightly across the ground—his robes bloodied and torn from the battle, boots abandoned after carrying Mu Qing into the lake before.

With each step he takes, wildflowers bloom beneath his feet.

And as golden petals fall around his head, they begin to form a crown.

His eyes are filled with golden light—

No shackles to be seen.

His neck and ankles bare.

"…What has he done?" Jun Wu whispers, shaking his head

How is that possible?

Xie Lian's reply is deceptively simple:

"What you were afraid to do."

There are those who will always see something beautiful, and feel the overwhelming desire to place it in a cage.

Hua Cheng has always been the one to fling the door open, offering that which he loves the greatest gift of all;

Freedom.

What comes out of Xie Lian's mouth next makes the emperor go still.

"Lay down your weapons, your highness." Xie Lian encourages him quietly, his voice echoing across the plains. "There's no need to fight any more."

It's finished, now.

Jun Wu stares at him in shocked silence.

"…Did I ever ask for your forgiveness?" He asks him slowly, seeming offended by even the most minute offer of kindness. "Did I ask for mercy?"

Xie Lian arches one perfectly shaped brow.

"I offered you dignity," he explains softly. "And I never said that I forgave you."

He doesn't know if he could.

"…A significant amount of my power these last eight centuries went into those shackles," Jun Wu points out, his gaze lingering on Xie Lian's throat. "It'll be just like the last time we fought."

Just before Xie Lian's second banishment.

"…I suppose we'll have to find out." His one-time protege replies.

BOOM!

In the imperial city, hundreds of miles away, mothers hold their children close.

As far as Yunmeng, battle-worn cultivators and martial gods lift their heads and listen to the sound.

Jun Wu took the first strike, attempting to slip around the prince and hit him from behind—

A mistake, fighting a man accustomed to fighting things he cannot see.

Xie Lian blocked him with Fangxin—not even taking the blade from its scabbard.

But he doesn't let Jun Wu make the second attack.

BOOM!

Each time their blades clash, the ground quakes, wind rushing around them.

BOOM!

But while Jun Wu is concentrated, moving desperately to break his guard—

Xie Lian makes it look like a dance, moving like water.

Jun Wu might be wearing a full set of armor—

But Xie Lian has never worn it, not even once.

It makes him light, and compared to the emperor—impossibly fast. Slipping under his attacks before they even get close.

"You won't be able to bring me down with elegant footwork!"

As he says this, he holds his hand outward, summoning a mass of stone from a nearby hillside, sending it hurtling towards the back of Xie Lian's head, and—

When the prince raises his hand, holding his palm out, it turns to dust and silt upon impact.

It blows past them in a thick cloud—leaving both men covered in a thin layer of dust.

The emperor's eyes widen, realizing that, for the first time in his godhood—

He's found himself in a fair fight.

That knowledge breeds urgency.

One that the emperor hasn't felt since he was a child, forced to live behind a mask.

He stretches one hand out, his palm glowing with power as he opens a storage array—

Summoning a storm of swords to his side.

Every single one Zhao Beitong ever forged—flying forth in a fury.

CLANG!

Only to meet an equal, if not greater surge of blades—this time made from pure light.

During their last battle, Xie Lian summoned three thousand swords, and made one dent in his armor.

Now—he summons ten thousand, both gods rising from the ground.

Blades swirling around them like swarms of hornets, clashing all around—and as Jun Wu's eyes scan the horizon—

Something seems to occur to him, and in a flash, he leaps on top of one of the weapons—flying past the prince in a gleaming flash.

But Xie Lian isn't far behind, riding the surge of blades he summoned, fangxin aloft in his right hand.

His non-dominant arm, curiously enough.

Flying through the clouds as the emperor surges across the plains, wondering—

Because retreat isn't Jun Wu's style.

But as the surge miles away from Mount Taicang, his intent becomes clear.

Surging down into the streets of a small city—one of many in the sprawl of unincorporated states left after the fall of Yong'an—citizens screaming and running from the sight.

A young girl stumbles, dropping her basket of laundry as she carries it back from the wash house, trembling with fear as a man in armor falls from the sky, surrounded by swords, but—

Flowers are falling too, landing in her hair—warm to the touch.

And when she looks up—

A young man stands next to her—in torn white robes, with a crown of golden flowers in his hair.

Offering her a hand.

"Don't be afraid," he murmurs, his voice unlike any she's ever heard, but—

She takes it, allowing him to pull her behind him.

The citizens of the town shrink away, some trying to hide inside of their homes, others too terrified to move.

"Who is this for?" Jun Wu asks softly, swords hovering overhead, pointing towards the mortals menacingly. "For them?"

He glances around at the masses, his eyes filled with nothing but disdain.

For these, the common people that Xie Lian was so desperate to protect, all those years ago.

"They don't even know who you are." He sneers. "The fires of Xianle have long since burned out."

And those who do remember him know him as a god of misfortune. Of plague, death, and destruction.

No one will thank him for what he does here.

Xie Lian doesn't step away, doesn't stop shielding the mortals behind him.

"...I was never a god of Xianle," Xie Lian replies, his voice calm as he echoes his sentiments from many, many years ago.

"I am a god of this world."

And everyone in it—whether they believe in him or not.

That isn't why Xie Lian helps people.

“…I…I think he’s a martial god,” one of the mortals whispers to her husband, hiding behind him, both of them shrinking when Jun Wu looks their way.

Which is odd—because the Central Plains doesn’t have a martial god widely worshiped within their territory. Even General Tai Hua, native born to the kingdom of their forefathers, is primarily worshiped in the east.

But regardless of who he is—it seems like he's there to protect them .

"…You had so many years to learn," Jun Wu shakes his head. "And you're still a fool ."

Xie Lian disagrees.

He's always been a slow learner. His lessons are long and painful.

But he learns.

Jun Wu, however…

He stares at Xie Lian with endless frustration, his jaw tight.

"If I asked you to take the blows in their place--you would, wouldn't you?"

Xie Lian glances over their heads, where Jun Wu's swords are still circling, pointed at each mortal in the street like a threat.

Left with the choice of protecting them, or stopping the emperor. Because that's what Jun Wu does .

Takes every other option, and makes you feel like you have a choice.

But Xie Lian isn't interested in letting the emperor tell him what his choices are.

Not anymore.

"Enough blood has been spilled on your account," he answers . "I don't see a need to spill any more today."

He isn't going to offer himself in their stead—and he isn't going to let Jun Wu slaughter them either.

"…Is that so?" The emperor hisses, pupils narrowing. "Then I'll make sure not to spill any more."

He won't be looked down on by someone just like him .

He won't suffer the blatant hypocrisy laced in Xie Lian's calm offers of peace and surrender.

No.

He’s seen who the Prince of Xianle really is—

And it’s time that Xie Lian received a much needed reminder.

There’s a terrified scream from behind him—and Xie Lian watches as a young boy is dragged from the ground by an invisible force.

“A’HENG!”

“M—MOM—!”

Xie Lian’s eyes narrow as he grips Fangxin tighter. “Let him—!”

Creaaaak…

“Show them,” Jun Wu sneers.

Xie Lian doesn’t move.

Creeeeaak…

Watching as the boy hangs over them, feet kicking and struggling, hands tugging at a noose made from spiritual rope

“Show them how kind and merciful you are.”

Xie Lian can’t breathe, remembering that sound.

Calling for his mother and father, only to stumble into them blindly.

Desperately looking all over the forest for Hong’er, only realizing afterwards that the creaking wasn’t the boughs of the trees.

It—

It was him.

He…He…

His knees wobble, feeling a weight settle on him once more, dragging him down.

Around his own throat—like he’s being hung too—and that’s when he realizes.

Jun Wu is shackling him again .

Black ink crawling across his throat, squeezing until his knees begin to wobble.

But the moment his knees hit the ground—

Xie Lian's hands wrap around his throat, his eyes snapping up towards the emperor's.

Staring him down as he takes the forming shackle between his hands —

And he shatters it, his voice coming out in a low, wrathful snarl.

"No."

The boy falls to the ground, cushioned by a pile of flower petals as his mother rushes forward to help him, and Jun Wu—

BOOM!

He feels the building walls crumble around him as he's thrown through it—all four—before he's sent flying down the hillside, struggling to stand—

BOOM!

The next blow comes from underneath him, sending the emperor rocketing up from the ground, surging hundreds of meters into the air —

BOOM!

And the third sends him crashing back down, slamming into the earth with a thunderous crash.

The crater that forms is as deep as a house is tall—and Xie Lian is flying back down into it before the smoke clears, riding a surge of golden petals beneath his feet—

CLANG!

CLANG!

CLANG!

Thousands of weapons clash all around them, but it’s not like before.

Now, the blows from the prince’s hand have reached double time, unleashing such speed and force, it’s impossible for the emperor to keep up—and when the dust clears, it’s easy to see why.

He wields a sword in each hand. Fangxin in his right—

And a gilded blade in his left.

Knocking Jun Wu further and further down the hillside, away from the town—trees falling, earth rumbling around them—

Until they find themselves far away—in a deserted, vast clearing—and Xie Lian hits him harder, faster , with spiritual power in every blow.

"You're a disgrace," Jun Wu snarls, sweat dripping from his brow every time they clash, sparks flying all around them. "All for nothing . Once I've finished with you, I'll find your precious San Lang, and I'll finish what I STARTED—!"

He cuts himself off with a pained grunt.

"What?" Xie Lian asks coldly, standing over the emperor as he falls to his knees. "What did you say you were going to do?"

Jun Wu's sword clatters to the ground as he clutches at his throat, breathing hard.

"I'm waiting."

He tries to speak—but his throat feels so heavy .

Xie Lian has sheathed the gilded blade—leaving only fangxin in his hand, his other clenching into a fist as Jun Wu struggles—

Black ink crawling around his neck, growing tighter by the moment.

"You..." He coughs, clutching at his skin, trying to shatter it—

But he can't.

"You can't...use..."

"Only the most powerful deity of the Heavenly Court can administer shackles," Xie Lian recalls slowly, his knuckles growing white as black ink begins to spring up around Jun Wu's wrists. "That's why you were frightened when I asked you to remove mine."

Jun Wu sinks forward on his hands and knees, hands trembling as they claw at the dirt, breathing hard.

He has three, right now.

The same number Xie Lian lived with for all of these years—and he can't even stand on two feet under the weight of them. He can barely breathe .

Then, it feels like needles are pressing into his irises, stabbing into him as the world grows dark—

Golden patterns of white and black gleaming in his eyes as he looks around blankly, his expression tinged with growing fear.

Xie Lian would be lying, if he said that there wasn't a part of him that enjoyed the sight.

He would be dishonest, if he said that forcing the emperor to experience his own abuse didn't bring some form of satisfaction, but...

Jun Wu gasps and shudders as a weight is lifted.

But it also makes Xie Lian feel a little sick.

When the emperor looks up—the crown prince of Xianle is kneeling beside him, his head in his hands.

Not tired, or frightened—but torn.

"...I'm not doing it like this," he mutters, shaking his head.

Because as much as Jun Wu has hurt him, as much as he's hurt so many others—

Xie Lian isn't willing to compromise himself again out of hatred for him.

He didn't understand that when he was younger. Stinging with grief and humiliation.

When he donned the white mask and mourning robes, Xie Lian felt like he was taking control over his grief. Like he had power again, but —

But that was the weakest moment of his life.

Because the moment you allow suffering to change you—it begins to control you.

It locks you into a wheel that never stops spinning. Dragging more and more down with it as it rolls, crushing those caught underneath.

Before long, they become the ones who continue pushing it down the hill.

When the only way to stop yourself from hitting rock bottom is to let go, and walk away.

Even when that feels impossible.

Not for the other person. Not because they deserve forgiveness, or peace.

Justice brings peace.

Revenge is a snake swallowing its own tail.

Jun Wu rubs his wrists, shaking his head.

"...Even with all of that power," he whispers, looking him over. "You're still a coward.”

A frightened child who allowed his kingdom to fall. Who couldn't protect those he loved. Who rolled in the dirt for eight hundred years.

Xie Lian doesn't lift his head—and after a brief pause, he turns to look at the emperor—

And his expression catches Jun Wu completely off-guard.

How sincere it is, not showing an ounce of hatred.

"Whatever your next life may bring—I hope it's kinder to you."

Jun Wu's jaw grows slack, eyes casting aside their resentment and fury for a moment, staring at him with utter shock.

"...How could you say that to me, after everything that's happened, and expect me to believe you?"

Xie Lian smiles—because it's simple.

Something he's always believed, even if he didn't have the wisdom to understand it, when he was young.

It was something that took him so long to understand, a naive child and a slow learner—

But he learned.

"Body in abyss, heart in paradise."

And he means every word.

Knowing exactly how the emperor will react.

His scream of rage, pure and utter fury is nearly swallowed up by the clashing of blades echoing all around them—

And up until now while Xie Lian was faster and stronger, their movements mirrored one another.

As one would expect, given that they had the same teacher.

They were brought up in the same style of swordsmanship. And the only real sparring matches either have had in the last thousand years have been with one another.

But now, Xie Lian knows something new.

'You're stronger than him.'

Those were the words Hua Cheng said to him, over and over again. In the Kiln. In the Heavens. Now, here—just before he broke his shackles.

And Xie Lian couldn't fathom it.

That he could be stronger than someone so ancient, so daunting .

Someone he had lost against so many times.

It took him what felt like ages to realize it wasn't about how long they had lived—it was about how they had lived.

And that his greatest weakness might have been his ultimate strength.

'San Lang—now!'

Half a world away, a ghost fire is crushed in the palm of someone's hand.

Flickering into sparks before burning out.

And with a twist of Xie Lian's hands, rapidly forming signs as they clash—

The sun, rising over the central plains, begins to change.

Burning brighter—so bright, that for a moment, the sky almost seems to burn, shining down on the world in a fury of pure, golden light.

So intense—anyone standing beneath it would be forced to close their eyes.

And for one of them—

That makes all the difference.

His feet don't touch the ground, carried by a wave of petals, hidden by the rush of the wind, the clashing of blades all around, until—

Until there's silence.

Thud!

As the sun begins to fade back to its normal morning glow, weapons fall to the ground all around him.

Xie Lian lowers one blade, blood dripping from its gilded edge, staining the grass below—the flower painted across the hilt gleaming in the sun.

Untouched by the carnage.

Jun Wu's body lays on the ground before him—Fangxin buried in his heart, buried deep into the earth beneath him.

His head has come to a stop several feet away, resting on its side.

Eyes reflecting the morning sun, unseeing.

The prince wipes the edge of the blade San Lang made for him, watching as an angry, raging aura springs up from the emperor's corpse, forming a dark cloud overhead. Two shattered halves of a soul, twisting back into one.

But Xie Lian's gaze shows no fear.

He's known, far longer than he wanted to admit, how to stop Bai Wuxiang from hurting anyone else, ever again.

And now, by extension, the rest of his soul.

Hua Cheng told him the first day they met again, sprawled across an ox cart.

CRACK!

The hilt of Fangxin falls to the ground, shards of the blade scattering all around, only one shard remaining buried in the emperor's heart.

A blade of revenge and death, broken by one forged in faith.

Ghosts have a tradition of leaving their ashes with those they love most.

As the emperor's body slowly begins to fade, finally giving up the illusion of a living, celestial form—

The cloud overheat begins to shudder and shriek, thousands of faces straining in the darkness, howling with resentment—

Only to grow silent once more.

Sucked into the open pickle jar, waiting in the prince's hands—only to be slammed shut and sealed the moment it's inside.

Holding the barest remnants of Jun Wu's soul—made whole once more.

Xie Lian looks around him, slowly beginning to realize—

It's over.

No more shackles.

No more Jun Wu, Bai Wuxiang, or anything in between.

And while he knows it was the right thing to do, he didn’t expect to feel so—

Clink!

Clink!

The prince's eyes widen, and his heart grows full.

The jar falls to the ground, discarded.

"San Lang!"

He throws himself into the calamity's arms without a thought, arms twining around his neck.

Hua Cheng chuckles fondly, arms wrapping around his waist, holding Xie Lian close.

"I told gege I would."

And he's never broken a single promise.

"It's like I said," Hua Cheng's lips press against his forehead, chaste, but adoring. "You were always stronger than him."

Xie Lian's hands slide up from his neck, cupping the ghost's face in his hands.

"You made me strong enough," he whispers.

Hua Cheng falls silent for a moment, his throat thick until he's forced to clear it, fingertips brushing Xie Lian's hair from his cheeks.

Examining the cuts and bruises on his face.

"Gege, you really should be more careful…"

Xie Lian is smiling too much to sound contrite.

"I will be next time!"

Hua Cheng arches one eyebrow in an attempt at sternness. "Next time?"

A breathless laugh escapes the prince as he smiles up at him, eyes shining.

But he…

"…I…" He takes a deep breath. "There's something I need to tell you."

He promised he would, before he fell into the Kiln—and they haven't really had a chance to speak freely since.

Hua Cheng waits, prepared for many things, but not—

"I am so sorry."

Not the shame in Xie Lian's voice.

"...What?"

"For the way I—the way I treated Wu Ming."

Hua Cheng's eye widens, hands resting against the small of Xie Lian's back.

"...I didn't know you had figured it out," he admits softly, and Xie Lian averts his eyes.

"I used to think it was strange, how I could have loved him so deeply, when I didn't have him for that long."

Hua Cheng can't take his eyes away from him, lips parted with shock—and Xie Lian is too guilt ridden to be shy.

"But once I knew you had never left this world...I also knew it had to have been you."

Xie Lian was already ashamed of his behavior before—

But then, it broke him.

"There's nothing to forgive."

"I was so selfish , San Lang, I used you so carelessly—"

"And I was so happy," the ghost king assures him, his thumb brushing over Xie Lian's cheek. "Serving you was the greatest gift you could have given me."

Xie Lian shakes his head.

"My only regret was knowing that you were in pain," Hua Cheng admits softly. "And that I was part of it."

"...Oh," the prince exhales shakily, looking up at him. "None of that could have ever been your fault. But I—I asked for things I shouldn't have—”

“You mean the kiss?”

Xie Lian swallows hard. “I should never have put you in that position—”

Hua Cheng doesn’t let him apologize again—not really.

He pulls the prince close, kissing him until he’s breathless, hands limp against Hua Cheng’s chest.

“I’ve stolen more from you since.”

Xie Lian would argue that wasn’t true. Under water rescues aside, Hua Cheng won their first kiss fair and square.

And every embrace after was willingly given.

But when Hua Cheng pulls back, and Xie Lian’s eyes open—

His breath catches in his throat.

There’s a youth in black armor, his hair pulled back into a high, sleek ponytail. One eye dark as pitch, the other red as blood.

And even without the white mask, Xie Lian would know him.

Remembering how his armor felt and smelled, pressed against him.

“…Wu Ming,” he whispers

He’s here.

He’s here, and he’s so beautiful , it’s like Xie Lian can’t breathe.

Seeing the eye Hong’er always hid from him, even after Xie Lian couldn’t see anything anymore.

“Oh, Wu Ming,” he whispers again, his voice thick—

Then, they’re kissing again.

More fiercely than they ever have before, unburdened by secrets, fear, or shame.

So desperate, they fall to the ground, Hua Cheng holding him steady in his lap with one hand in his hair, the other against the small of his back

Xie Lian doesn't open his eyes when they pull apart, their foreheads pressed together.

"…Can we go home, now?" He croaks, his voice thick with emotion—and Hua Cheng laughs softly with surprise.

"Where would that be, your highness?"

"…I don't know," Xie Lian admits. "Anywhere, just…go with me, please?" His voice wobbles, unsure. "Or I'll go with you, I just…I want…"

He buries his face in Hua Cheng's shoulder—and the ghost king hugs him close, until his ribs burn with the sweetest kind of ache.

"…I'm sorry, dianxia," Hua Cheng whispers, fingers stroking through Xie Lian's hair. "But I'm going to have to keep you waiting a little longer."

Xie Lian stiffens, leaning back, and when he does—

He sees that the edges of Hua Cheng's form have become transparent.

"…What?" The prince mutters, dumbfounded as he holds Hua Cheng by the shoulders, his face growing pale. "What's…what's happening?!"

Hua Cheng winces, still twirling Xie Lian's hair between his fingers.

"Nothing too serious, I…just over did it a little bit…"

After breaking so many spiritual shackles, and destroying Bai Wuxiang—it's to be expected, but…

"Did you give me too much?" Xie Lian rasps, taking Hua Cheng's face in his hands. "Take it back, then! As much as you need!"

He kisses him again, desperately trying to give it back.

Pouring as much energy as he can into the embrace, but—

It isn't working .

Hua Cheng pulls back, pressing another kiss to Xie Lian's forehead.

"While I'm glad gege isn't being so shy—that isn't necessary. Unless you just wanted to kiss me, in which case—"

"What's going on?" Xie Lian pleads, cutting through the teasing as he clings to the front of his robes.

"Just taking a little break," Hua Cheng reassures him, cupping the back of his head. "Don't be scared."

The prince's shoulders begin to shake.

"…How can you say that?"

Xie Lian shakes his head, his breaths quickening. "San Lang, I-I can't do this—"

"Gege—"

"—I really can't do this!"

Because it is serious, even if Hua Cheng doesn't want to frighten him.

He wouldn't let Xie Lian see him like this at all if it wasn't.

Hua Cheng hushes him, pushing tangled pieces of hair behind the prince's ears.

"It's alright, your highness…"

"N- No!" Xie Lian sobs, shaking his head vehemently. "I-I'm sorry, I—I'm not strong enough, I—I'm not brave enough, I c-can't—"

"You are."

"I'm not!"

Xie Lian shakes his head, tears pouring down his cheeks. "I-I don't want to do this! It's—It's no good if you're not there! I don't—"

He's cut short when Hua Cheng hugs him close against his chest, weeping silently against the front of his robes as they begin to fade.

"Listen," Hua Cheng urges him softly. "Do you know where we are now?"

Xie Lian blinks, struggling to see through the tears as he lifts his head. He knew he intentionally moved Jun Wu away from the city, towards a clear, open area, but now he realizes—

These are ruins of Xianle.

And here, on what would have been the grand Avenue, he…

"…This is where you caught me," Hua Cheng reminds him gently.

The place where it all started, and now ends.

"…And failed you ever since," Xie Lian whispers, each word dripping with pain and regret.

"No."

"San Lang—"

"I loved you, the moment I saw you." Hua Cheng explains, resting his chin on top of Xie Lian's head. "It was so much—it scared me, the first time I felt it."

"…Me too," Xie Lian whispers thickly—but for different reasons.

Because he didn't recognize what he felt for Hong'er as love. Not until he was standing before a pyre.

"You didn't catch me once," Hua Cheng tells him. "It was so many times."

Pulling him from a sack behind a carriage.

Carrying him to Mount Taicang.

When he was weeping in Xie Lian's arms, pleading that he wasn't cursed—

And for the first time, someone agreed.

Giving him an umbrella and food when he was cold and alone.

Saying that, if Hua Cheng couldn't find meaning in his life—

Xie Lian could be that meaning.

Words that he called arrogant and misguided later—but that wasn't true.

"Every moment we were apart," Hua Chen explains slowly. "Every time I was angry, scared, or alone—that love for you was with me. It caught me, dianxia."

Tears fall from Xie Lian's chin.

"It caught me every single day." He presses his lips against Xie Lian's forehead. "That's why I refuse to leave this world."

Xie Lian blinks slowly, tear addled and weary. "W…What?"

Hua Cheng's forehead rests against his cheek.

"Because I have someone precious to me."

Xie Lian knows what Hua Cheng is describing better than most—

Faith.

Love and faith are two halves of the same whole, never mutually exclusive.

It was love for Hong'er that reminded Xie Lian of his love for the world. Of how beautiful it could be.

He—

Every single day, when Xie Lian kissed his ring and told him good morning—

Hong'er caught him, too.

Hua Cheng pulls back to look at him, taking Xie Lian's face between his hands—

"If your dream is to save the world, then my dream is only you."

Xie Lian stares back at him, eyes wide, tears falling silently, remembering—

A conversation he had so long ago, alone in the snow.

"But…you won't…be able to Rest in Peace—" he croaks, only for Hua Cheng to reply just as he did back then.

"I pray to never Rest in Peace."

Hua Cheng's hand rubs Xie Lian's back, just as his mother used to calm the prince when he was young and throwing a fit. Just as Xie Lian has soothed Hua Cheng twice now, telling him not to be angry.

"I understand your everything," he murmurs.

Not some idealized version of him. A god who doesn't cry, bleed, or fail.

There are countless gods who have projected that image, and Hua Cheng has never prayed to them.

"Your courage, your sorrow, your kindness, your pain, your resentment, your intelligence, your foolishness."

Because Hua Cheng—

He never needed Xie Lian to be perfect.

He loves his imperfections. His struggles. His scars and bruises, even if he wishes he could have spared him from every single one.

Hua Cheng has lived a life that makes a man find beauty in scars.

To—

Like Xie Lian said that night, sitting beside the campfire on Blackwater island, avoiding Hua Cheng's gaze, but speaking sincerely.

Hua Cheng loves him , not the state of him.

"...Please don't talk anymore," Xie Lian croaks, his face soaked in tears.

"Please, don't...Don't be like this, I...there are so many things...You...I owed Wu Ming one more promise, but you never asked! And...and I have so much more I want to say to you," the prince sobs. "It's been so long since anyone listened to me talk, just... please , stay?"

Hua Cheng's lips brush against his temple, and he shudders.

"I'll have to ask you later, don't worry."

"Don't," Xie Lian's voice cracks, "I can't do this again, Hong'er—" Saying his name for the first time in so long without pain—

It makes him break.

"Hong'er!"

He clings around Hua Cheng's neck, pressing his face against his shoulder, barely able to breathe, barely able to talk.

"It's—It's already been two times!" He weeps, trembling all over. "I can't go through that again, I--I don't want there to be a third! I can't take it!"

Doesn't want to see another sunrise if he isn't next to him. Doesn't want to face the endless years ahead of him if he'll be doing it alone.

Doesn't want a life without him in it, because it isn't living, it's just waiting, and he's so tired of waiting!

Hua Cheng holds him so close, it feels like Xie Lian could disappear in his arms—

And part of him wants to.

"To die for you is my greatest honor," he whispers fiercely.

Every single time. No matter how many times it takes—

Until the world is safe for him.

Until there's a place for them.

But Xie Lian doesn't want to be anywhere but here, in his arms. It feels like the minute Hua Cheng lets him go, he'll fall, and he'll never stop falling, not until—

Not until someone catches him again.

"You..." His shoulders hunch and quake, his cries no longer muffled by Hua Cheng's robes. "You said you'd never leave!"

Hua Cheng's eyelashes flutter slightly, fatigued—but his voice never shows it, repeating words he heard long ago, in another memory.

Another life.

"...There is no banquet in this world that doesn't come to an end," he mutters, tilting Xie Lian's chin up as the prince falls into inconsolable cries, "but I will never leave you."

Xie Lian pauses, struggling to catch his breath, his teeth chattering.

Hua Cheng smiles.

The same smile from before, when he fell back into the Sinner's Pit, making Xie Lian the same promise as he did then—

"I will always come back."

A choked sound of agonized adoration rips itself from Xie Lian's throat as he reaches for him one more time.

Desperate to say what he didn't before, what he couldn't for so long.

"I love you," he cries, hands pressed to Hua Cheng's face, desperately trying to take it in, every line, dimple, and smile. He—

He didn't have enough time, there's so much, and he—

"Hong'er, I love you, please don't—stay, stay with me? I promise I won't ever hurt myself again, I'll—I'll eat as much as you want, I—please , please, please. I love you! I'm—I'm so scared , I don't—I don't know how —"

"Wait for me," his love whispers.

He's said it many times before.

When Xie Lian didn't know he was there, desperately climbing that staircase, struggling to make his way back towards the light.

But even when the prince was at his most desperate, his most sorrowful —

Hong'er was always climbing back to him.

Saying those words, over and over again.

Wait for me.

Just a little longer.

Wait for me.

(Just a little longer.)

But faith isn't something that comes easily. If it was, it wouldn't have such power.

"I love you," Xie Lian repeats, saying those words as many times as he can before he disappears, trying to make up for lifetimes of lost hellos and goodbyes, memories they never got to share.

Trying to fit an immortality's worth of love and sorrow into one last moment.

But before the words finish leaving his mouth—his arms are empty.

Faith isn't tangible, that's why people struggle to find it.

It can't be seen, heard, or felt.

In the face of sorrow, it shrinks.

Xie Lian falls to his knees, surrounded by a storm of butterflies.

And he just wishes that the screaming would stop.

He's so tired of hearing it, but—

It's just him.

It's always been him, screaming.

Howling against the doors between life and death itself, feeling that pain, that grief open inside him like a pit, swallowing him whole.

Screaming at the unfairness.

Screaming at the agony.

Screaming at the void in his life that San Lang always leaves behind, even if it was never his choice to go.

Falling so hard and so fast, he knows, if he ever lands at that bottom, he will break .

But something brushes against his cheek, and when he opens his eyes —

A silver butterfly is there, wings brushing against his tears. Floating down to land on his finger, where...

A red thread remains, tied into an affinity knot.

Xie Lian hangs his head, his body convulsing with a pain that no one should ever know , breaking a bone you never knew you had—not until it shatters.

Faith is the first friend you accuse of abandoning you, and the one that never leaves.

Hiding in the smallest of places.

And now, when Xie Lian reaches for the chain around his neck--he finds it.

That feeling, twisting with beauty and pain, filling up the aching gap left inside.

And it catches him.

Holding him in its arms, even as he continues to cry his heart out—

But it doesn't die.

Because he—

Because his Hong'er promised he would come back to him.

And no matter how much it hurts, no matter how badly Xie Lian wants to turn his eyes towards that dark pit in the corner of every room he's ever in...

The one that makes him so tired that makes him want to give up, that makes him ache for the loving embrace of a rope around his neck, carrying him through that barrier between himself and everyone he's ever lost —

The pit he wants to fall into, and never climb out.

Xie Lian doesn't look at it.

He keeps his eyes firmly steered towards the horizon.

Watching the sun climb above the hills.

Xie Lian chooses life, clinging to nothing more than that fragile thread of faith.

Chooses to believe that he'll find him again.

Even if it takes another eight hundred years. A thousand years.

Even if he waits until the rest of life fades, and the stars fall from the sky, one by one, he'll wait.

A ring is grasped between trembling fingers, brought to his lips for another kiss.

Now, on the first day since they said goodbye again.

"...Good morning, San Lang," he whispers, wrapping his arms around himself.

He doesn't try to tell himself that it's going to be a good day.

He won't tomorrow, either.

But one day, he'll smile at the sunrise again.

He doesn't move when he hears people coming. Doesn't lift his head, or stop clutching San Lang to his chest for dear life, rocking back and forth.

"...Dianxia? Where's..." Feng Xin's voice is low with concern. "Where's the emperor? And Crimson Rain?"

The Prince doesn't answer.

Mu Qing is leaning heavily against him, his arm slung around Feng Xin's shoulders as he watches Xie Lian's slumped, trembling form.

Seeing the fading butterflies in the sky.

"...Your highness..."

"Gone," Xie Lian whispers, barely able to speak.

"They're...gone."

"What--?" Feng Xin frowns, stepping over the pickle jar on the ground, judging it away with his foot. "You—CRIMSON RAIN!" He shouts, looking around. "CAN'T YOU SEE HE'S UPSET?! GET THE HELL BACK OVER HERE, WHEREVER YOU ARE!"

But Mu Qing...

He kneels down on the ground beside Xie Lian, reaching out to touch the prince's shoulder.

Xie Lian looks up at him, his face flushed and tear stricken—and his friend pauses, taken aback.

"...Your eyes...?"

"...Your hair ," Xie Lian rasps, voice breaking.

They stare at each other, silent for a moment, each struggling through their own emotions, but...

When Xie Lian leans into Mu Qing's arms, they're wide open.

Holding him, the way he wishes he had back then.

The first time he lost him.

Xie Lian's face sinks into Mu Qing's shoulder, and he just—

He just sobs , allowing himself to be held, even if part of him wants to hide it away. To force himself to be silent and slink off, not wanting to be a burden. Because—

San Lang wouldn't want that for him.

You would think, after dying enough times, that it gets easier.

In some ways, it does.

The dark isn't as deep. The cold doesn't cut as sharply.

In other ways, it's exhausting.

Floating in darkness, slipping down, down, down—all the while, holding on.

Because you won't go.

You'll never let go.

It won't be easy—it wasn't last time, but—

He still has someone precious in this world.

Someone waiting for him to come back.

And that's enough to hold on. To struggle against the current, bracing his feet against the pull.

Thud!

He's fallen many times before—more times than he can count—

But he's never landed in a place like this.

Soft grass beneath his hands, tickling his nose.

The smell of hyacinth and orange blossoms drifting through the air.

He pushes himself up, brushing off the front of his robes, and when he looks up—his breath goes still.

A child is before him—no more than seven years old, sitting beneath the boughs of a maple tree.

Dressed in silks of white and cold, dripping with jewels that seem far too heavy for him.

But Hua Cheng would know those eyes anywhere.

His fingertips are outstretched, a silver butterfly resting against them—but with Hua Cheng watching, he pulls them back shyly.

"…Don't be scared," the ghost king murmurs, watching him with quiet wonder. "You can touch them."

The prince stretches his hand out again, smiling when another butterfly lands in his palm.

"What are you doing inside my dream?"

"Is that what this is?" Hua Cheng asks mildly.

Xie Lian nods rather seriously, averting his eyes. "And it's very rude to show up somewhere when you haven't been invited," he explains, parroting his mother's words.

He never means to be rude. He just gets lonely sometimes, when A'Xin isn't there.

"…I see," Hua Cheng bows his head, ever so contrite. "Shall I go, then?”

Xie Lian surveys him for a moment, a butterfly landing against his cheek, making the child giggle and shrink away.

“…You can stay,” he agrees, good natured. “Just don’t do anything scary.”

“Scary?”

“I don’t like scary dreams,” Xie Lian explains, his nose wrinkled with distaste. “And those are the only ones I remember…” he looks up at him apologetically. “Which means I won’t remember you, I’m sorry.”

But somehow, that makes Hua Cheng smile so wide, it hurts.

“I’m a good dream?”

Xie Lian looks away again, suddenly very shy—

But he nods.

“…And what if I told you that you would meet me someday? When you’re awake.”

“…Really?” The prince breathes, his eyes round.

“Really.”

“When?”

“When you’re older,” Hua Cheng promises.

“You just have to wait for me.”

“…I don’t like waiting very much,” Xie Lian whispers.

Hua Cheng’s eyes are brimming with fondness.

“I know—but you get very good at it.”

Which makes the prince frown with dismay.

“It sounds like I’ve had a lot of practice.”

“…Waiting isn’t so bad, sometimes.” Hua Cheng murmurs, sitting down beside him, pulling one knee up against his chest. “Not if it’s something worth waiting for.”

The prince thinks about that, staring at the butterflies in his hands.

“What did you have to wait for?”

“…Someone precious to me,” Hua Cheng looks over his shoulder, towards the hillside, gently sloping upward.

Further and further, disappearing in the distance.

“…I think I’m waking up soon,” Xie Lian frowns, glancing at Hua Cheng again.

It gets harder every time, almost as though he gets more and more shy the more he looks at him.

“…Are we really going to meet when I’m older?” He asks slowly, wraith butterflies casting his cheeks in a silver glow.

Hua Cheng smiles.

“Patience, your highness.”

The prince watches him for a moment, eyes taking in Hua Cheng’s face, flickering around in a childish fit of nervous curiosity—

But he smiles, watching as the butterflies slip away from his hands.

“…Okay.”

And then, he’s gone.

Taken from the realm of dreaming.

But Hua Cheng doesn’t despair.

He remains under the maple tree a moment later, breathing in hyacinths and orange blossoms, the gentle rays of sun warming his cheeks.

Then he rises to his feet.

Making the trek uphill.

Walking for what feels like days—maybe weeks , but—

Eventually, he hears laughter

Sees a child running past him—

Chasing the wraith butterflies.

Slightly older than last time—with the over-exuberance that children always seem to have, sending him tumbling and laughing when he stumbles, rolling over to look back at him.

“…You!” He breathes, sitting up.

Red honeysuckle flowers tangled in his hair.

Hua Cheng bites back what he actually wants to say, smiling down at the prince softly.

“Was I a bad dream?” Xie Lian tilts his head to the side, and he adds—“You remember me.”

“…No,” the prince shakes his head. “You’re good. It’s just—I’m not awake. So, of course I remember you.”

Hua Cheng’s smile widens. “Is that how it works?”

The prince nods, giggling when one of the butterflies lands on his nose.

“…I’m still waiting for you, by the way,” he adds offhandedly, as though he hasn’t counted the days in every dream he’s had since—that would be very silly.

And Xie Lian isn’t silly. He’s important. Busy. Dignified. Whatever else his father says a young man should be.

Definitely not—

“Patience, your highness.”

“I’m patient,” he cries, pausing and blushing when he realizes how whiny he sounds, very childish, not dignified at all—

So he clears his throat, tucking his hair behind his ears.

“I was just reminding you, that’s all.”

"...I see," Hua Cheng nods, opting not to question him. "Thank you—but I could never forget, your highness."

He says that, but there's so much waiting .

One dream after another, with Xie Lian slipping through the years. Growing from a child to a teenager between his dreams.

But his eyes still light up with recognition every time he sees Hua Cheng coming over the hill, saying the same thing.

It's you.

I'm still waiting, you know.

Patiently—just reminding you.

The older he gets, he finds more subtle, elegant ways of saying it.

But Hua Cheng's reply is always the same.

Patience, your highness.

The conversations are never long, but they're always fond. With the prince sitting beneath him under a maple tree, winding a lock of hair around his finger. Eyes averted from Hua Cheng's face.

"...This person you said you were waiting for...the one that's precious to you..."

Hua Cheng holds up his hand, watching as a falling petal lands on the back of his knuckles, offering it to him.

Xie Lian reaches out to take it—his fingers quick, ears pink.

"...What's she like?"

Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow, his lips quirking into a crooked smile. "You would like them, I think."

He should. Hua Cheng hopes he learns to, one day.

"Is she beautiful?"

His smile softens, and he never looks away when he replies—

"Breathtaking."

Xie Lian doesn't dare to look at him—but he frowns.

"...I'm waking up," he sighs, remorseful—because it's nicer here.

With him .

"You seem frustrated."

"I just—" Xie Lian bites his lip. "I don't even know your name. How am I supposed to know it's you when we—?"

Hua Cheng sends him a sly look, raising an eyebrow.

"I thought you said you didn't remember the good dreams."

Xie Lian opens his mouth, then closes it, flushing all the way to the back of his neck, and when he pulls his hand back from holding one of the butterflies—

Hua Cheng catches him by the wrist.

Pulling his hand over, pressing a kiss to his knuckles.

Something officers and politicians do to Xie Lian each and every day—

But it never leaves his heart hammering out of his chest.

"...I don't want to wake up yet," he whispers.

Doesn't want to go back to a beautiful, privileged life—but one with so many pressures.

It's never like that, here.

These are the best dreams that he ever has, and in a moment of honesty, because it's his dream, and no one will ever know —

"...Sometimes, I wish you'd just take me away." He mumbles, still holding onto Hua Cheng's hand. "When I meet you, I mean. That's selfish, isn't it? I shouldn't—"

Hua Cheng kisses his hand again.

(If only to hide the look on his face.)

"Patience, your highness."

He looks up at the prince through long, dark eyelashes—his gaze sparkling with an emotion that Xie Lian is far too sheltered to name.

"Wait for me."

Xie Lian swallows hard, struggling as he's pulled from dreams, because

—

These are always the sweetest.

"...I will."

Then Hua Cheng is alone again, watching the breeze play through maple leaves, breathing in the smell of the flowers.

They smell like him.

He got into a fight about that when he was small. It would probably horrify Xie Lian to hear about it now.

But when Hong'er was barely more than ten years old, sweeping one of the crown prince's less prestigious shrines, one of the other children who lived on the streets made some idiotic comment, saying something about how it wasn't very manly to be associated with flowers.

That the prince probably smelled like them too, that he was most likely a cutsleeve.

Hong'er hadn't known what that name meant back then—but that didn't stop him from breaking the boy's nose.

(And having his own broken in the process, which Xie Lian would loathe if he knew.)

But he does smell like flowers, and it changes.

Sometimes like hyacinth and jasmine. More recently like chamomile and bergamot. But always—

Always like home. Always like him .

And while part of Hua Cheng could spend forever like this, waiting beneath a maple tree for his love to dream of him—

That's all it is. A dream.

A beautiful one, but—

He promised he would come back. And Xie Lian...

He's already said he doesn't like waiting very long.

With that in mind, even if part of his soul could wait—

Hua Cheng could never Rest in Peace.

He prays that he never will.

And so, he rises to his feet, brushing the flowers from his hair

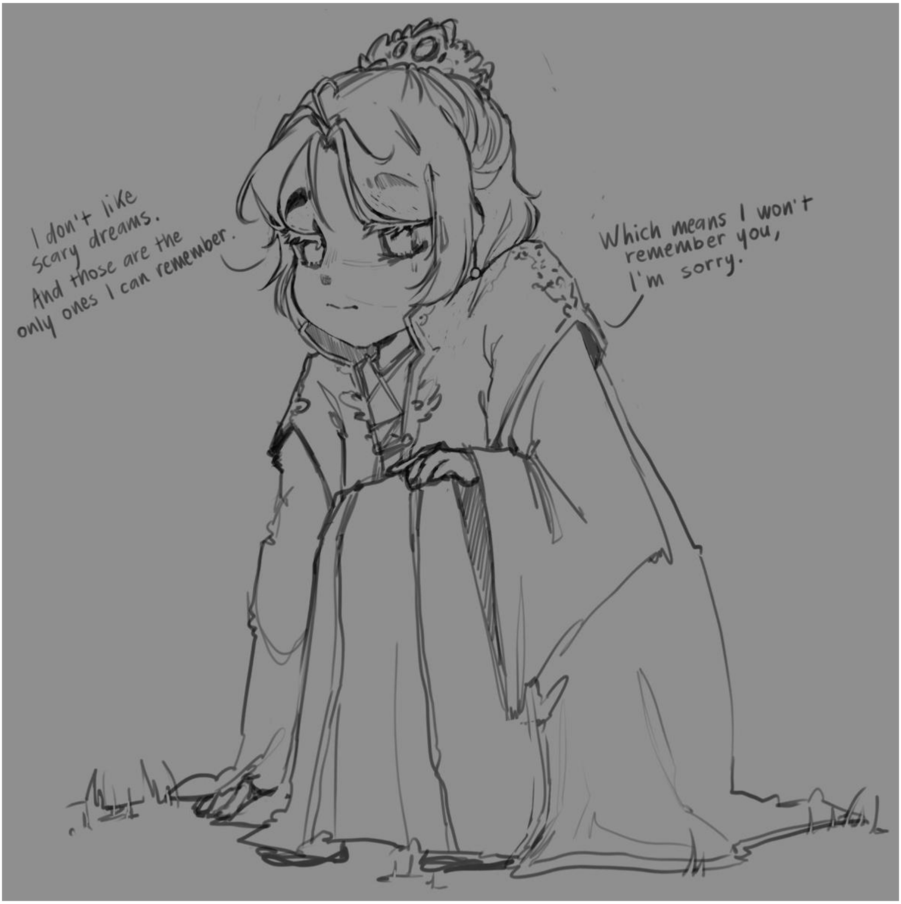
He climbs up the hill, knowing, someday—

He'll come back to him.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or reuse.

CREDIT: RYIE



I don't like scary dreams. And those are the only ones I can remember.
Which means I won't remember you, I'm sorry.

CREDIT: OPHELIA

CREDIT: MARTA

[image]

CREDIT: CLOUD

TapiocaPearls2

CREDIT: MIKA

From the Ashes

Chapter Summary

> Even now, in the beginning of winter, the sun shines clear on Mount Taicang, maple trees full and red year-round.
>
> A birthplace of kings and princes, long since abandoned.
>
> And now, for the first time in so long—teeming with life.

THREE DAYS LATER

Even now, in the beginning of winter, the sun shines clear on Mount Taicang, maple trees full and red year-round.

A birthplace of kings and princes, long since abandoned.

And now, for the first time in so long—teeming with life.

"HEY!" Mu Qing barks at a pair of deputy gods from the palace of Nan Yang, arms crossed over his shoulders. "Don't carry patients like sacks of rice! He has a broken back!"

The deputies look at one another, then down at the unconscious martial god they're carrying on a stretcher.

"...If you're just gonna fix it anyway, does it matter if we jostle him a little—?" One of them asks, only to fall silent when they notice Feng Xin watching them from just behind Mu Qing, scowling. "I mean...we...yes, General, we'll be more careful!"

They hurry off (balancing the stretcher far more carefully) and Mu Qing rolls his eyes, consulting his scroll from Ling Wen, listing out all of the injured Heavenly Officials remaining.

"You're hovering."

"You've placed half the court on bed rest, and you're more injured!”

"I'm not," Mu Qing sends him a look. "My body is fine. His highness has been keeping an eye on my Qi. I just need to stay calm, which isn't going to happen if you keep bothering me."

"You—!" Feng Xin bites back the urge to snap at him in frustration. "You were literally DYING in my arms three days ago, and now you act like I'M the unreasonable one for asking you to sit down—?"

"I'll rest later. You—" Mu Qing pauses, huffing, blowing his bangs out of his eyes. "You can make sure that I do," he mutters under his breath.

Feng Xin shuts up, clearing his throat awkwardly as he looks away, arms crossed over his chest.

"I will."

"Fine."

"And you're not gonna bitch about it—"

"That's unrealistic."

"But you'll do it?"

"Fine."

"Then fine."

Xie Lian could almost laugh, watching them like this. Feng Xin scowling and making a fuss, Mu Qing rolling his eyes, silver hair gleaming in the noon sun--

But he hasn't been able to laugh yet. Even smiling is hard, and it's never genuine.

"Hungry, your highness?"

Xie Lian looks down to see Yushi Huang sitting beside him, a basket of steamed buns in her lap--freshly made from her lands, brought to Mount Taicang along with countless other provisions as the Heavenly Court regroups.

"Oh, I..." He pauses in the middle of refusing.

He hasn't eaten today.

He hasn't eaten since...

Xie Lian swallows hard, reaching to take one.

"Thank you," he murmurs.

'Don't treat him so carelessly.'

It must be delicious—but he can hardly taste the first bite.

"You've been missing since the battle ended."

She isn't exactly a natural at prompting casual conversation—but then again, neither is he.

"...I destroyed a few buildings in a town nearby," Xie Lian explains with a sheepish shrug. "I couldn't leave them like that."

Yushi Huang smiles.

"I suppose you couldn't."

She's a beautiful woman. Xie Lian has struggled with that in the last few days. Adjusting to all of the faces he'd never seen, or hadn't seen in so long, he had almost forgotten what they looked like.

But she's nothing like what he had imagined in his mind.

Someone as steady and firm as her—he never expected the Rain Master to have such a delicate face. Youthful and heart shaped. But—

Her eyes are kind, and that doesn't surprise Xie Lian at all.

“How are you adjusting?”

It’s too soon for Xie Lian to have any idea.

He can speak, this time. He can force himself to go through motions.

When Hong’er died, he cannot even remember how long he laid in the snow, wishing it would bury him too.

But after a moment, he realizes she isn’t asking about Hua Cheng—she means his sight.

“…It’s not so bad,” he admits. “Most of my robes have hoods on them already. They help.”

During the battle and what followed, he put the discomfort aside, but —

Light is painful now.

Mu Qing says there's nothing wrong with his eyes—they just need time to adjust.

But psychologically, for someone who has spent almost forty times longer in darkness than he has with his sight…

His mind will take far longer to get used to it.

"…Stories of the battle have grown far and wide in the mortal realm," Yushi Huang continues, taking a bite out of one of the buns, chewing thoughtfully. "People are saying that you and General Pei Ming saved the world."

Pei has expressed his discomfort with receiving the credit more than once—but his voice was projected across the entire continent, revealing the emperor for what he was.

Naturally, mortals would give him credit for his fall—

But Xie Lian is the one known for striking the final blow.

And Hua Cheng is known for striking down Bai Wuxiang in Mount Tonglu—mostly on account of Quan Yizhen's followers, who had already been watching the encounter through projections in their dreams.

"I hear three different kingdoms have already pledged to build temples for you," Yushi Huang continues, unusually verbose.

But only because Xie Lian has been so unusually quiet.

"…It's very kind," he acknowledges. "But they don't need to."

Yushi Huang raises an eyebrow.

"I believe this is exactly the sort of thing that people build temples for in the first place."

The prince nods, staring down at his hands in his lap.

Surprised that they look exactly as they did when he was a teenager.

Soft and smooth, without a single mark of pain or work.

It makes him feel disconnected from himself. As though he's taken up residence inside someone else's skin, and he doesn't belong.

"…Where will you go now?"

"I'm waiting for the rest of the court to return."

Xie Lian glances at a clay jar, resting beside his feet.

He has a plan for what to do with it, but he doesn't have the authority to act unilaterally.

"After that…Ren Song might need help in Ghost City. And then there's whatever the Heavenly Court needs of me…"

"But aside from that—on your own time, where will you go?"

Xie Lian hesitates.

He hasn't had a home since Puqi Shrine, with Hong'er.

Eight hundred years ago.

"…I suppose I might do the same as you," he shrugs, picking at his sleeves. "The people of Puqi Village are kind."

Xie Lian wouldn't mind living and working among them. With his powers returned, he could keep them safe. Could make their lives better.

Small acts of usefulness might do him good.

"…If that's what makes you happy," Yushi Huang agrees. "But be careful, Xie Lian."

It's always a little surprising when she calls him by his first name. She has a right to, as the former ruler of a nation—

And Xie Lian doesn't mind.

It reminds him of his mother—in a way that doesn't ache.

"I know how much the emperor meant to you," she explains quietly.

She's more than aware of how controlling Jun Wu was over Xie Lian's world view. His self-perception.

He's lived his entire life under the emperor's thumb.

And even with it gone now, Xie Lian might remain in chains out of habit.

"The world is going to be different now for all of us," Xie Lian agrees, audibly numb, eyes still resting on his hands, and—

Yushi Huang reaches over, taking them in hers, squeezing gently.

"I live simply because it brings me peace," she watches him carefully. "Not because I have grown accustomed to living in penance."

And it's hard to know, after so many years, if Xie Lian actually wants to live the way that he has, or if it's all that he thinks he deserves.

When he was young, he enjoyed living well.

Now...he has no idea.

Xie Lian doesn't know what foods he likes, or what clothes he would wear, if he had the choice. He doesn't know if he wants a soft bed, or if he would prefer sleeping on the floor.

But he—

Hearing the Rain Master say that, his stomach twists painfully.

Jun Wu is dead. Bai Wuxiang is no more.

Their curses died with them.

And just like that, Xie Lian remembered everything he saw in the Kiln.

He remembers now that, even after two thousand years, Jun Wu couldn't bear to sleep in a bed.

He was too accustomed to pain.

Xie Lian feels pity for him—but also fear.

In two thousand years, is that going to be him?

Pei Ming said something similar, after Xie Lian's mission to ghost city. That he had been suffering for so long, he had learned to take pride in it.

And it's not that Xie Lian doesn't want to suffer anymore. Part of him is frightened of the idea that he'll always think he'll deserve it.

It's just thinking about how pained Hua Cheng would be, watching Xie Lian punish himself.

"...What should I do, then?" He whispers.

Yushi Huang squeezes his hands again, then lets him go.

"Whatever you want to do," she assures him. "Just take your time—and be gentle with yourself, your highness."

Heaven knows he needs it.

"You two seem thick as thieves."

The Rain Master looks up with a smile.

"Old friends often do."

In spite of the sorrow in his heart, Xie Lian's lips curve into a tired smile, looking up at General Pei.

Fully healed from the battle—deep circles under his eyes being the only reminder of their recent struggles.

"I'm surprised you haven't returned to your territory yet," the general raises an eyebrow. "You typically avoid these things."

"No," the queen corrects him quietly. "I avoided the man who held them."

And he's no longer a factor.

Besides, she has no intention of leaving before Ling Wen's position is settled—unsure of how whatever new Heavenly Government forms will treat her. And...

"And as senior elemental master, I have to wait for my peers to arrive."

Pei Ming raises an eyebrow, watching as she stands up to walk away.

"...I thought she was the only one left," Xie Lian tilts his head. "Does she mean Blackwater?"

"Perhaps," Pei sighs. "But a new thunder master ascended in Lanling a few days ago. Pei Su is traveling with him."

Xie Lian's eyes widen slightly with surprise—but he supposes it isn't that strange.

Gods are known for ascending in times of crisis—and it's been so long since they had a Thunder Master, they were long overdue.

"But enough about that...take a walk with me?"

The last person to ask him that was...

Xie Lian shakes himself out of it, rising to his feet.

"Of course."

The path down Mount Taicang is as familiar as it always was—even if it's far more worn now, paved stones long since faded.

"This must have been a beautiful place to grow up." Pei Ming glances at the trees around them, the ruins of the temples and grounds that once stood here.

Xie Lian follows his gaze, one corner of his mouth turning up.

"It was."

But it was the people who made the difference.

"It's kind of you to allow the court to take shelter here for now," Pei Ming sighs—exhausted, but grateful. "We're going to have to find a new place for the Heavens now, after..."

"Yes," Xie Lian agrees. "But...I had a thought."

"You did?"

"Mortals have avoided the old capital for centuries," Xie Lian looks over the hillside, where the imperial city of Xianle once stood. "They have superstitions about plagues and bad luck. If we seal it off with enchantments and form a new capital there..."

It's likely to go unnoticed.

Pei Ming seems surprised by the thought. The Heavens were never on a completely separate plane of existence, but they were always very far removed from Humans, an entire city held aloft by the emperor's power, far above the clouds.

"Don't you think that's a bit close to the mortal realm?"

"I think that's for the best," Xie Lian counters. "Some of the officials in the court haven't descended in centuries. They've never met the mortals they serve. That..."

"Doesn't seem right," Pei Ming agrees.

"...But would you really be alright with giving it up for such use? The palace of your ancestors...It's your home, your highness. You shouldn't take that lightly—”

"I don't," Xie Lian shakes his head. "But I'd rather see it used, than just..."

Left to rot away.

"Besides..." He looks back over his shoulder, at the slope of Mount Taicang behind them, remembering what Yushi Huang said. "...I'll keep this for myself, I think."

Mount Taicang was where he grew up with Feng Xin and Mu Qing. Where his parents are buried.

Where he would have taken Hong'er, if life hadn't been so keen on separating them so soon.

Not far from Ghost City, close to the new site of the Heavens...

It might be a good place to wait.

(Even if Xie Lian hates waiting.)

He jumps, feeling something brush against his leg.

But when he looks down...It's just a cat.

Slightly larger than a house breed, with dark fur, and a nick in its right ear. Big, tawny eyes looking up at him as it purrs, rubbing against that calf.

"...Sorry," Pei Ming sighs, distracted. "That's Bai Ze."

"You have a pet?"

"No, no..." Pei Ming rubs the back of his neck, his gaze tired. "He was Shui-xiong's."

Xie Lian reaches down to scratch the animal behind the ears, watching as it nuzzles into the touch eagerly.

"He deputized him when he ascended, and I did the same after he..." He trails off, and Xie Lian softens, reaching over to place a hand on his arm. "I'm sure he'd be happy to know that you've been looking after him."

In many ways, Pei Ming is the easiest person for Xie Lian to be around right now—

Because they understand a pain others don't.

The smile the general offers Xie Lian in return is strained.

"You should consider yourself lucky—he's usually pretty picky about who he'll allow to touch him. I'll be taking him to Gusu, once everything is settled...he should be with Shi Qingxuan," he concludes quietly.

Xie Lian nods, not disagreeing, but...

Shi Qingxuan has been oddly quiet.

She was one of the few people that, even in the depths of his grief, Xie Lian reached out to, just to make sure she was alright.

She assured him that she was—but said little else.

Xie Lian can only assume that has something to do with the fact that He Xuan must have gone to Gusu first after things were settled, but even so, he can't imagine what they've been doing all this time.

"...But you didn't get me alone to thank me for offering this place."

“No,” Pei agrees, the wind stirring through his hair. “I think you already know why.”

Xie Lian does, but he still waits, his lips pressed together in stubborn silence.

“…Traditionally, the role of emperor goes to the strongest martial god,” Pei Ming sighs.

“I’m not too proud to admit that isn’t me—”

“That’s not true.”

Pei Ming stops to look at him, and Xie Lian fiddles with the chain around his neck.

“I saw Bai Wuxiang’s memories when I fought him. Jun Wu’s predecessor was the fire master of the last Heavenly Dynasty.”

“Oh,” Pei frowns, thinking. It makes sense that Jun Wu would perpetuate that rumor. He solidified his own position in doing so. “…In that case, do you think we should ask Queen Yushi what she thinks?”

Xie Lian snorts, covering his mouth in surprise.

He hadn’t expected to be able to laugh any time soon.

It’s not that the idea of Yushi Huang as Heavenly Empress is laughable—it’s that there’s no scenario under which she would accept.

“…If we’re talking about who would be the best choice, we both know who that is.”

Xie Lian grimaces, looking away.

Ironically enough, if Shi Wudu hadn’t been guilty of such a terrible crime—or deceased—he would have been the natural choice.

“If we asked the court to choose their own emperor, they would choose you,” he counters.

“That could change.”

Pei catches a leaf in the wind, holding a leaf between his fingers for a moment before letting it go, watching as it blows back down the hill. “Everyone knows what you’ve done now. What you’ve sacrificed. They’ll come to trust and respect you.”

But as he watches Xie Lian’s expression become strained—

He sighs.

“But you have made many sacrifices already. You deserve to have time for yourself. To be young for a while.”

Xie Lian’s lips twitch. “I’m eight hundred years old, General.”

“And your youth was stolen.”

He hasn't lived for himself since he was seventeen years old. And even before then, he was born with the weight of prince hood upon his shoulders.

"…So," Pei broaches carefully. "I don't mind giving you time. A long time."

Xie Lian pauses, his heart in his throat.

"But I'll expect a helping hand—and a long retirement—"

"You would do that…for me?" Xie Lian asks slowly, his eyes wide.

Pei Ming has always been an easy-going soul. A good soldier, but never one who desired to take up the mantle of rule for himself.

And he still doesn't.

"So, take your time, you can go off and do whatever you like when Crimson Rain comes back—but the role will find you eventually, your highness." Pei Ming concludes, looking him in the eye. "You were born for it. I truly believe that."

But when it isn't being forced on him, and he's being told he can wait until he's ready—

Xie Lian lets out a massive breath he didn't know he was holding, shoulders trembling.

"…Thank you," he whispers.

"You're—" Pei Ming pauses, startled when—

When Xie Lian hugs him.

He pats Xie Lian on the back, shocked—but certainly not offended—the prince has just never been prone to getting close to others in such a way.

"…You're welcome."

Xie Lian doesn't speak for a moment, his throat thick.

It's hard, realizing what you could have had.

When he first ascended as a god—the only mentor he had was Jun Wu. Because he thought—

He thought the emperor wanted what was best for him, and he didn't know there were other options.

But the Rain Master and General Pei—they were always there.

Part of him can't help but wonder if he would have been happier under their guidance.

If he might have made different choices , but—

It's impossible to ever know.

"…I don't plan on ruling the way he did," Pei Ming warns him. "And I can't take all of the weight from you."

"I know," Xie Lian agrees, pulling back with a small smile, but—

It's sincere.

"I'll do my part."

It's even easier to do now—

Knowing that his relationship with this emperor could never be like the last one.

"We'll talk more later," Pei Ming lets him go. "Go be with your friends now. We'll have a meeting of the full court once they arrive to make it official, and then…you can do as you wish."

With reasonable limitations, but Xie Lian has never minded those.

They could never be shackles.

Pei Ming is left alone at the bottom of the mountainside, watching the wind blow through the trees as Xie Lian leaves him there, returning up the side of Mount Taicang.

(To make sure Mu Qing rests, and Feng Xin doesn't send him into Qi Deviation again in the process.)

For so many years—centuries, even—Pei Ming ran from responsibility. Flinches from power as if it was something that could burn him.

It was also one of his greatest regrets.

Watching what Xuli became. Wondering if it could have been different, had he just been willing.

Rong Guang made his own mistakes. He was a fool, and he said as much now, so many years later…

But so was Pei Ming.

In many ways, his choice to enable the King of Xuli led to the prince's death as much as anything else.

That haunted him more than almost anything else.

When he lost his own son, centuries later—it felt like punishment for his past failures.

Now, he has the chance to spare another prince from a cruel fate—

And he won't fail, this time.

But just as he thinks of that…

Bai Ze suddenly bursts from his side, running across the plain, tail aloft.

"…Oi!" He frowns, squinting. "Where are you off to? You're not on vacat—"

Then, he sees where the deputy is running to.

Pei Su, rounding a curve in the road.

And of course, it's a relief that he made it back safely, but—

A second figure rounds the corner beside him, and that's the one Bai Ze runs straight to. Winding between his legs, purring so loudly, the General can hear it from tens of meters away.

He must be the new thunder master, from what Pei Su reported, but…

When Pei Ming sees the dark robes and white mask, his breath momentarily catches.

…it was the cultivator from back then? Pei Yuan? But…The moment he looks up, noticing Pei Ming looking…he makes to walk away.

But before he can take more than a couple of steps—

Pei Su grabs him by the wrist.

“We talked about this.”

And it’s baffling, because even if he’s new—as an ascended god, he outranks Pei Su. He knows better than that. Why is he being so familiar—?

But then, he sees it.

A flash of light in dark hair—

From a golden hair pin

So familiar, that he—

In an instance, he’s crossed the space between them, grasping the new Thunder Master by the shoulder—his other hand reaching up to touch the gold piece, staring.

“…Where did you get this?”

He turns his head away—or tries to, but Pei Ming doesn’t let go.

Was this—was this the offering from before? The one that was stolen? After the—after the pin on his body wasn’t right?

“Where did you get this?!”

He shakes him once, even if he doesn’t mean to, then—

Then, he remembers being on the docks that day. Nearly rattling the young man to death in his rage and grief, and—

He pulls his hands back, as if he’s been burned—but still demanding.

“Answer me!”

After a moment of silence—he does.

But not with words.

With trembling fingers, he reaches up—pulling the mask from his face.

Something he learned he could do soon after news of the emperor’s death began to spread, and now—

It lands on the ground with a clatter.

Neither of them move.

But all Pei can do, think, see, breathe—

Are electric blue eyes. The kind that you could drown in, if you aren't careful.

Raven hair, slightly curled—damp, from passing through a nearby storm.

An angry red scar across his throat—still healing.

"…I don't…" Pei croaks, and the new god takes a step away, hanging his head. "I don't…"

"It's him," Pei Su says, holding a hand to his chest earnestly. "I tested him every way I could think of on the way here—it's him—"

Pei Ming ignores him, grabbing the Thunder Master by the shoulders, holding him in a Vice grip.

"What were the last words you said to me?"

"…"

"What were they?!"

And his answer, his voice —it brings something back to life.

"That you would have been perfect," he whispers. "And that I was sorry."

Shi Wudu watches the emotions flicker across Pei Ming's face, wild and uncontrolled.

Everything he's been holding in since that day, forced to go on.

To keep fighting.

"…I held your body."

He forced Mu Qing to let him check for the birthmark on his shoulder, just because it was that hard to accept that he was gone.

"There was a pyre , we—"

“He Xuan didn’t want the emperor to have my ashes,” Shi Wudu doesn’t lift his head.

“He must have thought I was gone. I-I was gone, but…someone helped me.”

But by then, He Xuan had already ascended with the false corpse in tow.

Pei Ming doesn’t speak, and for a man so proud—his head has never hung so low.

“…I know I’m not welcome here,” he mutters. “I changed my mind so many times on the way here, but Pei Su—”

“What?”

“I—”

“Pei Su—“ Pei Ming’s voice is so cold, it nearly lacks emotion. The tone he uses when he’s so overwhelmed, he has to shut that side of himself down.

“Go away.”

And the deputy doesn’t even sound offended, spinning on his heel as he walks up the hill, leaving them.

“Going away.”

Shi Wudu listens to the sound of his retreating footsteps, closing his eyes.

“…I know…After everything you must have heard about me, you—” For the first time, in all of the years they’ve spoken to one another, His voice cracks. “I know you’re… disappointed …in me…and you probably don’t even want to see—”

Shi Wudu can’t speak after that.

Has the wind knocked out of him, from being hugged so tightly.

Pei Ming crushes him against his chest, fingers tangled in his hair, his face pressed against the side of his head.

“I’m sorry.”

The thunder master is frozen with shock.

"…You're…what?"

"I—That day in Lanling—" Pei Ming chokes, his tears falling into Shi Wudu's hair. "Why didn't you say anything?!"

"I-I couldn't ," Shi Wudu struggles to explain. "Before, the emperor did something to me—I couldn't say my name , I couldn't take off that—"

"I could have killed you, I—I hurt you," Pei Ming sobs, his arms trembling as he holds him closer. "I'm so sorry—"

"You didn't," Shi Wudu assures him instinctively.

He was so happy to see him back then—he could barely feel any pain at all.

But the differences between Pei Ming and Jun Wu—they've never felt more stark than they do now.

Jun Wu did so many things to him that he can't even think of, can't give a name to—

And here Pei Ming is, weeping over the possibility of hurting him at all.

He's—

He's more than Shi Wudu has ever deserved, and he's never loved him more.

"…You're…you're not…angry with me?"

Pei Ming sinks to the ground with him in his arms, holding his lover against him.

"Angry?"

"About what I did ," Shi Wudu whispers.

Pei Ming hasn't had a moment to truly give it any thought, so swallowed whole by his grief.

"…I was never very good at being angry with you before," he mutters, fingers tangled in his hair. "I don't know if I'll ever manage it again, now."

He can’t say he agrees with every choice Shi Wudu has made—

But that pales compared to the thought of losing him.

“…Okay…” Shi Wudu takes a deep breath, steeling himself. Then he presses a hand against Pei Ming’s chest—pushing him back. “Then I need to say something.”

Pei Ming goes back with his hand easily, watching him with wide, tear-stricken eyes.

“What?”

“Before—I was never honest with you, and I—” He grits his teeth, forcing himself to push through it. “That wasn’t right.”

“…I already told you, I’m not—”

“Not about that.”

All this time, he's told himself—if he ever had the chance to see Pei again, he would tell him.

And now he's here, and he—

His hands are trembling, and he can barely say it.

"I love you."

Saying it sounds simple, but it's more than that.

"I'm in love with you."

He closes his eyes, sucking in another deep breath.

"You've never been dishonest about what you wanted. I was. I—I've never wanted to be with anyone else. I don't want you to be with anyone else. You—we are friends, but I've never wanted just that."

He wanted him before he even met him, before he even knew what the feelings meant.

"I don't expect anything from you," he adds quickly, slowly beginning to lose his nerve. "But if you want to go back to the way we were before—I don't think I can. It was hard , and I—”

A small noise slips out of the back of his throat when a familiar pair of lips crushes against his own.

Hands cradling Shi Wudu's head like he's holding the entire world between his palms.

"...You..." He's breathless when they pull back. "I'm serious, I—”

"Loving you is one of the hardest things I've ever done," Shi Wudu falls silent, his eyes growing impossibly wide as Pei Ming cups the side of his face. "You scare the shit out of me. You're always pushing me away. You never tell me what you're really thinking."

"I—”

"But it's also the most rewarding thing I've ever done," Pei Ming concludes. "And I'll never stop."

"You don't..." Shi Wudu can't look away from him, only able to take shallow, adrenaline filled breaths.

Pei takes him by the chin, looking him in the eye.

"I haven't wanted anyone else since the day I met you," his thumb drags over the thunder god's bottom lip, flushed and swollen. "The thought of you with anyone else makes me want to break something —”

"—You don't have to say that, just because I—”

"There is nothing you could say or do to make me stop," Pei Ming speaks over him, never breaking his gaze. "I'm going to love you until every single part of me is gone , and even then—I'm not sure if I'll stop. If there's anything of me left behind—it will love you still."

Before he can say another word, before he can argue, Pei Ming's mouth is back on his, warm and close and—and safe.

Shi Wudu's arms slide around his neck--reluctant to hold him at first, but after a moment he clings .

Kissing him back, kissing him desperately, until—

Until he feels the words, said against his lips:

"Marry me."

And he nearly chokes, his hands tightening on Pei's shoulders.

"What?!"

"Marry me."

"You—” Shi Wudu can barely talk with how much Pei Ming is kissing him, but it gets easier when he pulls back to kiss his face. His cheeks, his nose, his forehead, leaving the younger man dazed and struggling in his arms. "You've lost your mind—!”

"Absolutely." He murmurs, kissing underneath his ear. "You should still marry me, though."

"No."

"Wudu—”

"No!"

"Why not?"

"You don't mean it—”

"I've asked you before," Pei reminds him, undeterred.

"You were drunk!"

"That doesn't mean I didn't mean it." Pei's lips press against his brow, his arms tight around his waist. "Which is why I'm asking you now."

"You're extremely emotional right now, it's not—”

"Marry me."

"I just said—" Pei Ming kisses him again, this time until he's breathless and squirming, patting his shoulder in a silent request for relief—and when it's given, he can only try to catch his breath.

"Then I'll ask you later."

"You're insufferable—”

"If you'd say yes, I'd never have to ask you again. You're really bringing this upon yourself, you know."

And in spite of everything, with Pei Ming's cheek pressed against his, holding each other for the first time in so long—

Shi Wudu actually laughs, hugging him closer.

"You're the one who isn't taking no for an answer."

"You also did just say you were madly in love with me, couldn't live without me, didn't ever want to see me with someone else—”

Shi Wudu presses his face into Pei Ming's neck, his shoulders shaking with laughter.

"You're embellishing."

"No," Pei Ming shakes his head, feeling his heartbeat freely for the first time since he lost him. "It's called paraphrasing. What—so you're not madly in love with me?"

There's a brief pause—and a soft kiss against the side of his throat.

"I am."

So in love with him, it scares him sometimes. Like living at the edge of a cliff, terrified of falling over the edge.

Pei Ming's arms pull him closer as he whispers in his ear;

"Marry me, then."

Shi Wudu never realized that the other person falls with you.

"...Alright," he agrees, closing his eyes as he sinks against him, all the tension and exhaustion leaving his body.

Just from being held in his arms again.

"I have so much to tell you."

"...Yeah," Pei Ming agrees with a wince. "Me too."

"What's wrong?"

"...Nothing," he shakes his head, pressing his face into Shi Wudu's hair, his head still thrumming with the shock of finding him again. "I just wish you had come back around...an hour earlier."

It was so easy to take the job when he didn't think he had anything else, but...

"Did something happen?"

"Nothing..." Pei Ming sighs, breathing him in. "Nothing that I shouldn't have done, anyway."

It might have been harder if he had known—but it was still the right thing to do.

"I'm surprised that you didn't go to Gusu first."

Shi Wudu bites his lip.

"...I don't think Shi Qingxuan would..." He closes his eyes. "I had Pei Su make contact, I know she's safe. But I don't think she would want...I don't know how she would feel about..."

Pei Ming's thumb drifts over his cheek, his eyes filled with sadness.

"Oh, love, she's not..." He sighs, knowing better than to argue with him—he'll just have to see.

He's so hard headed, he didn't think Pei Ming wanted to see him either, not until the general was holding him in his arms and begging for his hand in marriage.

"...You haven't asked me how I ascended again," Shi Wudu comments after a moment, laying his head back down against Pei Ming's shoulder, and the general laughs weakly.

"That's the least surprising thing about this situation."

Pei Ming found it hard to believe that anything could have defeated him in the first place—but if he survived?

Whatever obstacles were placed between him, and the ones he loved would be quickly overcome.

"The title might take getting used to," He admits.

"I suppose 'Shui-xiong' isn't appropriate any..." But when he mentions that, his smile quickly fades. "...Do you have all of your powers back?"

"...They're not the same , but yes," Shi Wudu lifts his head, raising an eyebrow. "Why?"

Pei Ming's arms wrap around his back, pulling him back in.

"I wasn't going to let him anywhere near you anyhow," He mutters. "But it's good to know that you can protect yourself."

Shi Wudu's eyebrows knit together. "From who?"

"Who do you think?"

"The emperor is dead."

The mention of that makes Pei Ming's expression darken—reminded of how many things he wants to ask , but...

Later. When Shi Wudu isn't...under such strain.

Now would be a bad time.

"The one who lured you into a death trap?"

"...Oh." The Thunder Master blinks.

"Oh?!"

"Pei..." He sighs, pressing his hand against his forehead. "You know what I did to him—”

"That doesn't mean I'm going to stand by and let him hurt you."

And while Shi Wudu appreciates that loyalty, he really does—

"...It's really...none of it is what you think."

"Ah," Pei Ming sits back, watching him sternly. "So he didn't murder the Earth Master, take his place, insert himself into our lives, lie his way into Shi Qingxuan's bed, get her pregnant, then try to kill you in front of her?"

"...He didn't murder the earth master..."

"Oh," Pei rolls his eyes, "I'll mark that out of his column then. Lovely man. When are we inviting him for tea?"

"Look—he has to make up for what he did to Shi Qingxuan, but..." Shi Wudu grits his teeth. "That's between him, and her."

And in the end—Shi Wudu knows his intentions now better than anyone. He knows that the feelings between them were real.

Pei Ming stares at him, his jaw slack.

"...Who the hell are you, and what have you done to Shi Wudu?"

"Look..." Shi Wudu looks up at him, shaking his head. "Whatever he did to me—I did far worse, and in the end, He Sheng...was far better to me than I deserved."

Pei Ming's brow creases, hands tight on Shi Wudu's waist.

"...He Sheng?"

"...I'm sorry, that's a family nickname, I mean D—He Xuan—"

"Why are you calling him a family nickname?" Pei looks around, like he's waiting for someone to jump out from behind a tree and declare the entire thing some sort of horrible practical joke.

"I just—he's not a bad person, Pei. He's actually..." Shi Wudu falls silent, struggling for the right word, particularly with Pei Ming practically breathing down his neck, staring at him like he's lost his mind.

"...Incredible."

"... What?!"

Before Shi Wudu can respond, trying to explain again—

(And make it worse , most likely.)

—a voice crops up from behind them, making both men fall silent.

"... Pei?"

Shi Wudu grows completely still in his arms, his eyes wide.

For a moment, his shoulders hunch with anxiety, and he's reaching back without turning around, fumbling for the discarded mask, but—

Pei Ming grabs him by the wrist, stopping him.

"Don't," he assures him softly, squeezing.

Shi Wudu stares at him, and for a moment—he looks so much younger than he is, wide eyed, nervous, and—

A little bit scared.

And when he turns to look back over his shoulder…

He sees her, standing just a little way down the road.

Wearing fine silks, two fans tucked into her belt—and with the distinct glow of a heavenly official.

She can't seem to move at first—rooted in place, staring at him, one hand clenched over her heart.

Shi Wudu's is hammering against his ribs, hands unsteady.

Her eyes grow wider and wider, filling with tears.

Part of him can't help but feel happy just to see her, he never thought he would again, but—

Part of him is so scared of how much it will hurt when she doesn't—

"GEGE!"

In the next second, she's running to him—dropping to her knees on the ground beside him, not caring about the dirt on her dress, shoving Pei Ming aside without a thought.

Shi Wudu is frozen in shock, not knowing what to expect, until—

Shi Qingxuan flings her arms around him.

Shi Wudu's hands hover in the air for a moment, shocked—as Shi Qingxuan sobs into the front of his robes, holding on for dear life.

"I-Is this real?! Am I dreaming?" She cries, tears soaking into his front, but—

He doesn't care.

His arms are cautious at first, wrapping around her slowly—but once she doesn't push him away—

He crushes her against him, his face pressed against her curls.

"It's real—I'm—I'm here."

Shi Qingxuan's hands tremble in his robes, and—

When Shi Qingxuan was a child, she was used to being pitied for being made an orphan so young. To never know her parents, to have a family that was whole.

In many ways, she felt sorry for herself , too.

But not now—holding her entire family in her arms.

“…I’m sorry,” she chokes out, nuzzling her face into his shoulder, “I’m—I’m so sorry—for everything I said—!”

“ I’m sorry,” Shi Wudu shakes his head, still in shock—but not enough to let her apologize to him. “You have every right to hate—”

“No!” Shi Qingxuan sobs. “No, I—I was hurt, I was angry, but I—” She pulls back to look up at him, eyes red and swollen. “I could never hate you, and I—I…” She reaches up, mopping the tears from her cheeks. “I’m so sorry I didn’t…know what you were…”

What was being done to him.

Because even if Shi Qingxuan could never agree with his methods—her brother was always there to protect her when she needed it. Always attentive. Making sure she always had help, that she had protection—

And it never even occurred to her that he would need those things.

Shi Wudu stiffens in her arms, his lips pressing together tightly.

“…How much did he tell you?”

Unlike Pei Ming—she doesn’t need any clarification with regards to who he means.

“That…you were in so much pain,” Shi Qingxuan admits, “but that he couldn’t say more.”

Because he promised.

Shi Wudu lets out a trembling sigh of relief.

He hasn't wronged many people in his abnormally long life. Not beyond what might be expected of a water deity of his station.

But like everything else, when he did wrong someone—he did so spectacularly.

There is nothing He Sheng could do to him that he wouldn't accept. That he wouldn't feel like he deserved in some way.

When he pleaded for him not to tell anyone that day, in the Kiln—Shi Wudu knew that he had no right to privacy or dignity. Not from him.

But he kept his word.

Behind him, Pei Ming has only grown stiffer by the moment, on the verge of asking Shi Qingxuan to drop the subject—

Because unlike her—he notices the persistent hunch to Shi Wudu's shoulders. Too proud to express his discomfort, but—

He isn't ready to talk about that.

But luckily for him, whether it's because Shi Qingxuan noticed or not--the conversation turns.

"...It's been so hard since you left, I..." Shi Qingxuan leans against him heavily, hugging him tight. "I had no idea how much you did for me, until..."

"..." Shi Wudu swallows hard, biting down waves of remorse. "I sheltered you too much. I left you entirely unprepared."

"No!" Shi Qingxuan looks up quickly, startling him. "I mean—you did shelter me, but I wasn't unprepared."

Her brother shakes his head, grateful for her attempts to comfort him, but entirely undeserving of it. "I should have—"

"I spent my entire life watching you protect me." Shi Qingxuan's hands are heavy on his shoulders, looking him in the eye. "Doing whatever was necessary."

Even when he was so young, he shouldn't have had to.

"And even though I was scared, when the time came ...I was able to do whatever I had to, to protect him." One of her hands slides down to her stomach.

"I spent my whole life thinking I could never be as smart as you—as strong, or as brave, so I never even tried…"

"Qingxuan, you've always been clever—"

"But I realized I want to be."

Shi Wudu falls silent, his throat suddenly tight.

Shi Qingxuan isn't ashamed of where she falls short. She's still struggling to reconcile herself with what her brother did—

But she's proud of the ways that she's like him.

"And because of all of that...I ascended on my own. Because of what you—”

She can't speak after that—because her brother is hugging her so tightly, she can barely breathe.

"Gege—”

"You always had it in you," Shi Wudu murmurs, remembering how heartbroken she sounded, after she learned what he had done on her behalf.

Not just because of the pain and destruction it caused, but—

Because it also meant her brother hadn't believed that she could do it on her own.

"With or without me. And I am so proud ." He whispers, his fingers tight in her hair. "I was always proud of you."

A choked sniffle escapes Shi Qingxuan as they hold each other close, tears slipping down her cheeks once more.

"And I'm sorry , I should have told you more often, I shouldn't have been so—"

"You were everything I needed," Shi Qingxuan assures him hoarsely. "If I can be half of what you were for me for my own son...That's the best I could hope for. And I—I'm sorry I never told you that, that's all I could think about, I—I never thanked you for anything—"

"And you never had to," Shi Wudu whispers. He presses his face into her hair, hiding his expression—but she can feel wetness there. "It's been the joy of my life."

Her heart leaps into her throat, remembering those words he said in Blackwater Manor. When he thought they would be the last they ever said to each other.

"...I love you, gege," She chokes out the words, never so grateful in her life for the chance to say anything, feeling him hold her tighter in response.

Because he—

He genuinely believed that she didn't.

That she couldn't.

Not after all of his mistakes.

"I love you, meimei," he's barely able to answer, his voice thick and unsteady.

He's shed more tears in the last year than he has in four hundred, and most of them in only the last few months alone.

But he's almost never cried in front of anyone else.

And he still can't bring himself to now, refusing to loosen his grip around her shoulders, or pull his face from her hair until he regains his composure.

But the moment she sees that he's alright—Shi Qingxuan pulls back.

Turning her attention to Pei, of all people.

"What, so you knew he was back—and you weren't going to tell me?"

The general sputters, offended. "I only just found out myself! We barely had more than a few minutes alone before you barged in—"

"Barged in?! I'm his family!"

"Well kid, do I have some NEWS for you—!"

The two of them dissolve into their usual bickering--this time with Shi Qingxuan squawking in outrage at news of the engagement, all while Pei Ming smugly laughs in victory.

"Does this mean you're gonna start calling me gege now?"

"You didn't even ask me first!”

"Hah?! You're—he's OLDER than you, and he's a man!"

"I'm his only living relative, and I feel disrespected—”

"And here I thought we had turned over a new leaf!”

"Not THAT new!"

Shi Wudu can't even bring himself to be annoyed.

(He'll do that later.)

He manages to rise to his feet while they bicker behind him, allowing it to fade into the background as he wipes his hands down his face, erasing any of the evidence of his tears, and when he looks up—

Shi Wudu realizes that his sister didn't come alone.

And it's—

Surprisingly difficult, facing down the man who held you in his arms as you lay dying, who wept for you—even after everything you had done.

And it doesn't seem any easier for He Xuan to look at him.

Standing back from the others, hands tight at his sides.

He looks— different .

Not like Ming Yi, or the warped, drowned form that hid beneath.

Taller, broader—with tanned skin, and eyes—

Eyes that Shi Wudu has seen before, a lifetime ago.

And in futures that never came to pass.

Some good, some bad.

The sight of him aches.

Knowing that this is what he should have always looked like, if he had been allowed to ascend as he was meant to.

This—

This was the first man the Water Tyrant ever drowned. His first and only innocent victim.

"...You weren't..." He speaks slowly, unsure of what to say, but—

Somehow, Shi Wudu knows exactly what he means.

"I was, but...when you ascended, the Guoshi of Xianle found me, and he..." He shrugs, fighting the urge to cross his arms, or look away. "It wasn't your fault."

And even if it was—

"I looked."

Shi Wudu grows still.

"...What?"

"After I descended," he mutters, gripping something tightly in his hand. "I just...assumed your soul would have...so I..."

He assumed Shi Wudu's soul wouldn't have moved on, so he...

Spent weeks, searching for the spirit of the man he once loathed .

Grieving him.

"...You didn't have to," Shi Wudu finally averts his eyes. Always one to have an intense gaze, but in Blackwater, he's met his match.

"I know," He Xuan does the same, reaching up to rub the back of his neck, "I just...wanted to..."

"...Fix it?"

It's even stranger, for the person you once clung to this world for the sheer purpose of loathing—becomes the one who knows you better than anyone else.

Having walked the length of one another's lives, seeing the best and the worst of each other.

He Xuan finally stops in front of him, holding out what he's been holding in his palm all this time, and when Shi Wudu reluctantly reaches out to take it—

His fingers unfurl, dropping something into the former water master's palm.

A golden locket.

Shi Wudu stops, staring down at his palm with wide eyes. "You..." He whispers, stunned into near silence. "...You had this?"

"I was always going to give it to Shi Qingxuan," He Xuan mutters, his tone slightly gruff.

It's how he sounds when he feels vulnerable.

Shi Wudu knows.

"...But until things were settled, I wanted to know...that she was..."

That she was safe.

Admittedly, he couldn't do as much for her as he would have liked in the last week, but a near apocalypse did make for an exception.

But with He Xuan—

He thinks so much.

There's so much more behind the gesture. It's not simple.

Shi Wudu knows.

He could have given the locket back to Shi Qingxuan before they came to Mount Taicang.

He could have given it to her to give back to him later.

Instead, he gave it to him now, himself.

He wanted Shi Wudu to know he had it. That even while he was gone—someone was looking after his sister.

He wanted Shi Wudu to know that he couldn't let it go.

And by giving it back—a necklace with such a strong bond to Shi Qingxuan…

It's a silent acknowledgement of the fact that Shi Wudu is going to be in her life.

In their child's life.

A gift that Shi Wudu knows he doesn't deserve, never dreamed he would ever have.

And for a moment, thoughtlessly, he reaches—not even thinking.

His hand is halfway between them before he realizes what he's done, that it probably isn't wanted, but—

Then He Xuan's arms are there, pulling him in.

Shi Wudu is silent and still at first, struggling to reconcile himself to being embraced by someone he's wronged so deeply.

But it also means more than you can imagine.

To have someone see every part of you. Every memory, mistake, and horror. To crack you open until all of your sins reach the light—

And to embrace you now, like their oldest friend.

Slowly, Shi Wudu returns it.

The last time they fought, He Xuan called him the monster in his story—and Shi Wudu retorted harshly, asking,

'What's it like to be the monster in hers?'

But since then, Blackwater has learned the myth behind all monsters:

They don't exist.

Only people, who make monstrous choices.

Sometimes, the love of someone can make you a monster.

The desperate need to protect them—or to avenge them.

A world that devours little sisters so cruelly can turn elder brothers into monstrous things.

But not beyond forgiveness.

And all of that is hard enough to swallow, mixed with mounting regrets—the ache when he thinks about how easily Shi Qingxuan opened her heart to him again.

Not immediately. Not without pain. But willing to give him a chance.

He didn't deserve it.

Not after all the mistakes he's made, but—

"…You're a good man, He Sheng."

Hearing those words spoken next to his ear, by the man he's spent so many years loathing —

He Xuan's arms tighten around him, one hand fisting in the back of his robes.

"Better than me."

No.

No.

"…Just like you," He Xuan corrects him softly, fingertips straying slightly into his hair, tangling in the strands.

Far too much alike for their own good.

His arms don't loosen when something pulls hard, trying to yank Shi Wudu back—and when he looks up, violet eyes stare back at him darkly.

"What are you trying to do?"

"Pei—" Shi Wudu looks back at him, sighing. "I already told you, it's not—"

"Yes, you already said, you're perfectly fine with it if he wants to murder you, I'm not—"

"I don't want to hurt him," He Xuan lifts his head, staring at him coldly. "…Anymore."

Pei Ming's hand tightens on Shi Wudu's arm, his glare darkening.

"Oh, thank goodness."

Pei jumps, startled when Shi Qingxuan gives his arm a solid smack.

"Why shouldn't he get to hug him? He's family."

"I—" Pei rounds to look at her, not letting go of Shi Wudu's arm. "After you just chewed ME out—?"

"He is the father of my nephew," Shi Wudu points out, trying not to sound vaguely disgusted.

Not about the new addition to the family—just the means by which it happened.

"What, so I can't be 'family' until we have a kid? Fi—!"

"Don't get ahead of yourself."

For those words to come from He Xuan of all people—who still hasn't let Shi Wudu go—

Pei Ming can't decide whether or not all of this is some sort of delusion induced by a stroke.

"…Like you would have a say—?!"

"Alright, alright, alright!" Shi Wudu finally snaps with frustration, shoving them both back so he's no longer sandwiched between the two. "Shi Qingxuan—he is family—"

"What?!"

"He will be, once we're married—"

"Married?" He Xuan's eyebrows raise. Shi Wudu looks away, rubbing his temples. "When did that happen?"

"Just now, apparently," Shi Qingxuan huffs. "He didn't even ask ."

"Shameless."

Pei sends him a withering look. "As if YOU can say a word about that."

"I forgave him," Shi Qingxuan crosses her arms.

She's actually in the process of forgiving him—she isn't all the way there, but she won't grant Pei the victory of admitting that.

"Besides—I know he's being honest now."

"How?!"

"Because I could destroy him if he wasn't."

Not that she ever would. They both know that.

"…You gave her your ashes?" Shi Wudu mutters, stunned—and He Xuan huffs out a pained sigh.

"And then she used them to cave in a man's skull, yes."

"You what?"

"It was a fluid situation, I asked if they were sturdy FIRST—!"

"That's irresponsible —"

"Ingenious. Resourceful. You should try it again sometime."

Shi Wudu sends Pei Ming an annoyed look. "You already know he wasn't to blame for most of this, and he has no ill will now. There's no need for—"

Pei Ming's hand is firm on the small of his back.

"Lets see if he goes a century without trying to murder or impregnate one of you again, then I'll be more forgiving."

"You—"

"Gege, it really made sense to use them!" Shi Qingxuan whines, holding onto his sleeve. "They were a discreet option!"

"Discreet—?"

"I'll show you later," He Xuan sighs—and Shi Qingxuan pauses, actually a little jarred by that.

Obviously he wouldn't want Pei Ming to know—

But he doesn't mind if her brother does?

"The rest of the court will be here before long," Pei mutters, taking Shi Wudu by the arm.

"We'll have matters to discuss, and…"

While Pei Ming can't imagine everyone within the court will be eager to welcome Shi Wudu back with open arms…

That's a bridge they'll have to cross regardless.

"…There are things you need to know."

He leads him back up the hill, where the others are waiting—their heads bent closely together.

He Xuan hangs back for a moment, the hand that once held a golden locket now curled into a fist.

"…What happened between you two back there?" Shi Qingxuan touches his arm.

When he looks over, she's staring up at him with wide, curious eyes.

"I know you couldn't tell me much before, but with him back…"

He Xuan looks back towards her brother, eyes lingering for a moment as he disappears through the trees, hair gleaming in the sunlight.

"…There are parts of it I can tell you," he replies slowly. "But I'm not sure if you would believe it."

Her hand slides down to his, intertwining their fingers.

"I'll always hear you out, you know."

He tears his gaze away from her brother, looking down at Shi Qingxuan again.

And in a rare instance of openness—

His eyes soften.

Shi Qingxuan's own eyes widen, her face turning slightly pink when he leans down to kiss her forehead, squeezing her hand in return.

"Thank you."

"…You're welcome," she whispers, for once finding nothing silly to say.

A Raging Act of Defiance

Chapter Summary

> He smiles genuinely at the sight of her, holding Shi Qingxuan in a tight embrace, congratulating her on her ascension.
>
> And yet, it can’t help but feel somewhat halfhearted.
>
> “…Where’s Crimson Rain Sought Flower?” She muses, pulling back to look around. “He saved half of the people here, from what I hear—surely he’s welcome?”
>
> Xie Lian’s smile grows strained.
>
> “…He’s taking a rest,” he explains softly. “But he’ll be back.”

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Just as Pei predicted—the reception among most to Shi Wudu’s arrival is stunned silence.

Some pleased—others less so, with most having no idea what to think.

Except for Ling Wen, who, in a rare display of emotion, embraces him the moment she sees him.

Shi Qingxuan, by contrast, is welcomed back with cries of joy and celebration—widely beloved by all in the Heavens, even following her fall from Grace.

But she stubbornly remains glued to her brother’s side—only removing herself to hug the Crown Prince of Xianle.

He smiles genuinely at the sight of her, holding Shi Qingxuan in a tight embrace, congratulating her on her ascension.

And yet, it can’t help but feel somewhat halfhearted.

“…Where’s Crimson Rain Sought Flower?” She muses, pulling back to look around. “He saved half of the people here, from what I hear—surely he’s welcome?”

Xie Lian’s smile grows strained.

“…He’s taking a rest,” he explains softly. “But he’ll be back.”

He says that, but the look in his eyes is so—

“…Your shackles!” Shi Qingxuan gasps. “I heard you got your powers back—but it must be so strange! Is there anything I can help with—? Oh!” She grabs his hands, her face turning contrite. “I’m so sorry, but back in Gusu…”

“What is it?”

“…I ruined one of the dresses you made,” she blurts out.

“…Ruined?”

"Ah...I needed something to wear, and it got ripped—and covered in blood—but I'll buy you a new one—!"

"There's no need for that," Xie Lian laughs, shaking his head. "I wouldn't have a use for it, but..." He squeezes her hands in return. "I'd love to make another for you."

He's only seen Shi Qingxuan once--through Yin Yu's memories, shown to him by Hua Cheng.

And now, her eyes are just as kind as they were back then, shining with happiness as she embraces him again.

The feeling in Xie Lian's chest isn't happiness--he isn't there yet.

But it's close.

Members of the court have been slowly streaming in ever since Jun Wu's death became widely known, and after only a few more hours—it's deemed to be enough to call it a full assembly.

And it's strange.

When he was sixteen, he stood on this same peak, at the front of an assemblage of disciples, listening as Mei Nianqing stood under the divine pavilion, reading edicts to the others.

There's no pavilion now--and Mei Nianqing is nowhere to be found.

Xie Lian stands by Pei Ming's side now, a silent show of support as the new emperor is announced, his hands clasped behind his back.

The martial and civil gods assembled are silent, anxious, and battle weary.

No one protests Pei Ming's appointment, as Xie Lian expected.

He's respected by both the middle and upper courts—but there are questions about the other two thirds of the trio once known as the 'Three Tumors.'

"...What's to be done with Ling Wen Zhen Jun?" One of the Civil Gods speaks up, crossing his arms.

"She was perfectly willing to watch Jun Wu slaughter the lot of us. And then there's that entire business with the Brocade Immortal—”

"As I recall," Ling Wen tilts her head to the side, raising an eyebrow. "I also organized all of you escaping from Jun Wu."

Only because Pei Ming worked very hard to convince her—but he certainly isn't going to be the one to drag that fact to light.

"That doesn't change the fact that you're guilty of murder , and creating a cursed device—!"

"I'll purify the Brocade Immortal."

The assemblage looks to Xie Lian—who has always ended up at the center of such meetings, but never intentionally drawn attention to himself.

But he doesn't look at them—only paying mind to Ling Wen as he speaks.

"Bai Jing deserves the chance to rest."

For humanitarian purposes, and also because the Brocade Immortal is simply too dangerous to continue in its current state.

When Xie Lian thinks back on how easily it destroyed Yin Yu's life...

No. A device so deceitful by nature and carelessly handled must not be kept.

He can do little more for the fallen god--but he can do that much.

And regardless of its blood thirst—Bai Jing doesn't deserve to suffer any longer, even if he was willing to be used in such a way.

"...And practically speaking," Pei Ming shrugs. "None of you are qualified to replace her."

That draws a few offended whispers from the crowd of civil gods—but when no one steps forward to offer themselves as a candidate, it becomes painfully clear that Pei Ming is correct.

"So there's to be no punishment for her at all?" Another one of the civil gods speaks up with a frown. "How is that right?"

Pei Ming sighs, crossing his arms, deep in thought—and Xie Lian can't help but feel a little sorry for him.

He's been on the throne for a matter of minutes , and he's already being forced to pass judgment on his closest friend, but—

"No, you're right." Pei agrees.

But with Ling Wen being irreplaceable, there are limited ways to punish her at all.

"...The Palace of Ling Wen will be suspended from retaining any donated merits from her temples for the next 200 years."

The only other punishment Pei Ming could think of to give her would be refusing to appoint any new deputies to her palace, but that would be impractical.

At that point they would all suffer from the logistical nightmare of having the civil system of the Heavens overloaded, something Jun Wu has subjected them to for the last few centuries as it is.

The punishment doesn't exactly fit the crime—but it's still more than a slap on the wrist.

Enough so that any of the other civil gods remaining with discontent are forced to quiet— unhappy , but somewhat appeased.

But that's not the only concern.

"What about the Wa—The Thunder Master?" One of the lower martial gods speaks up, turning his gaze to Shi Wudu, standing between Shi Qingxuan and the Rain Master.

A darker emotion flashes across Pei Ming's face—and he can't be blamed.

Up until a matter of hours ago, he thought the man was dead. He can barely stand having him stand more than ten feet away for the duration of this meeting, wishing he could have his arms around him again—

But he can't interfere on his behalf.

Not only because it would plunge his own credibility into doubt—

But because, for hundreds of years, Shi Wudu lived under the shadow of being the last emperor's favorite.

If Pei Ming's first act as emperor was to leap to his defense—Shi Wudu wouldn't forgive him for it.

And if Xie Lian was even a little bit less heartbroken, he would find something to laugh about in this situation.

Because, eight hundred years ago, Mount Taicang was the place where he found a place alone to hyperventilate after seeing Feng Xin shirtless during training.

Alone in a dark room, struggling to breathe, feeling as though something was wrong with him—all because he felt that way about a man .

And now, on the same hillside, the Heavenly Emperor lifts his chin.

"I suppose now is the appropriate time to announce that I've asked for his hand in marriage, and he has accepted."

That draws shocked murmurs from the crowd—not because people didn't suspect anything about them before—but because General Pei proposed to anyone .

"As a future member of my family, I cannot pass judgment on him fairly, in which case...I defer to the Crown Prince of Xianle."

Xie Lian starts from beside him, clearly not having expected his name to come up—but it makes sense.

Ling Wen is effectively on probation--and as Shi Wudu's close friend, she couldn't pass judgment on him either. And given the Rain Master's...inclinations towards Ling Wen, and her new found (and apparently long standing) fondness of Pei Ming—

She isn't unbiased either.

And with Xie Lian's unofficial position as Pei Ming's second...

This is exactly where he would be needed.

His eyes drift over to the former Water Master, watching how tightly Shi Qingxuan holds his hand, her face pale.

"...I don't have enough information about the situation to pass fair judgment," he shakes his head. "And due to it's complexity, it's not a decision I would make here and now."

And in many ways, he doesn't think it's a matter that the general court has a right to be involved in.

Shi Wudu's crime, while severe—affected a very limited circle.

The Heavenly Court is not included among them.

And, arguably, it was this court that failed the Shi siblings.

"...Wouldn't there be a trial, then?" Lang Qianqiu has been relatively quiet since he arrived—along with Quan Yizhen, he was among the last to have his injuries treated by Mu Qing. "That's how we've handled issues in the past."

Xie Lian hesitates.

Lang Qianqiu is correct, and given how his own family was violently slaughtered—Xie Lian can understand how he would be less sympathetic to Shi Wudu's actions, which resulted in another man enduring the same fate.

But still.

He can't help but remember being a young, exhausted god himself, fresh from the stings of his failures--dragged before the Heavenly Court in what...

What felt like fair judgment at the time, but in reality—his trial was nothing more than planned public humiliation.

But before Xie Lian can give an answer—

Shi Wudu lifts his chin, turning his head to look at the crowd. Careful to meet their eyes with an intensity that has most of them looking away.

"I would prefer that, actually."

Pei Ming's jaw locks, and Shi Qingxuan shakes her head.

"Gege, you don't mean—”

"I do." He looks back to Xie Lian, who hasn't spoken again, bowing his head. "And I'll accept any punishment that I'm given."

And Xie Lian—

He wasn't expecting the way that would make him feel .

Seeing a young god, once burning so bright with potential—weighed down with guilt and shame.

Begging to be punished.

“…Jun Wu did many things a certain way before,” Xie Lian finally speaks, his voice low. “That doesn’t mean it was justice.”

That was never the goal.

And Xie Lian is not Jun Wu.

He will never be Jun Wu.

“…If there’s going to be a trial, it won’t be a public spectacle,” Xie Lian shakes his head. “And it isn’t the most pressing matter before the emperor or myself at the moment.”

“How can you take it so lightly—?”

The civil god who spoke up falls silent when another voice calls out—deep and cold.

“If I’m willing to accept that, I don’t think anyone else here has a right to speak.”

The other Heavenly Officials grow silent and restless.

None of them are comfortable with having a calamity in their presence—much less one who disguised himself as a comrade for so long—

But as the new Water Master, he has every right to be here.

And as the victim of Shi Wudu's crime—no one dares to speak over him.

There's little else that can be discussed with the full court present—leaving most of them to be dismissed to their previous posts. Some checking the rubble left behind of their temples in affected areas.

Some haven't left the Heavens in so long that they don't know what to do with themselves—and they're left to go through the ruins of the imperial city. Clearing centuries of overgrowth, preparing the site of the new Heavenly Capital.

But some—the emperor, the elemental masters, Ling Wen, and the ranked martial gods—remain.

There's no Grand Martial Hall to hold meetings in at the moment—leaving them to settle for sitting on stones and tree stumps.

Not particularly grand , but it will do.

"...Well," Pei Ming sighs, looking around him. "If that's everyone—"

"It isn't."

The newly crowned emperor stops, turning to raise an eyebrow at Yushi Huang.

"The Fire Master isn't here," she explains calmly—unbothered by the confused expressions of those surrounding her.

"...We don't have a fire master," Pei Ming reminds her, his gaze turning skeptical. "Or an earth master for that matter."

"We do not have an earth master any longer," Yushi Huang agrees. "But our fire master is simply away at the moment, and he might not be back soon."

The emperor waits for her to continue, explaining what she means, but when she doesn't—

"So we should continue in his absence?"

"Oh, I think so."

With that settled, everyone turns their attention to the matter at hand.

A small jar, sitting in the center of the circle.

"…I know how to take what remains of his soul and remove it from this world," Xie Lian explains slowly. "But it's not a decision I have the authority to make on my own."

"Is there anything to discuss, really?" Mu Qing mutters, staring at the jar with brimming resentment.

"Any mortal who has committed as many crimes as he has would be executed without question."

"But we're not mortals," Yushi Huang murmurs. "Our laws are different from theirs."

Their methods of punishment are banishment, or imprisonment.

Such measures have never been taken.

"…Imprisoning him would be a mistake," He Xuan shakes his head, watching the jar with the same dark, resentful gaze. "If given time, his soul could reform again—and who knows what damage he could unleash."

Xie Lian doesn't disagree, but it saddens him.

Remembering how certain Jun Wu was, that he would be put down like a mad dog—even if he were to surrender.

And while he did no such thing—he wasn't wrong.

He's too dangerous to remain.

"And what of the God Slayer? Or the shards of Fangxin?" Feng Xin frowns.

"…They're corrosive by nature," Xie Lian mutters, shaking his head.

He suspects that possessing the God Slayer for so long was enough to keep a ghost like Deng Shihong, with limited resentment, going for thousands of years—only for him to wither when he gave it up.

"And each has existed long enough to develop their own consciousness. In all likelihood, they want to be used."

Which means that they will try to corrupt anyone who comes too close.

"…Then they'll have to be melted down." Pei Ming sighs.

"I wouldn't even know how to begin with completely destroying them."

Xie Lian turns to He Xuan, who had taken to absentmindedly fiddling with a small trinket between his fingers.

"Would Guoshi Tonglu know?"

It startles him at first, but he supposes that curse is broken too.

"…The steel itself isn't at issue," he explains carefully. "It can be superheated and melted down like any other substance. But the ashes embedded in the God Slayer cause a greater issue."

"Ashes?" Shi Wudu raises an eyebrow from his seat by Pei Ming's side.

"…The God Slayer is forged from the ashes of the fallen souls of Wuyong," Xie Lian answers first.

Offering no subsequent explanation with regards to Fangxin.

That knowledge can stay with those who need to know it, and there aren't very many.

"They've been forged into a hard mineral state—shattering them is enough to prevent the souls bonded to them from remaining in this world…"

(Hence why Shi Qingxuan's choice of weaponry nearly gave him a heart attack.)

"But you'll never be able to make them harmless."

Pei Ming sits back, staring at the sack by Xie Lian's feet—where both weapons have been carefully wrapped and stored.

"That doesn't leave us with many options, does it?"

"They haven't had much of an impact on me, carrying them." Xie Lian thinks aloud. "I think the corruptive nature of the blades would be more dangerous for mortals who came into contact with them. If the blades can't be eradicated with current techniques—then hiding and sealing them away from mortals and ghosts is the safest option."

"…Do you think cultivation methods could advance to a point where they could deal with that?" Shi Wudu mutters, his arms crossed—clearly not thrilled with being close to anything that remains of Jun Wu.

“You’d be surprised,” Blackwater answers under his breath.

“…Until we find a proper place to seal them, would you mind guarding them?”

Xie Lian looks up, surprised. “Me?”

“You carried Fangxin for quite some time, and you said it didn’t affect you.” Pei Ming shrugs. “It seems like a safe option.”

Xie Lian can’t argue against it. He carried Fangxin for five centuries without incident—and with the blade shattered, it would have to be reforged to cause any more damage.

And it gives him a way to be useful—at least until…

“Alright.”

At the very least—it’s temporary.

“With that matter pending—as for the remains of Jun Wu’s spirit, I would say the Crown Prince moving him past this world is the right course of action,” Pei Ming concludes. “Unless anyone here has something they would like to add—”

“There isn’t going to be a grave marker for him, is there?”

The question seems so out of left field—particularly coming from Quan Yizhen, who hasn’t said a word since returning from Mount Tonglu, his expression like stone.

“…We hadn’t considered—”

“He shouldn’t have one.”

Quan Yizhen doesn't look up, his hand curling into a fist against his leg.

"He called Shixiong worthless and insignificant before he killed him. He shouldn't have any recognition in death."

Xie Lian's gaze softens with sympathy.

"...You're right," he agrees quietly.

It could hardly make a difference to Jun Wu now, but...if it can bring those who remain some measure of peace—then it's worth it.

With the pressing matter of discussion addressed—the remaining gods assembled begin to go their separate ways.

"Do you need us to go with you?"

Xie Lian smiles at Feng Xin gratefully, his bamboo hat shielding his eyes from the sun. "Oh, that's kind...but Mu Qing needs rest. Both of you do."

Mu Qing frowns, crossing his arms as he looks Xie Lian up and down.

"You realize you don't need to go by yourself, right? Actually, you don't need to go at all—"

Xie Lian reaches out to place a hand on Mu Qing's shoulder, squeezing it gently.

"I won't be going alone," he assures them both. "And once I'm finished..."

He glances back over his shoulder, thinking.

"...I'll be splitting my time between here, and Puqi Village," he explains with an awkward smile. "If either of you would like...to visit. You're always welcome."

When he sees the flash of uneasiness in Mu Qing's eyes, as if it might be words, not an actual gesture, Xie Lian squeezes his shoulder again, repeating firmly:

"Anytime."

And wherever they settle—in the new capital or otherwise...Xie Lian can visit them.

But…something tells Xie Lian that wherever one of them goes, the other will follow.

It’s always been that way, and…

Neither of them seem so keen on hiding it now.

“…Lord Thunder Master?”

Shi Wudu is unaccustomed to the new title as it is—particularly when most have avoided addressing him at all since his arrival—so it takes him a moment to look up.

But when he does—he's shocked to find the Crown Prince of Xianle before him.

Pei Ming is only a few meters away, dealing with a few minor disagreements among the other martial gods, smoothing over the tensions that have come with the recent chaos.

And it's been strange, watching him do it.

Pei Ming told Shi Wudu that he had agreed to take on the role before they ever returned to the others—cautious with regards to his reaction.

And Shi Wudu knows without a doubt, if he pleaded for Pei Ming to step back from it all—he would.

Which is exactly why he'll never ask.

Leaving him right where he started—

The emperor's favorite.

And it almost makes it a cruelty and a mercy, the things that he knows now—a veil pulled back with the intention of finding forgiveness, revealing so much more than that.

Now, he knows that was always his fate.

"…Yes?"

"Do you mind walking with me?" Xie Lian nods back in the direction of the ruins atop Mount Taicang. "I was hoping to speak to you alone before I left."

"…Alright."

Most of the actual structures of Mount Taicang have rotted away—but the stone frames of Huangji Temple remain.

"This was the site of my first ascension," Xie Lian muses without thinking, standing over the exact spot—remembering the moment well.

Shi Wudu’s eyebrows raise.

“…Really? Last I heard, there was something about a demon, and a bridge…?”

“That was a few hours before,” Xie Lian shakes his head. “I ascended later, when I was sleeping.”

It was a rather disconcerting experience in retrospect—waking up in the grand martial hall in nothing but his bed clothes.

“…I don’t imagine you brought me here to ask you about that.”

Xie Lian doesn’t turn around to look at him—but he isn’t surprised that the younger god would avoid beating around the bush.

“…No,” he agrees.

“Is this about the trial?”

“Heavens, no.”

“Then I don’t—?”

“Do you want to come with me?”

Shi Wudu pauses, taken completely off guard by the question.

“…What?”

Xie Lian looks down at the jar in his hands—and he broaches the subject carefully.

“…I know what it’s like, being the emperor’s favorite.”

The mere mention makes the Thunder Master grow pale.

“And I know after some things—there isn’t ever really closure, but…” Xie Lian looks down at the jar in his hands. “If going with me would help, you’re more than welcome.”

Shi Wudu remains silent, his eyes lingering on what little remains of Jun Wu.

Thinking.

“…You really think that—after you do whatever you’re going to do—

he won't be able to hurt anyone else again?"

His question isn't necessarily doubtful —just affirming.

"…Yes," Xie Lian nods. "I do."

Shi Wudu turns his eyes away from the jar.

"…That's all the closure I'm ever going to get." He mutters. "But… thank you. For asking."

It's not at all the response that Xie Lian would have expected—not from the acclaimed 'Water Tyrant.'

Such a title implies an edge of spitefulness.

"…You're certain?"

"I was always little more than a placeholder for you." Shi Wudu doesn't mean it as a form of condemnation or of casting blame—but Xie Lian winces nonetheless. "So, I'm sure you can understand—there are some things you never find closure for."

The best you can do is try and forget—as much as your mind allows you.

Xie Lian knows.

"…I'm sorry," he shakes his head. "All of this is—"

"His fault." Shi Wudu interrupts him firmly. "And if it had to happen, it's better that it was someone like…"

Someone like him.

Xie Lian's fingers tighten around the edges of the jar—careful not to break it, but his knuckles are white from the restraint it takes.

"…No matter what kind of person you think you are —no one deserves that. Never."

Shi Wudu stops, growing tense.

"…Did Blackwater say something to you?"

"No—" Xie Lian assures him. "No, it's just…my Guoshi warned me about the fate switching spell when I was young."

"…Warned you?" The thunder master asks hoarsely.

Xie Lian's eyes brim with sympathy.

"Whoever casts the fate switching spell endures the same suffering as their victims."

Shi Wudu grows silent.

"And…" Xie Lian takes a shaky breath.

He hasn't been able to say it yet.

Hasn't been able to put it into words.

"He tried to…when I was very young…" Xie Lian swallows hard. "And then later, he threatened…"

The prince is painfully aware of what he was capable of.

Shi Wudu doesn't ask him not to tell.

He knows he won't.

"…so, when I say some sorry, I know —"

"No." Shi Wudu shakes his head, holding up a hand to silence him. "Immortality already gives us too many chances to apologize. There's no need to say sorry for another man's mistakes, too."

At that point, you would always be apologizing.

And in Shi Wudu's experience—the only ones who benefit from that are powerful men.

Men who use others for their own means.

Shi Wudu was a powerful man, once.

He wants nothing to do with that. Not ever again.

"…Thank you again," Shi Wudu takes a step back, turning his eyes from everything that remains of Jun Wu one last time. "But I want no more part in it."

And Xie Lian can't blame him for that.

He almost admires him for his ability to walk away without looking back.

Xie Lian isn’t sure if he knows how.

His shackles are broken. The tyrant has been slayed by his own hand.

And yet he still feels the weight of them like a lingering shadow.

But, the only thing one can do to remedy such pain, in Xie Lian’s experience…

…Is to keep walking.

The space within this hall has never been so quiet.

Lanterns long since burned out. Tables empty.

A throne sits atop a long row of steps—its owner having not yet returned to claim it.

Clack!

Clack!

Dice roll across the table in the dark, over and over again.

Clack!

Clack!

Clack!

But there’s no risk or reward in gambling alone, with only ghost fires floating around you for company.

No glory in being the last one standing—left to rule over the ashes.

“I thought I’d find you here.”

Shuo doesn’t look up, sitting on one of the long benches along the gambling tables, knees pulled up against his chest.

Xie Lian knows he has a tendency to switch to his younger form when he’s in pain—and it’s no surprise to see him like this now.

But it still aches.

He’s also never seen him before—so now, when he rests his hand against the back of the boy’s head—he notices how similar their hair is in color and texture, even if Shuo’s has more of a wave to it.

Common for those born in Xianle at that time.

“…It’s so quiet.”

“They had to shut down to accommodate the civil gods when they got to Ghost City,” Shuo explains. “Most of them had to hold out here. And now that they’re gone…”

The Ghost Realm has entered a period of mourning.

And no one mourns like a ghost.

Shuo stares at the dice on the table, streaks of blood stained tears on his cheeks.

“Everyone keeps asking me what they should do,” he whispers. “But I don’t know anymore.”

Xie Lian’s fingers stroke through his hair.

“…We’ll figure it out together,” he says.

Xie Lian knows Hua Cheng. Better than his own heart in some ways.

Even if he hadn’t formed his own attachment to the boy—he knows that his San Lang cared for him.

He just never knew how to say it.

And without meaning to, he told Xie Lian why.

‘Have you ever loved something so much…that you’re afraid to make room in your heart for something else?’

Afraid that he wouldn’t have enough to give.

That he wouldn’t be enough.

“…He’s coming back, you know.”

Shuo doesn’t dare believe it.

“How?”

Xie Lian lowers his hand—allowing Shuo to see the familiar red thread tied around his finger.

“Because he promised me he would,” Xie Lian takes his hand, squeezing. “And he always comes back.”

No matter how long it takes. Even when Xie Lian struggles to keep believing.

And in Xie Lian’s experience—while blind faith is absolutely terrifying…

It can also carry you through anything.

And show you that the things you were so sure had been lost…never really left at all.

“But for now…I need your help.”

A door swings open to an empty hall, creaking and echoing against cavernous ceilings.

A room of doors, meetings and goodbyes.

Shuo has been here enough times to recognize it for what it is.

Human beings spend most of their lives in hallways—trying to get from one room to the next.

This place is no different.

Ren Song stays back—dice clutched tightly in hand.

And Xie Lian can’t say he blames him.

“…This is where San Lang brings them all?” He asks quietly, tilting his head back, staring into the endless darkness above.

“Lost children, yes,” Shuo agrees, the dice digging into his palm.

“…Good,” Xie Lian sighs, looking down at the small clay pot in his hands.

In all of human existence—he’s the first living person to enter this hall.

But not the last.

Slowly, he lifts the lid.

A dark cloud bursts forth, pulsating and churning for resentment, searching for an exit—

Finding none.

It rattles up towards the ceiling—but no matter how high it crawls, finds no end to it.

Eventually it comes back down, writhing on the floor, screaming—

Until eventually, Xie Lian hears crying.

When the smoke clears, a child remains, curled up on the floor.

Wearing a mask.

White—molded to look like it's crying.

He tears at it, his body trembling with terror, and—

Hands close around his, gently pulling the mask from his face.

Only to find the Prince of Xianle kneeling on the ground beside him.

"It's alright, your highness."

He wipes the Prince of Wuyong's tears with his sleeve.

"It's over, now."

Jun Wu looks up at him, tears still rolling down his cheeks.

Shocked that anyone is showing him kindness—but especially him.

"…B-But…I…"

Even without the mask, he hides his face in his hands.

"I t-turned out here like him!" Jun Wu sobs, rocking back and forth.

Xie Lian doesn't have to ask who he means.

"W-why did I do that?!"

Xie Lian doesn't stop wiping his tears—because he knows.

Before you hurt anyone else—your first victim is always yourself.

"…You shut every other door," Xie Lian explains. "Until there was only one left for you to walk through."

Until he felt like he didn't have any choices left. That he didn't know how to turn back.

But when the Guoshi of Wuyong stopped shutting those doors—Jun Wu started.

"…I can't go back, can I?" He whispers, his voice cracking.

Xie Lian's thumbs brush under his eyes, hands cupping the boy's cheeks.

"No," he agrees softly. "You can't."

Jun Wu stares back at him, eyes wide—and so frightened.

Knowing only one door is left for him now.

"…You don't have to go alone," another voice drifts through the hall—so similar, but not quite.

Coming from a boy standing beside the red door—one with the same face, but…

Kindness in his eyes.

Jun Wu looks over his shoulder, tear streaked and distrusting.

"…You waited for me?" He croaks, arms wrapped around himself. "…W-Why would you do that?"

Deng Shihong walks to him, his form flickering around the edges.

So weakened, he can only take shape here—at the end of all things, where everything is made new.

"I'll go with you."

Jun Wu stares up at him, shaking his head, eyes swollen, struggling to wrap his mind around it. "B…but I…e-everything I d…did to you…"

"…And I had chances to help you before," Deng Shihong mumbles, leaning his cheek into Xie Lian's hand when the prince reaches for him.

“But I didn’t.”

And he could blame it on being spoiled. On never being told no, or experiencing hardship.

But the prince kneeling before them is proof that privilege is no excuse for selfishness.

“Let me help you now, gege.”

Jun Wu is silent, shoulders shaking as he tries to understand it—the gravity of such a gesture, and what it might mean.

"...You can reincarnate now if that's what you choose," Xie Lian cautions the ghost, his hand still resting against the boy's cheek. "Are you sure?'

"...Yeah," Deng Shihong nods, pressing his hand against Jun Wu's, urging the boy to look up at him. "It can't be that bad if we go together, right?"

Jun Wu sniffs, rubbing at his nose with the back of his hand--and when he looks up at his brother...

He nods.

The two stand up together, and before they walk towards the door—

Jun Wu looks at his brother, repeating the sentiment he already expressed before, his eyebrows knitting together.

"...After everything I did to you, how...could you do this for me? I don't...I don't deserve..."

Deng Shihong squeezes his hand again, their shoulders bumping together—and it pains Xie Lian, watching them now, realizing...

Such a small gesture of affection is entirely alien to the child.

"I forgave you a long time ago," the younger twin answers simply.

"I just want you to be okay, now."

Jun Wu falls silent, glancing at the door ahead of them—looming and dark, it's mere presence being somewhat oppressive.

"It won't be okay in there," he says quietly.

Knowing very well that these doors aren't for those who rest in peace.

Den Shihong doesn't have to answer, he knows, he already said it before.

'But we'll be together.'

The younger brother looks up, smiling at Xie Lian gratefully.

"Thank you, your highness."

For stopping his brother, but far more importantly...

For being kind to him.

The Prince of Xianle smiles back at him warmly, even if it aches.

"Thank you , your highness," he replies, squeezing the boy's shoulder before letting go.

For being brave. For trying .

For choosing kindness, and helping others do the same.

Deng Shihong's eyes crinkle at the corners, not happy , he couldn't be, not where he's going—

But content.

That is, until he notices his brother's hand trembling in his grip.

"..." He turns his head, frowning. "Ge—?"

Thud!

Deng Shihong's eyes grow wide.

Jun Wu's hand pulled out of his own in the blink of an eye--shoving him in the chest, hard .

And now he's stumbling backwards, hands outstretched, but—

Another door has already opened behind him.

"Gege—WAIT, I—!"

The last thing he sees with these eyes, soon to be dissolved and remade as his soul is shaped into something new—is his brother's face.

And he can't say that Jun Wu looks happy.

He looks miserable, watching him go. Frightened and tear stricken.

But he doesn't look like he regrets it, either.

Saying the words that neither of them ever said when they were alive. Couldn't have, because they were never taught what they meant.

'I love you.'

After that, there's nothing.

Just a wave of warmth, followed by...

Peace.

BANG!

The red doors slam shut—and for a moment, Xie Lian is too shocked to look away.

Not until the boy who remains sinks to his knees beside him, trembling—tears pouring down his cheeks once more.

"...That was brave," he murmurs.

"No!"

"It—"

"I'm—I'm so scared!"

Jun Wu sobs, clutching his chest, shaking his head vehemently. "I'm not—I'm not ready, I don't—I don't wanna go! I don't wanna let go yet! It's—it's not FAIR! It's not..."

He says that. He sobs and protests—

But even if an act of kindness is ungraceful—it's still kind.

"...You know something?" Xie Lian reaches over, carefully pushing the boy's hair from his face. Jun Wu can't meet his gaze. Can't even see through the tears—but that's alright. "...I don't think anyone is meant to suffer forever."

The boy can't quite catch his breath, looking up at him—disbelieving. "...Y-You don't?"

Xie Lian shakes his head, looking at the room around them. How vast and cold it might seem to some. But life is the same way.

Massive, dark, and unknown.

"...There's no pain or hurt in this world that lasts forever," he explains softly. He would know. "Any form of punishment—big or small—is a lesson."

Some of them cruel, some of them merciful. Willingly endured, or forcefully given. Xie Lian doesn't think that all of the lessons he's been given in his life have been fair. He didn't ask for many of them. Some were never intended to teach him.

But goodness, he learned .

"...There's no point to them if they don't end," Xie Lian concludes. "So—whatever is waiting for you out there—I don't think it lasts forever."

And Xie Lian does think that Jun Wu can learn, because...

One act of love from Deng Shihong pulled a genuine act of selflessness from the boy. One who is capable of such inhumanity.

But, in Xie Lian's experience...sometimes, that's all it takes to remember the goodness in the world.

One act of kindness. One friendly stranger. Just one.

And that gives every single person enormous power. Because they, at any moment, could be that one.

Jun Wu grows still, feeling something land on top of his head, reaching up to find...

The rough, woven edges of a bamboo hat.

Old, but well loved.

"Wherever you go, whatever awaits you after this..." Xie Lian murmurs, repeating his words from the last time they fought as he adjusts the strap under his chin. "I hope your next life is kinder to you."

Kindness is not weakness.

Gentleness will never make you meek.

Sometimes, smiling in the face of pain is the bravest thing a person can do.

And in a world like this—prone to cruelty, resentment, and hatred—

Kindness is a raging act of defiance.

A stubborn refusal to allow suffering to change you. For hate to control you.

"...Y...You're not going to go?" Jun Wu whispers, staring at Xie Lian in disbelief, the hat slipping slightly over his eyes, but he holds onto the sides tightly, his knuckles white.

Kindness is a choice. One that you have to make over and over again.

Xie Lian has failed before. He's been cruel. He's been angry. He's looked at the world, asked for its hatred, and thrilled in the power he felt when it answered.

But he's never seen beauty like a small white flower left on an altar.

A bowl of food, given with no expectation of thanks.

A bamboo hat, placed on his head to shield him from the rain.

"...I'll wait," Xie Lian promises, kneeling on the ground beside him. "I'll wait until you're ready to go."

But—no matter how hard it is, no matter how easy it is to fall to anger—

Kindness is always worth the pain.

Jun Wu trembles, pulling the rim of the hat down in order to hide the tears pouring down his face.

Because every act of kindness opens a door for someone, somewhere.

It leaves the world better than you found it, and...

Xie Lian loves this world—and the people in it.

Eventually, the child rises to his feet.

Steps unsteady, stumbling. Hesitantly walking alone towards the dark.

But when doors of black jade slide open, an unseen force pulling him in—

He knows he isn't alone. Someone chose to remain—to bear witness.

And when his hands wrap around the edges of the hat on his head, for the first time...

Jun Wu lets go.

Xie Lian watches as dark doors slam shut with a resounding boom, a rush of wind blowing through his hair.

When he looks back over his shoulder—Shuo is watching him with a silent, wide-eyed gaze—tears in his eyes.

Xie Lian doesn't ask him what's the matter.

He knows.

Instead of asking, he rises to his feet, offering his hand.

"Let's go home."

The newborn ghost king grabs his fingers, holding on tight as he rattles a set of dice against his palm.

The climb back to the world is long and dark—

But easier, when you aren't alone.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or reuse without permission

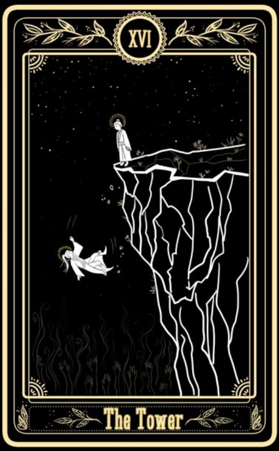
NPAB TAROT
XVI
The Tower
Death
XIII
The Emperor
IV
@_lakitsune

NPAB TAROT

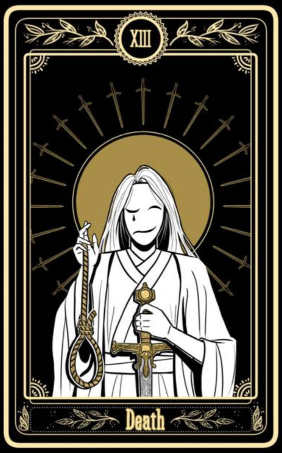


XVI
The Tower

@_lakitsune

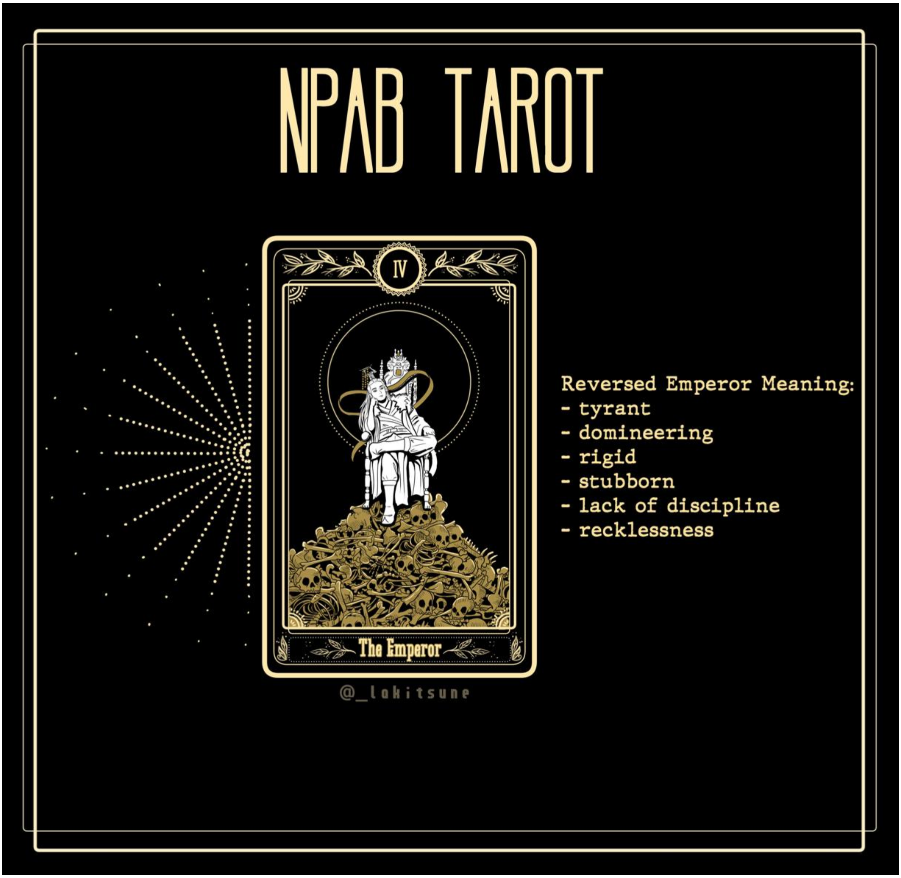
Upright Tower Meaning:
- disaster
- destruction
- upheaval
- trauma
- sudden change
- chaos

NPAB TAROT



@_lakitsune

Reversed Death Meaning:
- fear of change
- repeating negative patterns
- resisting change
- stagnancy
- decay



Reversed Emperor Meaning:
- tyrant
- domineering
- rigid
- stubborn
- lack of discipline
- recklessness

CREDIT: LAKITSUNE

Chapter End Notes

just want to say, since some of the themes in this chapter are heavy and squishy, the implication here is not that we are obligated to forgive those who abuse us, nor was this a redemption of Jun Wu / Bai Wuxiang's character. This is really only intended to display breaking the cycle of abuse and choosing to move forward. Thank you for reading!

xoxo, Evie

Scar Tissue

Chapter Summary

> Xie Lian spends so many hours laying there. Remembering the first night he slept in this bed. Tangled in Hua Cheng's arms.
>
> He aches for them, now.
>
> And each time he slips off, closing his eyes—Xie Lian desperately wishes he could remember his dreams.
>
> Because he knows if he could—every single one would be about him.

Chapter Notes

> CONTENT WARNINGS: VIOLENCE, SELF HARMING TENDENCIES

Xie Lian doesn't return to the Heavenly Court immediately.

He knows he should. That the sooner he goes and finishes what business remains, he'll have time for himself—to decide what comes next.

And maybe it's that impossible, daunting task that makes him delay.

He spends the next two weeks in Ghost City.

Thanking the residents for their help during the crisis. Watching as Shuo adjusts to his new role, running things in Hua Cheng's absence.

Watches as Lang Qianqiu visits—this time with now disguise—the two of them navigating their unexpected, mutual responsibility: Guzi.

And shared custody aside—Xie Lian catches sight of the two holding hands, tucked away in private corners more than once.

He never says a word about it, knowing such moments are private and fragile and new.

He takes food when it's given to him, no matter how badly he wants to say that he isn't hungry.

And he sleeps now—more than he ever has.

It took him two nights to climb into Hua Cheng's bed. Awkwardly drifting near the door, battling the feeling of overstepping, but—

It smells like him.

That's all he can think about, curled up on his side, his face pressed into the blankets.

Like the forest after it rains.

Xie Lian spends so many hours laying there. Remembering the first night he slept in this bed. Tangled in Hua Cheng's arms.

He aches for them, now.

And each time he slips off, closing his eyes— Xie Lian desperately wishes he could remember his dreams.

Because he knows if he could—every single one would be about him.

Every morning he rolls over, reaching out—and every morning, his hands find nothing but the pillows beside him.

Waking up alone, grasping a ring between his fingertips.

And on the last day of his stay in Ghost City—he can no longer bear the emptiness of it anymore.

Xie Lian sits up, hair loose around his shoulder, his face pressed against his palms.

"…Good morning, San Lang," he whispers.

Knowing that no one will reply.

He bids farewell to Shuo a few hours later—warning him that he'll be off on business for the day.

Then, he makes the trek back to Mount Taicang, and the new capital being built in the nearby valley.

Part of him knows his friends would prefer it if he called ahead, to set up a travel array, or make the journey with him, but…

For now, it feels better to walk alone.

Watching the sun through the trees, and the wind in the grass.

Picking wildflowers as he goes, and…

Talking to Hong'er, mostly.

About how beautiful the day is. Asking him what he would think of it. What he's going to do. What he worries about.

When he passes by villages, the locals stop to stare.

At the beautiful young man, dressed in white—a hood pulled over his head. Flowers in his hands.

And sometimes, when the children walk beside him—lilies bloom in his wake, making them cry out with delight, rushing to pick them.

When he arrives in the Old City of Xianle—it's nearly unrecognizable.

Bustling with life, new palaces being constructed everywhere you look. Old, worn stone replaced with gleaming towers and freshly laid roads.

He greets every god he passes, and unlike before…

Each and every one stops to bow to him, murmuring words of welcome.

Some begrudgingly, others with audible gratitude.

And when word of his return spreads—all in the new capital know…it could only be for one reason.

In previous years, the former Heavenly Dynasty would hold trials in the open, with one judge, jury, and executioner.

Not now.

Now, the cardinal gods and elemental masters are gathered in a newly built council room.

Four lower gods have been randomly selected—two civil, and two martial—to serve as witnesses, purely for the sake of transparency.

Necessary, given the prior administration's history of corruption and abuse.

They sit towards the back of the chamber, on lowered benches—silent observers.

The ranked martial gods sit to the right of the room, on elevated seats—with the elemental masters in mirroring positions on the right.

Pei Ming, however, does not sit in the emperor's chair.

He has taken an empty seat among the other martial gods—having recused himself as judge of this proceeding already.

Across from him, the seat of the Thunder Master remains empty.

Shi Wudu kneels on the ground, hands folded gracefully in his lap—his head held high.

Xie Lian was born to sit upon a throne. Shown to the world from the arms of a king, with royal blood tracing further back than even the eldest gods.

And yet, sitting upon one now feels utterly foreign to him.

Ankles crossed—a white sword scabbard laying across his thighs.

"...Lord Thunder Master, Shi Wudu," he finally speaks, unaccustomed to the eyes looking to him, even now in this smaller, private setting. "You stand accused of performing forbidden spells to steal a man's fate. How do you plead?"

Shi Wudu does not hesitate.

"Guilty."

After having spoken to the man privately—Xie Lian isn't surprised by his response. But in some far, distant way, he can appreciate the irony.

They are both favorites of a man who was incapable of taking responsibility—and neither of them have ever shied from taking blame.

"...Would you like to enter a confession?" Xie Lian asks softly, uncomfortable with how high above Shi Wudu the seating arrangement leaves them, but—

He understands the purpose of it.

"Yes," Shi Wudu looks down at his palm—squeezing the golden locket that rests there.

"...A curse was attached to my family for the sins of my ancestor—centuries before I was born," he recalls softly. "I've never known why it came back to haunt us the way it did—but when Shi Qingxuan was born...it attached to her."

No matter how old Shi Wudu becomes—no matter how many horrors he lives through—he'll never forget it.

Being a little boy, nearly crushed by a screaming crowd. Fleeing from words painted across the wall in blood:

'WRETCHED BEGINNING, WRETCHED END.'

Shi Qingxuan's lips tremble, her face pale as she watches her brother speak. Caught between love for him, guilt for her own role, and...

Every other emotion possible, tangled in a devil's knot—her fingers squeezing the hand of the very man who suffered from their failures.

“…A monster that hunted her. Hunted our family.” The locket digs into Shi Wudu’s palm. “We took advice. Raised her as a girl, changed her name. Hid her in every way we could…and it killed our parents.”

His words are not an excuse—and they never will be.

He knows as much.

“I did not become a cultivator out of any grand ideals or forms of self-belief,” he shakes his head. “My intention was always to bring Shi Qingxuan to the Heavens with me. To protect her. But…wherever we went, it followed.”

Some of it was from Shi Qingxuan's own folly—but none of that would have changed the fact that she had been cursed from the moment of her birth.

That Shi Wudu, in his efforts to protect her, had left her defenseless.

"I prayed for assistance. Made offerings. When I was a teenager...the emperor answered me." Shi Wudu's nostrils flare slightly, his hands tightening in his lap. "He told me of a spell that could save Shi Qingxuan, but if I were to use it and get caught...he wouldn't help me."

That seemed fair, at the time.

It seemed like, after countless years of struggle, someone was finally giving him a way out.

Now, he's old enough to know better.

To see that it was always a trap. That he was an easy target. Willing to be a victim, for her sake.

“…I ascended as a god in the year that followed, and when I did…I switched Shi Qingxuan’s fate with a local scholar, born on the same day with the same name.”

He doesn’t lower his chin, even when he feels the weight of He Sheng’s gaze on his back.

It’s a familiar feeling now, and it doesn’t frighten him. If anything, it makes the words easier to say.

“I put him from my mind after that. I made no efforts to see what became of him, or his loved ones. From then on, I lived my life as though it had never happened.”

Shi Wudu’s greatest shame is that it wasn’t keeping the secret that was hard.

It was living with the other one who knew it.

“I placed myself and my sister in a life of peace and luxury, while he and his loved ones were forced to pay the price. I have no excuses.”

“…You say that,” Mu Qing mutters, sitting just to Xie Lian’s right, his hair like liquid silver in the lantern light. “But you prefaced it with how much you and your own family suffered.”

“Not for sympathy,” Shi Wudu meets his gaze.

“Then why?”

“Because what I did to the He Family was my only crime as a god—and I don’t want that to be used in my defense.” Shi Wudu mutters. “I committed many more as a mortal. I lied. I cheated. I stole. I killed my own flesh and blood without remorse.”

“That isn’t within our authority to judge,” Xie Lian remains him quietly, having remained silent since he began his confession. “You are only on trial for one crime, Lord Thunder Master.”

Shi Wudu takes a long, slow breath.

“I know. I’m simply asking not to be shown any mercy.”

Xie Lian knows that, after what he's survived, there is no mercy.

"What would you consider to be an appropriate punishment?" He asks the Thunder Master quietly.

If Shi Wudu could ask for execution, he would.

But with that off of the table…

"…Three cursed shackles." He says firmly, his jaw locked with stubbornness.

One for Qin Meirong, He Zhong, and He Sheng.

Xie Lian grows silent again, watching Shi Wudu for a long, painful moment.

Then, he looks to the only other person who really matters in this case.

He Xuan.

"…The crime committed was against you." The prince points out. "What would you see done?"

He Xuan doesn't look away from Shi Wudu—can't seem to bring himself to, eyes fixed on his profile.

Pei Ming cannot say a word—but if he squeezes the arms of his chair any tighter, it might shatter.

Shi Qingxuan stares at her hands, her heart hammering in her chest, fingers unsteady—

"I can't."

"…What?"

He Xuan rises from his seat, climbing down the steps.

"I was a good man, when my life was easy," he explains. "But when I was forced to walk in someone else's fate…I lied. I cheated. I stole. I took lives."

He kneels beside Shi Wudu, and the Thunder Master can't look at him—his throat tight.

"I hurt someone who showed me nothing but kindness," he looks toward Shi Qingxuan, finding her eyes wide and tearful, hands covering her mouth. "I cannot judge him. Whatever he is, I am. Whatever punishment he faces, I should bear it too."

For the first time since their altercation on Mount Taicang—Pei Ming starts.

Watching He Xuan with an entirely different gaze.

"…Your crimes were committed as a ghost, not a god," Xie Lian points out—moved, but that doesn't change the circumstances.

"If you would like to face judgment for them, that will have to come from the Ghost Realm."

In which case—He Xuan would be forced to punish himself, or wait for Hua Cheng's eventual return.

"…Regardless," He Xuan presses. "I already made him pay."

Shi Wudu reaches up, pressing his palm against his throat—subconsciously touching his scar.

"You fought Bai Wuxiang in the Kiln," He Xuan explains to Xie Lian. "You know what that does."

All of the other gods assembled watch curiously, but—

Xie Lian does.

"He watched my sister grow up," He Xuan explains. "He watched me grow up with my parents. My fiancé. He loves them as much as I do. He mourns them like I do."

To He Xuan, that's all he needed to move on.

For their lives and the loss of them to be paid for.

Acknowledged.

"…No," Shi Wudu shakes his head. "It's not enough."

"If I say it is—"

" You have forgiven me," Shi Wudu agrees, and he still can't even begin to understand how . "He Zhong will never have that chance. Or Qin Meirong, or your parents. You—you could never be like me."

That’s the downside of making Shi Wudu care about someone.

His stubborn, fierce loyalty to them—even at his own expense.

The moment Shi Wudu began to love them as He Sheng did—it was assured he would never allow himself to escape punishment.

He Xuan couldn’t have planned it better—and yet that was never his intention.

“What I did to Ming Yi—”

“Was wrong, but that’s one life—I ruined so many—”

“Shi Wudu,” Pei finally speaks, his voice strained. “The man himself is telling you to let it go—”

“There are so many things I can never fix,” he explains, growing desperation in his voice. “There are lives that weren’t lived, children that weren’t born —because of me! I can’t take that back! And he is different!”

Shi Wudu hangs his head, hands balled into fists.

“Because even when he hated me—he tried to fix it. He never would have done what I did.”

He always tries to fix it. But this—

This can’t be fixed. Shi Wudu broke it, and he doesn’t…He can never…

Xie Lian has been silent, watching him.

“…You’ll accept any punishment, and leave it at that?” He asks finally, watching as Shi Wudu nods fervently in agreement.

In reality—Xie Lian doesn’t believe he needs it. If punishments are meant to be lessons—then his has been learned.

This is guilt.

Xie Lian is more familiar with that feeling than anyone.

But he also knows that telling someone they shouldn't feel a certain way is useless. That no matter how hard he is loved, and how many times he is forgiven—

He'll always regret what he did when he was young.

But having suffered so much in the last eight hundred years, having imposed so much of that on himself—

Xie Lian can't deny that made the guilt easier to live with, even if he knows it was wrong.

He only hurt those he loved in the process.

His friends. The man who loved him. Each of them desperately looking for him--but Xie Lian refused to be helped.

He didn't want mercy. He wanted—

He wanted to endure so much pain, that he could take pride in it. That he could absolve himself with it.

During his time in Ghost City, he found a room covered in tally marks—and all he could do was sink to the ground and weep.

Knowing that when he was hurting himself, starving himself, allowing himself to be beaten, abandoned, and used—

Hua Cheng was counting those days.

Loving him. Missing him. Praying for him.

And Xie Lian treated the love of Hua Cheng's life so carelessly. So cruelly.

Those lessons took eight centuries for him to learn—and Shi Wudu's guilt is just as profound.

Xie Lian knows, if he refuses to punish him—Shi Wudu will find a far harsher way to punish himself. That it has to be firm enough for the Thunder Master to accept—

And that doing so might be mercy, because it gives him a chance to feel like he paid.

Like he can move on.

"...Very well." Xie Lian glances down at his sword, running his fingertips over the gold petals inlaid across the pommel.

Missing the hands that painted them there.

"For the next one hundred years, you will be at the Water Master's disposal."

A century of indentured servitude to the man who suffered the most from his crimes is just, on one hand—

And on the other hand, it prevents Shi Wudu from going into seclusion and harming himself.

He'll have to remain near He Xuan, and by extension, his sister.

His family.

But it's not enough, and Xie Lian knows that.

Can see it from the way Shi Wudu's shoulders grow tense with defiance, debating whether or not he might take back his words about accepting Xie Lian's punishment.

Because they both know He Xuan will go easy on him.

That leaves Xie Lian with limited options.

Exile, for reasons he's already considered, would be a terrible idea.

He has already felt what it was like to shackle someone once—and he has no intention of doing that again. Not unless he has too.

Only one other form of punishment remains. Ancient. Harsh. Something that isn't permanent, but severe enough for Shi Wudu to accept it.

It still feels difficult, saying the words—even if they come out easily enough.

"...And fifty lashes."

He Xuan, Shi Qingxuan, and Pei Ming each cry out in unison with varying degrees of anger, anguish, or dismay—but Shi Wudu sags with relief, clapping a hand over his mouth to hide any sound that comes out.

And Xie Lian knows why.

Because it's a punishment that, while harsh, is brief. When it's over—he can try to move on.

And equally important—it's an actual punishment. One that will allow him to re-enter life in the Heavenly Court without speculations of corruption or favoritism hanging over him.

"Do you accept it?"

"Like HELL he does—!" Pei Ming is already halfway out of his seat. "He died! He saved an entire city's worth of mortals—how is that not enough?! He—!"

But when he notices the eyes of the witnesses watching...

He understands Xie Lian's point.

That if Shi Wudu is punished over his protests—that will make his position easier going forward.

That doesn't make it any easier to bear.

He Xuan has already pulled who was once his worst enemy halfway behind him, lips pulled back into a ferocious snarl—

"Yes."

Shi Wudu pushes He Xuan away—even when his grip on the man's shoulders feels like iron—he lets go.

"I accept it," he agrees, speaking over the protests of those around him.

Xie Lian waits to see if any of the other gods present protest—and none of them do.

“…Then there’s no point in putting it off.”

Feng Xin steps down from his own seat, ignoring the venomous stare from He Xuan as he binds Shi Wudu in spiritual chains, holding his wrists behind his back.

“Your highness—your highness , wait!”

Shi Qingxuan trails beside him, tugging on Xie Lian’s sleeve desperately as they move Shi Wudu from the council chambers—too small for a whip to be used properly—to a secluded hillside, far from where the court could see or hear.

“He did it for me! I’m the one who should be—!”

“You’re pregnant,” Xie Lian reminds her firmly. “And it was his choice, not yours.”

“But—”

“Shi Qingxuan…” he stops walking, standing with her, several paces behind the others. “It’s the only thing he’ll accept.”

Her eyes shine with tears—

But part of her knows it’s true.

“…But, if you want to help…” Xie Lian’s eyes slide back to the others. “It would be easier for him if you weren’t there.”

Shi Qingxuan knows that’s true, too—but that doesn’t make it any easier to bear.

“…Wait in the city?” The prince suggests gently.

"Mu Qing can help him once it's over, and after..."

After, he'll be brought home.

Shi Qingxuan hates the idea of leaving him, but...Her presence would only make things worse, and...he won't be alone.

Yushi Huang takes her by the hand, squeezing gently.

"I'll walk back with you."

Better to have as few people to witness it as possible—and for Shi Qingxuan to have company, waiting for it to be over.

The sun is golden as afternoon sinks over Mount Taicang, bringing some relief from a cold winter's day.

But the ground is hard and unforgiving against Shi Wudu's knees, kneeling before one of the oldest trees they can find.

Sturdy enough that, even if Shi Wudu holds onto it to steady himself, he isn't as likely to snap it in two accidentally.

Feng Xin unties his wrists—only to bind them to the trunk, pausing as he does so.

"...Your robes..." He mutters, slightly uncomfortable. "Would you rather leave them as they are?"

Never in a million years did he expect to be in this position with a man like Shi Wudu of all people. Always so proud. So dignified.

But if he leaves them as they are, they'll be in shreds by the time it's over.

"..." Shi Wudu can feel He Xuan tensing, knows what he's thinking about, why he's worried—

"It's fine," He mutters, reaching down to untie his belt, shrugging out of his sleeves.

Being bare from the waist up isn't particularly shameful, compared to the rest of it.

It's just cold.

He pulls his hair over his left shoulder, keeping it out of the way—then offers his wrists for Feng Xin to bind once more.

Pei Ming is pale, can't stop pacing, and when he sees Shi Wudu kneeling like that, he—

"You'll have to bind me too."

Xie Lian lowers his voice, turning to him. "If you don't think this is the right thing—”

"It doesn't matter if it is or not," Pei mutters under his breath. "He's already agreed to it. If we change our minds, he'll—”

With that pride, he'll likely just whip himself .

"...I know this is the best thing for his future," Pei Ming adds, even more quietly, his voice dripping with pain in every word. "But if you don't bind me—I'll try to stop it."

He won't be rational once it starts.

And Xie Lian can't suggest he wait in the city.

He would never leave Shi Wudu alone in something like this, and...

It's very likely that the Thunder Master will need him after. Sending him away would be cruel to both of them.

And Xie Lian has no desire to make this any more painful than it has to be.

Pei Ming is placed behind Lang Qianqiu and Quan Yizhen, spiritual chains binding his hands behind his back, and Xie Lian...

The only whip from the Heavenly Armory was one that once belonged to Jun Wu, like everything else. Black, the fall covered in wickedly sharp spikes.

And he...can't bring himself to use it.

Rather, he finds himself staring at a ring in his palm—one that was taken from Shi Wudu's person when he was disarmed for his trial.

A normal whip wouldn't leave much of a mark on a god, but this...

Xie Lian's expression twists with a wave of discomfort—so strong, he can't even bring himself to hide it, his mouth set into a firm line as he goes to slip the ring over his finger, but...

Someone grabs onto his wrist, stopping him.

When Xie Lian looks up, his gaze filled with exhaustion, ready to just get it over with—

He finds Feng Xin staring back at him, gently taking the ring from his grasp.

Not out of protest.

Rather, he slips the ring over his own finger.

"It doesn't always have to be you."

Besides—Xie Lian's strength has only recently returned to him, and his control isn't perfect yet.

He could actually kill Shi Wudu accidentally—something Feng Xin was able to recognize from the growing anxiety in Mu Qing's expression.

That doesn't mean Feng Xin takes any comfort in doing it himself. Not when he feels the weight of He Xuan's angry stare, or when he sees the vulnerable slump of Shi Wudu's shoulders.

They straighten when he hears Zidian crackle to life, stiffening apprehensively.

CRACK!

Pei Ming hangs his head, closing his eyes—doing everything he can not to think about that sound, what it means.

CRACK!

With each blow that lands, He Xuan's hand jerks. Fighting the need to intervene, nails biting into his palm until they draw blood.

CRACK!

Shi Wudu has never had any love for pain. He learned to smile through it when he was young, to hide his suffering from a monster that fed from it.

When he grew up, he met another monster—and hiding his suffering went from a means of survival to a habit.

It's almost easier now, because he isn't holding it in to steal satisfaction from the one inflicting his pain—he knows that no one is finding any joy in this. Rather, it's to spare his loved ones the agony of listening to him cry out.

But he isn't like Xie Lian.

He feels every single second of pain, rattling down in his bones. Every inch of split skin, Zidian's length digging deep into his flesh.

CRACK!

After the fourth lash, a pained gasp wrenches from his chest as he sinks forward against the tree trunk—and Pei thrashes.

Feng Xin is methodical—settling into a predictable rhythm—not hesitating when Shi Wudu's pain begins to peek through the edges of his composure.

CRACK!

Something he's grateful for, because by the tenth lash, he can't catch his breath anymore.

Every gasp is paired with a pained whimper on the exhale. Held back by thinning strings of pride and shame—

But after twenty lashes, they cut deep enough for a sob to rip from his chest, and He Xuan almost lunges.

Almost, because one look from Xie Lian locks him in place.

In a sense—if they can't actually punish He Xuan for what he did to Ming Yi—

This might be as close to atonement as he gets.

Forced to endure watching this.

CRACK!

After thirty, he doesn't make another sound.

Fifty lashes.

Ten for every life he stole.

He Sheng. He Zhong. Their mother and father. Qin Meirong.

Even now, his body limp and trembling as the pain begins to bleed into one long blur—it feels like a small price to pay.

But it's still payment.

When it’s finished, he still can’t catch his breath. Can’t move. Can’t make a sound.

But he never asked for it to stop—not once.

He never asked for mercy—and he’ll never feel as though he has the right to.

Mu Qing is the first to go to him—checking his back, making sure that his body is responding as it should.

But when he goes to heal the gashes in his flesh—Shi Wudu lets out a hoarse groan, writhing away from him.

Even now, when he can barely move at all.

“…Later,” Xie Lian suggests quietly, knowing there’s no sense in distressing Shi Wudu any further now.

Not when he’s bound to lose consciousness before long.

He Xuan stands to the side, knuckles aching, like he wants to go to him, but—

Pei Ming gets there first.

He must have been unbound by Quan Yizhen or Lang Qianqiu when it was finished—leaving him free to rush to his lover's side.

Pulling his robes back up to cover his shoulders, carefully lifting him in his arms.

Something Shi Wudu would never tolerate—but he can't walk now.

The weight of it all is heavy on Xie Lian's shoulders, nearly making him sink under the weight of it.

But there is one comfort.

Shi Wudu slips out of consciousness as Pei Ming carries him away, but…

His expression is almost peaceful.

"…You didn't have to," Xie Lian mutters.

Feng Xin doesn't look up at him, wiping the blood from his hands.

"Lashes were the punishment for desertion in the army," he explains calmly. "It's hard, if you aren't used to it."

Xie Lian is an old hand at enduring pain, but…

Inflicting it—not in battle, but on someone who can't fight back—is a different beast.

Feng Xin takes no joy in it—but it's something he's already learned.

Xie Lian bites back a grimace, nodding.

"…" Mu Qing watches them both, deep in thought. "…You need a bath," he mutters, giving Feng Xin a light shove on the arm. "And you," he looks at Xie Lian. "I have to go patch him up—but if you've left by the time I'm finished—"

"I won't," Xie Lian clears his throat. "I wanted to visit Huangji Temple, anyway."

"…Good," Mu Qing mutters, turning to walk away.

Xie Lian almost turns to do the same, then pauses, looking back at Feng Xin.

"…Are you going to take a bath now, or would you want to come with me?" He offers.

Knowing that he shouldn't be alone all the time.

Feng Xin is so surprised, he answers without thinking.

"I was going to wait until he was finished, so we could—"

The words are halfway out of his mouth before he freezes, his ears turning red.

"…If you're busy, it's—"

"I'm not," he croaks. "I'll come along, dianxia."

"It's fine if you take baths together, that's your business—"

"—I never said that we did! I just—you—!" Feng Xin presses his face against his palm with a groan as they walk uphill. "It's not something you should trouble yourself with, your highness—"

"Feng Xin."

The martial god falls silent, walking by his side.

Xie Lian tilts his head to the side, shivering when a winter breeze runs down the mountain side.

He really should make himself some winter clothes, he…Just hasn't been able to put his mind to it yet.

In an instant a warm cloak settles around his shoulders, and…Xie Lian can't help but smile, his eyes filled with bittersweet fondness.

"You don't have to do that."

Feng Xin grunts noncommittally, rubbing the back of his neck as they walk. Xie Lian is tempted to fall silent again, to simply enjoy the quiet of the walk, but…

"…I hope I've never done something to make you think I wouldn't be happy for you," he murmurs, pulling the furs tighter around his shoulders. "I know you would do the same for me."

Feng Xin's face is still so red, even underneath a deep tan, rubbing his neck with increasing speed as his embarrassment grows.

"…I…know you are…"

Though the thought that he'll have to return the favor if and when Crimson Rain returns makes him cringe.

"Then why the secrecy?"

Feng Xin grimaces, listening out to make sure Mu Qing is long gone.

"…It's a little hard to stick out your neck for someone who goes from asking you not to leave, to treating you like an infectious disease in the same day—"

He sounds bitter, but it's not that.

Feng Xin is loyal. He's passionate. But he does need some assurance.

Mu Qing isn't prone to giving that.

"…And it feels like he wants you to be a mind reader?"

"Yes! That's exactly—!"

"You don't need to be."

When they were younger—and even recently—Xie Lian and Mu Qing had the tendency to slip into the same mindset.

That Feng Xin was insensitive. Impatient. A good friend, but never once for nuance.

But after the Mid-Autumn festival…

Xie Lian realized that he wanted to understand.

How much it hurts him when he doesn't.

And that it wasn't kind to assume that such things were beyond him.

"…Mu Qing never means that sort of thing," Xie Lian explains carefully. "He's just…frightened."

Feng Xin almost opens his mouth to argue with him, to tell him that Mu Qing is a lot of things, but scared isn't one of them—

When he remembers.

Back when they were young, and Xie Lian had just left.

Feng Xin was frantic, looking for him—and, admittedly…he took it out on Mu Qing.

He said things that feel so stupid and immature in hindsight—and when Mu Qing lashed out at him over it…

Feng Xin's response had been that Mu Qing had said just as many cruel things to him.

And Mu Qing's defense, saying it was 'different' for him, it made Feng Xin feel like he was losing his mind—

'BECAUSE I DON'T ACTUALLY MEAN IT!'

…Does that mean Mu Qing thinks Feng Xin means everything he says when he's angry? That's ridiculous! Who actually—?

"…He can be the most compassionate, caring person I know," Xie Lian looks up the hill, watching the temple come into view. "But he's always going to assume people think the worst of him."

"Then how am I supposed to—?"

"But," the prince interrupts him gently. "If you jump first, if he knows that he isn't going to be alone on the landing…he'll always jump after you."

Always.

Xie Lian knows how big Mu Qing's heart is. How deeply he cares.

He just doesn't know how to jump first. Not yet.

"…What if he doesn't—?"

Xie Lian spent a lifetime giving them each a little too much space regarding their own emotions, and now…

"He loves you, Feng Xin. He has since we were children."

He's shocked by how badly he wants them to be happy.

It's not that he didn't before, he's always wished them the best—

But Xie Lian doesn't want them to know what it's like. Waking up alone, desperately wishing you hadn't wasted so much time.

Feng Xin stops walking, his jaw slack, eyes so wide, they're practically popping out.

Admittedly, Xie Lian was in denial at first, or maybe that isn't the appropriate word—

Sheltered might be best.

Mu Qing was always watching Feng Xin when they were little, always saying rude things, laughing when he tripped up—

But simultaneously, always there when he fell.

Patching him up, while needling him for getting hurt to begin with. Forcing him to eat, while telling him he was an idiot for not doing it on his own.

Mu Qing didn't have to look after Feng Xin, not the way he did for Xie Lian—

But he did anyway—and without any thanks.

While he's always been thin skinned, he stews on everyone else's criticism—but not Feng Xin's.

Not because he hates him—but because he cares so much about what Feng Xin thinks of him.

"Don't get so caught up in what he says, Feng Xin. Pay more attention to what he does."

Feng Xin is silent, struggling to wrap his mind around it.

Remembering bowls of congee. Wrestling in the snow. Someone holding his hand at a funeral. And he—

"…I don't think he feels that way anymore, your highness," Feng Xin mutters.

Maybe when they were teenagers, but…

After how many mistakes Feng Xin has made, how many times they've hurt one another—how could he? He—

"Tell him what you really think," Xie Lian suggests. "As kindly and simply as you can—don't give him the chance to misunderstand you."

That's easier said than done, and explaining things calmly has never been Feng Xin's specialty.

And after everything he said by the lake—Mu Qing has to know that he cares, doesn't he? But he's been so skittish since—

"If you tell him, he'll show you. You just have to jump."

Feng Xin falls silent, his expression clouded—but Xie Lian doesn't press him.

Knowing that his friend is actually listening to what he said—

And he's thinking.

Really thinking about it.

Regardless of the outcome—Xie Lian would call that progress.

Mu Qing heaves out a long sigh, sliding the door shut behind him—leaning against it for a moment.

It's been a long month.

No, it's been a long year .

And even after waking up from his own near death experience—he had to go straight back into the trenches.

Barely a moment of rest before he was set to healing nearly half of the martial gods who remained…and not all of them made it.

Then, there was moving back to the city he grew up in. Finding a new place to live, and today…

Today was hard.

Watching Shi Qingxuan slumped by her brother's bedside, gripping his hand tightly.

Pei Ming breathing down his neck as he healed the wounds as much as he could. As much as Shi Wudu would allow, once he regained consciousness.

Enough so that the lacerations don't reach the bone anymore, but little more than that.

Caught between Blackwater, snarling at him that he should do more, and Shi Wudu hissing that he shouldn't dare .

And now…he just wants…

"…Did he already leave?"

It's partially a matter of practicality that they're sharing a palace at the moment—they guard the same region, it's easy for their palaces to work together, and there's been so little time for construction.

Mu Qing still hasn't slept in a bed here, though.

It's a palace built for one god. There's only one private living wing, with spaces for deputies on the lower floors.

Mu Qing isn't sleeping down there, but he hasn't felt like having that conversation with Feng Xin yet, either.

As such, he's spent what few sleeping hours he's had collapsed across a couch in the offices.

There's a better one in the library—one with more leg room—

Mu Qing has never, and will never set foot in there.

"…No," Feng Xin mutters, shaking his head.

He's already taken off his armor, sitting at the table—almost like he was waiting for something, but Mu Qing can't imagine what it would be so late in the afternoon, he's always finished with his work by this time.

"He's spending the night in Huangji Temple."

Mu Qing wrinkles his nose with distaste. "That ruin? He'll freeze!"

"I told him already—but that's what he wanted. Apparently he wants to make it livable again." Feng Xin shrugs, "We can see him tomorrow."

"…You really think he should be by himself after today?"

They both know the trial and the whipping are going to weigh on him—more than it would weigh on most.

"And you didn't even take a bath—you're still—!"

"I think he'd rather have us here right now than with him."

And when Feng Xin sees Mu Qing's eyes widen in response, he winces.

"I didn't mean it like that—"

"—I didn't even say anything—"

"—I don't mean he doesn't want us around , he just wants us to—"

"—Wants us to what?!"

"I—you—do you want to take a bath with me?"

Mu Qing pauses, staring at him with his mouth hanging open.

"You're telling me…he wants us to take a bath together?"

Feng Xin's face drops into his hands.

"No!" He groans, chanting one word in his head like a mantra:

Jump. Jump. Jump.

"I want to take a bath with you?"

Mu Qing's gaze hasn't gotten any less confused.

"…You don't sound that fucking sure."

"I am!"

"—and what does this have to do with Xie Lian?"

"He thinks—he told me that you…I…"

"What's wrong with you?"

“Nothing, would you just shut up and let me get it out?!”

“You already said, you want to take a bath with me, and apparently Xie Lian has an opinion on the—did you tell him we take baths together?!”

“No!”

“Because we don’t!”

“I obviously know that!” Feng Xin snaps. “He just—he said that we should talk!”

“About a bath?!”

“No! I don’t know why I asked that, I just—”

“—So you don’t want a—?”

“Are you fucking with me right now?” Feng Xin groans between his fingers. “Because I’m really trying—”

“Fucking with you?! You’re the one that isn’t—”

“I’m trying to—wait.”

Feng Xin looks up from his hands, staring at Mu Qing like, for the first time, he’s actually seeing him clearly.

Thinking about what he’s doing , not what he’s saying .

“…You don’t want to talk…” He mutters slowly, and Mu Qing’s eyebrows crease in confusion.

“Huh?”

“…You don’t want to talk,” Feng Xin repeats. “You’re nervous, and you’re dragging it off topic on purpose.”

Mu Qing looks like a small creature caught under a floodlight, frozen, eyes wide.

Not really prepared to be seen at the moment.

“…Is that what you always do?”

“I—the fuck?!” Mu Qing sputters, snatching his cloak back up from where he tossed it down before. “No, I don’t, I’m not , you’re just—not making any sense, waiting around here, like I’d want to take a—”

“…Are you running away?!”

“No!!!”

Mu Qing shakes his head vehemently, nearly stumbling as he reaches back for the doorknob. “It’s just freezing, and he’s probably going to get frostbite or something and I’m gonna have to take care of it—”

“—He’s fine.”

“And you—you’re acting weird —you need to work out whatever the fuck is going on with you, I can’t—”

“Because I want to talk?! You don’t even want to know what it’s about!”

“Whatever you’re pissed at me about, can it wait until later? I’m not in the—”

“Pissed at you?!”

“You don’t want to talk to me unless it’s something like that—”

Well. That’s something Feng Xin is going to have to take some time to digest.

“I’m not! Would you just stop—?!”

Mu Qing starts to open the door, only to feel it slam back with a thud!

Feng Xin’s palm rests against the wood over his head, and Mu Qing sputters.

“You—You can’t lock me in here you fucking cretin—”

“Cretin? I wanna have a conversation like two adults, and I’m a fucking cretin?!”

“It’s not like adults if you’re forcing me—!”

Mu Qing won’t stop pushing at him, wrestling for the doorknob, and Feng Xin is exasperated.

“I wouldn’t have to force you if you didn’t run away every time and not let me talk!"

"I DO NOT! IF YOU WANT TO TAKE A BATH TOGETHER THAT BAD—!"

"IT'S NOT ABOUT THE GODDAMN BATH!!!"

In the struggle, they end up sliding down the door—with Mu Qing's wrists pinned above his head, Feng Xin kneeling between his thighs, both of them glaring at one another.

Because Feng Xin's arms are stupidly strong—and now he's stuck.

It isn't calm, or gentle—not like Xie Lian would have wanted, but…

"I MISSED YOU, YOU STUBBORN LITTLE ASSHOLE, OKAY?!"

Feng Xin is breathing hard, and Mu Qing's expression shifts from a glare, to just…

Pure, blank shock.

"…But I didn't go anywhere…"

"You didn't HAVE to!" Feng Xin shakes his head. "You—you stopped talking to me, you stopped kissing me—"

"You missed kissing me that much?" Mu Qing mutters snidely, averting his gaze, but—

"Yes!"

Feng Xin is leaping head first.

"Half the time when We're arguing, it's all I'm thinking about! And Jian Lan—what she did to you was bullshit, and I'm sorry—"

"You're bringing her up now?"

"She hated you because I said your name so many times when I was with her!" Feng Xin snaps.

"And I never meant to, I was just angry at you and I missed you and I wanted you, and I just—"

"But you said—" Mu Qing's voice is softer, his stomach lurching painfully.

“I didn’t mean to say dianxia that time!” Feng Xin pleads desperately. “You tripped! And he was tripping all the time back then! And I just—you left and you never let me explain—!”

“You were crazy about him, what was I supposed to—?!”

“I had a crush on him when I was a kid!” Feng Xin groans.

“The only person I’ve ever been crazy about is you!”

Mu Qing’s eyes grow round as words leave him, his breaths growing shallow.

“I—” Feng Xin grits his teeth.

It’s hard, being the one to lay your sword and shield down first.

Hard , showing someone where you’re the weakest.

“You’re the smartest person I’ve ever met,” he mutters, trying so hard to keep his tone gentle. To be patient. To be simple. To be clear . “And when I look at your eyes, I kind of feel like I’m going to be sick—but in a good way?”

“… Sick?”

“And your hair—is really —beautiful—” Feng Xin mutters, his cheeks so hot, it feels like he might faint. “It was before, too. And you—I lied before, I was touching it on purpose—”

“You acted like I was crazy —!”

“I don’t mind if I have to keep arguing with you forever,” Feng Xin continues hoarsely. “And I’m not trying to sabotage you, or ruin your cultivation. I—I really want you, but if we never do that, it’s fine—I just—I don’t want to lose you, alright?!”

It’s terrifying, but…

“…And I know you’re a good person,” he mutters. “I’m sorry I didn’t say it back then, I was just surprised —I don’t know why you did what you did to that guy—but I know you must have had a good reason.”

Mu Qing’s heart is in his throat.

…Some people are worth jumping for.

“I should have said it sooner, I don’t know why I didn’t—and I know I’ve fucked this up so many times, I shouldn’t have waited until you were dying to say anything, I know you probably think it was just because of that, but I—!”

Mu Qing lurches forward—as much as he can, with his wrists pinned over his head—sealing their mouths together.

Kissing Feng Xin in a way that always manages to send him out of orbit, spiraling.

“I don’t think I’ve ever heard you talk that much,” he mumbles against his mouth.

“…You never give me the chance,” Feng Xin croaks, breathing shakily. “So, I figured I had to say it all at once while I had you stuck—”

Mu Qing kisses him again, pulling at his wrists insistently.

“Let go,” he mumbles, feeling Feng Xin grumble in protest. “Let go.”

But when he does, half expecting Mu Qing to hiss and shove him away —

Mu Qing’s arms wrap around his neck, hugging him close, his lips never leaving Feng Xin’s.

“…You really…” Their mouths part between breaths, gasping. “… Mean that? All of it?”

"Yeah," Feng Xin croaks, his arms tight around Mu Qing's back. "All of it, I'll swear on anything you want me to, I wouldn't lie about something like—”

Then...Mu Qing does something new.

They've kissed so many times in eight centuries, in so many different ways, but...

He presses his face into the side of Feng Xin's neck, holding him so tight, it almost aches.

But only in a way that makes Feng Xin hold him tighter in response.

"...I..." His hands tighten into fists in the back of Feng Xin's robes. "I..."

In all this time, they've barely been able to do more than dance around each other, screaming and running back to their corners before they got even a little bit close, but—

Xie Lian was right.

"...I want you too ," Mu Qing croaks weakly, his voice breaking.

And he sounds—god, he sounds so...

"...And I know I'm not...not easy ..." Every word sounds like a struggle, forcing himself to spit it out. "I just...I get..."

He gets scared.

He gets so scared.

"Just...if you're gonna do this...don't..."

Feng Xin stiffens, feeling wetness against the side of his neck—Mu Qing's arms trembling as they hold onto him.

"...Don't...let me go, okay?" He pleads quietly. "Even if I...I'm not easy, don't—"

Feng Xin's arms crush him close, stealing his breath.

"I won't." He promises so sincerely , holding onto him like a lifeline. "I don't want you to be easy," he rests his cheek against the top of Mu Qing's head. "If you were...you wouldn't be you."

That's almost insulting—but so earnest...it makes the other man laugh wetly.

After a moment he grows quiet, his mouth pressed against the side of Feng Xin's neck—just over his hammering pulse—and he jumps.

Mumbling something under his breath, into Feng Xin's skin--too muffled to hear.

"...What?"

Mu Qing huffs, knees tightening around Feng Xin's hips.

It shouldn't be so hard. Not after how long they've known each other. Everything they've been through.

It almost feels like spending a lifetime insisting you don't need someone, then forcing yourself to bend your pride and admit that you do .

It's terrifying. It's vulnerable. It's embarrassing somehow, even though it really shouldn't be—

But all you have to do is jump.

After that, falling is easy.

And when Feng Xin hears the words—it's like the entire world grinds to a halt.

"...I love you."

'Mu Qing loves you. He has since we were children.'

It's one thing to hear that.

The noise that comes out of the back of Feng Xin's throat makes Mu Qing shudder.

It's another to hear him say it.

One hand slides into his hair, yanking his head back—drawing a gasp from Mu Qing's lips—

Then, they're tangled in each other again, mouths locked together.

Feng Xin whispers those words back, like he would speak them directly into his heart if he could.

I love you. I love you. I love you .

It's you. It's always been you.

Don't let go. Please don't—

I won't.

I won't .

They're flushed and panting, lips swollen as Mu Qing whispers.

"Can I tell you something?"

"...What?" Feng Xin rasps.

"...I've never liked my cultivation method," Mu Qing admits in a rushed jumble, fingers tangled in Feng Xin's hair, half of it falling down from its usual style.

Feng Xin is still—unsure of how to react—but cautiously euphoric.

"...You don't?"

Mu Qing shakes his head vehemently.

He hated it from the beginning, how ashamed he was made to feel of something that was never his choice. And then when he did want to make that choice...he couldn't.

"I want to drink," he admits first, then tags on— "And...you."

Besides—the cultivation world is rapidly moving away from celibacy as a widely cultivated path.

Sects are becoming more and more familial in nature—some of them looking to make a full switch to inheritance by bloodlines.

With that in mind, Mu Qing already relaxed the rules centuries ago for cultivators who wanted to practice in his name, not limiting himself to a shrinking number of sects who still practiced celibacy.

His base of power isn't the way it was before, when his 'chastity' was prized.

"...Which is the priority?" Feng Xin mutters, breathing hard. "Me, or the drinking?"

He feels Mu Qing smile against him, a laugh bubbling out of his chest.

"Well, you're the reason I want to drink—" He gasps when Feng Xin shifts closer, hands gripping his shoulders.

"...But mostly...you," he admits faintly, his heart beating so fast. "I just need... slow ..."

Feng Xin expected nothing less, given how long he's been trained to avoid anything and everything to do with that, even if he doesn't know...everything.

But he will.

"I can do slow," Feng Xin breathes against him, their foreheads resting against each other. "As slow as you want."

It's hard, telling a story that no one wanted to hear.

But the last time Mu Qing told the truth—someone listened.

Someone helped him.

When someone promises to hold onto you, to never let you go, even when you're not easy—when they promise to love you in spite of all of your flaws—

Telling the truth becomes easier with every act of faith.

And when he's ready—Mu Qing will jump again.

"For now...taking a bath sounds nice..." he mutters, feeling a little ridiculous, given how much shit he gave Feng Xin for the idea before, but—

Feng Xin smiles, their noses bumping together.

"Yeah?"

"...If you can handle it, anyway—”

"Handle it?"

"I don't know," Mu Qing shakes his head, a little haughty. "You mentioned how much you 'wanted me' twice in that speech of yours—”

"And you said you wanted me too you—!"

"Yeah, I did, but I've been trained in self restr—”

This time, when Feng Xin kisses him—there's teeth, making Mu Qing's legs tighten instinctively, wrapping around his waist without thinking, just doing, and it's—

It's so good.

"And I've wanted to taste you for eight hundred years," Feng Xin growls against this mouth, and—

Mu Qing thinks he might go into Qi Deviation once again on the spot, his toes curling.

"My self-restraint is pretty fucking good."

For once, Mu Qing is left relatively speechless, breathing hard against his mouth, hands tightening on his shoulders.

When Feng Xin lifts him up like that, carrying him towards his—their—private chambers—

It is just a bath.

Admittedly tense at first—far more mutually than Mu Qing would like to admit—

But eventually, he's relaxed. Leaning against him, his head against his shoulder.

There are still things they have to do. Things he has to tell him.

And he does.

Not the hardest things. Smaller bits and pieces, breaking off when it gets too hard, when his words start to break off and become unsteady, but...

Feng Xin just listens.

One arm around his shoulders, fingertips tracing patterns across his back.

His hands never stray past where Mu Qing wants them—

Even if he thinks he might want them everywhere.

And when they're dried off, for the first time since Mu Qing left...they go to bed together.

Legs tangled together, Feng Xin's face against his back—arms around him.

They'll talk more, later. They'll do more, later.

They'll find Xie Lian in the morning, and when they do...Mu Qing is going to have to find a way to thank him without dying of embarrassment.

But for now—they'll stay like this. Quiet—safe.

And Mu Qing won't let go.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or reuse

@_lakitsune

CREDIT: LAKITSUNE

. . .
DID YOU JUST CALL ME BEAUTI-FUL?
...
YEAH.
I DID.

CREDIT: MORGANNING

Tidal Forces

Chapter Summary

Days pass. Palaces grow up from fractured ruins, taking shape across a once abandoned horizon.

A new emperor walks the streets among his subjects—greeted wherever he goes. Lending his ear or his help to those who ask, leaving none unheard.

It's too soon for historians to look back on the Jun regime and give it a proper post-mortem—but the first month of the Pei Dynasty, despite beginning in the depths of winter, has been like a breath of warmth.

Chapter Notes

CONTENT WARNINGS: existential issues, mentions of pregnancy related topics

Days pass. Palaces grow up from fractured ruins, taking shape across a once abandoned horizon.

A new emperor walks the streets among his subjects—greeted wherever he goes. Lending his ear or his help to those who ask, leaving none unheard.

It's too soon for historians to look back on the Jun regime and give it a proper post-mortem—but the first month of the Pei Dynasty, despite beginning in the depths of winter, has been like a breath of warmth.

Even among the mortals, stories have begun to spread—aided by Pei Ming and Ling Wen broadcasting Jun Wu's words across the mortal realm.

His temples that were razed by the new Thunder Master are now being rebuilt—

Dedicated to the new emperor, or the crown prince.

The Martial God of the Central Plains is just as much of a hero of the story—but regarded as a tragic one.

Left wandering the hills, waiting for his beloved to return to him.

But his love is a star, shining high above—and he must wait for him to fall again.

The new emperor, however, is regarded as a triumphant savior.

Casting down the tyrant, the king of pretenders—a hero of war and revolution.

Bound now to one last battle: rule.

And when the new temples of Ming Guang begin to rise across the continent—he is still worshiped as a god of love and war—

But now, he is worshiped as God of the Sun, golden shingles and dragons framing the entryways of his halls.

And, ironically, today is when he should be at his weakest—the winter solstice.

The shortest day of the year, followed by its longest night.

The day when Xuan Zhen's followers gather and feast in his temples, celebrating the peak of winter.

This year he celebrates among old friends, the three sitting together on the mountain peak they once called home, telling stories around the campfire.

A bowl of congee split three ways, and enough for each to have their fill.

They lay beneath the stars after, counting them, recalling all the constellations they can remember. Some old, some new.

Xie Lian holds the grass this time—and Mu Qing holds Feng Xin's hand.

Neither let go.

They sleep long before the prince does.

He keeps his eyes on the stars, thinking of the stories the mortals are telling.

Wondering, out of all of the stars, which one his San Lang would be. One of the brightest, surely.

Most wish on falling stars—and now, he wishes for one to fall.

But the peak of winter has never been a holiday that belonged to Xuan Zhen alone.

The day belongs to him—but the night, the longest night of the year—has always been dedicated to the Goddess of the Moon.

Once associated with the Water Master, now fallen and made new.

As thunderstorms rage across the coast on this day, lightning crashing between gusts of wind, new celebrations are held in new temples.

Worshiping the God of Thunder, crafting new stories in his name.

A goddess of the moon, beloved by the sun god, cast down and drowned—only to be reborn as a god of thunder and wrath.

Still loved by the sun. Born in both lives to be the one who sits beside the throne.

Before, the longest night was celebrated with offerings and sacrifices.

Gold overflowing in his coffers was one thing—

But Jun Wu found it amusing to spread rumors that mortals should sacrifice doves in his name.

Every year, Shi Wudu would awake to bloodstained feathers on his doorstep. Intended by his worshippers as a gift, but...

This year, there is a new emperor. A god reborn.

And now, they have new traditions.

Up and down the coast, on the banks of rivers and lakes, small lanterns are sent floating across the water—each with one gold coin tucked inside.

Praying for the moon goddess's safe travels, and future rebirths. Reaching her in the only tangible way they can. Honoring her old title, and...

Because the only place you can touch the moon on earth, is when you brush your fingers across its reflection in the water.

Shi Wudu has almost always spent this night alone.

Some nights, Pei Ming has joined her. Secret moments, shared in private rooms, her voice always silenced.

Because it would be dangerous if anyone else knew.

Because she feared what Jun Wu would do .

But not this night.

She spent the first few hours with Pei Ming, tucked away in the sitting rooms of their new palace. Still healing, unable to do more than laugh and drink with him and Ling Wen—but it's still more than she thought she would ever have again.

But they are overworked, and the alcohol did little to help matters—leaving each sleeping on either side of the couch while the long night was still young.

Pei Ming's hand held onto hers tightly, even in his sleep—but she carefully slipped away.

Now, she spends the night as she always has, in one way or another.

Sitting in the new courtyard, alone beneath a blanket of stars.

On the banks of a freshly dug pond—but unlike the one Jun Wu gave her, there are no koi swimming beneath the surface.

Now, she only sees reflections of offering lanterns shining back up at her. Countless, from all across the continent.

It's a full moon tonight—shining so brightly, she can see them all clearly. One knee pulled against her chest, fingertips playing delicately over the surface.

"...Aren't you cold?"

Shi Wudu stiffens, pulling her hand back—and in an instance her shape changes. Still elegant, lithe, bathed in moonlight—

But now, he sounds almost irritated by the intrusion.

"Not particularly."

It's not that He Xuan isn't welcome in the palace. He is, with Pei Ming growing more tolerant upon every visit. It's just...

"I thought I'd never hear you sound anything but contrite again," he mutters, sitting down beside him. "I'm relieved."

Shi Wudu raises his eyebrows in silent acknowledgment, not looking away from the surface of the pond.

"How is Qingxuan? I didn't see her today."

"Her usual self," He Xuan shrugs, leaning back on his hand. "But she's started craving lemon cakes ferociously."

It's all anyone can do to keep them in the kitchens. And if they run out, it's somehow He Xuan's doing, when he doesn't even—

Well, he did eat a few, but he didn't eat them all , and he bought more .

But when he looks up...

He notices Shi Wudu is smiling.

"...What?"

"...My mother sucked on lemon slices when she was pregnant with her," he explains, his eyes filled with a fondness that He Xuan knows all too well.

"I remember," He Xuan squints. "She used to terrorize him with it, didn't she?"

That draws a laugh.

"She did—she'd chase him all around the house, trying to get him to kiss her—"

"Because it was sour," He Xuan finishes the sentence for him, smiling faintly.

Shi Qingxuan must take after her—because she tried to do the same thing to him this morning.

Only to discover, tragically, that her lover could not be tormented by any kiss from her, sour or not.

"...I'm surprised you didn't see her, given that it's an important night."

"She could always come and see me if she wanted," Shi Wudu shrugs.

He's made a point of seeing her every day since his return. She knows she can always return the favor, and often does.

"But she also knows I don't like being seen in that form."

And as such, she leaves him be, always sending a gift—but respecting the desire for privacy.

"...Yes," He Xuan leans his chin on his hand. "She's very considerate like that."

And he also knows that he is being passive aggressively scolded—because he is not.

"But in my case, I've already seen you that way—and every other—so I didn't think you would mind."

Shi Wudu sends him a look.

"I've already had to field so many questions from Pei Ming about that. And Shi Qingxuan."

"Yeah," He Xuan frowns. "We should have compared stories before either one of us spoke with her."

"Why?"

"Because I thought you had moved past your sugar coating everything you think she doesn't need to hear phase—”

"Oh, like you can talk?"

"When she agreed to give me another chance, I promised her honesty." He Xuan shrugs. " I told her that I saw everything."

Shi Wudu scowls, pressing his face against his hand.

"...I told her I tuned the inappropriate parts out," he mutters, which is true.

He tuned out as much as he could. But with regards to blackwater, there was a shocking amount of...

"...Yes, well, she wasn't even upset about me seeing you in that situation, she just didn't want to hear anything about it," He Xuan drawls. "It actually bothered her more that I had seen Pei Ming."

Shi Wudu's scowl intensifies, and now he's rubbing his temples.

"...It's too bad you missed it, they were actually very sweet to one another while you were gone." He Xuan looks back over his shoulder, eyeing the blooms surrounding the pond.

An engagement gift from Xie Lian—moon flowers, blossoming deep into the night.

"I'm sure."

"No, they really were." He Xuan shakes his head, resisting the urge to pick one, knowing they aren't for him to touch. "I was moved."

"Shut up, He Sheng."

Blackwater laughs . "I'm really not making it up—I swear. He was...very good to her."

The sincerity in his tone gives the thundermaster pause.

"...He promised me he would take care of her, if something ever happened to me..." He reminds him quietly. "That's not the part I find hard to believe."

"I know," He Xuan turns his head back to look at him.

"But...I think not having you around made her appreciate that he wasn't so bad. But, once you were back..."

She went back to being jealous all over again—even more so, because now, they were engaged .

Shi Wudu knows she's happy for him , but...not unconditionally.

"...Part of me hopes she'll relax about it when the baby is born," he mutters. "It's always been just the two of us. She doesn't...know how to share that part of our lives with someone else."

Shi Wudu was family—the one constant in her life—and she didn't want it to change.

But he's been willing to accept her partner into the family, despite...a far more complicated situation.

"She will," He Xuan agrees. "But I don't think it's just jealousy, you know. She's actually pretty protective of you."

Shi Wudu doesn't reply, but He Xuan can see it in the slump of his shoulders...

He doesn't think he deserves to be protected, regardless of what Shi Qingxuan might have to say about it.

"...Did you visit to ask me about that?"

"No," he admits, looking away.

"I came, because I knew you'd sneak off alone."

Shi Wudu stares back down at the water, his expression impassive. "Conniving."

"A tiger can't completely change its stripes."

"And you are no tiger."

"Oh, what am I?"

Shi Wudu sucks in a breath, blowing it out slowly.

"...A shark, maybe."

(Though really, the more he thinks, the tiger analogy might be more apt , which isn't surprising--when he wants to be, Blackwater is rather self-aware.)

"Why did you want to find me alone? You've seen me often enough since I got back."

He Xuan shrugs, tossing around a few options in his head.

"Well, I didn't expect you to go and change forms on me as soon as I arrived," he shrugs. "Since I've already seen—”

"You said."

"...And, I wanted to ask you about something. But..." His tone turns wary.

"...It's not something anyone else needs to hear."

Particularly not those who care for Shi Wudu—because it's...

"What?"

"During the trial..." He Xuan's eyes trail down his throat, to the bandages peeking out from beneath his collar.

Remorseful.

“…You sounded so certain about things that…you just couldn’t know. And that made me think…”

Shi Wudu’s shoulders are stiff, his eyes remaining on the water.

“Think what?”

He isn’t looking—so he doesn’t see the look in Blackwater’s eyes.

“…The Kiln doesn’t normally work that way, you know.” He mutters. “The way it did for us, I mean.”

Shi Wudu doesn’t react—and he certainly doesn’t seem shocked.

He Xuan can see that he isn’t surprised.

“…It showed you something,” he doesn’t ask. He says it firmly.

“Right before the end.”

When He Xuan asked if things could have been different, and Shi Wudu tried to say they would never know .

And minutes after he saw that —

He took his own life.

So easily. Without any hesitation or deliberation.

And Shi Wudu isn’t denying that was the case.

“…And you want to know?” He whispers, and He Sheng…

Is surprised by how hollow he looks.

“…Was it that bad?”

Shi Wudu shakes his head. “No. It's just…”

“Just what?”

“…It showed me what our lives would have been like, if I never switched your fate with Shi Qingxuan’s,” he mutters.

He Xuan guessed, and now that he knows…

A hungry curiosity crops up inside him, squeezing in his chest.

"…What was it like?"

"…You married Qin Meirong," Shi Wudu explains, struggling with his own remorse, what He Xuan deserves to know, and what no one should. "You passed your exams, but…you came back to Fu Gu, and you built a shipyard there."

What became, in that life, the largest port on earth.

In this one, it's still little more than a small fishing village.

"…Did we have children?" He Xuan's voice is quiet—tight, remembering something else Shi Wudu said, but—

"…No," he whispers. "There was another wave of plague, and she…"

That seems to jar him.

Whenever He Xuan considered countless different what ifs—

The hypothetical image of what his life could have been was always perfect. Free from suffering. Like Shi Qingxuan's was, in his stead.

But fate doesn't work that way.

"…You ascended ten years later."

"As a civil god?"

Shi Wudu's lips quirk, and he shakes his head.

"As the Water Master."

He waits, feeling the confusion passing over He Xuan's face, counting the dates in his head.

"…But you would have already—?"

"I wouldn't have been an elemental master."

In retrospect—it makes sense to him.

Shi Wudu met He Xuan just after his ascension, and proceeded to change his fate immediately.

When Jun Wu appointed him as Water Master, Shi Wudu had already destroyed that future.

"…Then what kind of god were you?"

"…" Shi Wudu's eyes turn upwards, and when He Xuan's gaze follows—

He sees the moon shining down on them, clear and bright as ever.

"…Oh," he whispers, his fingers tightening in the grass. "That…makes sense."

Shi Wudu doesn't ask him what he means.

"…What about Shi Qingxuan?"

"I still appointed him as my deputy," Shi Wudu's hands are tight around his own knees, fingernails digging in. "But…He wasn't able to leave the Heavens. At all."

Every time he did—the Reverend of Empty Words would appear.

"…Did we know each other?"

Shi Wudu's silences have never lasted quite this long.

"Did we—?"

"We did," he answers, his tone clipped. "You were mourning your wife. I was…struggling with Shi Qingxuan's situation. We became close."

"…Close?"

"…We were friends."

He Xuan grows silent again, listening to that, trying to understand how it could have been so horrible, that it would have pushed Shi Wudu so far, just from seeing it.

"…And how long was Shi Qingxuan—?"

"A hundred years," Shi Wudu wraps his arms around himself.

One hundred years, trapped in the Heavens. A gift for some, but a free spirit like him…

It was torture.

“I didn’t know until later—but Jun Wu…” Shi Wudu swallows down a lump in his throat. “Was hoping I would give in, eventually.”

He had no intention of allowing Shi Qingxuan to ascend, even if Shi Wudu’s brother did possess the ability to do so.

He suppressed him. Sabotaged his cultivation. Undermined him at every turn.

“And he—he was in so much pain, He Sheng, and I couldn’t fix it , I—”

But by that point, he couldn’t bring himself to switch his fate with He Xuan’s.

Because by then, he knew He Xuan.

They were friends .

“…Then I don’t understand—?”

Then, so much of Shi Wudu’s guilt becomes so much easier to understand.

“ You fixed it.”

He Xuan grows still, his eyes wide, struggling to take that in.

“…I…tried…to do something to myself, and you stopped me,” Shi Wudu recalls, his voice thick. “And you—you got me to tell you everything, and once you knew…”

Even now, tears slip down Shi Wudu’s cheeks.

“You switched your fate with his.”

He Xuan didn’t even hesitate, didn’t show an ounce of fear.

Because he has always, in every future, been a good man.

One who always tried to fix it.

And in that future…he did.

“…What happened to me after that?”

“…Jun Wu got rid of you,” Shi Wudu mutters, his voice bitter from memories of a life he never actually lived, but—

It feels like he did.

“Or, well…he tried to.”

“Tried?”

His lips quirk tiredly.

“…He may have cast you from the Heavens, but you fell straight into the Kiln.”

Maybe not the exact same path as the one he walked before, but…

“…It’s hard to imagine myself doing that for something besides revenge,” He Xuan mutters.

He’s never been the ambitious type.

“…You were trying to get back,” Shi Wudu’s breaths have grown calm and slow, almost meditative. “You left family behind.”

…Just as he has family now.

He Xuan’s brow furrows, thinking. “So…I still would have had children?”

“…Yes,” Shi Wudu agrees, his tone softening, filling with sincerity. “And while there were circumstances beyond your control…you did everything you could for them.”

“But they were happy?” He Xuan presses, thinking of his unborn son.

“…Yes,” Shi Wudu nods.

And his son will be. He has absolutely no doubt of that.

“And you were more than their mother could have asked for.”

Which does explain his sudden lack of animosity towards He Xuan’s relationship with Shi Qingxuan, after…

…Because he had seen …

In a way, it almost sets him at ease, thinking about how, if he had the choice—he still would have chosen her.

That their lives always would have been intertwined.

For so much of his life, he's resented his lack of choice.

It doesn't make the hurt go away, knowing that he still would have ended up here. But it brings some measure of peace.

And yet—he can also see how much anguish it must bring Shi Wudu, and he loathes it.

Knowing that his suffering was unnecessary.

And that seems like more punishment than any lashing. Any death. Any banishment.

Being broken and violated in so many ways, and knowing it could have been—

"What about you?"

Shi Wudu doesn't look up from the water, his reflection pierced by dozens of small specks of light.

"…Jun Wu and I were never…involved in the same way," he mutters. "You spared me from that."

He never had anything to blackmail Shi Wudu with.

"…And you were happy?"

The thunder master bites his tongue.

"…I…my life was never going to be easy," he cautions.

There was no changing the childhood he lived through. The losses and pain he experienced, shaping him into someone he almost didn't recognize.

And spending a century watching Shi Qingxuan suffering…

"I felt so guilty for telling you, and so relieved for Qingxuan…" He swallows thickly, shaking his head. "…But Pei Ming helped me."

Shi Wudu suspects that, if he could see the entire range of possibilities —every scenario and outcome, Pei Ming always does.

As lovers, friends, or anything in between.

And he'll never deserve it.

"…And you were happy?" He Xuan repeats.

"…We all were," Shi Wudu shrugs, remorse settling around him like a weight.

Blackwater sighs heavily, his lips twisting into a frown.

"I really have forgiven you, you know."

"I do."

"…I'm going to be happy."

He Xuan never imagined himself here.

Reassuring him like this.

"I have a family again. And…" he glances at Shi Wudu from the corner of his eye. "It makes it less confusing, knowing I was always meant to be your friend."

Shi Wudu wraps his arms around himself.

"It does?"

"…I always knew taking you to the Kiln would make it possible for me to forgive you," he explains.

It's impossible to hate someone you know so deeply .

"But I never expected it to be so hard not to like you."

After so many years of living to hate him—it caused friction.

"…How successful have you been?"

"Not at all," He Xuan says softly, watching the same reflection in the pond. "But I've always had a soft spot for family."

Shi Wudu knows.

"…And are you going to be happy?"

Shi Wudu's lips purse, caught between emotions.

"…There were moments…Back then, when I really thought I never would be," he admits. "When I didn't want to get better. I still have them, sometimes."

But Pei Ming—he makes him want to try so badly , no matter how much it hurts.

"The things he did to me…" Shi Wudu's hand drifts up to his throat, remembering the shackle that was once placed there. "I still feel it. Almost like some sort of phantom limb."

The healing lashes on his back hurt less.

"Are you ever going to tell him?"

His breath catches, and his hand tightens.

"…I don't know," he mutters. "Some days I want to. Others I wish I could pretend it never happened. That must sound unhealthy—"

"Who cares?" He Xuan shrugs. "Treading water is treading water. As long as you make it back to shore."

…And Shi Wudu thinks he will.

Watching the Crown Prince of Xianle in these last few weeks—he's almost certain of it.

Pain isn't something you outgrow—but it doesn't grow with you.

Someday, he'll have enough time and distance.

Someday, the memories won't feel so instant and harsh.

This will pass.

"…I'll be happy," he finally says—almost like a promise.

Like he's assuring him , too.

"In so many ways, I already am."

The rest—the rest is just water to tread through.

"…Then that brings me to my final reason for coming to see you."

Shi Wudu looks up, only for He Xuan to set something in his lap.

"From what I understand, everyone else in the family gives you gifts today."

Shi Qingxuan and Pei always have. Small trinkets and mementos that he hoards with a characteristic greed.

"You don't have to."

"I know," He Xuan agrees. "But I did worm my way into this family right under your nose. I suppose a gesture of respect here and there couldn't hurt."

He hasn't asked for permission for anything with regards to Shi Qingxuan, for example—and Shi Wudu doubts he ever will.

But he almost prefers that, now.

Such choices always should have been hers—and unlike him—He Sheng has always believed that she could make them.

Shi Wudu's fingers pick apart the simple white cloth, wrapping the gift—and when he sees it…

"…I can't accept this," he whispers.

It's a small hair comb. Far less elegant than any he's ever owned—hewn from wood, painted black, waves carved into the handle.

It belonged to He Zhong.

"…I know you took those lashes for her," He Xuan says. "I wouldn't give this to someone who didn't love her as much as I do."

Shi Wudu does .

Remembering her is almost what hurts the most.

"And she would have loved you," He Xuan concludes, having no way of knowing how true that is. "Keep it."

"I can't—"

"According to the trial—you're at my disposal," he drawls. "So, you can consider it an order."

Oh, and his orders so far have been so cruel and tyrannical .

Forcing Shi Wudu to play Xiangqi with him at least once a day. To pour tea, if he’s feeling truly diabolical.

And now, he’s forcing him to accept gifts.

A harsh punishment indeed.

“You really are…”

“Incredible?”

Shi Wudu was going to say that he’s either insane, or a Saint—but now, he’s laughing.

“Are you ever going to let me live that down?”

“You asked not to be shown mercy, why should I?”

They stay like that for a few hours more.

Talking, counting offerings.

Reminiscing, laughing.

And slowly, with every passing moment, Shi Wudu feels an ache somewhere inside become less profound.

Acceptance.

From now on—he doesn’t think he’ll spend the longest night of the year alone.

He returns to his palace before sunrise—gently waking Pei Ming, pulling him back to their bed.

Still too injured to do much, but that doesn’t stop the emperor from holding him close, kissing every inch of skin that practicality allows.

The days keep changing from one to the next, like dominos falling in a gentle cascade.

Xie Lian makes new tally marks on a wall, pressing his palm against it every morning—holding a ring to his lips.

Shi Qingxuan's body changes--and the more it does, the more they whine and gripe about missing their old body, how He Xuan should be prepared not to see their breasts for years , as soon as they give birth —

(Only for them to collapse, remembering they'll have to nurse.)

The halls and streets of Ghost City begin to come to life, one by one—a new king roaming among them.

But he never takes the Gambler's Throne—only guards it, waiting for its true owner to return.

Days turn into weeks, winter slowly beginning to thaw—and the world slowly begins to settle into a new pace.

In the mortal realm, cultivation clans become more concentrated—worshiping fewer, more powerful gods, with larger names beginning to move to the forefront.

The Jiangs of Yunmeng, the Nies of Qinghe, the Lans of Gusu—

(Well, there's only one Lan at the moment, despite Lan An's cultivation partner constantly needling him to change that.)

Jin Feng starts his own sect in Lanling, cultivating under the Thunder Master.

Now, word has it that Wen Sicong's only surviving son, Wen Mao, has been taken in by a cultivation sect in Qishan—out in the far west.

Still young, but showing great promise—and with a rather unique idea beginning to form in his mind.

Having seen his father and grandfather both fail in their own ways to form lasting legacies—

He begins to think that cultivating in schools is a mistake. That one man can only achieve so much in a lifetime of cultivation, with so few destined to ascend as gods.

But, if sects begin to prioritize bloodlines—even if a man doesn't become a god—he leaves a lasting mark upon this world, and the people in it.

And now, while he's still so young—people have no idea just how true that belief will prove to be.

As the snows begin to melt, life begins to slowly return as it was—

And in the far south, a female ghost is found—hiding in the wilds with a savage fetal spirit.

Less violent incidents than before—but no one could argue that it's under control, either.

Cuo Cuo snarls and hisses, clutched tightly against his mother's chest as she hangs her head.

No longer welcome in Ghost City—left to wander, getting by as best as she can, but—

"…Is that what this is?" She mutters, backing away from the two martial gods before her.

"…You're here to take him?"

"He's our son," Feng Xin averted his eyes from her before, keeping his gaze cast downward with shame.

He doesn't now.

As a matter of fact—his tone is remarkably cold, considering his normal deference toward women.

"You don't get to decide whether or not I have a part in this."

Mu Qing must have told him.

She can see it in the anger behind his eyes. The disgust in his voice.

Feng Xin never gets that bothered on his own behalf—

Only if you hurt something he loves.

"…What, so he's going to live with you in the Heavens?" She mutters, trying to scoff, but—

There's an audible tinge of fear in her voice.

Fear of losing her child.

Fear of being alone again.

“…Yeah,” Mu Qing mutters under his breath. “I see it.”

Feng Xin has a type.

Presuming that they’ll be rejected—making the worst assumptions, and lashing out because of it.

It isn’t particularly flattering, but he can see it.

“You—”

“You’re both a mess. This should only be about what’s best for him. That’s all that should matter.”

“…And you think his father dragging him around out of some misplaced sense of honor is what’s best?!” Jian Lan glares. “I saw how my kind was treated in the Heavens! He’ll be called a monster—”

“That was Jun Wu,” Feng Xin shakes his head.

“We have a ghost king for a Water Master now. Things are changing—and he is my son.”

Feng Xin is among one of the most respected martial gods living. If he claims the child—he’ll be treated well.

“And what if he attacks one of the—?”

Normally, especially in a situation like this, Mu Qing would respect a mother’s boundaries.

But after what she did to him , well—

He’s not particularly concerned about being polite.

As such, he promptly snatches the spirit from Jian Lan’s arms.

“HEY—!”

Cuo Cuo doesn’t seem that thrilled about being snatched either—snarling, sinking his fangs into Mu Qing’s forearm—

And the martial god barely even winces, not pulling his head back, allowing the fetal spirit to latch on.

"I told you, this is about what's best for him."

After a few moments, Cuo Cuo's form begins to shift, shrinking down to the shape of a normal infant once more.

One with soft, dark hair—and his father's eyes.

Lifting his shrinking fangs from Mu Qing's arm, cooing curiously.

"What, so you're going to carry him around for all eternity—?"

Jian Lan falls silent, her eyes widening with shock when…

Mu Qing hands her son back to her without a word.

And this time—

Cuo Cuo doesn't change back.

Squirming slightly in her arms, grasping at her hair.

"I always told you I was looking for a more permanent solution," he mutters, crossing his arms.

He said, but he was so angry, and he—he made it seem like she didn't deserve —

"H- How?" S he whispers, pushing her fingers through her son's curls, lips trembling with emotion.

"…Spiritual power dissipates fairly rapidly in a child's system. They aren't strong enough to handle it," Mu Qing shrugs. "Blood is different."

And his blood was recently changed by the process of surviving Qi Deviation.

That's not normally how it works—but people don't normally Qi Deviate in the way Mu Qing did, either.

He had death qi injected directly into his bloodstream. The same type of energy that has Cuo Cuo trapped in this state.

Surviving it meant purifying Mu Qing's soul and body, including his blood.

Those purifying properties are still there.

It isn’t permanent—Cuo Cuo is going to need infusions going forward, but If he can grow the way other ghost children, like Ren Song have…

Eventually, he won’t need them anymore.

“…And I never said that it wasn’t best for him to have his mother in his life,” Mu Qing mutters, pressing his palm against the bite mark, healing it in an instant. “Regardless of what you’ve done to me in the past.”

It isn’t about him.

"...You're...not going to—?"

"Ren Song has extended another offer of sanctuary to you within Ghost City," Feng Xin interrupts her flatly. "He'll split his time between my palace, and your residence there."

The exact ratio can be discussed later—but for now, it's a solution.

Admittedly, given the fact that she set Paradise Manor on fire the last time she was there—Ren Song wasn't eager to break Hua Cheng's revocation of her permission to enter the city.

Xie Lian had to ask on Feng Xin's behalf, and Feng Xin has to pay her rent.

Indefinitely .

“You can go and try to mend fences now, because last I heard—they’re all pretty pissed at you over there.”

Jian Lan grimaces at the reminder of her brief foray into arson. Not to mention the fact that she had already offended Autumn Twilight when she met the Crown Prince…

She's interrupted from her train of thought when Feng Xin reaches out, pulling Cuo Cuo from her arms.

It's the first time he's ever gotten to hold him--not without the boy trying to bite his arm off, anyway—and...

He's surprisingly light.

Irritated, too—whining and reaching for his mother. Then, when he's standing too far away, Mu Qing.

"You'll get used to me," he mutters, listening to the beginnings of a boiling tantrum before he looks back at Jian Lan.

"Since you got a pretty big head start—I'm taking my time with him first."

Jian Lan forces her mouth shut, wrapping her arms around herself as she watches him go.

It's better than what she thought she was going to get, if they ever decided to come for him.

That doesn’t make it any easier to listen to her son’s confused, angry cries as his father carries him away.

But Mu Qing stays where he is, his arms crossed.

Defensively, almost. Like even a martial god like him feels as though he needs to be on guard around her.

“…I would have thought you said everything you needed to last time,” she mutters. “When you threatened to—”

“Disperse you? It was tempting,” he replies coldly.

Jian Lan falls silent, her jaw locked.

“But I was never actually going to.”

She snorts, like she clearly doesn’t believe him, but—

“Because your father was a good person,” he mutters, his arms tightening around his ribs until it aches. “He saved my life.”

Mu Qing had been prepared for his head to land on the executioner’s block next.

Jian Lan’s father had no obligation to him. His life might have been easier if he had allowed that to happen—but he didn’t.

Mu Qing’s life was destroyed by men who abused their power. But it was also remade by those who chose to use it with kindness.

“I know my father would be proud of me,” he concludes, the grass crunching beneath him as he shifts his weight. “Something tells me you can’t say the same.”

Her expression twists with a reactive kind of pain—burdened with shame.

“Is that your way of calling me a cheap whore? Because I’ve already heard it all—”

“You know what happened to me. Do you really believe I would think that?”

She falls silent again, lips trembling as she’s forced to bite her tongue.

"...But I don't think my father would have been proud of the things I did when I was nineteen," Mu Qing admits. "I don't think he would have been proud of most of the things I did for a long time after that, either."

Because Mu Qing was in so much pain back then, and he...

He said and did so many things that he's ashamed of now. And he didn't know how to admit that he was wrong, because clinging on to that projection of pride...was all that he had left.

If he admitted it, he would have nothing. He would be nothing.

"...But I got lucky," he mutters. "Because I had people that weren't willing to let me go."

No matter how awful he was, or if he deserved to be alone.

He's lucky—and she—

She wasn't.

Mu Qing doesn't forgive her—but he also found room in his heart to pity her.

"...Are you trying to gloat—?" She grouses, and Mu Qing finds Feng Xin's 'type' less and less flattering by the second, but—

He can still see it.

"If I can get my shit together, so can you." He interrupts her flatly.

Because Jian Lan isn't a monster.

She's self-centered, stubborn, and judgmental. She speaks without thinking. Her fears and temper control her.

But she cares for Feng Xin. She didn't want to shame him before, admitting who Cuo Cuo's father was to the court.

And she loves her son.

Blindly, maybe—but she does.

"...You could be someone that your son can be proud of," Mu Qing concludes. "Because he's always going to need you."

Mu Qing would know.

He does think, with time, Jian Lan could get there—however much he might resent her now.

And this isn't about him.

This is about what's best for Cuo Cuo, and—

For the love of—they really need to give him an actual name, now.

Mu Qing's words aren't exactly glowing encouragement—but as much of an olive branch as he's willing to give.

Which is more than he'll do for most.

Then, they take him back.

He’s confused at first, holding the front of his father’s robes as he’s carried through the doors of his palace.

But when the child sees a familiar face following behind, fussing, telling Feng Xin how to properly hold him—

He’s home.

Spring begins to settle in—flowers begin to bloom, animals crawling out from their burrows, shivering off memories of the cold.

Firecrackers shoot off in temples across the continent, praises and celebrations offered as the emperor kneels with his dearest friend.

Two families are joined, and when Shi Qingxuan watches her gege cross cups of wine with his husband, hardly able to contain his smile—

She's always loved having a big brother.

She supposes she could stand having one more.

"I can't believe you."

"Hmm?"

He Xuan is kicked back beside her, an entire lamb shank in his hand—most of the meat long gone, leaving him to gnaw on the bone.

"That kiss was far too long—I thought you were going to leap over the table."

"Gege would have murdered me—but it was pretty shameless…"

Shi Qingxuan sighs, then shrugs—looking away—and He Xuan raises an eyebrow.

"…Are you crying?"

"Hahahaha—what?! N-ahaha, no! T-that would…haha…be so…hahaha…" She dabs at her face with her sleeve, struggling not to smear her makeup—

And He Xuan softens.

Reaching over to wipe a few away with his thumb—and he's never been particularly affectionate, especially not in public—

But he presses a kiss against the side of her head.

"Crybaby."

She knows.

But she also knows he's always loved her for it.

And even then, with two families joined—they don't stop growing.

When winter came, Shi Qingxuan thought her brother was gone. That she could never look at the man she loved the way she did before.

That she would never see her son.

But by the end of Spring, her brother is holding her hand—soothing her as she pleads that she can't do it, that it hurts, that she's scared—

And the man she loves is on her other side, dutifully allowing her to punch his arm as hard as she can when the pain is too much.

He Bai is born in the early hours of the morning—with his father's hair, and his mother's eyes.

His grandmother's, too.

He Xuan is quiet. Sitting beside them later, when all of the others have gone.

Shi Qingxuan barely has the energy to ask—But she does.

"What…what is it?"

He hasn't been able to take his eyes off of either one of them this entire time—sitting on the edge of the bed, watching his son sleep against Shi Qingxuan's chest.

"Nothing, he just…" His eyes slide up to meet hers. "I didn't expect him to be born past midnight."

It's an odd thing to say—but Shi Qingxuan pays that no mind, her head sagging against the pillow.

"He took his time, that's for damn sure…"

And she hopes he enjoys being an only child—because she is never doing this again—

But that isn't what He Xuan means.

This entire time—he assumed Shi Qingxuan had forgiven them for the child's sake. That they would work together to support him, but…

It would never be as it was before.

But then, he came today. Early in the morning—

Born under a star of solitude.

Shi Qingxuan leans into it when he reaches for her face, pushing her hair back, fingertips brushing across her cheek.

Love surprises you, sometimes.

It can come from the most surprising places—even when you think it's gone.

All you have to do is allow yourself to see it. To feel it.

It'll find you.

And when He Xuan lays down beside her, hand resting against his son's back, feeling the rise and fall of his breaths—

It finds him again.

It's rare enough for a goddess to have a child—an occasion that draws celebrations across the new Heavenly Capital—and even rarer for a Ghost King. Albeit, not the most popular calamity—

But a feast is held in Ghost City, nonetheless.

The Crown Prince of Xianle is among the first to visit, bringing a trunk filled to the brim with clothes, worrying about whether or not the size is right, explaining he'll grow into it if not—

And Shi Qingxuan has never hugged anyone so tightly.

Her brother holds him every chance he gets—sometimes letting his nephew sleep in his lap during games of xiangqi with his father, fingers stroking through his hair.

His gaze is bittersweet, but less so with every passing day.

The Grandmaster

Chapter Summary

> The rest of Xie Lian’s time is spent roaming.
>
> Nights spent in Ghost City, watching as Ren Song wrangles patrons in the Gambler’s Den. Sleeping in Hua Cheng’s bed, crimson robes pulled around him.
>
> It’s been too long now, it should have faded—but they still smell like him.
>
> And, just because the world has changed with Jun Wu gone, doesn’t necessarily mean it’s gotten quiet.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

As they creep closer to summer, the days growing longer and warmer, farmers begin to return to their fields—sowing rows of crops as far as the eye can see.

In Puqi Village, it's always been one of the busiest times of the year.

"...Make sure you help your sister carry the basket! It's too big for her to do by herself!" A mother calls down the street.

Her son groans, heaving a basket of water chestnuts up in his arms rather than having his little sister help him at all.

"I've got it!"

"And make sure you burn some incense in the Crown Prince of Xianle's shrine before you take that to your grandparents!"

"I know..."

"What was that?"

"I mean yes ma'am!" He calls back to her, holding back a groan as he walks down the dirt road leading past the fields.

"Ge, I can help!" His younger sister whines, reaching for a corner of the basket—only for him to grumble, pulling it out of her reach.

"Forget about it, you'll just make me drop everything again."

"I won't, I won't!"

"You ALWAYS do!" He snaps. "Then I have to pick it all up!"

"Don't be mean!"

"I'm NOT! I just—"

"You just wanna go play with those older boys from up the hill—and it's not fair! I never get to go!"

"It's not my fault they don't wanna play with a girl—”

"And it's not my fault that I'M A GIRL!" She pleads.

"It doesn't matter!" He shakes his head, walking down the road a little faster. "None of them have been around all day anyways, so I don't know why you're—!"

They come around the bend in the road, and he falls silent—tilting his head to the side.

"...Huh?" He mutters.

Puqi has a small, countryside shrine—but it's grown popular in recent months, with the Crown Prince of Xianle's surge in worshippers.

And, according to the stories—he lived in Puqi Village for months as a blind priest.

But he hasn't been back since the last emperor fell.

There's always a line of worshippers—sometimes big, sometimes small—crowding outside the temple, waiting to leave offerings or burn incense.

But today, it seems like every child in the village has crowded around the shrine steps.

"Me! Me! Do me next, gege?"

He has to strain on the tips of his toes, nearly dropping the basket on his own—

And there’s a teenager on the steps of Puqi shrine.

No more than sixteen or seventeen, his hair pulled up in a wide ribbon—a single white flower tucked behind his ear.

Wearing white robes, with a red layer beneath them.

“…Who…?” He mutters under his breath, only for one of the boys standing nearby to overhear him.

“He’s a disciple cultivating under the prince of Xianle—he’s friends with Xiao-Hua!”

The reminder of the teenager makes him perk up a little—he hasn’t been back in months —

And people are beginning to wonder if he’ll ever return.

The newcomer has a line of children in front of him, plucking flowers from a basket, weaving them into their hair.

“What brings you all the way out here?” One of the village girls asks, sitting beside him as she waits for her turn.

“Oh?” He looks up, glancing back over his shoulder. “The Crown Prince has tapestries in all of his temples—my Shizun had me deliver one here.”

That sends a few children rushing inside to see—staring at the new piece curiously.

The divine statue of the crown prince has always been there—as beautiful as ever—

But this tapestry almost seems meant to pair with it.

Made from silk threads of crimson, silver, and gold—so vivid, it looks more like a painting.

Showing a young man with dark hair and crimson robes, walking down the mountainside—

An umbrella in hand.

“…That’s not the crown prince…” one of the children points out, confused.

“No,” the young cultivator agrees, finishing one child’s hair, only for another to rush forward for her turn. “Its Crimson Rain Sought Flower.”

That draws rounds of gasps, more children hurrying over, sitting close to listen.

“The ghost king?!”

“The very one.”

“…Can ghosts be worshiped in temples?”

“This one can,” the teenager smiles, plucking a lily from the basket, weaving it with other blooms into a crown. “In fact, if you really want good luck—you have to worship them together.”

“Really?” The girl before him breathes.

He hums in agreement. “I can tell you why, but it’s a very long story.”

Several more children sit down—some adults, too, having come to see the commotion.

“We’ll listen!”

Xie Lian’s eyes hold an aching warmth.

It’s been so long since anyone listened to him talk.

"Long ago, in the Central Plain—there was a kingdom known as Xianle," he explains, tucking lily stems into the little girl's hair. "And within that kingdom, there were four great treasures. Rare beauties, vibrant music and literature, gold and fine gems, and—”

"The Crown Prince!" Several of the children crow dutifully—having heard these lines from Xiao Hua many times during his stay in Puqi Shrine.

The smile that crosses his lips is fond, if not somewhat tainted with longing.

"Everyone always said that, yes—but there was another treasure, far greater than him. But no one else could see it."

"Like a secret weapon?" One of the boys sits forward. "Was it the sword he used to slay the demon of Yi Nian Bridge?!"

"No, no..." The teenager shakes his head.

All of the wait with bated breath, and—

"It was an orphan."

"...Huh?!"

"An orphan who grew up on the streets of Xianle," he murmurs. "He came to see the prince during a festival—but fell from the city walls, right into his arms."

"...What was so special about him?" The sun comes out from behind the clouds, shining down upon the shrine—soft and golden. "Did he have special powers?"

"Not back then," Xie Lian admits.

"Did people love him?"

"Actually—they called him a monster."

"How come?!"

"He was born under a Star of Solitude," Xie Lian recalls Mei Nianqing's words—said so casually back then—and how they devastated Hong'er, sobbing in his arms. "And with one red eye."

That makes several of the children shrink away, unsure.

"...So... he was cursed?"

"No," the teenager shakes his head emphatically. "He was blessed. And his eye..."

He smiles faintly, remembering the glimpse he was shown of Wu Ming before his form began to fade.

"It was beautiful."

"...Then why did people treat him badly? How is that a blessing?"

"People are often frightened of things that are different from they are," he finishes again, one of the younger boys hurrying over, sitting down for his turn. "That doesn't make them monsters—or cursed."

"...But people were cruel to him?"

"Yes, but..."

Xie Lian pulls out another set of flowers, rolling a petal between his fingers. "That's what made him so special. You see—when people were cruel to him...it only made him stronger. But if someone was kind to him..."

He lowers his voice, making the crowd of children lean closer—as though he's telling some great secret.

"He would turn it into a miracle."

"Miracles?" One of the girls sits up straighter, her voice slightly awed. "Really?"

Xie Lian hums, nodding. "He fell from the city walls—but right into the prince's arms, remember? That isn't bad luck at all."

That makes some of the children pause, realizing...

That is good luck, even if it didn't sound that way at first.

"Later, he was dragged behind a carriage by a cruel noble, breaking half of the bones in his body—and he survived," Xie Lian recalls. "And even after that, when the prince saved him again—he was so strong, he wouldn't let him go."

Even back then, when he was so small—his arms, bleeding and broken, held onto Xie Lian so fiercely. Feng Xin could barely pry him away to hand him to the doctors.

The children seem startled, but they remember—

Suffering made this boy stronger.

"He was so strong—he was one of the youngest soldiers in the army of Xianle," Xie Lian pulls his hand back for a moment, touching the chain hanging around his neck—remembering.

His Hong'er was a soldier.

"So strong, so brave—he saved the Prince from an ambush."

Xie Lian can barely remember that night—he was so disoriented and lost—

But he remembers Hong'er, watching over him until it was safe to return.

"And when the Crown Prince lost his Kingdom, his believers, and was banished from the Heavens...the boy stayed with him."

His hand reaches down, patting the porch beneath him.

"When the Crown Prince was hiding in this very shrine, powerless and blind—the boy left food on his doorstep every night. Found a blanket to keep him warm. He prayed to him every single day."

"...Why would he pray to a god that couldn't answer?" One of the children asks—and Xie Lian's smile becomes so...

"That wasn't why he prayed," he says quietly. "They lived here, side by side—and the boy grew into a man. Brave and handsome."

"...But if he was always there, why has nobody ever heard of him before?"

"He had a different name back then," Xie Lian returns to braiding flowers into the little boy's hair. "And one day, when the prince was sleeping..."

His fingers almost tremble.

"A monster came."

More villagers have come, more than thirty of them sitting around the shrine now, listening raptly

“…It wanted to find the prince,” Xie Lian takes a deep breath. “To hurt him. But the boy went out to fight it—in the dark. Alone.”

“…That’s really brave…” A girl whispers, standing next to an older boy, holding a basket of water chestnuts.

“Did he win?”

“Not then—but he didn’t make a sound,” Xie Lian murmurs. “No matter how much it hurt—because he didn’t want the monster to find his prince.”

Part of Xie Lian will always wish that he had. Will always wonder how much of his life has been lost to dreams that he can’t even remember.

“…He…died?” One of the children asks slowly, many of them shaking their heads. “How is that a treasure?”

“Gege—This story is so sad!”

"I know it sounds that way," Xie Lian agrees, "But dead doesn't mean gone. Even if you can't see or feel them anymore. Even if it feels like you're alone. He didn't leave this world."

"...How?!"

"Because he still had someone precious to him," the teenager murmurs.

"And his prince kept his ashes safe--so, he was able to come back as a Ghost Fire."

"Did he find the prince again?"

"Yes, but Prince Xie Lian didn't know it was him," several children look at each other in confusion, because in all of the stories, ghost fires can talk .

"...Why didn't he just tell him?"

"Because,"

Fairy tales are fickle things. Harsh on the monsters and heroes that fill their pages. Nothing is as it seems, and so much lurks between the pages.

"When the monster killed the young man—it took his name."

But they also grip you.

And Xie Lian has always adored them, ever since he was a child.

He can see that adoration, that rapt fascination in their eyes too.

Telling the story of a ghost fire, following a god, exiled and blind, to the ends of the earth.

How, after so many days of watching him suffer—the monster game for him again.

The children were passive at first, hearing about the great treasure of Xianle, the one that no one knew—an orphan boy.

But now, hearing about the black armored ghost, Wu Ming, their eyes are alight.

Fighting for his prince, embodying all of the lost souls of a fallen kingdom--and saving the exiled god from himself.

Part of Xie Lian wants to confess what he almost did.

To unburden himself from the guilt.

But his San Lang wouldn't want that.

He's vague about Wu Ming's demise—and even still, several of the adults looking on have tears in their eyes.

"...But he came back!" The boy sitting in front of Xie Lian cries. "He tried so hard!

"He did," Xie Lian agrees. "But—"

"And Prince Xie Lian took those shackles for him? It's so unfair!"

"It's not always about what's fair," Xie Lian points out. "But this has never been a sad story."

"How?!"

The young man smiles.

"Because Wu Ming never left this world."

The boy from before has long since set down his basket of water chestnuts, standing towards the edge of the crowd awkwardly, rubbing his arm.

"...The way you tell the story, they sound like they were in love with each other," he mutters, freezing up when the cultivator replies;

"They always have been."

Admittedly, Hong'er fell in love with him first—Xie Lian didn't even begin to realize the depth of what he felt. Not until he lost him.

But he's held onto that love tightly ever since.

"...But..." the boy swallows hard. "You...said they were both..."

In so many ways, Xie Lian looks back on himself—and he sees a stranger.

The teenager he used to be could barely say these words to Hong'er—much less a crowd of his worshippers.

But not anymore.

"Loving someone is the most beautiful thing a person can do," he murmurs.

"Man or woman—it doesn't make a difference."

"...The Crown Prince of Xianle believes that?"

It's not that such relationships are unheard of now, not the way they were when Xie Lian was a teenager.

After all, the Heavenly Emperor's consort is a man —but Pei Ming was never known for his piety before. A hedonistic figure—with his worshippers never holding him to...

Strict standards of what would be appropriate in his personal life.

(It also doesn't hurt that several regions worship the patron of the moon is a woman, rather than a man.)

But Xie Lian can't help but think about how much less he might have hated himself when he was young—if he knew even gods might feel the way he did.

"...He does," Xie Lian agrees. "That's his teaching."

And if his new worshippers won't follow him for loving Hua Cheng—then that's fine.

Xie Lian doesn't need devotion that comes with such conditions. If you have to lie about who you are to be loved...

It isn't love at all.

All Xie Lian needs is one person's love, one person's acceptance, and he can carry on through anything.

He has that.

And he can't help but notice...more than one of the sets of eyes in the crowd has a new light in them.

Cautious hope.

"...What happened to Wu Ming?" One of the girls presses, sliding up another step to sit closer to Xie Lian. "You said he didn't leave—but where did he go?"

The young cultivator smiles—and he continues the story.

Braiding crowns of flowers for all of the children who ask.

Somehow, the basket never seems to grow empty.

He tells them how Wu Ming rose through the trials of Mount Tonglu—watching as they gasp and cry out in shock, learning that little boy who fell from the walls of Xianle...

Grew into the Great Calamity, Crimson Rain Sought Flower.

How the Crown Prince and the Ghost King wandered the world for eight hundred years, loving each other every single day.

That even when they found each other again—Hua Cheng still couldn't tell his love who he was. His true name.

But even still—he found his way back to Xie Lian's side. Even if he had to wear a new face and bear a new name. Even if it was thankless, and his suffering went unknown.

He never minded.

He tells them how Hua Cheng freed the Gods from the Heavens.

How he broke Xie Lian's chains.

And this time, when he explains Hua Cheng's recent departure—the children don't seem heartbroken anymore.

Not the way they were the first time.

“But he's coming back, right?” One of them asks.

Xie Lian looks down at the red sting on his finger.

“…He always comes back.”

But now—if you want to worship the crown prince, you must pray in equal measure to the ghost king.

His love and greatest treasure.

Xie Lian has temples and shrines rising across the continent—and every single one of them has a tapestry.

He's told this story over and over again

"…Are they married?" One of the children asks—and Xie Lian nearly loses his footing, clutching the basket of flowers to his chest.

"I'm sorry?"

"If they've loved each other all this time—how come they aren't married yet?"

The teenager pauses, a blush spreading across his face

"I…don't think they had time to discuss those details before he had to leave again…"

"But you know so many other details, gege!" One of the girls complains. "How do you not know that?"

"I'll—ah—have to check with my fellow disciples and get back to you!"

The young cultivator, later introducing himself as Bolin, appears in Puqi Village often throughout the late spring and following summer. Helping farmers in the field, maintaining Puqi Shrine—

(Shooing a curly haired teenager with bars of gold away from his offering box.)

The rest of Xie Lian's time is spent roaming.

Nights spent in Ghost City, watching as Ren Song wrangles patrons in the Gambler's Den. Sleeping in Hua Cheng's bed, crimson robes pulled around him.

It's been too long now, it should have faded—but they still smell like him.

And, just because the world has changed with Jun Wu gone, doesn't necessarily mean it's gotten quiet.

An earthquake rattles the continent in the peak of summer—ancient beasts, long kept in silence by Jun Wu's authority, come to walk among men once more.

Thunder rolls across the region of Qishan, the sun shrouded with darkness as mortals and gods alike clash against a beast that crawled from the ruins of what was once Wuyong.

A tortoise the size of a palace—with the head and speed of a viper.

A Xuanwu of Slaughter.

The Gods have entered a new period—one where mortal cultivators are gradually being given more power—

But this is far beyond them.

They prayed with little expectation of being answered—the region of Qishan has always been poor, and gods are rarely dispatched.

This time—the Martial God of the West, Qi Ying, descends immediately.

Facing the beast with a mighty fervor—but even with the help of local sects, the creature is beyond his ability to suppress on his own.

Nan Yang is sent next—but even his arrows cannot pierce its shell.

Which is how they've found themselves here.

With two martial gods struggling to keep the beast occupied as mortals flee east.

The Water and Thunder Masters working in tandem—golden chains holding it in place as the river is redirected, swirling around him—lighting striking.

The electricity surges through the water, making it flail with agony—

But it still won't die .

"This isn't working," Shi Wudu mutters, wiping the sweat from his brow. "I'm calling—"

"Your husband is busy with that beast in the north, remember?" He Xuan grouses.

"I swear—killing that bastard was like flipping over a rock in the mud. Every cockroach you can imagine comes crawling out…"

"I'd prefer to deal with the roaches," Shi Wudu replies under his breath—and the water master has no response to that.

“It’s fine!” Feng Xin lands beside them, wiping the blood from his cheek with the back of his hand. “You don’t need to call him—reinforcements are here.”

He Xuan doesn’t have to ask what he means—

Not when a golden petal lands on his sleeve.

The beast turns its head, still slashing around viciously, trying to catch anything it can between it’s jaws—

CLANG!

Only to be met with a clash of silver, sending even a beast of such massive stature sprawling backwards, crashing onto the water.

The scimitar lashes backwards, spinning through the air until it returns to its current master.

Xie Lian turns his head to the side, pressing a kiss just above the pommel—making the eye inlaid there swivel and spin with excitement.

“Thank you, E’Ming.”

The blade hasn’t left his side once in the last few months—and it’s become surprisingly protective in its master’s absence.

Once, it tried to cut Lang Qianqiu’s hand off for pulling a leaf out of Xie Lian’s hair.

His own blade gleams in his left hand.

“Have you made any progress with it?”

“Besides irritating it and slowing it down?” He Xuan rasps, still clutching at the wraith chains being used to hold it in place. “Not particularly.”

Xie Lian watches the creature right itself, thinking.

The shell itself likely isn't penetrable with anything that they have available. Not unless Xie Lian were to unleash blasts of pure spiritual power—and that would place the surrounding area at risk.

The neck is the best point of attack—far more exposed.

But it's quick—quick enough to evade Feng Xin's arrows, leaving them to bounce off of the impenetrable surface of its shell.

Decapitation seems like the only option—but with a neck so thick ...

It'll be slow and bloody.

"...Your highness!" Feng Xin gasps, reaching out to grab Xie Lian's shoulder and pull him out of harm’s way when the Xuanwu's head whips around, surging towards him with deadly speed—

Only to watch Xie Lian stop it with the palm of his hand.

It's startling, sometimes—remembering that he isn't shackled anymore.

The creature seems so vast compared to him—and yet he seems to hold it at bay with little effort, its body thrashing around—but its head held in place.

"...He's kind of a monster, isn't he?"

Shi Wudu mutters the words under his breath—startled by the raw strength the prince displays at times...

And Blackwater doesn't disagree—he just doesn't dare say so.

"Should I hit it again?" Quan Yizhen sits upright, his hair sticking up in every direction.

"No," Feng Xin sends him an irritated look. "Wait for his highness to tell us the plan."

Speaking of.

He looks toward Xie Lian, "What is the pl—?"

He stops when he sees the look on Xie Lian's face. "...Dianxia?"

"He Sheng?!"

Feng Xin whips his head around to look behind them--only to find Blackwater having sunken to his knees, one hand clutched over his chest.

Shi Wudu kneels beside him, holding his shoulders, looking up at the others.

"What's going on—?"

"Resentment," Blackwater rasps, wrapping his hand around Shi Wudu's wrist to steady himself, his eyes burning bright—

Not so dissimilar from how they looked in the Kiln.

"That thing...Isn't...It has..." He grits his teeth, nostrils flaring.

If that's the case--it makes sense that it would be affecting him, as a calamity he would be more sensitive, but...

"Your highness," Feng Xin shakes his shoulder. "What are you—?"

"Be quiet ."

The sound of Xie Lian's voice startles all of them—low and harsh.

Even Quan Yizhen's eyes grow noticeably wide, but...

Xie Lian isn't even looking at the Xuanwu of the Slaughter.

His eyes are averted—and Feng Xin can't recognize the look inside of them.

How cold and numb they look, staring at...

Ostensibly, nothing.

Just rubble from the battle—limp bodies of cultivators who lost their lives fighting the beast in the last few days, strewn across the field.

Xie Lian isn't looking at them.

But he is looking at something , his eyes are so focused—

Xie Lian doesn't know whether to laugh or cry.

Because logically, he knows that what he's seeing isn't real.

The white robed figure with long mourning sleeves, standing upon the battlefield. Wearing an ever-familiar mask.

Half smiling. Half crying.

Xie Lian still sees him, sometimes.

Even when he knows that Jun Wu's soul is gone from this world. Sometimes, out of the corner of his eye--he sees that mask.

Pei Ming says it happens, sometimes. He says that he sees things, too.

Fallen enemies. Lost friends.

But not like this.

"...Your highness," Feng Xin repeats—this time far more quietly. "We have to do something—”

"You think I don't—?" Xie Lian starts to ask, his voice frigid , but—

The image of Bai Wuxiang begins to waver, a noose forming around his neck.

"Stop it," he whispers, shaking his head.

This isn't like what Pei Ming said.

"...Dianxia, nobody is doing anything.”

This isn't like a waking nightmare, it's too sharp, too vicious, it—

The small pouch on Xie Lian's belt has never felt so heavy, field with metal shards.

"You still feel them, don't you?" Bai Wuxiang's voice echoes in his ears —

For Xie Lian to hear, and him alone.

"Every single cut. It still feels like the blade is inside of you, doesn't it?"

Xie Lian watches as he's dragged upwards—contently hanging from invisible gallows.

"A piece might have broken off, back then. Do you think your body just healed around it? That maybe, somewhere between your ribs, a piece of me is still there?"

Xie Lian yanks his hand back with a strangled sound, and when he begins to turn his sword on himself—Feng Xin grabs him by the arm, shaking him hard.

"What the hell are you doing?!"

"I have to get it out," Xie Lian mutters, face pale, eyes out of focus. "Have to get it out—”

He yanks his wrist back, his sword clattering to the ground as the others are forced to leap into action, blocking the Xuanwu when it tries to attack again—

And Xie Lian falls down on all fours, gasping.

This weight...this agony ...what—?

Then, everything goes dark.

Xie Lian is left breathing raggedly, unable to stand up—hearing Blackwater's voice, a hand on his shoulder, but everything is fading...fading...

Cold. And heavy. And dark .

"What the hell is happening to him?!" Feng Xin snaps, watching as He Xuan tries to shake him out of it.

"That creature—I don't know how the hell it's doing it, but it amplifies resentment," He Xuan mutters. "His highness is alive—he's not meant to ingest that—"

And carrying the shards of Fangxin and the Godslayer while coming into contact with the Xuanwu...

It triggered something.

"...Can't you just suck it out of him or something?!"

"Excuse me?!"

"I don't know! You're a ghost!"

They shout back and forth in a panicked daze—

But Xie Lian can't hear them anymore.

Can't see them anymore.

He only hears one thing:

A flute.

Shrill, haunting notes drifting across his senses.

He sees three lotus blossoms grow.

One burns. The other wilts. The last blows away in the wind.

He hears the throaty, screaming caws of ravens. Feels their wings as they rush past him in a cloud, swirling into the night.

Xie Lian lifts his head, following them with his eyes.

He sees a sun that casts no light. Watches as an arrow pierces it, and black rain begins to fall—

Then, the cloud of ravens devours it—pecking away until nothing remains.

‘Traitor…’

Whispers echo all around him, drifting in between the flute’s haunting sound.

‘Blasphemer…’

The cold is so sharp—it steals his breath.

‘Murderer…’

And for a moment—Xie Lian thinks they’re talking about him .

‘Everyone admired you once.’

Xie Lian opens his mouth, ready to beg for it to stop —but then he hears it.

Laughter.

Cold, brimming with bitterness.

That’s when he sees him.

Standing alone in the darkness, hair loose across his back—wearing robes of red and black.

Clutching a dark amulet between blood stained fingers.

The young man looks back over his shoulder—revealing a wickedly handsome face, lips pulled back into a lopsided smirk.

Eyes burning an unnatural shade of red.

“…Your admiration is a bit too cheap, isn’t it?”

But there's another voice, softer than all of the others.

Roughened with emotions that are constantly pushed far beneath the surface. Still waters that run so, so deep.

"Come back with me."

But there's longing within those words—and pain.

So much pain.

Xie Lian cannot tell if the man before him is in danger, or the danger.

If he's a devil, or an untamed hero.

But before he can see much more—the ravens from overhead swoop back down, surrounding the youth in a cloud, and when they clear...

Nothing remains.

The god watches, his breaths slow and labored, as the sun rises again—this time moving backwards across the horizon. Over and over again—until it stops, hanging in the center of the sky.

Shrouded again in shadow—but not shot with arrows, or devoured by ravens.

It's an eclipse.

Followed by the shrill cries of a newborn child.

"Help?"

The prince turns around—this time following the call of a little boy—

And he sees one, sitting alone in the snow. So small , heartbreakingly thin.

Wearing little more than rags—and when he looks up, Xie Lian...

Somehow, he knows it's the young man from before.

His lips turning blue from the cold, holding himself as he shivers—looking up at Xie Lian hopelessly.

"...Help me?" He whispers.

And Xie Lian wants to, he does—

But when he reaches out—the child disappears.

In his place, Xie Lian sees a set of dark scales.

Swinging back and forth wildly—and each time they shift, the ground quakes and rumbles.

"...Breach from within..."

"...Chord assassination?"

He hears the familiar roar of the Xuanwu of the Slaughter—and all he can do is clutch his head, curling downwards.

Struggling to think, struggling to breathe, it's so—

"It's okay."

Xie Lian can barely lift his head—and when he does, that boy is standing before him again.

Holding the pouch Xie Lian knows should still be hanging from his belt—

And his hands seem so small, to be holding it.

The prince groans, panicking as he reaches out--but the child shakes his head...and he smiles.

Like the bigger and brighter his expression is, it might hide the loneliness in his eyes.

It might be one of the most heartbreaking smiles Xie Lian has ever seen.

"It's okay," he repeats, turning to walk away from him.

Talking a narrow, lonely path into the darkness.

Xie Lian gasps, his chest heaving—

And he sees the sky above him.

Feels hands shaking his shoulders. Hears the roar of the beast.

"...Where did you go just now?" Blackwater's voice is close, suspicious—

And Xie Lian's heart aches.

He sits up, pressing the heel of his palm against his forehead—feeling E'Ming rattling against his side, pressed close with worry.

"Gege, come back."

He mutters the words under his breath—barely gives them sound.

The words his San Lang would say.

"...You—?"

Xie Lian rises to his feet—his eyes no longer out of focus—instead, they're sharply narrowed, and his expression has turned grim.

"I need someone to open its mouth for me."

"...It's mouth?" Blackwater mutters, Feng Xin and Quan Yizhen occupied fighting the creature.

"How the hell are we supposed to—?"

"Just do what I did to you that one time," Shi Wudu cuts him off, summoning a new wall of storm clouds.

The Calamity scowls.

"What? Haven't learned it yet?"

"I haven't even had a year—!"

"Do it. Now."

Xie Lian is rarely ever forceful—and he's certainly never deemed to give He Xuan orders before, but the moment he does...

Without even thinking, the Ghost King complies, attempting to control the cursed blood within the Xuanwu's body, slowly forcing its jaws open.

Xie Lian surges upwards, riding his blade high into the sky, E'Ming whipping around him—and when he reaches eye level with the beast —

He Xuan watches with shock as he snatches the sack from his belt, hurling it down the creature's throat.

The Xuanwu of the Slaughter howls , its neck whipping around wildly, eyes burning with hatred—

But before it can close its jaws around anyone else, the crown prince comes surging back to earth, plunging E'Ming deep into the ground.

Forming a rift in the earth itself.

A deep, winding cavern forming beneath the hills of Qishan—large enough for the Xuanwu to go plunging within, its roars fading as the earth swallows it whole.

Xie Lian sinks to his knees as the ground closes once more, sweat forming at his brow, breathing hard.

Feng Xin rushes back to his side, dropping down beside him. "...Did you just—?!"

Seal the shards of Fangxin and the God Slayer inside of the beast?

He certainly did.

"...It took care of both problems," Xie Lian mutters faintly, swaying slightly, his friend holding him steady.

The Xuanwu's soul is sealed within the pit--it'll never escape.

Hopefully, over enough time alone in the darkness, it will fade. And if it doesn't...

Xie Lian can't imagine a mortal cultivator strong enough to extract the shards from the creature's belly.

“…Did you hear what you said?” He Xuan asks, watching as the others move to deal with the aftermath.

“What?” Xie Lian clears his throat, stroking E’Ming as the blade settles in his lap.

“…When you passed out…”

The prince’s eyes grow round.

“…I said something?”

Oh, he did.

And the words—heard by four different gods—could have been kept a secret.

If not for Quan Yizhen’s tendency to share his battles with worshippers in their dreams.

They will repeat it, whispers flooding across the cultivation world—a prophecy that will fade into legend.

Of a child, born during a total eclipse.

One who would not only defy death twice, but become its master.

A boy who would save the world or destroy it.

No middle ground.

Centuries will pass—and the memories of this day will fade, leaving it old, guarded knowledge.

But those who do remember will alter the shape of their own destinies—some permanently.

Walking a narrow, single plank bridge into the dark.

Chapter End Notes

> set up for a potential mdzs sequel? in my tgcf fic? it's more likely than you may think

Home

Chapter Summary

> Summer ends, the leaves turning with Autumn.
>
> Xie Lian can't help but love this time of year the most.
>
> Can't help but see crimson leaves, and think of him. Smelling campfires in the air, and wishing he was here.
>
> See children playing with lanterns, and ache for him.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

By the longest day of the year—the Summer Solstice—the great beasts awakened by the changing of the Heavenly Dynasty have been put to rest.

A festival is held for the new god of the sun—and he doesn't even attend, seeming content to remain in bed from dawn till dusk.

But not alone.

The Crown Prince of Xianle returns to Mount Taicang once more—clearing centuries of underbrush and overgrowth.

Huangji Temple isn't so easily restored—he works slowly, methodically—and He Xuan is kind enough to offer assistance on architectural matters.

Well—he says that, but it isn't actually kind.

As the calamity flatly tells him one afternoon—he owes Hua Cheng money: and quite a bit of it.

Assisting Xie Lian when the chance arises is just a proactive means of attempting to chip away at that debt.

Xie Lian finds himself unable to mind.

When you've lived as long as he has—almost anything can become a habit.

That makes it even harder to break them.

He still doesn't eat every single day—but sometimes, even if he isn't hungry…

He'll sit down and make himself a meal.

When help is offered, he tries to think a little harder before he turns it down.

He tries not to smile when he doesn't mean it.

Stops himself from falling on his own sword.

Because there's one thing more precious to his San Lang than anything else…

And Xie Lian promised that he wouldn't treat him so carelessly.

He still isn't perfect.

There are stretches of days where he doesn't eat a bite. When he'll lay on his side, staring at the growing number of tally marks on the wall, and not move until the sun sets.

But not every day is so bad.

Some days, Ren Song and Banyue spend the entire day—helping him move stones, or clear out abandoned rooms.

They sleep beside him, and the void aches a little less.

Sometimes, Feng Xin and Mu Qing are there too.

Mu Qing will fuss and complain until Xie Lian takes a bath, combing his wet hair after, just as he did when they were children.

Feng Xin will shout for his son to play nice when he bites Guzi's hand, the mortal child trying to say through the tears that it doesn't hurt so bad.

It's been eight hundred years since he had so much company—and the days have never passed so slowly.

But still, they pass.

He visits the Heavens. Sits on council meetings—spends afternoons with Shi Qingxuan, making flower petals dance over her son’s crib, summoning sweet dreams

He walks with Shuo from Ghost City, red lantern in hand, as countless souls of lost children pass from one life to the next.

Never afraid. Never alone.

By the end of summer, he’s made the cottage on Mount Taicang comfortable—but he saves the temple.

He thinks Hua Cheng would want to do that with him.

Bolin returns to Puqi Village, helping farmers with their harvests—sweeping the shrine steps.

And one day, walking back from the fields, he hears a sound.

Children laughing—but unkindly.

A pair of boys standing at the top of a grassy hill, throwing pebbles—

And low, pitiful whimpering.

Thud!

The children whip around—only to find a familiar face, arms crossed, eyes stern, his basket set down beside him.

"What's this?"

"...N-Nothing, gege!"

Both of them hide their hands behind their backs, looking appropriately ashamed. "We—we were just on our way home now!"

They scramble, practically tripping over one another to rush away, and when Xie Lian walks towards the edge of the hill...

There's a small, pitiful mass of dark fur—whining as it tries to drag itself back into the bushes.

His eyes widen for a moment—then he's rushing down after it, skidding on the grass.

It seems terrified at first, growling and shrinking away, but—

"Don't be scared."

Mu Qing is a bit exasperated, being summoned from the Heavens to help a puppy with a broken leg, but...

It's hard to tell Xie Lian no, when he gets that look on his face.

A local stray, abandoned by its mother—tormented by local children for only having one eye.

"I can't do anything about that part," Mu Qing mutters, examining the scar tissue around the socket. "It must be some kind of birth defect..."

"That's fine," Xie Lian murmurs, rubbing his hand against the creature's side. "As long as he isn't in pain anymore."

He had no intention of keeping it—not at first.

But Mu Qing is stern, asking him what he expects—leaving food and water outside of the shrine all the time. Of course it keeps on coming back.

Tail wagging with cautious hope whenever it sees Xie Lian's face.

But one night, when Xie Lian allows it to come in and take shelter from the rain...

He feels it crawl onto the bamboo mat behind him, its side pressed against his back.

The same way the hounds they kept in the palace did, when he was small.

The same way Hong'er did, later.

It's funny, sometimes—how cruel life can seem.

And all of the things it ends up giving back to you.

Xie Lian doesn't sleep alone again.

"...Hong Li?" Feng Xin mutters, holding the pup in front of him, watching its scruffy, panting face.

Xie Lian hums from behind his loom.

"Because he's strong."

Growing every single day. Becoming less and less uncertain about whether or not he gets to stay.

There's something healing, about watching something come to trust you. To earn that faith, step by step.

He sleeps by Xie Lian's feet during council meetings. Trots by his side on the trek to ghost city, excitedly yipping, leaping up to try and catch sparrow ghosts between his jaws.

The children of Puqi learn to scratch him behind the ears each time they come to pray.

Sometimes Ruoye has to keep him in line, giving him gentle swats when he tries to start barking at the Ox that Xie Lian got to pull his cart on Mount Taicang—

But just as often, Xie Lian will find the two resting together under a warm patch of sun.

Summer ends, the leaves turning with Autumn.

Xie Lian can't help but love this time of year the most.

Can't help but see crimson leaves, and think of him. Smelling campfires in the air, and wishing he was here.

See children playing with lanterns, and ache for him.

And with the seasons changes, old traditions rear their heads—or in some cases, are made new.

Cities across the continent toast to the new emperor, feasting, preparing their blessing lanterns along the streets and hills.

And in the newly built capital—it’s full of life.

Firecrackers going off—acrobats and dancers performing in the streets.

Gods of the upper and middle courts laughing and dining together.

No swords are passed to test chastity—and no plays are shown as a form of teasing.

Instead, they toast to one another.

Celebrating their achievements in the last year—cheering in gratitude for the heroes of the battle of the Heavens.

Glasses of wine are passed—but when the drums stop, the god it lands upon throws a shower of merits, blessing one worshiper in the mortal realm.

Among the mortal realm, however—plays are still performed.

Showing the burning of the Heavens. The Windmaster's Battle in Gusu. The Thunder Master ascending from Lanling, marrying the newly crowned emperor. A birth of a new calamity, Autumn Twilight.

But among all of these, the most popular play in the mortal realm is a love story.

One that seems to end so many times, but always begins again.

Of a prince and an orphan.

A lost soul, and a fallen soldier.

A king of the dead, and a god in chains.

Crimson rain and the flower that he seeks—no less lovely for being bloodied or downtrodden.

Still deserving of shelter from the rain.

The new emperor still hasn't joined his subjects—rare, for a man known for being social and jovial.

Rather, he watches the festivities below from the balcony of his palace, elbows leaned against the railing.

Arms wrap around his waist from behind.

"Well," his consort sighs, kissing his shoulder blade. "You certainly have a leg up in the battle of the lanterns this year."

Pei Ming's lips curve into a faint smile, watching as heavenly officials below begin to gather and wait for the count to begin.

He turns around, leaning back against the railing as he gathers his husband up in one arm, cupping his face in his hand, his thumb stroking over his cheek. "The emperor is disqualified from the contest, remember?"

“Ah,” Shi Wudu leans his cheek into his palm. “Silly me.”

Besides—even if Pei Ming was participating—he would have stiff competition.

And Shi Wudu already seems to have the man in question in mind.

“He isn’t coming, is he?”

Pei Ming glances back down at the festival below.

“I don’t expect him to, no.”

And after everything he’s been through—Pei Ming really can’t blame him for wanting to be alone.

“He has the freedom to make that choice now.”

The mention of that makes Shi Wudu’s face fall—and Pei’s thumb pressed against the corner of his frown.

“What is it?”

It takes the thunder master a moment to meet his eyes—and when he does, his own gaze is remorseful.

“I know you never wanted to be doing this,” he mutters. “You should be doing whatever you like, with the people you love.”

If Shi Wudu hadn’t made his own mistakes—he could have carried the burden for him. It isn’t fair. Pei has done so much, sacrificed so much —

The emperor leans down—kissing him until the thoughts spinning around in Shi Wudu’s head begin to slow.

"I get to spend the rest of my days with the people I love," he reminds him gently. "And for that, I will always consider myself a lucky man."

Not to mention the fact that Shi Wudu is helping, and Xie Lian promised him a long retirement. Eventually.

Until then, this is enough.

Now, Shi Wudu takes Pei Ming's face between his hands, raising his eyebrows--trying not to be so easily distracted by his embrace.

"Then what's been on your mind?"

The warmth of Pei Ming's smile doesn't quite meet his eyes.

"...I know who will succeed me. The throne of the Heavens has never been determined by blood right," he explains slowly. "But what does a man have a legacy for, if not..."

Shi Wudu wishes he didn't understand the pain in his eyes.

If not for your children.

The Thunder Master's expression falters, his eyes filling with hesitation.

"Are you...saying you want—?"

"...Someday, maybe," Pei Ming admits. It would be a lie to say that he never imagined having children together, but... "But that's not what I mean."

"Then I don't...?"

He doesn't now, but he will.

When Pei Ming tells him of what he lost before he ever even knew he had it.

A sorrow that he's carried alone for too long—but not anymore.

Now, there's someone to listen as he confesses what has always been his greatest regret.

His failure.

Now, he has someone to hold him through it. To be with him, in that pain.

And once he does—he doesn't feel so alone anymore.

In his husband's arms, lights floating overhead, and this year...

General Pei Ming doesn't bother to count how many lanterns there are.

Across the valley, a young man climbs the hill in quiet solitude.

Content, listening to the gentle wooden creaks of the wheels on his ox cart, Hong Li sleeping in the back after a long day running up and down the mountain.

Ren Song came earlier, explaining that he was accompanying Lang Qianqiu to the festival. He brushed it off with some long-winded explanation about wanting to show good will from the ghost realm—and Xie Lian didn't argue.

He asked the prince to come, but...

Xie Lian can't seem to bring himself to celebrate.

He knows he should. He knows it's ungrateful, after everything he's survived, after how many worshippers he's gained in the last year, not to be thankful.

And he is , but he...

He doesn't want to fake a smile tonight.

Maybe tomorrow, or when he goes to visit Shi Qingxuan again. Maybe he'll manage it when Feng Xin and Mu Qing come to see him next.

But for now, he just wants to return home, and place another tally mark on the wall.

Sleep away another night without him.

His grief is fully grown now. It’s come up with him. Beside him. It’s as much a part of him as all of the good, all of the bad.

The price of loving a man who has fallen on the sword for you a thousand times, and would do so another thousand times over again.

But dead doesn’t mean gone.

There is no pain in this life that does not one day begin to ease.

And one day, if you hold on long enough—you’ll look up at the world, and you’ll see the beauty in it again.

When Xie Lian looks up now, he sees lanterns, drifting from all around.

Trickling in towards the Heavens from temples and shrines across the world, the names of different gods etched across every single one.

Above all of them, a red star shines in the sky. One that's been beaming down for weeks now.

A comet, according to Ling Wen.

The very same one that shone over Xianle, when Xie Lian was a little boy.

Back then, everyone assumed it was the light of a dying star. An omen of bad luck—but this makes more sense, if you ask Xie Lian.

Comets always come back.

Then, something else catches Xie Lian's eye.

What almost seems like another sunrise, even though it just set behind the hills less than an hour before.

A slow explosion of light, and when Xie Lian follows it.

He sees as many lanterns as stars in the sky.

Rising from the peak of Mount Taicang, even though Xie Lian knows no one should be up there, it's been empty all day, but...

Clink!

The prince's fingers slip free of the lead to his ox, his eyes growing wide--hearing that familiar sound, even from down here.

Clink!

Xie Lian has spent almost the entirety of his life wandering through the dark.

Has stumbled over more bridges than any mortal could cross. Nearly drowned in every corner of the sea.

He's spent nearly three hundred thousand days saying good morning to a memory.

And now, after so many years looking for one another in vein—

It only takes the span of a few moments to find each other again.

Xie Lian scrambling up the hillside, his feet barely touching the ground, the lights from above reflected in his eyes.

There was a time when the entire world chanted his name. When he held more jewels than a man could touch in his lifetime.

And none of that could compare to the euphoria he feels, reaching the peak--and seeing crimson robes, shifting in the breeze.

Releasing one last lantern into the air, head tilted back as it floats away from him, his face cast in a golden glow.

And when he turns to look at him—

The tears won't stop falling down Xie Lian's cheeks.

He's been waiting.

He waited so long.

His name doesn't come out the first time, not on the first try. Only a choked sob as he takes the last three steps, leaping into his arms.

But the second—it's loud and clear.

"San Lang!"

His love stumbles backwards slightly, his arms solid as they wrap around his waist, holding him close.

Strong, familiar, real .

Xie Lian's face presses into his neck, breathing him in. A man who once lost the ability to cry—now weeping in his arms.

From pure happiness.

Hua Cheng manages a weak laugh, holding Xie Lian closer as his face presses into his god's hair.

He's always had a penchant for leaving the man he loves in tears. Now, he does the same when he returns.

Xie Lian's feet are dangling far from the ground—and he doesn't care.

He could never touch the ground again, and that would be fine by him.

As long as he gets to stay here.

"...You came back," he whispers, his voice trembling with emotion—not that he ever doubted him—he always comes back, but—

He's here .

Hua Cheng closes his eye, taking a moment to compose himself before he answers--and even still, his voice is thick with emotion when he replies—

"I'm home, gege."

Xie Lian's eyes burn with emotion.

Home .

And he's never smiled like this before.

"...Welcome back, Hong'er."

He's dreamed of saying it so many times. In so many ways. Across so many years, kingdoms, and seasons.

And now that he can —he'll never let go again.

"...Stay, this time?" He asks, his voice small, struggling to find the audacity to hope—

And his love holds him closer.

"...Heaven could fall, the ghost realm could turn to ash—this world could end and be reborn anew, and I would never leave you again," he whispers into Xie Lian's ear, holding the words deep in his heart.

An oath to never leave his side again...

And he never did.

For those who would like to catch up on twitter, you can continue from here !

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not repost or reuse.

@_lakitsune
"How long?"
"Always..."

@_lakitsune

CREDIT: LAKITSUNE

CREDIT: LEAFSHEEP

@musinglotus

CREDIT: CASS

[image]

CREDIT: ROWAN

Chapter End Notes

> this officially brings us to the end of the canon tgcf timeline! This story is not over, I have post canon content and an epilogue, but we're entering the final stretch!
>
> I will also be going on vacation (I get on my flight in the next couple of hours), so I won't be updating on Ao3 until I get back. That pushes the next update to at least Sunday, probably Monday. I will still be updating on twitter at @cataclysmicevie if you want to keep up on there in the meantime!

Anything You Want

Chapter Summary

> There’s so much Xie Lian wants to say—so much he needs to tell him, but he can’t seem to bring himself to.
>
> He can’t even lift his face from Hua Cheng’s neck—or loosen his arms around him in the slightest.
>
> And Hua Cheng makes no complaints.

Chapter Notes

> hey, so sorry for the long break in updates! I got home from vacation, ended up testing positive for COVID, and have been struggling to shake that for the last week or so. I was finally feeling well enough to edit and post this today, but I didn't get much work done during my time off--so updates are going to be a little slower while I write the end of the story! thank you for your patience!
>
> CONTENT WARNING: This chapter contains a NSFW scene

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Xie Lian isn’t sure if his feet actually touched the ground once, going from the peak of the mountain to the cottage at the base.

They must have, he doesn’t think Hua Cheng carried him the entire way—

Or maybe he did, because Xie Lian’s arms are still wrapped around him.

It’s almost difficult to believe, after everything that’s happened—

They’ve still barely had any time alone together, not since Xie Lian realized who he was in Mount Tonglu.

There was a stolen moment in the Heavens—a final walk before they faced Jun Wu…

And that was all.

There’s so much Xie Lian wants to say—so much he needs to tell him, but he can't seem to bring himself to.

He can't even lift his face from Hua Cheng's neck—or loosen his arms around him in the slightest.

And Hua Cheng makes no complaints.

There's a brief moment of hesitation when they step inside, clearly silently evaluating where to set the prince down—but when Xie Lian shows no sign of loosening his grip…

Hua Cheng takes a seat beside the kitchen table, with his god carefully placed across his lap.

His arms are still holding most of Xie Lian's weight, keeping him tight against his chest—

And the prince wouldn't have it any other way.

"…Does anyone else know that you're…?" Xie Lian's voice is raw—hardly coherent after so much crying, but Hua Cheng understands.

"No," he assures him—and Xie Lian isn't surprised, even if he knows there are people who would want to know that he's back… "Was gege planning on attending the festival? I can—"

"No," Xie Lin shakes his head vehemently. The idea almost sounds insane now.

That he could want to go anywhere, to see or speak to anyone else.

For now, he almost wishes they were the only ones in the entire world—and they may as well be.

"I…don't want to see anyone else right now," he admits quietly.

He knows that must sound so selfish. He isn't the only person who missed Hua Cheng in his absence. And he's had duties left unattended, but—

When he shifts his head to the side, peeking up at Hua Cheng's expression through his lashes…

He looks blissful .

"…Was it hard?" Xie Lian's hands press flat against his shoulders—finally able to relax from being balled up in his robes. "Were you in any pain? Or…do you not remember—?”

“It wasn’t painful at all,” Hua Cheng shakes his head. “But I knew I was keeping gege waiting…”

He pauses, his gaze slipping down to Xie Lian’s throat.

Bare. Not shrouded by Ruoye, or a cursed shackle.

A sight he didn’t have the chance to appreciate, in their last moments together.

His eye turns upwards—words the curve of his jaw, his cheek, and…

Xie Lian can’t help but shiver when Hua Cheng’s fingertips brush against his earlobe—finding an earring there.

A red pearl.

“…You haven’t worn this since the day we met,” he murmurs, watching it reflect in the lantern light.

When two pearls were still a set, and they were strangers to one another.

Before a child refused to let him go—and when he was forced to, he took something with him.

Xie Lian would never begrudge him for taking it.

Shameless, but everything he has is San Lang’s to take.

Xie Lian’s fingers are slightly more hesitant, sliding down to tangle in his hair, rolling the Pearl braided into the strands between his fingers.

“I knew you had the other. Wearing it made me feel…”

Closer to him.

Even his ashes weren't enough.

Nothing is, when he’s gone.

Hua Cheng leans forward on instinct more than thought, pressing a kiss to the hollow behind his ear.

They both grow still, each for very different reasons.

Xie Lian's eyes are round, a blush slowly building across his cheeks…

And Hua Cheng is contrite.

"…Apologies dianxia," he pulls back.

They've kissed one another many times now—mostly under false pretenses, but also without.

He didn't seem so contrite when he was healing Xie Lian's arm on the way to Qi Rong's lair. Or when he was collecting a gambling debt.

Or when he was teaching Xie Lian about certain positions.

Against a tree .

"…What for?" He mutters, clearing his throat.

Hua Cheng leans a little further back, to what must seem like a respectful distance.

"I forgot myself—it will not happen again."

There's nothing he could do to Xie Lian that he wouldn't want.

But the prince doesn't have the confidence to say that.

Not yet, anyway.

Instead, he opts for lifting his head—craning his neck slightly as he presses their mouths together.

They've kissed desperately, shyly, through tears of joy and grief. But never like this.

Never with the un-rushed, bone deep affection Xie Lian feels in a small, contented sigh against his mouth, lips parting.

The weight of Hua Cheng's hand against the small of his back.

Why would this have anything to do with Hua Cheng forgetting himself?

Who else would Xie Lian want this with, if not him?

But there's a restrained edge to every touch the ghost king offers him.

Gentle. Careful. Always so thoughtful—as Xie Lian has come to expect.

It was hard to adjust to at first—how treasured Hua Cheng makes him feel after being abandoned for so long.

But now—he stretches into his touch, like a flower towards the sun.

Twisting in Hua Cheng's arms until they're facing one another properly.

Before his legs were thrown across Hua Cheng's, but now he's sitting in his lap fully—fingers interlocking at the nape of his neck, breaths shallow and unsteady.

Hua Cheng's hands are rigid, stubbornly remaining on the same point at the middle of his back.

If Xie Lian notices, or it bothers him—he doesn't say so.

He leans back, lips flushed in a way that makes Hua Cheng sharply avert his gaze—

But Xie Lian can't take his eyes off of him.

Hands sliding up from his neck to press against his cheeks. Thumbs sliding over his jaw.

They've been in a similar position before—when Hong'er was a teenager in Puqi Shrine, allowing his god to see his face with his hands.

That was hard enough then—and Xie Lian wasn't in his lap , lips slightly swollen, staring at him with eyes filled with so much wonder, he doesn't understand it—

"Handsome," he whispers.

Xie Lian is shy about so many other things—but that isn't one of them.

Not when he remembers what Hua Cheng said back then.

'I'm not like you.'

'I'm not beautiful.'

Liar.

Just looking at him makes Xie Lian ache in a way he's never felt before. Like someone has reached inside his chest, squeezing his heart with an invisible force.

"…You don't have to say those things to me," Hua Cheng's voice is low—

And it still makes Xie Lian's eyes grow wide with confusion.

"I'm sorry?"

"I was impudent before, trying to trick dianxia into saying it—"

The prince pauses, his lips parted.

"When did you do that?"

Hua Cheng won't look at him, and—

Xie Lian supposes, in retrospect, posing as Lang Ying in an attempt to fish for compliments from him was a bit mischievous.

But even before he knew who Hua Cheng actually was—he found it endearing.

"…Do you think I'm lying?" Xie Lian's head tilts to the side—and when Hua Cheng replies, his voice is strained.

"No."

He knows Xie Lian wouldn't lie to him. Logically—of course he knows that.

"…Then I don't understand," the prince frowns. "…Did I…upset you?"

He was just as overjoyed as Xie Lian was before—then suddenly became so still, clearly stressed by something—

"No," Hua Cheng shakes his head. "You could never—"

"…But you're upset, San Lang."

The Ghost King falls silent, his mouth twisting with discomfort...and when he finally does answer, it leaves Xie Lian even more confused than he was before.

"I've never had any expectations, your highness." He murmurs.

"All I ever need is to be close to you. I..." His lips press into a tight line, struggling to admit it, but—

"When we met again, I took liberties that I shouldn't have. I don't want you to assume based on my past actions that...that you have any obligation to—"

"...Obligation?" Xie Lian's voice grows smaller, his eyebrows knitting together. "San Lang...I've told you how I..."

He's kissed him, said 'I love you,' multiple times—was it...unclear?

Hua Cheng's lips press against his forehead softly.

"The fact that this lowly one has a place in your heart is the greatest treasure I could ever ask for," he promises.

This lowly one.

"But you should never push yourself beyond your own comfort just to please me."

Oh.

It's slowly beginning to dawn on him.

Xie Lian is more than aware of the way that people have perceived him for the last eight centuries. Particularly those that once knew him well.

There were rumors about what he almost did, but...

The Prince of Xianle never expressed a desire for any of that.

And there are people who never do. Xie Lian has met plenty over the years. Who are completely content to live in chastity. Some of them are even repulsed by the idea of breaking it. And for a long time...

Xie Lian thought that might have been how he felt.

"...Can I..." Xie Lian's voice is slightly strained when he finally speaks, his forehead still resting against Hua Cheng's chin. "...I need...to...talk about something, but...I'm not sure I'll say it correctly."

He isn't confident in his vocabulary around the subject.

"...There's nothing you can't say to me," Hua Cheng's fingers tangle in his hair gently, pushing it back over his shoulder—and Xie Lian releases a shaky sigh.

"Do you...remember that day, before..." He closes his eyes. "When...Bai Wuxiang wore Feng Xin's face?"

The mere mention of it is enough to make Hua Cheng go completely still in his arms. He doesn't have to answer at that point, he clearly does remember, but—

"...I do, dianxia."

It's become fairly obvious to Xie Lian since then that Hua Cheng...interpreted that event very differently.

"That...was..." Xie Lian takes another deep breath, fighting back the shame , knowing it isn't something that Hua Cheng would love him less for, but...

That doesn't make it any easier to say.

"I didn't want to do that," Xie Lian explains finally, his voice small. "When he kissed me—I don't know why, but—it hurt me."

Because he thought his only friend left in the world remained for one thing: his beauty.

It was his first time being kissed, and it was also the first time he could think of, other than the day he found Hong'er's body, that he had ever felt so alone.

"...But I also couldn't think of another way...to make sure that he wouldn't leave me by myself."

It feels so shameful to admit. Xie Lian didn't have anything back then. No wealth, power, or protection to give.

If he hadn't realized it was Bai Wuxiang sooner ...

"And later, when I asked Wu Ming to..." He swallows hard. "...I wanted to feel like he hadn't...actually taken anything from me."

And Xie Lian almost asked for too much because of that. Things he wasn't ready for. Things he didn't actually want.

He doubts Wu Ming would have been ready for it either.

"...So, I know...what you're worried about, when you're asking me not to push myself, or do things out of obligation..." Xie Lian explains carefully.

Because he has done that before.

"...But that's...never been how I've felt with you."

That finally gives Hua Cheng pause.

"I don't...think you're going to leave if I don't want the same things that you do," Xie Lian assures him quietly.

After how much they've been through to remain by each other's sides—he has no doubt.

Hua Cheng wouldn't leave him again. Not for anything.

"…If I kiss you, it's because I…want…" He bites his lip, and he can practically feel Hua Cheng preparing to make some kind, understanding speech about how he might want more than Xie Lian does, and that's okay—

And Xie Lian changed forms in that coffin for a reason .

If Hua Cheng could remember what happened between them in the forge after Mount Tonglu reopened, he would know.

But this is all so painfully new, and it's already hard enough to say as much as he has.

"…I love you…in many different ways," Xie Lian could have never even said this before, but…

Mourning someone for eight centuries changes you.

"When…I said it, I meant…"

"Your highness, I never meant to distress you, you don't have to say —"

"As lovers," Xie Lian concludes hoarsely, feeling so—

But that's clear, isn't it? That is demonstrably, undeniably obvious?

Hua Cheng falls silent—clearly thinking about what he's saying, and his question, while fair—

“…When you say lovers—how do you envision that?”

Xie Lian still feels like he might die.

Struggling to think of a way to explain that, before he closed himself off to such things—he just knew he liked adventure novels with…

(He lied to Feng Xin, he did read them for the kissing.)

Like…husband and wife do? But they’re not…

He almost offers Shi Qingxuan and Blackwater for an example, but when he remembers how furious Hua Cheng was over that entire thing, he might be insulted—he certainly would be if Xie Lian compared it to Feng Xin and Mu Qing—

How did Mu Qing navigate this so easily?

It's not that Xie Lian's friends approached them and proudly declared that they were being intimate at some point in the last year—but it's fairly obvious.

As in Feng Xin appeared in a council meeting with a black eye, zero complaints, and Mu Qing seemed mortified.

Which implies that it probably wasn't easy for them, but at least Mu Qing of all people was probably able to verbalize it, and if Xie Lian can't even meet that low, low bar—

"I think I want the same things you do, San Lang," he croaks, fighting the urge to hide his face in his hands.

And while Hua Cheng has taken him at his word up until now, only asking for clarification—

Now, when Xie Lian peeks at his expression—he seems utterly disbelieving.

"You wouldn't say that if you knew what I wanted," he shakes his head firmly. "And that's alright—”

"You could tell me?" Xie Lian swallows hard, and now Hua Cheng looks like he might disperse for a third time.

"I would never insult you that way."

"I wouldn't be insulted—”

"You should be, your highness—I don't have any right to—”

Before Hua Cheng can even finish that sentence, he lets out a surprised grunt—yanked down by the shoulders, and this time—

This time, Xie Lian kisses him differently.

Sliding forward in his lap until they're chest to chest, his eyes tightly squeezed shut, face burning with embarrassment—

And Hua Cheng makes a small, shocked sound in the back of his throat when he feels teeth against his lower lip, tugging lightly.

He doesn't even think before opening his mouth to him, he just does , shuddering when their tongues slide together, his mind going blank when he feels the prince speak into his communication array, saying words he would struggle to say out loud—

'There isn't a single part of me that you don't have a right to, San Lang.'

Hua Cheng is still underneath him, palms flat against Xie Lian's shoulders, almost hovering there, like he doesn't quite dare, but—

Those words make him think of what Xie Lian said to Jun Wu, before.

That Hua Cheng hadn't taken anything that wasn't already his.

His.

And Xie Lian finds himself pinched between several different emotions.

Mild frustration, embarrassment, want , and—

When he feels that Hua Cheng is shaking, restraining himself, his heart aches.

Their lips part, and even though Hua Cheng has no need for air, he's breathing hard, and—

Xie Lian presses their foreheads together, his voice softening.

"San Lang?"

"...Yes?" He replies weakly.

"You love me."

The ghost king shudders—and repeats an affirmative without being asked, not realizing where Xie Lian is going with it—

"I love you."

Xie Lian's hands are on his cheeks again, fingers tenderly tracing the shapes of his features.

"...There's someone precious to me," the prince explains softly. "I love him more than anything else in this world."

If Hua Cheng's heart could still beat, it would be pounding in his chest.

"Please—try not to think so little of him," Xie Lian whispers. "It hurts me."

What little remains of his self-restraint almost makes an audible sound as it snaps, and the noise that rips out of Hua Cheng's chest doesn't even sound human .

The grip on Xie Lian's waist is suddenly like iron, and before he can fully gasp from surprise—

Hua Cheng swallows it with his lips, surging into Xie Lian with a force that might have frightened him, not so long ago.

But not now.

Now, he just finds himself trying to meet it as best as he can, shuddering every time Hua Cheng's hands squeeze him tighter, when his teeth scrape against him, when his tongue does this absolutely wicked thing against the roof of his mouth, making the prince's toes curl.

Their lips part again, and Xie Lian makes a small sound of discontent, trying to chase him—only to feel Hua Cheng's fingers tangling in his hair, pulling until Xie Lian's head tilts back, and when the prince feels teeth against the side of his throat—

He makes a sound he didn't even know he could make, and when he feels Hua Cheng stiffen, clearly fearful that it might have been a step too far—

Xie Lian's hands tighten against his shoulders almost frantically.

"Don't stop."

Hua Cheng's lips close around his pulse point and suck, and Xie Lian—

He feels like a marionette with the strings attached in the wrong places.

Hua Cheng nips and bites at different points along the column of his neck, and Xie Lian's stomach lurches, his legs trembling.

He mumbles something against the prince's neck, and there's a slight delay—between Xie Lian hearing it and understanding it.

"It's…harder…if you try to stop later…"

The solution is obvious in Xie Lian's mind: not to stop at all.

Then, he picks out another word:

'Cultivation.'

Oh.

Xie Lian's response is so nonchalant, Hua Cheng almost isn't sure if he heard him right.

"D-Don't worry about that…"

After he just got his powers back?

"But—"

"I promise it's…a-alright, San Lang…"

And as much as Xie Lian wants him not to worry—he wouldn't say that unless it really would be alright. He would never want Hua Cheng to feel responsible for ruining his cultivation, so…

It must be true .

Hua Cheng's hands slide down from his hips—skirting around the edges of his thighs through his robes, fingers hesitantly curling, like he's trespassing on sacred ground.

But the ragged intake of Xie Lian's breath isn't fearful—just nervous.

It's slow, when he rises from the chair, slow enough for Xie Lian to say whatever he likes—but he just tightens his arms around Hua Cheng's neck.

The cottage has only two rooms—Xie Lian saw no need to build it out further when it was just him, and that makes the trip short.

There's maybe three steps through the kitchen, once through the doorway, then he's sitting on the edge of his bed.

Slightly more comfortable than what he keeps at Puqi Shrine, and since everything that happened...

Xie Lian tries not to sleep on the ground anymore.

Hua Cheng stands over him for a moment—doesn't sink down over him, like when they were in paradise manor, or slink in behind him from an appropriate distance, like he did in Puqi Shrine.

Now, he just stands in front of him, hands resting on Xie Lian's sides.

At first, Xie Lian mistakes it for more hesitation, and part of him doesn't think he has the nerve to say anything more, because at that point it might seem like begging , but...Hua Cheng reaches up, gently prying the god's hands from where they've been clutching his shoulders.

Not to push him away, no.

He turns his head, pressing a soft kiss to both of Xie Lian’s palms. Slow, with a tenderness that leaves the prince watching him with round eyes and bated breath.

“Just…” He still hasn’t lifted his lips from Xie Lian’s left hand. “Just let me…” his voice is so soft, strained with longing. Xie Lian’s fingers curl around his chin, gentle, loving.

“Yes,” Xie Lian whispers, hearing the ghost king’s breath hitch in response. “Whatever San Lang wants.”

He says that, even though he really has no idea what might come next.

Xie Lian has overheard plenty, spending the majority of his life living on the streets—but that isn’t the same as knowing what to expect.

But if it’s with him—he knows he wants it.

Xie Lian wants everything. He’s been taught not to crave, to sacrifice that which he desires—

But Hua Cheng makes him greedy. Makes Xie Lian want to experience every single thing he's missed by his side. To spend every moment in each other's arms.

To be selfish.

And isn't that alright?

When he glances up at the ghost king through his lashes, watching the way Hua Cheng keeps his face pressed against his palm—breathing him in—he thinks it might be.

But of all of the guesses he could have made for what the ghost king would do…

He wasn't expecting Hua Cheng to reach for the pin in his hair—the clasp he left for Xie Lian in Puqi Shrine many months before—gently pulling it free, sending the prince's tresses tumbling loosely down his back and shoulders.

Such a small gesture—

But…intimate.

For a moment, he doesn't even say anything—just quietly admires the sight of him in the shifting patterns of light coming in through the window, lanterns drifting through the air outside.

"…Beautiful."

Xie Lian has always known that he thought so—

But he rarely says it.

He's called Xie Lian so many other things, sung his praises in ways that made him sheepish—and Xie Lian has spent a lifetime being told that, if nothing else, he is beautiful—

But it's never affected him like this before, hearing it from Hua Cheng's lips.

There were times he resented being thought of as beautiful, thought it was the only thing people wanted from him—

But when he says it, Xie Lian feels his lungs tighten in his chest, fingers trembling against the edge of the bed.

He's confused at first, watching as Hua Cheng sinks to his knees in front of him, fingers tightening against the mattress when the ghost king's fingers find the backs of his calves—

Only to gently ease off the prince's boots, one after the other, carefully setting them aside.

When he straightens up, he's far more careless with his own belongings. Kicking off his own boots—unfastening his silver vambraces, allowing them to fall to the ground with a heavy clank, and Xie Lian can't help but wince.

"San Lang, those are so nice, you shouldn't—"

But then the mattress is dipping beneath the weight of his knees, and Xie Lian finds himself tongue tied.

Which is fine—because Hua Cheng seems fully intent on kissing him breathless, anyhow.

Slow, his body hovering over Xie Lian's as he lays back—but not pinning him.

Xie Lian is almost only distantly aware of hands helping him shrug out of his outer robe—he certainly never noticed anything touching his belt—

And somehow, he ends up on his side with Hua Cheng pressed behind him, lips against the nape of his neck, holding him close.

It's less than Xie Lian expected, but somehow more, too.

They've laid side by side in bed together. Xie Lian has had his hair down in front of him before, slept in only his inner robes—

But this couldn't be any more different.

It's not a surprise that his neck is sensitive, kept from any form of contact for years due to the cursed shackle—but every brush of Hua Cheng's mouth against his nape makes him burn , feet jerking, trying not to accidentally kick him—

And then, there's his hands.

Xie Lian has always liked them. How he could feel the slight roughness to his skin from years or working with a hammer or saber. How big they are—

But they’ve never felt bigger than they do now, pressing against his body through the thin layer of his inner robes.

One of them is splayed across his ribs, thumb rubbing slow circles just underneath the muscles of the prince’s chest—and he must feel his heart pounding, but he never says so.

The other is on his thigh, easing higher, and Xie Lian—

Xie Lian almost can’t take it.

“Ah…San Lang?” He’s barely said a coherent word since Hua Cheng laid him down, and he’s struggling with it now, his breaths turning slightly labored. “Shouldn’t…shouldn’t I be…touching you, too?”

There’s a small rumble of acknowledgement against his back—and he shivers.

“Later,” He replies, and Xie Lian wishes—he just wishes Hua Cheng wouldn’t do that against the nape of his neck, it makes him squirm even more, and…

“But…what about you—?”

“Gege said whatever I wanted,” Hua Cheng reminds him gently, fingertips drumming against his thigh.

“I-I did…”

“Do you want me to stop?”

There’s no apprehension in Hua Cheng’s tone—and despite him speaking of how difficult it would be to stop, before…Xie Lian knows he would, if he said so.

He shakes his head, his heart thudding unsteadily. “Not unless you want—”

Hua Cheng’s hand tightens against his thigh and he falls silent, biting his lip so hard, it starts to feel almost numb.

“…I just want to take care of you,” his voice is soft in Xie Lian’s ear. “Can I?”

The prince can barely manage more than a terse nod, his head moving woodenly as Hua Cheng’s hand slides higher, resting over his hip.

“Have you…have you ever…?” He struggles to think, eyes fixed on the sight of Hua Cheng’s fingers pulling at the strings of his inner robes.

“…Only on my own,” the ghost king admits, his nose resting against Xie Lian’s pulse point. “I was never interested in doing this with someone else.”

Xie Lian couldn’t have predicted the way hearing that would make him feel.

It’s not that he would have been upset if Hua Cheng had , or that he would have thought less of him.

But there’s a pleasant leap of relief in his gut—followed by an emotion he’s never…

A thrill in the idea that this is something that is just for them, together.

Hua Cheng's mouth is slow—in a fashion that could almost be mistaken for lazy if not for the fact that Xie Lian knows how seriously he's taking this—making its way across his skin, pressing at the hollow beneath his ear once more.

The prince is so distracted by that, arching his neck, he almost doesn't notice when Hua Cheng's hand slips downward, dipping beneath that final layer of fabric, and—

A strangled gasp wrenches itself from his lips, eyes blown wide against the dark.

It—It doesn't feel bad , not at all—Xie Lian's heels are already digging into the mattress, legs shaking. It's just—

Even the barest brush of Hua Cheng's fingers there feels wrong. Like someone is about to burst through the door and tell him this is wrong. Like he's—

But then, the other man's voice is in his ear—shushing him. Fingertips slowly dragging down sensitive flesh, warmer than Xie Lian expected, but that's probably intentional—

"Beautiful..." He murmurs into his skin, fingers wrapping around him fully—and Xie Lian shudders.

The irony of it all is that part of cultivation is control over the mind and body. A significant part of Xie Lian's is control over this very part of his body, but now—

It feels utterly unfamiliar to him. Hot, pulsing between his thighs, and —

Good.

Hua Cheng's hand slides down, moving thin, sensitive skin with it in a slow, deliberate slide, and Xie Lian is too distracted by the sensations running down his thighs to even be embarrassed. Muscles tensing, breaths growing more and more shallow.

But once they reach the end, the roughened bed over his thumb sliding over the head, gathering slickness there—

A high, mortifying sound makes its way out of Xie Lian's throat, his face turning into the pillow, thighs jerking.

And Hua Cheng's teeth are on his earlobe.

Dragging over one half of the pearl set that connects them together, his hand sliding back down, slicker this time—far more so than what could have just come from Xie Lian alone. Though the prince supposes of all of the other things Hua Cheng can summon from storage, that isn’t—

"How does it feel, gege?" His voice is different from how Xie Lian has ever heard it.

Low, rough, and hungry in his ear—but from the way his fingers squeeze slightly after, making Xie Lian choke—

It wasn't a rhetorical question.

"I..." His words are trembling, half formed.

"San...San Lang...I...can't..."

"I said I want to take care of you," Hua Cheng reminds him gently.

And Xie Lian said himself—

'Whatever San Lang wants.'

"How can I do that if gege won't tell me?" He purrs, his hand moving slightly faster, and Xie Lian--

He makes a sound embarrassingly close to a whine, trying to muffle it in the pillow, hips squirming, unsure of what to do with himself, but…

"…Good," he rasps, shuddering when Hua Cheng buries his face in the crook of his neck. "I-It's good…"

His thumb teases at the tip again, drinking in the sounds falling from the prince's lips.

"Thank you for telling me," he breathes, feeling Xie Lian writhe, unsure of how to move, but unable to stay still.

"…You…you do this…on your own?"

Thinking about that helps—makes Xie Lian feel slightly less mortified. It's not that he doesn't want it, or that he isn't enjoying it—

But when you've spent the majority of your life thinking about certain parts of you like they may as well not exist, being reminded that they do in such a vivid way is…

An adjustment.

But Xie Lian could never think of anything about Hua Cheng as distasteful, uncomfortable, or wrong. If he does it, then there's nothing wrong with…enjoying it. There isn't—

"Sometimes," the ghost king agrees, making Xie Lian ease slightly against him, even if his thighs are tense and trembling.

And it's not something that he would normally say—he's never been able to admit it before, too ashamed of his own coveting, craving something he knows he doesn't deserve—

"Whenever I can't stop thinking of you."

He doesn't know if he consciously meant to say it, but…

Xie Lian's reaction—the way his body shudders, curling inwards, turning his face completely into the pillow beneath him, trying to muffle the moan that tears from his throat—

It's the best encouragement there is.

Xie Lian feels Hua Cheng's other arm slide under his head, keeping him from turning his face into the pillow anymore to hide, his cheeks scorching —

Lips brush beneath his jaw, humming.

“Thank you,” Hua Cheng somehow manages to exude gratitude, even when he purrs.

“Letting your San Lang hear you like this…feel you,” as he says it, his thumb brushes over Xie Lian in a way that makes him keen.

His San Lang.

His San Lang.

“…I would…wouldn’t want anyone else to…” Xie Lian can barely speak, but still feels Hua Cheng’s approval.

If anyone else heard Xie Lian like this—they wouldn’t live to tell.

They wouldn’t get the chance to draw another breath.

“Just me?”

Hua Cheng was so hesitant to admit that he wanted it at all, and his questions might be mortifying, but—

They also mean he’s starting to believe what Xie Lian said.

That he wants this. That he isn’t just forcing himself for Hua Cheng’s sake.

“…Just you…” the prince whispers, voice trembling. “I…I’m just sorry that I…don’t…”

He breaks off with a soft moan, his cheek pressed against the ghost king’s forearm. “Know how to…”

Hua Cheng shushes him again, his cheek cool as it presses against the flushed skin of Xie Lian’s cheek.

“You’re perfect,” he whispers.

Not because he has to be. No expectations placed upon him—

He just is.

“Just breathe, gege.”

Xie Lian lets out a shuddering sigh, inhaling sharply—and Hua Cheng's answering chuckle is breathless with affection.

"Move with me?"

Xie Lian doesn't understand what he means, not at first—not until he feels Hua Cheng's hips rock against him from behind.

A gentle, subtle demonstration—but one that makes an entirely different form of desire crop up inside of him, powerful and unfamiliar.

And he likes it like this—loves Hua Cheng, for how tender and careful he is with him—

But part of him found the unrestrained, near animalistic side displayed after the Kiln reopened easier to deal with, because it didn't give Xie Lian so much space to think.

Now, he finds himself wondering if he sounds strange. If he's reacting too much. If he isn't reacting enough.

If, after giving Hua Cheng an entire speech about how he did want these things and practically demanding that they do them, he's as stiff and unexciting as a statue—

But then Hua Cheng's hips rock into him again—not firmly enough to gain any friction, it's not for his own pleasure, just subtle encouragement—

Xie Lian's breath trembles anyway, his heart fluttering around in his rib cage like a hummingbird's wings.

And when he moves with him, finally moving his hips forward, into his hand instead of squirming away from it—

It feels like a sudden realization. A trembling sigh of relief, his body growing languid, even as his toes curl.

Oh.

It's—

It's supposed to feel like this.

The more he moves, the more his body seems to just know , rocking into Hua Cheng's touch in movements that feel more fluid, more natural with every single pass.

And with Hua Cheng’s voice in his ear, telling him how lovely he sounds, how beautiful he is, how he’s—

"So well..." His voice is like a touch in itself, the only part of him that Xie Lian knew by heart months ago, wrapping itself around him. "You're doing so well..."

And it's—the same thing they said back then.

Hua Cheng couldn't remember, but—

Back then, Xie Lian had been so sure that there was someone else Hua Cheng wanted. This amorphous, faceless, presumably perfect special, precious someone who held an immovable place in his heart.

When Hua Cheng touched him like that, Xie lian thought he was thinking of them.

And even with everything that's happened since—Xie Lian never took the time to revisit that night in his mind, and realize that Hua Cheng was thinking about him .

That he wanted to touch Xie Lian like that.

When he felt like he was on the verge of being devoured. Hua Cheng's fingers wrapped around his throat. His teeth on shoulder. His—

Xie Lian's head tilts back, resting against Hua Cheng's shoulder as his breaths become ragged and short.

His nose nuzzles against Xie Lian's cheek, soft kisses pressed along his jaw as he eases the prince into it. Guiding Xie Lian to thrust into his hand, stroking in time.

Xie Lian thought this would be embarrassing at best, awkward at worst—and at first, it was.

But now, something about it feels so natural. So safe, so wanted, as though there’s nothing he could do wrong right now.

It’s just—

It’s just good , and Xie Lian feels himself building towards something he doesn’t quite understand, but…

For the first time, he doesn't run away from it, or tell himself that it's wrong. That he should stop.

In a way, it felt like a knot formed in his chest, the day he realized that he was different.

That he didn't want the things that he was expected to.

A part of him that he could never change—and something he spent so many years trying to reassure others about—

But never himself.

It never felt as though he had permission to embrace it as something that could be beautiful.

Something that could feel like this .

He opens his eyes hazily, his gaze taking a moment to adjust to the dim light of the room—

And the first thing he notices is ink.

Black ink scrawled across Hua Cheng's forearm, cradling his head.

Characters nearly illegible, but here, this close—

Xie Lian always knew that Hong'er had a tattoo. One of the farmers mentioned it, after he…

But seeing it now—

Xie Lian never expected to decipher the characters of his own name .

It feels like something in his gut snaps like a broken string—and his vision goes white.

His body trembles through it, muscles in his thighs and torso tensing in ways he's never experienced before as a burning heat consumes him in the sweetest inferno he could imagine.

He doesn't know how he moves, what sounds he makes—but Hua Cheng drinks all of it in.

His hand working over him until Xie Lian squirms, because it's too much , pulling back—kissing his prince as he starts to come back down, his breaths still stuttering and uncertain.

“Beautiful,” he breathes again as Xie Lian shudders in his arms. “You did so well…”

Xie Lian isn’t actually sure that he did anything other than not actively get in the way as Hua Cheng’s hands took him apart—

But the way the ghost king says it, like it was some sort of wondrous privilege…

It makes Xie Lian feel like he did do well.

His body is limp and relaxed—almost floating, in the aftermath of so much sensation. He’s vaguely aware of Hua Cheng cleaning off his hand, but too mortified by that part to give it much attention.

“That…was what you wanted?”

In its mildest form, yes.

Considering how Xie Lian has never even touched himself , Hua Cheng was never going to act on more…intensive desires. If he had the self-control that his god does, he never would have considered—

But he doesn’t. What he does have is a very vivid imagination.

He could never even bring himself to detail the half of it to Xie Lian. Not now, when he already feels as though his god has been more generous with him than he ever could have asked for.

“But…there’s more, isn’t there?”

Hua Cheng’s fingers grow still against his side.

“…There can be,” he admits warily. He could be content with just this for eternity, if that’s what Xie Lian wan—

“Can we?”

It’s such a simple question, but it seems to leave the ghost king lightheaded, taking a moment to respond.

“…Gege,” his tone makes Xie Lian’s face grow warm again.

“I’m alright…really—”

“We have time,” Hua Cheng’s palm settles against his side, fingers splayed across his ribs.

"I know," he mutters. It's actually strange to think about—because for the first time, they do.

There's no lurking enemy waiting to drive them apart, no battles they have to hurry off to fight.

This may as well be the first night of the rest of their lives, because they'll be spent together—

"But—"

"Be gentle with your San Lang," Hua Cheng's chin rests against his shoulder. "Gege can take his time."

Xie Lian is more than aware of the fact that Hua Cheng is helping him save face—mostly because he knows the prince a little too well.

And Xie Lian can say the same.

Just from what he remembers from the forge—he knows, free of restraints, exactly what Hua Cheng would want to do.

And Hua Cheng knows how badly Xie Lian wants to give something back to him—and even if that's something Xie Lian also wants—

He saw the way Xie Lian reacted to his praise. How heady and addictive it can be, thinking you're doing well for someone you love.

That you might push yourself further than you're ready for—just to please them.

And Hua Cheng would rather be careful than risk that.

Even if that seems to leave his god somewhat frustrated.

"Patience, your highness."

"I—" Xie Lian opens his mouth, surprised by the way he sounds almost petulant.

I am.

…Why did that almost feel like a habit?

He's silent for a moment, contemplating that, content to allow Hua Cheng's hand to slide up and down his rib cage, leaving him content and pliant in his hold.

When he finally rolls over in Hua Cheng's arms, he's completely relaxed—pressing close, arms around his neck.

There's a contentment that settles over Hua Cheng, rumbling quietly in his chest—when Xie Lian chooses to speak again.

"What about you?" He murmurs, his voice low, so relaxed, Hua Cheng doesn't understand it at first.

"Hmm?"

"…Can I take care of you?"

And He promptly chokes.

Xie Lian doesn't seem particularly surprised by that reaction, waiting until he's properly cleared his throat.

"…There's no obligation for you to reciprocate, dianxia." He explains hoarsely. "It doesn't have to be give and take."

He's perfectly happy to give, give, and give—

"I want to," Xie Lian's reply is quiet, riddled with shyness—but when Hua Cheng peeks at his expression…

He seems sure.

"I just…don't know how," he admits, seeming almost contrite about that fact. And before Hua Cheng can reassure him that it's perfectly alright not to—

"…Could San Lang teach me?"

He asks so delicately, so earnestly, his cheeks stained pink, all the way to his ears—

And what else can Hua Cheng do?

"…Alright," he mutters, averting his gaze. "But you don't need—"

"I know," Xie Lian whispers.

After a moment of long, contemplative silence—Hua Cheng shifts, sitting up against the pillows and headboard, guiding Xie Lian to move with him.

He does so easily, sitting up on his knees beside him—and the ghost king takes a deep breath.

He doesn't ask Xie Lian again if he's sure, having had that conversation enough times to know what the answer is going to be.

But before he can pull the prince to him—he feels hands on the front of his robes.

When Xie Lian sees the way his eyebrows raise, he pulls back.

"…that…I thought…since that was what you did…" he fiddles with the hem of his sleeve. "But if that's not the proper order—"

He falls silent when Hua Cheng's hands envelop his wrists, pulling them back.

"There's nothing to be embarrassed about—gege's already done it."

Xie Lian is baffled at first, because they have definitely never done anything like this before, but—

Then he remembers the dice game they played in Fu Gu with 'Ming Yi' and Shi Qingxuan, and how, when they lost…

"…Right," he swallows hard.

That was a little different back then—because Xie Lian couldn't actually see what he was doing—

But now, he's just as careful as Hua Cheng was with him before. Delicately removing the silver jewelry around his neck, setting it aside.

His fingers are a little less self assured, compared to Hua Cheng's before. Carefully pulling at the clasps on the front of his robes, trembling slightly when they pull at his belt.

And it isn't any easier when the robes slip down his shoulders.

It's actually not that Xie Lian is unfamiliar with Hua Cheng's physique—he's bumped into the man while he was shirtless more than once.

Likely because Hua Cheng felt more comfortable knowing that Xie Lian couldn't see anything—he can't imagine another reason for it.

And it's not as though he's shirtless now—he still has his white inner robes beneath.

But they’re thinner—cut close to his body, unclasped in the front. Enough to show more bare skin than Xie Lian was expecting.

The smooth, toned planes of his chest, leading down his torso…

Xie Lian reaches out without thinking, pressing his palm against Hua Cheng’s chest, surprised to find that it isn’t as cold as he expected, but —

There’s something else he wasn’t expecting.

A scar.

Other than calluses on his hands and his missing eye—his body has been largely unblemished. All of the scars Xie Lian felt on Hong’er’s face, the broken nose. All of it gone as death wipes away all imperfections like waves on the sand.

Except for this.

The death scar.

Xie Lian has spent too many nights laying awake, thinking of the way he died. How much pain he must have been in. How scared and alone.

Part of him knows he should have been sad when Qi Rong dispersed. That it was an almost pitiful thing. He was his last family in the world.

And part of him knows that coldness, that harsh streak of anger that he discovered in himself when he was young—it remains.

Because he's glad.

He never tried to forgive Qi Rong. Never tried to show him kindness.

He knows that's ironic, given the grace he showed to Jun Wu at the end.

But of all of the things that man did—none of them could have ever caused Xie Lian as much pain as this scar.

He can't forgive that. He won't even try.

It's vertical—slashing across where his heart once beat. A signal of its now permanent silence.

And it aches sometimes, remembering the nights that Xie Lian would sleep next to the fire of Puqi Shrine, comforted by the sound of Hong'er's heartbeat.

He'll never hear it again.

Hua Cheng watches him silently, the emotions of sorrow and remorse in his eyes, wishing he could wash those away—and knowing that he can't.

But before he can say anything to take his mind from it—the prince leans forward, pressing his lips over the mark.

The ghost king grows still under his touch, fingers tangled in his hair—and Xie Lian considers it more of a silent oath than a kiss.

That he will never let someone take him from him again. No matter what he has to do. No matter what it takes.

This scar will be the last.

But once his fervor fades, and he realizes that his lips are pressed to the bare skin of Hua Cheng's chest—

His cheeks slowly begin to warm as he pulls back, opening his mouth to apologize--even if that's silly, given what they're doing , but—

Then, Hua Cheng's hands are on his waist, pulling him forward until he's sitting astride the man's lap, and their lips are moving together again.

There's a harder edge to it than there was before—still passionate, always loving—

But slightly less controlled.

His hands are heavy through the thin fabric of Xie Lian's inner robes—dragging it upwards when his hands slide up the small of his back, pushing him closer, and when the prince feels fingertips against the bare skin of his spine, that familiar feeling crops up in his gut again.

"Should—” He tries to speak only to find his mouth tongue tied, eyes rolling back as they part, Hua Cheng's lips finding his jaw again. "What should I—?"

If he were mortal, Hua Cheng's grip on his hips might be considered bruising.

Should he just do it exactly how Hua Cheng did it to him? That makes sense, but he isn't sure—

"I probably won't be as good—" He starts to warn, audibly concerned about being disappointing compared to Hua Cheng's performance, and something about that strikes a nerve.

Because in a departure from his prior caution—Xie Lian feels fingers wrap around one of his wrists, dragging his hand down, and—

When his palm is pressed against the hardness between the ghost king's legs and he hears a low, guttural moan in response, his heart pounds.

It actually isn’t the first time Xie Lian has felt him like this—and even if it wasn’t, he felt it pressed against him before, when Hua Cheng was touching him. He was just politely ignoring it up until now—

But feeling it against his thigh and having it against his hand are…

“Dianxia couldn’t touch me in a way I wouldn’t enjoy,” Hua Cheng’s voice is ragged, practically undone by even this much.

Xie Lian swallows hard—wishing Hua Cheng would realize he feels the same way, but…

For now, he tries to focus on the matter at hand.

Literally.

His palm slides up slowly—the added friction earning a soft hiss as he reaches for the hem of his robes, grateful for Hua Cheng’s assistance when he helps pull them down.

And it’s—

It’s not that Xie Lian has never seen a man naked before—he has.

Well, he’s seen himself.

Which he supposes leaves him better off than if he was doing this with a woman, which he’s utterly clueless about.

But when he says that he’s ‘seen’ himself—that’s actually being a bit generous in description.

He paid attention to his physique when he was younger—because everyone else did.

Which—considering he was very much a child back then, wasn't appropriate—but that's not the point.

The point is that he couldn't see himself for the last eight centuries. At all.

Ironically—he even forgot what his own face looked like, and he hasn't gotten reacquainted in the last year.

Part of it was adjusting to his sight. He lives with his eyes shut as a habit, and has to remember that he can open them now—and adjust to the brightness when he does.

But it's also because he's avoided mirrors—or looking at himself at all.

He's never changed forms often, either—but in the last year he has.

Masquerading as 'Bolin,' or using his female form to show some solidarity with Shi Qingxuan in the latter stages of their pregnancy.

He isn't sure why he did—but if he was avoiding looking at his own appearance, he certainly wasn't going to strip down to examine himself down there either.

So, for all purposes, the sight of Hua Cheng's body is jarring.

In a good way—a way that feels so natural, it's almost jarring—but it still leaves the prince unsure, eyes sliding up to meet the ghost king's.

"Should I…?" He swallows again, his ears burning as Hua Cheng reaches down to take his hand once more.

He knows that it won't always be like this—that he might occasionally be a slow learner, but he does learn—but there's something…

Something about the gentleness in Hua Cheng's touch as he guides him through it that somehow, impossibly, makes the prince love him even more.

He never even saw what was used to slick Hua Cheng's hand before—everything was so smooth and quick, and Xie Lian was too embarrassed to open his eyes half of the time.

Now, he watches as oil is rubbed into his palm from a small vile—and his fingers are carefully guided down, wrapping around—

Oh.

Xie Lian bites his lip, fingers gripping slightly tighter—feeling him pulse and groan underneath his touch.

He didn't realize that touching someone else could be just as—if not more —exciting than being touched yourself.

Watching with round eyes and bated breath as Hua Cheng's fingers overlap with his. Xie Lian's never had small hands, but he's enveloped nonetheless, his knees tightening where they rest next to Hua Cheng's thighs, watching his fingers are guided up and down.

Watching the way his body reacts—how flesh darkens and somehow gets even bigger —

"Dianxia," Xie Lian grows still, having heard his title said in countless different ways, but—

Never like that .

"L-look at me…"

The moment he tilts his face up, Hua Cheng takes his mouth.

Teeth dragging over his lower lip, drinking in his gasp as their tongues move together.

It seemed sudden to Xie Lian, but if Hua Cheng was forced to watch the prince watching him like that any longer—

It would have ended embarrassingly quickly.

(Not that drinking in the noises he makes as his hands are on him makes it any easier.)

Xie Lian steadies himself with one hand on Hua Cheng's shoulder, his stomach lurching every time he thrusts into his other hand.

(Remembering. Remembering vividly.)

Part of him thinks he wouldn't mind if they stayed like this forever. Here, alone—wrapped up in each other. Not having to worry, not having to think. Hua Cheng moving his body, using it to make something that feels as beautiful as this.

One kiss falls into the next, and Hua Cheng is louder than he was—grunts and moans sending shivers down Xie Lian's spine, hungry for more.

But when they pause between kisses, if only because Hua Cheng wants him to breathe—

“I love you,” Xie Lian pants against his jaw.

Hua Cheng's head sinks back against the pillows, cheeks flushed, and Xie Lian follows him, pressing clumsy, earnest kisses against his chin, the side of his throat.

“I love you so much,” he shudders when Hua Cheng's fingers tangle in his hair, dragging him back up.

It's hard to get words out between kisses, but he tries , remembering how Hua Cheng spoke to him before. Gasping out praises and compliments every time his lips are free.

“You—you're so good, San Lang, I love you, I—”

The ghost king lets out a broken cry against his lips.

The last few jerks of his hips up into Xie Lian's hand are so forceful, the only thing that stops him from toppling over is Hua Cheng's palm against the small of his back, holding him in place.

He's trembling one moment, boneless and gasping the next, and when his vision clears, he pulls Xie Lian back into him.

The prince's hand was halfway to his lips beforehand, not even thinking—and now he's too embarrassed by what he was going to do to comment as the ghost king cleans his hand off, kissing him deeply.

“Was that…” Xie Lian's eyes are half-lidded, and he feels…almost hazy.

Even more so than he did after his own climax—warm all over, his limbs impossibly light. “Was that good—?”

He sighs into the next kiss, melting into Hua Cheng's arms as the ghost king cradles him against his chest.

Each of them half dressed, relaxed, and sated.

“It was so good,” he assures him, one hand cradling the back of his head, the other wrapped around his back. “You really are going to be the death of me.”

Xie Lian makes a low sound of disapproval in the back of his throat, burying his face in Hua Cheng’s chest.

"No more of that," He mutters, shaking his head.

He's been the death of him three times too many—and that's more than enough to last for the rest of eternity.

Hua Cheng smiles faintly, sitting back against the pillows with his love in his arms.

"If dianxia insists."

Xie Lian does insist, and Hua Cheng should know that by now.

That if he ever goes charging off the cliff by himself again—Xie Lian will just go jumping after him, plunging down into whatever pit awaits by his side.

"There's so much I want to tell you," he whispers.

So much that's happened since he left last--so much that Xie Lian wanted to tell him before that--

He doesn't even know where to begin.

But that's alright—

Hua Cheng already has his own priorities in mind.

"Sleep first," he murmurs. "You need rest."

It’s not a bad suggestion, not when they’re both limp and pleasantly tired.

And when Hua Cheng sees the flash of anxiety in his eyes at the suggestion…

He leans down to kiss his cheek.

“I’ll be there when you wake up your highness—I swear.”

Even when he says that, Xie Lian finds himself fighting the clutches of sleep. Fighting to keep his eyes open, but the feeling of Hua Cheng's fingers in his hair, his hand against his back—

It feels safe.

And it's been so long since Xie Lian felt…

Hua Cheng watches as he slowly sinks down against his chest, his body growing slack, breaths growing deep and slow.

The lantern lights still drift past the window outside, the Heaven's cheering in celebration as the final counts are tallied.

In spite of everything, there are more lanterns this year all around—mortals looking for comfort in the chaos through prayers.

Prayers to the elemental masters, the martial gods of the south, east, and west—to the new Emperor.

But above all of them, standing tall above the rest, are the lanterns sent into the sky in name of the Crown Prince of Xianle, and as his teachings have said, far and wide across the continent—

Any lantern given in his name is also given in the name of the Ghost King.

Praying for his return, so that the prince will never be parted from his greatest treasure again—forever together once more.

And that night, across the world, they see their prayers come to fruition.

Countless believers scattered across the continent, hands clasped in prayer as they stand before the statue of the Crown Prince, the Ghost King's tapestry always standing sentry behind him.

They watch with bated breath, a red comet burning in the sky above, fireworks exploding like falling stars, as the statue of the Crown Prince begins to change.

White marble turning into gleaming veins of gold.

A secret that only faith can tell—where true worth lies.

In the Heavenly Capital, when the tallies are counted—even with the great generals and elemental masters in tight competition—the Crown Prince sits firmly atop the heap.

With six thousand and one lanterns.

Nearly a thousand from grateful worshippers across the country, scattered temples halfway constructed, but sending up as much as they can muster. Another thousand from Qiandeng Temple in Ghost City. Thirty from Gusu, one from Puqi Village...

And four thousand from Huangji Temple, on Mount Taicang. More than any other release of Blessing Lanterns on record, beating the record of three thousand from the year before.

It doesn't take much guesswork to think of who could have done such a thing.

But no one goes to investigate the matter—not just yet.

Such matters can be left for the morning—no matter how badly some of them want to look, they understand.

Some reunions are best had in private—giving them time and space to breathe.

To sleep until sorrow becomes a memory, and longing is replaced with the beautiful ache of no longer waking up alone.

UPDATE ON THE NO PATHS ARE BOUND COMIC

As mentioned before, ImaginaryCanvas has been making a beautiful visual adaptation of this story! They uploaded the first two chapters on the WEBTOON platform today, and you can check their twitter @imaginarycanvas for more updates on new chapters as they go up! It's a huge honor to have such a wonderful artist putting so much time and energy into a project based on my story, and I'm so grateful! If you want to follow the comic on WEBTOON, you can do it here!

Chapter End Notes

> if you noticed that I went the entire chapter without describing male genitalia once, it's because I went semi-viral for making a tweets about synonyms for the word "cock" and got embarrassed.

See you next time!!

xoxo, Evie

Legacies

Chapter Summary

> The prince lifts his head, eyes peeking out from blankets and folds of fabric—and when he sees a familiar, adoring gaze staring down at him…
>
> Xie Lian sits up, pushing himself forward until he can press their lips together in a slow, lingering kiss.
>
> Saying the same thing he’s said hundreds of thousands of times—but this time, to the man who was always meant to hear it.
>
> “Good morning, San Lang.”

Xie Lian's eyes open to the gentle warmth of morning sun—and something that sounds suspiciously like a heartbeat, but not in the chest underneath his cheek.

His gaze drifts to the side, and…he finds a silver wraith butterfly nestled in his hair, wings beating softly, mimicking a pulse.

He never thought such a simple thing could bring him to the verge of tears.

It’s overwhelming, to be known inside out. To be loved so carefully, so wholeheartedly, that the man holding him would think of such a small thing. That Xie Lian would miss the sound of it.

The same man who wore silver bells for 800 years, so Xie Lian could hear his steps.

The sudden surge of emotions has him burying his face in the front of Hua Cheng’s robes, nose brushing against his chest—earning a sigh in response.

He’s awake, then.

The prince lifts his head, eyes peeking out from blankets and folds of fabric—and when he sees a familiar, adoring gaze staring down at him…

Xie Lian sits up, pushing himself forward until he can press their lips together in a slow, lingering kiss.

Saying the same thing he's said hundreds of thousands of times—but this time, to the man who was always meant to hear it.

"Good morning, San Lang."

He doesn't say that it's going to be a good day, a mantra he used to use to will hope into existence—and he doesn't need to.

It's going to be a good day.

As long as Hua Cheng is here—it couldn't be anything less.

Arms tighten around him, pulling the prince closer, their foreheads pressing together.

"Good morning, gege…" He replies, voice slightly roughened with sleep.

Xie Lian loves him.

Loves the way his robes feel against his skin. Loves the familiar way he smells. Loves the sound of his voice, loves it even more when it's rougher and deeper just after he wakes up. Loves the way he holds him.

He loves him, he loves him, he loves him—

"…Did you get a dog, or is it just a persistent stray?"

Xie Lian pulls back slightly at the reminder, looking back over his shoulder to see Hong Li standing in the doorway, his head tilted to the side as he takes in the newcomer.

The prince's eyes brighten, then soften as he sits up, patting the space on the bed beside him. All the invitation the animal needs to trot over, climbing up, his tail thumping against the mattress.

"He didn't have anyone," Xie Lian explains.

(And sometimes, neither did he.)

Hua Cheng sits up, resting his chin on his shoulder as he looks the little beast over, arms wrapping around Xie Lian's waist.

"Does he have a name?"

Xie Lian hums, leaning back against him as he scratches the dog behind the ears. “Hong Li.”

“…”

The silence stretches on long enough for the prince to realize, his face growing hot with embarrassment.

“Not—not like red—”

(Like Hua Cheng’s birth name.)

“—just—like strong! He’s strong, for a dog…”

But when Xie Lian surveys the missing eye, the wild dark fur, and the protective way the animal lays across his lap—

…He can understand what it looks like.

If he put an eyepatch and a red collar on him, someone passing by might think it was one of Hua Cheng’s other forms.

“…He really is good company,” Xie Lian explains awkwardly. “He’s good for protection—”

As if the man who decapitated the former emperor in one blow needs a guard dog, but Hua Cheng is generous with his god—and as such, does not dispute that fact with him.

“…And I used to keep dogs when I was a child,” the prince adds sheepishly. “I know that sounds silly—”

Hua Cheng’s arms tighten around his waist as he shakes his head.

“No,” he murmurs, his cheek pressed against Xie Lian’s jaw. “There’s nothing you could tell me about yourself that I wouldn’t be grateful to hear.”

He wants to know everything about him. From the moments they couldn’t share. What he thinks. What he remembers. What he worries about. What keeps him awake at night.

Xie Lian isn’t so sure, doesn’t see how that could be true, but…

He smiles, nuzzling back against him, fingers tangled in Hong Li’s fur.

“…I’ve never liked sleeping alone,” he admits. “When I was small, I used to cry and ask to sleep with my parents every night.”

He can feel Hua Cheng's smile against his neck. "Did they indulge you?"

"Yes," Xie Lian nods. "I think my father liked it better when I was… whining. It made him feel like I needed him, I suppose? But as I got older, I was embarrassed about sleeping in their bed."

"Naturally."

"The solution was to have one of the guard dogs sleep in my room with me until I got used to it, and I did, but…the dogs never left," Xie Lian concludes. "Thinking about them was…one of the few things that made me homesick."

Even before his first banishment.

And once he says that—Hong Li's fate is sealed.

Hua Cheng reaches down, scratching the dog's side—and Hong Li's tail thumps in appreciation.

In general, animals have no aggression towards ghosts—knowing they don't do the same harm as the living.

"…Did your father find you less endearing when you were older?" It's a narrow question, and Xie Lian's surprised that Hua Cheng picked up on such a minute detail in his phrasing so quickly—but he doesn't avoid it.

He just thinks carefully before he speaks.

It's notable, because in all of the questions that Hua Cheng has asked Xie Lian—he can't recall the man having ever asked about Xie Lian's father before.

Not once.

"…We both disappointed each other, I think." Xie Lian explains carefully.

"He loved me, but…sometimes I felt like it was conditional."

On Xie Lian being perfect . On Xie Lian never failing. On Xie Lian never disagreeing with him.

On Xie Lian being a dutiful son. A glorious prince. A righteous god.

"And he loved his pride more."

But it's not simple.

And the more he talks to Mu Qing, cautiously unveiling more and more of the things neither of them dared to speak of before—he struggles to reconcile himself with two facts:

Xie Lian's father was not a good man.

And;

Xie Lian still loves him.

Still mourns him. Still goes to visit him, along with what's left of his mother in the family mausoleum.

He doesn't know how to stop—because he's always loved his father, and he's almost frightened by the void that would be left behind if he let that go.

"…But you would have liked my mother," Xie Lian concludes, shifting the topic slightly. "And she loved you, when I told her about you."

Hua Cheng stiffens, surprised. "You told her about me?"

"…How you took care of me," Xie Lian whispers. "And that you made sure I was never by myself."

Her love for her son was unconditional—even if she didn't always understand Xie Lian, or know what to say in the face of his struggles.

For so many years, Xie Lian looked back on her reaction to learning that he was in love with a man—and thought she was ashamed of him.

But now, he understands.

She thought Xie Lian was ashamed—and to some extent, she was right.

But she never loved him less.

And she would have loved Hua Cheng. Would have been thrilled to see them now—because Xie Lian is happy.

That's all she ever wanted.

His father would have hated him by contrast—but tolerated him, for Xie Lian's sake.

And that makes all the difference between the two.

The potential of a father's disappointment should be motivation, never a burden.

A parent's love should never be conditional.

If Xie Lian ever had children—he'd like to make them understand that.

"…What about your father?" He asks quietly. "You've never mentioned him."

Hong'er spoke of his mother sometimes—very briefly—and she isn't a subject that he speaks on often, but he doesn't outright avoid it either.

"…I never knew him," Hua Cheng mutters, arms tightening subtly around his ribs. "But my mother said he was a soldier. And she loved him."

Xie Lian waits for him to continue—hands slipping down to cover where they rest over his stomach.

But he doesn't, turning his head to look out the window, eye narrowed—and a small, annoyed grunt draws Xie Lian's attention.

"San Lang?"

"…It's nothing, really." He frowns, pressing a lingering kiss into the side of Xie Lian's throat until he squirms, but isn't effectively distracted. "Just useless trash making a nuisance of themselves."

"…San Lang…"

"Hmmm?"

"Did you put an array around the mountain?"

There's a pause—and after a moment, he shrugs.

"Gege needed rest. Your attendants are too impatient."

Xie Lian wouldn't call them attendants anymore, but he doesn't argue that point.

"Thank you San Lang, but I'm awake now..."

So he is.

Hua Cheng sighs deeply.

He doesn't release the array immediately—no.

First, he helps Xie Lian back into his outer robes, combs his hair until it's perfectly smooth, and his gaze shines when Xie Lian insists on doing the same for him.

And...there's something different now.

It's not that it was hard to touch Hua Cheng before. As a matter of fact...even though Xie Lian had learned to dread being touched over the years, he's never minded it from him.

But there was tension before. One that still exists now...in a much more tolerable amount.

Xie Lian couldn't have put his finger on it before their encounter in the Forge. And after, he had assumed it was only on his end of things. That he just had to...deal with it. And if he did get the chance to act on it, the vast unknown of that possibility was...intimidating.

But now that he's seen what comes of it...

There's nothing frightening about it at all. Not when it's with the right person.

And now...there's this added layer of intimacy every time Hua Cheng touches him, and...he thrills in it, even in the smallest of ways.

When they step out of the cottage, they're hand in hand--and Xie Lian watches as the barrier around Mount Taicang fades with a golden glimmer, disappearing into the air. And the moment it does...

"...Your highness!"

Familiar voices follow.

It's only moments later that Feng Xin and Mu Qing burst into sight, stumbling through the underbrush.

"You—!" Feng Xin sputters, pointing to Hua Cheng's chest, "You're back?!"

The Ghost King arches an eyebrow, his thumb rubbing over Xie Lian's knuckles.

"What gave it away?"

He made absolutely no efforts at subtlety with his return, after all—and the reminder has Feng Xin glaring at him sheepishly.

“And you had to lock his highness into an array all night? For what—?!” His gaze drifts toward Xie Lian, and he falls silent, eyes bulging out.

Xie Lian can’t understand what he’s looking at, turning to peer over his shoulder, only to find Hong Li and Ruoye playing in front of the house.

But when he turns back around, the issue becomes obvious.

Feng Xin is pointedly staring at his neck .

Xie Lian’s mind flashes to Hua Cheng’s teeth scraping across his skin the night before—and he claps a hand against the side of his throat; ears turning read as he looks to him, looking for an explanation, but—

But the ghost king looks perfectly smug about it all.

Mu Qing rolls his eyes, crossing his arms over his chest as he sends Feng Xin a pointed look. “Stop staring at him like a show pony, you’re making it worse.”

Poor Xie Lian looks like he might faint at any moment—and Hua Cheng’s ego doesn’t need the boost of watching them panic.

“But he—! He can’t just—!”

“We’ll talk more later,” Xie Lian mutters frantically, waving his fingers—summoning Ruoye to wrap around his neck, hiding the evidence from the night before. “San Lang has a busy day—lots of things to catch up on—thank you for stopping by!”

“So—what, we’re not gonna talk about—?”

“Give it a rest, Feng Xin,” Mu Qing sighs, tugging on his sleeve. “I doubt his highness is going to pay attention to anyone else for the next month anyway.”

“…Who’s side are you on?! Am I the only one who remembers that the last time we tried to talk things out, he punched you in the face?!"

Mu Qing wouldn't call that 'talking things out,' they were just trying to sneak Xie Lian out of that cavern to get him away from him.

He doesn't regret that—the ghost king seemed freakishly obsessed at the time.

They just didn't realize that it was, as Xie Lian put it…mutual.

And looking back on it—the punch was the thing Mu Qing resents the least about that interaction.

Words were said that certainly crossed a line—on both sides—and now that Feng Xin has context …

He obviously isn't as forgiving of it either.

But Mu Qing can't say he hasn't said worse when pushed—and they'll have time to talk about it.

Later.

Now, when a white robed figure walks across the central plains—he does not go alone.

A young man walks by his side, one in crimson robes, tilting an umbrella over his head to shield him from the sun.

And everywhere they step, orchids grow.

The ghost king occasionally steps, bending over to pluck one of the white blooms, tucking them into the prince's hair—stealing a kiss every time.

And every time, Xie Lian tilts his face up, leaning onto the tips of his toes to reach him.

The path isn't long—and they don't rush, though Hua Cheng's leisurely pace is less from a lack of urgency, and more to give someone else the chance to notice his approach.

And when a rush of autumn leaves blows past—a small smile grows across his face.

A pair of eyes peer out from around the corner of a nearby oak—cautious, almost as though he's terrified to look and be wrong—

But when Crimson Rain turns to meet his gaze, it only takes a moment for him to start running.

In the year since he left, Ren Song has spent nearly all of that time in his adult form. Occasionally turning small on the nights he visited Puqi Shrine, wriggling his way into Xie Lian's arms before he fell asleep.

But by the time he reaches Hua Cheng now—

Shuo doesn't care about growing up. He doesn't care about looking stronger or braver than he is.

All he can think about, when he jumps into the ghost king's arms, is that his family is back.

All of his family.

"You—" Xie Lian's heart almost breaks for him when he hears the ghost weep, small arms clinging around Hua Cheng's neck. "You came back!"

Xie Lian told him that a million times, that he always comes back, but —

This was Shuo's first time losing him. Being alone.

He had Lang Qianqiu. He had Guzi. He had Xie Lian. He mended things with Blackwater—and even formed a tentative friendship with Xie Lian's attendants.

(Who hates being called that.)

But the one constant that he always had—Hua Cheng—was gone.

And now...he can't make himself stop crying. Wiping bloody tears on his sleeve, not caring.

"You—you can't ever do that again!" He snaps, hugging him tighter. "D-Dianxia missed you so much and he was scared and he didn't know what to do and it was lonely—”

Xie Lian nods sagely, not disputing a single word—perfectly willing to let the youngest calamity say it was just him in order to save face—and Hua Cheng holds the boy close, resting his chin on top of his head.

"He won't lose me. Not ever again."

Now, he cries harder.

An ancient ghost, one who now holds immense power—but none of that really matters.

No matter how old you are, no matter how much you change—you're always small in the hands that raised you.

"...I had the chance to speak with Blackwater in the array this morning."

Shuo grows still, listening to the low, stern tone in Hua Cheng's voice.

"He told me what you did."

And that, for a time, he was gone.

That Hua Cheng could have lost his last—

That's when Shuo notices how tightly he's being held—almost painfully.

Hua Cheng's protective nature is always limited when it comes to Xie Lian--because he's always been above him. Never even equals in Hua Cheng's mind. He can't make demands of him, only plead with him.

In Shuo's case, however, there are no such reservations.

"You are never doing that again," he hisses. "Understood?"

Shuo leans back, wiping his eyes with his sleeve, sniffling. "But if I hadn't, you would have been—”

A low snarl makes him shrink, nodding in agreement.

"Fine, fine, not doing it again! Don't be such a—!"

But when he sees the look on Crimson Rain's face, he grows silent.

Because he's never seen Hua Cheng look...not quite afraid, but close to it.

Pained.

"...I won't," he promises, quieter this time—and he's pulled into another tight hug.

They'll return to Ghost City soon—and the entire Ghost Realm will break out in a celebration like no other—but for now, it's just them.

And when Hua Cheng speaks again, his voice is softer, and he says something that leaves Shuo frozen, his mind blank with shock.

"I'm proud of you."

As frightened and angry as he was, learning what Shuo had done—it was brave. There's a chance it bought time that saved them all.

And when Hua Cheng remembers a frightened little boy, crying out for help on Mount Tonglu—

He's so proud.

"..." Shuo's eyes well up again before he buries his face in the front of Hua Cheng's robes, arms clinging tightly around his neck, mumbling the words—

"I'm proud of you too."

And there's something else. One word tacked on timidly, almost as if he thinks it's safer to say it quietly, half muffled, to the point where Hua Cheng barely has a chance at hearing it.

Something Hua Cheng never expected to hear, after the brief, miserable life the boy lived.

'Baba.'

It's not something he'll ever say at full volume, he'll never have the nerve.

But it's a cautious offering of something he was always too nervous to ask for. And now, instead of rejection...

Hua Cheng holds him tighter.

And when he answers to it, simply saying—

"I know."

The void that has always existed in Shuo's life—one that he was always too afraid to fill...finally seems to disappear.

He doesn't lift his head from Hua Cheng's chest, reaching one hand out—and when Xie Lian takes it, stepping close to hug the other side of him...

The ghost realizes quietly, to himself, that this is what it was always supposed to feel like.

Wanted. Safe.

Never alone.

Xie Lian leans his head against Hua Cheng's shoulder, holding both of them in his arms.

Thinking of how it's almost hard to believe that the ghost king never knew his father.

Because being one seems to come to him so naturally.

The gates of Ghost City await them, and a man feared from one end of the globe to the other is welcomed like a returning hero. To screams and cheers of euphoria, celebrations breaking out all over the ghost realm.

(And in the mortal realm, too.)

But even now, in a time of celebration—he can't stay.

There's someone else that's been waiting for him for far, far too long.

The journey is far quicker than their last—as simple as a roll of the dice.

This used to be such a lonely place.

An enormous glass box, built by a cruel, lonely child, to hold a butterfly.

He could never stand the thought of her flying away.

But not anymore.

Journeys end in reunions—and she’s been waiting for so long.

And now, she’s not alone.

Held in the arms of the only man who loved her selflessly.

The oldest spirit left in this world, holding on valiantly—but growing weaker with every second that passes, butterflies drifting around them sluggishly.

Mei Nianqing's fingers brush through her hair, just as they did when she was a girl. Young, too shy to admit her feelings for her Shizun ran deeper than she could ever say.

"…How are you still as beautiful as the day we met?" He whispers. "That doesn't seem fair."

Everything else withers in decay—but not her.

She is beautiful in death. Love that endures through sorrow.

And for two thousand years, he watched over their descendants.

For two thousand years, he fought to find a way to the Kiln.

To her.

And when she was free—he was there.

There to show her the mountains again. The sunrise over the sea. To share the memories of their son, what he built, and the legacy of his descendants.

But as her strength began to wane—she wanted to come back here.

To where her sons were born. Where two of them were buried.

"Liar…" She whispers, smiling as she turns her cheek into his palm.

Hair streaked with gray. Laugh lines around her mouth that weren't there the year before.

But he still loves her the same.

He only wishes his body could show the wear of time. That he could fade with her.

There are so many things Tonglu Hudie never got to be. So many dreams that were stolen from her too soon.

But she gets to have one;

Passing on from this life surrounded by the ones she loves.

There’s a gold flash in the corner of her eye—and her smile trembles.

One hand reaches out, weak, frail.

Ghosts need resentment to linger—or something precious to hold onto.

Hudie has no hatred left in her heart—and her sons have already passed on. Except for…

“…My boys…” she whispers, eyes full when they kneel beside her.

San Lang and He Sheng.

Both have grown so much in the time since she met them. From bitter, lost souls, into men who can hold their heads high.

He Sheng brought his son, barely old enough to crawl—to meet the closest thing he’ll ever have to a grandmother.

When Hua Cheng watches her holding He Bai in her arms, eyes bittersweet and far away—he knows who she’s remembering.

But there’s no room for sadness now.

Not when she sees Bolin in Xie Lian’s face.

Or the newfound peace in Ren Song’s eyes when he hugs her goodbye.

There's nothing like the passing of a ghost. A lingering presence finally letting go in a final sigh.

No funeral rites. No desperate pleas for a soul to hold on longer than it wishes.

There's only fondness, gratitude, and bittersweet goodbyes.

Even her ashes have long since found their final rest, a golden ring that has sat on the hand of the man she loves as kingdoms rose and fell, as all memory of who they were and what they became faded into ash.

Where her remains rest, he'll rest with them.

She shares a whispered conversation with the Crown Prince of Xianle, their heads tilted close together.

And when he pulls back—she sees flowers growing through the ashes around them.

The same flowers that filled a garden planted for her, when she was young.

Hudie smiles faintly, sharing one last kiss with Mei Nianqing as the guoshi tucks those very same flowers into her hair—a crown finer than any she wore in her mortal life.

And then, it's time.

It ends the way she always knew it would—ever since the day they met.

She's lifted into a familiar pair of arms, too weak to make the final steps on her own.

Shares one final look with He Sheng, and the little boy in his arms.

Remembering the sons she once held.

Clack!

Clack!

They were always meant to end up here.

A mother fading in the arms of her favorite child.

Frail fingers press against a ghost king's cheek.

"You...aren't supposed to cry when you win, boy." She whispers.

At first, Crimson Rain cannot bring himself to speak.

He's lost a mother before. Known the helpless grief that comes from having no power to protect those you love. To only watch them suffer and wither in front of you.

But now, with all of the power in the world, it's even harder to let the people you love go—knowing it's best.

Kneeling before a red door in a dark hall, holding her palm against his cheek, two tears of blood slipping down his chin.

And now, he can give her one last gift. Ease one final hurt, before the end.

"...You deserve to follow your children," he murmurs. "All three."

Her eyes widen slightly against the darkness, wraith butterflies reflecting in her irises. "A...all...of them?"

San Lang fell to the volcano. Bolin lived a long, peaceful life. But—

"Zhang Wei's soul wasn't destroyed," Hua Cheng tells her quietly. "He was able to pass on."

And just like that, her eyes fill with tears, lips trembling.

Remembering that first pain, one that haunted her like no other—a theft that left a void inside of her for the rest of her days.

The fact that he was stolen. Not missing, not lost—just gone .

"How...do you...?"

There are some mysteries that humans will never know. Recognizing souls between lives has always been one of them.

But the Kiln is the place where all souls are rendered bare, and lines between them become blurred.

"I've seen him. Who he'll become. He's not gone."

Part of her must have always known. Dreaming of a boy in the garden, playing a flute—lulling her into peaceful sleep throughout the centuries, waiting to be free.

Hudie's lips tremble, her hand tightening against Hua Cheng's cheek.

"...Then I'll find him again," she whispers.

No matter what she has to do. Who she becomes.

She was able to give all of her sons something. Raising San Lang with all of the love she had left to give. Letting Bolin go, when he had a chance for a better life.

But Zhang Wei, her first, her sweetest...

He was taken from her before she could.

Hua Cheng knows that humans have little control over their next lives. That you can only live this one as well as you can. And hold on long after, if something precious remains.

He knows that—but he believes her.

"...I'm sorry," he finally whispers—her eyes drifting up towards him, surprised.

"...Sorry?"

"I wasn't a good son," he explains, eyes brimming. "I always made trouble."

Her form flickers, and her laugh is weak—but affectionate.

“Y...you were perfect...” she reassures him. “It...It was the best trouble of my life.”

Hua Cheng falls silent, his cheek resting against her head.

She watches the butterflies drifting around them—old and new, a mother's and son's, here at the end of all things.

Beautiful.

And Zhao Beitong is so, so proud.

Rebirth is a terrifying process.

The action of a host being ripped apart in order to be forged into something new. An inherently violent cycle—but you never fear the creature that will spring forth.

Because it has always been a part of you.

"...Thank you, San Lang," she whispers.

The name she gave him when he didn't have one. When he was powerless, she gave him strength.

When he was lost, she gave him a mother.

And when she did, he made a promise—

That he would set her free.

A promise made—and a promise kept.

Hua Cheng watches as her form fades, butterfly wings rushing past him—until only one wraith butterfly remains.

Not silver anymore—but burning gold.

Resting on his forehead for one final moment, before flying through an open door.

There are so many things that he could thank her for. Things she taught him that could have been lost to time.

How terrifying and destructive love can be.

That you can love someone selfishly, as long as you don't cage them in.

That you love the man, not the name he carries.

He clasps his hands together as the door slams shut.

There is only one man he will ever kneel for—but he has always bowed before his teachers.

She was his first, and his last—and now he bends deeply in one final show of respect.

Taking up the mantle she once carried—and in many ways has carried since they met.

She forged the first calamities—and he will forge the last.

A forge master. A god of fire and death.

Bound to this existence by love and love alone.

"Thank you, Guoshi Tonglu."

Nearly a thousand years after their kingdom fell, a master is reunited with his students.

Leaning heavily on Feng Xin as they walk through the new Heavenly Capital.

The streets that used to be their home.

"You three…have grown up so much…" He murmurs.

Far from the three lost teenagers he knew so many years before. Naive, argumentative, and cynical respectively.

Now three fully fledged gods in their own right—who accomplished far more than he ever could.

"Circumstances will make that happen," Mu Qing mutters.

Mei Nianqing takes the tone in stride, glancing up at Feng Xin as he's led through the street. "I hear you two have a child now."

That makes both of his former students go red around the ears.

"It's HIS kid, I just—!"

"—he just helps out, dammit!

Cuo Cuo, now known around the Heavens as Xiao Feng, has called out for Mu Qing in the same way as he does for his mother at least three times in Xie Lian's presence alone—but the prince doesn't see fit to contradict them.

"Well—I'm sure the boy is well looked after."

Most of the palaces in the new capital are recent constructions—but one is a renovated ruin. Far more ancient in its architecture than the others.

But when Xie Lian trails his fingertips against the wall, he remembers running through this hall with Feng Xin on his heels.

His mother shouting for him to slow down. Pretending to sword fight on the balconies—reading books with Mu Qing on the terraces.

Listening to lectures from his Guoshi all afternoon long, falling asleep sometimes—and never being scolded for it.

For so long, Xie Lian wished he could have made memories with Hong'er here, before everything became so...

And now, in a quiet, happy realization...he understands that he can.

They reach the terrace outside of the apartments that once belonged to their Guoshi, helping him sit.

He leans against the wall, head tilted back to watch the beginnings of the sunset, the sky burning soft shades of gold and red.

Slowly spinning the ring on his finger.

When Mu Qing and Feng Xin make to leave—he holds up one hand, stopping them in their tracks.

"I have something to say to each of you," he murmurs. Words that should have been sooner, but now is still better than never.

"Feng Xin—you performed with distinction, and have served this family with honor like none other. From the bottom of my heart—thank you."

Before, Feng Xin would have found receiving such a thanks from a guoshi on behalf of the royal family...odd, and more of an empty gesture.

But now, knowing the truth of the Xie family's ancestry...

He finds himself choked up—barely able to nod in acknowledgement.

Mu Qing doesn't speak, his arms crossed over his chest.

He can sense that there's some desire for closure. To make amends, but...

When Mei Nianqing turns his gaze towards him—he has the same reluctant air.

The last time they parted—it wasn't on the best of terms. Even if Mu Qing can't exactly remember being on good terms with him to begin with.

The Guoshi of Xianle always made him feel like he didn't know his place. Like he was lucky just to be there, and shouldn't complain.

He was never praised. Never encouraged. He was able to sit, listen, and learn—but he was never entirely welcome.

And even now, Mei Nianqing’s words aren’t glowing.

“I never thought you’d amount to much,” he admits. “I always thought that personality would get in your way.”

Feng Xin’s hackles raise momentarily. They still bicker constantly, but he doesn't tolerate listening to anyone else complain about Mu Qing anymore.

Mu Qing is just as offended—but in part, he doesn't disagree.

His personality got in his way so many times.

"…And then you made a fool out of me," Mei Nianqing admits, looking him over with an emotion that Mu Qing never expected to see from him:

Respect.

"I'm sure that must please you."

A servant, son of a kitchen hand and an executed criminal—

And now, a respected martial god.

Not only that—but one who came closer to anyone other than Xie Lian to actually outmatching Jun Wu with a blade.

Mu Qing watches him for a moment, then shrugs.

"I stopped placing value in what old men think of me centuries ago."

With little else to say, he leaves—flicking his hair back over his shoulder as Feng Xin goes to follow him after a moment of hesitation—

And Xie Lian sighs, left alone with him on the balcony.

"You didn't have to say it like that, Guoshi."

"He wouldn't have thought the compliment was sincere if I wasn't mildly insulting at the same time," Mei Nianqing shrugs. "He's far quicker to believe praise that comes begrudgingly."

He isn't wrong—but it surprises Xie Lian that he put so much thought into such a small matter.

"…Is that why you were hard on him back then?" He raises his eyebrows, almost pleasantly surprised—

But his teacher shakes his head, reaching for the flask on his hip.

"No. I just…" he closes his eyes for a moment. "Saw shadows of him around every corner."

He doesn't claim to be fair, or rational—and Xie Lian can see what he means.

Mei Nianqing knew an underprivileged child who grew close to a prince once, too.

And he watched as that boy grew, destroying everything he ever loved.

"…And he wasn't the only child I did wrong by."

Xie Lian doesn't need to ask who he's referring to.

The boy who he stated should have had one of his senses sealed for falling from the city walls during the parade.

The child he claimed was cursed, sending him from Mount Taicang.

A day hadn't gone by without Xie Lian wondering how things couldn't have been different, if he had stayed.

If he could have protected him more. If they could have suffered less.

"…I don't know how…or when," his Guoshi frowns.

"But that wheel we were trapped in, in Wuyong…it began rolling again. But I wasn't the one being crushed by it."

He was the one pushing it down the hill.

A cycle he was never able to break.

But now…it's over.

Instead of being crushed underneath the wheel, someone dug their heels in. Bearing the weight on his shoulders in order to stop it.

And it never should have been his responsibility.

"…You're nothing like him, you know."

If Xie Lian can offer him any comfort—he can offer him that.

Mei Nianqing had his own flaws and failings—some greater than others—

But he isn't Jun Wu. He isn't responsible for Jun Wu, either.

"…I know," he agrees softly.

Part of him wishes he could be more like his student.

Someone who, when faced with two men dying of thirst and one glass of water, would try to save them both.

And it infuriated Mei Nianqing once—because that would mean pouring water from his own cup.

That he would have nothing left for the next person who needed him. That it would be a waste, and it would be in vain.

But that willingness to put everything on the line…

Mei Nianqing often wonders how things would have been different if he just…

"…You should go rest," he murmurs, reaching back to find Xie Lian's hand, squeezing it softly. "Or wait for him."

After being reunited so recently, every moment apart must ache.

Xie Lian doesn't let go of his hand immediately.

"I can sit with you, if you like…"

Mei Nianqing smiles faintly, shaking his head—squeezing his hand one more time before letting his own drop to the ground.

"That's alright. I used to watch the sunset like this every night. Go on—the others are waiting for you."

Xie Lian is reluctant at first—but he goes.

Allowing him to rest there, overlooking the same hills where he watched his son grow. His grandchildren, and their children. On and on.

One hand resting over his heart, a gold ring on his finger.

When they find him in the morning—he's still. Peaceful.

With a smile on his face.

He was never a god, even if he always managed to tower in the lives of those who dominated the upper court.

And when your immortality is dependent on your cultivation rather than your believers…

Surviving becomes a choice.

Though Xie Lian wouldn't call this willful surrender.

It's returning home when the battle has ended.

It reminds Xie Lian of something his father told him when he was still small, whining and begging to be carried, or held in his lap.

When his grandmother passed, he first became aware of what death meant.

Xie Lian barely remembers her now. She's become a kind face in the furthest recesses of his memory. But back then…he was suddenly painfully aware of the fact that life was a story with a definitive ending.

And that terrified him as a little boy.

The thought that one day, he just wouldn't exist anymore. That his mother and father might die one day.

(Painfully sooner than he ever could have guessed.)

He couldn't bear the thought of losing someone he loved.

As such, when he was six years old, he went to his father, his favorite person in the world at the time, and made what he thought was a perfectly reasonable request:

Xie Lian asked him to never die.

And it was the first time the King ever told him no.

It frustrated him, pushed the little prince to the verge of a panicked tantrum, full of tears—

But his father held him close, telling him that there was nothing to be afraid of.

That death is the only universal destination among human beings.

And when you reach that point—you won't be among strangers.

No one is ever really gone—it's more like they're waiting in the next room, and all one must do is wait for their turn to go through the door.

While that might have soothed Xie Lian's fears of losing his loved ones—it did nothing to resolve himself to the idea of his own eventual death.

And that was when his father told him about what their family once was;

Descendants of warriors. Defenders of the central plains.

That if Xie Lian was brave, if he grew to become strong, like they were—death was nothing to fear.

A man who lived honorably and fiercely would meet death with a hero's welcome.

And now, laying the last blood relative of his family to rest—

Xie Lian hopes that's true.

He's cremated on a traditional pyre, his final students standing sentry over his final rites.

A funeral that, for once, isn't a heartbreaking affair.

And when it's finished, his ashes are laid to rest in the family mausoleum—

Next to the love of his life, and their son.

Xie Lian realizes then, sealing the tomb--that Mei Nianqing is the last man that will ever be buried in this place.

Even if the crown prince eventually leaves this earth—as far as he's concerned, the time the Xie name, all that it meant, and all the history it held...has passed

His blood relatives are gone—and even if Xie Lian intended to have children of his own at any point…he wouldn't want them to have his family name.

He isn't ashamed of where he came from, but…

Some legacies don’t need to be passed on, even with love and good intentions.

If you lay them to rest, and let them go…

You leave room for new legacies to form. New stories to be told.

When Xie Lian returns from the family catacombs, he finds a familiar face sitting on the front steps, scratching Hong Li behind the ears,

They don't need to exchange words before they embrace one another, Hua Cheng's arms wrapping around his waist when Xie Lian comes to stand on the steps in front of him, pulling him in.

He leans his head against Hua Cheng's shoulder, hugging him tightly.

"...I know saying goodbye to her must have been difficult for you," he murmurs, fingers tangling in long locks of raven hair. "I'm sorry."

Hua Cheng is quiet for a moment, aware of where Xie Lian has come from, and what happened the night before.

But he can't bring himself to offer the same words of remorse. He feels sympathy for his god's loss of a mentor. Would do anything to spare Xie Lian from any source of pain—

And even still, he can't say he's sorry that Mei Nianqing followed Hudie into the afterlife.

Better for her, and...

With every ounce of love he carries for his prince, he's also aware of the fact that they are not the same. He isn't capable of the same kind of grace.

And there are certain things that he does not have the capacity to forgive.

Eventually, his lips press to the side of Xie Lian's head—arms holding him even closer, somehow.

"It's not so hard when moving on is what that person wants," he explains gently.

A reminder that makes Xie Lian press his face into the ghost king's throat, remembering his words;

'I pray to never rest in peace.'

A promise that dispels the fears of a man who was once a little boy, terrified of losing the ones he loved.

Because death might be the only universal destination—but it doesn't always mean parting ways.

He leans back, pulling him in for the softest kiss he knows how to give—an embrace that Hua Cheng leans into gratefully, palms pressed flat against the small of his back. And when they part, Xie Lian notices a gleaming light from the corner of his eye.

A lantern, hanging from the corner of the porch—a purple flame flickering beneath panes of glass. So small, it seems to be on the verge of burning out...but it never does.

"San Lang...what's that?" He asks curiously, craning his neck to get a better look.

The ghost king follows his gaze. "Oh, just a project. Gege will see when it's finished."

Xie Lian might have been curious enough to ask more—but Hua Cheng takes advantage of him craning his head, leaning forward to kiss the side of his throat, and...

Then he's distracted.

Allowing himself to be swept off to bed and kissed until he can't remember any of the woes or worries from the day before. Until he can only think to breathe through his nose, to hold onto Hua Cheng's shoulders, and whisper his name.

It isn't like the night before—there's no destination in mind when Hua Cheng touches him like this, and even though their hands wander...it finally begins to slow and soften. Until sleep finds the prince somewhere between what feels like countless kisses, lulling him to dream.

The Fire Master

Chapter Summary

Waking up in Hua Cheng's arms—kissing him awake, whispering good morning—is the first thing that Xie Lian has ever felt so desperate to get used to.

Staring into his face, memorizing new facets of him with a hungry fascination that only seems to grow the longer he looks.

A newfound habit that the ghost king dutifully endures—at least until it’s time for the day to begin.

Chapter Notes

Hello! I have officially finished writing the main story for No Paths Are Bound, so place expect more frequent updates as I edit the final portion of the story! The next time the chapter count updates (if it does), that will be the final increase!

I also plan on doing a post-word / Q & A chapter, so the actual final chapter will be second to last.

Waking up in Hua Cheng's arms—kissing him awake, whispering good morning—is the first thing that Xie Lian has ever felt so desperate to get used to.

Staring into his face, memorizing new facets of him with a hungry fascination that only seems to grow the longer he looks.

A newfound habit that the ghost king dutifully endures—at least until it’s time for the day to begin.

Xie Lian has no assignments from the Heavens for the moment—and accompanying Hua Cheng to Ghost City could never feel like a chore.

Watching as he's eagerly greeted by its ghostly citizens, looking on as he handles business here and there. None of them comment on the prince's presence either.

Almost as though seeing Xie Lian by their lord's side has become a welcome, expected sight.

There isn't much amiss—not when Ren Song took such care of the place while he was gone—but Crimson Rain's presence seems to bring back a sense of ease over the city. Becoming lively and carefree once again in his wake.

Before, Hua Cheng never would have said that Paradise Manor resembled anything like a home. In fact, he once told Xie Lian that he never viewed it that way.

But watching the prince sit on the edge of his bed, Ruoye slithering out of his hair as it falls around his shoulders...

Taking his place behind him as he carefully begins to comb it out, occasionally bowing his head and daring to press a kiss against his shoulder here and there, thrilling as Xie Lian shivers in response...

That feeling begins to change.

Realizing with slow, cautious delight, that they do get to spend every day together. Finding ease and comfort in each other's company.

And some of those days are spent exactly where they started.

Walking a country road, red maple leaves falling from trees overhead.

The god is still fond of visiting Puqi Village, helping the farmers with their work, playing with local children—and Hua Cheng would never miss the opportunity to accompany him.

As such, he's quick to take on the form that he used when he first met Xie Lian again on the ox cart, the bright-eyed teenager the locals have come to call 'Xiao Hua,' who has been away for such a long time.

But it doesn't occur to him until the villagers are greeting them that Xie Lian might have changed forms as well.

"Bolin!" One of the children cries, squeezing her arms around Xie Lian's legs. "You brought Xiao Hua back!"

That's when Hua Cheng turns to look at him again, only to find a teenager standing beside him. Wearing familiar white robes, but with red lining underneath--his hair pulled up into a high, neat ponytail.

Still perfectly beautiful, but the only sign that it's his prince is the red pearl earring glittering in his ear.

"I did promise you he would come back someday, remember?"

Hua Cheng does seem utterly fascinated by the sight of him as they go about the village together—and Xie Lian can't say that he blames him. The prince has never been prone to changing his appearance.

He never had the ability to do so when he was in exile, and when he was a beloved prince he never had the desire.

But in the last year, Xie Lian has hardly worn his own face anywhere outside of the Heavens.

Hardly felt a need to, when Hua Cheng wasn't there to see it.

And now, in moments like this—wearing a disguise is perfectly reasonable.

Not to mention the fact that there's something so...pleasant about being with Hua Cheng like this. Wondering what their lives might have been like, if they had been two teenage disciples together.

It would have been happier. There are so many ways where, if life had brought them together sooner—Xie Lian would have been grateful for it.

But that doesn't mean he isn't happy now. Working with him out in the autumn sun—taking in Hua Cheng's teenage form with his own eyes.

How handsome he is—not that different at all from his true form, just younger, leaner, with a boyish ease about him.

But his smile, and the mischievous light in his eyes are still the same.

"Gege, could you hand me that?"

It takes Hua Cheng a moment to realize that someone is speaking to him—not even lifting his head from his work until 'Bolin' repeats himself.

"Gege?" He glances up, only to find Xie Lian pointing towards one of the farming tools on the ground nearby.

"...Of course."

Xie Lian isn't aware of exactly why , but he feels a subtle change in the air as the afternoon wears on. The weight of Hua Cheng's gaze on the nape of his neck, everywhere he goes.

Pleasant, but unusually...intent. Like a fox with its eye on a rabbit.

But there’s no sign of any incoming danger—and Hua Cheng’s attention being so narrowly focused upon him is nothing new. As such, Xie Lian doesn’t pay it any mind. Not when they’re finishing in the fields, or when the children walk back to the shrine to listen to more stories.

It doesn’t occur to him to think that anything is amiss at all—not until the shrine has begun to clear out for the evening, and as the final stragglers slip back towards their homes, and Xie Lian turns to tidy a few empty baskets, he notices something.

A small white flower, left by the feet of his divine statue.

Easily missed, but not to him.

Xie Lian’s gaze softens as he reaches out to touch it, fingertips stroking over soft ivory petals, only to hear movement behind him.

“…Everyone was excited to see you again,” the comment is almost redundant. Aside from the heavens, everyone is excited to see his return in any shape and form. “They missed you when you were…”

He turns around, startled because—

When did he get so close?

“San Lang—?”

He doesn’t mean to take a step back—only in instinct, when the other man stands so close, he feels that he might fall over—

But when he bumps into the table behind them, Hua Cheng’s solution seems to be to lift him up, setting him down on top of it.

Rarely has he ever been quite so forward—not unless Xie Lian initiated first, or there was some intervening circumstance, like when they were in the forge—

But it would be dishonest of the prince to say his entire body didn’t grow warm in response.

“You—?”

“…I love your hair like this.”

Those are the first words from his lips, uttered softly as they press against his pulse, feeling it throb under his touch.

He always has. The way Xie Lian used to wear it, when he was a young prince—living in a kinder world.

"…I know," Xie Lian admits hoarsely, hands gripping the edge of the table tightly when he feels Hua Cheng's smile against his skin.

"You do?"

The god swallows hard, struggling to find his composure when every brush of breath and flesh derails his thoughts.

"…You…when you do my hair for me," Xie Lian explains faintly, fingernails scraping into the wood, "You almost always choose that style."

"…Would it be terribly presumptuous of me to ask if you wore it like that today for my benefit?"

"…It wouldn't be…" Xie Lian admits.

It's not that he often puts very much thought or effort behind his appearance—but if it's something Hua Cheng enjoys…why wouldn't he?

And any doubt he could have had about whether or not it was a good idea is silenced by the calamity's mouth against his own.

Not having to bend as far as he normally might, not with Xie Lian sitting higher than usual—and when he steps between the prince's knees, it draws a shuddering gasp.

Remembering being inside the forge. Or against a tree. Or in a coffin—

"San Lang—"

"That isn't what you called me before."

It's different, kissing him like this. In these forms, the difference in their sizes isn't so exaggerated—but his voice still feels wickedly hot and enveloping in Xie Lian's ears.

"…You mean gege?" He repeats curiously.

Is that so strange? Hua Cheng calls him the very same thing every single day.

"I thought it was reasonable, you look older than me when we're like —"

"Forgive me for interrupting, your highness—but I'm afraid I look older than you when we aren't like this, too."

Xie Lian pauses for a moment, considering.

It's not that he could have known beforehand. He didn't know what Hua Cheng's true form actually looked like—and had practically forgotten the sight of his own face.

He still doesn't make a point of observing his own countenance now—but Xie Lian knows that he hasn't aged a day in the last eight hundred years. That he still looks like a youthful prince in his early twenties.

And it's not that Hua Cheng has aged very much at all—he hasn't.

But when he always called Xie Lian 'gege' before—it made him envision someone who would look younger than him…and he doesn't.

He looks more like a man in his late twenties when he's in his true form—a detail that makes little difference to Xie Lian, but still…

It doesn't change the fact that he has a point.

"…I don't understand why that's—?"

"Say it again." He would never command—but his words certainly have an authoritative ring, even if he means them as more of a plea.

And when his teeth scrape against Xie Lian's jaw…

The prince's knees spread a little wider, silently beckoning him to press closer.

"Gege…" he barely manages to repeat the word before his mouth is stolen once more, swept up in a hungry, burning kiss.

Part of him can't stop thinking about the fact that this is still very much a shrine, one that now has frequent visitors. Someone could walk in at any moment, but—

But this feels like more, and Xie Lian wants more.

He didn’t know how to ask for it, the first night they spent together. And he’s been willing to go along with Hua Cheng’s desire to take their time every night after.

But if it feels this good—why not keep going?

They start to slowly tip backwards—until Xie Lian's back is flat against the table, with Hua Cheng hovering over him, palms flat against the wood on either side of his head as they drink each other in, and it is far too good to ever consider stopping—

Knock!

Knock!

It could be a testament to how distracted Xie Lian was that he didn't hear anyone coming until there was a knock at the door—or to Hua Cheng's equal diversion, a surprised, annoyed snarl ripping from his throat.

(One that makes Xie Lian shiver, his neck arched and bared.)

"Don't fucking start," a voice snaps from the other side of the door. "I tried calling his highness in his private array several times without an answer. You're lucky I got here before Feng Xin could show up and kick the damn door down."

Xie Lian bites back a groan.

Obviously, Feng Xin storming in would be worse. As far as he knows, Xie Lian is still intent on a path of celibacy. The prince didn’t exactly feel obligated to inform anyone other than Hua Cheng of his change of heart. But if Feng Xin walked in on that , he might…well…

It wouldn’t be the first time one of Xie Lian’s friends had made less than generous assumptions about the ghost king’s intentions.

When he sits up he realizes—rather embarrassingly—that the reason Hua Cheng hasn’t moved back has been Xie Lian’s legs firmly locked around his hips

“…Apologies, San Lang,” he unfolds his limbs carefully, unable to look him in the eye, and—

“Dianxia isn’t the one who should be apologizing,” the ghost king answers darkly. Still, he steps back—helping Xie Lian collect himself before he answers the door.

"Mu Qing," he smiles—maybe a little too brightly, in a misguided attempt to compensate for Hua Cheng glowering menacingly from just behind his shoulder. "It's so nice of you to visit."

"Since he couldn't take the hint when someone doesn't answer in their communication array..."

Xie Lian says something quietly disparaging—but there isn't enough sincerity behind it for Hua Cheng or Mu Qing to pay him any mind.

"It wasn't dianxia that I needed to get into contact with," the martial god explains, arms crossed over his chest. "It was you."

Xie Lian's eyebrows raise, but Hua Cheng doesn't seem particularly impressed.

"And why would you want to get in contact with me?"

"I don't—the Heavens do. More specifically Lord Rain Master."

"And she sent you?"

Mu Qing's eyes narrow.

"No. Initially the emperor was going to have Blackwater summon you, but he's off on a family trip with the Shi siblings and won't be returning for two days. Ren Song has been away on his own business, and as such, his highness was the easiest way to get in contact with you."

And because of that, Feng Xin and Mu Qing had been sent to fetch him together, only...

When Xie Lian didn't answer in his private array, Mu Qing correctly assumed that he was walking into a scene that Feng Xin needed to stumble upon.

"Where's Feng Xin now?" Xie Lian asks.

"I told him you were wearing a female form and to wait until I said the coast was clear," Mu Qing explains blithely, and Xie Lian is slightly mortified by being used to delay Feng Xin's arrival, but...the alternative...

"And why would the Rain Master want to speak to me?"

“She didn’t specify, but you two seemed to be on good terms when she snuck you into the Heavens before,” Mu Qing points out dryly. “So, I imagine it’s not for unpleasant reasons.”

As he comes to that conclusion, Feng Xin appears behind him in the doorway, panting.

“S-she’s gone—?” He starts, his expression melting into that of relief when he sees Xie Lian’s younger, but decisively male form.

Relief that lasts for approximately two seconds—the length of time it takes for him to notice the red marks blossoming on the prince’s jaw.

“W—WHAT WERE YOU DOING TO HER HIGHNESS—?!”

“Feng Xin…” Xie Lian hides his face in his hands, hiding his embarrassment. “I wasn’t—”

Mu Qing’s eyebrows raise. “You think they don’t do that sort of thing when he’s a man?”

“Mu Qing—” His voice is even higher pitched now, but—

“That’s DIFFERENT—!”

“How is it different?!” If Mu Qing’s eyebrows raised any higher, they would disappear into his hairline.

“Because then he would be violating an unmarried princess!”

“Do I need to remind you that you have a history of fraternizing with unmarried women?!”

“She wasn’t a princess and I OBVIOUSLY REGRET IT—!”

“I really don’t change to that form very often,” Xie Lian tries to comfort him, just as Hua Cheng speaks—

“I’m already acquainted with dianxia’s female form, there’s no point in making a fuss over it now.”

Xie Lian doesn't think that Hua Cheng is even aware of just how familiar he almost became with his female form, but he would never dare say so. Especially not now , when his face is about to burst into flames, and Feng Xin is on the verge of a stroke.

"YOU—!”

"And he's acquainted with mine, so I don't see what the problem is."

It takes Feng Xin a moment to understand what he means, his face growing deathly pale.

"You...you have a..."

Xie Lian certainly doesn't need any reminder, lifting his hand to his cheek, instinctively remembering how it felt when...

"Of course he does," Mu Qing snaps. "Any of us can if we decide to, and he changes shape more than the rest of us combined. I could turn into a—”

" Don't even start with that, I don't need to think about that today—” Feng Xin grouses, to which Mu Qing has the nerve to look slightly hurt, and Xie Lian offers,

"I think you would look very nice, Mu Qing. But I really don't see why it matters—”

"Because he doesn't actually WANT to take on a form like that, your highness," Feng Xin explains with a groan, "He's only trying to SCARE me—”

"...Are we just going to continuously gloss over how strange it is that he's terrified of an entire gender?"

Hua Cheng mutters under his breath, and Xie Lian pauses, rubbing his chin.

"I agree that it's unusual, but I don't think it would be considered so strange if he was a woman terrified of men."

"Yeah," Mu Qing tilts his head, rubbing the back of his neck. "But the power dynamics at play are different..."

"I always assumed that he had some sort of childhood trauma—”

"The Wind Master asked him once if he had been attacked by a giant pair of breasts as a child."

"Did they really?" Mu Qing's eyes brighten for the first time in any conversation with Hua Cheng, and Feng Xin finds that development horrifying.

As a matter of fact, they've been noticeably less hostile to one another since Hua Cheng's return, and the martial god loathes it.

"If there actually WAS some sort of traumatic reason, you're all being REALLY insensitive about it!" Feng Xin snaps. "Clearly he's got the message about the Rain Master—so we're going!"

"Going where?!"

"There's supposed to be an inn near here that serves wontons that taste kind of like the ones you used to like but if you'd rather fuckin' sit around here and make fun of me with that asshole then I guess you can eat them by your damn self—!"

"No," Mu Qing shakes his head quickly, allowing himself to be pulled along—a faint smile spreading across his lips. "I'll go."

Leaving Xie Lian standing in the doorway awkwardly, the blush slowly fading from his face as Hua Cheng's hands reach for his waist.

"Would dianxia like to return to Ghost City for the evening? Or Mount Taicang?"

Xie Lian's lips quirk with temptation, but...he sighs.

"Don't you think we should see why she's summoned you first?"

"Tomorrow," Hua Cheng's tone is half firm, half pleading. "It's already late—”

“It’s still afternoon,” Xie Lian points out gently. Late afternoon, but still. “Aren’t you curious about what she could want?”

In truth, he doesn’t particularly care—but Xie Lian is clearly curious, and that, regrettably, is reason enough to go.

During the previous administration, seeing the Rain Master in the Heavens was about as frequent as the sky raining frogs.

Actually, raining frogs was a more frequent event. Xie Lian would know, he inadvertently caused such an event after an incident with a few goats—

Point being, her presence used to be quite rare. But, since the beginning of the new dynasty, she’s been known to appear with more frequency.

More often than not to visit Ling Wen—but still.

Which is how they find her new palace strewn with books and manuscripts.

See, part of the conditions of Ling Wen's probation is that she isn't exactly allowed to live in luxury—but if the palace of a 'friend' she often visits just so happens to be filled with all of her favorite things… what is there to be done? It certainly isn't her fault.

Yushi Huang is aware of the fact that she's being used to flout the mechanisms of justice—but Ling Wen often leaves her feeling pleasantly used, and she never particularly minds.

Which is what leaves her stretched out on a terrace now, in a rare moment of relaxation.

Examining a book that she isn't particularly interested in, hat tilted forward to shield her eyes from the late afternoon sun—and when she feels a shadow pass over her, she snaps the tome shut.

"I see Xuan Zhen was able to reach you."

Hua Cheng smiles as fakely as possible.

"Thankfully, yes."

This was a conversation she would typically have alone, and she knows that the prince of Xianle would be happy to give them privacy—

But there's clearly no desire on Hua Cheng's part for her to do so.

"…You and I have always forged a path separate from the Heavens—and for similar reasons," The Rain Master explains calmly, her method of speaking as slow and methodical as ever. "But with the new situation, your stance may have changed."

Xie Lian glances back and forth between the two of them curiously from his seat in the corner—and Hua Cheng sighs, crossing his arms.

"I don't see how my stance would change anything. I resigned the position as soon as it was offered to me."

He did—and the Rain Master didn't fault him for it then, nor does she now.

"Yes—but...as we're all discovering in the wake of Jun Wu's death, there are many things that...he allowed us to believe he had control over. But as it turns out—that isn't true."

The Rain Master sets her book aside, uncrossing her ankles as she sits up.

"Things have moved quickly recently. It's...left one with little time to think. But Jun Wu would not have appointed He Xuan as Water Master, or accepted him into the Heavenly Court. Not willingly."

Hua Cheng has thought about that himself—but, like she said, there wasn't exactly time in the events that followed to do anything more than ponder it.

But in the year that followed, Yushi Huang found answers.

"The Heavenly Emperor does not determine what god you will be."

Absent some interference like fate switching—a circumstance that allowed him to interfere in Shi Wudu and He Xuan's lives, along with the Wind Master's from an early stage—the type of god a person will be as immovable as their ability to ascend itself.

Xie Lian can't fathom where the conversation is going—not until she says something that makes him freeze with shock.

"Jun Wu didn't make you the Fire Master—fate did." The Rain Master concludes quietly. "And absent death or resigning the role—you still hold that title."

Hua Cheng falls silent, thinking, and Xie Lian can't help but turn his gaze toward him, eyes round with shock.

"You…ascended, San Lang?" He breathes, wracking his mind. "When?"

He doesn't answer, but makes no effort to interrupt Yushi Huang when she does so in his stead.

"Nearly eight centuries ago, a young ghost defended a group of lost humans on the hills of Mount Tonglu. He could have used their souls to forge a weapon to protect himself, but instead…he used his own eye."

Xie Lian's gaze is drawn to the dark leather eyepatch on his face.

For a man who makes it so clear that he never intended to play the part of a hero…

It’s one of the most heroic things that Xie Lian has ever heard.

“…Does anyone else know?” Hua Cheng murmurs, his arms still tightly crossed over his chest.

"I didn't see a reason to inform the emperor until I knew where you stood upon the matter," Yushi Huang shrugs. "And if you wish to continue to live separately from the court, no one ever needs to know."

Hua Cheng has always had a...complex relationship with the concept of divinity.

He's only ever acknowledged or prayed to one god—despite his mother's efforts, when he was a small child—and even now, so many years after he spoke down to thirty three officials in battle...

His perspective on the gods remains the same.

Ascension might be a matter of chance—but not everyone who has the opportunity to ascend will do so. That's a matter of which path you choose to walk.

But ascension isn't the only thing that makes one worthy of being a god.

Gods should embody what they teach. And while Hua Cheng has never wanted nor felt entitled to anything in return for his prayers to his own god—he does believe that gods should care about the world around them, and those who worship them.

And he doesn't.

Or maybe that's the wrong way to phrase it—he doesn't care enough .

Hua Cheng cares about the world because he still has someone precious in it. And that precious person loves this world, and everyone in it.

That is worship—but does it make him worthy of being worshipped?

Does he have any interest in participating in a system that has treated his love so poorly? One that he's always scorned?

Jun Wu is gone. Xie Lian is very clearly near the top of that system now. But he can't just forget what happened before.

...Can he?

"...I'm surprised any lingering godhood didn't fade over the years," he mutters. "No one has been worshipping a fire master all this time."

It's true. And while children might have been praying to him all this time...that was for Crimson Rain Sought Flower.

They didn't even know it was a god that they were praying to. Could that still count?

But from the way that Yushi Huang is staring at him...apparently it does.

Part of him wishes that he knew Xie Lian's opinion on the matter—even if the prince would never tell him what to do.

But on the other hand—Hua Cheng can see how Xie Lian would benefit from him taking on the title.

If he was a god , then no one in the Heavens would have reason to reproach Xie Lian about their relationship. The prince wouldn't want him to agree for such reasons, but...

It's a valid item to place in the 'pro' column. And...

When he glances to the side, he notices that Xie Lian doesn't seem anxious, waiting for his answer. As though he's at peace with whatever the Ghost King chooses.

Then, in a moment of sudden clarity—he knows what he wants.

"If you're telling me that title came to me by my own will—then I have no intention of relinquishing it." Hua Cheng replies calmly.

Not yet, anyhow.

(He will later, when he has a successor—and a new title that he likes far better.)

"...But I have no intention of recognizing any emperor."

He didn't before—and he won't now. He's held the role of king in the ghost realm long enough to have earned the right to not kneel unless he chooses to.

And there is only one he chooses to be ruled by.

"And any assistance I give, or role I play will be decided by myself."

With the tacit understanding that he would obviously help if Xie Lian was in danger, or if the prince asked him to—but the latter is highly unlikely.

"That's fine by me," Yushi Huang agrees breezily. She's always been notoriously gentle natured—but even Xie Lian is surprised by her easy acquiescence. "We haven't been this close to a full host of elemental masters since my ascension—and I suspect we'll have a new earth master before the century's out."

"Does it really matter if the roster is full?" Hua Cheng asks blithely, and she nods with surprising seriousness.

"Balance in the three realms is conducive to peace. The world functions best when there are four cardinal gods, five elemental masters, four great tales, and—"

"Four calamities." Hua Cheng recalls quietly, remembering his unspoken promise to Zhao Beitong.

Three calamities remain now, after Bai Wuxiang's death—slain by Hua Cheng's own hand, and pushed into the next life under Xie Lian's gentle guidance.

There will be another.

"I'll inform the emperor of your position—and your decision," Yushi Huang smiles mildly—as though this was a perfectly normal conversation, just another chore to tick off of a to-do list at the end of the day. "Thank you for meeting with me, Lord Fire Master."

Hua Cheng makes a face, his smile growing thin.

"I still prefer Crimson Rain Sought Flower."

With that, he returns to Xie Lian's side—and while he makes no attempt to drag him out, the prince can sense that he wishes to leave, standing up to follow.

He doesn't speak until they've left the new capital behind, holding Hua Cheng's arm as he rattles the dice to take them back to Ghost City—but once they're alone in the halls of Paradise Manor, he reaches up to touch the patch over the calamity's right eye.

Hua Cheng pauses, slightly surprised. Xie Lian rarely touches him there—probably because he assumes that the ghost king is sensitive about it. And he is , but...not when it's him.

"...When I asked you how you lost this, you said it was over something stupid," he murmurs.

"It was," Hua Cheng agrees instantaneously.

"San Lang..."

"I almost never saw you again," he recalls, his voice low and tense with guilt. Recalling that final moment, when his soul was on the verge of tearing apart. And instead of saving himself, to find Xie Lian again...

He chose to protect strangers, instead.

And what if he had failed? What if he had been destroyed, and Xie Lian still had to face all of those challenges, eight hundred years later? What would Jun Wu have done to him? Would he have been shackled forever?

It's one moment in his life that has always stood apart as a definitive marker of his own humanity.

And yet it also stands starkly separate from all of his choices—because it's the one he has always remained conflicted about.

Because, by his view, it was so stupid .

Xie Lian hums for a moment, his fingertips trailing down over Hua Cheng's cheek, then to his jaw—guiding the calamity to look down and meet his gaze.

And Hua Cheng's mind grows blank, because—

His god looks so proud .

"I don't think it was stupid at all."

Not of his ascension—even if Xie Lian had known from the very beginning that Hong'er had it in him to do so—but of his actions.

"You were always going to make it back to me," Xie Lian reminds him gently, his arms sliding around his neck. "You always come back."

For a man so ambivalent to his own godhood—he certainly has a way of inspiring faith.

And he shouldn't regret, or doubt himself for being the person that Xie Lian has always known him to be.

His handsome, brave San Lang.

He just wishes everyone else could see him so clearly.

Others will, over time. Never so deeply or openly as Xie Lian does. But the claws and thorns that shroud him from others will recede for some, even if only a limited few.

As the ghost king falls in love with the world through his beloved's eyes.

It's too early for bed—but never too late in the day for Hua Cheng to stretch out on a couch beside him, carefully feeding him bits of fruit—which Xie Lian dutifully accepts—watching a pink tongue dart out to lick up any escaping juice.

He's gained weight.

Not so much that it's entirely noticeable to anyone who looks at him—but his cheeks aren't as hollowed as they were before. And, if you get the chance to see beneath his robes, as Hua Cheng has in the last few days...

His bones don't jut out anymore.

Most noticeably along his rib cage and spine, though Hua Cheng hasn't dared to examine him too closely without his robes to know exactly how much his body has changed, but...

It shows he was trying , in the last year.

And that thought warms a long unbeating heart.

"...San Lang, why do you think they weren't able to get a hold of Ren Song in order to reach you?" Xie Lian eventually asks, delicately chewing a slice of peach. "I just realized I haven't heard from him since we left the Kiln. Do you think he's alright?"

"Oh, he's fine."

Hua Cheng assures him with ease. "He's been bound to Ghost City in my absence, looking after things for me. But now that he's a calamity in his own right, he needs to forge his own domain."

Even if Hua Cheng suspects he'll take after Blackwater and use it relatively rarely.

But if Guzi is going to be in his care for the rest of the boy's childhood—it might be good for him to have a home that isn't in Ghost City or the Heavens. Something a little close to normalcy, since he's a mortal child.

“And that's where he is now?”

Hua Cheng hums in agreement. “I've spoken to him since he left. He won't be gone too long.”

He says this as if it's all to reassure Xie Lian—and he wasn't the one who reached out to check on him to begin with.

Xie Lian knows he's right.

Home has a way of finding you.

There's a rumor forming, deep in the cultivation world. Born from the lips of a god himself.

The major sects view it as a matter of academic fascination. A story that will one day fade into myth and become lost.

But in the smaller villages, the tale is fresh—and it breeds paranoia.

“YOU CAN'T HIDE IN THE BRUSH, MONGREL!” A voice booms through the trees, echoed by the barks of hunting dogs and other men through the village, hacking through the underbrush. “BEST COME OUT NOW!”

She can't breathe.

If she does, they'll find her.

If they find her, they'll hurt her.

That's what her mother said. And her mother won't be able to stop them this time.

Oh, but she wants to cry, wants to scream as she listens to them coming closer.

She can't stay still.

She's bleeding. The dogs will catch the smell of it, and when they do, they'll find her.

When they find her, they'll hurt her.

But if she runs, she'll breathe. And if she breathes, they'll—

The sound of a snapping twig nearby sends her staggering out from her hiding place.

Scrambling through the dirt, rocks and twigs cutting into the bare soles of her feet as she desperately tries to climb the mountainside faster than her pursuers.

The men who used to be her neighbors.

Some called her cousin, not so long ago—when her parents still lived.

Maybe they never would have looked at her the way they did, if her father hadn't gotten sick. Then her mother. If the harvest this year had not failed.

Maybe then, they wouldn't have whispered the word 'cursed' behind their hands, and looked at her as though she were a beast.

She is not old enough to understand why the people who had once embraced her turned to loathe her so quickly. With an ease that frightens her almost as much as the hounds.

How every illness, death, and misfortune became her crime to be punished for.

But today, the magistrate's favorite concubine fell into the river and drowned.

Today, the village decided that they'd had enough.

Today, they had to kill her.

Water splashes loudly as she staggers through the river, unable to reach the bottom, paddling clumsily.

She knows the noise will only draw them faster—but there's nowhere else to run. Like a fox chased up a tree, she has no choice.

Coughing and shivering when she somehow reaches the opposite bank, slipping in the mud as she struggles up the hill—

Thud!

A rock bounces sharply off of the back of her head, skin splitting, blood pouring down the nape of her neck as she falls to her knees with a pained sob.

"P…please…!" She sobs, nails ripping as she climbs the embankment.

"DON'T LISTEN TO IT!" The magistrate shouts. "IT PRETENDS TO WEAR THE SKIN OF A LITTLE GIRL, BUT IT'S A DEMON!"

She is no such thing.

She's frightened of snakes, she does not like spicy foods, and cries when she gets angry. Her mother once said she was too shy, and she needed to try harder to make friends.

No one wants to be her friend now, no matter how shy she might be.

Because of something that was innocuous, a few months ago—something that only made her unique.

She was born during the totality of an eclipse.

And the features that were once considered a rare medical condition—unusually fair skin, white hair, and light-colored eyes (and the poor vision that came with them)—were suddenly viewed as deformities.

Demon marks, they said.

Proof that she was cursed.

That she would end the world.

(And it's always the paranoia that makes people forget the less dire aspects of that story.)

Her head aches and pounds as she struggles fruitlessly, the knowledge coursing through her, cold as ice—

She can't get away.

There is no escape.

She is going to die. It's going to hurt. She cannot stop it. And she's scared, scared, so scared—

And with little other options, she frantically tries to pray.

First to Nan Yang and Xuan Zhen. This is their territory, and they are the gods her parents prayed to, but—

She doesn't have anything to offer, and asking for something from a martial god without even burning incense in return is rude.

She cannot do that.

But who else can she pray to?

The child stumbles into the forest clearing, shivering, bleeding, and filthy.

"H…Hua Chengzhu…" She croaks, teeth chattering, knees knocking together as she struggles with the last of her strength, tears carving tracks through the filth on her cheeks. "I…I'm s-sorry I don't have…a lantern…p…please help me…!"

CRACK!

She feels pain. Sharp, searing pain, unlike anything she's ever felt before—tearing into her left leg.

A shocked scream falls from her throat as she falls to the ground, looking down to see her ankle caught in a hunting snare—one with long spikes, meant for wolves and bears.

She sobs, too frightened to move, afraid she might rip her entire limb off if she does—but they—they're—

"Hua Chengzhu helps abused children," one of her pursuers sneers, leveling his bow with her chest. "Not monsters."

"DON'T—!"

"ROAAAAAAR!"

A thunderous bellow rips through the forest—that of a ferocious beast—and like the men chasing her, all she can do is cower, throwing her arms around her head, shrinking on the ground.

“WHAT FOUL CREATURE HAS IT SUMMONED TO IT’S AID?!”

Her…aid…?

She cracks one eyelid open, vision swimming, only to see something shaped like a bear, but it’s far too big.

What…?

But it stands over her, fangs bared, snarling at the men who approach.

And now, a new voice appears among the crowd.

“There are much more frightening things in the woods than scared little girls, I assure you.”

They look around for the newcomer—only to see a pair of eyes gleaming through the leaves.

One brilliantly green, the other burning like a forest fire.

“…This doesn’t concern you!” The magistrate shouts, not even knowing that with which he speaks. “This creature is not worthy of pity or sympathy, I assure you!”

“What if it summoned another demon to help it—?”

“Then I suppose it’s already too late for you.”

She doesn’t actually see anything happen. Only hears the rattling of the tree boughs, a rush of wind—screams, then…nothing.

But the next pair of hands that find her don’t hurt her.

They’re gentle, carefully releasing the snare around her ankle.

And when they brush against bleeding, torn flesh…the pain seems to melt away, followed with a feeling of warmth slowly blossoming in her chest.

“Where are your parents, little one?”

“…Gone,” she whispers, lips dry and cracked.

"And your home?"

"Don't have one," her voice shakes, eyes stinging with tears. "I'm lost."

Her savior happens to know that feeling all too well.

He was a lost child on a mountain once. Without parents or a home to return to.

"No," he corrects her gently. "You're not lost. I found you."

She feels herself being lifted up into his arms, but, for the first time in so long…

It feels safe.

"What's your name, little one?"

"…Sanren," she whispers, the forest folding around them in a dark embrace as he carries her away, repeating her name weakly.

"Sanren."

It's not a particularly kind thing to call a child, but…Ren Song suspects that she's forgotten her birth name, at some time or another.

Either way, she seems to genuinely believe that's what she is called.

But there are worse things in this world than cruel or false names.

There are harsher fates than being found by a ghost king on a lonely mountain, accompanied by a golden martial god.

And Guzi, much to his delight, finds that the first mortal company he's had in over a year isn't on the menu.

It's funny. After he traded in one cruel and unfeeling father for another slightly less cruel and certainly not unfeeling replacement, then lost him again—

Guzi just assumed he'd already had a second chance at a family, and he wouldn't get a third.

But sometimes chances aren't limited—and you get as many as you need.

The same could be said for another.

A small lantern, flickering from the roof eaves of a cottage on Mount Taicang. Growing brighter with every passing day. Until, finally, it's carefully moved to Ghost City.

Left flickering and rattling on a table, ghost children and butterflies flying by day after day—cracks slowly forming in the panes of glass.

And one afternoon, seemingly out of nowhere—it shatters.

The world is out of focus, hazy—and every sound has an echoing quality.

It takes him a moment to lift his head—and when he does, he finds himself in a familiar position.

Sitting behind his desk.

Well. Other than the fact that he's naked. Is this another one of those dreams? Because at this point Blackwater usually shows up and—

"Oops."

When he looks up, he finds his benefactor stretched across the desk on the opposite side of the room, dressed in the leather gear he usually uses after a night working in the forges—an apple clutched between his claws.

"I forgot the clothes don't reincorporate like the spirit."

"I…" Yin Yu swallows dryly, squinting in order to see clearly. "I thought I…?"

"Died? Yes. Rather heroically, from how Ren Song described it," Hua Cheng agrees, reaching for whatever can pass for clothes that happens to be within reach. Which, at the moment, is a black cloak.

He's slow to pull it around himself, struggling to process the reality of his situation. "H…how long—?"

"A little over a year," Hua Cheng replies evenly. "But your soul hadn't passed on when I found it, and Qi Ying has taken good care of your ashes. So, here you are."

The mention of Quan Yizhen makes him pause, the tip of his nose slightly flushed as he pulls the cloak tighter around him. "…And I wasn't even able to come back as a ghost on my own?" He murmurs, slightly morose.

Hua Cheng examines him with one raised eyebrow, arms crossed.

"Ghost fire."

"…What?"

"You were a ghost fire when I happened upon you, which is more than what happens to most souls after death." The ghost king explains curtly.

It's easy for people to forget in a place like ghost city—but most mortals don't become ghosts at all.

That doesn't seem to comfort him very much, and the ghost king adds icily—

"I came back as a ghost fire, the first time I died."

Yin Yu immediately blanches, holding his hands up apologetically.

"I-I only meant that I clearly needed your help, sir."

"That's overstating my efforts quite a bit."

All he did was stabilize him, and stop anything else from eating him. An unfortunate but common end for most low-level ghosts.

"But if you're certain, so be it."

Clack!

Clack!

A set of dice rattle around in his palm menacingly, and Yin Yu swallows hard, rocking back in his seat.

"…Sir?"

"If you think you didn't have the means to stay on your own, that must mean you're at peace. In that case, we can go to—"

"No, thank you!" He croaks.

Hua Cheng closes his fingers around the dice, a ghost of a smirk tugging at the corner of his mouth now that he's proved his own point.

"The bangs aren't bad."

Yin Yu's palms fly up to his forehead.

"I…have bangs?"

"It would seem so."

It takes him a moment to digest everything, hands tight on either side of his head.

"…Do I still have my job?"

"I didn't hire a replacement, if that's what you're asking."

That one bit of security seems to make him relax.

He doubts anyone took the time to go through his quarters either—in which case, he should still have clothes there to change into.

"…Does anyone else know that I made it back?"

"I don't plan on keeping it from his highness—and Ren Song and Blackwater are bound to find out."

There's no avoiding any of that. Hua Cheng never willingly keeps secrets from Xie Lian, and the other two calamities know the goings on of the ghost realm.

"…And no one else has to?"

"No." His confirmation is calm—indifferent even, but…

He disapproves.

He has never been the sort to meddle in the affairs of others without reason—but Yin Yu has worked with him long enough to sense the silent judgment.

He lifts himself from his chair, careful to keep the cloak around himself—prepared to go and dress, but…

The ghost pauses in the doorway, biting his lip.

Hua Cheng says nothing, fangs gleaming as he takes a bite from the apple, skewering it on one of his claws to hold it in place as he works around the core—

“Hua Chengzhu?”

Crimson Rain has heard his assistant in many states.

Typically resigned, exasperated, or exhausted. Less often frightened or anxious.

But now, he seems…timid isn’t the right word.

Vulnerable, maybe. But not a fragile kind of vulnerability. More like a man who is about to jump off of a cliff.

“Yes?”

"...What do you think of me?"

There's a pause, and the calamity repeats the question slowly, working the words between his teeth, as though he's trying to determine exactly what Yin Yu means.

"...What I think of you."

"I was always too afraid of the answer to ask."

Understandably. Hua Cheng thinks it's completely self-destructive of him to ask now, because he isn't going to be dishonest or gentle in his answer.

"...You're practical. And efficient."

"As an employee," Yin Yu agrees, nearly losing his nerve, but...

When you've died, plenty of things become slightly less terrifying. And prior to this...

Yin Yu took his position as Hua Cheng's employee in order to flee from his banishment--and his shidi, as it stood.

But he isn't banished anymore.

And he doesn't necessarily have a reason to hide from Quan Yizhen anymore, even if he...isn't sure...

Part of him just feels adrift. Without a sense of self, direction, or...

"I meant...as a person. If you have any opinion of me."

Hua Cheng lowers the apple core from his lips.

"I don't think you're a bad person, if that's what you mean."

He seems slightly relieved to hear it—but that's clearly not what he meant, and...Hua Cheng sighs, tossing the remains of the apple into a nearby bin, licking the juice from his fingers.

"...You're prone to self-pity, and you resent others for passing absolutely impossible standards that were placed upon you by your family that you have never managed to meet, but now you're the only one left holding onto them."

In short, he's often the creator of his own misery.

"...Oh." Yin Yu didn't have high expectations for what Hua Cheng was going to say. He didn't think it was going to be nice—he expected the ghost king to call him pitiful.

But not that .

"Then my situation...has always been my fault?"

"...Not necessarily..."

Hua Cheng sighs, tilting his head back. "That deputy of yours was the one who got you banished. But you're a capable person, so I don't pity you for what you've made of your life since then."

Yin Yu bites his lip, considering that.

That he's 'capable.'

"If that's true...then why am I still so...?"

The question is unspoken, but what he's thinking is clear.

'Then why do I still feel so worthless?'

"...I'd say you look for validation in places where you know you won't find it."

Like with Hua Cheng, as a present example.

It's hard to hear—but painfully true. Something he remembers thinking about in the moments of his death.

That he spent his entire life thinking he had been passed over, that he wasn't good enough, that he would never be good enough...

But there was someone who always thought he was good enough. Who placed him first. Who thought he was special.

Yin Yu allowed his own lack of self-worth and jealousy to blind him to that. And in his final moments...

It felt like he had wasted his own life on self-pity.

"…And if I stay…before, most of my duties surrounded the search for his highness. But now…"

"I have different needs now," Hua Cheng agrees. "But in large you could keep doing as you've always done."

And by that—he means looking after the city.

A prospect that Yin Yu can easily wrap his head around. It's familiar, secure—something he already knows and understands. And...

It leaves room for him to put his mind to the one other thing that he needs to sort out. Instead of avoiding it for another century and a half.

And it isn't as easy as walking into the Heavens and into open arms. Even if he didn't find the idea mortifying—he died.

He isn't a heavenly official anymore—not even an exiled one.

He's a ghost—and as such, his options are limited.

Which brings him to the simplest option—even if it feels like a trope in some silly romance novel—it's practical.

Dropping a few gold pieces into an offering tray near Yiling, kneeling down as incense burns to offer a prayer.

A few worshippers watch the average, lanky teenager with smirks—wondering what he's doing in a place like this.

(It’s the only convincing skin he could manage, and it isn’t particularly impressive.)

Qi Ying is a god of battle—prayed to by career warriors.

Some of them find it comical, watching such a scrawny kid pray to him—and those who don’t find it pitiful.

But that’s alright. Because, for the first time in his life—he’s learning not to care what other people think.

The incense stick is halfway burned by the time he straightens up, wiping the dust from his knees—not particularly hopeful that he was heard.

He never appointed any deputies, and he barely cares about his duties anyway, but…

Then again, how could he know how long it will take? Yin Yu has never prayed to him before. Not even anonymously. It never occurred to him to offer that much.

And once he realizes that, his stomach twists with guilt.

It’s not something Quan Yizhen would have neglected to do.

And it’s going to take him a long time to untangle the knot of history, friendship, mentoring, and romantic feelings between the two of them —

But what Yin Yu does know is that, at its core—he willingly stepped into an important role in Quan Yizhen’s life in the beginning.

He knew that he was different. That he didn’t have any friends or family. He wasn’t so oblivious that he was unaware of the fact that he was the only one who showed him kindness.

Of course Quan Yizhen clung to him. Of course he was attached to him.

And looking back on it, while Yin Yu was never malicious—he can’t help but feel like he allowed his jealousy to give him permission to abandon him.

Which makes the fact that Quan Yizhen would never do the same hurt even more, and—and it makes Yin Yu wonder.

Why did he never let go? How could he have such strong feelings after everything they've been through—and still see Yin Yu as something…

Yin Yu is halfway down the temple steps when he hears a crash.

And he wishes he could say that dying cured him of his near pathological desire to never make a scene, or be in the center of attention—

But the minute he hears shouts of shock and prayer from the temple, he starts walking down the steps faster, covering his head.

Why didn't he do this at night, when no one was here? Or maybe in a temple of Qi Ying on a deserted island? There has to be one like that, right—?

"SHIXIONG!"

His voice booms across the pavilion—and any chance Yin Yu has of maintaining his disguise is lost when he cringes.

Why didn't he think this through? Did harsh feedback from Hua Chengzhu and one moment of self reflection make him forget all of his instincts regarding self preservation—?

THUD!

But then someone slams into him from behind, and there are arms around him.

Crushing. Too much, to the point where Yin Yu has to croak out for relief until they loosen with a muttered apology.

"You…you were gone," the words are whispered with such pain and—and not exactly disbelief.

Shi Wudu came back. Hua Cheng came back. There have been recent examples that people can return from seemingly dire circumstances.

But time went on and on, and Yin Yu didn't. And—

Quan Yizhen was accustomed to him not returning.

"…I'm back now," Yin Yu replies softly.

He's back now.

And he came to Quan Yizhen on his own. He didn't run. He didn't hide.

(Well, maybe he ran a little—but only out of mild embarrassment.)

"…Don't go again," Quan Yizhen mumbles, trembling slightly. "Or let me go with you next time."

His arms still aren't loose enough for Yin Yu to turn around—but he leans back into him, placing his hands over Quan Yizhen's where they wrap around his middle.

"…okay," he agrees, his shidi's curls brushing against his cheek. "But…stop telling people we're getting married!"

"Why?" He actually has the nerve to ask, his eyebrows raising, and Yin Yu could pull his hair out.

"You never even asked me—and we only just started—!"

"Will you marry m—?"

"No!" He takes a deep breath. "You're too young to get married! And it's too fast!"

"…I am?"

"Yes!"

"Oh," Quan Yizhen frowns. "Just a few more years then."

Yin Yu gawks, prepared to protest even more, but—

He never said that he wasn't old enough to get married, and Quan Yizhen must be thinking of their age difference. He—

"Just slow down , okay?!"

Before, he never would have expressed his distress—only suffered in silence.

And before, Quan Yizhen would have steamrolled ahead, unaware of his distress.

But not anymore.

"…Okay," he agrees, still draped around him heavily, hugging him tighter. “Slow.”

And it surprises Yin Yu, who would be the first to admit that his expectations had gradually become quite low.

He’s not used to being listened to, or considered, or valued —

But with an open mind, people start to surprise him.

“…Let’s go home, A’Yizhen.”

Things move smoother, with him back in his old position—even more so, now that he’s finally content.

A Selfish Man

Chapter Summary

> "...San Lang?" He turns his head, and the moment he does, the ghost king presses a kiss against his temple.
>
> "Yes, gege?"
>
> Xie Lian tries to be considerate of the fact that he might not want to talk about it--and Hua Cheng never pushes him, when the tables are turned.
>
> "...You don't have to answer if you don't want to," he murmurs. "But...do you treat E'Ming so coldly...because it carries your right eye?"

Between the Ghost Realm and the Heavens, things seem to grow calm as people ease into their new roles.

And it occurs to Xie Lian, nearly a month after Hua Cheng's return—

That this is the longest stretch of peace he's had in eight centuries.

Waking up every morning in his love's arms. Spending their days together. No longer running or hiding or investigating or planning.

They settle into ways of managing their time, coming to the unspoken understanding of splitting their time between Ghost City and Mount Taicang, occasionally visiting Puqi Shrine during the day.

As Xie Lian expected—the ghost king was thrilled to renovate the temple with him.

Admittedly far more difficult than patching up Puqi Shrine—but with Xie Lian's powers returned, and Hua Cheng doing far more than his share of the work…

It starts to resemble a childhood home once more.

With a few noticeable changes.

First being the lack of other cultivators and servants running around. Xie Lian has no need for them, and even if he did—Hua Cheng quickly attends to his needs before he even realizes them.

And they can’t exactly have mortals wandering in, so Ren Song is kind enough to help with enchanting the forest around the base of the mountain, trees growing taller and denser—and any mortals who do wander in quickly forget why they came, turning back towards home.

It doesn’t work on gods or ghosts to Hua Cheng’s eternal dismay, but Xie Lian enjoys having guests occasionally, so he doesn’t always complain.

(He usually does, though, when it’s his former deputies.)

But while the halls are usually empty—they’re rarely quiet.

Crumbling flagstones are patched and repaired. Holes in the roof are filled. Faded frescoes and mosaics are remade in new images.

Flowers bloom from the terraces and down the hillsides, vines forming natural curtains along the windowsills.

And Xie Lian always wakes up to one white bloom tucked behind his ear, lips pressed against the nape of his neck—smiling as he whispers a small prayer of his own, even if he didn’t always realize that was what it was;

Good Morning, San Lang.

San Lang, who makes happiness feel as easy as breathing—and Xie Lian feels as though he’s been holding his breath for his entire life.

Some mornings, if he has to leave bed before Xie Lian does, he kisses him half awake, murmuring a gentle goodbye—and always leaves something.

Sometimes small things, like a bowl of orange slices on the table—a gentle reminder to eat. Other times Xie Lian wakes to a new ring glimmering on his finger, or a gem encrusted comb in his hair.

The gifts aren’t needed, but it pleases Hua Cheng to give them.

And slowly, Xie Lian is learning how to accept them.

It's been so long since he owned anything of substance. He's always had the ashes that hang around his neck, and used to have the bamboo hat he had been given so long ago—but those were the only constants.

Everything else was lost, stolen, or broken—and it's still difficult for him to look at anything, big or small, and think of it as 'his.'

(With one exception.)

But he's slowly learning to have things again.

Like the hair piece Hua Cheng gave him a year ago.

Or the choker he gave him when he briefly didn't have Ruoye to cover his cursed shackle—one he wears often now, unaccustomed to leaving his neck bare.

(And even more often, he has to hide certain things on his throat.)

But he's more comfortable with the word ours .

Learning to think of a bedroom as theirs , or the gifts left on his pillow as things that bring Hua Cheng equal joy and value.

Their time, their home, their—

Their life. Together.

And the more he thinks of that, the more tightly he holds onto it.

The more he treasures their time alone—the less he scolds Hua Cheng for grumbling when people visit, even if he knows the ghost king is slowly becoming spoiled from having him all to himself.

The more he reaches for him first, stretching up like a growing stem to kiss him.

The more he treasures afternoons spent in the sun, knowing it should be cold, this late in autumn—but every point of contact between them is warm.

Sitting underneath a maple tree, Xie Lian reading to Hua Cheng as he leans back against his chest—one of his favorites.

With dragons, sword fighting, magic—and the occasional kissing scene. Which Xie Lian wouldn't find particularly embarrassing at his age if Hua Cheng didn't tease him so sadistically about it, but—

Well, he never really minds.

Hua Cheng seems content to listen to him for as long as Xie Lian wants to go on, wraith butterflies sometimes fluttering over, offering a flower petal for the calamity to braid into the god's hair.

E'Ming tries to join in on the help too—but the moment it gets close, it's batted away.

"Who asked for your help?”

The saber rattles pitifully, shrinking as it slinks down into Xie Lian's lap.

"San Lang..." His tone is mildly chastising, fingers stroking over the blade. "E'Ming is very helpful, it's alright to let it try..."

The way Hua Cheng treated the saber always struck Xie Lian as odd—but more so, when he sees how respectful the ghost king is to Ruoye.

Or to the blade he made for him, forged into a divine weapon when he killed Jun Wu.

It moves and behaves similarly to E'Ming now, named Mo Ye by its master—and Hua Cheng treats that blade with respect as well, even though it was also forged by his own hand.

At first, Xie Lian thought it was because Mo Ye and Ruoye were his tools. He tried borrowing E'Ming often, thinking that maybe showing affection and preference for the saber would make Hua Cheng a little less frigid towards it, but...

Now, staring down at the pommel, he...

Oh.

"...San Lang?" He turns his head, and the moment he does, the ghost king presses a kiss against his temple.

"Yes, gege?"

Xie Lian tries to be considerate of the fact that he might not want to talk about it--and Hua Cheng never pushes him, when the tables are turned.

"...You don't have to answer if you don't want to," he murmurs. "But...do you treat E'Ming so coldly...because it carries your right eye?"

The eye he was cursed for. Treated like less than an animal. Called a hideous, foul, loathsome thing.

Hua Cheng grows quiet—and Xie Lian is more than happy to move on, not wanting to ruin the happy easiness of the afternoon, but...

"...It brings back bad memories for me, I suppose."

But it's also living proof of a brave, selfless act. Something that made him a god.

Is that a bad memory for him, or—?

The deep, profound pain in Hua Cheng's remaining eye tells him it's not about that.

"...You don't have to tell me, San Lang—”

"It's alright, dianxia."

He says that, but the breath he takes is slightly unsteady.

"...My mother left her husband when I was born," he explains quietly, a subject that he usually never touches, and Xie Lian never dares to ask. "Because she thought he would kill me for being born deformed."

Among other reasons, but his eye was the most pressing and dangerous concern.

"I knew it made me different. Even from the way she named me after it—but I almost never saw my own reflection when I was a child, so I didn't know what it looked like."

That doesn't surprise Xie Lian—back then mirrors were especially expensive, even small ones. Mu Qing was absolutely fascinated with them when he came to the palace, to the point where Feng Xin would needle him for constantly looking at himself.

"But...when she died, it was near water," he recalls, his tone so carefully guarded and controlled, it makes Xie Lian's heart ache . "I saw my reflection...and her ...and knew she was killed because...because I was..."

Suddenly, Xie Lian is reminded of being on this mountain eight centuries ago. Holding Hong'er as the boy clung to him fiercely, weeping the words—

'I'm not cursed! I'm not !'

"..." The prince closes his book, setting it aside as he turns in Hua

Cheng's arms.

“She died because someone decided to take her life,” His voice is gentle, but firm—fingers stroking through Hua Cheng’s hair. “Not because of you.”

He knows, when logic rules his mind, he knows.

But that never seems to strike deep enough to make the pain ease.

And it’s just as easy to think that she died because he was born , because he couldn’t save her.

Because he was a deformed, hideous little monster.

(“In love with a princess,” a long dead voice echoes in his mind.)

Xie Lian is quiet for a long, long time.

Hesitant to use the comparison, not sure of how Hua Cheng would react, but…

“You would suffer in order to protect Shuo, wouldn’t you?”

The ghost king pauses, surprised—but he doesn’t deny it.

“Would you want him to hate himself for that?”

No—because when you have a child, you keep them safe. It’s not a question. It’s not something you hold a grudge for, or want them to carry guilt for later.

“Should I hate myself for all of the times you’ve suffered for me?”

Or died for Xie Lian—three times, no less.

“You do.” Hua Cheng points out, his tone strained.

A sign of how difficult the subject is for him—because normally he would never point that out.

Xie Lian winces—knowing that he’s a bit hypocritical.

“…Then why don’t we both try to stop?”

It’s easy to say that. To make bold promises about trying. But sometimes it doesn’t matter how hard you try, or how badly you want to—feelings don't change.

Still.

He doesn't take any joy in Xie Lian hating himself. It pains him.

And it would probably pain his mother, if she knew…

If she could see just how much her son had come to see himself the same way the world did.

"San Lang?"

"…Hm?"

Xie Lian's request is so sudden, it takes him off guard.

"Could I see Wu Ming?"

He pauses, eyebrows knitting together in surprise—

But he obeys.

And Xie Lian bites back a woeful smile when that mask comes into view—a white ceramic smile, hiding what lies beneath.

"Kiss me?"

Even that doesn't coax him out—his face tilting forward, the cool, hard surface of the mask pressing against Xie Lian's lips.

That draws a small, silent laugh from the prince—shoulders shaking slightly.

But when he lifts his hands to slip the mask away from the ghost king's face—Wu Ming doesn't stop him.

His first kiss. His most devoted believer.

In so many ways, his first love.

Xie Lian sets the mask aside, allowing it to sit on the grass beside Ruoye and E'Ming. Takes his love's face between his hands.

Looking into both of his eyes.

And it hurts, but in a good way.

Like the relief one feels after crying their heart out.

When Xie Lian is with him, he feels like a teenager again. Young and thoughtless and scared but held.

Fragile, but protected.

And he's so beautiful, the prince can hardly bear it.

But he does.

Moves into his lap, sliding his arms around his neck—pressing their foreheads together.

The ghost's eyelids tremble when Xie Lian kisses him there, one after the other.

"Handsome," he whispers, feeling him shudder in response, arms tightening around Xie Lian's waist.

Because he is.

Because the eye he views with such contempt shines up at Xie Lian like a precious stone in the sunlight.

Because he's never been a curse. He's always been Xie Lian's greatest blessing.

"I wish I could have seen you, back then." The prince admits. "Though I can't imagine I was much to look at—"

"You were beautiful," Hua Cheng responds with immediate faithfulness, and Xie Lian manages a wry smile.

He would have been a wraith. Filthy, bloody, sleep deprived.

It must have pained Wu Ming so much to see him in that state.

Xie Lian hasn't always felt beautiful himself. Sometimes, he still doesn't.

Even if he knows that he has a body that will always heal, and a face that will never age.

He remembers every cut, wound, and broken bone. How much of him has been cut away and regrown.

He doesn't feel connected to his own body or image of himself anymore. Only finds meaning in it when Hua Cheng is touching him, only recognizes his reflection in his lover's eyes.

His hands don't feel like his own, but his strangers. His own body is foreign to him.

And in some strange surge of awareness—he remembers a conversation they had not so long ago, in an inn with questionable customer service.

Hua Cheng asking if Xie Lian ever wanted children. If so, how many. Boys or girls.

How Xie Lian said three, and he didn't care—maybe both.

But he didn't want to have children anymore—because he never wanted to outlive them.

That's still true.

But if he did , and he had them with him—he would want them to look like Hua Cheng, not him.

Wouldn't want to see a stranger's eyes in his own child's face.

He would rather see the eyes of the person who has always come back to him. The face of the man who has always loved him selflessly.

"…I love you," Xie Lian says it far more easily than he used to, the words falling from his lips when he has no other way to voice his feelings.

He presses his lips just underneath Wu Ming's right eye, and he says it again.

With such sincerity, such openness—Hua Cheng would never have a choice but to believe him.

And all he can do is hold him closer and say it back, letting that reality wash over him.

That Xie Lian loves him.

Loves him this much.

Loves every single part of him, beyond Hua Cheng's wishful thinking or impetuous fantasies—it's the truth.

Somehow, he does.

"…I hope one day I'll be worthy of it," he sighs, breathing in the smell of chamomile in his hair.

The prince clicks his tongue disapprovingly, resting his face against the side of his neck.

"If one of us isn't worthy, it's me."

"Forgive me, your highness—but I'm afraid you're entirely incorrect."

"No, it's true—you're the one who's always doing things for me."

"You did so much for me first—"

"And you've more than paid it back by now," Xie Lian admonishes him gently, even if he knows that Hua Cheng has never viewed their relationship as one of give and take.

His worship has never worked that way.

"I haven't paid you back at all…"

Then Xie Lian pulls back sharply, remembering. "I didn't even pay Wu Ming back for turning down his request—you never got the chance to make another one!"

Back then, the first time he made a request from Xie Lian—it was only to kiss his hand.

But the next thing he asked for—to release Human Face Disease on Xie Lian's behalf (to spare him from the inevitable guilt, as Xie Lian would later come to understand)—the prince refused.

Saying Wu Ming could make another request of him instead—but he was never able to.

"…Oh," Hua Cheng bites back a smile, shaking his head. "I only had one other thing I wanted to ask of you—and I never would have asked for it back then, anyway. Gege shouldn't worry himself with it."

Xie Lian's eyebrows knit together.

"Why wouldn't you have asked?"

Hua Cheng sits back against the trunk of the tree with Xie Lian in his arms, black armor gleaming in the sun.

“Because it wasn’t what you would have wanted at the time. And I had no right.”

“How could you have known if you didn’t ask me?”

“I knew.”

He didn’t want to hear it from Wu Ming , at the very least, Hua Cheng was painfully aware of that at the time.

“But I didn’t mind, gege—I was happy to wait.”

For as long as it took—even if the opportunity never presented itself, he could have waited for all eternity.

“…What was it?” Xie Lian stares, tipping his chin to look Hua Cheng in the eye. “What did you want to ask me?”

He averts his gaze for a moment—then shifts back to his true form. Loose hair, a missing eye covered with dark leather. Red robes rolled up to the elbows.

And Xie Lian had so many guesses for what it could have been. Some far out and ridiculous. Others less so. But—

“…For dianxia’s hand.”

But the actual answer manages to steal the breath from his lungs and leave him frozen for a moment, dumbfounded.

“…In marriage?”

Hua Cheng doesn’t even have it in him to tease Xie Lian about what else he could have possibly meant—only nods silently, his eyes fixed in the middle distance.

“Ask me,” the prince says breathlessly.

Hua Cheng pauses, and…

He can hear Xie Lian’s heart pounding .

“…Gege—”

"Please ask me, San Lang," his eyes are round and bottomless and hopeful and neither one of them can seem to breathe. "Unless you don't want to anymore—"

Any self-doubt is silenced with a kiss, arms crushing him close, stealing what little breath remains in his lungs.

It's long and deep, rendering the prince a half-melted piece of clay in his hands as the ghost king struggles to compose his thoughts.

Almost wishing this hadn't come up so soon. That he could have planned something elaborate and profound. Worthy of a prince, worthy of him.

Desperately cursing the fact that he wasn't born a writer, or a poet. That eloquence seems to fail him now, his tongue growing slow and clumsy, his lips quivering for a brief moment.

"…I've been yours from the moment I saw you," he explains, his voice low and hoarse. "When my life had no meaning, you allowed me to take you as my meaning."

Words that Xie Lian later called foolhardy and arrogant, but now, seeing the ripples of them through time…he's left speechless.

"This one could never be discontent, as long as I'm by dianxia's side." He reaches up, pushing a lock of hair behind Xie Lian's ear. "This time with you, everything you've already given me, it's more than I could have dreamed of—"

"—San Lang—"

"But I'm not like you, gege," he admits breathlessly, arms tight around his back. "I'm a selfish man."

He closes his eyes, taking another deep breath.

"I want more. I want to know everything there is to know about you. I want to share every moment you have ahead of you, to take every single step beside you. I want to give you everything I have."

And he doesn't even know how to say it, but he wants every single thing that Xie Lian has to give.

His attention. His thoughts. His heart. His mind, his body. His past and his future. His world.

Hua Cheng wishes he knew how to love as selflessly as Xie Lian does, but he's a different animal entirely.

If he could, he'd live in the hollow places around his ribs, existing somewhere between his heartbeats.

And somehow, he got his way—because his ashes rest there.

"…And I know it's not enough," he mutters, shaking his head in a reflexive act of self-deprecation. "I know you deserve more than this servant could ever give you. But—"

"San Lang—"

"All I want is to spend the rest of my time in this world trying," Hua Cheng concludes.

"And I don't expect anything in return, that isn't why I want those things, but…if you ever decide to share your entire life with someone, I want that person to be me. So…"

The one thing Hua Cheng doesn't think he could bear to do is share him.

"…Would you marry me?"

He barely has the words out of his mouth before—

"Yes."

His God's voice is slightly thick, and when Hua Cheng looks up—

Xie Lian has tears on his cheeks.

"Then, now, and every day after —yes."

He didn't know it back then—but Xie Lian's been his since the day they met.

From the moment he first caught the boy in his arms, and felt small hands clinging to him so fiercely.

He's been his every day since. In every moment of loneliness, in every dream he can't remember.

With every sunrise that he whispered good morning.

He was always his.

If Xie Lian couldn't have had him—he wouldn't have had anyone.

And he fell in love with him over and over again. In different times, with different faces and names.

He would have said yes before he realized the truth on Mount Tonglu.

By the time they were in Blackwater Manor…some part of him knew exactly what he felt.

"…You're sure—?"

"Yes," Xie Lian reaches up to wipe the tears from his face, only to have the ghost king do it for him—leaning forward to kiss them away. "I would have asked you, if I'd known to think of it."

And in Xie Lian's defense, he came from a portion of society where marriages were arranged. Even concubines were selected for a monarch far in advance.

He was never raised to believe that he could choose who he loved.

And even if he could, it would have been a woman. That was his only option back then. But now…

Now, Xie Lian gets to choose him .

Marriage might sound like a small, inconsequential step, compared to everything they've already been through together.

There was already the tacit understanding that they would spend the rest of eternity together, but—

This is more.

At its core, marriage is taking someone as a partner. Not a servant, or a worshipper.

Traditionally, it's the joining of two families.

Hua Cheng was an orphan, left without one at a young age, and Xie Lian…

He chose to walk away from his family name and legacy long ago, not wanting to carry a torch for something with such a painful history.

But there was loneliness in giving that up.

A sense of no longer belonging anywhere. Having no roots left connecting him to this world.

And he wants to feel like he belongs to something again, to someone. To feel grounded.

To try and build something again, believing that it will actually last.

Hua Cheng can't seem to take his lips off of him. His cheeks. His mouth. His nose and chin. Trailing along his jaw, fingers tangled in Xie Lian's hair.

"I can't imagine your attendants will be thrilled…" (But he seems to enjoy the thought of that.)

Maybe not initially—but they'll be happy once they see how happy Xie Lian is. The prince has faith in that.

Still, the thought of listening to bickering during the process makes him frown, and…

"Could we tell them after, you think?"

Better to ask forgiveness than permission.

Not that Xie Lian needs their permission—he's a grown man, and they aren't his parents.

But he doesn't want to hear what anyone else thinks or feels about the matter—

He just wants him .

A slow smile spreads across Hua Cheng's face as he realizes what he means.

"It doesn't sound like you're planning on a long engagement, gege."

Just the word 'engagement' makes the tips of Xie Lian's ears a little warm, but he still admits—

"I'd marry you today, if I could."

Hua Cheng's lips pause against his jaw.

"…And who says you can't?"

Xie Lian pulls back to look at him in surprise—and then they smile at one another, slowly realizing what's to come.

Which is how they end up in a rather familiar position.

Xie Lian sitting beside his loom, working with threads of red and gold, Hua Cheng holding them around his fingers as he works.

"How do you think we should do it?" The prince murmurs, his brow furrowed.

When you've lived for as long as they have—wedding traditions come and go.

Currently, most grooms will negotiate some sort of price with the father of the bride—she'll be brought to his home in a bridal sedan, and the rest is a glorified party between both families.

In their case there is no bride, though Xie Lian wouldn't mind playing that role—he has before, even if it was only as a disguise

"I was assuming gege would want to follow the traditions of Xianle," Hua Cheng muses, silk threads gleaming between his fingers.

That is how Xie Lian always imagined it, but…

"Didn't you say you were from Xuli initially, San Lang?"

The ghost king looks up from his blissful staring, raising an eyebrow. "Yes. But we came to Xianle when I was young."

"Do you know what the traditions were like there?"

He thinks about it for a moment, one leg pulled up against his chest as he lounges by Xie Lian's side.

"…I'm sure you would have seen some of it at the emperor's wedding to the thunder master," he recalls, his tone slightly…distant, for some reason. "They're both from Xuli."

They are—but Shi Wudu is younger, and the ceremony was far more updated as a result.

"They crossed cups of wine—I know that much is traditional, but the rest seemed a bit more contemporary."

Hua Cheng doesn't seem particularly surprised, but…

"Kidnapping, technically."

Xie Lian pauses, an awkward smile in place as he processes—well—

"…Pardon?"

"Not really , but…my mother's family was from western Xuli, and there was a tradition of the groom's family 'stealing' the bride. But it was always agreed upon ahead of time—so it was just for show."

Though, when he thinks about his mother's attitude towards her husband…he suspects it wasn't entirely performative. And in some cases—in different regions and generations, the concept of prior consent varied.

"…Like taking her from a bridal sedan on a mountain side, for example?"

Hua Cheng lets out a surprised laugh. "My intention was never to abduct gege."

"And if I was being carted down a mountain to marry someone I didn't want, you wouldn't come and steal me away?" He doesn't look over his shoulder as he speaks, unaccustomed to teasing Hua Cheng the way he always does to him—not wanting the look on his face to ruin the effect.

"I wouldn't let anyone else take you, obviously," the ghost king agrees. "But that's more of a rescue than an abduction, isn't it?"

Xie Lian supposes so, but Hua Cheng did abduct him much more literally from his own palace once. And spirited him away on Mount Tonglu.

They settle on something more traditional for Xianle in the end—the place where they both grew up.

And Xie Lian can't help but feel a growing warmth in his chest, holding the robes to Hua Cheng's shoulders to make sure they fit. Checking the length of the sleeves.

They're the first robes he's made for him since his death. And technically, Hua Cheng is always dressed for a wedding, but…

He’s only worn the robes of a bride groom once—the day he died.

This feels like painting over a painful memory with something joyous.

He’s lost count of how many sets of bridal robes he’s made over the centuries. For countless couples, rich and poor, happy and miserable.

But he’s never been fighting back a smile the entire time, accepting kisses from Hua Cheng each time he leans down to steal another.

His own robes aren’t that different from what he made for his disguise on Mount Yu Jun—except this time, they’re clearly made for a man.

(There’s no need to disguise himself as someone else’s bride anymore.)

Hua Cheng takes care of his hair—with the same loving grace he always has. Carefully combing it back into a high ponytail—the same he wore when he was young, pinned back with a gleaming gold butterfly pin, one he seemed to procure just for this, and orchid blossoms.

“Well,” Xie Lian sits back, looking his work on Hua Cheng’s robes over, making sure they fit perfectly—

And of course, they do.

“How’s that?”

The ghost king sits back on his own, taking in the sight of him—eyes filled with an emotion that Xie Lian can barely fathom.

"Perfect," he murmurs, pushing one loose lock of hair behind Xie Lian's ear, fingertips curving briefly around his jaw, taking him in.

The prince leans into the touch, smiling up at him.

He used to loathe being called beautiful, or perfect. The expectations that came with it.

But not from him.

Because Hua Cheng doesn't need him to be perfect. Knows that he isn't, and wants him regardless.

It makes it easier to accept the fact that the ghost king finds him beautiful. That he wouldn't change him, even if he could.

Autumn leaves fall around them as they walk to the family catacombs, arm in arm. Kneeling before his parents' remains in a sign of respect.

And while Xie Lian isn't sure what his father would have made of any of this...his mother would have been happy.

He knows that much.

There's something almost surreal about it, a man born with nothing—an orphan, cursed and deformed, kneeling before the graves of a king and queen on his wedding night, paying his respects as he prepares to take their son as his husband.

And yet...he doesn't feel out of place.

His own mother is buried too far from here to pay respects to—even though Xie Lian offers, he tells him not to worry.

He'll show him one day, just not tonight.

Xie Lian says a silent prayer to her instead. A quiet thank you, hoping that she would approve.

And when they make their way to leave the catacombs...Xie Lian lets out a soft sound of surprise, holding his arms around Hua Cheng's neck as the ghost king sweeps him off of his feet. Something the prince easily could have prevented, but he allows him to.

"San Lang—?"

"You wanted me to incorporate a tradition from Xuli," his love reminds him impishly. "I might as well steal you away," he concludes, carrying him up the hill in his arms, wraith butterflies flickering around them as the sun begins to sink low over the horizon.

Weddings in the days of Xianle were large, highly ceremonial affairs—particularly among royalty. But for now, they opt for a far more stripped down version of the rites Xie Lian witnessed as a child.

They don't stand together inside of Huangji Temple, or a royal palace. Instead, they stand beneath the maple tree where Xie Lian coaxed him into asking. The sun setting as the autumn breeze carries the smell of the forest, campfires, and home.

Rather than an elaborately carved array on marble floors, they stand in an octagon of eight candles—and when the time comes to pay their respects to the Heavens...

For the first time in his life, Xie Lian doesn't know who to pray to.

Before, it would have been Jun Wu. And now...

The very point of eloping is not to tell anyone until after the deed is already done, and if he prayed to Mu Qing or Feng Xin, that would decisively let the cat out of the bag.

But for Hua Cheng, it's exceptionally easy.

Xie Lian has never wanted to be kneeled to in prayer—and with that in mind, he bows low. Takes the prince's hand, placing a reverent kiss to the back of his knuckles, saying a silent prayer of thanks.

And watching him...Xie Lian feels as though he's grasping something elusive.

It takes Hua Cheng off guard when the prince bows low in return—reaching out to mimic the same gesture, lifting larger, calloused hands to his lips. Pressing a kiss to the back of each knuckle—slow and methodical, as the ghost king watches him in wonder.

"What are you...?"

Xie Lian glances up through his lashes, carefully lifting his head. "Praying to the fire master for a blessed marriage."

The thought that Xie Lian would pray to him seems to leave Hua Cheng utterly stunned, even if he is a god, and—

Hua Cheng couldn't actually know, but he's the only person that Xie Lian has prayed to for quite some time. Even if he didn't know that was what he was doing.

Living with grief can often be an act of prayer in itself. Going on with the desperate hope of being reunited again.

Hua Cheng watches him with one wide, shocked eye—unable to speak.

And with their families (well, Xie Lian's) and the Heavens shown due deference, there's only one left for each of them to kneel to--

One another.

Sinking to their knees together, surrounded by candles in the twilight, silently promising to keep and honor one another, allowing heaven and earth to bear witness.

Whispering ancient words of promise, and when the last leaves their lips—the candles blow out.

Xie Lian closes his eyes, breathing in the smell of smoke and maple leaves--and when he opens them again, he meets his husband's gaze.

Watching how the final rays of sunlight seem to set his eye aflame—the soft curve of his smile sending aftershocks through the prince's heart.

When you've lived as long as he has, and memories start to blend together—you start to see your life in phases and seasons. Some good, some bad. Occasionally easy, often painful.

Xie Lian will look back on his life, and divide it in two.

Before today, and after.

Almost like a long delayed divide between childhood and adulthood;

Before he became a husband, and after.

For some people, the difference might not seem so inextricable. They might say that they went from one day to the next, and they didn't feel any different.

That they didn't feel changed.

But Xie Lian isn't one of them. In an instant, he feels reshaped. Made into something new.

Something that he chose to be. Someone he grew into.

Someone he grew up with.

And he doesn't ever want to go back to the way he was before.

One half of a life, waiting to be made whole.

Silver bells chime softly as they walk away from the tree, the sun setting behind them as Hua Cheng helps him over the threshold of the temple.

Autumn sunsets on Mount Taicang are famous, a sea of reds and golds.

But Xie Lian can't look at anything but him.

He went most of his life without sight, and there's still nothing else he would rather see.

And it's only now that he pauses to wonder, still living in a warm, happy daze.

"…San Lang?"

"Mmm?"

"Was there something you wanted from the temple?" The rite itself is finished, and it's already evening, when they would be making a meal or retiring for the evening—but Hua Cheng has led them into the worship hall. Braziers alight, marble floors gleaming.

"…I didn't pray quite enough during the ceremony for my liking," he explains softly.

"But didn't we both—?"

"Oh, but I didn't give nearly enough thanks," he shakes his head.

"You don't need to thank me, San Lang—"

"Don't we always give thanks for a blessing?"

Well, yes , but in that case Xie Lian should be just as thankful, and he doubts Hua Cheng would want him doing the same.

"If so, then I'm just as blessed—"

"Forgive me, dianxia—but I'm afraid we'll have to agree to disagree," his husband shushes him gently.

Xie Lian doesn't get another word in before hands wrap around his waist, lifting him up onto the altar before his divine statue.

One Hua Cheng carved himself upon his return, putting all of the other effigies from Xie Lian's youth to shame.

(As is to be expected, from a man who's had so much practice.)

At first, Xie Lian had thought he might skip the step of a statue, similar to Qiandeng Temple—but when he asked him about it, Hua Cheng simply explained that there was no need for a statue when he had the real thing

That embarrassed the prince enough to suggest that maybe Huangji Temple did need a divine statue, so he made one—but somehow he always ends up praying like this, anyway.

With Xie Lian sitting on the edge of the altar, his cheeks aflame as the calamity kisses his hands.

Each knuckle, the tips of his fingers, the bones in his wrists, and Xie Lian can hear his prayers, even if they aren't spoken aloud.

The wonder, the happiness, the adoration, the kind that leaves him floating in a sea of warmth, comfort, and belonging.

A small crack forms in that concentration when he kisses Xie Lian's palms, first his right—then pauses when he reaches his left, finding a scar there.

The only scar on the prince's entire body, left when Bai Wuxiang pierced him with the God Slayer on Mount Tonglu.

Xie Lian can feel the frown tugging at his lips and sneaks his fingers under his husband's chin, tilting his face to look up at him.

"That wasn't your fault," he assures him, knowing that it's fruitless—he'll blame himself no matter what Xie Lian says.

"You nearly brought the entire mountain down trying to get to me."

"Nearly," Hua Cheng agrees, turning his face into Xie Lian's palm—kissing the scar twice for good measure. "But I should have ripped it apart before he ever had the chance."

"...I don't mind it," Xie Lian abandons trying to ease his sense of responsibility, instead aiming to make the scar itself not seem quite so bad. "I just wish it had come from you."

That statement seems to startle Hua Cheng, and not in a good way, so he rushes to explain himself.

"I don't mean that I would want you to hurt me, San Lang, just...if I had something permanent on my skin, I mean--I would want it to remind me of you."

He reaches down to squeeze the ghost king's forearm, reminding him of the tattoo that lies underneath.

"Like this."

Hua Cheng's expression freezes—likely surprised because Xie Lian had never admitted that he knew what the tattoo said , not until now.

If he could have Hua Cheng's name written on his skin in ink, he would. If he could carve it in and let it scar, he would. But he's been blessed and cursed with a body that shows no passage of time or pain.

But he's almost a little jealous of the tattoo's permanence.

Hua Cheng considers that, slowly rising to his full height—and even with Xie Lian sitting on top of the altar, he still manages to tower over him.

"But you've always had me against your skin, dianxia."

Xie Lian raises an eyebrow, slightly flushed, but...

When Hua Cheng reaches down to tug at the chain around his neck playfully, his meaning becomes clear.

Xie Lian has had him close, all this time—keeping his ashes against his skin with all of the constance and permanence of a tattoo. Still.

He can't help but want him closer.

In his skin, not just against him.

“…I suppose I’m a selfish man too,” he finally admits, looking up at the ghost king through his lashes. “I want more.”

It’s almost laughable that Xie Lian would call himself selfish—but Hua Cheng’s eyes soften regardless.

“You have all of me,” the ghost king reminds him, leaning down to kiss the side of his jaw. “For as long as you’ll have me.”

As if Xie Lian would ever let him go.

He turns his head, pressing their cheeks together, until Hua Cheng can’t bear to go another moment without his lips

And he kisses him the way Xie Lian always wanted to be kissed, even before he knew what it felt like.

As though the only way he can breathe is through the prince's lungs, rather than his own.

The kind of kiss that flits around the pages of the novels he once adored.

He used to be so clumsy in his arms. Mortified and flushed, wanting more but having no idea how to show it. Terrified of his own excitement, stammering and running away from him when he saved him from the fetal ghost in the lake.

There's nothing frightening about it now.

The Most Beautiful Thing a Person Can Do

Chapter Summary

> The warmth in the pit of his stomach is welcome and familiar. His heart skips a beat when fingers cradle the base of his skull, tilting his head back so Hua Cheng can deepen the kiss—but with thrill, not nerves.
>
> And there's no shame in it, either.
>
> There might always be some lingering sense of taboo from spending so long with celibacy vows, but—
>
> There are so many other feelings inside of him, Xie Lian doesn’t have room for shame or self-loathing.
>
> Just him. Wanting him.

Chapter Notes

> CONTENT WARNING: this entire chapter centers around an explicit scene, if you don't want to read that sort of content, feel free to skip. The dynamic is Hua Cheng/Xie Lian, if that is not your preference, you don't have to read this scene to understand the plot.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The warmth in the pit of his stomach is welcome and familiar. His heart skips a beat when fingers cradle the base of his skull, tilting his head back so Hua Cheng can deepen the kiss—but with thrill, not nerves.

And there's no shame in it, either.

There might always be some lingering sense of taboo from spending so long with celibacy vows, but—

There are so many other feelings inside of him, Xie Lian doesn’t have room for shame or self-loathing.

Just him. Wanting him.

His knees parting in silent invitation when Hua Cheng steps closer, elbows bracing against the edge of the altar as Xie Lian sinks back, arms wrapped around his neck, pulling the ghost king with him.

Shivering when their bodies press together, chest to chest, hip to hip, even through the layers of robes, he can't help but arch into it. Gasping against Hua Cheng's lips, fingers tightening in his hair.

And when Hua Cheng reaches for his belt—that isn't nerve wracking anymore either.

They've done it again since the night he came back. Not every single night, but definitely more often than not.

Only ever with hands, but enough for Xie Lian to grow familiar with the stirring excitement in his gut.

But this time—he grabs Hua Cheng's wrist, stopping him. A gesture that has him immediately pulling back apologetically—

But that's not it.

"Could we…do more?"

The question gives the ghost king pause, both eyebrows raising as he stares down at him, observing the rising blush on the prince's cheeks.

"More?"

"The…the rest of it, I mean."

Oh, and now Hua Cheng is caught.

Between the instant inferno in his gut, his nerves pounding with excitement—and the irresistible urge to tease.

"That could mean quite a few things, your highness."

Xie Lian pauses, his brows knitting together. "It could?"

Hua Cheng nods sagely, leaning over him on the altar, one elbow propped over Xie Lian's head.

"There are countless ways to be with someone in that sense—if you wanted all of it , it would take quite some time."

He says this as though he's experienced most of it.

And that’s not entirely removed from the truth—but only if doing that sort of thing on your own or with a clone is included.

In any cases, the teasing gaze and cheshire grin leave Xie Lian hot around the ears, muttering—

“What usually happens on a wedding night, I mean.”

And that phrasing leaves little room for Hua Cheng to be sly or wink around what that could possibly mean, because they both know.

Of course, most wedding nights have very different circumstances and intentions, the first being that they aren’t typically between two men.

Second being that the bounds of what dictates a wedding night between a man and a woman is often governed by the overarching goal of producing an heir , a burden they don’t have, but—

Hua Cheng knows what he means, even if Xie Lian likely doesn’t grasp the finer details.

But he can’t say that the prince doesn’t have some idea of what he’s asking for, because, well—

Hua Cheng already gave him a brief, albeit rudimentary lesson in Puqi Village.

Against a tree.

And he also can’t say that he doesn’t want it, he just…

“…You’re certain?”

Xie Lian’s heart betrays his nerves, hammering loudly against his ribs —but his voice doesn’t falter.

“Yes.”

Even if he’s terribly embarrassed about being so forward—if he wasn’t, Hua Cheng would never take that step unless he knew in no uncertain terms that Xie Lian wanted it

And Xie Lian has noticed—once Hua Cheng knows he welcomes and enjoys a certain type of touch, he becomes far more demanding and greedy towards that kind of contact himself.

He knows Xie Lian enjoys being kissed—and now he’s constantly sneaking a taste of his lips.

He knows Xie Lian enjoys what they did that first night, and hasn't been shy about sneaking in moments in paradise manor, Puqi shrine, or the cottage here on the mountainside—using his hands to make the prince writhe with want.

But he wants more—and Xie Lian can tell.

Can feel it in the way he touches him—in the palpable restraint every time they're together.

And he won't ever take it further on his own, would never dare push Xie Lian into something he doesn't want—and the prince loves him for that.

But he thinks he wants it too .

Hua Cheng takes a deep breath, pulling back to look him in the eye.

"If you change your mind, or decide you want me to stop—you must tell me." Xie Lian nods, but that isn't enough. "Promise me that you will."

"…I promise," he agrees quietly, looking up at him with round eyes.

Hua Cheng leans down again—but it's different, kissing him now.

Hands that always remained politely on his back or waist begin to wander.

Teeth lightly scraping over his lower lip as fingertips tug at the laces of his outer robes.

And if his hands were cautious before—his mouth never wandered below the neck. But now, Xie Lian feels his lips wandering lower as he breaks the kiss, leaving the prince breathing hard, staring at flickering shadows across the marble ceiling.

Back arching as his robes part under the ghost king's hands, and teeth nip at his collarbone. A place he never thought of as sensitive, but every part of him seems to catch fire under Hua Cheng's touch.

"Oh—" he shudders when fingers slide under his robes, thumbs sliding over sensitive skin, flattening his nipples in a slow, gentle drag of pressure, and—

Xie Lian's never been touched there, never even thought of that part of his body, but now, he moans.

"Do you want me to stop?" Hua Cheng asks—and Xie Lian knows that he already knows what the answer will be, because he purrs when he says it.

"Nnngh… ah!" He gasps when lips replace fingers, giving a slow, undeniably sensual suck, shaking his head vehemently. "N…no…"

Technically, Xie Lian only promised that he would tell Hua Cheng if he wanted him to stop—he doesn't have to play along with the teasing questions as the ghost king abuses his chest, sucking and biting until he's flushed and nonsensical—

He doesn't have to, but he does.

It isn't cold when his robes slip down around his waist, leaving his torso bare—the braziers burning brightly around them, a thin layer of heat filling the air.

(Hua Cheng's doing—knowing how his love has never enjoyed the cold.)

And for a moment, he stops to look at him.

He's always kept his gaze above the neck unless necessary, has never stripped Xie Lian's skin bare, but now—he takes it in.

The toned planes of his stomach and chest, the latter of which is flushed and marked from his previous attentions, rising and falling with quiet pants.

Swollen lips, half lidded eyes.

And Xie Lian—

His fingers tighten around the edge of the altar, heart thumping harshly in his chest, wondering…what he's supposed to look like right now.

He's always been beautiful—but he's never given much thought to his body.

Hua Cheng has fostered enough security in their relationship that Xie Lian knows he would be accepted regardless, but that's not the same as knowing that every single part of him is desirable—

But Hua Cheng doesn't leave him time or space to doubt that either.

Placing one hand on his stomach, long fingers splaying across his ribs, watching the muscles of his abdomen contract and shiver under his touch. Pupils blown, lips slightly parted with desire.

And in the next moment, the prince feels as though he's being devoured.

Lips pressing against the spaces between his ribs, a tongue slipping past his navel—sending a sharp sensation down the prince's spine, legs jerking, a surprised little laugh escaping his throat, and when the ghost king looks up with one raised eyebrow—

“I-I think I'm ticklish there,” he explains breathlessly, his cheeks burning as an answering laugh rumbles in Hua Cheng's throat.

“And what about here?”

His teeth brush over the god's hipbone lightly, teasingly, a hint of the tip of a fang scraping, and—

Xie Lian shudders .

“N-Not there…” he admits weakly, eyes rolling back into his head.

Sensitive, maybe—but ticklish isn't the word he would use.

He has to fight the urge to close his legs when Hua Cheng is kneeling like this, not wanting to crush his head between his thighs, but it's hard.

Every touch makes him writhe, and there's something so embarrassing about having his face so close , even if it's equally exciting—but nerve wracking too, watching as his inner robes are untied and pushed down, until they fall aside, landing on the floor in a pile of silk.

Leaving the prince completely undressed—wearing only the jewelry from the ceremony, gleaming under the torch light.

By comparison, Hua Cheng is still completely clothed—and it's intimidating in part, but also…

Exciting in ways that Xie Lian couldn't even begin to explain.

And for one tense moment, he actually thinks he might put his mouth there , from the way he's staring—a thought that is just as thrilling as it is mortifying, and he feels a mixture of anticipation and anxiety building in his gut, but—

Hua Cheng seems to sense that.

His hand wraps around him—a warm, familiar touch. Even if it makes him shudder, hips stuttering slightly—but that's nothing compared to when his head sinks down, turning to the side, pressing open mouthed kisses against the inside of his thigh as his hand works over him.

"S...San La...ng...!" He jumps almost violently when teeth sink into the tender flesh where his leg meets his hip, certainly leaving a mark, and he almost kicks him—but one arm wraps around his leg, pulling it over the ghost king's shoulder—firmly holding him in place

It's not often that Xie Lian could have been manhandled before he got his powers back, and for the last year no one has come close to matching his strength, much less being able to hold him still.

And if the god wanted to get loose, he could—but the strength Xie Lian feels in his arm as he holds him down makes his heart beat even faster, blood rushing confusedly between his face and between his hips.

His bicep flexes powerfully against his outer thigh, long fingers splaying across his hip and stomach, holding him in place—

And Xie Lian thought the hardest part was asking for it.

Oh, he was wrong. So, so wrong.

"Your highness..."

"H...ha...what...?

In retrospect, Xie Lian should have known that he was trying to cow him sooner than this. Stripping him bare so quickly, kneeling between his thighs like this—pushing him, just to make sure that he was absolutely certain, but...

"Would you rather have my mouth instead?"

Now, the heat is decisively rushing to his face, his cheeks turning scarlet as Hua Cheng stares up at him with one raised eyebrow. "It seems like you do."

If Xie Lian is too embarrassed for that , then he certainly wouldn't be ready for the rest.

A test.

Xie Lian knows that, but—

He shakes his head vehemently, his heel digging into the ghost king's shoulder blade.

"N...No..."

Hard to believe, when he's pulsing and flushed—only two inches from Hua Cheng's cheek, embarrassingly enough—

"I...don't want to finish...before..."

"I can make you do that as many times as you like," the calamity points out, his expression turning just a little smug when Xie Lian's eyes grow wide with shock.

"...You can?"

The more accustomed they grow to touching one another, Xie Lian begins to see a new side of him.

Almost like a cat. Xie Lian knows that Hua Cheng would never hurt him—but there are moments when they're like this, and he has the prince decidedly at his mercy—

"I didn't want to push too hard before and make gege cry."

(There's an unspoken 'yet.')

...He has a tendency to play with his food.

Or, more accurately—he can be a bully.

And Xie Lian is shocked and bewildered by how much he...

Enjoys it.

"So," Hua Cheng repeats, now that they have that snag settled, "Where do you want your San Lang to touch you, dianxia?"

The prince is flushed all the way down to his chest, and the only reason his knees aren't knocking together with nerves is because Hua Cheng is between them, but—

"...If you promise...we'll still do...the rest..." he struggles with every single word, his voice hoarse.

Trying to dig deep, find the part of him that still wants to reflexively recite ethics sutras, and strangle it.

Hua Cheng's gaze is half amused, half stunned by his determination.

"...I promise, if you still want it—I will."

It's not an attempted diversion, at least.

He's done that before—when Xie Lian tried to say he could take more if he wanted it, their first few nights together. As if he thought the prince was offering it as an enticement to stay, and—

Maybe that was part of it. Xie Lian can't deny he feels almost desperate for any possible layer of commitment he can pile between them, to chain them together until they could never be separated again. Not because he thinks Hua Cheng would leave, but...

Part of him can't shake the fear of things being lost, stolen, or fading away—like waves beneath the sand.

But that didn't mean that he didn't actually want it, it just meant he felt this overwhelming need not to wait any longer.

"...Then...if you want to..." He starts, only for his voice to break off into an embarrassingly high-pitched moan when Hua Cheng dips his head forward, lips parting—

And then he's surrounded with this wet, maddening heat—and he can't think.

He can't even sit up, sinking back until his elbows hit the marble surface of the altar with a quiet thud , muscles in his torso flexing as he fights the urge to thrust forward into that warmth, not wanting to hurt him, but—

Then he feels the ghost king's cheeks hollowing out around him, sucking, the flat of his tongue sliding down the underside of his length, and Xie Lian can't breathe . If his heart stopped, he wouldn't know. He can only gasp, moan, and writhe.

How did he get so good?

Xie Lian often feels like a newborn fawn with such things, moving about on clumsy, shaky legs—but Hua Cheng is utterly confident with every touch. His tongue sliding over Xie Lian's flesh as though he knows it by heart, like his body is a beloved instrument.

And all the prince can do is clamp one hand over his mouth, muffling gasps and keening moans, his heel digging into Hua Cheng's shoulder until it must be painful, but...

Somehow, he manages to swallow him even deeper, until Xie Lian feels himself hit the back of his throat and keep going , buried halfway down the ghost king's throat—something that couldn't possibly be comfortable, but—

It's so tight, squeezing around him until he sees stars dancing behind his eyelids.

A strangled, broken whimper tears itself from his lips—whining and desperate, hands grasping the edge of the altar until marble begins to crack in long, spidery fault lines.

The desperate, vulnerable sound of pleasure sends the ghost king's gaze snapping up to meet his, and his eye almost seems to burn.

And Xie Lian can't look away.

Not from the sight of his lips stretched around him—the hunger in his expression, as though he would swallow him whole if he could.

Then, he swallows around him, and the prince practically shatters.

His shoulders hit the cold, hard surface of the altar as he loses the ability to hold himself up, his back arching into a perfect bow—arms wrapped around his head as he bites back a scream .

The muscles in his thighs tremble around Hua Cheng's ears as he becomes nonsensical.

"I...I can't...I...!" His hips rock forward, despite his best efforts—and rather than choking, or complaining in the least—

Hua Cheng just takes him deeper, until his nose brushes against skin—his gaze never leaving the prince's body, his expression.

Half hidden underneath his forearms, but every single glimpse of his flushed, contorted expression—lost in the throes of pleasure—is delicious .

His hands lock around Xie Lian's hips, so broad and long his thumbs nearly meet—and it's a silent demand.

One that Xie Lian couldn't put to words, but instinctively understands—and he can't, he can't, he can't , it's too much, it's—

Hua Cheng's throat constricts around him again in another slow, controlled swallow—and he groans , vibrations shooting through the prince's body.

He's drawn more than a few climaxes from his god since his return—but this crests even higher than the others. His entire body trembles and convulsing, always trying to be quiet, but now, he can't stop the moans and cries that rip from his throat.

And he keeps thinking that Hua Cheng must pull off now , because they've been intimate enough times for Xie Lian to understand what doing otherwise would entail, but—

He doesn't.

He holds on, fingertips carving bruises into Xie Lian's hips like wet clay—swallowing everything he has to give. Until Xie Lian is limp and quivering in his grip, feeling as though whatever remains of him might melt down into a puddle on the temple floor.

It's cold when he releases the prince's softening length from between his lips, prompting another sharp shiver—but Hua Cheng's mouth never leaves him, not even for a second.

His lips return to Xie Lian's thighs, licking away anything that escaped during his ministrations.

Sucking occasionally, teeth teasing his flesh until he's left behind a trail of marks and bruises from the bend of his knee to the curve of his hip—and when Xie Lian comes back to himself enough to look down, he loses his breath all over again.

Seeing wet, swollen lips—his gaze still ravenous as he takes in the sight of Xie Lian's limp, shivering body.

And the strangled groan that leaves the prince's throat takes them both by surprise as he reaches for him desperately, pulling him up and into a frantic, clumsy kiss.

It tastes different from before—and after a moment, he comes to the mortifying realization that he's tasting himself , but Hua Cheng leaves no room for him to linger on it.

The silk of his robes sliding against the prince's bare, over sensitive skin as they press close.

Hands sliding up Xie Lian's back, making him gasp and arch into him when he brushes over sensitive points, and when the prince feels the familiar press of his arousal against his thigh, even through his robes —

His stomach lurches in anticipation.

After a minute or two of being kissed breathless, arms hanging loosely around Hua Cheng's neck—he finally begins to notice the fractured, crumbling edge of the altar, and he winces apologetically.

"I'm…sorry," he mumbles against his husband's lips. "Didn't…mean to break…"

But Hua Cheng is quick to hush him, cupping the back of his head, fingers stroking through his hair tenderly.

"I'll be happy to make gege another."

He could carve ten thousand more, if it meant they could do this just as many times.

Xie Lian shivers, beyond trying to tell him that it isn't necessary or that he doesn't expect it—because he knows that's pointless, and—

"Do you want to stop?"

Of course, he acts again—and the subtle reminder of what's to come makes his toes curl in anticipation.

"No," he whispers, his words uneven, weak from how much deeper, rougher Hua Cheng's voice sounds now. "Not…" the prince falters. "Not unless you don't want…"

This entire time, he assumed Hua Cheng never pushed further because he didn't want Xie Lian to feel obligated.

But should he have assumed? Was he being inconsiderate this entire time? Now that he thinks about it, it seems presumptuous at best and self-centered at worst.

If he has to be this determined to convince him, maybe he's the one pushing him into something that he doesn't want—

"…Because if you don't, I won't be upset," the prince continues quickly, biting his lip. "We could do something else, I could try using my mouth on y—"

Hua Cheng's hands slide down, tightening around his hips, and Xie Lian falls silent, his throat tight.

"…Apologies, your highness—it would seem that your husband has been unclear," hearing Hua Cheng refer to himself that way makes his heart flutter, his cheeks pleasantly warm. "I want it too much."

"…Too much?" Xie Lian asks faintly.

Hua Cheng's face presses against his throat, nose brushing over his pulse, then lets out a rattling sigh.

"I want it so much that I'm…concerned about my ability to control myself." He mutters—as though admitting to some mortal weakness. "And if I hurt you, or did something that you didn't want, I…"

Xie Lian's arms tighten around his neck.

"You wouldn't. Even if you lost control, you wouldn't."

"You can't know that—"

"I do," the prince promises him softly. "There's nothing you could do that I wouldn't want."

He can feel Hua Cheng's frown against his neck—and Xie Lian resolves himself to tell him why he's so certain.

But that can come later.

For now, he hugs him tightly, shivering at the coolness of the ghost king's silver jewelry against his skin.

"I trust San Lang completely."

And he could stop him, even if he did lose control. Hua Cheng must know that—but he doesn't want to put Xie Lian in a position where he would need to.

Still, with him completely bare and flushed in his arms, thighs around his hips, hugging him like this…

Hua Cheng shudders.

Xie Lian's breath catches in his throat when the hands on his hips slide underneath his legs, lifting him from the now crumbling altar, wondering if Hua Cheng intends to carry him to the living quarters from here—

But they don't make it that far.

He's surprised when they sink down to the floor here, in the middle of the temple, only to feel blankets and cushions beneath his back—certain that they couldn't have been there before, he would have noticed, but—

Then Hua Cheng is over him, on him, and he stops wondering.

Rarely had the ghost king ever gotten on top of him, allowing Xie Lian to feel his weight over him, around him, and now that he is—the prince feels as though he would rather be crushed by the gravity of him than ever be free of it.

His hands slide down from Hua Cheng's neck, palms flattening against his shoulder blades—feet dragging against silk blankets as he squirms underneath him.

Fumbles for the ties in his robes, knowing exactly where he'll find them—

Because he made them.

His fingers slide beneath the collar as soon as it loosens, hesitant at first, then drifting downwards, feeling the muscles in Hua Cheng's back as he arches into the touch.

His hands grasp against Xie Lian's sides again, moving as if he means to turn him over—but the prince resists, shaking his head.

"…It's more…" The ghost king struggles to form words for a moment, almost drunk on his God's lips, his body underneath him. "More comfortable…"

Xie Lian can imagine why—but he doesn't want to give up the feeling of him in his arms, his lips against his.

"Can we…like this…?"

As if his husband would ever deny him anything.

Shrugging out of his sleeves, resting one forearm next to the prince's head—and Xie Lian's eyes are half lidded, taking in the sight of him in the candlelight.

Hair mussed, bare from the waist up—covered in lean, hard muscle, dark hair falling around him in a curtain.

His other hand trails downward, lips soothing along his jaw as the prince's body tremors beneath his fingertips. Heart pounding, stomach tightening—and he must have been right, saying he could push Xie Lian over the edge as many times as he wanted, because he's already burning.

But unlike the other times when he's touched him like this—his hand turns, pressing against the prince's inner thigh—hitching it higher around his hip, then pushing his other open wider, until his knee is pinned against the ground, and—

Xie Lian has never felt so exposed.

Spread bare beneath his hands, shivering, but that has nothing to do with the cold—breath hitching in quick, uneven breaths as Hua Cheng's palm slides back up his leg, further, further, and—

When he feels the wet, slick press of his finger, his first instinct is to tense.

Not because it hurts , not at all—but because of how reflexively embarrassing it is, being touched somewhere so private, even if he was the one who asked—

And it's slow, so slow that it's almost maddening—like Xie Lian can't take a full breath, squirming with anticipation.

For once, he doesn't need to ask what Hua Cheng is doing, or why—because it's intuitive at this point, even if Xie Lian doesn't think it's necessary, he isn't going to hurt him if he just goes on and—

"Oh—"

A shocked, bewildered gasp escapes him, and Hua Cheng smirks.

His finger curving inside of him—sliding back over that same point, and—

It’s not like anything else they’ve done. That instant flash of pleasure, this—

This is burning pressure, lurching up and coiling in his stomach, but not painfully, no—it’s good.

So good, that when Hua Cheng’s finger slides back and forth over the same point, it coaxes out a strangled whimper.

“It doesn’t hurt, does it, your highness?” The ghost king purrs against his jaw, completely ignoring Xie Lian’s arousal, hard and leaking against his stomach.

“If you don’t tell me, I’ll have to stop…” he muses, moving as if he’s starting to pull out, and it’s remarkable, because the prince was silently mortified only a few minutes ago, and now—

“It doesn’t h…hurt!” The prince chokes out, tightening his leg around his waist.

Asking Xie Lian if something hurts at all is a pointless exercise—they both know that—but the prince would willingly indulge any whim at the moment if it meant that Hua Cheng wouldn't stop doing that .

It's a struggle to even describe the feeling.

The stretch is something he would have assumed would feel unpleasant, but his body actually shakes in silent delight when Hua Cheng adds another, rocking his hips down into it instead of away from it.

Every time his muscles clench down—the resistance around the fingers inside of him feels good . The friction when they move, pressing and curling deeper, hitting that spot again with a slow, merciless precision that has the god on the verge of tears, but not from pain.

"...S...San...L...La..." His breath hitches between every syllable, thighs trembling with every crook of the ghost king's fingers, and when he manages to look up through his lashes—

He finds Hua Cheng staring at him in wide eyed wonder, lips parted, pupil blown.

And Xie Lian can barely stand it, turning his face into his husband's forearm in a desperate bid to escape the embarrassment of being watched so intently in this state, almost wishing he had turned over when he had the chance.

"Don't...please don't...look at m...me like..."

In a rare instance, he makes a request that Hua Cheng cannot grant. Or, more accurately— will not.

"Oh, but I can't help it..." he leans down, his breath fanning over Xie Lian's cheek, teeth scraping against his earlobe as his fingers crook inside of him, making him cry out. "I shouldn't be surprised, gege is always naturally gifted in anything he tries, but…" his fingers shift inside of him, spreading—bracketing that spot, massaging around the edges of it until Xie Lian actually whines , muffling himself against his husband's arm.

"I think you could get there again with just this, couldn't you?"

Hua Cheng knows enough to understand that not everyone enjoys being taken like this. If Xie Lian had been one of them, he would have been perfectly content to perform that role himself, but—

He never expected this to suit the prince so well .

His pain tolerance is such that discomfort was never a hindering concern—but for him to enjoy it like this, rocking down into his fingers, tightening with every press at just the right angle.

"Or this?"

A third finger slips inside to join the others, and Hua Cheng has never had small hands, but they feel impossibly long and thick, every knuckle brushing past his muscles as they slide deeper, and—

Xie Lian really thinks he could .

"S…San Lang, please…"

"Hmm?"

Xie Lian doesn't lift his face from Hua Cheng's arm, reaching down to wrap his hand around the ghost king's wrist, making the fingers inside of him grow still.

And for a moment, the prince struggles to find the words.

Tossing them around in his head, trying to find something that isn't so mortifying and crude, but—

The words he does use, while not necessarily explicit…

“T… please , just…take…”

“Take what, gege?” The ghost king raises an eyebrow, and—

“Me,” he answers hoarsely.

While not lewd in nature, they have quite an effect .

Xie Lian hears a soft swear, muttered halfway under Hua Cheng’s breath—startling, because he normally never curses at him, or even in his presence, but—

He doesn’t even make his god say please.

Xie Lian bites back a groan of loss when he feels Hua Cheng’s fingers slip out of him, lifting his other leg to hitch around his husband’s waist as he pushes his robes down past his hips—but a hand catches him under the knee, lifting his leg over the calamity’s shoulder.

A position that somehow feels even more exposed than he already was, but—

Xie Lian feels lips press against his temple, and his heart softens.

Remembering that, even if some part of him can't help but feel mortified—he's safe. He's taken care of. Adored .

For so long, it felt like this was something that could be stolen from him. Regarded with only anxiety and dread as just one more thing that Bai Wuxiang could use against him, turning it into another scar, another painful memory.

But it isn't.

There's pressure when Hua Cheng guides himself in, but no pain. Only this feeling of satisfaction that Xie Lian never could have understood until now. Feeling so deeply intertwined with another person that the lines between their bodies begin to blur.

Before, it’s always been one of them focusing on the other. Giving, then taking.

This isn’t that.

Now, they're both feeling it. Hua Cheng's face sinking into his neck, breathing hard—Xie Lian's arms tight around his shoulders, trembling faintly.

He always knew that he was big—he's felt the ghost king's arousal in his hand, against his thigh enough times by now to know that, but—

But this is different.

Sinking further and further until Xie Lian's breath feels punched out of his lungs.

Until he can practically feel him in his throat .

His cheeks are scorching, breaths coming in shallow, hitched gasps, his thigh trembling where it's trapped between their chests, his foot dangling over his shoulder, toes tightly curled.

When their hips are finally flush, it feels like an accomplishment in a way that he really couldn't explain, but—

The low, almost animalistic groan that echoes in the back of Hua Cheng's throat steals his thoughts.

He can feel it in the pit of his stomach like a pleasant pull.

Practically trembling from the effort it takes to hold still, one hand holding his prince by the hip, the other propped over his head.

Giving him time to adjust, even Xie Lian doesn't need that.

But seeing how careful he is with him makes his heart ache pleasantly.

After a long moment of struggling to catch his breath, his body tensing and relaxing over and over again as he slowly begins to control his breathing, adjusting to the sensation of being so full —one of his hands reaches over his head, finding Hua Cheng's on the floor.

Intertwining their fingers, squeezing, turning his head until his cheek presses into his husband's hair, breathing him in.

And when he closes his eyes, there's only the weight of his husband on top of him, inside of him. The smell of the forest, the sound of crackling flames.

Xie Lian finds himself surprised by the quiet realization...that even if he'd never gotten his sight back, he could have been happy with this.

With the way that Hua Cheng can occupy every other sense, and it feels like home.

The ghost king finally seems to collect himself enough to press a kiss to the underside of his jaw, squeezing the prince's fingers in return.

"Still alright?" His voice is soft, gentle—all from a man who was so worried about his self-control.

"Mmm..." Xie Lian manages to hum quietly in affirmation, his nose tickling in Hua Cheng's hair. "I just...don't understand..." He's almost incoherent, thoughts falling straight from his mind and out of his lips without any restraint.

"Understand...what?"

The prince squirms for a moment, legs tightening around him until Hua Cheng has to bite back a hiss, and he eventually mumbles—

"How...all of this comes so...naturally, for you..."

It's certainly not easy, but he knows what Xie Lian means.

He's never been ashamed of the simple existence of desire, or lust. And while he's never felt worthy of taking pleasure in his god's body like this—the simple fact of physical attraction was never something he was taught to be repulsed by.

And it's not Xie Lian's fault that he was taught to feel that way.

But he also wasn't as lucky as Hua Cheng was.

He didn't have someone to tell him something different.

"...Well," the ghost king slowly lifts his head, kissing his husband's chin, then his nose—and finally his lips. "Someone told me something when I was young...and it always stuck with me."

"They...they did...?" Xie Lian cuts himself off with an unsteady moan when Hua Cheng pulls back slightly, only to rock his hips back into him in a gentle, experimental movement. One that sends bolts of pleasure radiating down his limbs, pooling in his stomach.

"He did," Hua Cheng murmurs, his tone slightly roughened and distracted with the pleasure—but that doesn't deter him from pressing their foreheads together, holding Xie Lian's even more tightly. "He told me that loving someone was the most beautiful thing a person could do."

Xie Lian grows silent, his throat suddenly tight as he remembers that day.

Knowing now that even back then, Hong'er must have been in love with him. And all of the things that he said.

About how he wanted someone with nice hair, preferably—long, and soft.

How it didn't matter if the person was taller than him at the time, because he was still growing.

That it didn't matter if the person was a man or a woman—as long as they were smart, kind, and brave.

Those were the important things.

All Xie Lian remembers wanting back then was for Hong'er to never feel ashamed of himself. To never be struck by the self-loathing and anxiety that Xie Lian never knew how to escape on his own.

Knowing now that it worked, that he was able to give him that...it brings tears to his eyes, his lips trembling as he kisses his husband with all of the composure he can spare.

"Oh, love..." the ghost king squeezes his hand, their faces still pressed close. "Don't cry..."

Love.

Just hearing Hua Cheng call him that makes the prince shudder, because...

After so many years alone—feeling tainted, unwanted, and disgraced, like he wasn't worthy of being protected, or even remembered—

Xie Lian feels loved.

Unconditional, unwavering affection.

It's not the first time that he's been adored or worshipped, but he's never felt it in his bones. As though it rushes into him with every breath he takes. Filling up the void inside of his chest until that constant sorrow, that dark corner in every room he's in—grows faint.

"...I can't help it," he whispers brokenly, his arm tightening around Hua Cheng's back, even though he couldn't possibly get him any closer than this. "I just...love you, San Lang," his voice is so laden with emotion, it trembles and cracks. "I love you so much."

Hua Cheng's expression contorts with emotion—and he can't help but start to move now, slow, powerful rolls of his hips reducing the man underneath him into a mess of gasps, moans, and cries of his name. Fingernails digging into his shoulder, and gods , he hopes it bleeds.

"I love you," he speaks the words directly against his lips, something he doesn't say as often as Xie Lian. Not because he doesn't feel it, or because he never wants to—he simply never felt worthy of it.

But now, they're married. They're family.

Who else has a right to say that, if not him?

"I love you so much, it...almost hurts me," his voice grows rougher as they start to move together in an easy, natural rhythm. As if they were meant for this. "Every...single...moment..."

And it's not that Xie Lian could know , it's not something that he would ever do intentionally. But every single moment, he's dragging Hua Cheng deeper in.

Like roots growing between the cracks in stone, carving it into something new.

Loving someone really is the most beautiful thing a person can do.

Because it's so hard to choose love in a world that teaches you that you will never deserve it.

To allow that love to change you, to make you want to be better, in a society that only sees you as a monster.

But Xie Lian makes that choice easy. And makes it possible for Hua Cheng to choose it again, and again, and again .

With every gentle smile. Every single act of kindness. Each strained laugh and annoyed sigh.

His bravery, his patience, and his reluctant anger.

The quiet strength that has never faltered, even when he was at his lowest.

Even his imperfections that he judges himself so harshly for—because they don't make him weak, or cruel. They make him human.

Every single facet makes him fall again, further, and harder.

Xie Lian loves this world, and the people in it. Hua Cheng loves the world because he's in it.

And he can't find words to describe that feeling, other than the ones falling from his lips as he moves faster, with increasing fervor.

"So... beautiful , it's...like you don't even know..."

The prince shakes his head weakly, trying to turn his face into the pillows to hide his shyness—but Hua Cheng only takes advantage of the exposed column of his throat.

"Don't...Don't say..."

"Gege doesn't believe me?"

His teeth sink in, and he’s almost apologetic when his sharpened canines scrape over the god’s pulse—until he feels Xie Lian’s powerful shudder in response, tightening around him in a flash of pleasure.

Oh.

“Should I show gege what he looks like, like this?”

It’s then there Xie Lian seems to remember the silver butterflies fluttering overhead, all around him, his heart leaping into his throat.

Is Hua Cheng recording this?

“Or,” his voice lowers, snatching his God’s attention with ease. “I could take you in front of a mirror next time, so you can see how perfect you are like this…” he was always so cautious with his fangs before, but now, able to feel how much the prince enjoys it, he drags them down the column of his throat.

Next time.

Yes, yes —

Xie Lian doesn't know if there will ever be a next time—because he doesn't know if they'll ever be able to stop .

How does anyone stop, when it feels like this?

But the thought of being made to watch himself—that's too embarrassing.

"I don't…I don't think I…need to see…" Xie Lian slurs, eyes rolling back into his head, but then, just as he's in the middle of talking , Hua Cheng's hand tightens around his hip, angling up—

And the next thrust hits so deep, the prince lets out a sharp sob.

"That would be a shame…" his husband muses, fangs scraping over his shoulder, growling as the prince tightens around him. "It's the most beautiful thing I've ever seen."

Xie Lian shakes his head harshly in embarrassment, stammering—but he can't form coherent words.

Anything besides Hua Cheng's name is too much—and even then, it's broken, quiet cries, punctuated by gasps and moans, his body trembling.

It was overwhelming when Hua Cheng caressed that place inside of him with his fingertips. But now, driving into it over and over again —

It's too much . It's not enough. And Xie Lian feels almost detached from the rest of himself, focusing only on that tightening knot of pleasure in his stomach. Different from anything he's felt before. Slow building, like a rising tide.

Tears slip down his cheeks from the near overstimulation, his arms trembling—and when the ghost king begins to slow, lifting his head to check on him—

Xie Lian's hips jerk down desperately, crying out;

"D- Don't stop!"

And that makes something in Hua Cheng's brain snap.

As if he would ever stop—as if he could .

But hearing that draws a rumble from the back of his throat, moving faster, harder , until Xie Loan feels his heartbeat fall into sync with his rhythm, pounding in his ears.

And his lips don't stop, either.

His words are barely intelligible, breathless, nearly drowned out by the sound surrounding them—but Hua Cheng hears every single one.

Yes, yes , there, right there—don't stop, please don't stop.

Nails scraping into the skin of his shoulders in pace with every thrust.

That tide is riding faster now, building into this slow, overwhelming knot of warm, pleasurable pressure—

And when it crashes over him, it's unlike anything Xie Lian has ever felt before.

His body trembling from head to toe, thoughts melting together, his back arching.

When Hua Cheng pushed him over the edge before—it was always white hot and sudden, euphoric , but this—

This is longer, and far more intense.

Xie Lian couldn't tell anyone his own name right now, much less put the sensation to words.

Hua Cheng doesn't ease or slow as his husband writhes and sobs underneath him, even as the overwhelming tightness squeezing around him threatens to steal his sanity —

He just works him through it, jaw clenched, his gaze sharp and heated with a single-minded focus.

Easing the prince's leg down from his shoulder as his body begins to grow limp, kissing the inside of his knee reverently, preparing to pull back when—

When Xie Lian's nails dig into his skin sharply, his other leg turning into a vice around his hips.

"No…"

Hua Cheng bites back a hiss, the muscles in his shoulders coiling and tensing from the effort it takes to stop himself from falling under the pull of his own pleasure.

“It…it’s alright, I don’t need…”

In truth, he never would have lasted this long if not for the fact that he was so focused on his lover’s pleasure first, but the body tends to be far more sensitive in the wake of a climax. It might be too much for—

“W… want you to…”

Xie Lian’s voice might be fractured and unsteady—but he isn’t asking.

There’s a hint of a demand in his tone.

And once he hears that—

Hua Cheng can’t stop. Can’t think .

Hands wrapping around Xie Lian’s hips, claws digging in until he gasps from the sensation.

The prince wraps both arms around his neck, holding him close, and while Xie Lian tried to bite back every sound that slipped from his lips—even now, choking on overstimulated moans and whines—

Hua Cheng makes no such effort.

Groaning next to Xie Lian’s ear, whispering how beautiful he is, how good he feels, crying out for his dianxia over and over again, but never—

“S-San Lang—” Xie Lian pants, eyes half out of focus, hands clutching at his shoulders. “C-Could you…”

“Y…yes?”

“…Say my name,” the prince whispers hoarsely, his voice turned raw from the tears.

His name.

His name .

Xie Lian has only ever heard Hua Cheng say it to him once as far as he can remember—and he was angry , because the prince had used the soul switching spell in Fu Gu.

But now, as his husband—he has every right to call him that.

He's one of the only people to have ever possessed that privilege.

When that realization hits him, his unbeating heart jumps in his chest.

"…Xie Lian."

The sound of it makes the prince shudder .

It's been so long since anyone (aside from the Rain Master, on rare occasions) called him that. The last he can remember was his parents—and it was never like this.

Said with such awe and reverence, like a sutra of the highest kind.

And once he says it, he doesn't stop.

"Xie Lian…"

He says it again, and again, and again , sounding more and more undone with every utterance.

"Xie Lian!"

"San…San Lang!"

Calling to each other back and forth in breathless cries, bodies intertwined as though they were made to fit together.

This time, it takes Xie Lian completely by surprise when that feeling rises up in him again, his thighs trembling around his husband's hips as his body clenched down around him again.

Hua Cheng's movements grow slower, deeper, and more erratic.

Starting to pull back again when he feels himself pulse and twitch inside of him, but—

Xie Lian won't let him go.

Arms and legs wrapped around him in a vice, shaking his head when Hua Cheng tries to warn him.

"I-I'm going to—"

Then, he moans one word that stuns the calamity into near silence, his mind going blank.

"Inside."

For a man who could barely manage to ask Hua Cheng to take him without dying of embarrassment, it takes him completely off guard—and it sends him flying over the edge.

Growing still, trembling just as much as Xie Lian now as he pulses and spills inside of him, each holding on to one another tightly as the heat rushes through them both.

And when he collapses on top of him, still panting his name—Xie Lian doesn't think he's ever felt so satisfied. So complete .

So grounded with the weight of his husband in his arms, their bodies tightly intertwined.

The tears begin to slow as they fall down his cheeks, his breaths evening out—and the moment he finds himself lucid, he feels Hua Cheng's lips.

Kissing him everywhere they can reach.

His throat, his jaw, all over his face—then his mouth, with a tenderness that makes the prince melt in his arms.

"…I love you," he murmurs, pressing their foreheads together once more, his fingertips stroking away the tear tracks on his prince's cheeks.

And Xie Lian couldn't explain why, after so many centuries without shedding a tear, that brings them to his eyes so easily.

Kissing his husband again, hugging him tightly in his arms.

"I love you too," he croaks, unable to identify the feeling in his chest.

Not sadness, or pain. But not entirely happiness either.

Or maybe it is, but the kind of happiness that fills you up so much, it hurts.

Finding himself wishing desperately that he could reach back through time, and whisper to a boy he once knew.

One who felt such terror, the first time he desired another man. Who laid awake at night, haunted by his own imperfections.

Who watched golden palaces fall, and kingdoms turn to ash.

A young god who knelt before the pyre of his last believer.

Xie Lian wishes now, more than he ever has, that he could reach back and tell that child that there was happiness to be found after all of that suffering. That he could have had that hope to hold onto, in all of his centuries stumbling around in the dark.

Because only now, in the arms of the man who has always loved him so well, knowing that this isn't going to be taken from him, that he's safe —

Xie Lian begins to ask himself a question that he always assumed the answer to:

Did he deserve it?

The existence of the punishment, the weight of his shackles—it always made him assume that he was guilty of the crime.

Xie Lian never asked what that crime was, or whether he had committed it.

Did he deserve the pain, the loss, the loneliness—the shame?

Part of him can't help but think yes, because he's always believed that.

And another side of him, one that has laid dormant for far too long, a seed planted by a boy who fell from the sky long, long ago—

Thinks that no one could ever deserve that.

Not even him.

Hua Cheng's face nuzzles into his neck, kissing his pulse as it begins to even and slow, and still, when he tries to pull back, Xie Lian holds him in place.

"Are you alright?"

"…Yes," the god answers softly, eyes reflecting the butterflies overhead. "…Can we stay like this…a little longer?"

He doesn't want to lose that feeling of fullness, being tied down by the weight of him—not just yet.

“It must be heavy…”

“Yes,” Xie Lian murmurs, hugging him around his neck. “But I like it.”

And Hua Cheng has no argument for that.

They stay that way for what must be at least another hour. Holding one another, the flames flickering around them as Hua Cheng showers him in kisses, words of reverence and affection.

But eventually, when the sweat on Xie Lian’s body cools, and he begins to shiver—the ghost king insists that they move.

Carrying his god from the worship hall of the temple—taking him to the baths.

Xie Lian is far too tired for an actual soak—but he relents to sitting in the water in his husband’s arms. Allowing Hua Cheng to wash him—rubbing soap and scented oils into his hair.

A gesture Xie Lian insists on returning, even if his arms still feel almost stiff with exhaustion—but the ghost king doesn’t complain about the time it takes.

They’ve never bathed together before.

(Well, not when the prince was aware that it was him .)

It’s something Xie Lian would have been too embarrassed to even suggest, and Hua Cheng never dared.

But now, the intimacy comes easily.

Having the ghost king’s bare skin pressed against his own. Being carefully toweled dry when they get out—dressed in soft inner robes.

It takes him a moment to realize where they are when he’s lowered into bed—held comfortably against Hua Cheng’s chest.

The same bedchamber he slept in as a teenager, cultivating in this very temple.

Back again, eight centuries later. On his wedding night, in his husband’s arms.

His body tired and pleasantly used—quickly sinking towards sleep, gently urged on by Hua Cheng's hands rubbing his back. Humming a wordless song on his ear. A tune he sang so long ago, on cold nights in Puqi Village.

When dreams take him, he now has no need to remember them.

Sleep is no longer an escape from memory. Waking up isn't something that Xie Lian dreads.

Unlike so many other nights—he sleeps peacefully, free from nightmares or fitfulness.

A man who finally caught a falling star between his hands.

With no intention of ever letting go.

Chapter End Notes

> 1.1 million words later...they fucked! I doubt that breaks the record but that, my friends, is what I call a slow burn.
>
> Also, since 90% of this story has absolutely no porn what-so-ever, you can skip the NSFW chapters or have whatever head canons you want about their sex lives in this story, it does not bother me! I want it to be an enjoyable experience for everyone, and I know people have varying interests and preferences when it comes to ship dynamics.
>
> xoxo, Evie

Born Beneath a Star of Solitude

Chapter Summary

He can feel fingers stroking through his hair—an indicator that he hasn't woken up first—and when he looks up, he meets a familiar gaze.

"Good morning, your highness."

Xie Lian's smile widens as he leans up on his elbows, kissing him sleepily.

Back to using his title—likely out of habit—but that's alright.

He has a title of his own to call him now.

"Good morning, husband."

Xie Lian doesn't wake in the morning until the sun has already risen high in the sky. Birds sing outside the window, wind passing gently through the trees.

The first thing he sees when he opens his eyes is his hand, curled on the pillows next to his head.

The thread of a red affinity knot tied around his finger gleams in the morning sun, drawing a small smile to his lips.

He can feel fingers stroking through his hair—an indicator that he hasn't woken up first—and when he looks up, he meets a familiar gaze.

"Good morning, your highness."

Xie Lian's smile widens as he leans up on his elbows, kissing him sleepily.

Back to using his title—likely out of habit—but that's alright.

He has a title of his own to call him now.

"Good morning, husband."

Hua Cheng lips curve upward against his as he pulls him closer—but

Xie Lian can sense something in the way he touches him. A faint hint of distraction that piques his curiosity.

“Is something on your mind?”

Normally, he would say Xie Lian needn’t bother himself with it. But…

“…Yes,” he admits slowly.

Xie Lian leans his cheek against his chest, seeking out the warmth that always seems to emanate from him. Something that was baffling before—but less so, since Yushi Huang’s revelation.

“What is it?”

“…I’m not sure if there’s a point in saying it.”

He says that so wearily—now, he has the prince’s full attention.

“If it’s bothering you, then there’s certainly a point.”

“…” Hua Cheng releases a long, heavy sigh, resting his chin on top of Xie Lian’s head.

He should have told him about this sooner.

Not because he necessarily had any obligation to—he knows that he doesn’t, and Xie Lian wouldn’t have been angry with him for saying nothing.

Rather than that—because telling his god might help him decide what to do.

So, he does.

Xie Lian listens carefully, eyes widening sharply with shock at certain points—then filling with sympathy. And when he’s told him all of it, and the prince has had a moment to think—he asks him questions.

What he wants, what he feels.

Hua Cheng isn’t sure of either. But as Xie Lian speaks with him, carefully walking him through all of the possible outcomes—he starts to gain some amount of clarity.

But regardless of what he decides—he has no intention of acting on it today.

Instead, he spends his morning feeding his husband breakfast, sliding pieces of sliced fruit into Xie Lian's mouth until he pleads that he's gotten full.

Not long after, the prince ends up in his lap—and hours later, they return to the baths once again, pleasantly exhausted.

They'll venture out in a few days—allowing word to trickle down the way it always does. First with Xie Lian's friends, notably disgruntled at having not been invited, but the screaming and bickering that breaks out when they find out is enough to confirm that Xie Lian made the right choice in keeping their nuptials private.

But disgruntlement is not the same thing as disapproval—and when they witness their prince's happiness—shining brighter than they've ever seen him—

How could they take issue with it?

For the rest of the Heavens, now aware that Hua Cheng is, at least technically, one of them—offer their own begrudging acceptance.

And as it so often does, acceptance—the act of moving on—brings things that have long since been buried under the surface back into the light.

The seasons begin their slow, inevitable turns. Autumn leaves begin to fall. Cool breezes bring winter snows.

A busy time of year for medicinal and civil gods—but less so for their martial counterparts. Mortals rarely start their battles in the cold.

Aside from Yushi Huang, whose duties peak during planting and harvest seasons, there is no lull in the roles of the Elemental Masters.

The Wind and Water Masters are often busy enough with their duties and their growing son that they're rarely present for official gatherings.

And where their attentions lapse, the thunder master often makes up the difference.

To be expected from Shi Qingxuan's elder brother— and the man who is ordered to He Xuan's service for the next ninety nine years, but...

His husband finds it irritating.

"...Pei Ming," he sighs heavily, sounding labored and long-suffering, even as he arches his throat into the emperor's lips, shivering with every kiss pressed against the crook of his neck. "I was supposed to leave an hour ago."

"Supposed to?" The older man grumbles. "Since when are gods forced to operate on a set schedule?"

The thunder master relents for a moment, turning his head to allow his husband to kiss him fully, fingers tangling in the back of his hair, tilting his head back to deepen it, but—

Shi Wudu pulls back.

"No one is forcing me, it's called time management." He points out sternly, tapping him on the forehead with his fan.

(Purely ceremonial now—but he still prefers to carry one in a force of habit.)

"You should try it sometime."

Pei Ming's arms remain stubbornly locked around his waist--and while Shi Wudu might surpass them in many other areas, brute physical strength is not one of them.

Leaving him trapped in the emperor's lap, tragically.

"Why should I, when you and Ling Wen manage my time so well?"

He leans in, pressing his lips to the thunder master's throat once more, hunting down that spot beneath his jaw that always makes his eyes roll back into his head—

And he does achieve the intended result, a deliciously restrained sigh escaping Shi Wudu's lips.

"Pei Ming."

"Oh baobei, don't be so cruel—”

"Baobei?" He sounds so shocked, half scandalized, that the emperor can't help but pull back with a devilish grin.

"What, you don't like it?" A grin that widens when he sees the color of Shi Wudu's cheeks. "Oh, you do like it."

He can also see the muscles in the Thunder Master's jaw working, a surefire sign that Pei Ming has tiptoed far too close to the edge of his tolerance, but he's far too thrilled with the discovery to pay it any—

Thud!

"Ow!" The general whines, not in any pain at all.

Shi Wudu didn't gently tap him with the fan this time, instead choosing to whack him upside the head with it. "There's no need for violence, I won't call you that in front of anyone else..."

(Unless Pei Ming finds it devastatingly necessary, of course.)

"Allow me to manage your time for you as you so aptly described it, and remind you that you have a meeting this morning as well. And ," he glances out the window, checking the height of the sun in the sky. "You're already going to be late."

And just like that, the emperor's expression turns from delighted teasing to sulking.

"...I don't care what anyone else says," he grumbles under his breath. "You'll always be the Water Tyrant to me."

In a cruel and unusual, mocking gesture, Shi Wudu kisses his cheek.

"That's very sweet of you to say."

He tugs at Pei Ming's wrists again, silently demanding freedom—and this time, his husband allows it. Sorrowfully. Pitifully.

"Can an emperor even really be late? Nothing would start without me, anyway."

"And I'm the tyrant?"

"Somehow..." Pei Ming sighs, forlorn as he watches him pull on his outer robes, adjusting his hair for a moment as he makes his way out the door. "I can't believe you're making me go by myself."

"Ling Wen and Lord Rain Master are accompanying you."

"Exactly," he grumbles.

Both are helpful and responsible separately. Together, they become easily distracted. And by that, Pei Ming means that his friend has the irritating tendency to pull the Rain Master away and throw her over the nearest flat surface whenever she grows bored.

Given his own tendencies, he can't exactly blame her for that, but it often leads him handling the entire affair by himself.

"I'm surprised Blackwater isn't forcing you to go along, since he'll be in attendance."

And during the last meeting Pei Ming attended where both were in attendance, he had to watch his husband serve the man tea.

He crushed his own cup at the sight, rendering it to nothing more than jasmine flavored dust.

"Qingxuan is in the mortal realm on business."

Which means someone has to look after his nephew--a task that Shi Wudu would never delegate, adoring the baby as if he were his own.

Pei Ming understands that. He does. It almost makes him wish that they...

"You haven't shaved—and you aren't even dressed."

"Fine, fine..." Pei Ming grouses, rising to his feet, stretching his arms over his head as he walks toward the vanity. His robes are still untied, showing a bare, tanned torso underneath as he leans forward, using spiritual power to rid himself of any remaining stubble.

Shi Wudu pauses in the doorway for a moment, watching him appreciatively.

"You could always order He Xuan off on some errand after the meeting, you know."

As emperor, he can do that.

"You could join us when you're finished."

The idea of an afternoon spent with his husband and nephew brings a small smile to the emperor's face, and he suddenly seems a little less miserable about the prospect of getting dressed.

"Have I ever told you that you're a genius?"

"Many times."

"And that I love you?"

His mouth quirks up at the corner into a small, lopsided smile. "Once or twice."

Pei Ming's eyebrows raise. "I'm certain I've said it far more than that."

"I can't recall..."

"Forgetting so easily? So cold, baobei—”

A throw pillow hits the back of his head with a thud!

"I'll look forward to seeing you later if you promise you'll stop being a nuisance."

"I make no such promises, but something tells me you'll look forward to seeing me anyway."

His husband gives him no answer before he slips out of the room—but the soft laugh he hears from the other side of the door draws a wide smile across his face.

Ruling is a burden, yes. One that he never sought out.

But there's a surprising amount of happiness to be found.

A much needed reminder, predating a meeting he hasn't been particularly looking forward to.

Tai Hua and Qi Ying accompany him—under the premise he couldn't attend such a meeting without some form of protection (and Ling Wen and Yushi Huang are not that.)

But each of them volunteered, likely wanting an excuse to see those who would be in attendance.

As such, the journey is relatively quiet for Pei Ming. Lang Qianqiu spends most of it barking at Quan Yizhen to stop being distracted—but he doesn't have to deal with that.

Ling Wen and Yushi Huang are relatively well-behaved for the moment as well. The Rain Master holds the civil goddess's sleeve as they walk, speaking quietly in her private array.

Not good for conversation, but they're both still vertical. He considers that a blessing.

The meeting itself is held on neutral ground. A local tea house with no temples or lairs nearby—and the owners completely oblivious to who their guests might be, all of them using disguises once they enter, taking their seats along a long, low-lying table.

Five gods on one side, and three Ghost Kings (plus one savage ghost) on the other.

And one martial god—who hasn't come to participate, simply sitting by his husband's side, absentmindedly weaving threads for what looks like the beginnings of a belt between his fingers.

It's the first time a meeting of this kind has ever been attempted--and while the ghost realm has always pointedly flouted the structure and hierarchy that the Heavens embrace, Hua Cheng sits at the center.

"Thank you for agreeing to meet with us today."

Ironically, this meeting wasn't Pei Ming or Hua Cheng's idea—it was Xie Lian who made the suggestion to the emperor months ago, before Hua Cheng had even returned.

Encouraging the elder martial god to consider the possibility of a future where the ghost realm wasn't alienated.

"Wouldn't it be silly of us not to?" The newest ghost king mutters, twirling a chopstick between his fingers, having ordered himself a plate of seared meat. And He Xuan, who didn't order any for himself, has been picking off of his plate since they arrived.

"Given that each of you is either a god, romantically involved with a god, or both , yes," Ling Wen agrees dryly. "Pretending our realms have nothing to do with one another would be quite silly."

Lang Qianqiu glances toward Ren Song, only to meet Crimson Rain's sharp glare.

He's done nothing to discourage the relationship. Interfering in other people's choices has never been his style. But he has sent lethal looks Lang Qianqiu's way whenever he so much as glances at Ren Song in his presence.

"It doesn't make us allies, either."

"No," Pei Ming agrees. "But we don't have to be."

There's quite a bit of room between adversaries and an alliance.

"I'm aware of the fact that Jun Wu's policy was to suppress the ghost realm when and where he could. The animosity was largely caused on our end."

It's a taking of responsibility that none of the ghosts present would have expected—but Ren Song seems visibly pleased to hear it.

"Yes," Ling Wen agrees, watching Hua Cheng with a cold gaze. "That, and he slaughtered thirty-three of our own."

Hua Cheng doesn't show an ounce of shame. Doesn't shrink from her gaze, or avert his own.

"I suppose we share a violent streak, Nangong Jie."

Clearly, she's still smarting from the verbal lashing he gave her in Puqi Shrine over the Brocade Immortal incident.

Pei Ming holds up a hand to force her to ease off, smiling diplomatically. "I'd say slaughtered is an exaggeration, Ling Wen. They broke their word, and he was owed compensation."

"He challenged them to that duel knowing he wouldn't let them walk away alive, your majesty."

"And they didn't have to accept the challenge," Pei Ming shrugs, throwing his hands up. "Nan Yang and Xuan Zhen are still alive and kicking."

Not something that Hua Cheng seems entirely thrilled about, muttering something unintelligible.

"Only because they were too busy doing god knows whatever it is they get up to when they're alone, and he was also involved in that business that nearly got Shi Wudu and Shi Qingxuan killed—”

"He wasn't." Blackwater speaks up firmly, swallowing the last of Shuo's food. "He was bound by an oath to me made many years before not to interfere in my business. But he never assisted me. He even tried to change my mind more than once."

That shocks nearly all of them—except for Xie Lian, who gives his husband's hand a fond squeeze beneath the table.

It wasn't exactly self-serving of He Xuan to confess that he had the chance to be talked out of it on multiple occasions—giving Pei Ming and Ling Wen even more reason to despise him, but...the emperor almost seems to respect him for admitting it.

"Then I suppose that adds them to the very short list of gods he hasn't tried to kill," Ling Wen grumbles, crossing her arms, and—

"He did it for me."

Everyone turns their gaze to Xie Lian, who has been quiet up until now.

"...San Lang witnessed...a very unfortunate incident between me and those thirty-three officials during my first banishment," Xie Lian explains quietly.

Once he learned which officials were killed, and who Hua Cheng really was—it became quite obvious.

"He challenged them to defend my honor."

Xie Lian gives no details—but his reluctance to do so leaves little room for anyone to argue the validity of Hua Cheng's reasons.

"...Is that also why he abducted and interrogated several of my deputies over the years?"

Hua Cheng stiffens, his eyebrows raising sharply. "Are you really so bitter that you would accuse me of something I didn't do?"

"Don't play stupid," Ling Wen glares. "You berated them over the locations of Heavenly Officials in exile, which makes sense now—"

"I wouldn't have needed to," Hua Cheng rolls his eyes, gesturing to He Xuan. "He was keeping me apprised of everything the Heavens knew at all times."

"You expect me to believe that? Who else would have done that?"

"Hell if I know, but it wasn't me —"

THUD!

The two of them stop, looking at Quan Yizhen, who slammed his hand down on the table to gain everyone's attention.

Golden eyes stare them down sharply, gleaming under the lantern lights overhead. "Shixiong has been trying to speak. You're both rude."

In almost comical unison, they turn their heads to look at Yin Yu—who looks like he wants to sink under the table and die a second time, staring at them through his fingers.

"...I was the one who did that, Ling Wen Zhen Jun," he croaks.

"...Huh?"

Hua Cheng, in a rare instance, looks almost comically shocked, his mouth hanging open--and Ling Wen is equally bewildered.

"...You?" She asks incredulously.

"Hua Chengzhu never ordered me to!" Yin Yu explains, waving his hands nervously.

"But I was tasked with searching for information on his highness, and...the best place to look for that sort of information would have been with your palace..."

It gave him a better chance than he would have had of finding information on Xie Lian before Blackwater did. It was the only important assignment Hua Cheng ever gave him, and succeeding in it was pretty much his only means of elevating himself in the ghost realm—

And finally, Hua Cheng's eye slides to the right, pointing out;

"You're the only one who doesn't seem surprised."

Ren Song looks up at him with big, innocent eyes, sipping from his tea cup. "I think it's pretty messed up of you to invalidate my reaction just because I'm not clutching my pearls—"

"Speak."

"...Okay, I didn't kidnap anyone , let me get that straight right now—!"

Hua Cheng presses his fingertips against his temples, already exasperated, and Xie Lian rubs small circles into his back, something he's taken up doing when the calamity grows stressed.

"But he's not very good at interrogating, and I'm a people person."

Lang Qianqiu snorts at that assertion, but before Shuo can snap at him for daring to question his social skill—Ling Wen speaks first.

"...You're the one who traumatized them?" She asks coldly. Ren Song only responds by sending her an unapologetic stare.

"And I'd do it again—he gave me snacks."

Hua Cheng's eye twitches, and Xie Lian rubs his back just a little bit faster, sending a look towards Pei Ming, who seems to be recovering from silent fits of laughter.

"I...I think we've gotten off topic..."

The emperor clears his throat, struggling to keep the mirth from his voice. "See, Ling Wen? Crimson Rain had nothing to do with your troubles, you have no reason to quarrel with him."

"...Yes, I suppose he's just incapable of controlling those who work under him."

Hua Cheng's eye snaps back to her, his mood even less generous than before.

"I don't make a habit of enslaving those loyal to me, you're correct."

Ling Wen stiffens, sitting a little straighter in her seat, but—

Yushi Huang places her hand over the civil goddess's.

"Let it go." She speaks softly, stroking her thumb over Ling Wen's knuckles.

Ling Wen has already lost the argument, only continuing it for the sake of her pride—and they both know it.

"..." The goddess huffs, but sits back, making no more objections.

"...As I was saying," Pei Ming clears his throat, recovering from that brief, chaotic interlude. "There's no reason we can't try to be cooperative with one another in the future."

Hua Cheng rubs his temples for one more moment, lowering his hands to look up at him. "Meaning?"

"...I don't think any of us are naive enough to believe that the destruction of Mount Tonglu won't have repercussions across all three realms," Pei Ming points out. "We're already beginning to see the effects.”

Some good, and some bad.

More powerful monsters and demons are cropping up, no longer filtered into the Kiln through channels of resentment.

But cultivation sects have shown signs of advancing the craft, rising to the challenge.

A rapidly advancing world after thousands of years of suppression.

“It was to Jun Wu’s benefit to keep our realms from communicating with one another. We were easier to control while we were in the dark. But there’s no reason that we can’t share information about rising threats now.”

That’s only practical, and Hua Cheng sees no harm in agreeing

The only threat he could imagine that might actually be relevant to them is the shards of Fangxin and the God Slayer. Xie Lian already told him what became of them, and while Hua Cheng can’t think of another solution…it isn’t ideal.

It’s not as simple as melting them down, either.

It would be like trying to melt down E’Ming, or set Ruoye aflame.

You could, but they would reform eventually, because the resentment inhabiting both weapons would remain.

And the resentment in Fangxin and the God Slayer…is beyond their ability to purify or destroy.

Putting them inside of a Xuanwu and imprisoning the creature under a mountain probably was the closest thing to a long-term solution—

But resentment isn't like spiritual power; a pure form of energy, cultivated by men and entirely under their control. Loss of that control, that crucial balance, leads to Qi Deviation and eventually—destruction.

Resentment can't be balanced, or trusted. It has its own will, steadily working in an undercurrent.

The blades will desire to be found. To be used. Weak minded cultivators would never be able to kill the Xuanwu in order to get to them to begin with. But if someone with a strong mind did...someone powerful enough to take what was inside...

They would be capable of everything Xie Lian saw in his vision.

For good, or evil—and that's the problem with mortals.

You never know what they'll do.

"...The ghost realm is always quiet after a Ghost King is released from Mount Tonglu," Hua Cheng murmurs, nodding in Ren Song's direction. "I imagine it will stay that way for some time."

A few centuries, at least. There was over a millennia between Bai Wuxiang's creation and Hua Cheng's, and since then a new Ghost King has been formed every four centuries. With the destruction of Mount Tonglu, it's possible that it could take far longer.

Pei Ming leans his chin on his hand, looking around the tea house—relatively quiet on a winter afternoon in the western countryside, an elderly waitress serving a young couple across the room. Children playing with glass marbles on the steps outside.

He wishes he could say that he expects the same for the mortal realm, but he knows better.

He knows men too well.

Major political players like Yong'an and Xuli have disintegrated in the last two hundred years, and he sees a trend beginning to form.There were some things about the fall of Xianle that were beyond anyone's control—but much of it was spurred on by an ancient, vengeful calamity.

Xuli was destabilized by the gods themselves. The ruling family of Yong'an was slaughtered by Qi Rong's machinations.

All of these interferences—and their disastrous consequences for mortals—were used by Jun Wu to justify his policy of non-interference.

His lie. His hypocrisy. Because he was always pulling the strings behind the scenes.

Xie Lian's shackles were visible, they were obvious—but everyone was being controlled in some way, even if they held onto some pretense of free will.

But only now, with him dead and gone, can one step back and survey the damage.

The effects on the gods, on the ghost realm, have been clear from the beginning. But the scars left on the mortal realm are in some ways far more sinister—

And Pei Ming doubts they, as gods, can undo the result of a historical trend nearly a thousand years in the making.

The continent has adapted culturally around periods of recurring instability. The common people have learned, watching the rapid rise and fall of kingdoms and empires alike, that their governments are weak.

They have begun looking to other sources for security.

When Pei Ming was born, societies were led by ruling families. Nobles and princes were born to their places in life, or won them through conquest. Sometimes they happened to be cultivators, like the Crown Prince of Xianle—but that wasn't a common path.

After all, Xie Lian taking on that role meant that he wouldn't have children. That he couldn't continue his family line. The crown would have either passed over him—or he would have been forced to name a cousin from the ruling family in Gusu as his heir.

It was far more common for cultivation schools to include stipulations for celibacy at the time—and as a result, it was also common for those meant to inherit the throne to be kept from cultivation.

Cultivators served kings, protected them, but they rarely ruled themselves.

While those from ruling classes did ascend—it was far more often as civil gods. Martial gods of royal blood used to be quite rare. Even Jun Wu's cover story was as a general who took the throne, not one who was born to it—because that was more believable at the time.

But with every interference from gods and ghosts alike—mortals struggled to adapt. Mortal soldiers couldn't handle the threats looming from every corner. The only ones who ever seemed to be able to protect them were the gods themselves, and when they wouldn't answer...

Cultivators were close enough.

Powerful cultivation schools like that in Yunmeng began to form. By the time Lang Qianqiu was born, five hundred years after the fall of Xianle—it was considered necessary for him to train in cultivation in order to survive.

Then, when the war between Yong'an and the Crescent Moon kingdom broke out, one teenage girl, a single mortal cultivator was able to turn the tide in Yong'an's favor in one night.

And Banyue was skilled—but cultivators of that level are becoming more and more common.

Now, in the most recent example, two cultivators who were barely even of age were able to liberate Gusu from a curse laid out in a plan that could only have been orchestrated by Jun Wu himself. With Xie Lian's help—but with his shackles, he couldn't have done it alone.

Pei Ming doesn't suspect that cultivators will ever displace the gods in their role. Lan An is a once in a generation mind—and it still took Shi Qingxuan to help them save Gusu when Wen Jiao's son returned with a vengeance.

But that isn't his worry.

Cultivators have already begun to supplant governments as a source of security and stability. On one hand, that might be considered a good thing, but on the other...

Tyrants were difficult enough to deal with when they were lazy, spoiled princelings.

A tyrant skilled in cultivation could very well enslave an entire city, like Gusu. Or a country.

Or the entire continent , if they became powerful enough.

And cultivation, something that was once considered an art, could become a tool of war.

If there's one thing Pei Ming understands better than anyone, it's war.

It's brutal, bloody—and often wasteful. But it also drives innovation faster than anything else.

If cultivation becomes the new means of holding political power—there's likely to be rapid advancement in the field like nothing they have ever seen. Gods will become more powerful too as a result, but...

The next wars of mortal men will likely be fought between cultivators.

Not by soldiers. Not with swords and canons.

Those battles were already bloody enough. With bodies piled so high, even now, almost a thousand years later, Pei Ming can still remember how it felt, being forced to climb over them.

He can't even imagine the scale of death and destruction that would follow in a war fought between cultivators on Banyue's level. Or, even worse, Lan An's.

Gods have interfered in the past to protect mortals from ghosts—but what can they do to protect them from themselves?

They spend the rest of the meeting discussing minor details of future communications. Each side making small concessions here and there—and the result isn't an alliance—but it's a far more relaxed posture than what existed between them before.

Small progress—but it's the first meeting of many. One that, eventually, could lead to something resembling cooperation between their realms. Or a lessening of animosity, at least.

He orders Blackwater to find and assist Shi Qingxuan on his business in the mortal realm—something that he doesn't actually mind , he's just irritated that it's an order, and that the order came from Pei Ming.

Still, he goes.

Ling Wen and Yushi Huang are long gone, having disappeared shortly after the Rain Master stopped her lover from continuing her pointless bickering with Hua Cheng. Quan Yizhen and Lang Qianqiu have also disappeared with the ones they actually came to see, rather than out of duty.

The emperor can't really bring himself to be bothered by that, as he has his own plans to steal an afternoon with his husband.

But, at least for a moment, he finds himself stopped on the road leading away from the inn. Watching a pair of young men in a nearby training field.

Using wooden swords, laughing as they best one another, not seeming even a little bit bothered by the cold.

The sight brings the warmth of nostalgia—and a quiet sense of dread over him, still thinking about the world boys like them will inherit.

A dangerous one.

"...As far as I can remember, I've never seen a Heavenly Emperor choose to walk back to the Heavens. Didn't Jun Wu use a golden carriage, or something like that?"

"...Something like that," the god agrees, looking back over his shoulder. "But you've only known one emperor."

Hua Cheng opted for the 'San Lang' disguise for the meeting. Something that seemed out of place as he discussed the fates of gods and men with the authority of an ancient being—but seems suitable here, walking down a country road on a quiet afternoon.

"So have you."

True. But Pei Ming ascended during the early days of Jun Wu's rule. Remembers, faintly, impressions that people had of the former dynasty.

Jun Wu's predecessor was, according to most accounts, a humble man.

Still, he agrees. "That's true."

Pei Ming glances behind him—searching for some sign of Xie Lian.

"...Where has the Crown Prince gone off to? It's unusual to see you two apart."

(Aside from when Xie Lian visits the Heavens, but Pei Ming can't imagine why Hua Cheng would approach him on his own like this.)

Hua Cheng makes a face, an unreadable emotion flickering across his expression—one that Pei Ming assumes must be annoyance.

"…Xuan Zhen is making preparations for the Winter Solstice celebrations. His highness offered to help him with a new set of robes."

And that explains why Hua Cheng wouldn't have gone along.

"Was there something about those boys that interested you? You were staring."

This is becoming more and more odd by the moment—but Pei Ming knows better to offend a ghost king by brushing him off.

Hua Cheng isn't a social man. He doesn't seek people out unless he wants something.

But Pei Ming has no reason to think whatever he wants might be sinister.

"…They reminded me of myself—there was a training pitch just like that on my father's estate when I was a boy."

He and Rong Guang spent hours sparring together. Until they were exhausted, black and blue—and having the time of their lives.

"Your father was a wealthy man, then?"

"…I suppose," Pei Ming agrees, rubbing the back of his neck. "But I never benefited from it."

Hua Cheng raises an eyebrow, curious, and the emperor sighs."He had over twenty children, and I was the only son—but of his least favorite concubine. He claimed me as a last resort, if one of his favored wives couldn't give him an heir—but I was never family to him."

Pei supposes the only identifiable privilege he had from his father's wealth was the fact that he didn't grow up on the streets—but he wasn't raised with the same luxuries his siblings had.

"…You had over twenty sisters?" The ghost king asks, a little incredulous.

"It wasn't so strange for a wealthy man to have so many children back then," Pei shrugs. There are still plenty of families that large for that matter, even if it isn't practiced among peasants.

"What about you?" Hua Cheng stares, and he asks again; "Did you have siblings?"

“…No.” The ghost king mutters, shaking his head. “I didn’t.”

“…That’s a shame,” Pei Ming says softly.

Just watching his interactions with Ren Song and Blackwater—it’s easy to imagine him as someone’s older brother. A good one, at that.

Pei Ming adored being a brother. The bond he didn’t have with his father never affected his closeness to his sisters. If Qing Yuan had married him, and he had known their son—he would have wanted to have more. To give him that experience.

There’s a sense of belonging that comes from being a part of a large family. One you can’t find anywhere else. Though for immortals like them, not having many loved ones may have been a mercy.

Pei Ming watched his sisters marry. Have children of their own. He helped raise his nephews after Rong Guang’s death—to the point where they often confused him with an actual father figure.

And he attended every single funeral.

“…Was there something you wanted to discuss with me? You’re not usually one for small talk.”

That’s not entirely true. Hua Cheng can speak to Xie Lian for hours on end about the silliest, seemingly irrelevant things—he’s just selective about who he has those conversations with.

Still, Pei Ming isn’t entirely wrong either.

“…It seemed like something was on your mind during the meeting that you didn’t want to say in front of the others,” Hua Cheng shrugs. “I wondered if it was important.”

Pei Ming grows silent, walking down the road once more, leaving the training pitch behind.

“…Free will.” He mutters.

Hua Cheng stops for a moment, staring at the line of his back, as though he’s trying to find something in the set of his shoulders. He himself has always been known as an advocate for personal freedom—but he’s never heard of a god concerned with it.

“What about it?”

"…I always believed that human conflict and suffering was the price we paid for freedom of choice," Pei Ming explains. "But…with the way things are going, we might just be allowing mortals the choice to destroy themselves."

Hua Cheng grows silent once more, thinking that over.

"I don't agree."

"You don't?"

Pei Ming always took him for a nihilist at heart.

"Mortals will always have conflict and bloodshed—and allowing them to have that is a cost of free will." He agrees with that much.

"But stopping them from destroying humanity as a whole wouldn't be depriving human beings of their free will."

"…I fail to see how it isn't," Pei Ming mutters, feeling profoundly exhausted at the task ahead of them.

Another war that he doesn't want to fight.

"Because you're still a human being."

So is Hua Cheng. Xie Lian. He Xuan, and all the rest.

Even Jun Wu, as difficult as that is to remember.

Gods are born human. When they ascend, they're human. If they fail, they're still human.

Woefully, painfully human.

"If some mortals grow powerful enough to cause that much destruction—allowing them to do so wouldn't be respecting free will, because there are infinitely more humans who don't have that ability. Whose choice to survive would be taken away from them by those with more power."

Hua Cheng has had the power to cause as much destruction as anyone ever has. And he's also been completely powerless.

"I suppose you're right," Pei agrees, "but it's difficult to know when and if one should interfere. The last thing I want is to be like…"

His fear is one that Hua Cheng has seen in his husband's face many times.

Seeing someone use power so ruthlessly can make you terrified of wielding it yourself.

Neither of them want to be like Jun Wu—and that's precisely why neither of them ever could be.

"…If the time comes when the gods must intervene, you'll know."

The point of no return is never obvious, not until you're looking over the edge, seeing how far you might fall.

When they round the curve in the path, the trees thin just enough for the river to come into view.

"…And what about you?"

"I don't particularly concern myself with the possibility of humanity's future destruction—"

"No, I meant—at the meeting, it seemed as though there was something on your mind, too."

He seemed oddly tense. Ling Wen may have made that worse, but still.

Hua Cheng turns his head away, looking to the river. A tributary to the largest system in the continent. One that ends with a delta in Yunmeng, runs all the way through the central plains, and begins with the glaciers in the north.

The same waters that flowed through Xianle.

"…If you had to choose between living in ignorance about something that would never impact you, or know about something that would upset you, which would you choose?"

Pei Ming stares at him.

That question sounds rather ominous, and— why would he ask it?

"…I would always rather know the truth," he eventually answers. "No matter what it's about."

It's always the things he didn't know that have come back to haunt him the most. Or finding out too little too late.

“But…why ask me that?”

Hua Cheng doesn’t look away from the river. Not even once.

“No matter what state his highness was in, you have always treated him fairly. Even when you had no incentive to do so.”

He was the only god who spoke out against the rumors about Xie Lian.

The only one who never gave the prince grief for his closeness to Hua Cheng. The one who took the position of emperor to spare Xie Lian from the burden.

He’s shown himself to be an honorable person.

He’s earned the right to be treated with respect. Something Hua Cheng has never treated lightly.

And if he had said that he’d rather not know the truth, Hua Cheng never would have told him.

Part of him wishes that he had chosen ignorance—but it’s too late to go back on it now

After a moment, he reaches into his robes—pulling out something that Pei Ming doesn’t immediately see—

“This should have been returned to you sooner—but I believe it’s yours.”

After he hands it over, it takes a moment of staring for Pei Ming to realize—

It’s a golden belt.

Pei Ming has had countless over the years—but this one, he’d never forget.

It’s the only one that he ever gave away. Many centuries ago, when he was still a freshly ascended god in Xuli.

“…Where did you get this?” He whispers, eyes as wide as they could possibly get.

Hua Cheng's gaze has returned to looking firmly in the opposite direction, his hands clasped behind his back.

"I haven't had it this entire time if that's what you're thinking. And I didn't steal it, either."

Pei hasn't accused him of anything. Hasn't been able to process this enough to formulate a proper accusation, even if he wanted to.

"…Then how did you find it…and how did you know that it was mine?"

He can't see how torn Hua Cheng's expression has become. Hands clasped so tightly behind his back, his knuckles have turned white.

He almost changes his mind three separate times.

"I took it from a grave, four hundred miles northeast of here."

A month ago.

Pei Ming still hasn't been able to look away from the belt in his hands.

"…You…took it from a…" He repeats the words slowly, but he—

He still doesn't understand how Hua Cheng could have known the belt was his , or…why he would have…

"When Jun Wu taunted you during the battle of the Heavens, you said the name Qing Yuan." Hua Cheng mutters.

"I knew where she was buried, and that the belt was with her. It seemed right that you should have it back."

That was what she would have wanted.

"…I don't…" Pei Ming swallows hard, struggling to deal with the emotions bubbling to the surface, his face growing pale.

"How…did you know where she was…—? You— knew her?"

He's learned a little more about the utter mystery that is Crimson Rain in the last year. Knows that he and Xie Lian were children together in Xianle.

But the gaps in his knowledge are wide, gaping chasms.

That’s by design on his part.

A desire to not be known in such a way by a world that he’s never trusted. Stepping into the light has never seemed worth the risk imposed by such vulnerability. But sometimes…

People earn the right to know the truth.

“She was my mother.”

Pei Ming finally manages to peel his eyes away from the belt, fingers closed tightly around it.

Staring at the young man in front of him, as though he’s never seen him before.

Seeing so many things in his face that seem so obvious now, but—

“… Your mother,” he croaks.

Hua Cheng nods stiffly, his lips pressed tightly together.

“But you…you were from Xianle…” Pei Ming can barely speak, sounding like the air has been punched out of him.

“I was born in Xuli. My mother took us to Xianle when I was six years old.”

“…Six years…”

They were in Xuli for six years , after she stopped praying? Even when he couldn't find her, when she must have known that he was looking—

Pei Ming grows silent again, his hands balling into fists at his sides, his expression tense and pale, struggling to...

"Her husband was the one who killed her, wasn't he?" He finally asks, doing something that Hua Cheng has watched himself do many times.

Ask the questions that he can wrap his head around, first.

"Not with his own hands. He paid a group of criminals. But he was there."

There's no emotion in Hua Cheng's voice when he says it. As if he's speaking about someone else's life, rather than his own.

"...How did they...?"

"It would be difficult to point to one thing," Hua Cheng's jaw tightens. "But I suppose she bled to death."

Pei finally manages to look up at him again, and when he does—he sees that, while Hua Cheng's voice sounds frigid, his eyes...

They're in quiet agony.

"...I tried to find him," Pei Ming explains hoarsely. "After I learned of her death. But when I did, he was already—”

"I know." The ghost king replies. Not that Pei Ming looked, though he isn't surprised to hear that. "I killed him myself, shortly after I emerged from Mount Tonglu."

And many, many others.

Every single person he could have attached blame to, he slaughtered.

Until only one person with her blood on his hands remained;

Himself.

And if Hua Cheng hadn't had something remaining tying him to this world, he would have destroyed the last remaining man responsible, as well.

The fact that he hasn't is both a blessing and a curse.

"...I looked for you, too." Pei Ming says quietly, feeling so pitiful, caught between struggling to admit his failures, and pleading against any perceived indifference.

"When I heard what happened to Qing Y—to...your mother," it's hard to say it, harder to believe it, to even wrap his mind around it— "They told me her son—you—were probably dead, but I still looked. I just...there was so much death in Xianle, and I couldn't find—”

"I know." Hua Cheng averts his gaze, struggling between the knowledge that he can't avoid this, and the fact that he doesn't have these kinds of conversations. Not with people who aren't his god. "Dianxia told me...that you asked for permission to search Xianle back then."

And, he told Hua Cheng that Pei Ming still spoke of his son after Shi Wudu's death. Of how the loss and regret still haunted him.

That was what made the ghost king wonder if not telling him was crueler than the truth.

Hearing the way Pei Ming reacted to what Jun Wu said...Hua Cheng could tell, even then, that he...

His mind always goes back to his first days in the Kiln, remembering what Zhao Beitong told him—watching his memories of his mother.

What it means, to be born beneath a star of solitude.

He remembers the fondness in his mother's eyes, when she spoke of her time with his father. How he was a soldier, and they had loved one another.

He thinks about how she...

"But she never stopped praying."

Pei starts, his eyes filling with confusion as he listens to him explain—

"She brought me to one of your temples often, and she would pray to you. I don't know if she ever tried to tell you about me before—but she did try to convince me to pray on the day we left."

He watches the struggle on Pei Ming's face. Swallowing down the frustration he felt towards Qing Yuan before, for never telling him. The surprise, the confusion.

And finally, as the reality of what must have happened sets in—anger.

"...Jun Wu."

He knew who the boy was. That he was Pei's. That would have been enough to intervene in Qing Yuan's prayers.

To stop them from receiving his help.

And that also explains how, in the six years he scoured Xuli—he never found them.

Qing Yuan was crafty—but even she couldn't have hidden herself so well. Only a god could have.

And there was only one god at that time who would have had the knowledge to do so.

"...Why would he have even cared?" Hua Cheng mutters.

He was no one, back then. Neither he nor his mother had any importance in the schemes and machinations of the Heavens.

Pei Ming presses his forehead against his palm for a moment, taking long, deep breaths.

"...Why do you think Bai Wuxiang murdered you?" He mutters. "Jun Wu could never stand the idea of one of his playthings loving something more than him."

Xie Lian's attachment to him was reason enough.

But Pei Ming was, even back then, the most powerful martial god remaining in the Heavenly Court. And he supposes Jun Wu must have viewed him...as little different from the hounds he used to keep.

Useful, as long as they're loyal.

"...But you didn't even know I existed," Hua Cheng shakes his head. "You thought my mother had spurned and abandoned you—”

"And I would have given up my godhood, if I was forced to choose between this life and the two of you."

Pei Ming says it with no doubt. No hesitation.

He already had plans, the moment he knew of his son's existence. To find him and bring him back to the capital. Maybe live with him on his mortal estate until he was old enough, then bring him to the Heavens as a deputy.

Plans that grew less hopeful as time went on.

Pei couldn't sleep back then. He couldn't eat. He was harsher than he needed to be. Lax in his duties.

He spent every single day he could spare searching for him for nearly ten years. Thinking about how, if his son was alive, he would be frightened. Alone.

Maybe he was sick. Maybe he was one of the children who had been forced to fight in the civil war. He could have been on the streets, cold and starving.

If he was alive, he needed him, and Pei—

Pei had all of the power of a god, and it felt like sifting through endless grains of sand. Finding nothing in the end but an aching, unending chasm of grief.

Realizing that if his son was alive, he would be a grown man by then. Pei should have found him.

But he never did.

Which meant, in all likelihood, that his son was dead.

And all Pei Ming wanted then was to give him the dignity of a proper burial. To find his remains, along with his mother's, and return them to the family ancestral hall.

He asked the emperor, pleading for his help.

And when Jun Wu cast his spells, looking far and wide—he told Pei Ming that there was nothing to be found.

That the ashes of his lover and son had likely been scattered by those who murdered them.

He held Pei Ming as the man wept for the family he lost. Comforted him, as he knew the truth. As he lied, and stole, and murdered.

And Pei Ming's greatest mistake was trusting him so blindly.

It feels like a repeating pattern that he can't escape.

He refused to betray the King of Xuli. Slaughtered those who were loyal to him to keep a mad, power-hungry fool on the throne. Even if Rong Guang was wrong in so many of the choices he made, even if they tried to force Pei down a path he didn't want—

Pei regretted his choice.

He trusted Jun Wu, when he told him that his lover and his son were gone. Beyond his help.

He trusted him, and they suffered as a result of that faith.

He listened to Shi Wudu, when he said the emperor's interest in him was as a mentor. That there was nothing to worry about.

He didn't step in to protect him when Jun Wu held him closer in his orbit. Assuming that Shi Wudu was being honest, that he was just a young, ambitious god—fostering a friendship with the emperor was a means for securing his and Shi Qingxuan's futures.

And hindsight is a cruel teacher, but—

Pei Ming still sees the Prince of Xuli, agonized and terrified, dying in his arms, whispering to the general—

'What did I do wrong?'

Only to hear them repeated again, by another young prince, one without a malicious bone in his body.

Remembers watching as Xie Lian, still a teenager , was forced to his knees in the grand ancestral hall. Eyes heartbroken as he looked to Pei, one of the only ranked gods in the court who did not scorn him back then, silently asking:

'What did I do wrong?'

And he knew that it was nothing.

He knew that Xie Lian was a good child. That he only tried to help. That whatever law bound him to be punished for the fall of Xianle was unjust and cruel.

But Jun Wu seemed so certain when he protested. Gently reminded him that he had never been taught to understand such laws, and encouraged Pei Ming to look for his son, rather than protect someone else's.

And Pei Ming listened.

Because he was so desperate to find him.

“…And I’m sorry,” Hua Cheng stiffens, startled by the sound of Pei Ming’s voice, looking up to find—

To find the emperor’s eyes filled with tears.

“I am so sorry that I wasn’t there.”

The ghost king doesn't know how to respond to it.

He's only ever seen one person weep for him. One person who cared enough to mourn, or apologize to him.

And he never thought he would experience that from anyone else. It wasn't something he craved, or felt lacking in. His God's love and acceptance was all he needed, but—

That doesn't mean he feels nothing, watching someone else display that emotion now. Even if it also draws out confusion.

"…You don't need to be."

"Of course, I—"

"I know you must have had fantasies in mind, when you imagined what your son must have been like."

People who never even have children imagine them in the back of their minds. And if you do, but you never get to see them grow…

It's natural to wonder what would have been.

"And I wasn't." His voice is firm, dispelling any romanticism of it all.

"I wasn't a kind, honorable, or well-mannered person. I had blood on my hands before you even knew I had been born. I was never going to be what you wanted. And now that you know that, you can—"

"You were a child."

Hua Cheng falls silent, his lips frozen in mid-sentence.

"You should have been protected and looked after. No matter how ill-mannered or dishonorable you think you were." Pei shakes his head. "And I am sorry that I wasn't able to give that to you."

Crimson Rain doesn't react immediately, his expression guarded.

But slowly beginning to see.

Something he caught a glimpse of, when Jun Wu taunted the general before, telling him that his son had been hideously deformed.

That he wouldn't have cared.

Words that are easy to say in the heat of emotion, but now—they seem sincere.

Hua Cheng has experienced love that came from gratitude. From shallow admiration. Or affection that has been hard earned and carefully treasured. But when his mother died, he lost more than just her. Something he thought he would never experience again.

A love that comes without conditions. That isn't severed with time or distance.

A parent's love.

The affection of a father that…wanted him.

Not one who cast him and his mother aside out of boredom. Who never cared. Who never looked.

Realizing that almost hurts more than indifference.

Thinking about how his life could have been different. Now, it feels as though something was stolen from them both.

Maybe he could have met Xie Lian under different terms. Done more to help him.

And his mother…

"…Even if you had known," Hua Cheng speaks slowly, choosing his words with utmost care. "I don't think my mother would have wanted me involved with the gods. I think that's why she left."

Pei Ming grimaces slightly, knowing that it's probably true.

"Given that you ended up a god yourself, she wouldn't have had a say in that in the end," he points out, and—

Hua Cheng doesn't miss a subtle note of pride in his voice.

"And you…know where she's buried?"

The ghost king takes a deep breath.

"…I do."

"In Xianle—?"

"Yong'an, actually."

Pei Ming's eyebrows raise, and Hua Cheng braces himself.

"No one would help me," he explains quietly. "I couldn't dig a grave or build a pyre by myself."

He was too small, back then.

"But I couldn't leave her there either."

If he was too small to dig a grave, or build a pyre—he was too small to carry a grown woman. But he still did. Even if it took hours. Even if he was too tired to move for nearly a day afterwards.

"…The best I could do was get her to the river."

He dragged her all the way through the poorer neighborhoods of the city. Out of the gates, and down the hill leading to the riverbed.

So far—and many people saw, but not a single soul stopped and offered to help.

Hong'er knew why.

He never went out again with his right eye uncovered after that. Not unless the bandages were pulled from his face, or—

Or if Xie Lian asked to look.

"…I cleaned her." As best as he could. "Gave her as many flowers as I could find."

Placed them in her hands, her hair.

She deserved more, but it was all he could do.

"…Years later, I heard a story of a young woman's body being found in a dried riverbed in Yong'an, covered in flowers. The villagers buried her and made a grave marker. When I went to look and found the belt…"

He knew it was her.

He built her a more formal grave after that—but never took the golden belt. Always thought it was better off remaining with her. That someone like him had no use for it.

Until very recently.

Hua Cheng could show him someday—but not today.

That would be too much.

“…I’m sorry for what I said, back in Ghost City,” Pei Ming mutters—something that Hua Cheng had nearly forgotten by now. “You’re far from heartless.”

“I wasn’t holding it against you.”

Not when he knew just how much Pei had been suffering when he said it.

Hua Cheng isn’t a particularly tolerant or forgiving man—but he understands that kind of pain, and he couldn’t blame him.

From Pei Ming’s perspective, Hua Cheng had seemed like an accomplice.

“You don’t have to apologize just because of what you know now.”

“I know, but…” Pei Ming shakes his head. “In the months since then, I’ve come to see you differently.”

Fighting beside him in Mount Tonglu—and again in the battle against Jun Wu.

He’s seen the man that the entire world has written off as cold and unfeeling be compassionate and loyal.

Pei Ming doesn’t say it, knowing that Hua Cheng probably wouldn’t know how to respond to it coming from him—

But by the time the battle was over, his opinion of him had already changed.

“…I never knew enough about you to have an opinion,” the ghost king admits.

He knew that Pei Ming had treated Xie Lian fairly. That he conducted his business with some manner of honor.

As such, Pei was one of the few gods he didn’t despise—but the lack of a bad opinion doesn’t translate to a good one.

He was neutral before.

“…You’re welcome to know more about me,” Pei Ming offers cautiously. “I’d like the chance to get to know you.”

This was the part of telling him that Hua Cheng felt so apprehensive about.

Because he doesn’t know what he wants.

Doesn’t know if he needs it, or if he has to need it to accept it.

“…We can discuss it,” he agrees cautiously. “But it would have to be…slow.”

And heaven knows both of them have plenty of time for that.

There’s so much more to say. So many things that each of them want to know—

But Pei Ming needs time to wrap his mind around the truth—and Hua Cheng has let his guard down enough for one encounter.

Still, when the conversation slows, and parting seems inevitable…

“What name did she give you?”

And Hua Cheng can’t help but be struck by a brief glimpse of irony.

He asked his mother what his family name was countless times, and she always said to wait until he was older.

Now he’s older, and his father asks him for his given name.

A name that was stolen from him for so long, it almost feels surreal, saying it now.

“…Hong.”

There’s a small, bittersweet curve to Pei Ming’s lips.

“…Hong’er, right?” The way Hua Cheng stiffens with surprise is answer enough.

It’s exactly the kind of nickname Qing Yuan would have used. Even if it’s almost impossible to attach a childhood pet name to a man who has grown to be synonymous with fear and violence—

But Pei Ming can see it.

“…I don’t know what reaction you expected from me,” he murmurs, turning his head to look at the long, winding road back home.

It was clear he didn’t expect a good one, from the way he broached the subject. How firmly he tried to lower Pei’s expectations.

“But I wasn’t disappointed.”

There are many emotions running rampant in his chest at the moment. Loss, anger, guilt, and shock—

But also happiness, and even more so…

Pride.

Hua Cheng grows quiet, watching as they bid farewell, and go their separate ways.

Maybe Pei Ming heard his response—and maybe he didn’t.

A quiet, but clear:

“Neither was I.”

He practically sinks into Xie Lian’s arms when he returns that night. Not physically tired, but for some reason, he feels like he could sleep for another year.

And in his god's embrace, it feels like he really could. His cheek resting against his chest, listening to the slow, comforting sound of his heartbeat. Xie Lian's fingers tangled in his hair, combing out invisible knots that hidden curls are prone to.

"I know that was hard."

This is normally the point where his husband would play it off, saying that nothing is difficult for him. Nothing is ever a strain. Xie Lian has nothing to worry himself about.

But this time, he only manages a tired grunt.

"It's over with."

"You say that as though he reacted poorly," Xie Lian murmurs—but he already knows the answer before Hua Cheng shakes his head, burying his face deeper in the front of his robes.

Crimson and white today, a sight that always makes the ghost king hold him tighter.

He hasn't even taken the time to return to his true form, still pressed close in the shape of a teenager—but Xie Lian has never minded.

"Did he say anything about the wedding?"

Hua Cheng lets out a surprised snort against his chest, one that makes Xie Lian squirm ticklishly.

"Why would he ask about that?"

The prince shrugs, spreading his legs so his husband can lie more comfortably between them, his arms around Xie Lian's waist.

(With no other intentions now , but that will likely change within the hour.)

"He might have wanted to come if he—”

"That's why I never would have told him before."

"San Lang..." Xie Lian bites his lip, not knowing whether to laugh or cry.

"I wouldn't change a thing about that night."

Nor would he, a subtle reminder that Xie Lian didn't invite anyone either.

But it's a little different when it comes to blood relatives, and Xie Lian doesn't have any of those left.

"I'm glad to know San Lang doesn't have any second thoughts."

His tone is lightly teasing, and his husband lifts his head, eyes flashing playfully.

"All of my thoughts are about you, gege." He leans up, placing a kiss on his neck, his chin, then his lips with every word. "First, second, and third."

That draws a soft, embarrassed sound from the prince—one that Hua Cheng has come to know by heart. Prompting it is a victory.

"San Lang... can you not be like this?" There's no force behind the words, he doesn't mean them, and the ghost king shakes his head, kissing him breathless.

"I'm afraid not. Is gege having second thoughts now?"

"..." Xie Lian leans up on his elbows, kissing him once—chastely.

"No," he murmurs, carefully pushing his husband's hair behind his ear. "I could never."

Hua Cheng's smile widens, the setting sun casting his face in a warm glow as it passes through the window, sinking down to steal another kiss.

"Good," their fingers become intertwined. "Because I'm looking forward to a long, prosperous marriage."

Xie Lian has no doubt that he will.

Because if there's one thing Hua Cheng has always managed, it's achieving what he sets out to do.

And in this case—nothing could make the Crown Prince of Xianle happier.

Your Most Devoted Believer

Chapter Summary

> The days grow longer and warmer, and visits grow more frequent. Hills that long stood empty and overgrown slowly coming back to life.
>
> And finally, on the last day of summer, Mount Taicang finds itself teeming with cultivators and ghosts alike once more.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Their first winter together is quiet and filled with warmth. Watching Hong Li chase Ruoye through the snow. Afternoons spent in the forge in Ghost City, flames crackling in the hearth as Hua Cheng works, his god reading (and watching) from the corner.

In spring, they're often in Puqi Village to help with the planting, Bolin and Xiao Hua having become fixtures among the locals.

With Xiao Hua's younger brother often accompanying them, two young children in tow. A boy and girl, often found playing on the hillside by the shrine.

Lang Qianqiu will often appear in a disguise of his own—one that always makes Hua Cheng roll his eyes—and the six of them will sit down for dinner together at the end of the day. Shuo cooks for himself and the others—but Hua Cheng only eats what his husband makes.

Xie Lian likes to think that he's getting better—but when Lang Qianqiu turns green and starts having hallucinations after one sip of his soup...

Well, Hua Cheng likes it, and that's what really matters.

Culinary disasters aside—there's something about sitting around a table together, watching Shuo and Lang Qianqiu bicker, Hua Cheng telling the children stories, Ruoye and E'Ming bustling around to monitor the food left on the stove that draws an immutable smile to his face.

There's a celebration near the beginning of summer for He Bai's first birthday, and the child is already walking— far too fast, sneaking away from his parents every time their heads are turned.

Always caught by his uncle before he can wander out of the palace grounds.

Or, if he doesn't get that far, he'll be herded back towards the others by Bai Ze, the feline deputy's tail flicking above his head as he nudges the little boy through the garden.

Whining at the prospect of being deterred from chasing a particularly interesting mouse.

"You have to be more careful, or you're going to lose track of him," Shi Wudu scolds, sapphires dripping from his ears, braided into his hair—part of the regalia for an imperial consort–-and Shi Qingxuan sighs pitifully.

"I am! He likes getting lost!" He moans. "You've seen him do it! He wanders off into the strangest places, then laughs when I find him like it's the funniest thing in the world! He loves stressing me out—he wants me to have a heart attack and die!"

"I doubt it's that sinister," his elder brother replies dryly.

Just then, a giggling voice calls through the air—

"Baba!"

And the moment he hears it, any vexation drains from Shi Qingxuan's face, replaced with a beaming smile as he kneels down to swoop the little boy up in his arms, holding him on his hip.

"Look at you!" He croons, nuzzling their noses together. "Running so fast! What are you in such a hurry for?"

All he receives is nonsensical children's babble in return, but he always responds as though the conversation is far more two sided.

"I see, I see, sounds serious..."

One of the deputies from a lower martial palace watches them curiously, sipping from his glass of wine.

"...Does he call you that in your female form as well, Lord Wind Master?"

Shi Qingxuan glances up, his eyes round.

"Hmm? Oh, no—he calls me 'mama' when I'm like that."

"Doesn't it get confusing for him?"

Shi Wudu raises one eyebrow, but Shi Qingxuan simply smiles even brighter, shaking his head.

"No, he always knows it's me."

"Even a toddler can grasp that much," the Thunder Master points out, his tone turning sharp.

"...No, no," the deputy smiles, waving one hand awkwardly. "You misunderstand, I only meant—how do you know which one of you he's calling for?"

"Oh," Shi Qingxuan laughs. "It's obvious, watch—baobei, where's baba? Can you point to baba?"

The little boy sits up a little in his father's arms, turning his head and squinting through the crowd, emerald eyes gleaming in the sun, until—

"Baba!" He points victoriously, tugging on the front of Shi Qingxuan's robes, and, as if on cue, He Xuan looks up at the sound of it.

"See?" Shi Qingxuan turns back to the deputy, practically beaming with pride. "It sounds completely different!"

The middle court official pauses, lips slightly parted, because he couldn't hear a difference in the baby's tone at all, but—

"Of course it does," Shi Wudu smiles, ruffling his nephew's hair, "he's so smart, just like his uncle—”

"Gege," Shi Qingxuan whines, "you could say he got it from me!"

"Or me," He Xuan grumbles, having walked over after hearing his son calling for him.

"Sorry," Shi Wudu places a kiss on the child's forehead, spurring happy babbling from He Bai, reaching up to grasp his uncle's hair in his fists. "I was being realistic."

"Gege—!"

It's the first Heavenly Gathering where all of the ghost kings are present—and invited .

It's not quite so surprising that Ren Song would be in attendance—Lang Qianqiu often brings him along to such events, but Hua Cheng is a pleasant surprise.

Well, a pleasant surprise to some—a mildly terrifying one to others.

Still, Shi Qingxuan greets them with eager delight, and He Bai is equally excited to see the prince, reaching out to be held.

Xie Lian visited quite often before Hua Cheng's return—and is one of the few gods the boy isn't shy around. The prince is just as eager to hold him, hugging him close as Hua Cheng and He Xuan exchange brief greetings, but...

Crimson Rain's gaze is repeatedly drawn back to the sight.

Clothes are almost an expected gift from Xie Lian—and a welcome one —

But the bangle is a surprise.

Too big for him—one that he'll have to grow into, but that was the point. Made from gold and pearl—designed to keep malicious ghosts away, as the crown prince explains.

Both gifts are supposedly from him, with no one else taking credit, but...

Shi Qingxuan sends Hua Cheng a knowing, thankful smile.

And, much to the surprise of the Heavenly Court—it's more and more common to find Crimson Rain and the Heavenly Emperor together. Having quiet conversations on the edges of things.

Rumors have begun to circulate about a history between the two, and neither have made an effort to confirm or deny it.

But sometimes, if you happen to look at just the right moment—you might catch the sight of the ghost king laughing.

Not with arrogance, or viciousness.

And if you look to the side, you'll find the emperor smiling. Similar to the way that he always has, but now—

Now, Pei Ming's smiles always seem to reach his eyes.

Summer is long and slow, one day drifting lazily into the next, like pages turning in a slight breeze.

He Xuan builds a new lair--asking for yet another loan from Crimson Rain, something that almost seems to offend Shi Qingxuan and his brother, but as he explains—

He's owed him money for so long, it feels strange when he doesn't.

Xie Lian takes to sparring again, for the first time in nearly eight centuries—and now, he has someone who can keep up with him.

E'Ming and Mo Ye flash as they clash together over and over again, neither gaining the upper hand over the other—and neither wanting to.

Feng Xin and Mu Qing occasionally join in when they visit, the former even striking up the nerve to cross swords with Hua Cheng at one point—

A mistake, as the ghost king is none too gentle about it, but…

Xie Lian can’t help but smile at the progress.

Or watch them interacting together, and wonder what could have been.

Mu Qing joins in occasionally, giving more of a challenge—but he seems just as content to sit with the prince beneath the maple trees, fingers drifting through blades of grass as they read together.

Some nights, they end up stretched out beneath the stars, Xie Lian excitedly explaining how much the constellations changed in the last eight centuries, since he saw them last.

And when he falls asleep, his husband is the one to carry him home.

Something Feng Xin always used to do on nights like this—but the martial god doesn't seem to mind having someone take over that role.

He's too busy looking at dark eyes and silver hair, perpetually cold fingers grasping his own as they walk home, side by side.

The days grow longer and warmer, and visits grow more frequent. Hills that long stood empty and overgrown slowly coming back to life.

And finally, on the last day of summer, Mount Taicang finds itself teeming with cultivators and ghosts alike once more.

Children running and playing in the trees and swings—Guzi helping a smaller girl with silver hair onto one of them, protective as he makes sure she doesn't trip over the tree roots she can't see.

Several climb around on Dian Dian's back where the beast sits at the forest's edge.

Despite being a famed, ferocious creature, the forest demon seems content to tolerate it, ears flicking back and forth as he listens to the sounds of the mountain. The rain master's bull sunbathes beside him, tail swishing lazily in the grass.

And while many of the children present are enjoying the swings—one soars higher than any of the others.

Screaming and giggling as he tumbles through the air, carried by gusts of wind, only to be caught in his father's arms and tossed into the sky again.

Jet black hair sticking up in every direction, and never once afraid of falling.

His other father watches with a fond gaze, watching as Shi Qingxuan catches him again, holding him close as he giggles with excitement, asking to go again.

"She's advancing too much on your right."

His eyes snap back down to the game board with a sigh, seeing where the white tiles are relentlessly encroaching. "I can see that."

"I hope that's part of a strategy."

If it was, he wouldn't say it out loud, not with Ling Wen watching him like a hawk.

"I'm already doing you a favor, don't be a nag."

"You're hardly doing anyone a favor," Ling Wen shrugs, spinning another tile between her fingertips.

Shi Wudu has played her countless times over the centuries—and he hasn't beaten her once.

Neither of them have ever beaten Pei Ming—but small stepping stones first.

At the moment, the emperor is busy anyway.

Holding a scorpion snake by the space beneath its jaws, scolding a teenage girl, her head hanging sheepishly.

“You do realize there are mortals here?”

“Yes…” Banyue mumbles, fiddling with one lock of hair nervously.

“Then what would possess you to bring the snakes?!”

“…I didn’t bring them, they just…follow me…”

“For what?”

“They get lonely,” she mumbles pitifully. “And they like Pei Su gege…”

Pei sends his deputy an annoyed look, only for the younger official to suddenly become very interested in his own boots, kneeling down to examine whether or not they’re fastened properly.

“You do realize that this is technically a family event, don’t you?”

Pei Su grimaces.

He still hasn’t adjusted to that news, the fact that it technically makes Crimson Rain his senior, or the fact that he was beaten into a pulp in the sinner’s pit by one of his own ancestors .

“That’s why I agreed to come, General.”

“Then could you also make sure your friend here doesn’t throw anything with fangs for the rest of the day?”

“I didn’t…” Banyue stops, biting her lip.

It’s a little bit difficult to deny when she was the one who told Pei Ming that throwing the snakes was her only skill.

Something that Pei Ming doesn’t entirely blame her for, but—

Why on earth was that the main spell Hua Cheng taught her? It couldn’t have been healing the sick? Or summoning columns of flame?

It had to be deadly serpents?

“…If you’re still mad about the time they bit you—”

“Water under the bridge,” Pei Ming mutters stiffly, flexing his fingers at the memory.

It still stuns him that Xie Lian was bitten on the hand by one once, then continued through the desert for hours without medical assistance.

“…Why don’t you two go and do something romantic? Like a walk in the forest, or watching the sunset—and you could take the snakes with you—”

Banyue goes from sheepish to shy at the suggestion, the tips of her ears turning red, but Pei Su is quick to reach for her hand.

“That sounds like a good idea to me,” he murmurs, giving her hand a reassuring squeeze.

His general wouldn’t understand enough about the snakes to know—but they’re just as respondent to her anxiety as they are to their own—

And Banyue’s never been much of one for crowds.

“…Are they actually together, you think?” Shi Qingxuan asks, holding He Bai against his hip as the two walk off into the tree line, his head tilted curiously.

“How long were you listening?”

“Oh, the entire time—you can’t be a gossip if you aren’t also a bit of a snoop.”

“Something tells me, after everything people have heard this year, that would be a nonstory. Besides, I thought you hated Junior?”

“I didn’t hate him ,” He mutters, combing his fingers through He Bai’s curls. "I just associated him with you , and I thought you were giving him an unfair advantage in the middle court, and—”

"How did that advantage help him when the cards were down?" Pei Ming's question isn't necessarily antagonistic, but—

It makes Shi Qingxuan feel blatantly incorrect, and therefore a little defensive.

A feeling that he forces himself to swallow down, admitting;

"...You were more even handed about his situation than I expected you to be."

"Pei Su wasn't the one you hated."

It's not a question, but it still brings a guilty twist to the Wind Master's lips.

"...I didn't hate you, either." He mutters, bouncing He Bai to keep him from growing restless. "I was just..."

He mutters the word under his breath, and Pei Ming frowns, struggling to understand.

"What?"

"I...wasalittlebitenvious—"

"I don't—?"

"I was jealous , okay?! Geeze!"

Pei Ming pauses, turning his head to give Shi Qingxuan a mildly dubious look, and he holds up one finger to stop his train of thought.

"Don't think I haven't already guessed that my brother would have talked to you about it before —it's not anything gross —it's just always been the two of us, and I didn't know how to..."

That's practically exactly how Shi Wudu explained it to him before--but that doesn't necessarily mean that Pei Ming finds it reasonable.

"Your brother never seems threatened by your relationship with Blackwater."

"Well, he isn't now." Shi Qingxuan huffs.

And it's not that his friendship with 'Ming Yi' ever left his brother feeling threatened about their own relationship. Not before everything came out. He just told Shi Qingxuan that Ming Yi wasn't good enough for him, and that he was up to no good.

One of those things was true.

"But it's different."

"I don't see how."

"Because I—I need him," Shi Qingxuan mutters, holding his son just a little closer. "I'll always need him. But he...He doesn't..."

"..." Pei Ming sighs heavily, pinching the bridge of his nose.

"...Okay," Shi Qingxuan mutters dryly, covering He Bai's ears so he doesn't hear him swear. "I am never being fucking vulnerable with you again—"

"You know, you might annoy the shit out of me, but I know you have lots of good qualities," the general grumbles. "I used to think one of them was being perceptive about other people's feelings."

"Hey—"

"Short of having children of his own someday, there's quite literally no one on this earth that your brother will ever love as much as you."

Shi Qingxuan falls silent.

"You weren't conscious when he found you on the terrace of Cascading Wine," Pei Ming continues, struggling to keep his voice calm as he remembers that moment.

The terror and agony in Shi Wudu's voice. The only time he ever slapped Pei Ming away, blind with fear and grief.

"I don't think I've ever heard anyone scream like that."

And knowing that makes Shi Qingxuan feel so much worse for the things he said when he woke up, but—

"And when we were on that island, and he knew you were in danger—do you know what he told me?"

He turns his head, leveling the Wind Master with a stern stare.

"He said that if I ever chose to protect him instead of you, he would never forgive me."

Shi Qingxuan's eyes grow round with shock, his lips parting into a perfect 'o.' "He...he actually said that?"

Pei Ming doesn't see how that could possibly be a surprise. Shi Wudu's near pathological dedication to his brother is one of the most dependable things he's ever seen. You could bet your life on it.

"I knew that about him from the very beginning, and I never wanted to change it."

Because Pei Ming would have done the same for his sisters. Would have done it for his son, if he'd had the chance to raise him.

And from what he's learned about He Xuan—and admittedly, most of what he's learned about the man has been against his will—he understands that just the same.

Elder brothers often do.

Shi Qingxuan grows quiet, processing that information, and...

His expression softens.

"...Well, if we're sharing secrets..." He glances back over his shoulder, making sure that his brother is still totally preoccupied with the game between Ling Wen and He Xuan. "...There was a reason I didn't like you from the beginning."

Pei Ming's eyebrows raise curiously.

“…He was always staring at you when you weren’t looking,” Shi Qingxuan grumbles. “And he wouldn’t let me say a bad word about you!”

“…That early on?”

“As soon as we came to the Heavens,” Shi Qingxuan confirms with an annoyed huff.

"At first I thought it was because he didn't have time to be social before, he was always so focused on protecting me. It made sense he would make friends once we came here, and I was safe. But..." He can't help but look a little sour. "He could never take his eyes off of you."

That was different from friendship. Shi Qingxuan had friends. He had many friends, but never someone he felt so innately drawn to, to the point where he had to make a point not to look at them. Not to think of them.

And that made it feel...threatening.

Because Pei Ming wasn't weak, or frightened of anything. He was just as charismatic as Shi Qingxuan, and he wasn't a source of constant burden and trauma. The Reverend of Empty Words wasn't tied to them through any fault of Shi Qingxuan's, but it was still bound to him.

Shi Qingxuan never doubted his brother's love for him, he just...

Pei Ming's friendship came with no drawbacks. But being Shi Qingxuan's brother came with so many.

And what if he was a liar, like the ones who had stolen from them in the past?

What if he was cruel, like their uncle? Or greedy, like their cousins? And—

Shi Qingxuan was shielded from so much, but not from everything.

Ever since they were small, his brother had been uncommonly beautiful.

And Shi Qingxuan was raised as a girl.

He knows what men do when they see beautiful things. How shallow and unkind their affections can be.

It makes him utterly miserable now, to think about how his suspicions were placed on the god who wanted to help , all while...

All while the emperor he trusted , even looked up to when he was younger, was the one hurting him.

"...But...I know you love him," Shi Qingxuan eventually concludes, leaning down to kiss the top of his son's head, closing his eyes.

"I do," Pei Ming agrees earnestly.

Shi Qingxuan doesn't know if he believed that before. Not until he saw Pei Ming holding his brother's "body" in the streets of the Heavens.

Saw a depth of pain and grief that mirrored his own.

And then, Pei Ming was able to put aside centuries of differences for his memory.

To protect Shi Qingxuan, and make sure he and his unborn child were looked after—all because it was what his brother would have wanted.

Honor might make a man feel bound to act—but it doesn't make him so immediate, or sincere.

But love will.

"...And he's the happiest when he's with you," the Wind Master admits reluctantly.

He's always been aware of the fact that Pei Ming was his brother's first love, even if he didn't want to believe that it was requited. Or that it would last.

But...they're family now.

Pei Ming isn't a rival for his brother's attention, or the source of a happiness and stability that Shi Qingxuan always took away from.

He's his brother.

In law . But a brother nonetheless.

"Keep that up...and I suppose I could stand to learn to like you."

There's a slight smile in his voice as he says this—

As though he already has.

Pei Ming can't help but smile back, glancing back over to where his husband is seated, and...

"Does it ever seem strange to you?"

"What?"

"...How close they are. After everything that happened."

Shi Qingxuan turns his head, watching as Ling Wen and He Xuan place down tiles, his brother quietly nagging the ghost king about every move he makes—

And he smiles.

“…Did you prefer it when they despised each other? Because as I recall that was much more violent.”

Pei Ming can’t help but scowl. “Obviously not. I just…”

Jealousy isn't the right word. Or maybe it is but—even if he knows Shi Wudu is alive now, that they can go home together, that he can hold him, he can protect him—

The grief left its mark. It isn't so easily forgotten.

He can't see the scar on his husband's throat and forget how it felt to lose him. Or the rage he felt towards the man he thought was responsible.

He can move on, just not that quickly.

And he struggles to understand how everyone else can .

"…I don't know if I understand how they were able to forgive one another," Shi Qingxuan murmurs, looking back down at his son. "But they're more alike than you realize. I think…that makes them understand one another."

In a stroke of irony—it's been nearly two years since Jun Wu's demise and his brother's return, and in that time …he's been the one to help her see things about He Xuan that he just didn't understand before.

And he couldn't have, because He Xuan didn't let himself be known.

But with his brother's help…Shi Qingxuan finds himself piecing the edges of him together, forming a more complete picture. One that He Xuan himself lost sight of long ago.

"If you got to know He-Xiong yourself, you might start to see what I mean."

"…I wouldn't hold your breath," Pei mutters, glancing down at the two of them. Watching the warmth in Shi Qingxuan's gaze when he brushes He Bai's hair from his eyes.

…And maybe there is someone he could stand to get to know better—even if it's not He Xuan.

Getting to know someone beyond your first and worst assumptions can lead to things you never expected.

Thwap!

“Ow!”

“I said not to try and help with the food,” the teenager grouses. “It has to be edible.”

“…Not all Heavenly Officials are shit at cooking, you know!”

Lang Qianqiu leans over his shoulder, scowling as he watches his partner stir the simmering mixture.

“I don’t trust someone who barely knows how to tie his own shoes to roast my meat.”

“I know how to tie my—!”

“Which heavenly officials are terrible at cooking?”

Lang Qianqiu pauses, spinning around with almost comical speed, hands clasped behind his back.

"G-Guoshi!" He laughs nervously. "I didn't realize you were standing there!"

Xie Lian smiles, glancing back and forth between him and Ren Song, who seems entirely focused on the food.

"I wanted to make sure Shuo didn't need any help."

The ghost king glances up, smiling beatifically. "It's well handled dianxia, but you're welcome to help if you'd like."

Lang Qianqiu sends him an open mouthed, offended look. "You just said—!"

"Dianxia asked you a question."

"...I...ah..." The martial god swallows hard, turning back to his former teacher. "...I heard Nan Yang is an awful—”

"Oh, Feng Xin's cooking isn't bad at all," Xie Lian corrects him earnestly. "He learned during my first banishment."

Mu Qing has always been the best cook among the martial gods, but Feng Xin is certainly not the worst.

"...Qi Ying," Lang Qianqiu croaks, his eyes darting around, hoping not to see a very dark, very long shadow with silver bells and butterflies in tow. "His food is awful!"

"Not true," Shuo shakes his head.

"How would you know?!"

"Who do you think was making me snacks up until Yin Yu came back?"

Lang Qianqiu sends him a pointedly betrayed look, and Xie Lian pats his arm, letting the subject drop.

"Are you hungry?"

"...Yeah," the prince of Yong'an sags with relief, grabbing a bowl as he leans towards the pan Shuo has been working over. "I...probably was just saying things I didn't mean...because I was hungry—”

"It's not completely cooked yet," Shuo frowns, pushing his spoon away. "You'll make yourself sick."

"..."

"You could have some of my three volcanoes lamb stew," Xie Lian offers with a serene smile. "San Lang just finished a bowl, but there's plenty left."

Lan Qianqiu's smile fades, his expression growing pale. "Three...volcanoes...?"

"San Lang's been helping me make the flavors a little sharper," Xie Lian explains. "He's always preferred spicier foods."

"...But...why three?" Lang Qianqiu's voice cracks slightly, peeking over Xie Lian's shoulder to stare at the pot on the counter behind him.

"Three kinds of peppers!" Xie Lian beams, explaining how they've been growing them in the garden behind the temple, all while Lang Qianqiu begins to look fainter. "And Mount Tonglu created three ghost kings, so it's a bit of wordplay—”

"Then you should really try some!" The martial god exclaims, grabbing Shuo by the shoulders. "It's named after you!"

"Oh," Shuo looks up with round eyes. "I would, but I don't eat lamb. It reminds me too much of Qi Qi, y'know? I can't do it."

"Qi Qi isn't even close to a—!"

"If you don't want any, it's alright," Xie Lian smiles graciously, holding up his hands to dispel any tensions. "Spicy foods like that aren't for everyone—”

"True," Shuo muses. "Not everyone can be such a tough guy like Hua Chengzhu. Such grit."

"..." Lang Qianqiu scowls. "...I'd love to have a bowl guoshi, thank you."

The Prince of Xianle brightens, spooning out a portion for him as Shuo hunches over in the corner, shaking with silent laughter.

"But you did make a good point, maybe I should see if Blackwater would like to try some..."

Xie Lian muses, tapping the end of the ladle against his chin as his student stares down at the bowl in his hands, not much different from the sight of a man walking towards the executioner's block.

"That's a great idea, your highness!" Shuo crows with a fanged grin.

Lang Qianqiu looks up at the ceiling in a silent prayer, forcing a spoonful into his mouth.

And for a moment, he manages to chew, his expression presently surprised.

Until he begins to sweat.

"...Maybe you should have had water first," Shuo mutters, slightly concerned.

"Should I get him some?" Xie Lian asks, watching as tears well up in his student's eyes.

"...I don't know if he could open his mouth to drink it..." Shuo tilts his head to the side, eyeing how Lang Qianqiu's jaw has practically locked around the spoon, still in his mouth.

"If I was lucky enough to be fed by my plum blossom's family I certainly wouldn't complain, or make such an embarrassing scene!"

That seems to spur the martial god from his temporary out of body experience, wheezing and choking—

"W—What is HE doing here?!"

Xie Lian shrugs, rubbing the back of his neck. "I suppose it was a bit of an open invitation..."

"Yin Rong!" Shuo's eyes widen as he sets his spoon down, stepping away from the pot. "You're alright!"

So many mortal cultivators passed during the battle--he hadn't been sure.

"Ah!" Heaven's Eye laughs, placing his hands upon his hips. "As if anything could keep me from finding my way back to you for long, my dearest!"

Xie Lian supposes it isn't all that strange that he's here—Lan An and Xiong Li did, along with a few mortal friends of Shi Wudu's.

To be more accurate, he appointed Jiang Ning as a deputy shortly after his return to the Heavens. But Jin Feng is still very much a mortal. Not to mention countless spirits and demons from Ghost City mingling with the other guests.

Still, in spite of Heaven's Eye's heroic declarations, Xie Lian wouldn't give him any of the stew, as he's not entirely sure that it would be medically advisable. He—

"...Goodness, what's happened to you?" The cultivator huffs, looking Xie Lian up and down.

The prince pauses, reaching up to touch his hair self-consciously, making sure it's not too terribly askew after running around for hours on end. "...What do you mean? Is something on my face?"

"No, no... it’s that evil essence from before! It's gotten even worse!"

"...Huh?" Xie Lian stares, hands still frozen in his own hair, while Lang Qianqiu sputters, having sunk to the ground on his hands and knees.

"O...Of course he d-does, you... idiot ...he's with a...ghost a-all day!"

"Right," he agrees faintly, nodding in agreement, but—

"No, it's different from before!" Heaven's Eye frowns, stroking his beard—which has somehow gotten even longer and more magnificent than it was before. "It was like a stain covering the surface of his body, particularly around the head! But this—”

"I feel fine," Xie Lian explains weakly, trying to interrupt that train of thought. "There's really no reason to be concerned—”

"This is coming from the inside of his body! All over!"

The prince's smile is strained, frozen in place.

Shuo pauses, his expression that of genuine confusion.

"...What do you mean? How does that even—”

"It's as though he's been filled to the brim with evil essence! He's practically overflowing with it! It's completely unnatural!"

Xie Lian doesn't know whether to laugh or cry.

"...It's not...it's really not that serious..."

"Your highness, I would not downplay the seriousness of this. It's as though your entire body has been doused in it from the inside out! And the outside is covered all over too! You're practically bathing in —”

"I'm really not—!"

"It's almost as if you've been drinking it—!”

Lang Qianqiu makes a sound like he may or may not be dying, and when Shuo looks down at him—

He can tell it's not just from the stew.

Slowly, the dots begin to connect in his mind, and he bites back a horrified groan.

Xie Lian is currently debating the ethics of developing a memory wiping spell, exiling himself for another century, or faking his own—

Then, an arm wraps around his waist, silver vambraces gleaming, and he practically sags back against his husband's chest.

"Instead of spouting nonsense, why don't you focus on your own problems and enjoy the food?" Hua Cheng asks coldly, his thumb rubbing circles into the prince's side in order to soothe him.

"You of all people should be concerned!" Heaven's Eye cries. "It's not natural for a god to be so stuffed with evil! Practically bursting with it! I don't know how he's not leaking—"

Xie Lian chokes, holding up a hand to silence him, shaking his head vehemently. "There's no need to describe it so vividly—!"

"And he's not the only one!"

Everyone in the room freezes, and when Heaven's Eye points his finger, Shuo practically jumps three feet in the air.

"I'm a ghost , you idiot! Of course I have—!"

"You're stained with Heavenly Light!! That's not natural either!!!"

"..."

"..."

The entire room falls into shocked silence (aside from Lang Qianqiu's pained wheezing), and Shuo's knuckles grow white around his spoon.

"...But not filled to the brim , or whatever, so I don't know why you're —"

"Ren Song," Xie Lian croaks, feeling viciously betrayed.

Shuo can't bring himself to look at him, turning red from his collarbones, all the way to the tips of his ears.

"I'm sorry , what do you expect me to do when he's—?"

"It's not as severe, but it's inside you too! I'm no expert on ghostly anatomy, but that seems—!"

"You know," Hua Cheng has been deathly quiet, so when he does speak, it startles everyone listening. "I think I misjudged you, Daozhang."

Xie Lian and Shuo stare at each other in confusion, the latter mouthing, 'Daozhang?' with raised eyebrows.

"You seem more than worthy of courting Ren Song. Since you're so...concerned."

Shuo's eyes widen with horror. It's not that Hua Cheng ever actually interfered in that matter—but he allowed Shuo to imply that he did, to spare him any discomfort.

Crimson Rain's eyes drift down towards Lang Qianqiu's hunched, trembling form on the ground.

"You'll just have to deal with rivals first, I suppose."

"Rivals...?" Heaven's Eye questions, his expression going from that of euphoria to shock and anger . "You..."

His beard quivers with rage.

"WHAT HAVE YOU DONE TO MY PRECIOUS LITTLE PLUM BLOSSOM?!"

"He's NOT—” Lang Qianqiu gags, clutching his throat. "—HE'S NOT YOUR ANYTHING, YOU SENILE PIECE OF—!"

"Could you both NOT—?!"

"San Lang," Xie Lian mumbles, still burning with shame as he's guided out of the room. "Lang Qianqiu can hardly put up a fight right now..."

"Shuo won't let him die ," Hua Cheng mutters darkly, shooting one dark look over his shoulder as they step outside. "He'll be fine."

Of course he will, but Lang Qianqiu wasn't even the one who started that conversation, it wasn't his fault—

But when they step out onto the hill, and he catches sight of the sun slipping beneath the trees, his protests die in his throat.

They've watched the sunset together nearly every day since Hua Cheng's return. In different seasons. On opposite sides of the continent.

And every single time, Xie Lian remembers his first sunset without him, sitting on the seawalls in Lang'er Bay.

A beautiful sight, but one he couldn't appreciate then. Not when he had just lost Wu Ming. Not when Hong'er wasn't there to watch it with him.

But now, he's found himself able to enjoy the sight of them again.

Sitting with his husband on the hillside where he grew up.

Surrounded by friends and comrades, gathered here to celebrate the marriage of a Crown Prince and a Ghost King.

Belatedly, and only at Mu Qing and Feng Xin's insistence. Not because they were eager to accept his husband, but...

Xie Lian's happiness should be celebrated.

He can see them both now, standing at the bottom of the hill. Mu Qing holding Xiao Feng's hands as the boy stumbles through practice steps, making his way towards his father's waiting arms.

Part of him feels like he's celebrating their happiness, too.

Quan Yizhen is standing to the side of the cottage, watching the fighting going on through the window, gold bars clutched in his hands—only for Yin Yu, who has a rare day off, to usher him off towards the tables with gentle scolding.

Music drifts through the air, Lan An plucking gentle notes from his guqin as Xiong Li sings along, his voice adding to the easy ambience of twilight.

"I wish my heart were made of glass, within you might behold..."

He Xuan and Ling Wen have long since finished their game, and now, after so many years of watching in distant, restrained silence—

A Princess of Yushi asks someone to dance.

"Upon my heart your name lies, written in letters made of gold..."

Xie Lian's eyes drift down to his fingers, intertwined with Hua Cheng's. His husband's sleeves are rolled up to the elbows—and he finds his own name there, standing out against his skin in black ink.

"...In letters made of gold my love, believe me when I say..."

Xie Lian leans his head against his shoulder, briefly closing his eyes.

Breathing in the smell of the forest, woodfire smoke, and home.

"...You are the one that I will adore, until my dying day."

"San Lang?"

The ghost king hums, kissing his hair in acknowledgement. "Yes?"

(And when you're on some distant shore, think of your absent friend.)

Xie Lian turns his face into his sleeve, thinking back on how many times these arms have held him. How small and fierce they used to be. How they feel like they could swallow him whole, now.

He thinks of the ones who aren't here. By death, betrayal, or choice. How unrecognizable his life might seem to him, if he was forced to try to connect the links between beginnings and ends.

But tapestries aren't simple lines of continuance.

They're made of intertwining threads.

Moments that might seem painful, or pointless. Unable to see the design around you, stumbling blindly from one row to the next.

But eventually, when you pull back, you see the masterpiece you never knew you were making.

A mosaic of love, pain, and hard learned lessons.

"...Thank you," he whispers.

(And when the wind blows high and clear, a light to me pray send...

When the wind blows high and clear, pray send your love to me.)

"For what?"

The prince cracks his eyelids open, watching as day turns to night, stars beginning to peek through.

Some of them glitter and shoot across the horizon, a meteor shower that has always come with the end of summer. Children run through the grass, reaching up high—as though they could catch them between their fingers, and make a wish.

Xie Lian did the same, when he was small.

Thinking he could just catch one, and he could make a wish of his own.

"...For believing in me."

But catching one star is enough to last a thousand lifetimes. A radiance that even a blind man can see clearly.

(That I might know by your light, how time has gone with thee.)

The music grows softer, more distant as Hua Cheng shifts, pulling the prince into his arms, bells chiming softly as they intertwine.

Clink, clink!

Pushing locks of hair from his face as he leans forward, pressing their foreheads together.

(As time draws near...)

Hua Cheng doesn't say not to thank him. Doesn't deflect the love and gratitude he still doesn't feel as though he deserves, knowing that it's freely given.

Instead, he whispers the words he's said so many times before—with a sincerity that never wanes or fades.

An oath that Xie Lian doubted, then denied—but now believes with all of his heart.

No matter how much time passes, no matter what name or face he carries.

A lost orphan, a slain soldier, or a blood-soaked calamity.

Hong'er, Wu Ming, or Crimson Rain Sought Flower.

No matter the state of him, because it's always him.

The greatest blessing the Crown Prince of Xianle has ever been given.
The boy who fell from the sky, who then caught him every time after.

The man who will never let him fall again.

"I am forever your most devoted believer."

For you, I will become invincible.

Chapter End Notes

This is the end of the main timeline of this story! I will be posting a two chapter epilogue, then a Q & A chapter to answer any questions anyone has in regards to the story, as well as posting any other helpful information that comes up! If you have any questions that you want answered, feel free to go ahead and submit them! If it's material that is included in the epilogue, I won't answer in the Q&A, but otherwise I'm happy to clear up any points of confusion remaining!

xoxo, Evie

By Heaven Official's Blessing

Chapter Summary

> “Didn’t you say they were high school sweethearts or something? It’s weird you’ve never introduced us.”
>
> “…Something like that,” he agrees, looking away.
>
> “It’s not weird. His family is loaded, his dads are probably just busy—”
>
> “He never said they were loaded!”
>
> “He didn’t have to. You can just tell when someone grew up with money.”

Chapter Notes

> Please read the beginning and end notes for this chapter, as they're pretty important!
>
> CONTENT WARNINGS: This fic is not tagged for mpreg because it is never shown or discussed, but if you are uncomfortable with it being implied then this chapter might be triggering.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

TWO THOUSAND YEARS LATER

"Are you even listening?"

"Obviously not, dumb ass. He's wearing headphones."

"Oi," the teenager reaches forward, pulling at a white cord until it slips from his friend's ear. "Earth to demon king."

His head turns, and a pair of dark sunglasses stare back at him impassively.

“Did you hear me?”

“…No,” he answers shortly, turning away again. “I’m on the phone with my uncle.”

“…Oh,” Tang Chao winces as the cord is tugged back out of his hand pointedly.

On his other side, his sister doesn’t even look up from her phone, fingers typing away.

“He was going to ask if you were coming to our birthday party this weekend,” Tang Min explains flatly—and her brother winces, because he was going to sell it a little better.

“My parents are going out of town—”

“I have a family thing, sorry.”

“You always have a family thing, and it’s just one night—!”

“It’s a wedding,” he explains gently, sounding somewhat sympathetic. “I really can’t skip.”

“And bugging him while he’s on the phone with his uncle isn’t helping,” his sister reminds him flatly.

“…Right.”

They fall back a couple of steps as they pass through the intersection, crowds jostling around him as he places the headphones back in his ears.

“Sorry about that.”

“Did someone try to mug you or something?”

His uncle's incredulous tone makes him bite back a laugh.

"No, someone was inviting me to a party."

"...Was it one of those twins?"

"..."

"A'Ming, I do not like that boy. He smokes, he doesn't take anything seriously, he's a distraction from your studies—"

< He's harmless, and he's been a good friend to me. >

"Don't answer me in the communication array, you know your parents don't like you using that without supervision after the incident."

< Why should I get in trouble for something gege—! >

"A'Ming."

He huffs a sigh, lowering his voice.

"...My dad said it was good for me to have friends my own age," he mutters under his breath. "That's why we moved here, remember?"

Something his uncle vehemently disagreed with, but mostly because he would miss them dearly.

Which is a little silly, because they still see them all the time , they just aren't neighbors anymore.

"...Do you want me to pick you up?" He finally asks, changing the subject. "We weren't coming that way, but it's better than riding one of those smelly death traps—"

"Trains are one of the safest modes of transportation," the teenage parrots, as though he's already had to say it a thousand times. "I'm meeting baba at the shrine—and I like riding the train after school. It helps me unwind."

"...Are you worried about something?"

"No—"

"Is it because of entrance exams? Because you don't need to be. And if you did, I could just make a few calls. You know I helped deliver one of the board members. He doesn't know that, but it's all subliminal, you know—"

"Uncle. I'm fine."

His tone turns gentle, losing its annoyance from before. "I understand you're only asking because you care, but I promise I'm fine. I miss you, and I'll see you in a few hours—okay?"

"…Alright ," reluctant agreement comes from the other end of the line. "You're going straight to the shrine?"

"Cross my heart." He agrees lightly, taking the steps down to the station two at a time. "I'm going underground, so I have to hang up now."

"Fine."

"…Love you."

That always makes his uncle's tone soften.

"…Love you too, A'Ming."

He hangs up with a sigh, rolling his shoulders as he reaches down to loosen the collar of his school uniform.

It used to be suffocating, how protective the adults in his life became as he grew older. But now, just shy of seventeen, he knows why. Still, it seems a little silly for anyone to worry. It's not like anyone ever lets him go anywhere alone .

The occasional wriggling under his collar is enough of a reminder of that.

"So…who's getting married?" Tang Chao asks, right on his tail.

"My cousin."

"So—you were just on the phone with—?"

"What? Oh—no, he's not Mu Qing's kid. He's—" he scrunches up his nose, struggling to describe exactly how they're related in a way his friend could understand. "Technically a second cousin…once… removed?"

"…And you have to go to his wedding?"

He winces, a little sheepish from how that sounds. “I have a really close-knit family—and he’s best friends with my—”

He steps out just a little too far, nearly missing the next step down—only for a hand to reach out and grab his arm.

“You really shouldn’t wear those down here,” Tang Min points out flatly, eyeing the sunglasses on his face before she lets go of his sleeve. “They mess with your depth perception.”

“…Yeah,” he agrees, grabbing the railing before he continues down the rest of the stairs. “It’s just kind of a pain when I don’t wear them in crowded places.”

She can understand why. With the glasses on, he looks like a normal student. Well put together, handsome, courteous—no one gives him any trouble.

But when he doesn’t…

“Your parents can’t let you skip?”

“I don’t think he wants to skip, didi. Stop being rude.”

“They would let me if I asked,” he mutters. “But I want to go.”

“Weird.”

“I like spending time with my family, the horror.”

“I wish I enjoyed spending time with mine,” Tang Min sighs, earning an annoyed stare. “Don’t feel bad—he’s only bothering you about coming because he thinks it’ll make that underclassman from the archery team show up.”

“Why would that matter?”

“Because she likes you, idiot.”

The mention of that makes him frown, squirming with discomfort.

“…But you’re going to the wedding anyway,” Tang Chao mutters quickly, seeming to sense his anxiety. “Don’t worry about it. So…is it nearby?”

“Up north.”

"Oh. Near the capital? That's where your parents met, right?"

"…No, they're from further west, in the interior." It's so different now from what his father has described about his childhood—he struggles to connect the two, but still.

"Didn't you say they were high school sweethearts or something? It's weird you've never introduced us."

"…Something like that," he agrees, looking away.

"It's not weird. His family is loaded , his dads are probably just busy —"

"He never said they were loaded!"

"He didn't have to. You can just tell when someone grew up with money."

"I can't!"

"You think girls think smoking is sexy. You're not observant."

"Why are you being such a bitch today?!"

Their bickering fades into the background as they reach the platform, crowding around as they wait for the train, but…

He frowns, craning his neck to try and see above the crowd.

Something isn't right.

"…Hey…" he mutters, both of his friends speaking over him in the constant roar of the station. "…Are they pushing that kid, or—?"

At first he thought that must have been the case, watching a pair of shoes stumble across the yellow line.

But the closer he looks…there's no one shoving him from behind. And he can't imagine who would , it looks like a middle schooler, but—

He watches the boy bite his lip, hesitating as the intercom bellows overhead, announcing the incoming train.

Then, he lunges.

"HEY!"

He shoves past his friends, elbowing his way towards the edge of the platform, hearing them call after him in a panic;

“What are you—?”

“Hua Ming!”

All they hear his him barking out a word in a language they don’t recognize, then—

A blinding flash.

For a moment, everything comes to a halt. The shouting and the chatter. The rattling of cars in the street overhead. The roar of the incoming train.

The boy’s arms and legs ache from the fall onto the tracks, but…

He isn’t dead.

When he looks up, he sees a gleaming ray of light overhead, encircling the people standing on the platform—every single one of them frozen in place. Some in the middle of speaking, pointing, one man stopped in mid-cough. Even the escalators have stopped. The headlights of the inbound subway are blinding from behind him, but—

The train isn’t moving either.

And next him…is a high schooler.

Breathing hard, having landed on the tracks just beside him on his hands and knees, a once pristine school uniform now rumpled. When he looks up, the boy jumps, shrinking back instinctively.

As anyone would, seeing a pair of blood red eyes staring back at him, gleaming almost unnaturally under the station lamps.

But, once you look past that…He has a kind face, and a concerned gaze.

“…Shit.” He sits back on his heels for a moment, pressing his hands to his temples. “Shit, shit, shit!”

The younger boy swallows hard, the gravel on the tracks cutting into his palms, but…

He reaches forward, lifting up a fallen pair of sunglasses, handing them back to him.

The teenager glances down at them, then back at him, and whispers something in a language that the child couldn't possibly understand, making some sort of sign with his hands—

Then, everything goes dark.

When he wakes up again, he's back on the platform.

A jacket folded and slid underneath him to support his head, commuters standing around him in a circle as they try to wait and see if he's alright.

"…Do you think he needs an ambulance? I didn't see him fall…"

"It'll be okay."

Kneeling beside him is a teenager—

One with dark brown hair, neatly pulled back.

Sunglasses obscuring his eyes.

"I'm pretty sure he just fainted." The older boy mutters, rummaging around in his backpack, pulling out a bottle of water. "What's your name?"

"...Mo Shen," he manages to answer hoarsely, averting his gaze as the stranger--Hua Ming, from the way his friends were calling to him--hands him the water, indicating for him to drink up.

"...Is there anyone I can call for you?"

He takes a long drink, growing silent.

The lack of a reply is its own answer—

There's no one.

He must be younger—Hua Ming can tell that much from the pitch of his voice, and by looking at his face. But he's tall for a middle schooler—thin as a rail, with long legs. All knees and elbows, wild hair, and dark eyes. The bruises on his forearms are hard to ignore. Deeply discolored, layers upon layers of them.

If he does have somewhere to go—it might have been the reason he leapt over the edge of those tracks.

The high schooler looks down in his bag again, fumbling around for a moment before pulling out a bun wrapped in plastic, holding it out. "Eat this."

He hesitates to take it, but—

"Your adrenaline is going to crash, and you'll feel sick if you don't eat something."

"..." He pulls at the wrapping after a moment, taking a slow, cautious bite. Almost as if he expects Hua Ming to yank it out of his hands the moment he expresses any desire to eat it.

But...he doesn't.

He steps away for a moment, speaking quietly on the phone.

"...Are you calling the cops?" Mo Shen asks when he returns, watching him with nervous distrust.

Hua Ming kneels beside him, staring back at him mildly. "Why would I do that? You haven't done anything wrong."

Because he's suicidal runaway, and they both know it.

"...Do you want to wait with you?" Tang Chao asks, rubbing the back of his neck as he watches another train approach. "It might take a while to figure out what to do--"

"It's okay," Hua Ming shakes his head. "I already called someone, I'll wait with him."

"Aren't you gonna be late—?"

"I gave myself about an hour of a cushion before I had to meet up with my parents," he shrugs. "I was planning on stopping by the library, but this is more important."

...Of course he was.

"...See you after fall break then, I guess..."

Mo Shen sits up as the high schooler sits down beside him, cross legged as he scrolls through his phone. Not asking any questions, all while not necessarily being standoffish either, and...

He has layers around his face cropped slightly shorter, falling in front of his eyes.

His fingers twitch before he shoves his hands in his pockets, biting his lip.

"..." Hua Ming glances over at him, raising one eyebrow. "Are you still hungry? I have another—”

"Are you wearing colored contacts?"

He freezes, his lips parted, and Mo Shen swallows nervously.

"...No," he tilts his head to the side. "But when did you see my eyes?"

The middle schooler frowns, about to point out how he stared right at him on the tracks, but—

For some reason, it feels like he's not supposed to remember that.

"...Must have been the angle from when I woke up on the ground," he mumbles awkwardly, his throat dry, but—

He seems to believe him.

"Well. I came by them honestly, no accessories required."

"...Contacts might be easier, if you don't want to wear sunglasses all the time."

Hua Ming considers that, sitting back for a moment, pushing his glasses up and on top of his head, pushing his bangs back with them.

Mo Shen's face feels oddly warm.

"I wear these when I want to avoid people thinking I'm a delinquent or something." He shrugs.

"But I'm not wearing something uncomfortable all the time just to make other people feel comfortable. They're dry," he explains, wrinkling his nose. "And they burn.”

But, interestingly enough, he doesn't sound uncomfortable with his eye color.

"You...don't care otherwise?"

"Nope," he shakes his head, smiling. "I got them from my dad."

And as his other father was saying for most of his childhood—Hua Ming's dad is one of the most handsome people there is.

"You—?"

A pair of official looking men in dark clothes come down the station steps, walking towards them.

Hua Ming didn't call the police , but it's unusually cold for this time of year—and even if it was safe for him to sleep on the streets...

After that, he shouldn't be alone.

Thankfully, his father's assistant runs group homes that they own in the area. Even if he doesn't stay long term...he'll have a place to sleep tonight.

"...Are you gonna be okay?"

The younger boy nods stiffly—but Hua Ming doesn't seem to believe it. Not entirely.

"...Here," he mutters, digging around in his backpack for a pen and paper, bracing them against a nearby concrete pillar as he jots something down, handing it over to him. "You can call me if you run into any more trouble, or...if you need someone to talk to."

Mo Shen looks down at the crumbled, lined piece of sheet paper—the name 'Hua Ming' scrawled across the top, with a phone number carefully written underneath.

"...Okay," he mumbles, holding it tightly, feeling almost shell shocked by the rapid turn of events.

"...I hope I didn't make you late—” he starts, stiffening when he feels a hand ruffle through his hair.

"That doesn't matter," Hua Ming shakes his head, smiling with a warmth that makes it difficult for Mo Shen to breathe. "I'm just glad I met you today."

Mo Shen doesn't know what to say to that, watching with wide eyes as the older boy walks towards the next train, just arriving, the newcomers taking him by the arm, gently leading him towards the station exit—only thinking one thing.

That he has to see him again.

The commuter crowd has already passed—and by the time Hua Ming takes his seat, other than one elderly woman sleeping in the car corner, he has the compartment to himself.

And as such, he pulls back his collar with a hiss.

“Ruoye! I said to catch him, not the entire station!”

The end of the silk bandage wriggles out, curving up, almost like it’s staring up at him—

“Don’t look at me like that,” Hua Ming whispers. “I’m not allowed to use you unless my life is in danger! I could get in so much trouble!”

Luckily no one saw , thanks to the array Ruoye cast. But it could have been dangerous. If he had stopped that train for more than a minute, it could have caused a collision. And then who knows —

“…I’m gonna tell them,” he mutters, as if part of a two way conversation. “I mean. Probably not this weekend , they’re gonna have a lot of stuff going on for the wedding. And even if I don’t—Yin Yu is gonna tell them anyway. So don’t look at me like that, I’m not keeping secrets.”

The overdeveloped sense of guilt would say otherwise, but…

As a lifelong, habitually considerate young man, that isn’t surprising.

Either way—he is looking forward to the trip, and he has the entire ride to the shrine to calm down, and forget anything happened.

(As long as Ruoye stops looking at him like that.)

On the other side of town, it’s quiet in the shrine.

Incense burning on the altar, lights flickering dimly overhead.

When the doors swing open, a familiar voice bleeds through.

“We’ll both be there,” Xie Lian confirms, setting his bag down. “He’s just about finished for the day, anyway.”

There's worried babbling on the other end of the line—which the god constantly reassures, holding the phone against his cheek as he walks to the altar.

It's not needed but helpful if someone walks in—he doesn't appear to be talking to himself.

(He prefers to get through the workday without being mistaken for a raving lunatic, if possible.)

"Alright—see you then." He taps the screen, ending the call and pocketing the device.

His hands come together for a moment in prayer, head bowed as he stands before the altar—

But a persistent smile tugs at the corners of his lips.

"…I certainly hope no one's trying to sneak up on an old man while he's praying. I have no one to protect me…"

He says that, even when Hong Li can be seen in the corner—half asleep, but watching him with one keen eye, tail flicking lazily across the floor.

Creeeaak…

Life is the most baffling thing, and time can turn anything on its head.

A sound that once brought him nothing but terror is now the noise that makes him crack a smile, stepping back from the altar—holding his arms out as something comes crashing down from the rafters.

An expression that turns stern once he catches a little boy in his arms.

"What have I told you about climbing?"

Almond shaped, amber eyes—just like his own—stare up at him innocently.

"…That I could break my neck," he admits shamelessly. "I wasn't sneaking, though!"

Xie Lian's eyebrows raise. "Is that so?"

His son nods, arms wrapping around his neck as Xie Lian holds him against his hip. Maybe a little too old to be held like this—but always happy when his father does it.

“I was making sure no one else was sneaking up on you!”

The prince does his best to be unmoved.

“You can’t do that from the ground?”

He shakes his head, loose pieces of raven hair falling across his forehead. “You wouldn’t understand! I’m small, I’ve gotta attack from the sky! Like a hawk!”

“…Someone’s been listening to their Shuo gege a little too much.”

Besides, Xie Lian has never been considered a large person—but he’s never had to climb into the rafters to get the upper hand, either.

“…And you’re not old, Baba!” He changes the subject quickly, reaching up to pat his hand against Xie Lian’s cheek. “You don’t have wrinkles!”

Maybe not. But if Xie Lian could have gray hairs, his eldest and his youngest would be to blame for every single one of them.

“…Thank you, A’Liang,” he sighs, “but your baba is older than he looks.”

Both of them, to be sure—even if Hua Cheng chooses to look older these days. It makes it seem a little more believable that they could have a son that was about to take university entrance exams. Of course, Hua Ming knows exactly how old they are, but Hua Liang…

After he proudly declared to his pre-school class that one of his fathers was a ghost, well…

They took one look at the shocked, then offended stares—and realized they needed to go a little slow with explaining things to the boy as he got older.

He’s almost seven now, and Xie Lian wouldn’t say they’ve hidden anything from him, but…

He’s not in the loop, either.

“…How was school?” He finally asks, a little exhausted with that train of thought—and Hua Liang shrugs.

“Boring. I like it better when you and Dad teach me.”

Xie Lian prefers it that way too—but it isn’t good for socializing him either.

“Any new friends?”

“…Kinda?” The grade schooler makes a face, thinking about it. “I let someone play on the swings with me.”

“…Let them?” Xie Lian tries not to sound too tired.

He’s a little bit too much like Xie Lian’s husband at times. Wild, assertive to the point that it’s often mistaken for aggression, loyal, but extremely choosy about those he spends his time with—

And not the type who would develop strong social skills in isolation, hence the move to the city when he started school. Xie Lian thinks it’s helped—he’s made one friend, at the very least. A slightly terrorized first grader, but a friend.

“…Baba?”

“Hmm?”

“You’re in charge of all the others, right?”

He’s not exactly aware of the full context of what that means, but Xie Lian nods. “I am.”

“…Then who do you pray to?” Hua Liang asks with wide, curious eyes.

They’ve never instructed their children to pray to anyone. Hua Liang prays to him sometimes when he’s in trouble, or his grandfather when he wants sweets.

Hua Ming is old enough to understand that you don’t just pray in order to receive favors—gods need prayers in order to survive.

As such, he methodically prays to his loved ones on rotating days, and his parents every morning.

He never misses a single day.

"…I pray to your father, sometimes." Xie Lian murmurs, pushing Hua Liang's hair behind his ears. Dark, prone to curls and waves. It's always nearly braided over his shoulder when they send him to school—and a mess when he comes home.

"But…this isn't baba's temple."

Xie Lian bites back an affectionate smile. He's only ever been to their temple back home, on Mount Taicang—never any of the others, so naturally, he assumes that's the only one.

"No, but this isn't a temple, A'Liang."

"…I don't get the difference. You pray here."

There are a lot of nuances between classifications between shrines and temples, but in this case it's much more obvious.

"…Well, the goddess worshipped here isn't around anymore," Xie Lian explains carefully, pointing to the divine statue behind the altar. A woman with a hammer in one hand, a sword in the other. Butterflies etched into the sleeves of her dress, a crown upon her head.

"…But if she's gone…how does praying to her do anything?" His son frowns, staring up at a face made from marble and stone.

Xie Lian rubs his shoulder, resting his chin on top of his head. "We don't always pray because we want things from people," he explains quietly. "Sometimes we just want to feel close to people we can't see anymore."

Hua Liang turns his face into his shoulder, pressing close.

He's never been eager to accept physical affection from those outside of the immediate family—at times coming off as quite cold. But with Xie Lian, he's never been anything less than clingy, always eager for an opportunity to steal moments of affection that he's happy to give.

"…Who was she?" His voice is muffled against Xie Lian's shirt—but his father answers nonetheless.

"One of your ancestors," he explains quietly. "Your father's friend—and teacher."

The first martial goddess. The first forge master of the Kiln, creator of Ghost Kings.

More martial goddesses have ascended in the last two millennia. More ghost kings have been forged.

But she will always be the first—and her sacrifices have never been forgotten.

“…” Hua Liang stares at the figure, arms still wrapped around his father’s neck—then offers a small wave of greeting. “Do you miss her?”

Xie Lian glances back up at the statue, his eyes somewhat distant.

“…We both do.”

His son looks back up at him, familiar with that tone in his voice. "Are you sad today?"

If there's one thing Xie Lian has learned since having children of his own, it's that they ask the simplest questions with the most impossible answers.

Hua Liang is used to one father's temper. He provokes and tests it, not as often as he'd like—it's difficult to stretch the patience of a man who has lived nearly three thousand years—but Hua Cheng's moods never worry him.

But Xie Lian's occasional bouts of sadness make the child anxious.

Too young to understand that no one can be happy all the time, and that even if Xie Lian is sad, it doesn't mean that he did something wrong.

"...No," his father murmurs, kissing his forehead. "I'm excited. It's a special day."

"...Do I have to dress up this time?" Hua Liang mumbles, wrinkling his nose in annoyance.

"Yes," Xie Lian agrees, smiling even as his son scowls. "But I'm excited, because my little A'Liang looks so handsome when he dresses up—”

"Baba!" The child whines when Xie Lian nuzzles his face against his cheek, giving him a few loud, smacking kisses that make him squirm with embarrassment. Never too old to be held like this, but maybe just a little past the point of being kissed like a baby .

"It's true!"

Hua Liang huffs and cranes his neck to get away—uselessly—when the sound of the door sliding open catches both of their attention. And no matter how much time passes, Xie Lian still spins around with a smile, eyes brightening.

"San Lang!"

His husband drops his own cellphone into the pocket of his jacket, reaching down to ruffle Hua Liang's hair when the boy jumps down, rushing over to greet him.

"Is A'Ming not here yet?"

"No," Xie Lian shakes his head, walking over to greet him with a kiss. (Hua Liang gags a little, wriggling out from where he was squished between them.) "The train must be running late—he hasn't called."

And if there was serious trouble—he would have, one way or another.

That seems to be enough to abate Hua Cheng's concern.

He has Ruoye today, after all—and if something serious enough had arisen for him to be in danger with that much protection, they would have already heard.

"How was your day?"

"Busy," Xie Lian sighs, wrapping his arms around his neck. "But with the Earth Master's wedding, I suppose that's to be expected. And you?"

"Boring. Miserable. Away from you..." He tacks on another kiss with every answer, smirking as Hua Liang huffs with annoyance.

But Xie Lian knows there's more to it.

Hua Cheng doesn't have a hair out of place—but he smells like blood. Subtly so, not to the point where most aside from a god could tell—and not his own. It isn't unusual for him to finish a day of work smelling like that, but it doesn't imply that the day was boring .

"Have you heard from the other one?"

"Yes," Xie Lian sighs. "He says he'll be running a little late—but he was obviously always going to come."

"How is he going to be late? He lives closer than the rest of us." The emperor shrugs helplessly, and Hua Cheng rolls his eye. "...At this rate, we'll have to send Yin Yu after A'Ming, I don't want to deal with another panic attack from—”

"Here!" The doors swing open again, revealing their middle child—breathing hard, clutching his school bag over his shoulder.

"Gege!" Hua Liang excitedly rushes over, hugging him around the middle. "I let someone play on the swings with me today!" He declares proudly, earning a tired hug from his older brother in return.

"That's great, didi...what, you let—?"

"What happened to you?" Hua Cheng eyes him suspiciously, looking at the dirt on the knees of his school uniform. Hua Liang comes back in worse shape every single day, but it's unusual for Hua Ming to even have a wrinkle in his jacket.

"...I fell in the station," Hua Ming shrugs. "I'm okay, though!"

Before he can look away, a pair of fingers grab him by the chin, forcing him to look the Ghost King in the eye.

Hua Ming swallows hard, remembering not to smile, because he always smiles nervously when he's lying, but...averting his gaze and laughing awkwardly gives it away.

"...We'll talk about it later," Xie Lian offers, placing a hand on his husband's shoulder. Hua Cheng relents, letting him go—and Hua Ming practically sags when they turn away from him, getting ready to activate the travel array.

"Are you in trouble?" Hua Liang whispers loudly.

"...No," Hua Ming whispers back—this time at an appropriate volume.

"Because if you are, I have some tips."

"I'm not—”

"If you make yourself throw up, they'll have to be nice to you, because you're sick."

"That's manipulative—didi...have you been doing that? That's dangerous, you could hurt yourself—!"

"I'm the one asking the questions here!"

"Boys," Xie Lian calls back over his shoulder, a set of symbols glowing on the floor tiles. "It's time to go."

Hua Ming walks over without hesitation, dragging a far more reluctant Hua Liang with him. Despite being eager to get sick for sympathy , he has a tendency to get nauseous using the travel arrays.

Which Hua Ming understands—but you get used to it eventually.

Xie Lian lifts Hua Liang back into his arms as soon as he gets within reach--he still struggles to walk through the array himself. By contrast, Hua Ming grabs Hua Cheng's hand loosely, squinting as they're enveloped by light. It feels a little bit like being squeezed and stretched as you pass through the neck of a glass bottle. Pressure, like you might lose your breakfast—but bearable.

(He much prefers traveling on dr—)

"Baba!" Hua Liang tilts his head back so far, it aches. "You're huge!"

Xie Lian tips his own head back, taking in the sight of his divine statue. This isn't even close to the biggest one—only standing at a little over twelve meters, but for the inside of a building...it's fairly big. As would be expected for the imperial city.

Hua Cheng is depicted by his side, holding his arm—as if guiding him forward.

"There's an even bigger one down south," Hua Ming points out. "It's over one hundred and fifty meters."

Xie Lian winces, remembering how his husband got...carried away with that one.

"...Dad didn't make this one, right?" Hua Liang peers up at Xie Lian's face, carved from marble, embellished with gold. "Baba, why does everyone else make your statues with Ruoye on your face?"

Hua Cheng and Xie Lian glance at each other, sharing a knowing look.

"...It's a long story," Xie Lian murmurs. "And both of you need baths—and to get dressed, we're going to be late if we don't hurry."

In truth, Xie Lian has never minded the fact that he's still worshipped as a blind god. In part because public perceptions have changed so much. Martial gods still have their place within the Heavenly Court—but combat doesn't play the same role in modern life as it once did.

Cultivation sects still exist. They still learn martial arts and weapons skills in order to protect people from unnatural threats, but...

No one is just a martial god anymore, not if they still continue to exist and thrive. The last major 'traditional' martial god that Xie Lian can think of, trained in the old ways, ascended fifteen hundred years ago—and now, he's also known as a god of crossroads.

Mortals pray to him in times of indecision, looking for guidance.

People worship for more than just protection, or material rewards—now, they look to subjective concepts as well.

And justice, a concept Xie Lian has become heavily associated with—is meant to be blind.

"Why do I have to take a bath?" Hua Liang whines as they lead him towards the back rooms. "If we're already gonna be late, we should just go! Is it a whole wedding?" He's practically dragging his feet, and Xie Lian snorts.

"Not as elaborate as the last wedding we went to."

Full blown daoist ceremonies are rare these days—though in their family, for obvious reasons, they tend to engage a bit more with tradition.

"Really?"

"Remember, he's marrying a normal girl," Hua Ming reminds him, slipping out of his school jacket. "They did a civil ceremony with her parents this morning."

"So…she knows about everything?" Hua Liang eyes grow wide, and Xie Lian bites back a nervous laugh, remembering how awkward the first introductions were.

"She does now, yes. The ceremony and reception with the heavenly court is what's happening tonight--and since they're already married, they aren't doing a full--"

"If they're already married, can't we just show up when they bring out the food?"

"A'Liang."

"Alright," Hua Cheng lets go of Hua Ming's hand, grabbing his youngest up--but unlike Xie Lian, he doesn't carry him gently from his hip, instead choosing to let him dangle over his shoulders, crying out in protest. "That's enough complaining for one afternoon."

Always one for the dramatics, Hua Liang practically wails, watching his father and brother while hanging upside down, arms flailing.

"Baba, we just did the array—I'M GONNA THROW UP!"

"No, you're not."

"I AM!"

"Then it's a good thing you're about to take a bath."

They disappear through the door, and before Hua Ming goes to follow, he feels a hand on his shoulder.

“Dad—?”

“You know, even if something was wrong—I would only want to help you, right?”

Hua Ming swallows hard, slowly turning around to face him.

“…Yeah, I know…”

Xie Lian searches his face for an answer, squeezing his shoulder gently. “Mu Qing spoke to me after he called you. I know what time you went into the station.”

And he knows it took an extra hour.

“…It’s nothing that bad,” Hua Ming mumbles. “I just didn’t want to mess up the—”

“You’re not messing anything up,” Xie Lian presses his palm against his cheek, just as he did when he was small—watching as his son relaxes and leans into it, soothed. “You’re here. You aren’t hurt. That’s what matters. I just don’t want you to think you can’t talk to me.”

If it was his oldest acting like this—he would be far more concerned.

But Hua Ming holds himself to such unfair standards. A habit Xie Lian is all too familiar with.

"…I used Ruoye to save a boy who jumped onto the tracks," he whispers. "I don't think anyone else saw, but…"

"…And was the boy alright?"

Hua Ming nods. "…I had one of Yin Yu's men take him to one of the group homes. I don't think he had anywhere to go. I know it was a risk, but I—"

He falls silent when his father pulls him into a hug, his throat tight with emotion.

"You didn't do anything wrong," Xie Lian reassures him, stroking his fingers through his hair. "It's never wrong to help those who need it when you can."

"…Are you going to tell dad?"

"He won't be angry with you either, you know."

Xie Lian senses that he does know that, but…They both know just how protective Hua Cheng can be over him in particular. Xie Lian is no different. He can't help it, after the things they've lived through.

"But—if it will put your mind at ease, we can tell him tomorrow."

Hua Ming rests his head against his chest—still shorter than him, something Xie Lian is constantly relieved about, dreading the possibility of a sudden growth spurt robbing him of the ability to hold him like this.

"…Okay," he agrees, hugging him back tightly.

It's nice sometimes, to take extra moments like this, and feel small again. Held in his father's arms—and know that everything is going to be alright.

"…Now, hurry and wash up." Xie Lian pulls back, kissing his head. "You smell like you fell on the subway tracks."

Hua Ming winces, but doesn't disagree—turning to follow his brother and father into the inner chambers of the temple.

Xie Lian hangs back for a moment, watching his own figure, hewn from stone. Sword in one hand, flower in the other.

A reflection he's learned to live with.

The north is a land much changed. Once the battlefield of struggles between nations. Then, the home of ancient strongholds. The ancestral seat of the oldest and most powerful cultivation sect. Now, it is host to cities larger than anywhere else on earth.

Their gods are wealthy and held in high esteem—worshipped in temples beneath towering structures of steel, but never dwarfed by them.

The seat of the god in question can be found in one of those high rises—but that is not where they gather today.

Instead, they meet in an ancient place.

It was easier to separate themselves from mortals thousands of years ago—building their capitals on towering mountains and secluded islands.

Now, with modern technology, they're hidden with a vast network of arrays.

Passing beyond those boundaries can feel as though one is traveling backwards in time, from one age to another.

Structures feel ancient, clothes more traditional—swords and bows become a common and natural sight.

Here, at the edge of the forest—it feels far more similar to the time when he was born. Memories that he feels far removed from, in a world that has become so changed.

But some things remain the same.

Like his mother, biting back tears at the sight of him.

"…You look so handsome," they finally choke out, taking his face between their hands. Far taller, having inherited his father's height—forcing them to reach up. “Doesn’t he look handsome?”

“…Yes,” his father agrees—for the tenth time that hour. “And he’s late.”

“There isn’t a strict schedule—”

“Qingxuan.”

They bite their lip, leaning back to take in the sight of him one more time—dressed in red wedding robes.

“…I’m just so happy for you, baobei,” they whisper.

He Bai hugs his mother close, glancing at his father over their shoulder

“I know,” he murmurs. “I love you both.”

It’s not quite the same as bowing to one’s parents in a traditional ceremony—but he wasn’t ever raised in a traditional manner—

(Despite his uncle’s—who may as well be a third parent—best efforts.)

And this tradition—one that came into popularity in the centuries after his birth—is meant to be carried out before any of the traditional ceremonies—

But it’s also the first time in hundreds of years that a god has married a mortal.

A choice that shocked his parents, who had waited so long for him to find someone to share his life with—and his bride to be, when she learned the truth.

But it’s one of the few choices he knows he won’t regret.

He steps away from his parents, turning back to the forest.

Feeling around the trunk of a nearby maple—finding the telltale knot around the base.

A red thread, leading up the mountainside.

One that he carefully winds around his finger as he walks, making his way through the dark.

A tradition born from the story of star-crossed lovers.

Holding onto one thread as you make your way through the brambles and wilderness—until you find your love waiting for you at the mountain’s peak. Dressed in red and gold, face shrouded in a bridal veil.

And once you take their hand—both ends of the thread become intertwined.

Fates forever joined.

Chapter End Notes

Disclaimers:

As far as setting goes, I am intentionally vague in the epilogue. Due to the fantasy elements of No Paths Are Bound, this is a modern cultivation setting, and also an alternative history due to the long term impacts of the actions of the characters on the mortal realm. The politics and cultural dynamics of this setting are not intended to accurately represent what we know in the modern era for that reason, but this is the same geographic and cultural setting--just moved further into the future. This is also an international society as a result, but I choose not to touch on that because I don't find it particularly relevant to the plot of the epilogue.

There is a line in the novels where MXTX discusses how gods come and go with cultural changes, somewhat breaking the fourth wall by implying that a god of horses would be made irrelevant by cars--so what you see of the gods portrayed in the epilogue is how I believe the Heavenly Court would have been impacted as mortals became more and more modernized. The move away from martial gods, the emphasis on more subjective matters of worship. It was also pointed out to me by a friend as I was writing this on twitter that blindness being associated with justice is not necessarily a concept rooted in Asian--particularly Chinese culture--and some people drew connections between Xie Lian being depicted as blind with Themis (a greek goddess of Justice). This was entirely unintentional on my part! I used to mention it in my author's notes quite frequently, but I am a law student. As a matter of fact, I'm in my final semester! As a result, I've been so drilled with the concept of blind and impartial justice over the years--and I see the Lady Justice Statue every single day when I walk into my classroom buildings and courtrooms--that I made the connection somewhat subliminally! It was a really wonderful learning experience for me however, because we often don't realize just how much our view of subjective subjects like justice, law, and impartiality can be influenced by our cultural backgrounds!

Finally, with regards to the characters now having children: this can very much be a death of the author issue if you are uncomfortable with mpreg. I go out of my way not to describe any details related to conception or the means by which they were born for that reason! I might cover it in extras written after the story's conclusion, but within the main story the only character shown as pregnant is Shi Qingxuan, which I did not tag as mpreg because in this story Shi Qingxuan is a genderfluid femme character.

What's Next

I will be putting up the final part of the Epilogue tomorrow--and you will see the chapter count increase to 152 when I add the Q & A / Postword, but chapter 151 will be the last with any story related content, and I plan on putting both up on the same day. If you have any further questions that you would like to see on the Q&A, feel free to comment below!

xoxo, Evie

No Paths Are Bound

Chapter Summary

Those are pages from a different story.

One that hasn't started yet.

He still has this one, for now.

Autumn days surrounded by family. Quiet, with the security that comes from being home. Content with something that his own parents didn't have, when they were young;

Knowing that there will always be a place for him.

Chapter Notes

Here we are at the final chapter of this story! I hope you enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

He walks back down the other side, hand in hand with his new bride—and when the trees begin to clear, and the stars come into view—

There's laughing, and music—and the sight of his family awaiting him, cheering for the newlyweds as they walk into the pavilion.

Embraced first by his uncles, then bowing to the emperor as a sign of respect—one that is returned, until Xie Lian dispenses any formalities and pulls him into an embrace of his own.

From the tables nearby, Pei Yitong watches her cousins, her chin resting against her palm.

"Doesn't it ever seem weird to you that they only ever had one kid?" A voice pipes up next to her ear—and when she looks over, she finds Hua Liang there. Sitting halfway in and out of his chair, somehow already having his hands on a plate of food.

“I mean—it's been thousands of years.”

Pei Yitong lifts her head, looking at him with one raised eyebrow. “It took your parents nearly two thousand years to have you and your brother, did it not?”

“Yeah,” Hua Liang agrees, gnawing on a chicken bone.

"But they had the other one way before either of us—" he pauses, looking at his aunt before he lowers his voice to an obnoxious whisper. "He was an accident. Gege told me—"

"I did not," Hua Ming whispers furiously, dropping into the seat next to him. "You can't just walk around telling people—"

"Not you," Hua Liang hisses back. "Ren Song gege told me!"

"...Oh," Hua Ming leans back, slightly deflated from his previous stance. And...the more he thinks about it... "Oh gods, he probably did..."

And Hua Ming can't imagine that his older brother would actually care about that label, if anything, he'd probably find it funny—but his dad would care quite a bit if he heard that.

"...Well," Pei Yitong snorts, "my cousin was an accident too—and my aunt swore off ever doing that again."

Her uncle always seemed a little more interested in having more than they did—but Pei Yitong's parents have had enough children by now to make for a crowded family.

“I suppose you should be glad your parents didn’t feel the same way,” she concludes, watching as her own fathers stand near the front of the wedding party. One congratulating the bride and groom, while the other grabs one of her elder brothers by the ear, scolding him.

She was the one who spied him sneaking bottles of liquor into his robes before they left home—and, as was inevitable, his stash ended up being discovered.

“Where is my nephew, by the way?”

She’s a thousand years younger, and he loathes it when she calls him that.

“…He called dad and said he would be a little late,” Hua Ming mumbles, winding a lock of hair around his index finger.

“If your father wasn’t one of his favorite people on earth—I would start to think he enjoys making him worry.”

Hua Ming sighs.

"…It sure does feel that way sometimes," he mutters under his breath, reaching over to pick a piece of meat from Hua Liang's plate, popping it into his mouth. "But he just…does his own thing. It's not malicious."

"Ren Song gege says he's a shithead."

"Didi!"

Hua Ming doesn't necessarily disagree, but his older brothers are away often enough that, when Hua Liang swears, everyone assumes it's his fault—

"Did something happen with you?" Pei Yitong looks Hua Ming over curiously. "You're wound even tighter than usual."

"No—"

"He's in trouble!"

"I'm not in—!"

There's a rush of wind overhead—one that makes all three fall silent, looking towards the sky.

Burning bright against the rising moon. Growing larger, closer, until its shape comes into view.

The bride gasps, her eyes widening as she holds He Bai's arm tightly, even if he seems perfectly relaxed.

"Is that a—?!"

A dragon?

One with scales of crimson and gold, but the guests don't react with fear. In fact, the children present jump up and cry out in excitement.

Its body coils as it grows closer to the ground, glowing brightly—but by the time it grows near, its form shrinks and shifts—

Revealing the visage of a young man.

Landing lightly on his feet before the newlyweds, a charming smile in place as He Bai rolls his eyes.

"You've outdone yourself, Hua-Xiong."

“You did say not to bother showing up late unless I was able to make a grand entrance,” the new arrival shrugs.

“I was simply following instructions.” He turns to the bride, leaning down to kiss her hand. “And you must be the lovely Jia Kang, pleasure to meet you.”

They’ve met before, back when she and He Bai began dating seriously—but he wore a different face back then.

“…The pleasure is all mine,” she mutters, clearing her throat as she lets go of He Bai’s arm, attempting to put on a brave face. “…You must be Hua Bolin. He Bai has told me all about you.”

His eyebrows raise sharply. “Has he really?”

“As much as I can bear repeating.”

The martial god winces, clutching his heart in feigned offense. “It’s bad luck to make a guest cry at a wedding, He-Xiong.”

“I’ve never heard of that tradition, and if ever see you shed a tear, I’ll start preparing for the end times.”

“…Fair,” Hua Bolin shrugs, “but I was only late because I was searching long and hard for a gift—”

He Bai crosses his arms.

“—and other things that I can’t say. Official business. Anyhow, here.”

He tosses something over that Jia Kang barely manages to catch.

Surprisingly heavy between her palms, and when she looks down to examine it…

“An…egg?”

The size of a football, the same color and firmness as obsidian.

“…What kind of egg is it?”

“No idea,” he shrugs. “Found it in a demon lair. But you’re a scientist, right? Enjoy.”

Jia Kang stares down at it, then looks back up, eyes wide.

"…I'm a physicist…" She mumbles faintly.

"Oh? Might look nice on a dining table then."

"…Thanks," He Bai said. "We love it."

He's given Bolin far more ridiculous gifts before—he can't complain.

From the Cheshire grin on the God of the Central Plain's face—he seems to know that.

"I thought you might."

Across the pavilion, a silver haired official clutches his stomach, laughing until his ribs ache.

"Mu Qing—"

"I don't care what everyone else says, he takes after you!"

Xie Lian sinks in his chair, and Hua Cheng stares at him quizzically, raising an eyebrow.

"What?"

"The—the parade!" Their friend wheezes, and once Feng Xin realizes what he's referencing, he nearly chokes on his wine.

The emperor hides his face behind his hands.

"It was before you showed up," Mu Qing explains, setting his own glass aside, loose locks of hair pushed back behind his ears. "His highness decided arriving behind hundreds of mounted Calvary wasn't impressive enough—"

"No, no—" Xie Lian croaks. "I thought it was more realistic! Because I was supposed to be…"

A god, as hilarious as that sounds now.

"Guoshi and everyone else was panicking looking for him—and then he came flying down from on top of a building." Mu Qing concludes.

"It was the way people thought gods descended from the heavens back then—"

"And you'd know all about that now."

Xie Lian practically sinks under the table, all while Feng Xin struggles to catch his breath, and Hua Cheng doesn't seem amused at all by that joke, but—

"See? I wasn't that late," he feels a familiar hand land on his shoulder, then a greeting kiss against his cheek.

"I believed you," Xie Lian replies patiently, knowing that the statement is aimed more at Hua Cheng than it is at him. "How did it go?"

"Mostly fine."

He says mostly, because Mu Qing has already leaned over to roll up his sleeve, scowling at the sight of a deep gash in his forearm, still bleeding sluggishly.

"You couldn't have cleaned up a little before flying over?"

"I already did for the most part," he whines. "But you always finish it off the best. Clean edges and all that."

Which implies that his arm was likely nearly amputated before, but he tries not to focus on the details.

And having his arm locked in Mu Qing's grip doesn't stop him from reaching over to give his other father a one-armed hug.

"If I didn't know any better, I'd think you didn't miss me," he sighs, only for Hua Cheng to give a sharp eye roll, reaching out and returning the embrace.

"You say that when you're the one who's always running off on your own."

"Blame the emperor," their son shakes his head with a long-suffering sigh. "Working me to the bone. You don't know what it's like, the pressures of being the first b—"

One sharp look from Hua Cheng sends him leaning back against Xie Lian, resting his cheek against his shoulder pitifully.

"I'm just kidding Baba, you're patient and generous, don't send me on patrol in ghost city again, diē is a tyrant—"

"Would you stop moving?!" Mu Qing snaps, prompting him to sit stock still.

And once he does, Xie Lian asks him more seriously—

“Anything to report back?”

That’s enough to drain the silliness from his expression, bringing him back to business as he leans close to speak next to his father’s ear.

“The problem with the rift is getting more severe. You might need to intervene personally before…”

The sound of the party swells around them, drowning out their conversation to anyone not sitting at their table—and back on the far side of the pavilion, a newcomer drops down between Hua Ming and Pei Yitong.

“How does A’Liang have food already?” He grumbles.

His sister glances over at him sympathetically. “He always has food. Dad might have given it to him.”

“Unfair…” He groans. “I’m a kid too! I’m a growing boy!”

Pei Yitong snorts, swatting his hand when he reaches for Hua Liang’s plate.

“You could have eaten earlier.”

Pei Xiang rolls his eyes with an annoyed huff, unaided by the undeniably smug look on Hua Liang’s face as he chews, trying to distract himself by looking away.

Catching sight of the emperor’s eldest son, speaking with his father as Mu Qing patches up his arm.

“…How does he have the tattoos, anyway?” He mumbles, swinging his feet under his chair as he examines the patterns of ink across Hua Bolin’s forearm, going further up under his sleeve. “Wouldn’t they heal since he’s a god?”

Hua Ming shrugs.

"He got some of them when he was mortal," he explains, eyeing the prominent scar on the right side of his brother's face. Running from his brow bone, to deep down his cheek.

There are some reminders of their mortal lives that even gods cannot wash away.

"But most of them heal after a few weeks, then he gets new ones."

Not always as frequently or extensively as he does now—Ren Song says that's only an addition that came about with the aid of machines.

Now his brother, ever the artist, can do most of them himself in a relatively short amount of time.

He's offered to give them to his younger brothers, once they're old enough—something Hua Liang is horribly excited about, but Hua Ming is slightly more wary.

Pei Xiang almost asks what it's like, having a brother that much older—as a thirteen-year-old sitting beside his five hundred year old sister, all while his other siblings range up to nearly a millennia, well—

He already knows.

“…Well,” he crosses his arms, kicking back in his seat. “One day that’ll be us! Two martial gods, doing whatever we want, getting all the girls we—”

“Deputies,” Pei Yitong rolls her eyes. “And I doubt you’ll be getting any girls.”

“Jiejie…” He groans, the tips of his ears turning red. "Don't be mean!"

He might be complaining, but Hua Ming feels nothing short of relieved, looking down at his own plate as dinner begins to be served, attendants milling about.

"Someday you'll be happy to have someone to keep you grounded."

"As opposed to what?" A voice pipes up from behind them.

Hua Liang jumps with surprise as he's lifted out of his seat, prepared to shout in protest—until he sees who has him.

"Gege!"

Pei Yitong rolls her eyes, watching as Hua Bolin drops back into his seat with Hua Liang in his lap, holding one arm around the boy's waist as he sets down his own plate.

"A bad influence."

The martial god shrugs, his smile slightly less boisterous. "There are worse things."

"..." Hua Ming sets down his chopsticks, reaching over to squeeze his arm. "I'm glad you made it—was there trouble?"

He looks down at his forearm, where the wound was bleeding before—only to find it's already completely disappeared.

His older brother shakes his head, his gaze warm as he reaches over to pat his cheek.

"I'm just fine, didi. And what about you? Learning well?"

"My classes aren't too bad this semester—”

"He doesn't mean normal school," Hua Liang crosses his arms.

Right.

"I started using real swords this week," their little brother declares proudly, holding his head high.

"Really?" Bolin exclaims, eyebrows raised.

"They aren't sharp."

"That doesn't mean they aren't real!"

Hua Ming holds up his hands in surrender, slightly exasperated.

"Sorry...It's going fine."

Better than fine, actually. He's enrolled with a cultivation sect in the city, he's at the top of his class—but he can't help but feel like he's cheating, or has some sort of unfair advantage—even if his parents have always insisted otherwise.

"That doesn't sound very enthusiastic," Hua Bolin muses, chewing on a mouthful of braised pork. "Maybe we can work on it while I'm home."

The mention of that makes both of his younger brothers perk up, and he smiles.

"I just finished my patrol--you think I wasn't going to come and see you while you had a break from school?" He clicks his tongue, feigning hurt. "So little faith in your gege..."

"Can we go riding?! Oh—oh, can you and gege fight with sharp swords? I know I can't, but I can watch—!"

Hua Liang babbles excitedly, his food forgotten—but the greatest reward might be the smile that news pulls from Hua Ming.

No matter how kind and loving your parents might be—there's a weight that comes to the reality of their lives. One that drops over you like a curtain once you're old enough to understand it.

It's hard enough for him, at his age.

Even harder on a sixteen-year-old.

He saw the weight of that anxiety drop over Hua Ming a year ago and recognized it—knew it well.

Now, he does as much as he can—as often as he can—to make that gravity of it feel a little more bearable.

"Fine, fine...but maybe a movie too, while we're at it? Have mercy on your poor gege, he's so tired..."

"From what?" A familiar voice drawls. "Stirring up nonsense? I know dianxia and Hua Chengzhu taught you gift etiquette..."

“Ren Song gege!” Hua Liang beams, almost euphoric to have all of his brothers together—and Hua Ming seems just as pleased.

“Were you late too, or—?”

“No, unlike the other one I have some manners,” Shuo rolls his eyes, kissing Hua Ming’s head as he ruffles Hua Liang’s hair. “But someone has to run the arrays around this place when everyone else is at the party,” he explains. “And I couldn’t put the seals back up until this shithead showed up—”

Hua Liang giggles madly at the swearing, and Hua Ming winces.

“Gege, if you say that in front of him he’s gonna repeat it, and Baba and diē are gonna think—”

“Trust me, A’Ming, they are never going to think it was you,” Ren Song snorts.

Ironic, because he has heard the middle child swear more than once—but never in front of Hua Liang.

Hua Ming shrinks a little from that reminder, fighting the urge to jut out his lower lip.

"It could have been me," he mutters. "I mess up."

Sometimes, badly. Maybe even in front of an entire station of—

"Be grateful that you'll never be the problem child," Hua Bolin soothes him. "Heaven knows our parents need one son that doesn't keep them up at night."

"I don't!" Hua Liang cries, a steamed bun halfway to his mouth.

Hua Bolin snickers, "You give them more nightmares than the rest of us combined!"

As he says this, he tickles the boy's sides, making growling, biting noises next to his ear—like he means to swallow him whole—and Hua Liang shrieks with laughter, food forgotten.

Hua Ming can't help but smile, his gaze slowly returning to his other older brother.

Not quite dressed for a wedding—still wearing a leather jacket and hiking boots from the workday, but he spent the afternoon and early evening in the forests surrounding this place maintaining the array, so no one could blame him for that.

...Do you know where he was?

Shuo meets his gaze, eyebrows raised.

I thought you were banned from using the communication array for now.

Hua Ming bites back a scowl.

Because of that mess with gege, not because of—

I know, I know. But don't worry so much about Bolin. He's fine. Dianxia and Chengzhu didn't seem worried, did they?

Hua Ming looks over at his parents. The way the emperor leans comfortably against his husband's side, Hua Cheng's arm around his waist as they converse.

…No.

Then you have nothing to worry about, either.

He says that, but…

He remembers how tightly his father hugged him when they spoke in Tonglu Hudie's shrine today. How his other father gripped his hand when they went through the array.

They aren't panicked, but they both seem to have something on their minds. It isn't nothing.

With them, that could be something as minor as Hua Liang's behavioral problems at school—or as serious as an impending war. It's impossible to know.

And given what happened to his brother in the last war—it's a frightening thought.

…Okay.

Ren Song gives his shoulder a reassuring squeeze, giving Hua Bolin a little more grief before going to greet his husband, and the festivities continue.

Eating until they're stuffed full—laughing, exchanging stories, a few of them taking to the floor to dance.

Among them the former General of Xuli and Queen of Yushi, now lifelong friends. The mother and father of the groom. The thunder master and his eldest daughter.

Relatives and deputy gods mill about, watching the fireworks, handing around sparklers.

Apparently, the Heavens weren't always like this.

Two emperors ago, there was a man who pitted them against one another. Who kept them distant, distrusting, and competitive.

He's spoken of very little now. Only used as a cautionary tale.

Hua Ming has asked about him before, and received little in the way of an answer.

It's not something his father likes to talk about.

Some tyrants are better left forgotten.

As the night grows deeper, it’s easy to believe that they have been. Even with the mid-autumn festival approaching in the next week—no one shows a competitive zeal or an ounce of concern.

But Hua Ming does notice something, hanging towards the edge of the crowd.

His older brothers standing near the doors to the pavilion, having a quiet, somewhat tense conversation—eventually disappearing inside.

“…A’Ming? Where are you going?”

He stiffens when one of his uncles calls over to him, not turning around.

“…Bathroom! I’ll be right back!”

It's a bit of a task, walking around the side of the building, making it seem as though he's going towards the restrooms—only to climb up onto the trellis, scrambling for hand and footholds, struggling to be silent, only to feel something wriggling around his neck.

"...Don't look at me like that," he whispers.

(Ruoye cannot look at him in any way, not in this form--and if it could, they wouldn't be making eye contact at the moment.)

"You were supposed to go with dad after we got here!"

But Ruoye is with him so often now, it forgets.

"...I'm not snooping, this isn't their house either." Technically they're the ones snooping around in the earth master's palace, not him. "And I wouldn't have to sneak if they told me anything."

He doesn't even expect to know everything. Just a little, if it's important. And in his experience, the only way to know about anything is...a little bit of sneaking around.

Which is how he ends up on a narrow outcropping next to a third story window, leaning back against stone walls, his breathing muted as he listens closely.

"...We lost three," Hua Bolin admits, rummaging around in his friend's liquor cabinet until he finds something that strikes his fancy. "One of my own deputies, too."

"...I'm sorry," Shuo sighs. "Was it quick?"

"We have no way of knowing—and don't apologize, he wasn't my choice. It was a political appointment. He didn't know what he was doing. He wasn't qualified to be there. So, he got himself killed."

The ghost king winces at the glibness.

"Maybe so. Still, it's a loss."

"Maybe. But he was perfectly comfortable with his father pressuring the court into giving him a position—he should have been comfortable with living and dying with the consequences of taking a role he wasn't qualified for."

Harsh, but Shuo can't find fault with his logic.

He abandons scolding him for it, and moves on. "Is that how you hurt your arm? You got too close to it?"

Bolin pauses for a moment, knelt in front of the cabinet before straightening with a bottle of liquor in hand.

"...My arm got pulled inside of the rift. Technically."

"...What?" Shuo questions flatly.

"I was planning on going all of the way in," the martial god huffs, pouring himself a glass. "But it destabilized. Anyone stupid enough to be too close behind me got sucked in or incinerated."

"You planned that?"

"...It's not as if someone wasn't going to have to do it eventually, gege. It's getting worse. Mortals are starting to become interested in it. Cultivators are getting into border disputes just to control the land around it. We need to try to understand more before..."

Bolin grimaces, knocking back his drink in a single swallow.

He's lived through one cultivation war. He has no desire to experience another.

"...It's a miracle Mu Qing was able to put your arm back together at all, then." Shuo grumbles. "Does dianxia know what you did?"

"...And he's pissed at me, so you don't need to give me a lecture. I'm sure I'm gonna get one before long."

But Hua Bolin knows the emperor better than most. Probably better than anyone, short of his father.

If he didn't go, eventually, it would be Xie Lian.

And he's one of the very few to come close to him in power who also happens to be slightly more disposable, no matter how much it would horrify his parents to hear him say that.

"But I learned something."

That pulls Ren Song from his anxious anger.

"...What?"

Many theories have been spun about regarding the Rift since it appeared many centuries ago. At first a small crack, slowly widening into an area that none may approach.

Some think of it as a new evolution of Mount Tonglu, a source of power. Others see only poison and ruin.

"...It's a bridge," Bolin rasps, reaching up to rub his temple with one hand, setting down his empty glass. "I heard things. Saw things."

"...Bridge to what?" Shuo mutters, leaning back against the couch in his shock.

"No idea. Even dad didn't know what to think of it."

And if Xie Lian didn't even have the slightest guess as to what it could mean—it's less likely that anyone else could, either.

"All I know is that there are cultivators on the other side. And if I could hear them—there's a possibility they could hear us."

The sheer fact that Bolin survived nearly being dragged inside implies that he could cross, even though he isn't quite that suicidal. And if he could--theoretically, someone could come from the other side.

"...Did they seem dangerous?"

"How would I know? I only saw flashes."

And each one seemed to be different. Showing different times. Different places. Different people. It's hard to say if each one even existed within the same realm, or multiple.

"...One of them seemed dangerous, though. If something like him came through..."

Hua Bolin's parents would have to be the ones to deal with it. He doesn't think mortal cultivators would stand a chance.

They didn't seem to in the visions he saw, anyway.

"What was his name?"

"...Mo...something? It's all a blur."

Shuo grows silent for a moment, deep in thought as the martial god pours another drink, offering it to him.

"Sounds like the best solution is to find a way to close the damn thing."

"We already would've if we knew how," Bolin grumbles, refilling his own glass. "And I struggle to feel any pity for the cultivation sects panicking over it now."

"I think it would shock people to know how harsh you can be in private, didi. You play the carefree vagrant so well," the ghost king comments dryly.

"Wei Wuxian warned them there would be consequences to destroying the Yin Tiger Tally." He shrugs. "They chose not to heed that warning. Now the hens have come home to roost. You're telling me you *don'*t resent the fact that we're the ones cleaning it up?"

The gods aren’t blameless, particularly when it comes to the amulet’s creation, but—

Hua Bolin is entirely innocent in that matter, so Shuo finds his anger understandable.

“…Have more faith in your father. If it becomes necessary, he’s more than capable of dealing with it.”

He knows that. He’d be a fool not to know that.

But it can be exhausting, watching someone you love give so much to a world that often gives so little in return.

“He shouldn’t have to,” he eventually replies, taking a long, burning swallow.

On that, they both agree.

Outside, Hua Ming leans forward slightly, heart pounding in his chest. Digesting everything he heard. What it could mean. What he…

Mo…something?

And in his distraction—his foot slips.

He has enough discipline not to cry out, arms flailing as he slips over the side, but—

Someone catches him before he even comes close to hitting the ground—and when he feels a silver vambrace against his cheek…

He knows exactly who.

Cracking one eyelid to see his father staring down at him, unimpressed.

“…Hi…”

“How was the bathroom?”

“…Fine,” he croaks.

Hua Cheng says nothing, watching him filter through an awkward smile, nervous laughter, before finally cracking like an egg.

“…I wasn’t spying, I was just—!”

“Listening to things they wouldn’t say in front of you?”

He almost agrees—then bites his lip, properly chagrined.

“…I was worried,” he admits, his voice much smaller now—

And his father’s expression softens.

“…The party’s starting to wind down. Your father already took A’Liang home. Do you want to stay?”

He always gives him a choice—but if they’re going to talk, Hua Ming would rather not wait around all night to do it.

“…No,” he mumbles, shaking his head, hearing the all too familiar sound of dice rattling in his father’s pocket.

This kind of array is the most comfortable, even if it’s not practical when all four of them travel. Just the sound of the sharp clacking of dice reminds him of being small, half asleep in his father’s arms as he was ferried from one place to the next.

Not to their home in the city—they won’t be going back there until classes resumes. No, when the area around them comes back into focus—it’s the place where he was born.

The gentle, sloping hills and forests leading towards Mount Taicang.

Hua Cheng used to carry him all the way home on his shoulders—something Hua Ming dearly misses now, but he doesn’t complain when his father sets him on his feet.

“A’Ming.”

“…Yeah?”

Hua Cheng looks him in the eye.

The only one of his children to inherit the feature he lost.

Something he once felt such self-loathing and shame over—but he can’t bring himself to look at his son’s eyes and see something monstrous.

“…You know, no matter what happens, your father and I are going to keep you safe.”

It’s not a question—but he answers anyway.

“…I know,” he whispers.

Never, not even for a moment in his entire life, has he ever really doubted that fact.

“…And I’ll keep him safe.”

Not because Xie Lian needs it—but simply because he’ll always put his own welfare last.

So, Hua Cheng always puts it first.

Not just from enemies, or unforeseeable dangers.

After so many years together, he's learned to protect his god from his own self-destructive tendencies, when the time calls for it.

Hua Ming knows that, too.

He hangs back for a moment, shivering in the autumn breeze.

"...I just...I don't know how to..." He struggles to explain, biting his lip—but his father doesn't rush him, or prompt him to say anything else.

As always, he patiently listens.

"...If something happens, I...I don't want to be useless," he finally admits.

"And I know I'm still a kid, I know no one expects me to be able to...but I just don't think I could stand to sit by and watch—”

He stops, his throat growing thick when his father's hand lands on top of his head, forcing him to stop.

"A'Ming."

He swallows hard.

"...Understand one thing: there are many people in this world who will always be helpless. You are not one of them."

He knows his child well—and he knows that, like his husband, a gentle nature doesn't translate to weakness.

It can hide so much underneath.

"And even if you were," he grasps Hua Ming's chin gently, guiding the teenager to look up at him. "When have we ever said that you had to be perfect?"

"..."

He doesn't give an answer. There isn't a need for one.

Not when he surges forward into his father's arms, allowing himself to be held tightly. Eyes squeezed tightly shut as he allows a deep exhale, the tension easing from his shoulders.

Managing a smile when he feels a wraith butterfly land in his hair.

One thing you learn growing up surrounded by those who are untethered to time is that everything has its season. You have to let things flow from one chapter to the next.

The boy from the train, everything he overheard—

Those are pages from a different story.

One that hasn't started yet.

He still has this one, for now.

Autumn days surrounded by family. Quiet, with the security that comes from being home. Content with something that his own parents didn't have, when they were young;

Knowing that there will always be a place for him.

Inside the temple on Mount Taicang, long since converted to a family home, the emperor sits on the edge of his youngest's bed, smoothing the blankets over his legs.

"Baba..." Hua Liang yawns, fighting to keep his eyes open. "...Are you cheating?"

Xie Lian smiles.

"No."

In truth, he's just exhausted from traveling all day, playing with his cousins and stuffing himself full at the ceremony—and now, he's ready to sleep.

But in Hua Liang's mind, this could only be a deception. The result of a spell or incantation. He could never be sleepy.

"...I don't wanna sleep," he mumbles, fighting valiantly to keep his eyes open. "Tell me another story! ...The one with the goats!"

Xie Lian purses his lips, reaching over to push his hair back from his forehead.

"You look sleepy..."

"I'm not!" He whines. "I'm not ready to sleep yet!"

"I could lay down with you if you don't want me to go," Xie Lian suggests gently, something his son normally balks from, insisting he can sleep by himself.

(Even with Hong Li at the end of his bed, and several night lights.)

“…No,” Hua Liang’s jaw locks stubbornly—as Xie Lian expected—

“I don’t wanna have a nightmare.”

But he wasn’t expecting him to say that.

“…A nightmare?” He questions softly, searching Hua Liang’s face for an explanation. “What do you mean?”

He’s stubborn, as usual.

Not answering when Xie Lian asks, just repeating that he isn’t tired, he wants to hear another story about the goats, until—

“…Hua Ming gege and Pei Xiang were talking earlier,” he mumbles, like the words are being pried out of him with a pair of tongs.

“And Pei Xiang kept saying ‘once we’re martial gods,’ like it was definitely gonna happen, but then Pei Xitong said they’d just be deputies, and—”

Xie Lian has never gone out of his way to impress their reality upon his children—but he’s never hidden it either.

But he didn’t think they’d have this conversation so soon, or—

“But what if I don’t become a god?” Hua Liang mumbles, something he would only ever ask Xie Lian, and never in front of anyone else.

“…If it’s what you want, when you’re older, I can appoint you to be —”

"What if I die?" His son whispers.

Xie Lian grows still.

Because of all of the questions he thought his son might ask—

He wasn't prepared for that one.

"What if I die, and it makes you sad forever?" Hua Liang repeats, his lower lip beginning to tremble.

"…Oh," he finally manages to pry his lips open, to speak—his voice coming out unsteady and hoarse. "Nothing is going to happen to you—"

"But what if it does?" Hua Liang presses, and his father grows silent, looking back down at the sheets, smoothing them all over again.

But eventually, as always—he gives him an answer.

Glancing around his bedroom. The stuffed animals and toys littering the floor. Crayon drawings taped to the walls on colorful paper.

"…I would miss you forever," he finally replies, choosing every word carefully. "But I would remember the way you make me laugh. How you're always thinking of me. How smart and curious you are—and thinking about those things would make me happy. Because I love you so much."

"…But how do you know?"

His voice wobbles with sadness and uncertainty—and Xie Lian can't stand it anymore, laying down beside his son and pulling him into his arms.

"…Your father and I lost each other," he explains. "Many, many years ago. And I didn't see him again for a long time."

That's difficult for Hua Liang to imagine. In his entire life, his parents have never spent more than a day apart at a time.

"…You mean when he became a ghost?"

Xie Lian nods. "And I was so sad for so long—I didn't think I could ever be happy again."

The kind of anguish that consumes you. While your loved one is reduced to ash and bone, you endure a different form of living decay.

Weathered away by grief.

“…But you found each other again,” Hua Liang points out.

“We did,” his father agrees.

“But after that…I never wanted to feel that kind of pain again. So, when I found out we were having Bolin…I was worried about the same thing as you.”

Maybe it should be frightening, hearing his father empathize with him like that—but it isn’t.

It’s…comforting.

“…And we almost lost him, when he was close to your age.” Xie Lian recalls quietly—and his son can’t see how dark his eyes become when he says that. The roiling emotions beneath his gaze.

Remembering how his child was almost taken from him.

“I have never been that scared.”

He had thought he was beyond feeling that kind of anger anymore. That he had conquered it, when he sent his tormentor to the afterlife in peace.

Not knowing there was a rage that even he hadn’t experienced before. One that brought out sides of him that were long forgotten.

“…You were scared?” Hua Liang asks, disbelieving.

He’s never seen his father scared of anything.

“Of course I was,” Xie Lian murmurs.

It nearly paralyzed him.

All of his focus in the years that followed went into teaching his son everything he knew.

So nothing could ever threaten him again.

Greatness was never Bolin’s choice—more so a result of Xie Lian’s overwhelming fear.

"But, no matter how much I missed your father—or how much pain I was in—I never wished that I hadn't met him."

Not once.

"And no matter what happened—I never would have regretted having your brother."

Even if he had been so frightened of the grief—

The moment he held his son in his arms for the first time—that overshadowed everything else.

"…And when Hua Ming was born, and then you—I was still scared, but I was also excited."

Because he knew how much they would be loved, and protected. The kind of life he and Hua Cheng could give them.

He holds Hua Liang closer, tucking his head under his chin.

"I'm not going to let anyone hurt you. But if something did happen to you—I would miss you every day. But only because I would love you every day."

Grief might pick you to the bone—but it's a symptom of loving something you can no longer see, feel, or touch.

But it never outweighs it.

Xie Lian would never sacrifice that joy to escape the pain.

You can't live a life with meaning without experiencing loss.

You can't construct golden palaces and expect them to never fall back down.

That was never the point of building them.

"…And what if I become a ghost?" Hua Liang mumbles—his voice less tense and frightened than it was before. "What if I get lost?"

"…Then I'll find you," his father replies. "And you can haunt me for the rest of my days."

That makes the boy smile, wriggling closer in his arms.

"…I still don't wanna sleep," he admits, his voice muffled against the front of Xie Lian's shirt.

His father smiles.

"I don't think that's going to be your call."

"…But what if I have a nightmare?"

"Then you'll have a nightmare," He murmurs. "And when you wake up, I'll be here. And none of it will be real."

Dreams might end. Memories might fade.

But so do nightmares, and so does pain.

And when you wake up, it's nothing more than a dimming, ugly reminder.

Like so many other things.

He doesn't even realize that he's fallen asleep with him—not until arms carefully slide underneath him, as they have many times before, carefully lifting him out of bed.

He doesn't open his eyes—not quite yet.

But he smells smoke, the forest, and a faint hint of iron.

And he smiles, fingers tightening in the front of his husband's jacket—prompting Hua Cheng to lean down and kiss him, knowing exactly what he wants without a need for words.

The door slides shut behind them with a soft click.

"…Where are the other two?" Xie Lian rasps, his voice rough, still a little groggy.

"Asleep."

"Both of them?" He doesn't manage to keep the surprise from his voice, and Hua Cheng smiles.

"On the couch downstairs. We were watching a movie."

"…A'Bolin must have been tired," Xie Lian yawns, turning his face into his neck. "He's a night owl, like you."

His husband hums in agreement. “Given the day he had—that’s not a surprise.”

That’s certainly true. They’ll have to talk to him about it tomorrow. Give him the lecture he undoubtedly knows is coming—

But for now, they can be like this.

Hua Cheng can carry him into their bedroom, shutting the door behind them.

He can lay his god down on their bed, while the fireworks explode in the distance, the Heavens celebrating the Earth Master's marriage, showers of sparks gleaming through the window.

And Xie Lian can watch him undress, setting his jewelry on the bedside table.

Watching his movements with familiarity and fondness, patiently waiting for him to come to bed.

"Thinking much about the festival tomorrow?"

"...Oh, no," Xie Lian snorts, shaking his head. "The deputies have done nearly all of the organizing. I just signed off."

They'll have all three of their sons home—and he'd much rather focus on that.

"...But I've heard rumors from Ling Wen that A'Bolin might hit fifth place this year."

It's a long shot—most of the gods remaining in the upper court are so ancient and well established that there's been little vertical movement in the rankings for a long time, but there's a chance.

"I almost would rather he didn't—his ego is nearly unbearable as it is."

"Hmm..." Xie Lian bites back a smile, rolling onto his side as he watches his husband shrug out of his shirt, setting it aside. "I wonder who taught him to be so confident."

The calamity glances back over his shoulder, eye flashing playfully. "Certainly not me, gege."

Xie Lian shakes his head, his own eyes sparkling with amusement. "Of course."

"I beat him down every chance I get."

"As you should."

"If he hasn't cried by dinner, I call it a waste of a day."

The emperor rolls onto his back with a laugh, clutching his stomach.

He's obviously joking, but that's the point of it.

To say something so ridiculous, it gets Xie Lian to laugh.

"...Hua Ming climbed the side of He Bai's palace during the reception," Hua Cheng finally adds, climbing into bed.

Xie Lian sits up, staring.

"What?"

"All the way to the third-floor window."

"Between him and A'Liang and the climbing—"

"To eavesdrop on Shuo and Bolin," Hua Cheng concludes. "About what happened today."

"...How much did he hear?" Xie Lian half groans, wiping a hand down his face.

"Enough to be scared."

He falls silent for a moment, considering that.

It's not surprising. Hua Ming has never been a 'out of sight, out of mind' kind of person in the way that his brothers are. He worries. He fixates.

Xie Lian understands.

"He spoke to you about it?"

"He didn't have much of a choice," Hua Cheng shrugs. "I caught him in the act. You know what it's like when he tries to play it casual."

Yes, he's more than aware.

"...I suppose that's another thing we'll have to talk about tomorrow," he mutters.

"Another?"

"...It's nothing that bad," Xie Lian reassures him. "I just told A'Ming we'd wait to talk about it until after the wedding was over."

To some parents, that wouldn't exactly be comforting to hear—but Hua Cheng doesn't seem bothered by it.

If it was that serious, his husband wouldn't wait until tomorrow to discuss it.

"You haven't fallen asleep in A'Liang's bed in ages."

It's not exactly a question, and it doesn't need to be.

"...He was worried about having nightmares," Xie Lian murmurs. "...He asked me what would happen if he died, and if I would ever be happy again."

Hua Cheng blows out a long, heavy sigh, contemplating that conversation, how difficult it must have been.

"I wonder what prompted that."

"...I think anything can, at that age."

A time when children start thinking about the world beyond what's immediately in front of them. When things begin to feel a little too terrifying, close, and real.

What's funny is—Xie Lian can't remember Hua Ming ever being worried about himself dying one day.

When he began learning more about gods and cultivation, he suddenly became terrified that his parents might fade away at some point, even as they constantly assured him that was not a near possibility. Praying anxiously morning and night.

And when Hua Liang asked Xie Lian about death—it wasn't for childish, or selfish reasons.

It was because he didn't want to cause his parents any pain.

Their eldest risked his life today, likely with the hope that if he did, Xie Lian wouldn't have to.

"...What are you thinking about?" Hua Cheng murmurs, reaching down to brush his fingertips over his god's cheek.

Xie Lian looks up at him, his gaze turning contemplative.

"My choices, I think."

The ghost king's thumb rests against his forehead, as though he could reach in and taste his thoughts from that alone.

"Which ones?"

Rather than answer immediately, Xie Lian sits up on his elbows.

Swinging one leg over Hua Cheng's hips, shifting until he's comfortably settled in his husband's lap.

One of his favorite places to be, as they've discovered over the centuries.

"...Can I ask you something, San Lang?"

Large hands settle comfortably on his waist.

"Anything."

"...Those eight hundred years we were apart," Xie Lian murmurs.

They've been together twice as long now, but the ache is still memorable.

"When you were looking for me...did you know what you wanted when you found me?"

His brow furrows.

"...I'm not sure I know what you mean."

He reaches up, pressing his palm against his god's cheek. "I wanted to serve you. To protect you—”

Xie Lian catches his wrist, tilting his face down to kiss his knuckles thoughtfully. Tracing the indents from the heavy rings his husband wears with his lips.

"I know," he agrees. "But..."

He remembers how painfully certain Hua Cheng was back then, that Xie Lian would be disgusted by him. That he could never return his affections.

"...The favor I owed Wu Ming. You said you knew from that day in Lang-er Bay that you wanted me to marry you. Was that always your hope?"

Hua Cheng falls silent, watching his face intently—seeming to try to discern his mood, but...

"...I dreamed of it often," he admits. "What you would say. How beautiful you would be. But my imagination didn't do the reality of it justice. And...I had desires, but I never felt entitled to you—"

"I know," Xie Lian whispers, their faces illuminated by the fireworks through the window.

Remembering the words Hua Cheng said, fading in his arms after they defeated Jun Wu.

'If your dream is to save the world—then my only dream is you.'

"...But dianxia is incorrect about one thing," Hua Cheng explains, squeezing Xie Lian's fingers.

"I am?"

"I didn't realize I wanted to marry you in Lang'er Bay," he shakes his head, pressing a kiss against his jaw.

"I knew the moment I saw you."

Xie Lian's heart skips pleasantly in his chest, even if he tries to keep his tone politely skeptical.

"You were so young, San Lang—"

"I know," he agrees, his nose brushing across his skin in a way that, even after so long, still makes Xie Lian shiver. "But from that moment on, I never dreamed of anything else."

His prince hugs his arms around his neck, his face pleasantly warm.

"...You were never the one lacking in imagination," he eventually mutters under his breath, pressing his forehead against the bare skin of Hua Cheng's shoulder.

His skin should be cold—but it never is, always warm to his touch.

"Gege?"

"...I've probably told you plenty of times before—”

"You can tell me again, I'll always listen."

Xie Lian sighs. "...When I was small, guoshi asked me what I would do if I had one glass of water, and two men were dying of thirst."

And there were supposed to only be two answers:

First, you could split the cup of water between the two men. In which case neither would receive enough water, and both would die.

Or, you could choose to allow one to live by giving him the entire glass, forsaking the other.

When he asked Feng Xin the same question later, he became frustrated —saying that he didn't want to choose, and not to leave it up to him.

When Mu Qing was asked, he said he needed to know more about the two men in question. What kind of people they were, what they could do.

But Xie Lian--he stubbornly advocated for the existence of a third option.

That he would simply find another cup of water, and make sure both men lived. Stubbornly refusing to accept the two obvious and ultimately cruel choices.

It was a metaphor for godhood. He understands that now. The idea that if you try to be everything for everyone, you'll ultimately help no one.

There might be a grain of wisdom to it—but not as much as there was in the third option, if you ask him.

"And why are you thinking of that now?" Hua Cheng asks, his fingertips rubbing gentle circles into the small of his husband's back, something that always makes the prince melt into him like a sleepy barn cat, and now is no different.

"...I never imagined this."

His words are half muffled, but Hua Cheng understands him easily, leaning his head against the top of his.

"Never imagined what?"

Even after all of this time...it's so hard for him to admit.

"I...never imagined a third option for myself, San Lang."

When he realized that he would never want a wife, the way his parents imagined life for him—he thought he only had one other option.

Cultivation. A life of celibacy, and ultimately...loneliness.

There are plenty of people who don't need marriage or children to be fulfilled.

For the longest time, Xie Lian counted himself among them. He had friendships. He had the love and respect of his people, then his believers.

And he told himself that was enough.

Then, he lost it all.

Then, Hong'er found him again.

And one person's love outshone the peak of godhood. Fulfilled Xie Lian in ways he never could have imagined before, when life was always about what he could offer to others.

Never about how simple and fulfilling it is to be happy, sharing your life with someone else.

It took losing him for Xie Lian to understand that. Only recognizing how warm and comfortable he had become in their little life when he was trapped alone in the cold.

And in eight hundred years, Xie Lian never sought out company like that again.

He didn't always push it away when companionship presented itself—he taught Lang Qianqiu for those years. Formed his attachment to Banyue...

But even when he met Hua Cheng, even as he was falling in love with him again, it didn't occur to him.

He never thought Hua Cheng might love him back. Even when he realized that it was Hong'er, he was so afraid that he might not love him in the same way.

Even when he was back, and they had the rest of their lives to spend together—Xie Lian never thought to ask for marriage.

Once Hua Cheng said the words, he wanted it so badly. Once it felt like he was allowed to imagine the ghost king as his husband, he couldn't stand another moment of waiting.

But he just never knew how to ask for it. Never knew how to...

"...I never imagined I could have been this happy," Xie Lian finally manages to croak out the words, his voice thick with emotion.

He never would have imagined living this peacefully for this long. Having children of their own. Loving them so deeply, it's almost frightening.

Even in a world that isn't perfect, when he isn't perfect, when he makes mistakes, fails, loses his temper, takes steps backwards after coming so far—

Even then, he couldn't imagine himself being happier than this.

When he was explaining it to Hua Liang--how much he loved him, his brothers, his father—

All Xie Lian could think of was how Hua Cheng, a child who came from nothing, was able to dream so fiercely. To see options even a prince didn't dare to reach for.

And in that moment—he was so thankful.

"...I suppose I'm just trying to thank you," Xie Lian concludes. "For making me so—”

He reaches down to brace his palm against the mattress, wincing—something Hua Cheng immediately notices, leaning down to check his palm.

"...It's nothing," Xie Lian reassures him. "I forgot to put some reports away earlier." He pushes the folder aside, allowing it to land on the floor with a thud, holding up his hand—

Allowing Hua Cheng to see the paper cut on his thumb, rapidly healing.

An undecipherable expression passes across his husband's face, watching as the tiny wound fades away, leaving a single drop of blood behind. And to Xie Lian's shock—

He looks so emotional.

Dragging him forward, hugging him so tightly, he nearly loses his breath.

"...Thank you," he whispers, sinking back into the pillows with Xie Lian in his arms.

"But...I was in the middle of—"

"For being the best reason I could ever have."

Xie Lian's eyes swim with emotion, burning with tears that finally slip down his cheeks, one by one.

Caught in the double meaning, words spoken between life and death.

'If you can't find a meaning in this life—then allow me to be that meaning.'

'I still have someone precious in this world.'

'I pray to never rest in peace.'

If there is one glaring piece of evidence in favor of his own worth, it's that.

That Hua Cheng is here for him.

That, for thousands of years, Xie Lian has been enough.

Their hands and lips seldom part now, as though this is the only way they know how to catch their breath.

Xie Lian can seldom look back over the long, daunting expanse of his life and say that he's forgiven himself for every mistake. That's he's always been worthy of the love that's been given.

But in that time, he's learned to move past words like deserve and worth.

Learned to see the adoration in his husband's eyes when he wakes every morning. The companionship in his friend's voices when they laugh together. The trust in the way his sons hold onto his hand.

He could never cheapen their feelings by questioning if he was worthy of them.

That wasn't always something that he could see. So lost in his own suffering, walking a narrow path, where someone had shut every single door, then scolded him for fumbling towards the window.

But, as he told his son, that grief wasn't isolated in its existence.

Xie Lian missed Hua Cheng every day—over two hundred and ninety-two thousand of them—

Because he loved him for every single one of them.

Grief is just loving something that you can no longer feel, see, or touch. Its own form of blindness.

Xie Lian has clung to that tiny thread of faith, clawing his way forward. He has been reduced to his very foundations, and that love allowed him to be kind, even when that kindness was a raging act of defiance.

But even through all of that—he was never alone.

Someone was watching over him.

Waiting without hope of acceptance or reward—only wanting to take his hand, and lead him through the dark.

To give him a glass of water after he gave away his own.

Even when Xie Lian thought he had lost him--he came back.

He came back over, and over, and over again. And now he's here, kissing his god breathless—whispering words halfway between love and prayer.

You can't save everyone. Sometimes, you can't even save yourself, or control the paths your life might take.

But the third path isn't always so elusive.

Often, it's as simple as accepting help.

Allowing someone to believe in you—even if it's just one.

One is all it takes.

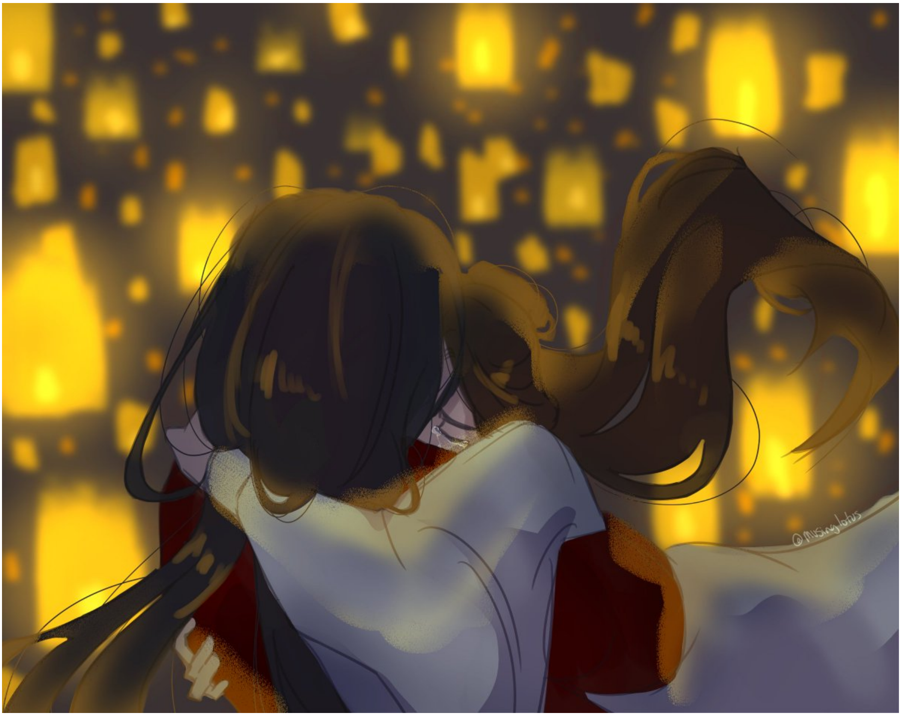
And by Heaven Official's Blessing; No Paths Are bound.

ARTWORK INSPIRED BY THIS STORY

Do not reuse or Repost without Permission

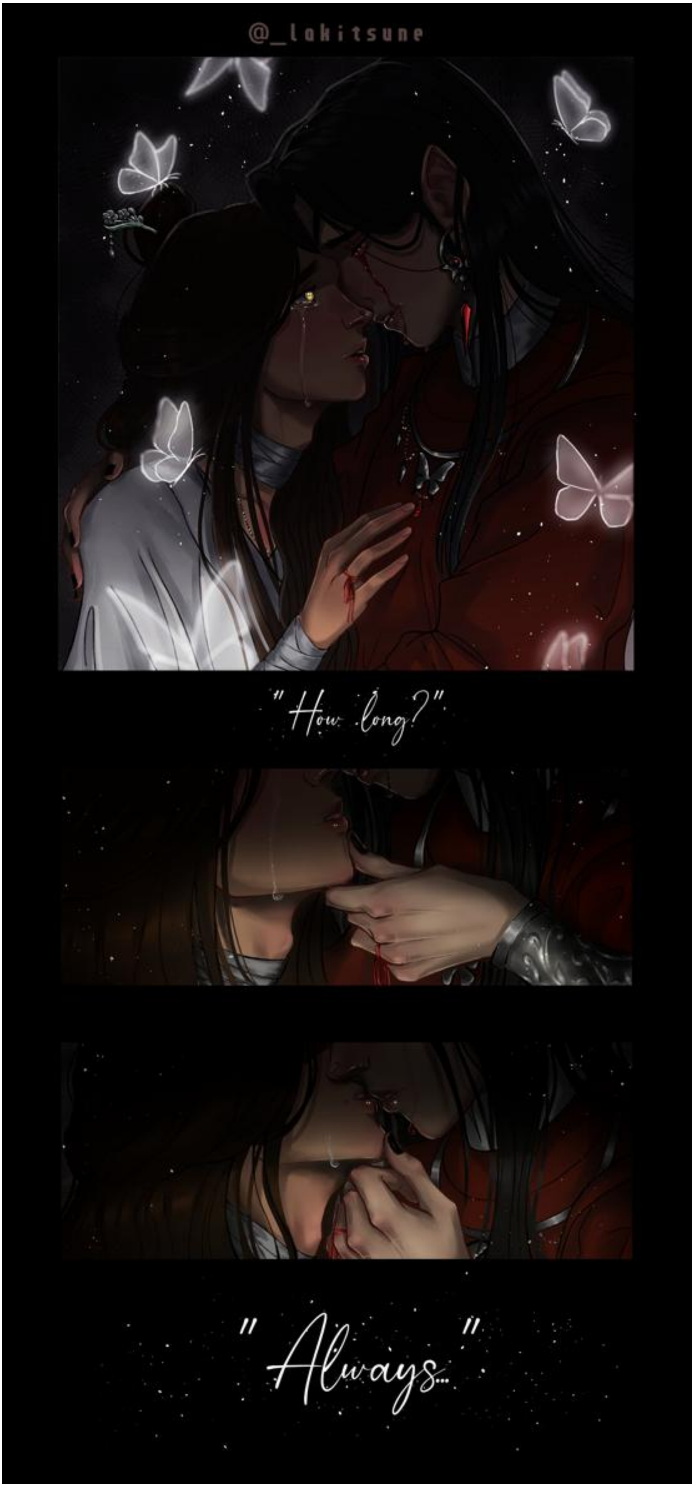
[image]

ROWAN



@musinglotus

MUSINGLOTUS

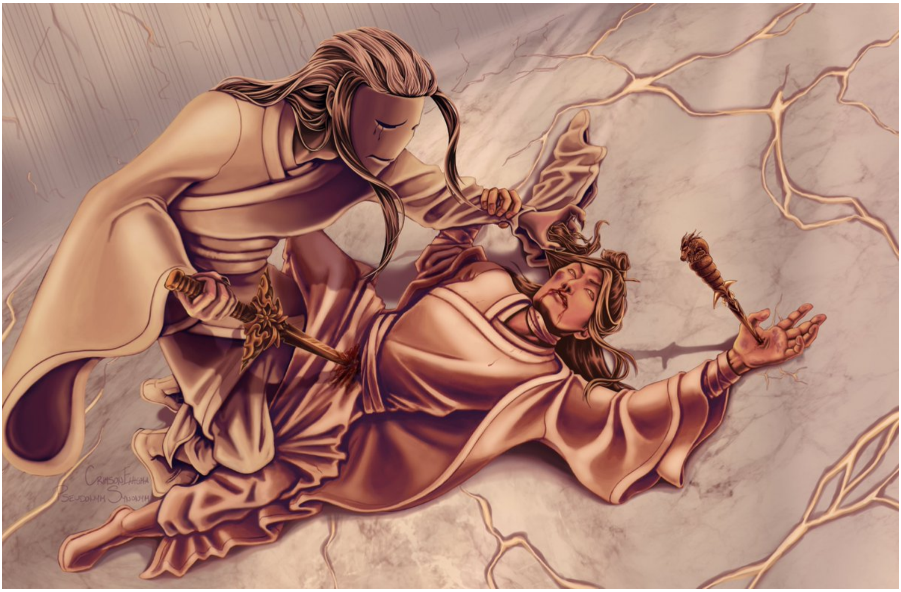


@_lakitsune
"How long?"
"Always..."

@_lakitsune

LAKITSUNE

(TW// BLOOD AND VIOLENCE)



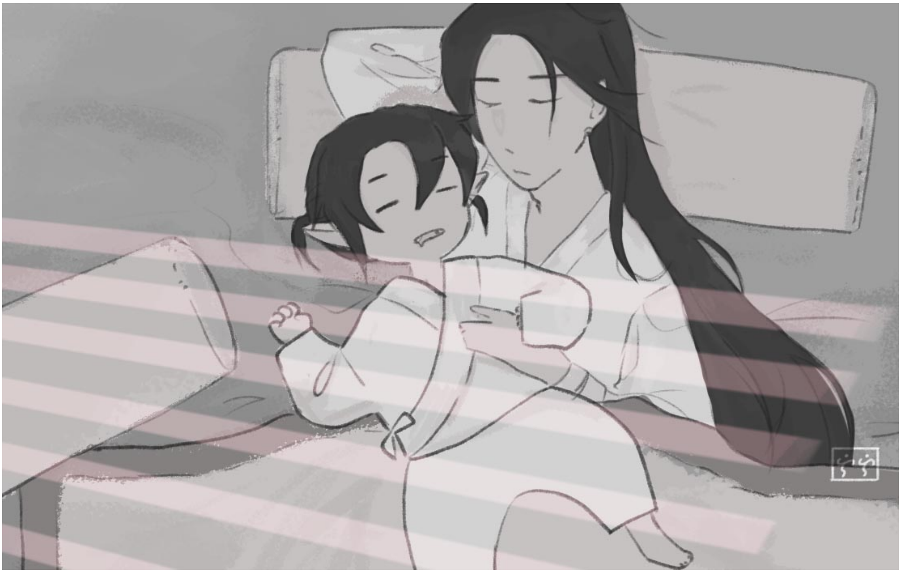
CrimsonEnigma
PseudonymSynonym

CRIMSON ENIGMA

[image]

EVANSFANTASYLOVE

(XIE LIAN + BABY REN SONG)



LILI

Chapter End Notes

> Thank you all so much for following this story! I'll say the rest in the afterword
>
> xoxo, Evie

Afterword / Q & A

Chapter Summary

More will be added to this over time, but for now, here is a note from me and a few questions and answers. I know it might seem excessive, but for a fic this long doing things like this helps me stay organized!

Afterword

First, I want to thank all of you so much for taking the time to read and support this story! I know it's extremely long and that it isn't perfect, but it's one of the most ambitious writing projects I've undertaken, I've gained a lot of confidence, and I've learned so much from it! Writing is a skill you have to practice in order to improve—and while I don't think I'm perfect, and I still have lots of areas where I want to grow and improve, I do think that this story helped me grow a lot as a writer! And I never would have had the motivation to continue to the end without so much kind words of encouragement and support!

I would also like to thank all of the artists who made pieces for this story, people who wrote inspired fics, made edits on TikTok, or just recommended the story to your friends! It created what I can only describe as a community around this story, and I've loved getting the chance to speak to and get to know many of you. Thank you to all the translators who have taken on this behemoth of a project, bringing it to even more people—and thank you to Imaginary Canvas for their beautiful comic inspired by the series! I cannot even begin to explain how flattered, honored, and humbled I have been by all of it.

This story was so special to me, and I will always be grateful to all of you who stuck it out with me, some from the very first chapter. I know this must seem like I take myself a little too seriously, but I worked on this project every day for ten months, and now that it's over I almost feel the need to add a postmortem.

I know it’s silly to be so emotionally attached to a fanfiction—but I can’t help as though I’m leaving an old friend behind. But I hope to keep going, to keep improving, and I would be forever grateful to those of you who come along for the ride.

By Heaven Official’s Blessing, No Paths Are Bound.

xoxo, Evie

Questions Submitted via Ao3 and Twitter

Will there be a sequel?

In short, yes. First, I plan on writing several extras in the form of oneshots that will trace events in the post canon. But after that I plan on writing another long-fic in the same universe that will center around MDZS. Eventually I'd also like to write one centered around SVSSS too to round it all out, but I'm taking things one step at a time for now!

Did you think it was confusing making the title of this fic the title of the third novel?

In retrospect, I absolutely do, but unfortunately, this was not intentional. I read the fan translation by Suika prior to the Seven Seas translation being licensed, and as I think many people can empathize with, I didn't actually know the names of the individual novels when I started writing this story. I just really enjoyed that phrase from the books, it seemed very central to the story to me, so I chose that as a title. This is pretty on theme for me, because you know how a lot of Ao3 authors say, 'Sorry, I'm bad with summaries?' That's me, but with titles. I'm terrible at naming things, it haunts me day and night.

How did you come up with the concept for No Paths Are Bound?

Initially I was intrigued by the cursed shackles, and the role they play in TGCF. I also couldn't help but wonder how differently Book 4 would have played out if Xie Lian was blind. Originally, my only intention was to write drabble exploring that—and once Hong-er's death unfolded, I kept going. Then, by the end of a week, I had rewritten TGCF Book 4, and I didn't want to stop. Other people didn't want me to stop, either. That continued on with writing Hua Cheng's backstory and the 800 year gap, and by then I had written so much new lore and added enough new plotlines that I wanted to round the story out and into its conclusion!

What is Hua Cheng's communication password in No Paths Are Bound?

This can really be a death of the author kind of question, just because I don't think there is any answer that could satisfy the hype around it (in TGCF canon, at least.) But I wrote it with the mindset that it is something along the lines of 'fuck me.'

Is Shi Wudu Qing Yuan's Reincarnation? Is Hua Cheng the reincarnation of the original San Lang?

From my reading experience, lots of xianxia novels cover the topic of reincarnation very differently depending on the world in which they take place—in No Paths Are Bound, most people have very little connections to their past lives, and it's impossible to know who you once were. I won't confirm or deny whether or not those two are reincarnations, because I think it's really more enjoyable if that's left up to the reader. What I will confirm however is that Zhang Wei, Zhao Beitong's first son who died in infancy, is later reincarnated as Wei Wuxian.

What was engraved on the bottom of the hairpin Pei Ming gave Shi Wudu?

"From the Scar." It's a saying that used to be spoken often by soldiers of Xuli, basically stating that strength grows from scar tissue.

Were there any alternative endings or did you change anything for how you expected No Paths Are Bound to go?

I think the biggest thing (tw// sexual assault) that I changed was that Bai Wuxiang was actually going to sexually assault Xie Lian while posing as Feng Xin—but I ended up deciding that it didn't work for the story line, and it felt like the wrong direction to go in.

Out of every character, which did you enjoy writing the most?

Shi Wudu and Mu Qing would be in a tie for that one! I love writing sharp and thorny characters with lots of subtext, and TGCF canon leaves a LOT of leeway with how you can write their internal thought processes and motivations.

Did you ever think you weren't going to finish No Paths Are Bound? Are you surprised it's this long?

Yes and yes. I almost stopped while writing the 'Way of Older

Brothers' chapters because I just didn't think anyone was interested in reading about it. I'm glad I kept going! And I initially only thought the story was going to be ten chapters long!

Are there any arcs you would change/add if you could?

I would definitely cover more with book 2 looking back on it, especially with regards to Feng Xin—and I would have written Ling Wen and Bai Jing's backstory in the 800 year gap.

Did HC and XL ever figure out they were in each other's dreams?

Hua Cheng did, post-canon—but Xie Lian still can't remember his for the most part.

For MDZS, are we starting off in the past like in NPAB?

Yes, we are! I love the way MXTX uses flashbacks, but it's easier for me to write in a more linear timeline.

With the MDZS sequel, will you be doing the pairing of LXC and JGY?

I don't know, to be honest! I love the novels and their adaptations, but I haven't read a ton of fanfiction yet that wasn't heavily wangxian focused. For that reason, I don't really have a lot of firm side ships in that fandom that I like, and haven't made many firm decisions for what pairings are going in the sequel. Aside from wangxian of course—and I also really enjoy Sangcheng, so that ship will be in it for sure!

Why was there such a heavy focus on children in the epilogue?

I find that, while the genre is moving forward in so many ways (there are actual happy endings in queer stories for example, something that just wasn't happening decades ago)—it's still not the norm to show LGBT characters growing older, getting married, having children. Those stories exist, but they aren't as common—especially not in BL. One personal fact about me, the author, is that I have two fathers. And it's important to me as a gay person—raised by gay men—to show that being gay isn't always synonymous with being estranged from your family, and that what we perceive as the happy ending with a husband, dog, and a few kids isn't a heteronormative concept. As a fic writer there isn't much I can do to chip away at that—but I try, and it's a common theme throughout my stories.

How did Mu Qing share his past with Feng Xin and Xie Lian?

(Content Warning for Answer: Rape, Childhood Sexual Abuse) This is going to be covered more so in an extra that surrounds Fengqing and their relationship, but Mu Qing had a panic attack a few months after the final battle—and in the midst of that, he admitted to Feng Xin that he had been raped multiple times by Qi Rong's father over an extended period. Mu Qing and Xie Lian have not had as explicit of a conversation about it, but Xie Lian was able to infer quite a bit from what he overheard in the Inn, and what Mu Qing told him before they were attacked by Jun Wu during the final battle.

How did you make the links between all of the characters and their background stories?

For a lot of it, the framework actually exists in TGCF canon, I just fleshed it out and expanded on it more. I love the novels fiercely, but I would sometimes feel frustrated by how interesting the side characters were, but we learned so little about them. I think the starkest example of this would be the way I wrote Shi Wudu and Shi Qingxuan's backstories in No Paths Are Bound, because a significant amount of it was just expanded from references made in canon. It's canon that the Shi family was tormented by the Reverend of Empty Words since Shi Qingxuan's birth, and its canon that their parents died when the brothers were very young. There is also an observation made in Book 5 that Shi Wudu's downfall was to some extent orchestrated by Jun Wu because he had become a threat to his power. The fandom often portrays him as a very cruel, villainous character—and I understand why—but when you look at the bare bones of his circumstances in the novel, I actually found quite a bit of tragedy and a potential for heroism in it.

Another character where the backstory takes major divergence—Mu Qing's—was done in the way that it was, because I always thought a lot of his behaviors that tend to be perceived negatively were very similar to trauma responses from victims of abuse. There is nothing in canon that suggests that he was abused the way that he was in this story, but the details of him having a dead father, younger siblings to support, and struggling to survive are all true. Children in positions like that are far more vulnerable to being preyed upon. CSA is an extremely personal subject to me, and I find it cathartic to explore the impacts and the recovery process through storytelling. Aside from the abuse, I also wanted to take advantage of the third person omniscient point of view I was writing in to highlight how difficult Xie Lian and Mu Qing's circumstances were, and that there was more nuance in their relationship.

Jun Wu also had big changes in his background story—and the reason for that was simply that his story and the way it was written was one of the only things in TGCF canon that I disagreed with, because it always felt like there was such a severe disconnect from Bai Wuxiang's actions in Book 4—which were blatantly indefensible—and the way the narrative treats him after he's revealed to be the same person as Jun Wu. The two characters never felt like the same person to me, and I found Bai Wuxiang far more compelling as a villain, so I decided to shift the story into a direction that both highlighted the disconnect between the two while also bringing the dark underside to the character more into the light. And that is not a criticism of TGCF at all—if I didn't love and respect the story as much as I do, I wouldn't have created a project like this—but it was just a fun creative exercise for me to explore!

How did you create your OCs?

I grew up in an era where self-insert OCs were the peak cringe factor that anyone could add to a fanfic, so for a long time, I didn't. But as I started writing my own original stories more, I began to feel a little more comfortable with the character creation process. And I often find that, when you want to bridge a gap between something that's canon and what you want to happen in your story, you don't have to twist canon characters into a pretzel to make it work—sometimes, it makes sense to add new characters in there. When I add OCs in any story, it's typically because I see a gap where the character would fit naturally, and because there isn't a canon character that could fulfill that role.

The first and most obvious character is Zhao Beitong, who was created initially for the purpose of fleshing out Hua Cheng's backstory. MXTX is intentionally vague about it, wanting the character to be mysterious—and works that to great effect within the novels. But in No Paths Are Bound, that meant I needed to be creative in writing his backstory. He wasn't formally trained in cultivation, and was only a foot soldier in the army—so how did he gain the skills to become a Ghost King? To me, the most obvious answer was that he had a teacher, and it made the most sense to me that he would have learned those skills in Mount Tonglu. So, I was left with a situation where I needed to create a character that was a fixture in a location where Ghosts routinely slaughter each other until only one remains. There's a point in the novels where Hua Cheng explains that each of the mountains in Wuyong has a name that corresponds to a stage in life, and it was heavily implied that Mount Tonglu was meant to represent birth. And the more I thought about it, the process of creating a Ghost King felt almost gestational. So, I thought to myself; What if the driving force behind Mount Tonglu is a mother? What if she was the one who taught Hua Cheng his skills? There wasn't a canon character who could have filled that gap who also would have had ties to the Kiln. Mei Nianqing was as close as anything as I could think of, but it didn't make sense to me that he would help Hua Cheng, or even be present in that scenario.

That was when I knew I had to make a new character, and when I stopped to think about it…The only substantial mother figure in TGCF is Xie Lian's (for obvious reasons.) But when it comes to fathers…Jun Wu is the first father figure I think of in TGCF, not the King of Xianle. That made me think that I wanted this new character to have been Jun Wu's former wife, and I wanted them to have had children together. The story developed naturally from that point, because so often we're shown these intelligent, heroic men who live and suffer in these stories…but often they climb on the backs of women to get there, and they never credit the women in their lives for their support, or their success. Stories that don't center around women can still show gender disparities and prejudice, and I really wanted to take the choice to show that.

Shuo's character initially wasn't meant to have the as much plot relevance as he would later come to by the end of the story. Initially, characters like Shuo, Bao, Yanlin, Xiang, and Fai, were created because we simply don't have a cast of characters to place around Hua Cheng after he ascends as a Ghost King, and He Xuan and Yin Yu didn't come around for quite some time. And I think since the canon shows him as so solely focused on Xie Lian, it might feel a little unnatural to see him interacting with and having attachments to other characters—but it wouldn't be a very interesting story if he spent 800 years in a dark room by himself, staring at the wall. And of course he does look for Xie Lian—but I wanted to explore what he's like when he isn't around Xie Lian. TGCF is told solely from Xie Lian's point of view, so we only see the side of Hua Cheng that is on display around him. But if you listen to how other characters describe his actions over the years, it's a mixed bag. The Heavens make him seem like a blood thirsty madman—but if you read closely in the scene where Xie Lian and Hua Cheng are stuck in Qi Rong's Inn in Book 3, and you listen to the mortal cultivators complain about him…many of his actions actually come off as fair, and considerate—even when Xie Lian wasn't involved at all.

I couldn't really imagine Hua Cheng with a 'best friend' or anything like that—I didn't think he would necessarily be willing to allow someone into his life that way. Xiang and Fai were meant to explain the gambling background and the birth of the gambler's den—as well as why the Shi family would later become so cursed, and while Hua Cheng had good relationships with both of them, that didn't necessarily show off a different side to him. So, I asked myself— "Is there a character in a position where Hua Cheng wouldn't push them away, and they could get close to him?" And the most obvious answer to me was a child that was dependent on him.

That was the initial motivation between creating Bao, Shuo, and Yanlin. On one hand because they gave me an opportunity to display a softer side of Hua Cheng without Xie Lian necessarily needing to be present—but there was a little more to it. There are already trios in TGCF like the Xianle trio and the three tumors—and the idea of carrying that through to three, low level ghosts was bittersweet to me. Initially, my plan was to kill all of them off. Which I did initially with Yanlin—which was meant to display the struggle for Hua Cheng, who even as someone who is undead, still has to watch people come and go from his life. Holding onto this world for someone precious to him, but that person is constantly being kept away from him. Bao's death was always intended to show the continued animosity between Hua Cheng and Qi Rong, but I still had Shuo left, and I was wondering what to do with him.

Initially, my plan was to make him age to the point of being middle-aged and pair him off with Jian Lan (which is hilarious to consider now) and end up as a step father of sorts to Cuo Cuo, because I thought that would make for a slightly more satisfying ending. But it felt a little too strange to me to jump from a character who had been portrayed as a child to a grown man—and if I did, I'd lose the reason I placed those children around Hua Cheng in the first place; to show a softer, paternal side to him. So, I made him a teenager once we got to the time period of Book One. The name "Autumn Twilight Shrouding Forests" was taken from a classical Chinese poem—because all of the Calamity Titles sound lyrical, and I'm no poet. But it's also a direct reference to his time spent trapped by Lang Ying on the forests of Mount Tonglu, and the Autumn reference comes directly from being raised by Hua Cheng, who is strongly associated with that season. I never planned on pairing him of with Lang Qianqiu—their chemistry was just surprisingly good, and I liked the dynamic, so I took the plot from there. The plan was for Shuo to be dispersed on the Terrace of Cascading Wine and not come back—but I thought that might take too much attention from the importance of the Blackwater Arc. After that, I planned on killing him off when he confronted Bai Wuxiang on Mount Tonglu—but I felt like it would be too much of a downer to have Hualian finally get their happy ending, and now they're left mourning their adopted child. It felt a little too cruel. And if I was going to bring him back—the only way that made sense was to make him forged into a new Calamity, so here we are!

If you ever look at Shuo's character and think he seems a little too informal, or you find yourself empathizing with him—that's intentional. He's meant to be a stand in within No Paths Are Bound for the common people. He wasn't rich, or a prince. He didn't work in a palace or win any battles. He was just a normal child in Xianle, and by creating him and humanizing him so much, it's meant to bring forth all of the pain and sorrow that Bai Wuxiang's actions caused. Because there were millions of other Shuos, Baos, and Yanlins in Xianle—who never did anything wrong, and still had to suffer from the carnage caused by people with incredible amounts of power and privilege. It's easy to brush over the mass deaths of blank identities from centuries ago—but it's harder when they have names, faces, and personalities. That was also why he had such a meaningful exchange with Bai Wuxiang towards the end—it's meant to be an almost allegorical backlash to his crimes against the weak as a whole.

How did you name your OCs?

As I'm sure has probably become abundantly clear to any native speakers who have read this story: I am not. In fact, my understanding of mandarin (even though I am trying very hard to learn) is poor. This makes naming Chinese characters difficult, because there is so much deeper linguistic and cultural context behind a character's name than you can originally realize. I did my best to research name meanings for important characters to ensure that I picked nothing that meant something embarrassing, and I would enter the names in social media databases to make sure people who had those names actually existed (that's usually a good sign) and went from there. But I was not always successful in this effort. (For example, I learned from my friends who are native speakers after the fact that the name 'Hua Ming' is essentially the Chinese equivalent of Timmy Turner, and that ruined my life a little bit.)

Another point in my naming that is likely controversial is the fact that Hua Ming and Hua Bolin seem to be named after other characters. Hua Ming does not use the same character's as Pei Ming to spell his name, so they are similar but different--and in Hua Bolin's case, I assumed that since the ancestor was so far removed (several thousand years worth) that it wouldn't really count as a point of disrespect and/or bad luck, but if that was incorrect of me I do apologize!

Works inspired by this one

On the way by Beware_of_Starlight

Burning skies by Beware_of_Starlight

(Cold Read) No Paths are Bound by Jedi_Claire

Please drop by the Archive and comment to let the creator know if you enjoyed their work!